(II) Out and Out Conversion by Agreement. Even in this country the question whether partnership real estate shall be deemed absolutely converted into personalty for all purposes, or only converted pro tanto for the purpose of partnership equities, may be controlled by the express or implied agreement of the parties themselves; and where by such agreement it appears that it was the intention of the partners that land should be treated and administered as personalty for all purposes, effect will be given thereto.[58]

F. Evidence as to Ownership of Property — 1. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. If land is deeded to one member of a partnership, or to the several members, without any statement in the deed that such grantee or grantees hold the land as the property of the firm, the law presumes that the ownership is in the individual grantee or grantees.[59] Nor is this presumption rebutted by evidence that the land is used by the firm.[60] It is rebutted, however, by evidence that it was bought with firm moneys, and treated in the firm accounts as firm property,[61]

2. ADMISSIBILITY. Parol evidence is admissible to show that land, which has been deeded to one or more of the partners, as individuals, is partnership property, when the question of ownership arises between the partners, or their heirs and personal representatives,[63] and such evidence is generally held to be admissible in controversies between the creditors of the title holding partners and other persons.[64] of members less than all, unless it has been delegated by all. Hence a partner does not work a conversion of firm into individual property by transferring his interest to an outsider,[67] or even to one of several copartners,[68] nor is such a conversion wrought by the several transfers of each partner's interest; it requires a joint act of all the partners.[69] It follows that an individual partner has no right to demand a portion of firm property.[70]

b. When the Firm Is Insolvent. The voluntary conversion of the firm estate into the separate estate of a partner when the firm is insolvent is generally held invalid, as a transfer intended to hinder, delay, and defraud firm creditors.[71] Moreover such a transfer is deemed voluntary, when the only consideration therefor is the insolvent transferee's promise to pay the firm debts.[72] Some courts, however, decline to treat a voluntary conversion as invalid against firm creditors, on the ground that such creditors have no claim, until judgment and execution, upon firm assets, except a derivative one through the partners; and if the partners surrender their lien or right to have firm assets first applied to firm debts, such surrender destroys the very foundation of the creditors' claim, and leaves them remediless. The only exception to the rule, according to these courts, is when the transfer is actually fraudulent.[73] separate property.[74] Such a conversion is not accomplished, however, by an executory agreement merely. So long as the transferee has not performed a condition imposed upon him by the contract the property remains that of the firm.[75] It is well settled that a partner cannot convert firm property into his individual property by using it to pay his separate debts, without the consent of his copartners.[76] If he does so use it, however, there are serious difficulties in the way of a legal action by the firm or by his defrauded associates.[77] But equity will afford relief by requiring the separate creditors to restore the property or to pay its value.[78]

V. MUTUAL RIGHTS, DUTIES, AND LIABILITIES OF PARTNERS.

A. Firm Business and Property — 1. Nature of Obligation Between Partners. While partnership articles generally contain a provision that each partner will be true and just in his partnership dealings, such a clause is unnecessary, for the very relation of partnership imposes upon the members of the firm the obligation of acting with the utmost good faith toward each other.[79] This obligation rests upon partners not only during the life of the partnership, but extends to their statements and dealings, while negotiating for the formation of the partnership, as well as for the purchase or sale of a partner's share and matters incident to winding up firm affairs.[80]

2. Construction of Partnership Articles. Partnership articles are subject to the same general rules of construction as are other written agreements.[81] If their provisions are explicit and unequivocal and do not violate the duty of good faith which each partner owes his associates, it is unnecessary to invoke rules of construction.[82] When the meaning of the articles is not perfectly clear, the court will strive to so construe them as to carry out the intention of the parties.[83] Generally all prior negotiations will be deemed merged in the written contract.[84] If the parties have put a particular construction upon the articles, this will be enforced by the courts, even though it results in modifying or even in canceling certain express stipulations.[85]

3. Forfeiture of Interest and Recovery of Bonus. The law does not favor forfeitures, and it does not treat the mere failure of one partner to pay his share of capital, or of firm expenses, or of firm debts, or to charge himself on the firm's books with moneys received on behalf of the firm, as a cause for forfeiting his interest in the firm property.[86] Such a failure may bar him from a specific performance of certain provisions of the partnership contract;[87] but it will not justify his copartners in exercising the powers of a court of equity and ejecting him from the partnership.[88] It is not infrequent for a partner to pay a premium or bonus for admission to a partnership. In such a case, if a partnership is dissolved before the expiration of the term for which it is formed, otherwise than by death, the English statute authorizes the court to order the repayment of the premium, or of such part as it thinks just.[89] In this country there is but little judicial authority upon the subject, but the intimations are opposed to a return of the premium, or any part thereof, except in the case of fraud.[90]

4. CAPITAL OF THE FIRM. Partnership may exist without the contribution of tangible property of any kind as capital stock. The contract may provide for the "partners mutual exertion of influence in each other's favor,"[91] or in the use of property owned by one or more of the partners as individuals[92] or in the rendition of personal services by one or all of the partners.[93] Whatever is contributed by the members of a firm as capital stock becomes firm property, and ceases to be owned by the contributor as an individual.[94] It is therefore quite important that the partnership agreement should clearly disclose the contribution to capital made by each partner, and whether that contribution consists in the transfer of title to the particular property or in its use only.[95]

5. ASSUMPTION BY FIRM OF A PARTNER'S DEBTS. The individual debts of partners, whether contracted in establishing the partnership, or during its existence, may be converted into the firm debts, by the mutual consent of the partners, if the firm is solvent.[96] The creditor, claiming the benefit of such an assumption, has the burden of showing the mutual consent of the partners,[97] and a valid consideration for the firm's promise to discharge the debt.[98] If he establishes these facts and the further fact of novation, that is, that the obligation of the firm has been accepted by him in satisfaction of his claim against the partner individually, there is no doubt that he can enforce the new obligation,[99] and according to some of the decisions even without such novation he can enforce it.[1]

6. ADVANCES AND LOANS BY PARTNERS TO THE FIRM. When there is an express agreement for advances by one or more of the partners, it will determine the rights and duties of the firm and its members in respect of such advances.[2] In the absence of such agreement, each partner becomes a creditor of the firm and entitled to reimbursement therefrom for all moneys advanced and personal obligations incurred, in the ordinary and proper conduct of the firm affairs, or in the preservation of its business or property.[3]

between the partners, unless the parties have otherwise agreed or acted in their partnership concerns.[4]

b. Interest on Balances. Even when a balance appears on the books of the firm in favor of one or more of the partners, interest thereon does not run in favor of the creditor partner, without an agreement therefor or an assent thereto on the part of all members of the firm.[5]

c. Interest on a Partner's Indebtedness to the Firm. If a partner becomes indebted to the firm with the consent of his associates, the indebtedness will not bear interest until a demand for payment is made and refused,[6] unless there is an express or implied agreement for interest.[7] If the indebtedness arises from a wrongful misappropriation of firm property, interest may be allowed.[8]

8. Kansas.— Krapp v. Aderholt, 42 Kan. 247, 21 Pac. 1063, the failure of one partner to furnish his share of the capital was treated as sufficiently wrongful to subject him to interest thereon.

8. Interest on Capital. In the absence of an express stipulation between the parties, a partner's contributions to the firm's capital do not bear interest in his favor. He must rely upon the profits of the business to compensate him for his investment.[9] When the contributions of the partners are unequal, and there is no stipulation that the excess shall draw interest, the law presumes that the labor, skill, and reputation of the smaller contributor are worth to the firm as much as the excess of capital.[10] Even the failure of a partner to pay in his agreed contribution does not entitle the copartner to interest on his own contribution. He must still look to the profits for compensation for his investment.[11] It is often agreed between partners that interest shall be allowed, either on the entire capital contributed by each, or on that contributed by one, or the excess of contribution.[12] The tendency of the courts is to require strict proof of such agreement by the one in whose favor it is invoked.[13] Even when an agreement for the interest exists, interest is not recoverable after the dissolution of the firm unless there is a special stipulation that it shall be; for upon the dissolution the capital ceases to earn profits.[14] But the withdrawal of a part of the capital during the life of the firm does not deprive the partner of his stipulated interest unless the withdrawal is clearly inequitable.[15]

9. INTEREST ON ADVANCES. Whether money advanced by a partner to the firm as a loan, and not as a contribution to its capital, bears interest in the absence of an express agreement therefor, is a question upon which the courts have differed. Formerly it did not bear interest in England,[16] unless a mercantile usage for interest was shown.[17] And this rule has been adopted in a few decisions in this country.[18] The modern rule, however, both in England and in America, is that a partner who makes for the purpose of the partnership any actual payment or advance beyond the capital which he has agreed to contribute is entitled to interest at the customary legal rate without any express agreement with his copartners therefor.[19]

10. INTEREST OF PARTNERS IN FIRM PROPERTY. The interest of a partner in the firm assets is not that of a tenant in common, or of a joint tenant, at common law. It is the share to which he is entitled under the partnership contract, after the firm debts are paid and the partner's equities are adjusted.[20] It is susceptible of being seized under legal process,[21] as well as of being sold and assigned by its owner.[22] In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, partners are presumed to have equal interests in the firm.[23] Their shares may be fixed at unequal amounts by agreement; and the partnership contract generally regulates this matter.[24]

as to such management, the majority govern.[32] These rules may be modified, however, by the partnership contract, or by the subsequent agreement or conduct of the partners. Thus the control of one part of the business may be committed to one member of the firm, while that of a different part is turned over to another partner.[33] It may be stipulated too that in case of difference of opinion the decision of a single partner may be final.[34]

14. Books of Account. In the absence of an agreement on the subject, the duty of keeping full and accurate accounts in proper books rests equally upon each partner.[35] The books should be kept at the firm's place of business,[36] as each partner is entitled to have free access to them.[37] When the duty of keeping books of account for the firm is assumed by a partner, the entries will generally be treated as conclusive against him.[38] And if he has culpably neglected his duty, the maxim, "Omnia præsumunter contra spoliatorem," will be applied.[39] In case all the partners have had free access to the books the entries therein will be deemed accurate, and the presumption will arise that they were known to each partner.[40] These presumptions may of course be rebutted.[41] The correctness of the bookkeeping of one partner can be questioned by a copartner who is not in pari delicto,[42] and who is not chargeable with laches.[43] A solvent partner is entitled to retain the firm books as against the trustee in bankruptcy of a copartner.[44] A partner who has no share in the good-will of the business is not entitled during the partnership to extract from the books of the firm the names and addresses of customers for the purpose of soliciting such customers on his own behalf after the termination of the partnership.[45]

15. Statements of Account During the Continuance of the Partnership. Statements of account, whether taking the form of periodical balances on the firm's books,[46] or of formal documents interchanged among the partners,[47] are generally conclusive upon the partners, unless impeachable because of fraud or mutual mistake.[48] It is the duty of each partner to examine such accountings and complain promptly of any mistakes therein. Failure to do this and consequent acquiescence in the correctness of the statements operate ordinarily as a bar to any subsequent claim inconsistent with them.[49]

16. Arbitration of Differences. Partnership articles often contain a provision that questions in dispute between partners shall be submitted to the decision of arbitrators to be selected in an agreed manner. The courts are not inclined to enforce such a stipulation either directly by decree for specific performance, or by a refusal to entertain an action for dissolution and settlement by a partner who refuses to act in accordance with the stipulation.[50] If, however, the partners have lawfully submitted their differences to arbitration and an award has been regularly made, the courts will recognize and enforce it.[51]

17. Services and Compensation. As it is the legal duty of each member of a firm in the absence of an exemption therefrom by contract to devote his entire time and business energies to partnership affairs, it follows that a partner is not entitled to compensation for his services, however valuable to the firm they may be, unless there is a contract therefor.[52] Such contract may be express or it may

21. LIABILITY OF PARTNER FOR MISCONDUCT. While losses which are attributable to mere errors of judgment of a partner as distinguished from recklessness or bad faith are to be borne by the firm and not exclusively by him, as just stated,[67] yet, when losses are caused by a partner's acts, which amount to a breach of the partnership stipulation,[68] or which are beyond the scope of the firm business and not assented to or ratified by his copartners,[69] or which are characterized by bad faith toward them,[70] the losses must be borne by him alone. The same rule is ordinarily applied to losses from adventures embarked in by a partner against his copartners' protests,[71] as well as to those due to his positive misconduct.[72]

22. LIEN OF PARTNER ON FIRM PROPERTY. A partner's lien on firm property is not a legal or possessory lien,[73] but an equitable lien; that is, a right to insist that

The transfer of the legal title to the firm property to a purchaser for value and without notice of the firm's interests therein dis-

the partnership effects shall be applied to the payment of partnership debts so that he may be exonerated from personal liability therefor.[74] This right or lien does not entitle the partner to compel a judgment creditor of the firm to have recourse to firm property before collecting the judgment from his individual property.[75] Indeed its principal function is performed in preventing the diversion of the firm assets from firm creditors, and after these are paid, in securing an equitable distribution of the balance among the parties. Accordingly, after firm debts are paid to outside creditors, this lien secures to each partner his share in the balance of the firm assets, as that share is ascertained on the final accounting between the partners.[76] The lien extends, however, only to firm assets,[77] and exists in favor only of claims growing out of partnership transactions.[78]

B. Individual Transactions — 1. Conflict of Partnership and Individual Interests. The duty which the law imposes upon a partner of acting with the utmost good faith toward his copartners, of devoting all his time and energies to the firm's business, and of accounting faithfully for all firm property coming to his hands,[79] makes it hazardous for him to engage in transactions in which his personal interests will be antagonistic to those of his firm. The courts will scrutinize such transactions very closely, and will compel the partner engaging in them to account to the firm for all profits arising therefrom,[80] or to hold for the firm's benefit the property thereby acquired,[81] unless the other partners assented to the transaction,[82] or unless it was entirely free from unfairness on his part.[83] The foregoing principles do not prevent a partner from acting as an agent for a third person in dealings with the firm where the firm is not harmed;[84] nor do they operate to make the other partners parties to a contract which a third person has entered into with one partner as an individual.[85]

2. DEALINGS BETWEEN A PARTNER AND HIS FIRM. While a partner is bound to give all his time and energies to the partnership business, unless exempted therefrom by his copartners,[86] it is quite common for partners to buy property from the firm, or to rent or sell property to the firm,[87] to lend it money or to borrow from it,[88] and in many other ways to deal with it as though it were an artificial person. While such transactions are not considered as creating strictly legal obligations, between the partner on the one side and the firm on the other, courts of equity have always enforced such obligations and, under the reformed procedure both in England and in this country, they are enforceable in appropriate actions.[89] The law merchant adopted the civil law conception of a firm as a legal entity, and permitted the indorsement of negotiable paper, which was made by a firm to a partner or by a partner to his firm with the same effect as though the parties to the paper were strangers.[90] In jurisdictions where an assignee of a chose in action may sue in his own name, an action by the assignee of a partner's claim against his firm, or of the firm's claim against a partner, provided such claim is not a mere item in the partnership account, is maintainable.[91]

3. Dealings Between Copartners — a. In General. The fact that certain persons are copartners does not disqualify them from entering into contracts with each other as individuals. Their rights and liabilities under such contract will be the same ordinarily as though they were not partners,[92] even though these have relation to partnership property or interests, provided such contracts operate to lawfully convert firm property into the separate property of the individuals, and to take all matters connected with the transactions out of the partnership accounts.[93]

b. Purchase of Copartner's Interest in Firm. Purchases by one partner of his copartner's interest in the firm are of frequent occurrence, and when made in good faith operate to vest the ownership of firm property in the purchasing partner,[94] and the right to the purchase-price in the selling partner.[95] Appropriate relief may be had by either party, in case of a mutual mistake of fact involved in the contract.[96] When a partner transfers his interest in the firm to his copartner, not by way of any absolute sale, but as security only for a debt, such transfer does not dissolve the firm, nor vest sole ownership in the transferee.[97] Even a transaction intended as an absolute sale may be avoided by either party for actual fraud,[98] or for the violation of that high degree of good faith and fair dealing which the law requires of the partners in their transactions with each other,[99] or for the nonperformance of a condition imposed by the contract.[1] Ordinarily the sale to a copartner of all the right, title, and interest of the selling partner in a firm carries with it to the purchaser all claims which the seller has against the firm, whether such claims be for capital, advances, or accumulated profits, and it also relieves the seller from all liabilities to the firm for over-drafts or similar indebtedness.[2]

This rule may of course be varied by the particular terms of the contract of sale.[3]

4. Transfer of a Partner's Interest to a Third Person. Purchasers of the share of an individual partner can only take his interest. That interest and not a share of the partnership effects is sold, and it consists of the vendor's share of the surplus which remains after the payment of the partnership debts and the settlement of accounts between the partners.[4] Such share is subject to the fluctuations of the firm's business, including firm debts subsequently contracted; and if, upon the winding up of the firm, the transferring partner's interest has no pecuniary value, the transferee takes nothing by his transfer.[5] In England such transferee acquires no right to interfere in the management of the firm affairs, or to an accounting by the other partners, or to an inspection of the firm books, but only to receive the share of the profits belonging to the transferring partner.[6] But in this country it has been held that a subpartner of one engaged with others in a joint enterprise is entitled to an accounting in reference thereto, although the other partners had no knowledge of the subpartnership.[7] And it has also been held that when a partner has assigned a definite portion of his share of the profits of the partnership, the assignee is entitled to maintain a bill in equity for an accounting and the ascertainment of the profits assigned.[8]

5. Acquiring Title or Interest Adverse to Firm or Copartners — a. During the Existence of the Firm. While the partnership relation continues, the law imposes upon each partner the duty of acting with the utmost good faith toward his copartners. It treats him as their confidential agent in all partnership transactions, and subjects him to the inability of such an agent to secure for himself that which it is his duty to obtain, if at all, for the firm of which he is a member.[9] Accordingly, if he purchases property for his individual benefit,[10] or takes

7. Engaging in Other Business. The law does not permit a partner, without the consent of his copartners, to carry on a business of the same nature and competing with that of the firm.[21] If he violates the rule, equity may enjoin him from carrying on such business,[22] and may compel him to account for and pay over to the firm all profits made therein.[23] But beyond the line of the trade or business in which the firm is engaged, there is no restraint upon the right of a partner to traffic for his own profit,[24] in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary;[25] and even if a partner has agreed not to carry on a separate business, his partners have no right to the profits he makes thereby,[26] although it may subject him to an injunction,[27] or to a claim for damages.[28]

C. Actions Between Partners — 1. Grounds of Action, Form of Remedy, and Defenses — a. In General. As a rule an action at law by one partner against his copartners will not lie on a claim growing out of the partnership transactions, until the business is wound up and the accounts finally settled.[29] It follows that a partner cannot sue a copartner on a contract between himself and the firm,[30] in the absence of legislation permitting it;[31] nor can he maintain trespass or replevin against his copartner for any part of the firm property.[32] The remedy of the complaining partner in such cases is to be sought ordinarily in an equity action for an accounting and settlement of the partnership affairs.[33]

b. but in order that it may form the basis of an action at law, it must show that the partners have agreed upon the sum which each owes to the other.[38] And when the partnership is limited to a single venture, not involving a partnership account, or when but a single item remains unadjusted, or when the parties have partitioned the firm property among them, an action at law will lie, and an accounting in equity is unnecessary.[39]

(II) Effect of Dissolution or Sale of Interest. As a partnership continues after its dissolution for the purpose of collecting its claims, paying its debts, and adjusting its affairs,[40] an action at law cannot be brought by one partner against another for money alleged to be due him on account of partnership transactions, until after a settlement, even though the partnership has been dissolved.[41] But a partner may sell his interest to his copartners, and recover the purchase-price in an action at law, and it is immaterial whether such interest is encumbered or not by the terms of the partnership, or whether its amount is fixed or the price agreed on.[42]

(III) Effect of Accounting. When an accounting and settlement have been had, an action at law will lie for the balance thus ascertained to be due,[43] and the creditor partner cannot maintain a bill in equity for relief,[44] unless he can show fraud or mutual mistake in the settlement.[45] If the fraud consists in false representations as to the state of the firm accounts, or in dishonest appropriation of firm property by defendant partner, an action at law for damages will lie against him.[46]

(IV) Breach of Contract For a Settlement. If the copartners enter into a contract for a settlement to be made at a subsequent date on certain terms, and one of them fails to fulfil his contract, the other may maintain an action at common law for damages for the breach.[47] An action at law may also be maintained for the breach of an engagement in a contract of settlement, provided plaintiff shows that he has duly performed his part of such contract.[48]

c. Breach of Partnership Agreement. While, as we have seen, an action at law will not lie ordinarily for a breach of the partnership agreement, until a partnership settlement has been had,[49] yet it will lie for the breach of an agreement to enter into a partnership;[50] or of an agreement to furnish capital or property, or to do some act antecedent to the formation of the partnership, and which forms no part of the firm's affairs.[51] It will lie also for the breach of individual stipu-

Failure to furnish money.—If, by an agreement between two persons, one agrees to furnish a specified sum of money to carry on a certain business, and afterward fails to furnish the money, he is liable to the other at law for such breach of contract. Ellison v. Chapman, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 224. See also Morgan v. Nunes, 54 Miss. 308. But a bill in equity is the only remedy for a partner's refusal to furnish money in the lations between the partners, although these may be contained in the partnership articles.[52] In this country it will lie also for the wrongful ouster of a party from the firm,[53] or for the wrongful dissolution of the firm, before the expiration of the agreed term of its existence.[54] It will lie too for fraudulently inducing one to become a member of the firm.[55]

d. Compensation For Services. Even when the partnership contract provides that a partner shall receive a fixed compensation for his services, unless the other partner or partners have bound themselves as individuals to pay it[56] he cannot maintain an action therefor. If there is no such obligation his claim is only an item in the firm account, and a settlement must be had, before he can recover any specific sum.[57]

g. Partition of Firm Property. A partner cannot bring an action for the partition of partnership real estate against his copartner, until after the creditors of the partnership have been paid and the interests of the partners adjusted.[62]

h. Tort Actions Between Partners. For actionable wrongs to the person, or to the individual property of one partner, inflicted by a copartner, an action at law will lie.[63] Ordinarily such an action will not lie for the sale and forcible removal of firm property, or for its use, in violation of the wishes of a copartner.[64] But for the tortious destruction of firm property,[65] for its detention and use under claim of sole ownership,[66] for the wrongful ouster of a copartner from firm premises,[67] or for the wrongful and secret appropriation of firm property to the use of one partner the appropriate action at law is maintainable.[68]

1. Assumpsit. As a general rule assumpsit will not lie by one partner against his copartner, in respect to any matters connected with the partnership transactions, or which would involve the consideration of their partnership dealings.[69] But there are cases in which one partner may maintain this action against another.[70] Thus where a partnership has been dissolved and a balance has been struck and agreed upon by the partners, assumpsit may be brought by one partner against another[71] upon an implied promise.[72] And where on a dissolution and closing of accounts, one partner, by mistake, pays another more than is due, he may recover it back in an action of assumpsit.[73] A partner who has sold his interest in the firm may also bring assumpsit for an amount due him as salary, where there has been an express promise to pay.[74] And where one partner sells to another all his interest in the firm, in consideration of the vendee's agreement to pay all the firm debts, the vendor may maintain this action against the vendee to recover a debt due by the firm to the vendor.[75] When by an express agreement partners separate a distinct matter from the partnership dealings and one expressly agrees to pay the other a specified sum for that matter, assumpsit will lie on the agreement

although the matter arose from the partnership dealings.[76] The action is also maintainable, during the existence of a partnership, for the recovery by one partner of money contributed by him to the firm, which the other partner was bound to contribute.[77]

j. Demand Before Action. Whether a demand must be made before an action at law can be properly brought by one partner against another depends upon the cause of action. If it rests upon an express promise which has been broken, or upon defendant's conversion to his own use of property belonging to plaintiff, no prior demand is necessary.[78] If, however, it consists in a claim for money received by defendant as a partner, and which is involved in the partnership accounts, or for defendant's share of debts paid by plaintiff to firm creditors, a prior demand must be shown.[79]

k. Defenses. In an action between partners, it is a valid defense that, since the obligation sued on was contracted, its subject-matter has become involved in the partnership business;[80] that the obligation has been legally satisfied,[81] or has been barred by a settlement;[82] or that it is unenforceable, because of a failure of consideration;[83] or because of fraud or mistake, or of defendant's failure to perform a condition precedent;[84] or because of illegality.[85] But after a partnership contract confessedly against public policy has been carried out, and money contributed by one of the partners has passed into other forms, a partner, in whose hands the profits are, cannot refuse to account for and divide them on the ground of the illegal character of the original contract.[86] And it is no defense to an action by one partner against another for contribution,[87] or for the conversion of partnership property,[88] that the firm was unlawfully engaged in selling intoxicating liquors.

l. Set-Off and Counter-Claim. In an action at law properly brought by one partner against his copartner, defendant is allowed to set off or counterclaim an obligation of plaintiff to defendant as an individual,[89] but not an obligation to the firm, nor any alleged balance against plaintiff on an unsettled partnership account.[90] Nor can defendant recoup a claim for damages growing out of partnership business.[91] There can be no liability from one partner to another by virtue simply of the partnership relation, which can be made the subject of set-off or counter-claim until there has been a settlement.[92]

2. Proceedings in Actions — a. Venue. The proper place for bringing an action between partners is to be determined by the rules applicable to personal actions, in the jurisdiction where the suit is brought,[93] even though it may involve the sale and conveyance of partnership lands.[94]

b. Time to Sue, Limitations, and Laches. A right of action between partners based on a partnership transaction does not accrue until the partnership is dissolved.[95] Within what time a suit must be brought upon such a cause of action is determined ordinarily by statute.[96] Even in the absence of statute plaintiff's suit may be barred by his laches.[97] When an action is brought upon the individual obligation of a partner, its provisions will determine the time when the cause of action accrues.[98] A partner who, after dissolution, buys a certain claim against the firm for the purpose of setting it off against a personal claim of his copartner steps into the shoes of his assignor, and the statute of limitations runs against him as it would against the assignor. Had he paid the claim as a partner, his right of action for contribution would not have been subject to the statute of limitations, until a final settlement of firm affairs.[99]

c. Parties. Where one partner has an individual and personal claim against his partner or partners his remedy is by an action at law brought by him as plaintiff against the partner or partners from whom he seeks relief as defendants.[1] If one partner's obligation is to the firm, and not to his copartner individually, an equity action for an accounting is necessary, to which all persons having property rights in the partnership, or whose presence is necessary to a final disposition of the controversy, must be parties, either as plaintiffs or defendants.[2] Where a subpartner brings suit he may make all the members of the firm defendants in order to compel a discovery and settlement of its business.[3]

d. Arrest of Partner by Copartner. One partner cannot obtain an order of arrest for his copartner in an action involving partnership transactions.[4] But he may obtain and enforce such an order for fraud in inducing him to enter the partnership, or for other misconduct toward him as an individual.[5]

e. Attachment. Ordinarily, in an action between partners, plaintiff is not entitled to an attachment against his copartner's interest in the partnership;[6] nor, if his action grows out of partnership transactions, can he attach or garnish his copartner's individual property.[7] However, the right to an attachment or gar-may be brought for the price after the lapse of a year).

nishment is created and regulated by statute; and in some of the states these remedies are available in equitable as well as in legal actions, whenever the object is to recover money and plaintiff is able to specify the amount of indebtedness.[8]

f. Injunction.[9] A partner may be enjoined from serious breaches of his partnership agreement,[10] or from a course of conduct which amounts to a fraud upon the partnership relation.[11] In this country, however, equity will seldom interfere at the suit of one partner to prevent a dissolution by the other partner or partners, before the time named in the partnership agreement.[12]

g. Receiver. In asking for the appointment of a receiver plaintiff partner invites the court to take control of the firm property and affairs and manage them through its officer, the receiver. This courts are unwilling to do, unless they are convinced that the receivership is only incidental to the dissolution and winding up of the firm.[13] Hence they will rarely appoint a receiver, during the continuance of the partnership, in connection with a suit between the partners as individuals. In case, however, the action is brought because of defendant's fraudulent conduct as a partner, or because of his wrongful exclusion of plaintiff from the firm, and it is apparent that a dissolution must be ultimately decreed, a court of equity will not hesitate to appoint a receiver.[14]

h. Pleading — (I) In General. If an action between partners is for a balance due, the complaint must aver a settlement of firm affairs and a determination of the amount owing by defendant to plaintiff.[15] If it is for a breach of defendant's agreement to collect the firm assets and apply them to the payment of the firm debts, it is enough to allege this agreement and the collection by defendant and the conversion to his own use, without alleging a demand by plaintiff of defendant's performance.[16] If it is for defendant's breach of his contract to pay all of the firm debts, plaintiff, upon paying a firm debt, need not allege notice to defendant of the debt, nor that plaintiff had been sued to judgment therefor.[17] If the action is for contribution, the complaint must allege the respective interests of the partners as well as a final accounting whereby defendant was found to be indebted to the firm in a certain sum, which had been paid by plaintiff.[18] When the action is brought by plaintiff against defendant for the breach of a contract or obligation, which is no part of the firm business, the complaint must allege that it is separate from the partnership account and that defendant has committed a breach thereof.[19] In actions of the kind under consideration the defendant may either demur[20] or interpose a general denial,[21] or in a proper case he may file a plea alleging that the plaintiff's claim relates to unsettled partnership affairs.[22]

(II) Issues, Proof, and Variance. A positive variance or discrepancy between the material allegations of a partner's pleading and proof is, as in actions between other persons, ordinarily fatal to his action or to his defense.[23]

i. Evidence — (I) Presumptions and Burden of Proof. It is presumed that the provisions of a partnership agreement are in accordance with the general rules of partnership law, and the burden of proof is upon the partner who sets up a claim under a special and peculiar provision.[24] Again a partner who sues a copartner at law upon a claim which is ordinarily an item in the partnership account has the burden of showing that this claim has been isolated from the firm business, or that the partnership account has been fully settled, and that the claim in suit is for a balance due him from defendant.[25]

(II) Admissibility, and Weight and Sufficiency. The usual rules as to the admissibility[26] and the weight and sufficiency of evidence[27] obtain in actions between partners.[28]

copartner, for wrongfully dissolving the partnership prematurely, the ordinary measure of damages is what the interest of plaintiff would have sold for.[37] If there is no probability of any profits, there can be no recovery of compensatory damages.[38] On the other hand if plaintiff shows that he relinquished a valuable appointment in order to enter the partnership, what he lost by such relinquishment may be considered by the jury in fixing his damages.[39]

l. Judgment and Execution. The successful party in a litigation between partners is entitled to such a judgment as the pleadings and proof warrant.[40] Even when the losing party has a good defense, if he fails to interpose it a judgment against him will be conclusive,[41] unless it is reversed for some other cause.[42] When the creditor partner enforces his execution against the debtor partner's interest in firm property and buys in such interest he does this subject to the rights of partnership creditors.[43] Moreover he is bound to act with perfect fairness toward the debtor partner, and must do nothing tending to depress the value of the interest which he purchases.[44] If he pays for such interest with firm money, the sale and purchase do not oust the debtor partner from the firm.[45]

VI. RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES AS TO THIRD PERSONS.

A. Representation of Firm by Partner — 1. Power and Authority of Partners Generally — a. Nature and Foundation. The law presumes every ordinary partnership to be based on the mutual trust and confidence of each partner in the skill, knowledge, and integrity of every other partner.[46] Accordingly it assumes that in every such partnership each member is an agent of the firm and of his other partners for the purpose of the business of the firm.[47] The partnership articles need not confer this authority in terms. The partnership relation operates as a grant of power to each partner to transact the firm's business in the usual way,[48] and a third person who has colluded with a partner to defraud his copartners cannot avail himself of the wrong-doing partner's implied authority.[49] So long, however, as a partner's acts are confined to carrying out what appears to be the firm's business in the usual way, his authority is much more extensive than that of a mere agent.[50] If an agency is conferred upon a firm, and not upon the individuals composing it, the rule that, where an authority is conferred upon several persons all must join in its execution, has no application, for the act of one partner is the act of the firm.[51] Generally, however, the appointment of one of several partners as agent is not an appointment of the partnership, and gives no authority to other partners.[52]

b. Commercial Character of the Partnership. It is generally held that the implied authority of a partner is much more extensive in a commercial or trading firm than in a non-commercial firm.[53]

c. Scope of Firm Business. Whether a partnership is commercial or non-commercial, the implied authority of its members depends very largely upon the scope of the firm business. This, in turn, depends chiefly upon two considerations: (1) The usages of business which have grown up in connection with the class of partnerships to which the particular one belongs;[54] and (2) the course of

is a question of fact depending on the partnership articles, course of business, and other circumstances shown in each case.

Commercial partnership defined.— A commercial partnership is a partnership whose conduct so involves buying and selling, whether incidentally or otherwise, that it naturally comprehends the employment of capital, credit, and the usual instrumentalities of trade, and frequent contact with the commercial world in dealings which in their character and incidents are like those of traders generally. In Louisiana it is provided by statute that "commercial partnerships are such as are formed: 1. For the purchase of any property, and the sale thereof, either in the same state or changed by manufacture. 2. For buying or selling any personal property whatever, as factors or brokers. 3. Notice of general business usages.— Of the general business usages which affect a partner's implied authority, those dealing with a firm are bound to take notice. Standard Wagon Co. v. Few, 119 Ga. 293, 46 S. E. 109 (one dealing with a firm is chargeable with notice of the character of the firm business, and, if he takes from one partner a firm note for goods supplied such partner, he is bound to know whether the transaction is within the apparent scope of the partnership business); Herlehy v. Ferguson, 47 N. Y. App. Div. 237, 62 N. Y. Suppl. 648; Venable v. Levick, 2 Head (Tenn.) 351 (if the public have the usual means of knowledge given them in regard to the business of a partnership, and no acts have been done or suffered by the partners to mislead, everyone is presumed to know the nature and extent of the partnership with whose members he deals; and where a person takes a partnership engagement, without the authority of the firm, for a matter not within the scope of its authority, he is guilty of a fraud, and cannot enforce such engagement); Peterson v. Armstrong, 24 Utah 96, 66 Pac. 767; Gutheil v. Gilmer, 23 Utah 84, 63 Pac. 817; Cavanaugh v. Salisbury, 22 Utah 465, 63 Pac. 39; Town v. Hendee, 27 Vt. 258.

d. Majority and Minority of Firm. In the absence of a provision in the partnership contract to the contrary, differences arising as to ordinary matters connected with the firm business may be decided by a majority of the members, acting in good faith.[57] No change may be made, however, in the nature of the firm business, or in its membership, or in the place where it is to be carried on, without the consent of all existing partners.[58]

e. Restrictions on Partner's Authority. These are often imposed, either in the partnership articles, or in a separate contract. While they are binding upon the partners they do not affect third persons, who deal with the firm or any member thereof, without notice of them; for the implied power of a partner is determined by what the partnership assumes to the public to be, and by its ordinary mode of doing business.[59] Even in the absence of an agreement between the

No. 701, 3 McLean 172, holding that where a partner in two firms draws a bill by one firm on the other, payable to himself, for his individual debt, which is accepted by the firm, such bill cannot be recovered on by the payee against the drawers or accepters; but it can be enforced by an indorsee for value without notice.

Enforceable in equity.— "The authorities to be closely scrutinized, when the common member assumes to act on behalf of both firms; and if he uses the property of one firm to pay his individual debt to the other, or otherwise defrauds the first firm, the transaction may be set aside.[62] The fact that a partner in one firm is or becomes a member of another does not of itself involve the first firm in the business affairs of the second, or make the first firm liable for the acts and transactions of the second.[63] But one firm, by adoption or ratification, may make itself liable for the contracts or torts of the common partner, although these originally bound only the other firm.[64] When two firms with a common partner have the same firm-name, it is sometimes difficult to determine which firm is liable upon the contracts made in this name. If the contract is actually connected with the business of the firm on whose behalf it purports to be made, there will be no difficulty in holding all of the members of that firm liable thereon.[65] If, however, it purports to be made on behalf of one firm, but is actually made for the benefit of the other, the first firm will be liable notwithstanding, unless the other party to the transaction knows the nature thereof.[66] When the firms with a common member are known to a person as distinct partnerships, he is bound to exercise reasonable care in ascertaining which firm he is dealing with.[67] If, in the exercise of such care, he enters into a contract, which is within the apparent scope of the business of the firm with which he supposes himself to be dealing, every member of that firm will be liable to him thereon.[68]

g. Individual Contracts and Firm Liability. A partnership is not liable for

are therefore uniform to the effect that one firm cannot maintain a common-law action against another having a common partner, although the law does not treat contracts between such firms as void, and it is only necessary for the creditor firm to make an assignment of its claim, to make it collectable by an action at law. Evidently, as the technical rules mentioned are the only obstacle to the collection of a debt by one firm against another in an action at law, the prohibition does not rest upon any obvious injustice, but is a good illustration of that inelasticity of the common law which it is the province of equity to remedy. The authorities agree that equity may take cognizance of these cases in a suit between the parties. Still equity follows the law in both respects. It does not treat the partnership as an entity, nor does it make the common partner both complainant and defendant; but, all being before the court, it so frames its decree as to grant proper relief." money borrowed, or goods bought, or contracts made by a partner in his individual capacity and not in the character of an agent for the firm, simply because such money, goods, or contracts are applied to the use, or inure to the benefit of the firm.[69] The firm may be liable, however, when the individual contracts or transactions of the partner have been adopted by the firm, and their benefits enjoyed by it.[70] But as a rule a partner's individual transactions, especially those which precede the formation of the partnership, bind him only, although their fruits come into its possession.[71]

h. Use of Firm-Name. Each partner has implied authority to bind the firm and each member thereof by contracts and obligations executed in the firm-name, and which are within the scope of the firm business as such a business is ordinarily conducted.[72] Where the partners have adopted a firm-name, they will not be bound by an obligation executed in any other name by a partner unless the use of such name has been assented to or ratified by the other partners,[73] or unless the difference in the two names is immaterial.[74] But a written contract will be binding on the firm, although signed with the individual names of the partners instead of with the firm-name, when it is shown that it was given in a firm transaction and intended as a firm obligation.[75]

i. Use of Individual Name. At times the individual name of a partner, or of an outsider, is adopted as the firm-name or style. In such cases its use in firm transactions binds all the partners as would the use of any other stipulated firm-name.[76] Even when the firm-name is different from that of any member, a partner may bind them by a contract in his name, when it is shown to be a partnership contract.[77] The use of an individual partner's name, however, raises a strong pre-

in the name of the firm and for its use, in the course of the firm's business, if this is done with the previous assent of the copartner,[81] or if such execution is ratified by him, either in express terms or by his conduct.[82] But in a few jurisdictions the rule is that one partner cannot bind another by an instrument under seal, without authority or ratification under seal.[83] If the instrument would be valid without a seal, the courts are disposed to treat the seal as surplusage, if possible, and thus hold the copartners.[84] It is generally held that a sealed instrument executed by one partner is binding on him, even when not enforceable against his copartners,[85] and such an instrument when executed by one of several partners, although not binding on the firm, is binding on one who signs as a surety.[86]

Transactions as factor or broker.— A contract on behalf of a firm to act as factor or broker for a third person is binding on all of the members, although made by one partner, provided it be within the scope of the firm's business as such a business is ordinarily conducted (Todd v. Jackson, 75 Ind. 272, 56 Ind. 406; Galloway v. Hughes, 1 Bailey (S. Lawrence v. Dale, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 23 [affirmed in 17 Johns. 437]. A contract by a partner to pay a person for past services to others, with reference to the subject-matter of the partnership, before the existence of the partnership, is not within the scope of his authority. Rice v. Jackson, 171 Pa. St. 89, 32 Atl. 1036. A contract creating in fact a new partnership between two different firms, although both engaged in the same business, cannot be made on behalf of either firm by a single member thereof but requires the consent of all the members. Buckingham v. Hanna, 20 Ind. 110. As a rule one partner has no implied authority to bind his firm by subscribing for the stock of a corporation (Livingston v Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 2 Grant (Pa.) 219; Patty v. Hillsboro Roller Mill Co., 4 Tex. Civ. App. 224, 23 S. W. 336), even though the existence of such corporation would incidentally benefit the firm (Barnard v. Lapeer, etc., Plank Road Co., 6 Mich. 274). In order to hold the firm on such a subscription, actual or apparent authority on the part of the subscribing member must be shown (Maltby v. Northwestern Virginia R. Co., 16 Md. 422; Union Hotel Co. v. Hersee, 79 N. Y. 454, 35 Am. Rep. 536; Ogdensburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Frost, 21 Barb. (N. that a partner has no implied authority to impose his individual obligations upon the firm.[90] It seems that a partner has no implied authority to waive the benefit of exemption laws with respect to his copartners.[91]

b. Hiring and Leasing Property. Whether one partner has implied authority to hire property for the firm depends upon the question: Is such a transaction within the scope of the firm's business as such a business is usually conducted?[92] The same test is to be applied when personal property of the firm is leased by a partner. In the case of firm realty, however, a lease under seal executed by one partner in the name of the firm does not pass the estate of the other partners without evidence of previous authority or subsequent ratification by them.[93]

c. Contracts of Employment. Each partner is the general agent of the firm in contracting for the services of third persons, when the employment of such persons is an act done in the ordinary course of business of the partnership.[94] The firm is also bound by a contract of this kind, when the conduct of the other partners gives the third person the right to assume that the contract is within the scope of the firm's business, or when they have assented to it.[95] In such a case the employee is the agent or servant of the firm and not of the individual partner who is active in employing him.[96] When the contract is not made in the ordinary course of the partnership business,[97] or the third person knows that the partner contracting with him is bound by the partnership agreement to provide personally for this service,[98] the contract does not bind the firm.

d. Alteration or Rescission of Contract. Whether one partner has implied authority to alter or rescind a firm contract depends upon the nature of the transaction. If in making the alteration or rescission he is exercising the same power as when he entered into the original contract, he can bind the firm;[99] but if the alteration or rescission calls for the exercise of a power which is not incident to the conduct of the firm business in the ordinary manner, it will not bind the other partners unless they authorize or assent to it.[1]

3. Authority as to Agents. It follows as an immediate consequence of the fundamental rule of partnership law that each partner has the power to contract for the firm on partnership affairs, that each partner has implied authority to appoint other persons agents for carrying on the partnership business,[2] and such agents so appointed become the agents, not of the individual partner appointing them, but of the firm,[3] for whose acts each partner is equally liable, whether he

99. Harper v. McKinnis, 53 Ohio St. 434, 42 N. E. 251, holding that one member of a firm of real estate brokers may bind his copartners by a revocation of a contract previously entered into by him with the owners of lands, whereby, for a time agreed on, such firm acquired an exclusive right to sell such lands. See also Shellito v. Sampson, 61 Iowa 40, 15 N. W. 572, holding that it was error to charge that one partner cannot rescind a firm contract without the consent of his copartner, where it does not affirmatively appear that the whole business of the firm was carried on under that contract, and that its rescission would work a practical dissolution, or without instructing the jury to find such facts before applying the rule.

Dec. 53 (holding that every member of a partnership is in legal contemplation, without any special powers being conferred upon him, not only a principal of the firm, but a general agent for all the copartners in the transaction of their company's business, that all are regarded as being present and sanctioning the engagements of each on partnership affairs, and that hence each partner is vested with the right to employ an agent for the partnership, and all are bound by the contract); Tillier v. Whitehead, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 269, 1 L. ed. 131 (holding that one of two partners may give an authority to a clerk under the name of the house, and that the clerk may in consequence thereof accept bills, and sign and indorse notes in the name of the company). See also Paton v. Baker, 62 Iowa 704, 15 N. W. 586, holding that if one member of a firm can make a valid sale of real estate belonging to the partnership, then the one who holds the legal title may authorize another to make the sale and conveyance, especially if the sale is not made for a purpose outside the scope of the partnership business, as for paying his individual debt.

3. Johnston v. Brown, 18 La. Ann. 330 (an agent of a partnership is not the agent of the partners individually, but of the firm, and he cannot act for one alone); Ayer v. Ayer, 41 Vt. 346 (an attorney employed by one partner to act for the partnership is the attorney of the firm, and equally accountable and subject to the direction and control of one as the other of the partners). Compare Wheatley v. Tutt, 4 Kan. 240; Rex v. Leach, 3 Stark. 70, 3 E. C. L. 598, where knew of the employment or not,[4] and for whose services as agent all are equally liable, whether he was employed by one or all of them.[5] These principles are so elementary in the law of partnership that few cases discuss them. Rather, it is usually assumed without discussion that a partnership may become a principal, and be liable in all respects as an individual for the resulting agency.[6]

4. Purchases, Sales, and Warranties — a. Purchases — (1) In General. When partners are engaged in the sale of merchandise as a business, each partner has implied authority to bind the firm by purchases of merchandise in which the partnership deals.[7] The same rule obtains in the case of purchases made by a partner for the firm, in carrying on its business in the usual way, whether the partnership is in trade or not.[8] If, however, such purchases are not within the scope of the firm business as ordinarily conducted, the other partners will not be liable therefor unless they actually authorized the purchase, or have adopted it.[9] A a servant of a partnership was held to be a servant of each partner, and liable to a charge of embezzlement from either individually.

4. Lucas v. Darien Bank, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 280; Harvey v. McAdams, 32 Mich. 472, holding that the assent of one of two partners to the employment of a constable for the service of an execution in favor of the firm bound both; what either partner does about the firm business is presumptively done with the assent of the other.

Rule inapplicable to mining partnerships.— Where one of several owners of a mine employed an attorney, he was held not to be the agent of the other owners, the court making a distinction between a mining partnership and a commercial partnership. partner's implied authority does not extend to pledging the credit of the firm for property which the seller knows is for the personal use or benefit of the partner.[10] A partner, by giving notice to persons dealing with the firm not to extend credit to his copartner, may limit his liability so that he will not be liable for goods furnished in violation of such notice.[11]

(II) Purchases of Real Estate. When the purchase of real estate is within the scope of the partnership business, one partner may bind the firm by a contract therefor.[12]

b. Sales — (I) In General. In a trading or commercial partnership, each partner has the power of selling the partnership effects for the purposes of the business.[13] Where, however, a partnership is not formed for the purposes of trade, property not held for the purpose of sale cannot be sold by one partner without the consent of the other,[14] although an unauthorized sale may be validated by the assent of the other partners.[15] Every partnership, whether commercial or non-trading, may incur debts in the line of its business and either partner may, without the express assent of the other, transfer partnership property or assets in payment of such indebtedness.[16] A partner has no implied authority to give away firm property;[17] and a person taking a transfer of firm property from one partner in fraud of the others acquires no title thereto.[18] A sale by a partner of his interest in the firm does not carry title to any particular property.[19]

(II) Sale and Conveyance of Real Estate. The agency resulting from partnership relations does not authorize one partner to dispose of the real estate of the firm, and pass a legal title thereto,[20] unless because of the nature of the partnership or the agreement of the parties the real estate is to be regarded as personalty.[21] If, however, the conveyance by one partner was made in the presence or with the consent of his copartners, or has been ratified by them, it will be binding upon all.[22] Such a conveyance also conveys the individual interest of the partner who executes the transfer.[23] If firm real estate stands in the name of one of the partners, he may make a valid legal conveyance thereof; and a bona fide purchaser from him will hold free from the equities of his copartners.[24]

(III) Assigning Choses in Action. A partner has implied authority to assign choses in action belonging to the firm, and the bona fide assignee acquires a valid title under an assignment, by a partner in the name of the firm.[25] But an action cannot be maintained on an assignment of the interest of one partner in a partnership claim unsupported by proof of dissolution of the firm, or that the partner's interest was entire.[26]

(IV) Disposing of Entire Property. Unless it is otherwise provided by statute[27] a partner has implied authority to dispose of the entire personal property of his firm, and if the transfer is made in the course of trade, that is, if it is a transfer incidental to the regular business of the firm, it is binding upon all the partners in favor of a bona fide transferee.[28] But it is otherwise if such a transfer is not in the course of trade,[29] especially if it is made for the purpose of breaking up the firm or under such circumstances that it practically terminates the business,[30] or if there is no necessity therefor.[31] And where such a transfer is made without the consent of a copartner who is accessible at the time, it is a fraud on the latter and may be avoided by him, although it be made to bona fide creditors of the firm.[32]

Such a transaction will vest the transferee with the interest of the transferring partner only.[33]

c. Warranties. One partner cannot bind his copartner to execute a deed with covenants of general warranty;[34] but, upon the sale of personal property of the firm by a partner, his warranty thereof will bind his copartners whenever such engagement is incidental to the particular contract of sale, or has been assented to by them.[35]

5. Mortgages and Pledges — a. Of Real Estate. A partner cannot make a valid legal mortgage or deed of trust of firm real estate, without the assent or ratification of all the partners.[36] It is believed that he may bind the firm by an equitable mortgage;[37] and equity will certainly sustain a mortgage upon firm realty given by one partner to secure a firm debt, in a jurisdiction where equity treats such realty as personal estate.[38] An unauthorized mortgage of firm realty will bind the interest of the mortgaging partner.[39]

pledge or assign firm property as security for his individual debts,[45] although the conduct of his copartners may be such as to estop them from questioning his authority.[46] While an assignment, mortgage, or pledge of firm property by a partner to secure his individual debt is not binding on the partnership,[47] it is not void, but imposes a charge upon the transferring partner's interest in the firm property thus transferred.[48]

his copartners.[53] Whether a pledge of a partner's individual property to secure his debts entitles the pledgee to hold it for firm debts depends upon the terms of the agreement made when the property was pledged.[54]

c. Transferring Firm Property to Pay Firm Debts. Each partner is entitled to have the firm property applied to the satisfaction of its debts, and hence he has implied authority to so apply it.[55]

d. Application of Payments. When there are distinct demands, one against a partnership and the other against a member of the partnership, if the money paid be that of the firm, the creditor is not at liberty to apply it in payment of the individual debt, as that would be to allow the creditor to pay the debt of one person with the money of others.[56] In such case the creditor must have the assent of all the partners.[57] On the other hand, if the money be that of the paying partner, it must be appropriated to his individual debt, unless he authorizes or ratifies its application to firm debts.[58] Where a party owes one account to an individual, and another to a firm, of which such individual is a member, and the individual account is assigned to the firm, it is immaterial on which account money paid is credited.[59]

Wisconsin.— Morse v. Hagenah, 68 Wis. 603, 32 N. W. 634; Freeman v. Carpenter, 17 Wis. 126.

See 38 Cent. Dig. tit. "Partnership," § 241.

This rule applies as well to partnerships formed for mechanical or manufacturing as to commercial partnerships, and to special partnerships as well as general partnerships. Hoskinson v. Eliot, 62 Pa. St. 393. See also Morse v. Hagenah, 68 Wis. 603, 32 N. W. 634.

It is an incident of a trading partnership to borrow money with which to carry on the business in the ordinary way. Brite v. Guy, 88 S. W. 1069, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 57; Parker v. Parker, 80 S. W. 209, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2193; Stevens v. McLachlan, 120 Mich. 285, 79 N. W. 627; Hoskinson v. Eliot, 62 Pa. St. 393; Union Nat. Bank v. Neill, 149 Fed. 711, 79 C. C. A. 417, 10 L. R. A. N. S. 426; Brown v. Kidger, 3 H. & N. 853, 28 L. J. Exch. 66. And see supra, VI, A, 1, b. And a firm carrying on a retail liquor business is a trading firm. Caraway v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, (Tex. Civ. App. 1895) 29 S. W. 506.

Notes borrowed.— A partner may borrow a note or bill for the purpose of raising money for the use of the firm (Hogan v. Reynolds, 8 Ala. 59; Buettner v. Steinbrecher, 91 Iowa 588, 60 N. W. 177; Hutchins v. Hudson, 8 Humphr. (Tenn.) 426), provided not more be affected by the borrowing partner's misapplication of the money, if he has acted in good faith.[74] If, however, the borrowing transaction is not within the scope of the partnership business, as such a business is ordinarily conducted, the firm will not be bound, unless the loan has been applied to the firm's benefit with the knowledge of the other partners, or their assent or ratification in some other way is shown.[75] If the loan is made to an individual partner on his credit, the firm is not liable, although the money ultimately goes to the use of the firm.[76]

9. Negotiable Instruments — a. Authority of Partner in General. Whenever the ordinary conduct of the business of a firm involves the use of negotiable paper, each partner is agent for all to sign the firm-name to such paper and negotiate it.[77] And negotiable paper issued within the scope of the partnership than legal interest be paid for such bill or note (Hutchins v. Hudson, supra).

Liability for usurious interest.— A partner who knowingly, and without objection, allows the financial partner to continually raise money at usurious rates, thereby impliedly gives him authority to bind the firm to pay usurious interest, from which he can only escape by pleading usury. Hurd v. Haggerty, 24 Ill. 171.

Authority limited by agreement.— A partner is not authorized to borrow money in the firm-name because he is allowed "to draw drafts, sign contracts, buy cotton, and otherwise generally supervise the business," where by the partnership articles the concurrence of both partners is required. King v. Levy, (Miss. 1892) 13 So. 282.

Notes given by one partner, in the partnership name, as security for money borrowed, are binding on the partnership, unless the transaction was out of the ordinary course of business, or the lender knew that the partner wanted the money for his own private use. Potter v. Dillon, 7 Mo. 228, 37 Am. Dec. 185; Bascom v. Young, 7 Mo. 1.

False representation.— The fact that the representation that money borrowed by one partner in the firm-name is to be used in the firm business is false does not release the partnership. Benninger v. Hess, 41 Ohio St. 64.

Where authority implied.—The law implies an authority in one of several partners to execute notes in the name of the firm: (1) Where such authority is necessary to the successful carrying on of the business of the firm; (2) according to the usage of similar partnerships; or (3) according to the course of trade of that particular partnership. Gray v. Ward, 18 Ill. 32.

Character of partnership as affecting authority.— If the firm is a commercial or trading partnership, this agency is implied. In Georgia by statute (Civ. Code, § 2643) a member of a non-commercial or non-trading partnership may bind the other members of the firm by negotiable paper signed in the firm-name. Davis v. Howell Cotton Co., 101 Ga. 128, 28 S. E. 612.

If a firm is engaged to any extent in making collections, even though that may not be the principal business, one of the firm may give a note for a balance of money collected by it. Van Brunt v. Mather, 48 Iowa 503.

The members of a partnership created for a particular enterprise are not liable on a note executed in the firm-name by one member, without authority, in the absence of proof of a previous consent to the execution of the note or a subsequent ratification thereof. Gray v. Ward, 18 Ill. 32. See also Freeman v. Gordon, 59 Ill. App. 189; Toland v. Lutz, 2 Ohio Cir. Ct. 453, 1 Ohio Cir. Dec. 584.

Burden of proof.— A note executed by a partner in a trading partnership in the firm-name prima facie binds the partners, on the theory that the partner had authority to make the note, and a copartner, asserting the contrary, has the burden of proving it. Mitchell v. Whaley, 92 S. W. 556, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 125.

Where one partner in a limited partnership affixes the name of the firm to a note during the existence of the partnership, the parties are prima facie liable thereon; and the burden of proof lies upon any partner seeking to escape liability. Jemison v. Dearing, 41 Ala. 283.

Authority limited by partnership articles see Dreyer v. Sander, 48 Mo. 400.

Evidence as to character of business admissible.— It being a material question whether certain acceptances in the name of a firm were binding on the partnership, or were the act of one partner individually, without the knowledge of his copartner, and for a consideration outside the scope of the firm business, evidence showing the nature and character of the general business in which the firm was engaged is admissible. Where partners purchase realty as individuals, the power of one to bind the others by acceptance of a draft for part of the purchase-money must be proved by some evidence of direct authority, and cannot be inferred from the fact of partnership. Schaeffer v. Fowler, 111 Pa. St. 451, 2 Atl. 558.

Purpose distinct from firm business.— If one partner gives a note in the name of the firm for a purpose distinct from the firm business, the law does not presume that he acted honestly and with the assent of his copartners, but such apparent misuse of the partnership name is prima facie evidence that he acted without authority and in fraud of his copartners. Where one partner keeps the bank-account of the firm in his own name, with the knowledge and consent of the other partners, all partnership debts and accounts being paid by checks drawn and signed by him alone, the firm is liable on such a check drawn in its business.[84]

b. Appointment of Agent to Execute. One partner has implied authority to appoint an agent to make and indorse negotiable paper for the firm.[85]

c. Partnership or Individual Transactions. A note given for a firm debt in the firm-name and in the course of its business is a firm note, although executed by one partner,[86] even though the firm-name is that of one partner only.[87] But where a partnership is carried on in the name of an individual, the presumption is that a note signed by such individual is his note and not that of the firm. If the individual whose name is used declares at the time of the transaction that it is on account of the firm, that is sufficient to bind the firm.[88] Even when given in part for the individual debt of the executing partner, it is enforceable against the firm to the extent of any firm indebtedness included in it.[89] A note signed in the individual names of the partners is presumably their individual obligation;[90]

but oral evidence is admissible to show that it was a partnership transaction.[91] Where the members of a firm execute a note to a member of the firm, and he assigns and indorses it to a third party, a suit may be maintained by the latter against the other members of the firm.[92]

d. Form and Requisites. When negotiable paper is signed or indorsed in the name agreed upon in the partnership articles, or in the name recognized by the firm as its business name, or in a name not materially different from its business style, the courts are agreed that it is properly executed.[93] Even when not so executed the holder may recover against the firm if he can show that the paper was issued or has been adopted by the firm as its obligation.[94] When paper has been issued by a partner which is not so executed as to entitle the payee to recover on the instrument, he may still be entitled to recover upon the original consideration.[95]

e. Sealed Bills and Notes. From the principles already stated[96] it follows that a bill or note under seal, given in the firm-name by one partner, does not bind the firm, but only the member or members signing it.[97] But such paper may be assented to by the other partners at the time of execution, or subsequently ratified;[98] and

In case the firm-name is that of the partner who indorses the paper, the indorsement will not bind the firm, unless the paper is owned by the firm or is represented to be that is aware that the transfer to him is made for the indorsing partner's individual benefit, neither the transfer nor the indorsement contract is binding upon the firm unless actual authority or ratification is shown.[20] Nor as a general rule has a partner in a non-trading firm implied authority to transfer its paper by indorsement.[21] When paper, payable to the order of a partner, is indorsed by him in the firm-name, legal title to the paper passes; for the firm signature includes the signature of every partner assenting thereto.[22] Where the payee of a note in forming a partnership gives it his power of attorney, the other partner may indorse the note in the partnership name.[23]

j. Payees Without Notice and Bona Fide Holders.[24] Where a partnership is engaged in trade and commerce, or it is the common custom or usage of such business to bind the firm by negotiable instruments, or it is necessary to the due transaction thereof, payees without notice of want of authority or of circumstances which should put them on inquiry and bona fide holders are entitled to hold all the members of a firm upon negotiable paper, issued or indorsed in the firm-name by any partner.[25] No such right attaches, however, to a payee or holder having knowledge or notice that the paper was issued or indorsed by a partner without the authority or assent of his copartners and for his individual benefit;[26] or otherwise in fraud of his copartners.[27] Nor does it usually attach in favor of any holder of the negotiable paper of a non-trading firm.[28] Where a is binding on the firm, if the payee had good reason to believe, and did really believe, the note to have been given with the assent of the firm. Cotton v. Evans, 21 N. C. 284.

Belief in firm's assent.— A partnership note given for the individual debt of one partner

A misapplication by a partner of the funds borrowed constitutes no defense to a suit for the payment of a note given therefor in the name of the firm, unless it is shown that the lender at the time of the loan had knowledge that the same was to be used for other than partnership purposes. Gregg v. Fisher, 3 Ill. App. 261.

Indorsement of third person forged.—A, the active member of an insolvent firm, made a number of promissory notes in the firm-name in favor of one B, by whom the notes purported to be indorsed, but the indorsements were all of them forged. The notes were presented to a bank and negotiated by A, who received the money on them, and a large part of the proceeds were appropriated to partnership purposes. It was held that, although the bank could not claim on the notes, it could rank for the amount of them as money paid. Graham v. Nova Scotia Bank, 12 Nova Scotia 251.

C. & Co., indorsing it in the name of E. & Co., and handing it over to plaintiff bank in payment of an overdraft of E. & Co. Circumstances putting upon inquiry.— If a creditor knew or had reasonable ground to believe that the money for which a note was given by a partner was not borrowed for the use of the firm, or the circumstances were such as to put him upon inquiry and he neglected to inquire, the firm is not bound. Wagner v. Freschl, 56 N. H. 495.

Rebuttal of implied authority.— The general authority of one partner to draw bills or notes to charge his copartners is only an implied authority, and may be rebutted by notice of the absence of such authority. Cargill v. Corby, 15 Mo. 425.

Signature by one member.— The fact that a note given by a partner for a firm loan, and indorsed by him in the firm-name, was signed only by the partner negotiating the loan, does not charge the lender with notice of want of authority on the part of the partner to execute the note. Benninger v. Hess, 41 Ohio St. 64.

Presumption from taking note for individual debt.— One who takes a firm note in payment of an individual debt of one of the firm is presumed to know that it is a diversion of the firm property, so as to preclude his recovering against the firm. Bradley v. Nicola, 9 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 82, 10 Cinc. L. Bul. 373. See also Gansevoort v. Williams, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 133.

In Pennsylvania in an action on a promissory note against a partnership an affidavit alleging that the firm note was used by one partner without the knowledge or consent of his copartner and for his own private use is sufficient to show that the note was put into circulation by fraud, and to require plaintiff to show that he took the note before maturity and paid value for it. partner makes a note in the name of his firm, without the knowledge or consent of his copartner, and not in the course of partnership business, one seeking, as holder, to recover the amount of the note against the copartner, must show that he took it before maturity, for value and in good faith.[29]

k. Renewals. The implied authority of a partner to issue or transfer the negotiable paper of the firm extends to the renewal of such paper.[30]

l. Demand, Dishonor, and Waiver. A due demand of payment of firm paper made upon either partner, and dishonor by him, will bind the firm, for he represents the firm.[31] So due notice of dishonor to either partner is notice to all;[32] and either partner can bind the firm by a waiver of presentment and notice,[33] as well as by designating the place and method of notice.[34] A partner may waive grace on a firm note given by him.[35]

10. Guaranty and Suretyship — a. In General. The normal partnership is organized to carry on a business for its members, and not to assist other persons by becoming surety for them, or answerable for their debts. Hence it is well established that a partner has no implied authority to bind the firm by a contract of guaranty or suretyship.[36] One who would hold the firm on such a contract must show that it was within the common course of business of the firm or within

Non-commercial character of firm as notice. — One who accepts from a member of a non-commercial partnership a firm note signed by him and secured on the firm's chattels is charged with notice that under the partnership agreement the partner had no authority to execute the note or mortgage for the firm. The taking of a judgment by one member of a firm, in favor of the firm, for an amount established by circumstances and conduct, as well as by express statements.[41] The partner executing an unauthorized contract of guaranty or suretyship in the firm-name is bound thereby.[42] An agreement on behalf of a firm to indemnify a third party for becoming its surety is not one of guaranty or suretyship, and therefore is not subject to the rules above stated.[43]

b. Accommodation Acceptance or Indorsement. The acceptance or indorsement of negotiable paper for the accommodation of another is a form of suretyship, and hence not within the implied powers of a partner.[44] Such use of the firm-name by a partner, however, may be authorized or ratified.[45] If the accommodation character of the signature does not appear upon the face of the paper, and the firm is a trading partnership, it will be liable to a bona fide holder of the paper.[46] When a partnership becomes an accommodation indorser, the liability of its members is joint, and not several. Hence, if a cosurety is compelled to pay the paper, he can recover from the firm only one half.[47]

confess judgment against the firm for his individual debt.[53] Such a judgment is generally held binding on the partner executing a warrant of attorney therefor, or otherwise responsible for the judgment,[54] and it will be binding upon all the partners, in case their ratification or assent is shown.[55]

b. Who May Attack Validity. A judgment entered by confession against a firm, upon a firm debt, on the warrant of attorney or consent executed by one partner in the firm-name, but without actual authority of his copartners, is not absolutely void, but is voidable only at the election of the non-assenting partners, and hence cannot be impeached by a creditor of the firm,[56] unless it is actually fraudulent.[57]

In New York the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 738) which provides for the entry of judgment upon a written offer of defendant does not authorize one partner to bind his copartners by an offer of judgment against them or against the firm. e. Non-Consenting Partner's Remedy. The remedy of the non consenting partner is to have the judgment opened[58] or set aside[59] or execution stayed.[60]

d. Effect of Judgment. As the liability of partners, in the absence of statute, is joint, and not joint and several, a partnership creditor, who takes a judgment by confession against the firm is barred from proceeding thereafter against the firm or the non-consenting partner on the same claim. It is merged in the judgment.[61] This has been changed by statute in many jurisdictions.[62]

13. Assignment For the Benefit of Creditors[63] — a. In General. A general assignment of the firm property to a trustee for the benefit of the creditors of the firm is not a transaction in the ordinary course of the firm's business.[64] On the contrary it is usually made with a view to terminating the business and closing the partnership; it is incident to the destruction, not to the conduct, of the partnership business.[65] Accordingly it is generally held that the partnership relation does not of itself impliedly confer upon a partner implied authority to make such an assignment on behalf of the firm.[66] Actual authority must be

ness,[73] his copartner may make a general assignment for the benefit of the firm's creditors. And according to some of the cases one partner may make such an assignment where there is a crisis in the affairs of the business and his copartner cannot be communicated with in time to meet the emergency.[74] But one partner has no right to make a general assignment because his copartner is temporarily disabled by sickness,[75] or is temporarily absent.[76] And such authority is not established by the mere fact that the assigning partner is the general manager or has a power of attorney to carry on the business of the firm.[77]

The execution of a general assignment for firm creditors is not necessary to protect firm property from sacrifice under hostile attacks of racing creditors, nor to secure its equal distribution among creditors. Either partner, if the firm is insolvent, may institute bankruptcy proceedings (Pleasants v. Meng, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 380, 1 L. ed. 185), or, in the absence of a federal bankruptcy statute, may institute insolvency proceedings under a state statute (Durgin v. Coolidge, 3 Allen (Mass.) 554), or may bring a suit in equity for the dissolution of the partnership and the ratable division of its assets among creditors (Holmes v. McDowell, 15 Hun (N. estopped to deny his liability on such contracts, as against third persons who have become parties thereto in reliance upon such apparent authority.[1]

b. To Deny Liability For Partner's Conduct. A partner is also estopped to deny his liability to a person, who has been induced to change his position for the worse, by the conduct of a copartner, while acting within the apparent scope of his authority, or by conduct assented to or adopted by defendant partner.[2]

c. To Deny Title Made by a Partner. A partner is estopped to deny the title to property conveyed by a copartner, whenever he has enabled the latter to deal with the property as one authorized to pass a perfect title thereto.[3] But he is not estopped by representations or transactions of his copartner, as to the title of property, of which he was ignorant and for which he is in no way responsible.[4]

17. RATIFICATION[5] — a. What May Be Ratified. Only acts done on behalf of the firm are susceptible of ratification by the partnership.[6]

b. Knowledge or Notice. In order to charge a partner with the ratification of an unauthorized act, it must be shown that he had knowledge of the act, or that he had notice of such facts as would put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry, which if pressed with reasonable diligence would result in knowledge of the act.[7]

c. What Amounts to Ratification. A mere offer to recognize the validity of an unauthorized act, upon a condition not accepted and performed by a third party, does not constitute a ratification thereof.[8] But the acceptance of benefits derived from the unauthorized act, or an attempt to enforce an obligation based upon such act, will be treated generally as a ratification, without direct proof of an intent to ratify.[9] A new consideration is not necessary.[10] A ratification may be presumed from failure to repudiate the unauthorized act, provided such failure would naturally operate to induce the third party to forego the exercise of his rights against the partner guilty of the unauthorized act.[11] It is not to be presumed, however, from the adoption of a similar but distinct act,[12] although the repeated adoption of similar acts may be evidence that they are treated by the adopting partners as within the course of the firm's business.[13]

d. Effect of Ratification. So far as the non-assenting partner is concerned, ratification is equivalent to precedent authority, and the ratified obligation relates back to the date of its inception.[14] The effect upon third persons has been pre-

b. Notice to Firm of Acts of a Partner. The acts of a partner in the transaction of firm matters are presumed to be known to all the members of the firm.[21]

c. Demand Upon One Partner. In a matter within the scope of the firm business a demand upon one partner is treated as a demand upon all the partners.[22]

20. Individual Liability Arising From Individual Acts or Interests. While a contract made or a transaction entered into by one partner, without the scope of the firm business and without the consent of his copartner, does not bind his firm, yet he himself may be bound thereby.[23] One entering into a contract in the name of a firm which does not exist,[24] or which is to commence at a future day and is never actually formed,[25] may be bound thereby. A partner who has individually joined as a maker in a promissory note of his firm for its accommodation is not indirectly or secondarily but primarily liable thereon.[26] Partners cannot discharge themselves of their liability for their individual debts by showing that the copartnership has assumed to pay them and is supplied with funds for the purpose. The individual liability is not merged in that of the partnership.[27] Where on the face of an instrument it appears that a partner signed, sealed, and delivered it to

21. Undisclosed Partnership and Dormant Partners[30] — a. General Rule as to Liability. The rule that an undisclosed principal is liable for contracts made or goods purchased or benefits secured for him by his agent applies to a case where there is an undisclosed or dormant partner.[31] A creditor of an undisclosed partnership does not waive or merge his claim against the firm or a dormant partner, by taking a negotiable security of the ostensible debtor, if this is done in ignorance of the firm's existence.[32]

b. Property of a Dormant Partnership. In a dormant partnership, the effects of the ostensible partner and those purporting to be his, although actually belonging to the partnership, are, with respect to the rights of innocent third parties, to be regarded as his sole property.[33]

Rule stated.—"It is true that each copartner is bound for the entire amount due on copartnership contracts; and that this obligation is so far several that if he is sued alone, and does not plead the non-joinder of his copartners, a recovery may be had against him for the whole amount due upon the contract, and a joint judgment against the copartners may be enforced against the property of each. But this is a different thing from the liability which arises from a joint and several contract. There the contract contains distinct engagements, that of each contractor individually, and that of all jointly, and different remedies may be pursued upon each. The contractors may be sued separately on their several engagements or together on their joint undertaking. But in copartnerships there is no such several liability of the copartners. The copartnerships are formed for joint purposes. The members undertake joint enterprises, they assume joint risks, and they incur in all cases joint liabilities. In all copartnership transactions this common risk and liability exist." Mason v. Eldred, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 231, 235, 18 L. ed. 783.

but in equity all partnership debts are deemed joint and several.[40] It is competent for the members of a firm, or any of them, to bind themselves severally as well as jointly for the firm debts, by an agreement to that effect.[41] And one partner may render himself separately liable by holding himself out as the only member of the firm.[42] Whether a contract by a firm not to engage in a certain business binds the partners individually or only as a firm is a question upon which courts differ.[43] If the contract prohibits the partners, "or any of them," from engaging in the specified business, it is clearly several in its application.[44] Whatever the private agreements and contracts of persons who conduct themselves before the world as partners may be, with reference to debts contracted by them and the responsibilities of the partners respectively, they will be equally and jointly liable to those dealing with the partnership for all debts lawfully contracted.[45] Where two firms agree to indorse notes for each other to enable each other to borrow money, the debt of the sureties on a note made in pursuance of this agreement is a partnership debt.[46] If individuals give a bond, each signing only as an individual, but it is in fact for a partnership debt, although at law it is an individual debt, it is in equity a partnership debt.[47] A partnership is not liable for transactions entered into by the members of the firm individually and which are not connected with the partnership business.[48] Where one deals with the agent of a firm individually, matters growing out of the transaction cannot, in the absence of fraud, be asserted against the firm because of a belief that the firm was being dealt with.[49]

2. Liability in Tort. Whenever a firm is answerable for the tort of any member, the liability of the partners is joint and several.[50]

3. Criminal Responsibility. As a rule a partner is not chargeable with the criminal acts of a copartner, simply because of their partnership relation. It must be shown that he actually authorized or assented to the criminal conduct of his copartner.[51] He may be liable to penalties imposed by statute without such proof;[52] and even to criminal prosecution under peculiar statutes.[53] When a partnership is guilty of a crime, the partners should be indicted as individuals, not as a firm.[54]

4. Liability For Acts of Agents and Servants. For the acts of agents or servants of a partnership, the firm as well as each member thereof is answerable, provided these are done in the course of their employment as partnership agents or servants;[55] nor does it matter that they are actually engaged and controlled by but one of the partners.[56] But for the acts of agents or servants of individual partners only the firm is not liable.[57]

C. Application of Assets to Liabilities — 1. Marshaling Firm and Individual Assets — a. In General. As a rule a court of equity will not entertain the question of marshaling the assets of the firm and of its members, unless both funds are within the jurisdiction and control of the court. If a judgment at law be recovered against partners as a firm, the separate property of each partner is alike liable to execution with the property of the firm, and equity will not interfere, unless there are special circumstances.[58] When equity does entertain an application for marshaling, it generally applies the rule that the firm assets are to be applied in the first instance to the payment of firm debts, and the assets of individual partners to the payment of their individual debts.[59] In some jurisdictions the rule prevails that firm creditors are entitled to a priority over individual creditors

The entire assets of a partnership are, in equity, subject to the payment of the debts. Coster v. Georgia Bank, 24 Ala. 37.

Interests of partners immaterial.— Partnership assets must be applied to the payment of partnership debts without reference to any disproportion of the interests of the individual partners as between themselves. In re Lowe, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,564, 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 221.

Enforceable only in equity.— The rule that firm property shall be subject first to the payment of firm in preference to individual debts is enforceable only in equity. Coe v. Simmons Boot, etc., Co., 61 Ill. App. 602.

Equities between the partners do not affect the rights of partnership creditors. Bartels v. His Creditors, 11 La. Ann. 433.

No right while partnership exists.— The rule that partnership effects must be first applied to partnership debts does not apply to cases where the partnership still exists, and the partners may dispose of their property as they please, but only to cases where equitable principles interfere in the distribution of the partnership property among the creditors. d. Rights and Liens of Partners as Creditors of the Firm. Although a partner may be a creditor of his firm for loans or sales to it, or for payments made for it, a court of equity, in marshaling firm assets, applies these to the payment of outside creditors, before permitting him to share them.[73] After such creditors are paid, equity secures to the creditor partner a lien on the balance of the firm assets,[74] to the exclusion of the individual creditors of his copartner.[75]

tween partners which determines their respective interests in a certain partnership fund is conclusive as to the rights of their individual creditors to such fund. Blair v. Harrison, 57 Fed. 257, 6 C. C. A. 326; Claflin v. Bennett, 51 Fed. 693.

3. Transactions of Partners Affecting Firm Creditors — a. Diversion of Firm Assets. Any transfer of partnership assets by an insolvent firm which operates to hinder and delay the firm creditors in the collection of their claims is held invalid by most courts.[76] If, however, a firm is solvent, after transferring part of its assets,[77] or if the firm has the benefit of the transfer, it is not invalid.[78]

b. Assumption by Firm of Individual Debts. The assumption of the individual debts of a partner by his firm will be upheld if the firm is solvent,[79] otherwise it will not,[80] unless the transaction is shown to be honest, and for the benefit of the firm.[81]

c. Assignments For Firm Creditors — (i) In General. In the absence of a statutory provision on the subject, a partnership may assign all or a part of its property for the benefit of firm creditors with preferences;[82] but it is a fraud upon firm creditors to prefer individual creditors.[83] It is generally held that any partner, under his implied power to sell and to pay debts, may apply partnership property to the satisfaction of particular debts of the firm, although he thereby gives a preference to such creditors over others.[84]

(II) Fraud in Assignments.[85] Where an assignment is executed by one partner with a fraudulent intent to hinder and delay the creditors of the firm, it is absolutely void, whether such intent and purpose are participated in by his copartners or not.[86] But where a firm and the individual partners make separate and distinct assignments, the fraud of one partner in his assignment does not vitiate the other assignments.[87] An assignment which fails to provide for the payment of partnership creditors before individual creditors is void.[88] An assignment by one partner to the other of all the property of the firm in trust to pay the assignee's expenses in defending suits which may be brought against the firm, and in obtaining the benefit of the insolvent act, and to apply the residue to the payment of firm debts is fraudulent;[89] and so is such an assignment of all the property of the firm which cannot be reached by execution in trust to pay all the debts of the firm.[90] The reservation of the homesteads of partners in an assignment by a firm does not render such assignment void.[91] A general assignment by a firm of all partnership and individual property, for the benefit of all firm creditors accepting it, is not void, as against individual creditors, as these can, although not named in the assignment, enforce their rights by suit against the assignee, without avoiding the assignment.[92] Where one partner, with the consent of his copartner, executes a deed of assignment of the partnership effects, for the payment of his individual debts, after paying to the copartner, out of the proceeds of the partnership property, a sum equal to such partner's interest therein, it will not be treated as a fraud upon creditors, nor as a reservation of a portion of the partnership property for the benefit of the copartner, as against his own creditors.[93] A voluntary assignment by a firm doing business in the names of the individual partners, treating all their property as firm property and all their debts as firm debts, is not fraudulent as to creditors, although they did not know of the copartnership.[94] Where one of the members of a firm, with his copartner's consent, withdraws a portion of the firm assets for the purpose of paying his individual debts, and is charged therefor on the books of the firm, the portion so withdrawn ceases to be a part of the firm assets, and the omission from a subsequent assign-

85. See, generally, Assignments For Benefit of Creditors; Fraudulent Conveyances.

Assignment by infant partner.—An assignment for the benefit of creditors, made by copartners, is not fraudulent and void in law because one of the assignors is an infant. If voidable, it can only be avoided at the election of the infant; and, where he has ratified it after his coming of age, no fraud in fact can be claimed because of the infancy. Yates v. Lyon, 61 N. Y. 344 [reversing 61 Barb. 205]. See, generally, Infants.

Admissibility of evidence.— Where a partnership assignment of partnership property is attacked for fraud, proof that one of the partners had previously assigned to the same assignee portions of his individual property on a secret trust in his own favor is not admissible to establish such fraud, although it might be admissible in case of an assignment of all the property, joint and individual, of the partners. Guerin v. Hunt, 6 Minn. 375.

In Texas where an assignment is made under the statute, no act of the assignor or assignee at the time the assignment is made, or preceding but in contemplation of it, however fraudulent the act, can divest the right of creditors to have the estate administered for their benefit in accordance with the spirit of the statute, and therefore, where one of two partners sells to the other his interest in the partnership assets, and the purchaser then makes a general assignment of all his property for the benefit of creditors, the creditors of the firm cannot attach the property on the ground that the partnership assets were fraudulently withdrawn; they must proceed as general creditors under the assignment. ment of the firm assets will not be fraudulent.[95] Where the only effect of a provision authorizing the assignee in a partnership assignment to pay the individual debts of each partner from the combined individual assets is to divert a very small sum from the payment of a very great indebtedness, the smallness of the sum diverted will furnish proof of the absence of fraudulent intent.[96] Where one partner makes a secret conveyance of his interest in an insolvent partnership to a creditor, and his copartner upon learning of the transfer takes such creditor in and continues the business with him, without notifying creditors of the change, an assignment afterward made as the act and deed of the new firm, and for the benefit of its creditors, is fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the old firm.[97]

d. Transfers to Third Persons. So long as a partnership is an acting concern, it is entitled to transfer its property, and such a transfer to an honest purchaser for value is not impeachable[98] because the members of the firm use the proceeds for their individual benefit;[99] nor is such purchaser liable for firm debts.[1] If, however, the transfer is not fair and bona fide, but is made and accepted to defeat firm creditors, they may have it set aside as a fraud upon them.[2] A transfer by a partner of his interest in the firm assets is prima facie valid as to firm creditors,[3] for it conveys to the purchaser only the selling partner's interest in any surplus remaining after firm debts are paid.[4] If a partner transfers firm property in satisfaction of his own debts it is impeachable by firm creditors.[5]

e. Transfer of Firm Assets to Partner or New Firm. A valid sale of the partnership property by the firm to one or more of its members, or to a new firm in which some of the former partners are members, puts an end to the old part-

In the case of insolvency of the firm and purchasing partner, the courts are disposed to find some loophole for the benefit of firm creditors.[9] Even when the firm and purchasing partner are insolvent, if the sale is made for a consideration which is valuable to the firm estate and in good faith, it transforms the firm ownership into the separate ownership of the purchaser, and puts an end to all claim of firm creditors to have it administered as firm property.[10] In some jurisdictions the same result is held to follow a sale by an insolvent firm to an insolvent partner, although no value is given by the latter to the former, beyond a promise to pay the firm debts, provided the parties have no actual intent to defraud the firm creditors.[11] But the view which generally prevails is that such a promise by an insolvent purchaser is not a thing of value to the firm estate; that the necessary object and consequence of such a transfer with its transformation of firm title into the separate title of the purchaser are to defeat and delay the firm creditors, and consequently that it is voidable by them.[12] The transfer of firm property by a firm to one of its members is not assailable by the individual creditors of the retiring partners, because their rights are not affected thereby.[13] When the purchasing partner assumes the debts of the firm, firm creditors are generally entitled to accept him as their debtor, in the place of the firm, and to share pari passu

with his individual creditors thereafter.[14] But such a transaction cannot relieve the members of the old firm from their liability to firm creditors without the latters' consent.[15]

f. Dividing Firm Assets Among Partners. When a firm is solvent, the partners have a perfect right to divide the property between them, and thus convert it into separate estates. After such a valid division, each partner is entitled to deal with the property thus set off to him, as he is with any other individual property.[16] If, however, a firm is insolvent, the better view seems to be that a division of assets among the partners is invalid against firm creditors who are thereby prevented from enforcing their claims against the property as firm assets.[17] But in a number of decisions such transactions have been upheld, on the ground that the firm creditors have no lien on firm property except through the equities of the partners, and that the partners can waive their equities by consenting to a division.[18]

g. Mortgaging Firm Property For Firm Debts. The power of a partner to mortgage firm property to secure firm debts has been already considered.[19] In this connection it is necessary only to note that when a valid partnership mortgage has been placed on firm property, either by one partner or by all of the partners, it is not impeachable by other firm creditors because it gives to the mortgagee a preference over them;[20] and it takes precedence over the lien of judgments against the partners by individual creditors.[21]

h. Mortgage of Partner's Interest or Share. A mortgage of a partner's interest in partnership property, although made to secure individual debts of the mortgaging partner, is valid; but its lien is subject to the superior claims of the firm creditors. In other words it passes only the ultimate share of such partner, that is, the amount due to him after the payment of firm debts and the adjustment of the equities of his copartners.[22] If firm real estate is allowed to stand in the

j. Mortgage or Assignment by Firm For Individual Debts. A solvent partnership may validly mortgage or assign or use its property to secure or pay the debts of a partner.[27] According to some of the decisions such a use of its property by an insolvent partnership is impeachable by firm creditors, who are thereby hindered, delayed, or prevented from enforcing their claims against the firm assets.[28] Other decisions, however, have sustained such use even by an insolvent partnership, when it was not accompanied by an actual intention to defraud.[29]

k. Confession of Judgment. A judgment confessed by one partner for a partnership debt cannot disturb the equities of the partners to have the joint effects applied to partnership debts.[30] As against its creditors a partnership cannot by confessing a judgment assume the individual liabilities of one of its members for which it is neither legally nor morally responsible and apply the partnership property to their payment.[31] Where the confession of a judgment against a partnership is procured by fraud or collusion it is invalid.[32] Where land is held by a firm by deed expressing that it is partnership stock, a judgment on a bond with warrant of attorney against a member of the firm is not a lien upon any interest in it, so as to prevent the firm conveying to the purchaser a clear title.[33]

4. Assets of Individual Partners — a. What Are. The separate estate of a partner includes that part of his property which is not embarked in the partnership enterprise.[34] His interest in lands used for partnership purposes may be available to his individual creditors as his separate property,[35] although acquired with firm funds.[36] A credit item in the firm account of a partner is not to be treated as his separate estate, until partnership affairs are settled.[37] Nor is a partner's interest in an illegal partnership to be treated as separate estate rather than firm assets.[38] In England, under a provision of the bankruptcy statute as to reputed ownership,[39] firm property may be treated in bankruptcy as the separate estate of the partner who is allowed to retain possession of it.[40]

b. Right of Individual Creditors to Individual Assets. In distributing the property of a firm and of its members among creditors equity generally secures to the individual creditors of a partner a preference over the firm creditors in his separate estate.[41]

c. Right of Firm Creditors to Share Individual Assets. In equity partnership debts are regarded as both joint and several and the creditors of a partnership may prove their debts against the estate of a deceased member thereof;[42] but the right of firm creditors to share in the separate estate of a partner is generally limited to sharing in any surplus that remains after the payment of such partner's individual debts.[43] An exception to the foregoing rule exists in many jurisdictions to the effect that, if there is no firm estate and no living solvent partner, the firm creditors may share pari passu with the separate creditors in the separate estate.[44] Another exception is generally recognized in cases where a partner

d. Rights of Firm or of Copartners as Creditors. The principle which secures to the separate creditors of a partner priority over firm creditors in his separate estate prevents the firm, and the copartners as representatives of the firm, from sharing in the separate estate, until the separate creditors are paid in full.[46] This rule does not apply to a claim by a copartner in his individual right against the separate estate of an associate,[47] provided the claimant does not come into competition with the firm creditors in sharing such estate.[48] When a member of a firm fraudulently abstracts some of its assets, a representative of the firm may share ratably with the individual creditors of the delinquent.[49]

e. Transactions By or Between Partners Affecting Rights of Creditors. Where a partner has given a valid lien upon his separate property to a firm creditor, or has permitted one to be acquired by him, before the separate estate is brought into equity for distribution, the separate creditors cannot invoke against such lien the principle that separate property is to be applied to separate debts in preference to firm debts.[50] But a firm creditor, having such security, cannot be compelled to resort to it before sharing in the partnership assets, as the latter are primarily liable for firm debts.[51] A partner can by a general assignment devote his individual property to the payment of debts due by the firm.[52] It is not a fraud upon firm creditors for a partner to convey his separate property at a fair valuation in payment of a separate debt,[53] nor, if the firm is solvent, to give it away;[54] and it has been held that the partners may convert the firm property into the separate property of such partners, and thus enable each partner to apply the proceeds of a sale of his share to the payment of his individual debts.[55] Even if the firm is insolvent, a voluntary conveyance of his separate property cannot be deemed fraudulent against firm creditors who are not also his individual creditors, unless his individual estate is more than sufficient to pay his individual debts.[56] But if the firm and he are insolvent, his voluntary conveyance of individual property will be fraudulent against firm creditors if it operates to diminish the amount they could otherwise obtain from his separate estate.[57] And a conveyance of individual property of a partner in payment of his individual debt, with the intent known to the grantee of defrauding partnership creditors, is void as against them.[58]

5. Partners in Different Firms. The law does not recognize two partnerships when the same persons carry on the same business, although they do this at different places and under different names.[59] But where different firms have common members, each partnership is dealt with by the courts as having a joint fund of its own, and its own set of creditors, who are as clearly entitled to that fund in preference to the creditors of any partnership connected with it by the ties of a common partner, as they are entitled in preference to the individual creditor of its members.[60]

6. Retirement or Admission of Partners. The retirement of a partner and the admission of another results ordinarily in the constitution of a new firm, and a conversion of the property of the old firm into the property of the new firm.[61] Such is not the consequence, however, of a change of membership in a joint stock company,[62] nor in the case of an ordinary partnership when the parties agree that a change of membership by retirement or admission shall not work a dissolution.[63] If the new firm agree to pay the debts of the old, in consideration of the transfer of the latter's property to it, the creditors of the old firm are entitled to share pari passu with the creditors of the new firm.[64]

D. Actions By or Against Firms or Partners — 1. In General — a. Capacity To Sue and Be Sued. As the common law does not recognize a legal personality in a partnership, but views a firm as an aggregation of individuals,[65] in the absence of a statutory provision a partnership cannot be sued as an entity.[66] In some jurisdictions certain partnerships are required to file and publish a certificate showing the names and residences of all the partners, before they can maintain certain actions.[67]

b. Authority of Partner to Institute and Defend Actions. It is generally held to be within the implied powers of a partner to institute ordinary legal proceedings in behalf of a firm, using the names of all the partners as plaintiffs, for the enforcement of the firm's rights;[68] and also to defend actions brought against the firm.[69]

c. Rights of Action and Defenses.[70] In an action at law by partners, all must be entitled to recover, or the action cannot be maintained; as the cause of action is joint and not joint and several. Accordingly if one of the partners does an act which bars him from maintaining a suit on the firm claim, it will defeat all.[71] One partner cannot recover for a trespass to the firm property directed or assented to by a copartner.[72] Where persons sue as partners on a contract alleged to have been made with them as such, it is a defense that they were a corporation when they entered into the contract.[73] And when a partnership is sued as a corporation a judgment entered against it as such cannot be enforced against the partners whether they are indebted to the plaintiff or not.[74] Where persons enter into a copartnership, with the fraudulent purpose of hindering or delaying the creditors of one of the parties in the collection of their debts they cannot bring a joint action against one who forcibly enters their storehouse and seizes their goods.[75] There is no implied obligation to account for mere use and occupation by one partner, who has by his title a right of possession of the whole, although it is joint, and assumpsit can be maintained by one partner against another only on an express promise to pay rent or to account.[76] Where a partner agrees to pay a third person a part of his interest in the net profits of his firm such person may bring suit, although there has been no settlement between such partner and his copartner.[77] A person cannot be charged in equity as a partner and sued at law as a debtor of the same firm.[78] The joint liability of a partnership cannot be set off against a separate demand of one of the partners.[79] Where two partners execute their individual notes for work performed for the partnership, but it is so badly done that the whole consideration fails, the right to make a defense is not lost by the execution of such separate notes, but may be asserted by either partner.[80] The fact that a partner made an illegal agreement to pay rebates to a third person and appropriated partnership funds for that purpose, all without the knowledge of his copartner, does not affect the right of recovery against the partnership on another agreement, it not appearing that the partner making such use of the firm funds is personally irresponsible so as to be unable to account to his partner for the amount of such misappropriation.[81] It is a good defense to an action brought against a partner that judgment has been recovered against his firm upon the same cause of action.[82]

d. Assignee of Obligation Between Firm and Partner or Copartner. While the common law does not permit the maintenance of an action by a partner against his firm, or by a firm against one of its members,[83] nor by one partner against another on a partnership claim before an accounting,[84] a bona fide indorsee of a firm or of one of the partners therein may maintain such action;[85] and in juris-

Michigan.— Carpenter v. Greenop, 74 Mich. 664, 42 N. W. 276, 16 Am. St. Rep. 662, 4 L. R. A. 241. If the indorsement is merely formal to enable the indorsee to sue for the indorser, and he is not a bona fide holder, he cannot enforce it free from the equities dictions where the assignee of a claim may sue in his own name, such an action is maintainable by the assignee of a firm or a partner therein,[86] subject to the equities in favor of defendant, or defendants, which may include an inquiry into the state of accounts between the firm and the partner, and thus defeat the action at law.[87] Even then, however, a bill in equity may be maintainable for an account and distribution of the assignee's share.[88]

e. Joinder of Causes of Action.[89] Where by statute partnership contracts are joint and several, a cause of action against one on a joint contract as a partner may be joined with a cause of action against such partner individually.[90] Where one bringing suit has amended by joining his partner, and the suit is prosecuted as by the partnership, a verdict cannot stand for more than the partnership claim, although the excess be due the original plaintiff as an individual.[91] A partner who is also a stock-holder of a corporation cannot be held, in a suit against him individually, to recover the amount of his stock subscription, for interest on money of the corporation received by his firm and mingled with its funds.[92] The fact that the same firm is doing business under different names does not preclude the partners from joining in one suit claims payable to the firm under its different names.[93]

f. Nature and Form of Remedy.[94] An action at law is the appropriate remedy for one who seeks to enforce a contract or tort obligation or other purely legal claim against a partnership.[95] But if creditors seek to set aside a conveyance or disposition of firm property as fraudulent toward them;[96] or if partners seek redress against a copartner and third persons for fraudulently diverting firm property from the partnership;[97] or if one partnership seeks recovery against another having a common member with it,[98] the proper forum for plaintiffs is a court of equity. Such is the forum also for one who asks to have the firm and separate estates marshaled and distributed.[99]

g. Jurisdiction[1] and Venue. The jurisdiction of a court of equity over proceedings connected with the settlement of partnership affairs is very broad and full,[2] extending to real property outside of the county or state;[3] and it is not ousted by the fact of the non-residence of some of the partners,[4] nor by the jurisdiction of a probate court over the estate of a deceased partner,[5] nor by the allegation of defendants that they are not partners but a corporation.[6] If a partner is omitted as plaintiff and made a party defendant with another person who is not a partner and who does not represent the interests of one, the court will not have equity jurisdiction as to the latter.[7] In jurisdictions where a firm is not recognized as a legal entity the venue of actions against it generally depends upon the residence of its members.[8] But where it is suable as an ideal person, it is deemed to have a residence in the county or counties where it carries on business, and may be sued in any such county.[9]

h. Limitations and Laches.[10] The defense of the statute of limitations, when interposed by one partner in an action brought against him and his copartners, on a firm obligation, is generally treated as a personal defense for him, and not as inuring to the benefit of his copartners, in whose favor the statute has not run.[11] Fraud or concealment by one partner in the course of the partnership business which prevents the statute from running in his favor will prevent its running in favor of his copartner.[12] A firm creditor may lose his right to enforce his claim against the retiring partner by laches; as when he delays for a long time from asserting such claim, and accepts the continuing partner, or a new firm as his debtor.[13]

i. Arrest of Partners.[14] A firm is not subject to arrest, but its members may be.[15] Each partner may be arrested who has been actually guilty of the wrongdoing for which a warrant of arrest is authorized.[16] As a rule, however, the courts decline to hold an innocent partner liable to arrest for the fraud or other misconduct of a copartner, even though it be practised in the transaction of the ordinary affairs of the firm, unless he has ratified his copartner's acts. Actual guilt or moral delinquency on the part of the arrested person is generally held to be the test of his liability to this harsh and extraordinary remedy.[17]

Partners residing in different places.— The fact that a partnership is composed of a large number of members, residing in different counties, does not justify a single partner in bringing an action for the benefit of all to recover a debt due the partnership. Brainerd v. Bertram, 5 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 102.

Where a libel is published concerning a partnership business, each partner may sue separately for the injuries he has sustained or all may join in one suit for damages to the firm. Wills v. Jones, 13 App. Cas. (D. C.) 482.

Undisclosed partner.— Where persons making a contract are partners and bills are rendered in the firm-name, the partners may maintain an action as such, although the name of one does not appear in the bills and he is not known to be a partner. McDonnell v. Ford, 87 Mich. 198, 49 N. W. 545.

When two sureties from their common or partnership funds pay the debt of their principal they may maintain a joint action for the money so paid. Pearson v. Parker, 3 N. H. 366.

Agreement made before partnership formed.— Where an agreement is made with one to pay him a commission for selling land, and he then forms a partnership, which sells it, the partners may sue jointly for the commission. Welsh v. Lemert, 92 Iowa 116, 60 N. W. 230.

Services outside of regular business.— An action may be brought in the firm-name for services rendered outside of the regular business of the firm where the other party is benefited and the firm damaged thereby. Tiernan v. Doran, 19 Nebr. 492, 26 N. W. 318.

Fraudulent conduct of partner.— An action cannot be maintained in the name of the partnership where it is necessary to set up the fraudulent misapplication of the partnership assets on the part of one of plaintiffs. Blodgett v. Sleeper, 67 Me. 499. See also Farley v. Lovell, 103 Mass. 387; Homer v. Wood, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 62.

Action for possession of realty.—A partner, being a tenant in common with his copartner, may recover possession of the whole of the firm real estate, as against one holding the same without title. Brady v. Kreuger, 8 S. D. 464, 66 N. W. 1083, 59 Am. St. Rep. 771.

22. Alabama.—Giovanni v. First Nat. Bank, 51 Ala. 176 (where firm property being levied on each partner claimed exemption, thereby severing their joint interest, it was held that they could not maintain a joint action against the judgment creditor for selling the property); Roberts v. Heim, 27 Ala. 678.

Connecticut.— Leveret v. Sherman, 1 Root 169, action for personal injury from false imprisonment upon a firm obligation.

Georgia.— Council v. Tael, 122 Ga. 61, 49 S. E. 806, one who signs a contract in his individual name may bring suit thereon, although the contract may have been for the benefit of his firm. Compare Newsome v. Brazell, 118 Ga. 547, 45 S. cannot sue alone for his share of a firm claim,[27] unless the defendant has incurred a several liability to him.[28] Where there has not been a joint letting of firm property, either partner may maintain a separate action for his proportion of the sum due for use and occupation.[29]

(iv) One Partner Suing as Assignee of Firm. At common law an assignment of a firm claim to a partner, as distinguished from an indorsement, does not entitle him to maintain an action in his own name.[30] If he sues thereon he must proceed in the names of all the partners, unless he shows that defendant has assented to the transaction; in which case he brings his action upon the new contract between him and defendant which has been substituted for the firm claim.[31] But one member of a partnership may take by indorsement from the firm a note payable to the firm, so as to enable him to maintain an action thereon.[32]

(v) Dormant Partners as Plaintiffs. It is a well-settled rule that a dormant partner need not join in an action, brought in behalf of the firm by the ostensible partners, against persons who have dealt with the latter only.[33] It is equally well settled, however, that a dormant partner may be joined as plaintiff with the ostensible partner.[34]

(VI) Using Names of Copartners as Plaintiffs. As a rule a partner may sue in the name of himself and of his copartners to enforce a partnership claim, even without their consent;[35] but he is not entitled to sue in his own name for the benefit of himself and of his copartners,[36] unless the members are too numerous, or it is otherwise impracticable to bring them in.[37]

c. to enforce a firm claim may be made a defendant.[44] But the fact that one partner refuses to be a plaintiff will not justify his copartners in bringing suit in their own names without joining him as defendant.[45]

e. Firms With Common Members. At common law an action was not maintainable between partnerships with a common member, for the same person could not be at once a plaintiff and a defendant in an action at law.[46] Equity, however, permitted a suit under such circumstances;[47] and statutes in many jurisdictions authorize such actions.[48] Even the common-law rule does not preclude a person from suing a firm, upon an individual transaction with him, simply because a member of the defendant firm is his copartner.[49] Much less does it preclude a partner from suing one who has indemnified him against all claims owing by one firm to another firm, of which firms he is a common member.[50]

f. Intervention. A partner,[51] and likewise creditors of a firm,[52] are allowed to intervene as defendants, upon showing that they have an interest in the litigation, which they should be permitted to protect.

g. New Parties and Change of Parties. The courts are very liberal, especially under modern statutes, in permitting the introduction of new parties,[53] or the change of parties by striking out the names of one or more,[54] or the substitution of individuals for a defendant firm or corporation.[55]

ship pending a suit he is still a party to the record.[59] And where after a suit is brought by partners one of them sells his interest to his partner this does not necessitate a change of parties.[60]

i. Miscellaneous. Persons not interested in the result thereof are of course not necessary parties to an action to which a partnership or a member thereof is a party.[61] The wives of partners are not necessary parties defendant in an action to foreclose a lien on firm real estate for a firm debt;[62] nor are the heirs of a deceased partner in an action to set aside as in fraud of the grantor's creditors a conveyance to a firm in payment of a firm debt.[63] The assignee of an insolvent partner cannot either alone or jointly with the other partners bring an action to recover a debt due to the firm; but such insolvent partner may, with the assignee's assent, join his copartner in maintaining such an action.[64]

3. Process, Appearance, Discontinuance, and Dismissal — a. Form of Process.[65] In the absence of special statutory provisions on the subject, the summons or other process instituting an action by or against a firm should contain the names of all the partners, although it need not describe them as partners.[66] A warrant is not the proper process against a firm, where it would not lie against the members thereof individually.[67]

equity, however, permitted suits to be prosecuted, and a decree to be obtained for a firm debt, when service of process had been made upon the resident partners, and the others were out of the jurisdiction, or could not be found.[70] In many jurisdictions it is now provided that actions may be instituted against partnerships, by service of process upon any partner and judgment rendered which is enforceable against firm property, and against the separate property of the partners served.[71] In some jurisdictions statutes provide for the service of process, in suits against a partnership by leaving a copy at its usual place of business with one of its members, or with its clerk or general agent, or other specified person.[72]

action may be dismissed as to some of the defendants who are alleged to be partners, without affecting the right to proceed against the others.[87] When an action is properly brought against a firm and its members, it may be dismissed as to the latter without defeating it as to the former.[88] If one partner only answers, and disproves plaintiff's case against the partnership, the suit must be dismissed as to all members of the firm, although some have defaulted in appearance.[89] A discontinuance by one partner will not be permitted, if he is acting in collusion with the adverse party, to a copartner's injury.[90]

4. Attachment or Garnishment[91]—a. Right and Liability of Firm or Partners. The right of a partnership to sue out an attachment or garnishment,[92] and likewise the liability of a partnership or of the members thereof to have this remedy invoked against it or them,[93] is to be determined generally by the statutes in force in the different jurisdictions, and except for statutes it seems that an attachment would not lie against a partnership or any member thereof for a partnership debt.[94]

b. Grounds For Proceeding and Property Subject. The most common grounds for attachment are the absconding or non-residence of the debtor, or the removal or transfer of his property in fraud of his creditors.[95] In the case of partnerships, it is generally held that the absconding or non-residence of some of the partners will not authorize an attachment of the firm property, when the other partners remain residents and carry on the firm business within the state.[96] Whether

The remedy by attachment is a stringent one; it has always been strictly construed. . . . Its object was to enable suitors in our courts to collect their debts from non-residents. To extend the remedy to the present case would lead to practical results highly detrimental to commerce." The property of a foreign commercial firm, or the interest of a non-resident in such an attachment will issue against a non-resident partner, in an action upon a firm claim, the other partners being residents, depends upon statutory provisions.[97] Any disposition of firm property by the firm, or by a partner with the consent of his copartners, which amounts to a fraud upon the firm creditors, furnishes ground for attachment against the firm.[98] Firm property is of course attachable in behalf of firm creditors,[99] and the separate property of a partner is attachable in a suit

Effect of insolvency.—A creditor of one of a firm cannot attach the partnership effects, where the firm is insolvent, so that there issued against one of the partners only.[4] In an action by one partner against another firm property is attachable.[5] A judgment creditor of one partner cannot take out an execution upon his judgment, and levy upon property in the hands of an assignee of another partner by summoning an agent of the latter as garnishee.[6]

c. Proceedings, Levy, Lien, Custody, and Disposition.[7] Proceedings to procure, support, or enforce attachments to which partners or partnerships are parties are frequently regulated by statute.[8] As a rule courts are disposed to disregard merely formal defects and irregularities in the papers upon which an attachment is asked,[9] but to insist that allegations of fraud or other misconduct will be no surplus to go to the partner. Commercial Bank v. Wilkins, 9 Me. 28; Rice v. Austin, 17 Mass. 197. Compare Buckingham v. Swezey, 25 Hun (N. Y.) 84, 61 How. Pr. 266. Sale of entire property in goods attached. —Where an officer attaches goods of a firm interest of a partner in partnership property effectual the officer may take possession of the whole partnership property and upon a sale may deliver it to the purchaser who takes only the interest of such partner therein.[15] Where a bank balance of a firm is levied on by service of a copy of the attachment and is voluntarily paid over to the officer, the bank is chargeable with notice of the contents of the attachment and cannot recover back the amount paid as for moneys paid by mistake.[16] Where partnership property is attached by several creditors of the same class, the proceeds of such property should be applied according to the order of the attachments.[17] But an attachment on firm assets, in a suit against a member of the firm, must be postponed to a later attachment by a firm creditor in a suit against the firm,[18] and an attachment by a creditor of an individual partner will not affect the lien acquired by an earlier attachment in favor of a creditor of the firm.[19] A partner who has advanced funds for partnership purposes is entitled to preference over attaching creditors of the other partner.[20] A mortgage made by one of the partners of his interest in the partnership to secure his individual debt cannot take precedence over a statutory attachment by a bona fide creditor of the firm, for, as to them, and all other creditors of the partnership, such mortgage is illegal.[21] And a partner cannot provide for individual debts due by his copartners, or by a mere stranger without any interest either in the property of the partnership or of either member of the firm, in a conveyance covering his entire property, to the exclusion of his bona fide creditors. As to the attaching creditors, such conveyance must be held to be utterly fraudulent and void.[22] An ordinary creditor with the older equity will be postponed to another creditor of the same class where the former stands by and permits the latter to acquire a valid equitable lien by the levy of an attachment, which goes into judgment.[23] The assets of an insolvent partnership should be divided pro rata among all the creditors of the partnership and a judgment creditor gains no priority of lien by attaching firm assets already in the custody of the law for distribution under the attachment bill of the representative of a deceased partner.[24] A ratification by a non-executing partner of an assignment made by the other partner cannot take away the rights of creditors who have attached the property assigned between the execution of the assignment and the time of its ratification.[25] The lien acquired by an attachment of the separate property of a partner to secure a partnership debt is preferred to a subsequent attachment to secure a separate debt, which was contracted subsequently to the first attachment.[26] In equity the creditors of an insolvent partnership are entitled to have the partnership assets applied in satisfaction of their debts in preference to the creditors of the individual partners, notwithstanding the separate creditors may have first attached those assets.[27] Where a partnership consists of two members, one of whom is a non-resident and the other a resident of the state, a firm creditor issuing an attachment against the firm, and levying upon the firm assets, does not thereby gain any priority over the firm creditors, except as to the individual interest of the non-resident partner.[28] In an action by an unsecured attaching creditor of a firm to compel a prior attaching creditor to exhaust a mortgage security on land of the firm before sharing in the proceeds of a sale under his attachment, the mere fact that the resort to mortgage security would cause some delay to the prior attaching creditor is not ground for the refusal to so marshal the assets, where, the proceeds of the attached property being in court, his rights are not endangered, nor his prior right to raise his debt out of both funds impaired, nor any part of his security taken from him.[29] A creditor of an ostensible partner, who gave him credit as a single individual, is not to be postponed in his attachment upon the goods of a partnership to another creditor, who afterward attached the same stock for a debt created upon the same credit, although he should have discovered a concealed partner and set up his claim as a partnership creditor.[30]

d. Quashing or Vacating and Wrongful Attachment. An attachment against a partnership will be quashed[31] or will abate[32] if improperly granted. When an attachment is wrongfully employed for the collection of a firm claim, all the partners are liable in damages, even though some of them took no part in the proceedings.[33] In case of a wrongful attachment against a partnership, by a creditor who colludes with a partner, the other members of the firm may maintain an action for damages.[34]

5. Injunction[35] and Receiver.[36] As has been already stated the separate creditor of a partner, by the levy of an attachment on firm property, acquires a lien on the interest of the debtor only in such property.[37] In many jurisdictions it is held that the attachment debtor's copartners are entitled to file a bill for a partnership accounting, and to obtain an injunction against the seizure and sale of the property meantime, under the attachment.[38] In other jurisdictions this right to an injunction by copartners is denied, either absolutely,[39] or unless it is shown that the firm is insolvent and thus that the debtor partner has no interest in the property attached.[40] Partnership creditors who have levied a valid attachment may have an injunction against a sale by individual creditors of firm property.[41] But an injunction is generally denied to a creditor at large, that is, to one who has not obtained a judgment or levy before making application.[42] Where a partnership is alleged between the complainant and the defendant, an injunction granted to secure the complainant's interest in the property thereof is properly dissolved where the partnership is denied and it is set up that the partnership has been dissolved.[43] A member of a partnership may be enjoined from continuing to violate a contract as to a patent, although his partners are not parties to the bill for the specific performance of such contract, and although the partnership may be embarrassed thereby.[44] The purchaser of a partner's interest will be granted an injunction against the fraudulent interference with firm property by partners who have surrendered control of the business and agreed not to interfere with its management.[45] As a rule a general creditor of a firm is not entitled to equitable aid by the appointment of a receiver for the firm,[46] although such aid has been granted him, when the court has been convinced that unless it was granted him he would sustain great and irreparable injury by the fraudulent misconduct of the firm or some member thereof.[47] A receiver of firm property cannot be appointed at the suit of an execution purchaser of a partner's share of the firm assets against alleged fraudulent purchasers of the partnership assets at execution sale against the firm, where the only surviving partner is not a party to the suit.[48] copartnership. Such allegation, however, need not be in any set form of words;[52] but it should state the existence of the partnership as a fact and not merely suggest it as an inference from other facts.[53] No allegation of partnership is necessary when the action is brought upon a claim which is enforceable by or against joint contractors, although plaintiffs or defendants may be partners.[54] If plaintiffs are partners and are suing upon a claim belonging to their firm, the complaint should allege the existence of the partnership, and must in some way show the names of its members.[55] If a statute permits a suit in the name of the firm, an allegation setting forth the individual names of the partners is surplusage, unless the statute requires a statement of the names.[56] In some jurisdictions plaintiffs must aver compliance with statutory requirements such as making, filing, and publishing a certificate stating the names and places of residence of the partners,[57] but in others non-compliance with such requirements is a matter of defense and need not be alleged.[58] When suit is brought upon an obligation executed in the firm-name, plaintiff should allege the names of those constituting the firm,[59] or at least state them in the caption of his complaint.[60] In other cases of contract liability on the part of defendants it is generally held to be sufficient to allege their joint promise without any averment as to their partnership or their firm-name.[61] In jurisdictions where the liability of partners is several as well as joint, it is unnecessary for plaintiff to make any allegation concerning the firm or its members.[62] This is true too in actions for tort against a partner.[63] A partner who has contracted in the firm-name without the authority of his copartners, express or implied, may be alleged to have individually contracted in that name.[64] Indeed, if an action is brought against one partner only, on a firm contract, he must plead the non-joinder of his copartners in abatement, or plaintiff will be entitled to recover against him alone.[65] The ostensible partners cannot plead in abatement the non-joinder of a secret partner.[66] In order to sustain an action against a dormant partner, after his withdrawal from the firm, plaintiff must allege that such partner had been known to him as a member of the firm.[67] A person suing in his own name, on a claim assigned or indorsed to him by a partnership, need not specify the persons composing such firm.[68] Whether the signature and verification of a pleading are proper and sufficient in a particular case is determinable by the statutory provisions and rules of practice of the forum.[69]

b. Denial of Partnership. In the absence of a statutory rule upon the subject, the general issue operates to deny a partnership alleged as a material fact in the complaint.[70] In many jurisdictions, however, a statutory rule or rule of court requires that an allegation of partnership must be specially denied by affidavit or a verified plea.[71] When the existence of a partnership is alleged and it is not

d. Defenses. To a suit by a firm it is a good defense that the debt is due to one partner only.[77] It is also a defense that any one of the joint plaintiffs has estopped himself from maintaining the suit.[78] But a set-off or counter-claim against either of plaintiffs as an individual is not available as a defense to a partnership cause of action.[79] In case of misjoinder or non-joinder of partners as plaintiffs, the objection is to be taken by a plea in abatement, or it will be deemed waived.[80] When a firm is sued upon a partnership obligation, the non-existence of such obligation is a defense;[81] but it is no defense to allege, while admitting the partnership, that one or more of the defendants did not incur the obligation.[82] If want of authority in the partner executing the obligation is the only ground of defense, it should be alleged that such partner acted without authority express or implied, that plaintiff knew, or was chargeable with notice, of such want of authority, and that the unauthorized act has never been adopted or ratified.[83] It is a good defense for any person sued as a partner of the other defendants that he was not a partner, nor liable as one, when the obligation was incurred, provided this is alleged in the manner required by the law of the forum;[84] but a denial that he as an individual made the contract sued on,[85] or that he has any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the contract or transaction,[86] is bad.

e. Demurrer. A complaint is demurrable where it alleges a contract or transaction with a partnership, but sets forth a contract or transaction which purports or appears to be with one partner only.[87] It is also demurrable at common law, if it discloses that one member of the plaintiff firm is also a member of the

7. Evidence — a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof.[92] In an action to enforce a partnership liability, which is denied, the burden of proof is upon the party alleging such liability.[93] There is a presumption, however, that the proper parties have united as plaintiffs in an action by a partnership,[94] and that a transac-

particular case is for the jury, under proper instructions from the court, if the evidence is conflicting or if it is open to more than one inference.[29] Whether the intention of parties in a particular case was to become partners may be a question for the jury.[30] It may also be a question for the jury whether persons who are admitted to be partners intended to contract or to hold property as a firm or as individuals.[31] Whether a particular transaction, conducted by a partner on behalf of the firm, is within the scope of his authority is often a question for the jury.[32]

equity.[39] A judgment in favor of "H. & H.," without stating their given names, is not erroneous, when defendant has not objected to the suit proceeding in such name, the irregularity being a matter for abatement.[40] In the absence of statutory provisions on the subject, the judgment in an action against a firm is to be entered against the individuals composing it.[41] If a statute permits a judgment to be entered against a partnership in the firm-name, it cannot be entered against an individual member;[42] but an action may be brought on the judgment against an individual member.[43] In an action by a partnership, judgment may not be rendered in favor of one or more, but less than all of the persons described in the complaint as composing the firm.[44] But when plaintiff counts upon a partnership liability of several persons, and proves a liability against a part only of the defendants, he is generally allowed to take judgment against these.[45] This is allowed everywhere when the liability is in tort.[46] In some jurisdictions, however, he is not allowed to do this, when he counts on a joint promise of all the defendants.[47] If his complaint is on a partnership obligation and his proof establishes such obligation on the part of the defendants, he cannot take judgment against a part of them only, unless he can show statutory authority therefor.[48] A plaintiff who sues a firm in its firm-name under statutory authority cannot take judgment against a partner as for a personal debt;[49] although, if one person is transacting business in a firm-name, a judgment may be rendered against him in such name.[50] On the other hand, if a plaintiff sues partners, he cannot take judgment against the partnership in its firm-name;[51] but it must run against the partners as individuals.[52] The persons composing a partnership, whether it is plaintiff or defendant, should be designated by their full names, in the judgment,[53] although irregularities in this respect have been treated by many courts as not fatal;[54] and modern legislation often permits judgments to be entered for or against partnerships in the firm-name.[55] It is elementary that a judgment must conform to the pleadings and verdict or findings.[56]

b. Joint and Several Liability on Judgments. When a judgment has been taken against defendants as partners it can be enforced at common law either against the firm assets, or against the separate property of either partner,[57] for each partner is liable for the entire indebtedness of the firm.[58] In Louisiana this liability in solido is limited to members of commercial partnerships.[59] At common law, as we have seen,[60] the liability of partners upon firm contracts is joint, not joint and several. Accordingly a judgment against some of the partners upon such a liability extinguishes the claim against all others, for the contract obligation has been merged in the judgment.[61] Such is not the consequence, however, under statutes which declare the obligation of a partner to be several as well as joint.[62]

could not be entered against a partner not served with process,[63] nor could a joint judgment be entered in such case against the partners served,[64] at least unless those not served were non-residents.[65] This, however, has been changed by statute to a varying extent in many jurisdictions.[66]

d. Property Bound by Judgment. Under statutes permitting actions to be prosecuted against a firm in its firm-name, a judgment against the firm is binding only on firm property.[67] At common law a judgment against the members of a firm for a firm debt is binding on the partnership property and also on each partner's individual property.[68] A judgment against a partner for an individual debt binds his separate property, and his interest in the partnership property.[69] As it binds only such interest, its lien on the firm assets is subordinate to junior judgments of firm creditors.[70] When the legal title to firm real estate is vested in one of its members, the lien acquired by his individual judgment creditor is subordinate to the lien of judgment creditors of the firm.[71]

e. Default Judgment.[72] What judgment may be taken upon default by some or all of the partners who are defendants depends largely upon local statutory provisions.[73] In the absence of any peculiar legislation on the subject, a verdict for plaintiff upon the merits, when the action has been defended by any partner and the others have made default, entitles plaintiff to enter judgment against all;[74] while a verdict against plaintiff in such a case precludes him from taking judgment against any, even the defaulting, partners.[75]

f. Relief Against Judgment and Collateral Attack. The validity of a judgment against a firm or a partner, unless it is absolutely void, as for want of jurisdiction, cannot be successfully attacked collaterally;[76] but if it has been obtained fraudulently, it may be vacated, or relief may be obtained in equity, upon the application of the proper parties.[77] But a judgment will not ordinarily be vacated or set aside in equity for a mere irregularity,[78] or when the applicant has been guilty of laches.[79]

g. Dormant Partners. If the creditor of a firm takes judgment against the ostensible partners only, his claim against the dormant partner is extinguished at common law by the operation of the doctrine of merger.[80] Such judgment, however, is enforceable against the firm assets with the same effect as though the dormant partner had been a defendant.[81]

10. Execution and Enforcement of Judgment — a. In General. At common law a judgment against all the members of a firm for a firm debt is both joint and several, and execution thereon may be levied either on the firm property or on the property of either partner.[82] Under statutes which permit a partnership to be sued in the firm-name, a judgment in an action so brought is generally enforceable against the firm property only.[83] When statutes permit an action against a firm to proceed to judgment, although but a part of the members are served,[84] such judgment is ordinarily enforceable only against the firm property and the property of the partners served.[85] A similar limitation exists in the case of a judgment against a firm upon confession or consent of one or more but less than all of the partners.[86]

b. Execution Against Firm Property on Judgment Against Partner For Individual Debt. An execution on such a judgment is enforceable against the firm property, at common law, but only to the extent of the judgment debtor's interest therein.[87] As the execution is enforceable only against the debtor part-to seize and take actual possession thereof,[92] although some jurisdictions permit only a constructive levy.[93] Whether he must levy on the debtor partner's interest in the entire assets,[94] or may levy only on his interest in what is necessary to satisfy the execution, or in what is accessible to him,[95] is a question upon which the authorities are at variance. They are also at variance on the question whether the other partners are entitled to equitable interference to prevent a sale under the individual execution until an accounting and settlement can be had,[96] or not.[97] The manner of levying and enforcing individual executions against firm property has been regulated by statute in many jurisdictions.[98]

d. Title and Rights of Purchaser. he is generally allowed an accounting with the other partners.[1] In some cases it may be necessary for him to file a bill in equity in order to have his rights defined and secured.[2] It is held in some jurisdictions that the purchaser under a judgment against all the partners, although not for a firm debt, acquires title to the firm assets.[3] The purchaser, on an execution sale under a firm judgment, acquires the entire ownership in the property sold.[4] As at common law a judgment creditor of the firm may make a valid levy of his execution on the separate property of a partner, it follows that the purchaser under such an execution acquires complete ownership of such property,[5] subject only to the liens of separate execution creditors which are prior in time.[6] It is to be borne in mind that in some jurisdictions statutes have modified the common-law right above stated.[7]

proceeds are payable to him,[8] unless circumstances arise which authorize a court of equity to interfere and marshal the assets between firm and separate creditors.[9]

f. Priorities of Executions. From the principles above set forth, it follows that when firm property is sold by a sheriff under several executions in his hands, some of which are in favor of firm creditors while others are in favor of separate creditors, the proceeds are to be applied to the satisfaction of firm creditors' executions in preference to those of separate creditors, without regard to the dates of judgments or levies.[10]

11. Appeal and Error. The ordinary rules upon this topic apply to appeals from judgments in partnership litigations.[11] It may be noted that all the partners must join in an appeal from a joint judgment against them;[12] but that the firm as such may appeal from a judgment taken against it under statutory authority.[13] In case a partner dies after a judgment is rendered, an appeal may be prosecuted against the surviving partner.[14] In an action against several on a partnership liability, the appellate court may affirm as to one or more and reverse as to others.[15]

petent for a partner to sell his interest in the firm and retire therefrom.[2] Such transaction does not prevent the continuance of the partnership by the other partners. On the contrary, if the business is thereafter carried on by the other partners, it will be presumed that their original contract remains in force, so far as it is consistent with the change of members.[3] Provisions for the retirement of a member are often inserted in the partnership articles;[4] but in the absence of such provisions the parties may agree at any time upon the terms of retirement of a partner.[5] So, without the retirement of a member, the members of an existing firm may admit a new member into the firm.[6] If the incoming partner is induced to become a member of the firm by false and fraudulent representations, he may rescind or maintain an action of deceit.[7]

2. Transfer of Partner's Interest to a Copartner. When one partner transfers his interest in the firm to a copartner for a valuable consideration, his title to firm assets is extinguished and passes to his vendee,[8] unless the transfer is merely as security;[9] and a note given by the purchasing partner for such interest represents a valid debt, although the selling partner by failing to give notice of his retirement might be liable as a partner thereafter.[10] If, however, the transaction is only a preliminary negotiation for a sale, or the creation of an agency to collect debts due the firm, firm title is not affected.[11] Moreover, the selling partner must act with the utmost good faith toward his copartner, or the transfer will be impeachable for fraud, or give rise to an action for deceit.[12] Such a purchase

3. TRANSFER OF PARTNER'S INTEREST TO THIRD PERSON. The legal power of a partner to make a transfer of his interest to a third person is unquestioned.[15] The transferee, however, does not become a tenant in common with the other partners in any specific goods, but acquires only the interest his vendor had, which is his share of the residue after the affairs of the firm are settled and the debts paid, including debts due from the firm to a partner.[16] Such a purchase does not make the buyer a partner in the firm, without the concurrence of all the partners, either given expressly or implied from conduct.[17]

4. Continued Use of Firm-Name.[18] The right to continue the use of the old firm-name, after the retirement of a partner, may be acquired by an express agreement with such partner.[19] In the absence of such agreement, it is held in many jurisdictions, and in some it is expressly provided by statute, that the continuing parties are not entitled to use the old firm-name.[20] In England and in some of our states they are entitled to use it if they are the purchasers of the partnership property and business, provided they do not thereby expose the retired partner to any liability for the debts of the new firm.[21] If the name is an arbitrary or fancy one, not designating the retired partner, or if its continued use is under statutory authority, so that it has come to designate a business house rather than the individual members of the firm, its use may be continued by the new firm, under a purchase of the partnership good-will.[22] In case the firm-name is used without legal warrant therefor, and especially if it is so used as to subject the retiring partner to personal liability, to injure his business reputation, or to impose upon the public, such use may be enjoined.[23]

5. Good-Will of Old Firm.[24] The term "good-will" has been defined by statute as "the expectation of continued public patronage."[25] Judges have found no little difficulty in framing a definition;[26] but their tendency is to expand rather than to narrow its scope. Lord Eldon's statement that the good-will of a business "is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place"[27] has been criticized repeatedly as too limited for modern kinds and methods of business. It has been well said that "the habit of people to purchase from a certain dealer or manufacturer, which is the foundation for any expectation that purchases will continue, may depend on many things beside place. 6. Competition of Retiring Partner With New Firm. Even though the retiring partner has sold his interest in the partnership good-will to the new firm, he is not bound to retire from this line of business. Indeed, formerly a contract on his part to so retire would have been held void on the ground of public policy.[34] Although such a contract will now be enforced,[35] if the purchaser has duly performed his obligations thereunder,[36] the retiring partner who has not thus bound himself may set up a competing business next door so long as he does not mislead

B. Assets of Old Firm — 1. Rights of Retiring Partner. A partner who retires from a firm without selling his interest therein is entitled to his share of the firm assets,[47] including the profits realized from the business after the firm's dissolution.[48] After an absolute sale of his interest, he becomes, as we have seen,[49] a creditor of the purchaser,[50] and the assets are available to the purchaser's creditors,[51] the selling-out partner having no lien on the old firm assets.[52] But if the sale is made subject to the partnership indebtedness, or upon terms from which the court can imply an understanding that the purchaser took the assets subject to a trust for the benefit of the retiring partner and the firm creditors, it is generally held that the retiring partner retains a lien by which the property can be secured for himself or unpaid firm creditors.[53]

Co., 123 Ill. App. 616. See also Rose v. Coffield, 53 Md. 18, 36 Am. Rep. 389; Clapp v. Rogers, 12 N. Y. 283; Wardwell v. Haight, 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 549; National Bank v. Norton, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 572; and other cases cited in the preceding notes.

Proof of the mailing of a printed circular, containing notice of the withdrawal of a partner, addressed to a party who had prior dealings with the firm, is prima facie evidence that such person received the same in due course of mail, and, without rebuttal, is sufficient to charge such person with notice of that fact. Young v. Clapp, 147 Ill. 176, 32 N. E. 187, 35 N. E. 372.

Special agreement.— Where a partnership agreement in the business of cutting and selling ice was made for three years, and provided that, at the end of that time, or on the sooner determination of the agreement, one of the partners was to receive from the others a certain sum for all his interest in the "icehouse, tools and property" of the firm, it was held that the interest which he was to convey was his interest in the fixed property or plant and did not include the ice or the unsettled partnership accounts; and also that the retiring partner was still liable to share with the other partners, under the agreement, in the profits or losses of the business. Schuyler v. Cullen, 120 N. Y. App. Div. 637, 105 N. Y. Suppl. 544.

Interest on share.— Where, on the expiration of a partnership, all but one of the partners took over all its property, formed a new firm and continued the business, it was held that the retiring partner was, on an accounting, entitled to interest from the time of the dissolution on his share of the property of the firm. 53. Alabama.— McGown v. Sprague, 23 Ala. 524.

Illinois.— Parker v. Merritt, 105 Ill. 293, where it is said that where a stock of goods equal to the firm indebtedness is left with one who continues the business with which to pay the debts, he is not a purchaser so as to subject the goods to the payment of his individual debts. He is a trustee and the trust can be enforced in equity by the retiring partner for the benefit of firm creditors and against subsequent purchasers or execution creditors with notice of equities of retiring partner.

2. Rights of Continuing and Incoming Partners or New Firm. These depend upon the terms of the transaction, by which the outgoing partner retires. If he dissolves the firm by selling his interest to a third person, the continuing partner has power to wind up the firm's affairs, and in so doing to dispose of the firm's assets.[54] If he sells his interest to those who organize and conduct a new firm, or a continuation of the old one, the transferees acquire all the rights possessed by the original firm.[55] But where a firm dissolves by a change in its membership and a new firm is formed, the property interests of the old firm do not become those of the new firm, without a clear agreement to that effect,[56] or acts from which such agreement can be presumed.[57] One who buys the interest of a retiring partner in firm property and assumes his liabilities does not hold the property in trust for the creditors of the firm so as to prevent him from making a deed of trust thereof for the benefit of such creditors with preferences.[58]

3. Debts Due by Partners to Firm or Copartners. The indebtedness of a retiring partner to his firm or his copartners continues to belong to the firm, or to the partners, as the case may be, and does not pass to a new partnership without the agreement of all the parties concerned.[59] Nor is his indebtedness affected by his sale of his interest to one of several copartners or to a third person.[60] If, however, he sells to his copartners his interest in the firm assets and they agree to pay the firm debts, his indebtedness to the firm is extinguished, for his interest or share in the business is only the balance which would come to him after his indebtedness to the firm was satisfied.[61]

C. Obligations of Old Firm — 1. Retiring Partner's Liabilities. For obligations of the firm, incurred during his membership, a partner remains liable after his retirement, even though his copartners have contracted with him to discharge such obligation,[62] unless the creditor agrees to accept the liability of the continuing partners or new firm,[63] or unless he is estopped by his conduct or laches from pursuing the retired partner.[64] Even for firm obligations incurred after his retirement he will be liable, as has been seen, unless he was a dormant partner, or unless he has given due notice of his withdrawal.[65]

2. Retiring Partner as Surety For Firm Debts. When a partnership is dissolved by the retirement of one of the partners, and the others agree with him to assume the firm debts, all courts admit that as between themselves the retiring partner becomes a surety for the debts.[66] It is also universally agreed that such an agreement cannot affect the rights of firm creditors to proceed against all the old partners in the collection of their claims against the firm.[67] But the courts differ on the question whether the firm creditors who have notice of such agreement are bound thereafter to observe the relationship of principal and surety thus instituted between the continuing and retiring partners. The weight of authority both in England and in this country is in favor of compelling them to observe it.[68]

Discharge by extension of time.— Where, after the dissolution of a firm, the continuing partner, having agreed to pay the firm debts, requested an extension from plaintiff, to which plaintiff agreed, without consideration, but the continuing partner's agreement was never fulfilled, it was held that there was no such extension of time as to discharge the retiring partner from liability. pay an indebtedness of the firm to the retiring partner;[71] nor are they available to the creditors of the firm, unless there is evidence that it was intended that they should inure to their benefit.[72] If the contract is one of indemnity only, the retiring partner must show that he has been compelled to pay firm debts or has sustained other legal harm, as a result of the obligor's breach of contract, before he can maintain an action.[73] If, however, the contract is to pay firm debts, it is broken by the obligor's failure to pay the debts upon maturity.[74] Such contracts of indemnity do not relieve the retiring partner from liability to firm creditors.[75]

4. Liabilities of Continuing Partners or New Firm. For the debts of the old firm, the continuing partners remain liable jointly with the retiring partners, and in some jurisdictions they are severally liable.[76] If, however, they organize a new firm, it is not liable for the old firm's debts, unless it assumes them, either by express agreement,[77] or by conduct.[78] But if one of its members uses its funds in paying a debt of the old firm to a creditor who is ignorant of any change in the firm, it may not be able to recover such payment,[79] although the members not assenting to this use will be entitled to recover their share of the funds from the partner misapplying them.[80]

5. Liability of Incoming Partners. One who becomes a member of an existing firm does not render himself liable for its existing obligations, unless he actually contracts for such liability,[81] or unless his conduct is such as will raise the legal debts which he is compelled to pay,[3] and for expenses properly incurred in connection therewith.[4] If his agreement is to pay the debts, he is liable to suit if he fails to so do, whether the retiring partner has paid them or not.[5] His breach of agreement may give to the retiring partner the right to go into equity for relief.[6]

D. Actions After Change in Membership[7]—1. To Enforce Claims of the Old Firm. At common law, actions to enforce claims of the old firm had to be brought in the names of the partners in the old firm;[8] but under modern legislation they may be brought in the name of the assignee, whether he be the continuing partner, or a new firm,[9] save in exceptional circumstances.[10] And in case the assignee has performed an executory contract of the old firm, with the consent of the other contracting party, such assignee is entitled to sue upon the contract.[11]

2. To Enforce Claims Against the Old Firm. Actions to enforce claims against the old firm can be brought against all the members of the old firm, although they have been assumed by one or more of them, or by a new firm.[12] Indeed if an outgoing partner defends, on the ground of his retirement, he must plead and prove his release from the obligations of the old firm.[13] The presumption is that those who were members of a firm when it incurred an obligation are the proper parties defendant in an action to enforce the obligation.[14]

3. Actions Between Partners on Contracts of Dissolution. The retiring partner is entitled to sue any former copartner, or other person, who has broken a contract with him, to pay for his share in the old firm and to save him harmless from its debts.[15] On the other hand he may be sued by the other contracting party for any breach of the contract on his part.[16] In an action on a bond for the payment of firm debts given to a retiring partner, it was held that the court should provide in its judgment for the satisfaction of the firm's creditors out of the money received.[17]

4. Actions by Creditors on Contracts Between Partners. We have seen that the courts differ in their views as to the right of a firm creditor to sue upon a contract between partners, by which some of them, or a new firm in which they become members, undertake to pay existing debts. In some jurisdictions the suit will lie.[18] Where a partner after dissolution goes into business with a new firm and gives a note in the name of the new firm for a debt of the old firm, of which fact the holder is aware, it is incumbent on him, in an action on the note, to show that the debt had been assumed by the new firm for the sake of some benefit derived from the assumption.[19] An incoming partner who has agreed to assume the debts of the old firm may, when sued by one of its creditors, defend by showing that he was defrauded and that plaintiff or his agent was cognizant of it and connived at it.[20] Where a partnership has dissolved and the partner succeeding to the business, having taken a new partner, signs the name of the new firm to a note in renewal of a note of the old firm, the creditor has the burden of showing, against the new partner, that he agreed to assume the old firm's debts.[21] Where a partnership is dissolved and a new firm formed, including, with one exception, the members of the old firm, it will be presumed, as between the latter firm and the retiring partner, that debts of the latter firm were contracted for payment of debts of the former one.[22]

VIII. Death of Partner, and Surviving Partners.

A. Effect of Death of Partner — 1. In General. In the absence of an agreement between the partners upon the subject, the death of a partner dissolves the firm.[23] The firm title to partnership property is not converted by the common-law rule of survivorship into the separate title of the surviving partner,[24] although such survivor has the exclusive right thereafter to control and dispose of the firm title.[25] The dissolution of a firm by the death of a partner does not affect existing contracts to which it is a party,[26] unless the contract has relation to the personal conduct of the deceased partner.[27] Most of the foregoing principles are applicable, when the death of the partner occurs after the dissolution of his firm.[28]

2. Right and Duty to Liquidate Firm Affairs.[29] From the foregoing principles it follows that the surviving partner has the exclusive right to liquidate the affairs of the firm, and that he is under a duty to do this promptly and honestly.[30] Whatever legal power is essential to such liquidation, he may exercise,[31] and he is exercise this authority for his private advantage.[47] Where, however, a surviving partner executed a quitclaim, in which he was described as a party of the first part, and conveyed all interest in the assets or partnership property of the firm, consisting of notes, judgments, mortgages, and other evidences of debt, as well as goods, lands, and chattels, with all rights of the surviving partner to make deeds and other necessary instruments for the winding up of the partnership, the instrument was construed as conveying only the individual interest of the grantor in the partnership assets.[48]

3. MORTGAGING FIRM PROPERTY. The surviving partner has power to mortgage firm property to secure firm debts,[49] or to raise money with which to pay firm debts,[50] or to secure money borrowed by him after his partner's death and which was used in paying firm debts.[51]

4. indebtedness, in the absence of proof that they were properly made in the discharge of later items.[57] Payments made to the surviving partner by one who is a debtor of the old firm and of the new business conducted by the survivor will likewise be imputed to the oldest item.[58]

6. PAYMENT OF INDIVIDUAL DEBTS. While the surviving partner holds the legal title to the firm assets, he has no right to transfer such assets in payment of his individual debts;[59] and a transferee who takes any part of the firm assets in satisfaction of or as security for a debt owing to him by the surviving partner individually can be charged as a trustee thereof at the suit of firm creditors, or of the representatives of the deceased partner.[60]

C. Real Property of Firm[61]— 1. TITLE IN INDIVIDUAL.[62] When real estate is acquired by a firm, and forms a part of the partnership stock, it does not matter that the record title is in one of the partners. Equity will treat the heirs of the deceased partner as trustees for the survivor and those interested in the firm assets.[63] But one who purchases the land for value from the holder of the legal title and without notice of the equitable interest therein can hold unencumbered by such secret equity.[64]

2. TITLE, POSSESSION, AND CONTROL OF SURVIVOR. The custom of merchants was extended by English tribunals, at an early day, to exclude survivorship among partners,[65] and to secure all partnership property, whether real or personal, for the purposes of the partnership in accordance with the partnership agreement.[66] Nevertheless the legal estate or interest in partnership real estate devolves according to the nature and tenure thereof and according to the general rules of real estate law applicable thereto.[67] Equity, however, treats the surviving partner and the heirs of the deceased partner as holding the title after such devolution in trust, so far as necessary, for the persons beneficially interested in the land as a part of the partnership stock.[68] And the surviving partner is generally accorded the right of possession of such land for the purposes of winding up the firm's business.[69]

3. Sale and Conveyance. While the surviving partner has power to make a valid contract for the sale of partnership realty, when such sale is necessary in order to pay firm debts, and may compel the heirs or devisees of the deceased partner to join in a conveyance of the property in pursuance of such contract,[70] he has not the power to convey a perfect legal title to such realty in his capacity as survivor,[71] unless the realty has been converted into personalty by the partnership contract and the will of the deceased partner,[72] or unless the law of the particular jurisdiction has given to the surviving partner such power.[73] If a sale of firm real estate is made by the survivor in payment of his individual debts, or by a separate judgment creditor of the survivor, only his individual interest therein will pass.[74] A quitclaim deed by a surviving partner of partnership realty conveys only the individual interest of the grantor.[75]

4. Subjection to Payment of Firm Debts. When the personal property of a firm is insufficient to pay its debts in full, its realty can be subjected to their payment either upon application of the surviving partner,[76] or, if he fails to do his duty or the firm is insolvent, upon application of the firm creditors.[77] And if the survivor has sold the realty for full value, in order to pay firm debts, the purchaser can compel the heirs or devisees of the deceased partner to join with the survivor in a conveyance thereof.[78] But the personal representative of the deceased partner cannot compel a sale of the latter's interest in firm realty, while such realty is needed to pay firm debts.[79]

5. RIGHTS OF HEIRS, DEVISEES, AND WIDOW. If the surviving partner disposes of firm realty in an inequitable and unauthorized manner, the heirs or devisees of the deceased partner will not be compelled to join in a conveyance thereof;[80] and whatever remains of firm realty after the debts of the firm are paid and the equities between the partners adjusted descends in this country according to the rules of real estate law, and vests in his heirs or devisees,[81] unless the contract of partnership is such as to constitute an equitable conversion of the realty into personalty.[82] His widow is entitled to dower in such remnant, but in nothing beyond this.[83] The heirs of a deceased partner are not necessary or proper parties to a proceeding by the surviving partners for sale of the partnership property, although part of it was realty; it being converted to personalty by the sale, and its descent being according to its character after conversion.[84] If the interest of the deceased partner in firm realty is duly sold by his authorized personal representative, the proceeds belong to his estate.[85]

jurisdictions, however, the firm creditors do not share pari passu with the separate creditors in the separate estate of the deceased,[93] unless there is no living solvent partner and no firm property.[94] But they are entitled to priority over separate creditors in the deceased partner's share of the firm assets.[95] The time for presenting a claim by a firm creditor against the deceased's estate is not ordinarily limited by the statutory provisions which govern the presentation of claims by individual creditors.[96]

E. Rights and Liabilities of Survivor as to Estate of Deceased — 1. Rights in General. The survivor is entitled to the possession of the firm assets for the purpose of converting them into cash, paying its debts, and winding up the firm's affairs;[97] but not for the purpose of appropriating them to the payment of individual debts.[98] In England, and in some of our states, the survivor is not deemed a trustee for the estate of the deceased;[99] while other courts treat him as in some sense at least a trustee for the estate.[1]

2. Recovery by Survivor For Improvements. If improvements are made in good faith in winding up the firm's affairs, the survivor is generally allowed reimbursement from the firm's assets; and, if these are insufficient, he is entitled to contribution from the deceased partner's estate.[2]

3. Recovering Funds Misapplied by Deceased or His Representatives. The surviving partner is entitled to recover from the estate of the deceased moneys collected and misapplied by the deceased or by his representatives.[3] He may also fol-

5. Reimbursement For Payments. When the surviving partner, applying the firm assets, is compelled to pay firm debts, he is entitled to reimbursement from the deceased partner's estate to the extent of that partner's share of the losses.[7]

partner can compel him to account for the deceased's ratable share thereof.[10] If the representative of the deceased partner is compelled to pay firm debts he is entitled to call upon the surviving partner for contribution;[11] and if the latter makes a voluntary conveyance of his property, it may be set aside as fraudulent against the deceased partner's representatives.[12]

F. Survivor as Executor or Administrator of Deceased Partner — 1. Collection and Management of Estate. When the surviving partner is also the personal representative of the deceased, he acts in a dual capacity. As survivor, he is entitled and legally bound to convert the assets of the firm into cash, and to receive, hold, and distribute the proceeds.[13] In such capacity, however, he has no right to sell the separate property of the deceased for the payment of firm debts,[14] nor to apply the separate assets to such payment,[15] although he is entitled to call upon such estate for contribution in case the firm assets have proved insufficient to pay the debts and he has paid them,[16] unless he is barred by laches.[17] But he cannot lawfully apply the assets of the separate estate to firm debts, save in such or in similar circumstances;[18] and certainly he cannot apply them to the payment of debts for which he has become primarily liable.[19] On the other hand it is his duty as survivor to collect the decedent's share in the partnership and turn this over to the separate estate of the deceased.[20]

2. Contracts Between Survivor and Executor. The same person cannot enter into an agreement between himself as surviving partner and himself as the personal representative of the deceased.[21] Accordingly a sale by himself in one capacity to himself in the other is voidable, unless it is permitted by statute.[22]

In Louisiana by statute a surviving partner, who is administrator of the deceased partner's succession, may purchase at a succession sale of his effects.[23]

3. Allowance to Widow. Until firm debts are paid, the widow of the deceased has no right to an allowance from the personal assets of the firm; and if the survivor, being also administrator of the deceased partner's estate, makes such an allowance, he is guilty of a misappropriation of firm assets.[24] This, however, does not apply to payments made to the widow pursuant to provisions in the partnership articles.[25]

4. Accounting and Settlement. The survivor should account to the estate of the deceased partner for the latter's share in firm assets, and if he fails to do so he may be forced to an accounting by application to the proper court.[26] In such proceeding he will be required to account for the fair valuation of the share at the deceased partner's death.[27] As a rule he will not be allowed a compensation for settling the firm's affairs;[28] and if he misappropriates the share, he may be chargeable with compound interest thereon,[29] or with the profits realized from such use.[30]

Where a surviving partner, who during the continuance of the partnership had been entitled to draw a certain weekly salary for his services in managing the business, continued to conduct the business after the death of the other partner, and continued to draw the salary, but neither the co-administratrix nor next of kin of the deceased partner objected to the continuance of the business, and it did not appear that they consented that the surviving partner might continue to draw the salary, it was held that, on settlement of the accounts of the surviving partner as administrator of the deceased partner, the surviving partner was properly charged with the amount withdrawn by him as salary. Clausen v. Puvogel, supra.

Interest on salary improperly withdrawn. — But where a surviving partner who carried on the business for some time was required to account for the profits thereof, it was held that he was not chargeable in such case with interest on amounts improperly withdrawn by him as salary. G. Statutory Partnership Administrators — 1. In General. In some states it is provided by statute that the surviving partner shall not exercise his common-law functions as survivor, until he has given a bond or complied with other specified requirements.[31] Such statutes generally preclude the settlement of such estates in any other manner.[32]

2. Collection and Allowance of Claims and Accounting. The powers of the statutory administrator in collecting firm debts and managing the firm affairs,[33] as well as in allowing, refusing, and paying claims,[34] are prescribed with considerable particularity. He is also subject to an accounting in a specified court.[35]

31. As to the construction of these statutes see the following cases:

The administrator of the deceased partner may recover possession of property from the surviving partner on his failure to give the statutory security. Bredow v. Mutual Sav. Inst., 28 Mo. 181. The heirs at law of a deceased member of a partnership may not sue for his share of an unadministerial asset of the firm, but the administrator of the partnership, or, he being dead, its administrator de bonis non, must sue for the asset. Removal.—A surviving partner who has given bonds under the statute for the due administration of the partnership effects cannot be removed for non-residence by the probate court as in the case of an ordinary administrator. Green v. Virden, 22 Mo. 506.

Public administrator see Headle v. Cloud, 51 Mo. 301.

33. Shattuck v. Chandler, 40 Kan. 516, 20 Pac. 225, 10 Am. St. Rep. 227 (survivor, under this regulation of his powers, is deprived of authority to make an assignment for the benefit of creditors); Bell v. McCoy, 136 Mo. 552, 38 S. W. 329; Easton v. Courtwright, 84 Mo. 27; Springfield Grocer Co. v. Shackleford, 56 Mo. 34. Easton v. Courtwright, 84 Mo. 27; State v. Shacklett, 73 Mo. App. 265 (applying Rev. St. (1889) § 64); Collier v. Cairns, 6 Mo. App. 188. The surviving partner of a commercial partnership liquidating its affairs is without authority to admit the correctness of debts alleged to be due by the deceased individually, or pay them out of the partnership funds, and the widow of the deceased partner and his succession cannot be called on to litigate such claims in the liquidation proceedings. In re Curlee, 118 La. 563, 43 So. 165. Where partners executed a trust deed, the surviving partner and his wife and the wife of the deceased partner could not create a lien on the partnership estate, after another had been appointed administrator and was in charge of the partnership estate, so as to exclude the right of the partnership administrator to the excess of the purchase-money in the hands of the trustee after satisfying the debt. Barnes v. Stone, 198 Mo. 471, 95 S. W. 915.

35. Wolfort v. Reilly, 133 Mo. 463, 34 S. W. 847 (where counsel fees were allowed to the statutory administrator, as well as disbursements to a bookkeeper for looking after assessments and taxes, but he was chargeable with interest on the sum tendered to the deceased partner's executrix, from the time of tender, if he could have loaned the money or used it after the tender); In re Glover, 127 Mo. 153, 29 S. W. 982; Christy v. Donegan, 83 Mo. 374 (not allowed for groceries furnished the widow of the deceased); Crow v. Weidner, 36 Mo. 412; Cogswell v. Freudenau, 93 Mo. App. 482, 67 S. W. 744 (holding that the heirs of the deceased partner may appear in such proceeding and except to the administrator's account). In a contest over the final settlement of a surviving partner administering the partnership estate, whose letters were revoked, the administrator de bonis non represents the heirs and creditors of the estate and such final settlement has the effect of a final judgment, which, until impeached in equity, is a complete defense to an action on such surviving partner's bond as administrator. State v. Shacklett, 115 Mo. App. 715, 91 S. W. 956. The widow of a deceased partner of a commercial firm, which is in the hands of the surviving partner for the purpose of liquidation, who lives in the city where the liquidation is carried on, and who, presumably, has knowledge of the situation, should, in justice to the liquidator, urge at the time any timely objection which she has to the liquidation, before, and not postpone complaints as to the expense

H. Bond of Surviving Partner or of Statutory Partnership Administrator. The duty on the part of the survivor or of the statutory representative to give a bond,[36] as well as the facts constituting a breach of its conditions and authorizing the maintenance of an action thereon,[37] are determinable by the statutory provisions in the particular jurisdiction as these have been construed by the courts thereof.[38]

I. Rights and Liabilities Incident to Winding Up Business — 1. Obligations Incurred. The surviving partner, in performing his duty of winding up the firm affairs, may subject the assets of the firm to a mortgage or other specific lien,[39] and may render them liable for the satisfaction of new debts properly incurred by him as survivor.[40] If the assets are insufficient to pay such debts, he is entitled to call upon the deceased partner's estate for contribution.[41] As a rule, however, the estate of the deceased partner cannot be made directly liable to third persons by the contracts of the survivor.[42] For the breach of any incurred in the liquidation until after they have been incurred, and the liquidation closed. In re Curlee, 118 La. 563, 43 So. 165. The preparation of the accounts of the surviving partner of a commercial firm liquidating its affairs is part of the duty of the attorney employed in the case, and the liquidator is not authorized to employ a bookkeeper to make out the account and have him paid out of the funds of the partnership, under La. Civ. Code, art. 1142, providing that lawful expenses incurred for the advantage of a partnership during the administration of its affairs after the death of a partner are borne by the succession of the deceased partner in proportion to the interest of the succession in the partnership. In re Curlee, supra. When an outlay of money by the liquidator of partnership affairs for electric lights is shown by the testimony to have resulted in benefit to the partnership, the widow of the deceased partner who accepts the benefit of the expenditure cannot properly complain of the outlay which produced the benefit. In re Curlee, supra.

Hill v. Treat, 67 Me. 501; Cook v. Lewis, 36 Me. 340; Gurley v. Gurley, 77 Miss. 413, 26 So. 962 (bond must be in a sum equal to the value of the partnership assets, although the survivor's interest in the estate greatly exceeds that of the deceased partner); Goodson v. Goodson, 140 Mo. 206, 41 S. W. 737 (the survivor's failure to give the bond required by Rev. St. (1889) § 56, does not deprive him of his common-law right to settle the firm estate, unless the personal representative of the deceased qualifies under section 60, and takes possession); Hays v. Odom, 79 Mo. Under the statute allowing the surviving member of a partnership to pay all demands against the firm without requiring the same to be exhibited to the probate court for allowance, only when he knows the partnership assets will suffice to discharge all its debts, the payment by a surviving partner of unallowed demands where there is a deficiency of assets to satisfy all creditors, constitutes a breach of his bond. State v. Shacklett, 115 Mo. App. 715, 91 S. W. 956. In an action on the bond of a surviving partner administering the partnership estate, the petition averred that such administrator, after wrongfully paying unallowed debts, had eight hundred dollars left in his hands and alleged an indebtedness to relator of two thousand dollars. There was evidence that defendant's successor, as administrator de bonis non, had in his hands the sum of nine hundred dollars and was entitled to collect other assets alleged to amount to one thousand four hundred dollars or more. It was held not to show conclusively that there would be a deficiency of assets, authorizing a recovery on the bond, it appearing that all other claims against the estate were paid in full. Provision not authorizing continuance of business.—A provision in a firm agreement that on the death of a partner his share of the capital shall remain in the business for two years, a surviving partner paying interest thereon at a specified rate, does not authorize a continuance of the business by the executor of a deceased partner. be continued.[56] If the articles provide that the personal representatives or the heirs or assigns of the deceased may become partners in his stead, such provision does not compel them to enter the firm, although it gives them the option to do so.[57] If they exercise the option, a new firm is formed.[58] Even when the articles provide that such representatives shall enter the firm, they may still decline to enter, although their refusal may subject the decedent's estate to damages for the breach of this term of the partnership contract.[59] When the decedent's will or partnership articles provide that the partnership shall continue for a specified period, the provision is generally construed to be binding upon the decedent's estate only to the extent of the capital then embarked in the business.[60] Still it is competent to provide that his entire estate shall be chargeable with the debts of the business carried on after his death.[61]

2. Rights and Liabilities of Survivors. While, as has been seen in the preceding paragraph, the survivor has no right to continue the business of the firm save for the purpose of winding it up,[62] and while a court of equity may take from him even the right of winding up in case of his insolvency and danger of wasting the assets;[63] yet, if he does organize a new firm and passes title to the old firm's stock to it, his rights to such property as surviving partner are extinguished.[64] Whether the rights of the creditors of the old firm to such property are extinguished depends upon whether the transfer of title was bona fide.[65] If the survivor simply mingles the firm assets with his own in continuing the business, firm creditors will be entitled to share in the entire assets.[66] Advantages gained by the survivor, while acting as such, must be shared with the estate of the deceased;[67] while losses sustained in continuing the business, as distinguished from winding it up, must be borne by him.[68] If one or more of the survivors continue the business without authority, they do not subject to liability the other survivors who take no part in such continuance.[69]

3. RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. The executors or administrators of the deceased partner have no right to interfere with the settlement of the firm's business by the survivor,[70] unless they can show that there is reason to apprehend loss to the estate from his mismanagement.[71] They have the right, however, to an accounting from the survivor, and to the decedent's share of the profits from the business as wound up by such survivor.[72] They have no lien on the assets for such share.[73] When the business is continued by the survivor pursuant to provisions in the partnership articles or the decedent's will, the executor or administrator of the deceased is not personally liable for the debts,[74] unless he becomes a member of the firm.[75] In the latter case, if he was anthor-

ized by the deceased to become a partner, he is entitled to indemnity from the estate to the extent of the decedent's interest in the partnership.[76]

4. Rights and Liabilities of Heirs, Devisees, and Legatees. The decedent's interest in firm real estate descends to his heirs, but in trust.[77] In England this trust is for the persons beneficially interested in the partnership assets.[78] In this country the trust is generally limited to the payment of firm debts.[79] If a partner dies intestate, his heirs and next of kin are entitled to his share.[80] If he leaves a will, disposing of such interest, the devisees or legatees are entitled to receive it from the surviving partner.[81] Although his interest is to remain as a part of the firm assets, the heirs, devisees, or legatees of the remainder of his estate do not become liable for the survivor's debts.[82] The heirs, devisees, or legatees of a deceased partner do not become personally liable for the firm debts unless they become members of the firm.[83]

5. Liabilities of Decedent's Estate For Survivor's Acts. The survivor's acts, in winding up the firm business, will render the estate of the deceased liable, when they are done in the performance of obligations of the firm;[84] but the estate will not be liable for his acts in incurring new obligations.[85] Even when the survivor is continuing the firm's business pursuant to a provision in the partnership articles or in the decedent's will, his acts will not render the decedent's estate liable, beyond the share invested in the firm at his death, for new obligations,[86] unless the deceased has clearly subjected the remainder of the estate to such liability.[87]

6. ACCOUNTING AND SETTLEMENT BY SURVIVOR. When the business is carried on by the survivor, for the purpose of completing existing contracts, or pursuant to the partnership articles, he must account to the representatives of the deceased for the profits made in such business.[88] If he carries it on longer than he is authorized to do, the decedent's representatives are generally accorded the election of compelling him to account for the decedent's share of the profits, or to pay interest on decedent's capital thus employed by the survivor.[89] It is also to be borne in mind that the survivor occupies a fiduciary position toward the representatives of the deceased, and is held to a strict accountability.[90] But he is not personally liable for sums of money given in charity, according to the firm's custom, during decedent's life.[91] For his services in continuing the business the survivor will not be allowed to charge unless there is an agreement therefor,[92] unless the court is satisfied that the services have been very beneficial to the state,[93] or unless the representatives of the deceased partner elect to share in the profits.[94] A settlement fairly made by the survivor will bind all parties thereto, in the absence of fraud or mistake.[95]

7. Rights of Firm Creditors. Those who are creditors of the firm when it is dissolved by the death of a partner, and those who become creditors as the result of transactions with the survivor while he is discharging existing obligations of the firm, are entitled to share in the assets of the firm, to the exclusion of the individual creditors of the survivor.[96] Even when the survivor has formed a new partnership and is using the old firm's assets in the business, the old firm's creditors are entitled to have any of those assets which remain in specie appropriated to their claims in preference to those of the new firm.[97] But if the old assets have been honestly and in good faith purchased by the new firm, the old creditors have no lien upon them, nor any preferential interest in them.[98] In case, however, the new firm has assumed the debts of the old firm, the old creditors are allowed, in most jurisdictions, to enforce their claims against the new firm pari passu with those who have become creditors by dealing with the new firm.[99]

K. Name and Good-Will of Firm — 1. Continued Use of Firm-Name.[1] It is well settled that the estate of a deceased partner is not subjected to any liability by the survivor's continuance of the business in the old firm style, although such style includes the name of the deceased.[2] In some states legislation has been enacted authorizing the personal representatives of a deceased partner to enjoin such use by the survivor.[3] On the other hand statutes have been passed authorizing the continued use of such name upon compliance with their provisions.[4]

2. Good-Will of Firm.[5] What constitutes the good-will of a firm has been considered in a former connection.[6] Although there are decisions both in England and in this country that the right to use the firm-name passes to the survivor,[7] it is now pretty well settled that such right, if valuable, is a part of the good-will and hence a part of the firm assets, which must be accounted for by the

Where, therefore, the defendant in the case at bar, for a year and eleven months after the death of Hutchinson, carried on business at the old stand, with customers of the old firm, there being only slight changes in the personnel of the customers, and then sold the good will of his business, with a covenant to continue in the employ of the purchaser for six months, and to do all in his power to hold the customers for the purchaser, and with another covenant not to engage in the teaming business for five years within the district covered by the old business, the good will sold was not the good will of the old firm, but the good will of the defendant, and there is no obligation to account for even a nominal sum."

c. Liability of Decedent's Estate. While the representatives of the deceased partner cannot be joined with the survivor as a rule, in an action at law, the estate is everywhere liable for firm obligations.[16] According to some of the cases the claimant may pursue his concurrent remedies against the survivor and against the decedent's estate at the same time.[17] According to others, before he can proceed against the decedent's estate, he must show that the surviving partners have been proceeded against to execution at law or else that they are insolvent, so that to proceed against them would be unavailing.[18] This rule is based upon the doctrine that the assets of the firm in the control of the survivor are the primary fund for the payment of firm debts.[19] Courts of equity often permit proceedings against the estate of the deceased partner, and permit the joinder of survivors and the representatives of the deceased partner, when courts of law would not permit them.[20]

19. See the cases cited in the following note.

d. Jurisdiction of Actions. Equity has jurisdiction of actions by the survivor or by firm creditors against the estate of a deceased partner,[21] in the absence of statutes giving to probate courts exclusive cognizance thereof.[22]

e. Limitations of Actions. The time within which actions must be brought by or against surviving partners or representatives of deceased partners depends upon the statutory provisions in the particular jurisdiction.[23] Whether the representatives of a deceased partner can set up the statute of limitations against a firm creditor while the surviving partner remains liable and has the right of contribution against them is a point on which the courts differ.[24] In jurisdictions where the creditor is not entitled to sue pending the administration of the firm estate in specified courts, the statute of limitations does not run against his claim during such settlement.[25]

f. Receiver and Attachment. The appointment of a receiver in a creditor's action against the surviving partner will be made whenever the court deems this essential to the preservation or honest administration of the assets.[26] In what cases an attachment will issue against the survivor in an action upon a firm claim and the procedure therein is generally determinable by local statutes.[27]

g. Pleadings and Issues — (I) Declaration or Complaint. In the absence of statutory provisions upon the subject, it is not necessary, as a rule, that the surviving partner should describe himself as such in an action brought by him to enforce a partnership claim; but he should set forth in his complaint or declaration all the facts which are necessary to show his right to maintain the action without the joinder of those who were his copartners, when the claim arose.[28] When a new firm has succeeded to the business of one dissolved by the death of a partner, and snes upon a claim of the old firm, it must allege an assignment of the claim to itself.[29] The rule stated above as to the complaint or declaration in an action by a surviving partner applies to a complaint or declaration in an action against the survivor on a firm obligation.[30] If the action is brought against the representatives of the deceased partner plaintiff's allegations must include the insolvency of the survivor in jurisdictions where a firm creditor must exhaust his remedy against the survivor as a condition precedent to an action against the estate of the deceased.[31] In other jurisdictions such allegations are unnecessary.[32]

(II) Subsequent Pleadings. The defense of payment, whether on behalf of the survivor or against him, must be pleaded.[33] When one sued as a survivor denies the existence of the partnership, he is not thereby precluded from having the partnership effects applied to the payment of firm debts.[34] The answer or plea of the representative of a deceased partner will vary, according to the jurisdiction in which the action is brought.[35] In every jurisdiction, however, such representative states a good defense when he answers that the claim sued on is an individual debt of the surviving partner.[36]

(III) Issues and Variance. The issues as framed by the pleadings must be sustained by the proof of the party having the affirmative.[37] If plaintiff's cause

h. Evidence. The rules which relate to the admissibility of evidence, to presumptions and burden of proof, as well as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence, in actions such as we are now considering, are not peculiar, although the necessity of giving evidence in a particular case, its admissibility and its probative force, depend very largely upon the principles of substantive law, which have been stated in the foregoing sections of this article.[39]

i. Instructions and Questions For Jury. It is the duty of the court to properly instruct the jury as to the rules of law applicable to the issue presented to them by the evidence.[40] It is for the jury to decide all disputed questions of fact.[41]

j. Judgment. The judgment must follow the pleadings. Hence, in an action brought by a surviving partner, a judgment in favor of the firm is irregular, even in a jurisdiction where a firm may sue as such.[42] Again the judgment should dispose of every material issue involved in the action.[43] A judgment may be

k. Execution. The surviving partner is entitled to issue execution upon a judgment recovered by the firm.[49] A judgment against him for a firm debt may be enforced by an execution against the firm property in his hands;[50] but a judgment against him for an individual debt cannot be enforced against firm assets to the detriment of firm creditors.[51] Nor can a judgment against him for a firm debt be enforced by execution against the estate of the deceased partner.[52]

2. Actions Between Survivor and Deceased's Representatives — a. By Survivor. exercise of this power is limited by the requirement that it shall be made in good faith and not at an unreasonable time.[66]

b. Partnership For Fixed Term. In the case of such partnership the authorities are divided. Some of our states follow the English view that neither partner has the power to dissolve the partnership of his own volition during the stipulated term.[67] In most jurisdictions, however, he is accorded this power, but exercises it subject to his liability to pay damages for his breach of contract, unless the circumstances are such as would entitle him to a decree of dissolution.[68]

2. Form and Requisites. To effect the dissolution of a partnership at will there must be a mutual agreement to dissolve, or else there must be notice by the party desiring a dissolution to his copartners of his election to terminate the partnership, or his election must be manifested by unequivocal acts or circumstances brought to the knowledge of the other parties.[69] No particular form of notice or of agreement is necessary.[70] It may be oral,[71] in the absence of a statutory provision on the subject.[72] But it must be given or actually authorized by a partner.[73]

3. Dissolution by Mutual Consent — a. Shown by Agreement. Of course, as in the case of other contracts, a partnership may be dissolved, at any time during the term for which it was organized, by the valid mutual agreement of the partners,[74]

but a mortgage of his interest by a partner does not work a dissolution.[80] Where the enterprise is unsuccessful and is abandoned by all the partners, such abandonment is ordinarily treated as working a dissolution by mutual consent.[81]

4. Withdrawal of Partner or Sale of Partner's Share or of Whole Property Without Consent. In most jurisdictions in this country, although not in England,[82] any partner may work a dissolution of the firm by withdrawing, or selling his share in the partnership, or by selling the entire firm property, without the consent of his copartners.[83]

5. By Operation of Law — a. Death of Partner. This produces a dissolution of the firm, not only as to the estate of the deceased, but as to all the partners,[84] unless the continuance of the partnership has been provided for by the agreement of the parties.[85] That a partner's death should have this legal consequence follows from the principle that by the contract of partnership each member has the right to the continuance of all his associates as members of the firm. The personal qualities of each member of a firm enter largely into the inducements which lead parties to form a normal partnership.[86] As this principle does not apply to joint stock associations, it follows that the death of one of its members does not work a dissolution ipso facto.[87]

b. Disability of Partner. In Tennessee it has been held that an adjudication of lunacy as to one partner ipso facto dissolves the firm;[88] but the general view is that it only affords a ground for judicial dissolution.[89] The mere weakening of the mental faculties of a partner, although it may be ground for dissolution, does not of itself cause a dissolution.[90]

c. Bankruptcy or Insolvency of Partner or Firm. The bankruptcy or the adjudicated insolvency of a partner or of the firm dissolves the firm;[91] but his or its mere insolvency or inability to pay debts as they mature does not,[92] although it entitles the solvent partner to a decree of dissolution and also to the possession and management of the firm assets.[93] A voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors works an immediate dissolution in some jurisdictions,[94] while in others it operates only to give an option to the copartners to have the firm dissolved.[95]

d. Marriage. At common law, the marriage of a female partner worked an immediate dissolution of the firm, as it gave to the husband the legal right to her share in the partnership and deprived her of her contractual power.[96] But under many modern statutes removing the disabilities of married women and giving them the right to their property, marriage does not produce this result.[97]

e. War or Illegality of Partnership. As a rule the breaking out of war operates to dissolve a partnership, requiring commercial intercourse between the belligerent states, because such intercourse is illegal.[98] And the happening of any other event which makes it unlawful for the business of the firm to be carried on, or for the members of the firm to carry it on in partnership, dissolves the firm.[99]

f. Misconduct of Partner. The absconding or other misconduct of a partner does not ipso facto dissolve the partnership,[1] although it may be ground for a judicial dissolution.[2] The failure of one of the partners to comply with the terms and conditions of the partnership contract will not annul the partnership unless the condition is a condition precedent.[3] to do business does not operate as a dissolution;[4] and where a plaintiff in execution against a member of a partnership seizes the interest of his debtor in the partnership property, such execution does not dissolve the partnership.[5] On the other hand it has been held that a partnership for the cultivation of a plantation is dissolved by the seizure of an undivided interest therein, whereby the partnership is deprived of control of the plantation,[6] and that a sale of partnership property under a separate execution against one partner operates as a dissolution.[7] The filing of an attachment bill by one member of a firm against the others dissolves the firm; but it is otherwise where a creditor files the bill and attaches the property of the firm.[8]

h. Loss of Entire Capital. It has also been held that the loss of the entire capital of a partnership will operate as a dissolution.[9]

6. Dissolution by Judicial Decree — a. In General. Courts of equity have the power to dissolve a partnership for a sufficient cause before the expiration of the term for which it was formed,[10] even on the application of the partner committing the acts set up as grounds for dissolution,[11] and even though the partnership articles contain a clause requiring six months' notice of intention to dissolve and a clause providing for arbitration.[12] But dissolution of a partnership by decree of court may be refused when the circumstances render the dissolution inconvenient, as where a large operation has been commenced and cannot be arrested without serious loss.[13]

b. Because of Partner's Incapacity. When a partner becomes permanently incapable of performing his duties under the partnership contract, the court may decree a dissolution.[14] The lunacy of a partner is ground for a judicial dissolution.[15]

c. Because Business Can Only Be Carried on at a Loss. As the object for which a partnership is formed is pecuniary gain, as soon as it becomes apparent that the business can no longer be carried on at a profit any member is entitled to have the firm dissolved.[16]

d. Because of Partner's Misconduct. The courts do not hesitate to dissolve a

e. Because of Dissensions. While a court will not dissolve a firm because of trifling or temporary disputes of partners,[22] yet, if their dissensions are so serious and persistent as to make the successful continuance of the firm impracticable, a dissolution will be decreed.[23]

f. Because a Dissolution Is Just and Equitable. The Louisiana code permits a partner to dissolve the firm "for just cause";[24] and the English Partnership Act provides that the court may decree a dissolution "whenever in any case circumstances have arisen which, in the opinion of the court, render it just and equitable that the partnership be dissolved."[25] Even in the absence of such a statutory provision, courts of equity have not hesitated to exercise the power thus recognized.[26]

7. Time of Taking Effect. When the firm is dissolved by the agreement of the parties, the dissolution takes effect at the time agreed upon.[27] A partnership at will is terminated at the time when notice is given.[28] When a firm is dissolved by judicial decree, the date of dissolution is ordinarily the date of entering judgment therefor.[29]

B. Rights, Powers, and Disabilities After Dissolution — 1. Status of Firm After Dissolution. The dissolution of a firm does not relieve any of its members from liability for existing obligations,[30] although it does save them from new obligations to which they have not expressly or impliedly assented,[31] and any of them may be discharged from old obligations by novation or other form of release.[32] It is often said that a partnership continues, even after dissolution, for the purpose of winding up its affairs.[33] After the dissolution of a firm one of the members cannot act as the agent of a creditor of the firm in holding obligations due the firm as collateral security for a note due from the firm to such creditor, and taking a conveyance of land in settlement of such an obligation.[34]

2. Effect of Dissolution on Powers of Partners — a. In General. The dissolution of a partnership terminates those powers of the partners which are implied from the partnership relation,[35] except those which are necessary to the winding up of the business.[36] In other cases a partner, after dissolution duly notified, has the power of binding his former partner only when actual authority therefor has been conferred upon him.[37] Moreover, he is bound to observe the utmost good faith toward his late partners in all matters connected with the settlement of firm affairs.[38]

b. Power to Administer Firm Affairs. In case of dissolution by the death of a partner, the power to administer the firm affairs belongs to the survivor.[39] When dissolution is caused by the bankruptcy or insolvency of a partner, this power belongs to the solvent partner.[40] In other cases of dissolution each partner is entitled to take part in administering the firm's affairs, unless there is an agreement between them, or an order of court, committing the power of liquidation to one or some only of the members.[41] Partners cannot be regarded as trustees for each other after the firm is dissolved and its business closed.[42]

c. As Affected by Agreements For Dissolution. It is not only competent for the partners by agreement to commit the power of liquidating the partnership business to one or some of their number, but they may provide, as between themselves, that one or some may become the owners of the firm assets, upon prescribed terms;[43] or that one or some shall assume and pay the firm debts.[44] Such

Liability for money collected under contract.— Where partners, commission merchants, receive a consignment of goods for sale, and a dissolution of the partnership afterward takes place before the goods are sold, and they are turned over to, and are sold by, the partner continuing in the business, the outgoing partner is not exonerated from his liability to the shipper by the mere fact that a special notice of the dissolution of the partnership was sent to such shipper, containing also a statement that the goods of the shipper were left in the hands of the continuing partner. f. Admissions and Representations. The courts are agreed that neither partner has implied authority, after a duly notified dissolution, to bind his late copartners by an admission or representation which subjects them to a new obligation. Authority to him to do this must be actually conferred by them.[52] Many courts in this country apply the same rule to all admissions and representations by a partner after dissolution,[53] while other courts follow the English rule[54] that such admissions and representations are binding upon his late copartners when they relate to rights created during the partnership, or to transactions which are merely incidental to the settlement of firm affairs.[55]

g. Power to Confess Judgment. Where a judgment is confessed by one of the partners after the dissolution of a firm, it does not bind his late copartners, although it is for a firm debt.[56] But it has been held that where a partnership consists of an active and a dormant partner, a confession of judgment for a partnership debt by the active partner will bind both partners, so far as the partner-ment of the contract and thus absolve the other party from liability to perform.

ship property is concerned, even though as between themselves the partnership has been dissolved.[57]

h. Power to Assign For Benefit of Creditors. When all the former partners are living,[58] neither has the power to make a valid assignment of the firm assets for the benefit of creditors.[59]

i. Power to Compromise and Release. When the partners agree that one or some of their number shall liquidate firm affairs, none of the others has power to compromise or settle firm claims, and such agreement must be observed by third persons having notice thereof;[60] but compromises and releases in good faith by the liquidating partner are valid.[61] In the absence of an agreement of this sort, each partner, even after dissolution, has the power to pay valid claims and to receive payment of debts and give receipts and releases therefor.[62] As a rule, however, the authority to receive payment does not include the power to take any sort of property in satisfaction,[63] nor to make an arrangement that subjects the other partners to any new obligation.[64] In this country the courts are disposed to uphold an honest compromise or release by a partner, even after dissolution;[65] and in some jurisdictions it is provided by statute that a partner authorized to act in liquidation may collect, compromise, or release any debts due the partnership.[66] By statute in some states, a firm creditor may compromise with one partner, without destroying his claim against the others.[67]

j. Power to Revive Debts. After a duly notified dissolution,[68] neither partner has the implied power according to the prevailing view to revive a debt barred by the statute of limitations,[69] or to bind his partners by a promise to pay a note indorsed by the firm, but from liability on which they have been discharged by want of notice of dishonor,[70] or to pay a debt from which the firm have been discharged in bankruptcy,[71] or which for any other cause is legally extinct.[72] In a few jurisdictions, however, such power has been recognized.[73]

k. Liability For Wrongful Acts. The dissolution of a firm does not absolve a partner from liability for wrongful acts of a copartner, done within the scope of the business;[74] nor does it relieve him from liability for his late copartner's wrongful acts to which his own conduct has contributed,[75] or the benefit of which he has received without repudiation.[76]

3. Control and Disposition of Firm Property — a. In General. hands.[80] Otherwise he may be chargeable with interest.[81] This power must not be exercised to the prejudice of his copartners or of firm creditors,[82] and the power may be modified by the partnership articles.[83] If a partner carries on the business after dissolution, he may be compelled to account to his copartner for the profits.[84]

b. Assigning or Transferring Firm Property to Creditors. A liquidating partner certainly has authority to assign a book-account to a firm creditor, or to a purchaser, for full value.[85] But neither he nor any other partner has implied authority after dissolution to make a general assignment of firm property for the benefit of creditors.[86] Nor has a partner authority to transfer firm property in satisfaction of his individual debts,[87] unless the copartners assent thereto and firm creditors are paid.[88] If, by the terms of dissolution, one partner becomes the sole owner of the firm property, the others have no authority to mortgage it thereafter, even to secure firm debts.[89]

c. Real Estate of Firm. For the purpose of paying firm debts, partnership real estate is treated in equity as personal assets,[90] and the surviving partner can convey an equitable title thereto.[91] So can one of several living partners, when conveyance is necessary for the payment of firm debts.[92] But, in order to convey a perfect legal title to firm real estate, all the partners must join in the deed.[93] In England neither partner is entitled to a partition of firm realty.[94] In this country the prevailing rule is that a partner is not so entitled as long as partnership debts remain unliquidated;[95] but that he has a right to compel the 276, limiting this power to the sale of property necessary to pay partnership debts, on the ground that partners, after dissolution, are only tenants in common of the firm assets, a view which is unsound in principle and opposed to the weight of authority. See supra, IX, B, 1.

4. COLLECTIONS AND PAYMENTS. It is the right as well as the duty of each partner to collect debts due the firm and give discharges therefor,[97] in the absence of an agreement between them limiting such right and duty to one or some of their number.[98] When such an agreement exists and is made known to a firm debtor, he is bound to observe its terms;[99] and the liquidating partner is bound to act with due diligence[1] and to account for the proceeds collected.[2] The right to collect firm debts does not authorize a partner to accept payment in anything but the money due the firm.[3] Clearly it does not authorize him to accept notes or other securities payable to him individually;[4] nor to deduct his individual indebtedness from the firm debt.[5] As an incident to winding up the affairs of the firm, each partner after dissolution has the right and duty of paying firm debts.[6] Although one of the partners may have bound himself to the others to pay the debts, such agreement does not preclude the creditors from enforcing their claims against all the partners,[7] although it may compel them to observe the

It makes no difference that the collecting partner is insolvent (Major v. Hawkes, 12 Ill. 298), or that a third person has been appointed collecting agent for the firm (Gordon v. Freeman, 11 Ill. 14).

The right may be forfeited by a partner's selling his interest to a third person and absconding. Ayer v. Ayer, 41 Vt. 346.

One partner cannot deprive his copartner of the right by publishing a notice forbidding creditors to pay to the latter. Gillilan v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 41 N. Y. 376.

5. Contracting New Obligations — a. In General. The dissolution of a partnership terminates the implied authority of each partner to enter into new obligations on behalf of the firm or of his copartners.[9] Nor is such authority conferred in most jurisdictions by an agreement that one or some of the members shall have exclusive power to settle the firm's affairs.[10] This rule, however, does not prevent the contracting or incurring of obligations, in the due course of settling the affairs of the partnership, by reason of transactions prior to the dissolution.[11] paper in the firm-name, and this is true even though the obligation be given for a firm debt,[15] or, in most jurisdictions, by the liquidating partner.[16] Authority to do either of these acts after dissolution may be given during the existence of the partnership,[17] or at a later time;[18] and such act, although unauthorized when done, may be ratified.[19] It would seem that either partner even after dissolution, in exercising his right to convert the property into cash and to collect the debts, should have authority to sell negotiable paper payable to the firm, and to indorse it without recourse. Other courts, however, have held that a partner has no such authority after dissolution.[21]

6. NOTICE OF DISSOLUTION — a. In General. When a partnership exists, each partner is its accredited agent in the ordinary conduct of its business,[22] and third persons have a right to infer that this agency continues until its revocation is duly notified.[23] Accordingly each member of a firm continues liable for the acts of any partner within the ordinary scope of its business, although a dissolution has taken place, until due notice of such dissolution has been given,[24] unless the customer has actual knowledge of the dissolution or the legal equivalent of such knowledge, in which case a formal notice is not necessary.[25] In some jurisdictions this rule is expressly declared by statute.[26] In case, however, of dissolution by operation of law,[27] notice thereof need not be given by a partner or his representative, as everyone is bound to take notice of such a dissolution.[28] A notice of proposed dissolution does not affect the implied agency of either partner, if the dissolution does not take place.[29] On the other hand, a notice of dissolution is unnecessary, where a valid partnership has never existed.[30] A person, having no knowledge of a partnership at the time of the dealings which form the basis of his action, is not entitled to notice that it had been dissolved.[31]

b. In Case of Dormant Partner. So long as a member of a firm remains a dormant partner in the strict sense of that term,[32] he is not bound to give notice of dissolution in order to escape liability for the firm's subsequent obligations, for he has never been an accredited agent of the firm, nor has his connection with it given credit.[33] But if his membership in the firm has become known, he must give notice of the dissolution to those who have had knowledge of his membership.[34]

c. Persons Entitled to Notice and Sufficiency of Notice. Those who have had dealings with and given credit to the partnership during its existence are entitled to personal or actual notice of its dissolution.[35] Others are duly notified by a publication, in the manner and form hereafter described. Evidence insufficient to show notice.— On an issue as to whether plaintiff, a creditor of a partnership, had notice of its dissolution, it appeared that after the retirement of one member and the admission of another the stationery was printed with the name of the new member substituted for that of the retiring member, that a circular was sent out generally advertising a reduction in prices and was signed in the same manner, but there was no proof that a copy of the circular or any of the stationery was mailed to plaintiff or sent to any place from which it might be inferred that he saw it. It also appeared that an advertising sign was placed on all the roads leading to defendant's place of business, signed with the name of the new firm, but plaintiff's place of business was twenty-one miles distant in a different town, and it was not shown that any of his agents ever went to the place of defendant's business or passed along any of the roads where the signs were placed. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to show notice of the dissolution to plaintiff. Bush v. W. A. McCarty Co., 127 Ga. 308, 56 S. E. 430.

f. Evidence of Notice. It follows from the principles stated in the foregoing paragraphs that it is not incumbent upon a partner who has withdrawn from a firm to establish plaintiff's knowledge of a dissolution by direct evidence. Either kind of notice of withdrawal; that is, either personal notice thereof or notice by publication, may be shown by circumstantial evidence.[54] But, as has already been pointed out, the burden is in all cases on the retired partner to show by competent evidence that plaintiff had notice of the dissolution at the time when he became a creditor.[55]

g. Functions of Court and Jury. Whether the kind of notice to which a particular plaintiff is entitled has been given him is a question for the jury;[56] but it is the duty of the court to explain to the jury what constitutes proper notice in the particular case,[57] and to state the legal principles applicable thereto.[58] If the facts are undisputed and, in the opinion of the court, but one inference can be drawn therefrom, it may withdraw the question of notice from the jury.[59]

7. Holding Out as Partner After Dissolution. A partner who has actually retired from the firm, but who has failed to give proper notice of the dissolution, is treated in law as holding himself out as still a member of the firm, and is liable as such.[60] And even though he has given proper notice of dissolution, his subsequent conduct may be such as to induce others to believe that he is a member of the firm, or at least that he is content to be liable as a partner, and in such a case he can be held as a partner by one who has given credit in reliance on such conduct.[61]

Whether defendant's conduct amounted to a holding out is often, as was shown in a former connection, a difficult question of fact.[62]

8. Actions After Dissolution — a. Against Partners on Old Obligations. Although a firm has been dissolved, its obligations remain the joint obligations of its living members, and actions upon such obligations should be brought against all the partners, in the absence of legislative enactments modifying the common-law rules on the point.[63] If one or some of the partners have assumed the firm obligations, suits may be maintained against such partner or partners, in some jurisdictions;[64] while in others all the partners must be joined as defendants, unless plaintiff has accepted the obligation in satisfaction of the firm liability.[65] As has been seen, the firm creditor may discharge the outgoing partner in some jurisdictions by acts which prejudice such partner's position as surety for the assuming partner.[66]

66. See supra, VII, C, 2, 6, 9. And see Anniston First Nat. Bank v. Cheney, 114 Ala. 536, 21 So. 1002, holding that if a firm creditor holds collaterals received from the firm and surrenders them to the assuming partner, without the other partner's knowledge, he thereby releases the latter.

b. On Obligations Subsequent to Dissolution Without Notice. All the partners are properly made defendants in an action upon an obligation incurred after dissolution, if plaintiff had no notice thereof, and the obligation was within the scope of a partner's implied powers,[67] or if it has been assented to by all.[68]

c. On Such Obligations With Notice, or on Individual Obligation. An action cannot be maintained upon an obligation in the firm-name, incurred after dissolution, of which plaintiff had due notice,[69] nor upon one incurred by a partner as an individual.[70] The action must be brought against such partner alone.

d. Service of Process and Appearance. After a firm is dissolved, neither partner has implied authority to accept service of process, or appear in the action for a copartner, so as to entitle plaintiff to a judgment against such copartner or against the firm,[71] in the absence of a statute permitting such a judgment.[72]

e. Actions by Partners.[73] If these are brought to enforce claims acquired by the firm, before dissolution, they may and should be brought by all the partners;[74]

are not entitled to call the surviving partner to an account, in the absence of special circumstances, as their remedy is generally against the personal representatives of the deceased.[97] If the surviving partner is a bankrupt, any creditor of the deceased partner may bring a suit in equity to have the partnership estate administered.[98] But the creditors of a partner who has made an assignment for the benefit of creditors cannot call the other partners to an account, their remedy being against the assignee.[99]

c. Who May Be Compelled to Account. Each living partner of a dissolved partnership is bound to account to his copartners for his dealings and transactions as such partner.[1] The surviving partner is bound to account to the representatives of the deceased partner,[2] unless the partnership agreement permits him to take the firm assets at a valuation, or otherwise exempts him from liability to an accounting.[3] On the other hand the representative of the deceased is bound to account, when he, or the deceased partner, had the management or control of firm assets.[4] But the surety of a deceased partner cannot be called to account to the survivor, when his only connection with the firm consists in this suretyship relation.[5]

Interest in public lands.— Partners seeking a dissolution of the firm submitted their differences to arbitrators. It appeared that a partner had made a homestead entry under the federal land laws. The partner testified that the land was not partnership land, and was not included in the agreement of submission to arbitration, and the copartner offered no evidence in opposition thereto. It was held that the land could not be regarded as firm property, especially in view of the fact that an agreement by the partner to convey the land to the firm would be void. firm is accountable to the firm for this profit, unless his copartners have assented to the transaction.[11] On the other side of the account are to be included all debts and expenditures fairly incurred and made on behalf of the firm.[12]

b. Premiums For Admission Into the Partnership.[13] In some cases of dissolution a partner who has received from a copartner a premium or bonus for admission into the firm is bound to return a part of such premium to the copartner, on the ground that a part of the consideration for the premium was the continuance of the partnership, during an agreed, or at least an expected, period.[14] In England the subject is now regulated by statute.[15] In the United States there seems to be no disposition on the part of the courts to order a return of any part of a premium, unless the partner who received it induced its payment by fraud.[16]

15. English Partn. Act (1890), § 40, providing as follows: "Where one partner has paid a premium to another on entering into a partnership for a fixed term, and the partnership is dissolved before the expiration of that term otherwise than by the death of a partner, the Court may order the repayment of the premium, or of such part thereof as it thinks just, having regard to the terms of the partnership contract and to the length of time during which the partnership has continued; unless (a) the dissolution is, in the judgment of the Court, wholly or chiefly due to the misconduct of the partner who paid the premium, or (b) the partnership has been dissolved by an agreement containing no provision for a return of any part of the premium." W. 1044, 11 L. R. A. 302 (where a return was refused, although plaintiff had paid a bonus of three thousand one hundred dollars, and the partnership was to continue for ten years, unless sooner dissolved by mutual consent, or by written notice given by one partner to the other, where after fifteen months plaintiff's health broke down, and he was obliged to leave the state, when the other partner gave written notice of dissolution, provided for in the partnership articles); Boughner v. Black, 83 Ky. 521, 4 Am. St. Rep. 174 (partner released from paying his note given for the bonus, because he was induced to give the note and become a partner by the fraudulent conduct of the payee); Gaty v. Tyler, 33 Mo. App. 494. The general rule is that, where a partnership is created for a specified time and determined by a dissolution by mutual consent before the expiration of that time, then, in the absence of a provision in the original articles of agreement for return of any part of the premium or bonus paid when the partnership was formed on any contingency, the party who paid it is not entitled

In such a case a return would be ordered in England, even when the partnership is one at will.[17]

c. Partial Accounting. One partner cannot maintain an action against his copartners for an accounting as to particular items or transactions.[18] Nor, while the partnership continues, will a court of equity interfere to settle accounts and state the balance between the partners, except where the complaining partner establishes a case of extreme necessity;[19] for it is not the office of a court to enter into a consideration of partnership squabbles and attempt to right them.[20] But partners may make a partial settlement by arbitration at any time.[21]

d. Good-Will of Firm. This constitutes a part of the firm's assets,[22] and, upon dissolution, every partner is entitled to have it converted into cash and included in the firm's accounts,[23] unless by his agreement or conduct he has precluded himself from asserting such right.[24] In computing the value of the good-will of a decedent's business at the time of his death, the basis should be the annual profits before his death.[25] In particular circumstances, as in a case where it is shown to the return of any part of it, unless the dissolution agreement so provides. Crouse v. McCandless, 121 Ill. App. 237 [affirmed in 220 Ill. 344, 77 N. E. 202]. Where parties have agreed to dissolve a partnership but have left the terms of dissolution for further agreement between themselves, upon their failing to agree, a court of equity will fix such terms and, in such connection, will inquire into the matters preceding the agreement by which the dissolution was effected, will examine the contract of partnership to ascertain if there was any fraud in its inception, and consider such other matters as will aid it in making an equitable adjustment. Dissolution by death.— When dissolution of a partnership is caused by the death of one of the partners, the same principles apply for the disposal of the good-will as in other cases of dissolution, where no agreement has been made by the parties concerning it. Matter of Silkman, 121 N. Y. App. Div. 202, 105 N. Y. Suppl. 872 [affirmed in 190 N. Y. 560, 83 N. E. 1131].

that the business has long been conducted at a loss, etc., the good-will of a firm may not have any pecuniary value.[26]

e. Claims Between Partners and Firm and Between Copartners. Upon a final accounting and settlement of firm affairs, valid claims by any partner against the firm upon firm transactions are to be credited to him;[27] and valid claims by the firm upon a partner are to be charged against him.[28] The same rule applies to claims between partners which are veritable partnership transactions;[29] and these, in England, include claims for the repayment of premiums.[30] But claims growing out of individual transactions between partners and having nothing to do with partnership affairs are not to be included in the partnership accounting.[31] As between the partners themselves, however, when the rights of creditors are not involved, it has been held that an individual indebtedness from one partner to another may be deducted from a partnership balance due from the latter to the former.[32]

f. Transactions Subsequent to Dissolution. If these are connected with the winding up of the firm affairs, or with the completion of contracts entered into before dissolution and binding upon the firm thereafter, they are to be included in the final settlement between the partners.[33] If the transactions consist in the

g. Matters Connected With Previous Partnerships. These cannot be brought into an accounting,[36] unless the parties thereto have by agreement or conduct made them a part of the affairs of the firm which is in process of settlement.[37]

3. Determination and Disposition of Share of Partners — a. Inventory and Valuation of Assets. The value of a partner's share is determinable by converting the firm's assets into cash,[38] paying the liabilities of the firm, and striking a balance. The proportion of such balance to which he is entitled under the partnership agreement constitutes his share.[39] This method of determining the value of a partner's share is often modified by agreement;[40] and a partner who has prevented the sale of firm assets, or their accurate valuation, may be charged with their fair value.[41] At times statutes provide for an inventory and appraisement of debt, and its subsequent sale for less than its value.

vent or outside the jurisdiction, the solvent and resident partners are to contribute as though there were no others.[61] This right of contribution has been based by some authorities on the actual agreement of the partics when entering into the partnership relation, although such agreement is not express.[62] Others prefer to treat it as resulting from an obligation imposed by law.[63] There is no doubt that the right may be modified or negatived by the contract of the partners,[64] or by the conduct of the one claiming the right.[65]

f. Division of Personal Assets. As stated in a former paragraph, all the personal assets of a firm are to be converted into cash, upon the firm's dissolution, and what remains, after paying firm debts, is to be distributed among the partners.[66] But if the rights of firm creditors are not harmed thereby, the partners may divide firm assets in specie between them.[67] An equal partnership is always presumed;[68] but this presumption may be and often is rebutted by evidence of an express or implied agreement between the partners that their shares shall be unequal.[69] Whether their shares are equal or unequal, if a partner is indebted to the firm, such indebtedness is to be paid by him, before his share is ascertainable; or if it is not actually paid, it is to be treated as a firm asset and deducted from

g. Division of Firm Realty. That real estate may be acquired by a firm and held as a part of the firm assets is no longer open to doubt.[72] When it is so acquired and held, and upon dissolution it is not needed to pay firm debts, the partners may divide it between them.[73] In this country such surplus realty of the firm may be partitioned by judicial decree,[74] in the absence of an agreement between the partners for its out and out conversion into personalty.[75] When improvements are made upon firm realty by a partner, he is entitled to be treated as a creditor of the firm therefor.[76]

In the absence of a special agreement on the subject,[77] the profits of the firm upon its dissolution [78] are the balance remaining after the payment of all its debts, including its liabilities to its members for advances and for capital.[79] Such balance is to be treated as firm profits, although a part of it has been gained by a receiver of the firm, or by a liquidating

One of the partners, without authority, withdrew from the bank certain of the partnership funds and departed, thereafter writing the other partner, turning the stock of goods over to him, with directions to sell and pay the debts, retaining all that he had paid into the firm, and turn the balance, if any, over to the wife and child of the absent partner. Partly from the fact that the absent partner had abandoned the business, and that the remainder of the goods on hand were sold at loss, there was not a sufficient balance after payment of the debts to pay the remaining partner the amount that he had put into the firm. and such right passes to his personal representatives or assigns.[85] This statement does not apply, however, to those partnerships which are engaged in a business which is under the ban of the law.[86] But an innocent partner in a lawful business cannot be beaten out of his share of the profits by his copartner, because the latter has increased the profits by cheating customers.[87] All partners are entitled to share equally in the firm profits,[88] unless this right is varied, as it frequently is, by the express or implied agreement of the partners.[89]

i. Compensation For Services in Winding Up. The rule which denies to a partner a right to compensation for services rendered to his firm during its life, save in exceptional circumstances,[90] is generally applied in this country to partners who render services after dissolution in winding up the affairs of the firm.[91] The reason assigned for this rule is that, after the dissolution as before, each partner is acting in his own interest, and pursuant to a duty implied from the nature of the partnership relation, in conducting the firm's affairs; and these affairs extend to the collection of assets and the winding up of the business.[92] In England it was held before the present statute[93] that the rule did not apply to a partner carrying on the business after dissolution.[94] As this rule rests upon the implied intention of the parties in entering into the partnership, it will not be applied when the parties have expressly agreed that compensation may be had;[95] nor if the circumstances show an implied agreement for compensation.[96] And the courts are disposed to give compensation for services which have proved exceptionally beneficial,[97] as well as for extra services imposed upon one partner by the indefensible misconduct of his copartner.[98]

j. Allowanee For Expenses in Winding Up. A partner who incurs a liability or expends money in winding up the affairs of the firm is entitled to be credited therewith on the final accounting, and to be indemnified by his copartners therefor, provided he has acted reasonably in the performance of his duties as a winding-up partner,[99] and in a lawful manner.[1]

k. Right to Firm-Name, Good-Will, and Books of Account. The nature of the good-will of a firm,[2] and the rights and duties of the surviving partner respecting it,[3] have been considered. We are now to consider the rights of partners to the good-will of the firm, including the use of the firm-name, after dissolution between living partners. Such good-will is undoubtedly an asset of the firm which each partner is entitled to have converted into cash,[4] unless it is shown that the good-will in the particular case is worthless.[5] It must be confessed that the rights of the purchaser of a firm's good-will are not satisfactorily settled at present. He acquires the right to hold himself out as the successor of the firm, to the exclusion of any of the old partners.[6] He is also entitled to use the old firm-name, provided always that such use does not subject any of the old partners to the risk of liability for the purchaser's debts.[7] But in this country he is probably not entitled to prevent a former partner from carrying on business in a firm style which includes his own name, although it may be substantially the style of the old firm,[8] unless the conduct of such old partner is calculated to deceive the public into believing that, when dealing with him, it is dealing with the purchaser.[9] In the absence of an agreement to the contrary,[10] each member of a partnership is entitled to have access to the firm books, and to inspect and copy any of them.[11]

4. Interest — a. On Capital. A partner is not entitled to interest on capital which he contributes to the firm, although his contribution is greatly in excess of that of his copartners,[12] unless they have agreed that he may have interest.[13]

Even when such an agreement exists, interest stops with the dissolution of the firm.[14]

b. On Advances and Overdrafts. When a partner makes an advance or loan to his firm for partnership purposes, it seems fair that he should receive interest thereon,[15] and, when he overdraws his account or borrows money from the firm he should be charged with interest on such amount,[16] even though no express agreement has been made on the subject. This rule has been formulated in the English Partnership Act.[17] In some of our jurisdictions, however, interest is not allowed on advances in the absence of an agreement therefor.[18]

c. On Balances. A partner is not allowed interest on fluctuating balances during partnership, unless there is an agreement with his copartners therefor.[19] On balances in his hands after a dissolution, he will be charged with interest only when there is an agreement therefor,[20] when he has retained the money an debtor partner for any balance or claim incident to the partnership business.[26] He has no such lien, however, for a balance or claim arising from transactions outside the firm affairs, and which is not involved in partnership accounts.[27] Even when a partner is entitled to a lien, he may waive it or by his conduct lose its benefit.[28]

6. Private Accounting and Settlement — a. Validity and Construction. The members of a firm are perfectly competent to conduct a partnership accounting, without resort to a court of justice, and, even to settle the affairs of the firm without a formal accounting,[29] provided they do not defraud their creditors by such settlement.[30] In order that a private accounting shall bind all partners all must assent to it, and, in order that it may operate as a complete settlement of firm affairs, it must embrace all the partnership transactions.[31] When all partners have assented to a settlement of all of the firm's affairs upon a definite and clearly expressed basis, no difficulty is experienced by the courts in adjusting the rights of the parties under it.[32] But it often happens that the parties have not

Action for amount found due on settlement. — In an action to recover a sum found due to plaintiff on a partnership settlement between the parties, it is not necessary to show that the firm debts were paid. Burley v. Brown, 73 Kan. 780, 85 Pac. 527. A complaint in such action alleging that plaintiff and defendant dissolved their partnership and settled the "business," but that defendant failed to pay the amount due plaintiff, is not objectionable on the ground that it does not allege the settlement of the partnership affairs. Burley v. Brown, supra.

Action on account stated.— After the dissostated the terms of their settlement with clearness nor fully disclosed their intentions as to the extent and operation of their settlement. In such cases, if a litigation ensues, the court is compelled to construe any writings upon the subject which have passed between the parties, and to interpret their conduct, in order to ascertain their intention.[33] Whether a settlement agreement between partners is lution of a partnership one of the partners may maintain an action against the other upon an account stated, without showing that he has paid the partnership debts which he agreed to pay. Cochrane v. Allen, 58 N. H. 250.

Defenses and counter-claims in actions based on dissolution agreement.— Where plaintiff, after dissolution of a partnership existing between himself and defendant, sued to restrain defendant from using the firm-name in a similar business, and based his right of action on the dissolution agreement, it was held that a separate defense alleging that such agreement was signed by defendant's attorney in fact contrary to defendant's instructions, and was subsequently repudiated by defendant, was not demurrable. Bastable v. Carroll, 116 N. Y. App. Div. 205, 101 N. Y. Suppl. 637. It was held, however, that a special defense alleging that the attorney in fact was induced by plaintiff to sign the agreement by means of a sum of money paid to him by plaintiff was immaterial and demurrable; and further that an allegation in the answer that plaintiff directed the postmaster to deliver all mail directed to the firm to himself, and that plaintiff thereby obtained large quantities of mail belonging to defendant to his damage in a certain sum, was not available either as a defense or as a counter-claim. Illinois.— Horne v. Ingraham, 125 Ill. 198, 16 N. E. 868, no consideration shown for an alleged release of one partner's interest in the firm.

Indiana.— Selz v. Mayer, 151 Ind. 422, 51 N. E. 485 (holding that when one partner surrenders his interest in the firm to other members in consideration of their assuming the firm debts and releasing him from his indebtedness to the firm, the agreement is supported by a valid consideration); Herald v. Harper, 8 Blackf. 170 (a valid settlement).

Iowa.— Nystuen v. Hanson, (1902) 91 N. W. 1071, holding that a written contract of settlement is not invalidated by an allegation of mutual mistake, when no reformation is asked.

Louisiana.— Landry v. Landry, 23 La. Ann. 312, holding that notes given by partners for their supposed indebtedness to the firm can be enforced against the maker by a purchaser after maturity only to the extent of his actual indebtedness to the firm.

Maine.— Wiggin v. Goodwin, 63 Me. 389, holding that in case of a mistake in drafting a contract between two partners for the sale of one's interest to the other, if the parties subsequently settled on the basis of the contract as it should have been written, a parol promise to pay or allow the balance thus found due will be enforced.

Maryland.— Trump v. Baltzell, 3 Md. 295, holding that a settlement on the basis that the books have been correctly kept can be modified at the request of the partner harmed.

Massachusetts.— Forward v. Forward, 6 Allen 494; Miller v. Lord, 11 Pick. 11 (not void for uncertainty in this case, nor because one partner alleged that he did not understand the settlement as the other partner did); Farnam v. Brooks, 9 Pick. 212 (a partner not a true trustee for his copartner after dissolution).

it;[39] nor is it binding upon third persons who are not in privity with either party to the settlement,[40] although it does bind creditors and others who must claim through the settling partners or either of them,[41] if it is an honest settlement,[42] and one not in violation of the bankruptcy statute.[43]

e. Laches in Disputing Settlement. Courts are not disposed to look with favor upon attempts to question a private settlement between partners which are not made promptly. Hence, if a partner, or one claiming through him, permits a settlement to stand for a long time unquestioned, his laches will bar an action to open it or set it aside,[44] unless the delay is satisfactorily explained.[45]

d. Mistake or Fraud in Settlement. A mistake by one of the members of a partnership in construing a written agreement of settlement will not justify a court in setting it aside at the instance of the other,[46] and one cannot impeach a settlement for mistake, while continuing to hold property obtained under it;[47]

but a mutual mistake of fact as to the amount actually due one of the parties, the amount of the firm assets, or the like, is ground for relief.[48] But the complainant's allegation of mistake must be definite, and his evidence in its support must be clear and strong.[49] An innocent misrepresentation may entitle the party misled by it into particular terms of settlement to relief.[50] When a partner seeks to set aside a settlement because of fraud, duress, or imposition practised upon him by a copartner, he is bound to establish his claim by clear and cogent proof.[51] Upon such proof, however, he is entitled to have the settlement set aside,[52] unless

e. Assumption Of, and Indemnity Against, Firm Debts. Agreements by which one or more of the partners assume the firm debts and indemnify the other partners against such claims, upon the dissolution of the partnership, are not uncommon, as we have seen in a former connection.[54] When such an agreement is made in consideration of the promisee's transfer of his interest in the firm to the promisor, then there can be no question of its validity as between the partners.[55] It is not binding upon the firm creditors,[56] however, unless they assent to the substitution of the assuming partner as their debtor, in place of the firm.[57] Being valid, as between the partners, it creates an indebtedness on the part of the promising partner to the promisee for any sum which the latter is legally compelled to pay firm creditors;[58] but one which may be compromised or discharged by a new agreement of the parties.[59] An agreement to pay firm debts, as distinguished from one to indemnify him against them, is broken by a failure to pay such debts as they mature, or within a reasonable time thereafter.[60] The agreements we are now considering are to be construed as limited to partnership liabilities,[61] unless there is clear evidence that the parties intended them to include the individual indebtedness of the promisee partner.[62] An agreement may limit the assuming partner's

Ratification by retention of assets, etc.— Where a party to an agreement of dissolution of a partnership discovers shortly after the settlement is effected that he has been defrauded by the other, the retention of the assets turned over to such injured party and the application of them by him to the indebtedness of the firm, which he assumed under the agreement of dissolution, will not be treated as a ratification by him of the terms of the dissolution when the other partner has been in no way injured thereby. liability to a part only of the firm's debts.[63] When the promisor partner receives firm assets and binds himself to apply their proceeds to the payment of firm debts, the promisee partner, upon breach, may follow the proceeds and recover property in which they have been invested from a transferee with notice.[64]

f. The Promisee Partner as Surety For Firm Debts. When one or more partners on dissolution take the firm property and promise the other partners to assume and pay the firm's debts, they become the principal debtors and the promisees are thereafter sureties for them.[65] As between the partners, this is unquestioned; but some courts, as pointed out in an earlier part of this article, decline to apply this doctrine to firm creditors.[66] In the jurisdictions where it is applied, creditors of the firm are entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the promisee partner to a bond given by the promisor as security for the performance of his agreement.[67]

7. Arbitration and Award — a. Submission and Agreements Therefor. A stipulation in the partnership articles that all matters of controversy between the partners shall be submitted to arbitration does not oust the courts of jurisdiction over such controversies,[68] in the absence of legislation on the subject,[69] or of a clear agreement by the partners that arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the right to sue.[70] Agreements for arbitration, even when pursued by the parties, are generally subjected by the courts to a strict construction.[71] After a dissolution has occurred, the parties may submit any controversies connected with it to arbitration.[72] If an arbitration fails through no fault of the parties, but for an alleged balance cannot be maintained, until an accounting has been had,[86] unless by statute.[87] Any partner, or his personal representative, is entitled to institute a proceeding in equity for an accounting upon the dissolution of the firm,[88] unless his culpable negligence has been such as to render the accounting abortive.[89] A partnership accounting is not to be had, as an incident to some other litigation between partners,[90] except when allowed by statute;[91] nor when a partnership is not shown to exist;[92] nor, as a rule, while the partnership continues.[93] The commencement of an action for an accounting is a legal demand of plaintiff's share of the assets from the partners in possession and may be evidence of their conversion thereof.[94] If the action is successful the partnership may be treated as dissolved from the filing of the bill.[95] Such action as a rule is not to be complicated by proceedings therein for the partition of real estate.[96]

b. Joinder of Causes of Action. Plaintiff's bill is not objectionable, because different causes of action are joined therein, provided all are directly involved in a final settlement of the firm's affairs.[97] If not so involved, they should not be joined.[98]

2. Grounds of Action and Defenses — a. For Dissolution. These, as we have seen, generally consist in the fraudulent misconduct of defendant partner or some serious breach of the partnership contract or duty.[99] If the partnership is one at will, either partner is at liberty to bring an action for dissolution at any time.[1]

b. For an Accounting After Dissolution. The mere fact that a partnership has been dissolved makes out a prima facie case for a partnership accounting;[2] although a plaintiff rarely resorts to a court for a judicial accounting, unless some of the partners are improperly withholding firm assets,[3] or neglecting to the firm business to another partner, the latter cannot compel the retiring partner to pay a note given for his portion of the capital of the firm, in a suit for accounting, since the purchase is an adjustment of the accounts of the retiring partner with the firm). The articles provided that on the death of any partner his capital should remain in the firm until that time, and should share in the profits unless otherwise mutually agreed. For some time the surviving partner carried on the business, and then by agreement of all parties in interest the business and the greater part of the assets of the firm were transferred to a corporation in exchange for its stock, which was placed in the hands of the surviving partner as trustee. It was held that the personal representative of one of the partners who had been dead eight years, and upon whose share no profits had been paid, because his right was disputed, was entitled to maintain a suit in equity for a settlement and accounting without waiting until the remnant of the partnership had been fully closed up, it being within the power of the court in such a case to protect the interests of all persons concerned in the final decree.

Where parties have agreed to dissolve a partnership, but have left the terms of dissolution for further agreement between themselves, on their failing to agree, a court of equity on a bill for an accounting will fix such terms, and, in such connection, will inquire into the matters preceding the agreement by which the dissolution was effected, will examine the contract of partnership to ascertain if there was any fraud in its inception, and consider such other matters as will aid it in making an equitable adjustment. account,[4] or have defrauded plaintiff into an unfair settlement,[5] or have excluded him from the partnership business,[6] or have carried on a business in competition with the firm.[7] But the representative of a deceased partner is not entitled to call the surviving partner to account, where the deceased was indebted to the survivor, and it is not shown that the latter has partnership property in excess of such debt.[8]

c. For an Accounting Without Dissolution. As we saw in a former connection, a bill for an accounting will not be entertained during the existence of a partnership, save in exceptionable circumstances.[9]

d. Conditions Precedent to an Accounting. When a firm has been dissolved, and no private accounting or settlement has taken place, either partner has the unconditional right to institute a suit for a judicial accounting.[10] And a demand for an accounting is not a condition precedent.[11] But a partner who has been intrusted with the collection of firm debts must render an accounting thereof as a condition of maintaining a suit against his copartners.[12] A creditor of a partner is not entitled to bring such a suit as a rule, until he has obtained judgment and secured a lien on his debtor's interest in the firm,[13] or has become a purchaser of the debtor's interest.[14] A partner who has been defrauded into a private settlement may institute a suit for a judicial accounting, without rescinding the settlement and putting the defrauding partner in statu quo.[15]

In Zimmerman v. Chambers, 79 Wis. 20, 47 N. W. 947, it was held that where two contract to purchase a boat as joint owners and partners in it and its business, but one fraudulently procures the bill of sale to be made to himself, and then takes sole possession of the boat and excludes his partner, who has paid part of the purchase-price, from all participation in the business and profits, the ousted partner can sue in equity to compel the conveyance to him of a half interest in the boat, and for an accounting, and it is not essential to the maintenance of the suit that plaintiff should first tender the balance of his share of the purchase-money.

profits have not been collected.[16] Nor is it a defense to an action for an accounting that the partners have had a partial settlement;[17] that defendant has no balance which is due plaintiff;[18] that plaintiff has failed to perform his obligations under the partnership agreement;[19] that the business was carried on in defendant's name;[20] that plaintiff is a corporation whose connection with the completed partnership transaction for which an accounting is asked was ultra vires;[21] that the administrator of a deceased partner seeking an accounting has received money from the survivor on account of a claim outside the partnership settlement;[22] that there is an unexecuted agreement for a settlement;[23] nor that a void assignment for the benefit of creditors has been made.[24] Nor does a judgment in a suit at law, between partners, as to a particular firm transaction, preclude the debtor from maintaining an action for a firm accounting, including this very transaction.[25] But a complete private settlement,[26] or arbitration,[27] of the partnership business is a bar to a judicial accounting. And the plaintiff's misconduct may be such as to debar his action for an account.[28] The fact that under the particular circumstances it may be difficult to make a true accounting on dissolution of a partnership, or that the only statement possible will be an approximation to correctness, is no reason for refusing an accounting.[29]

f. Set-Off and Counter-Claim. In partnership accountings, personal demands in favor of one partner are the proper subject of set off against any final balance found due the other partner, if the rights of creditors are not involved,[30] unless they are wholly disconnected with partnership affairs.[31] A defendant partner is often allowed to counter-claim for plaintiff's violation of his duty as a partner,[32] although as a rule such claims form items in the account itself, rather than subjects of set-off or counter-claim, in the technical sense.[33]

3. Form of Remedy — a. Generally by Bill in Equity. A partner who seeks a judicial settlement of the firm's affairs ordinarily institutes a suit in equity because of its flexible procedure, and because of the special machinery possessed by equity courts for dealing with complicated interests and accounts.[34] If a private settlement has been reached by the parties, an action at law will lie to enforce collection of the sum due,[35] as it will to recover for the breach of an individual covenant by a defendant partner.[36]

for the settlement of the affairs of partnership having only two members.[39] In partnerships with more than two members, the action is held not to be maintainable because two or more partners could not be made either joint plaintiffs or joint defendants, their rights and liabilities being several and not joint. Hence the only remedy in such cases is in equity.[40] In some states, however, the jurisdiction of common-law courts over the action of account has been extended by statute to partnerships with more than two members.[41]

c. Action of Assumpsit. In some jurisdictions a partner has been permitted to adjust all differences between himself and a copartner in an action of assumpsit,[42] when the partnership has been limited to a single transaction, or when a basis for settlement has been agreed upon, or a final balance has been stated between them.[43]

4. Jurisdiction and Venue — a. Jurisdiction. In the absence of statutory provisions on the subject, a court of equity has exclusive jurisdiction of actions for the dissolution and settlement of partnerships.[44] As a rule this jurisdiction has been continued by modern codes and statutes,[45] although occasionally the jurisdiction has been vested in courts of probate.[46] Even a court of equity may be ousted of jurisdiction by a fair and final settlement between the partners.[47] It is not ousted of jurisdiction, however, by defendant's showing that plaintiff is not entitled to all the relief which the bill demands, so long as he is entitled to any relief under the bill which he cannot obtain in a court of law.[48]

b. Venue. The proper venue of an equity action for the dissolution and settlement of a partnership is generally determined by the residence of the parties,[49] and not by the locality of the firm assets, even when these include real estate.[50] Some statutes, however, localize the action in the county where firm real estate is situated.[51]

5. Time to Sue — a. In General. In the absence of legislation on the subject,[52] an action for an accounting may be brought immediately upon dissolution.[53] Even when an action is prematurely brought, it will not be dismissed, provided it appears at the trial that complainant is entitled to any relief consistent with his prayer.[54]

before.[58] It is generally agreed, however, that the statutory period of limitations does not begin to run against a suit for an accounting before the firm's dissolution,[59] unless plaintiff's claim for an accounting is joined with a claim for dissolution, and the latter claim is based upon a cause of action accruing before dissolution.[60] Beyond this point the cases present a great diversity of view. Some hold that the statutory period begins to run immediately upon dissolution, inasmuch as either partner may then bring a suit for an accounting.[61] Others hold that it does not begin to run until the last item of debit or credit, or other like partnership transaction, on account between the partners.[62] Still others hold, and this holding is correct in principle, that the statute does not begin to run until the partnership affairs have been settled and a balance struck.[63] Another class holds that the statute begins to run after the lapse of a reasonable time for settlement.[64] And yet other cases hold that the statute begins to run as soon as one partner disputes a claim of the other, or holds firm assets adversely to him.[65] Some judges have expressed the opinion that the time from which the period of limitations is to be computed must depend on the circumstances of each case, and cannot be governed by rigid or formal rule.[66] And in a number of cases it has been held that where, after a dissolution, the agreement of the parties or the circumstances are such as to create a continuing trust, the statute will not begin to run until a demand or repudiation of the trust.[67] As a rule, in the case of fraud, has taken their place with the consent of the surviving partners,[83] or unless they refuse to bring an action for an accounting, or their position is such that injury may result to them if they become parties.[84]

d. Heirs. The heirs of a deceased partner can rarely bring an action for a partnership accounting, as the proper party plaintiff is either the surviving partner[85] or the personal representative of the deceased partner.[86] They are often made parties defendant in this country, and should be such whenever their interests may be affected by the result of the accounting.[87]

e. Creditors. As a rule creditors are neither necessary nor proper parties to a suit between partners for a firm settlement and accounting.[88] They are often permitted, however, to appear in such a suit for the purpose of establishing their claims,[89] and even for the purpose of compelling an honest distribution of firm assets.[90]

f. Fraudulent Grantee or Confederate. When the avoidance of a fraudulent transfer or of a scheme harmful to the partnership in which a partner has had a confederate is necessary to a full settlement and accounting by the partnership, the fraudulent transferee or confederate may be made a party.[91]

Texas.— The court, on an application by a partner for the appointment of a receiver of the partnership assets, is not required to pass on the question of the rights between the parties, the object being to protect the assets for the benefit of those to whom it will appear that they belong, but a receiver will not be appointed unless the partner applying therefor is entitled to a dissolution of the partnership. As the appointment results in transferring to an officer of the court the control of the firm's affairs, and in preventing all other persons from taking part in their management, the court is never anxious to exercise this power,[6] especially if the partners have once agreed as to the manner in which the partnership shall be settled.[7] Accordingly a receiver will not be appointed, when the existence of the partnership alleged in the petition or bill is denied, unless the court is satisfied that there is a partnership, or the funds are in danger,[8] or the affairs in question are not involved in the partnership settlement,[9] nor without notice to the other partners,[10] nor to take possession of firm assets in a foreign jurisdiction.[11] But if all the partners are living the court will appoint a receiver if they concur in asking for one,[12] or if they seriously disagree concerning the management of affairs during

of insanity.[16] When a partnership has been dissolved by the death of a partner and the surviving partner is settling its affairs, a receiver will not be appointed, against his opposition, unless there is clear evidence of mismanagement or improper conduct on his part, or that by reason of his insolvency or other circumstances the rights of the deceased partner's estate are endangered.[17] If both partners are dead, however, a receiver will be appointed.[18] The creditors of a firm, or of a partner, are rarely entitled to have a receiver of firm property appointed,[19] except in cases where such appointment is necessary to save the property from being squandered or to enforce their lien thereon.[20]

(II) Effect of Appointment and Receiver's Title. As soon as a receiver is appointed all the property of the firm passes into the custody of the court,[21] and therefore neither a partner nor a creditor can interfere with it, save with the court's consent, without being guilty of contempt.[22] The appointment does not vest the receiver with title to the individual property of the partners,[23] nor does it dispose of the rights of creditors or others in such property,[24] for the receiver can take no better title than the firm had.[25] If the partnership is solvent, the partners cannot, by securing the appointment of a receiver, prevent their creditors from securing a judgment and execution lien on firm property.[26]

(III) Authority of Receiver. This, in the absence of any provision to the contrary in the order or decree of the court, extends to whatever is necessary for the ordinary winding up of the firm's business, and the receiver is not bound to take orders from either partner,[27] although a partner may make himself liable to third persons by inducing the receiver to act in a particular manner.[28] The receiver is a trustee for all the partners,[29] but he is not empowered to bind them personally by any new engagement.[30] He may be authorized to carry on the business temporarily.[31] In the absence of a statute conferring authority, he is not entitled to maintain an action to set aside conveyances of the partnership, or judgments confessed by the firm, as in fraud of creditors.[32] The mere appointment of a receiver does not change the relative position of partners to each other;[33] but the court, in its final decree in the action, may determine the rights and liabilities of the partners toward each other.[34]

(IV) ACTIONS BY AND AGAINST RECEIVER. The receiver may institute actions to collect what is due the firm and to otherwise enforce and protect its rights.[35] With permission of the court he may be sued, when such proceeding is necessary to determine the rights or protect the interests of plaintiff.[36]

(V) ACCOUNTING OF RECEIVER. It is the duty of a receiver in these actions to render a proper account of his proceedings[37] and pay over any balance that may remain in his hands to the partners.[38] If the estate sustains a loss through his failure to properly perform his duties he is chargeable therewith.[39]

8. EFFECT OF BRINGING ACTION. The mere institution of a suit for dissolution and accounting does not dissolve the firm, nor vest title to firm assets in firm creditors or in any one on their behalf;[40] nor will an injunction against a partner's meddling with the firm property prevent him from confessing judgment or creditors from securing a judgment and lien.[41] But in most jurisdictions the appointment of a receiver will preclude creditors from thereafter obtaining a lien, although such appointment is made before a decree in the action; while in others creditors are not thus precluded, until a decree is made.[42] The appointment of a receiver will operate to prevent a partner from selling as his own property purchased with firm funds and claimed by the receiver.[43] The bringing of an action for the dissolution of a partnership and for an accounting does not constitute an election on the part of plaintiff to exercise his right to dissolve the

such relief is properly involved in the full statement of the partnership accounting.[57] As a rule third parties have no right to intervene in these actions for the purpose of trying issues which are not germane thereto.[58]

c. Reply. When it is necessary for plaintiff to reply, and the effect of such pleading, are largely matters of statutory regulation at present.[59]

d. Construction of Pleadings and Amended and Supplemental Pleadings. In actions for dissolution and accounting, the courts act with much liberality in allowing and construing amended and supplemental pleadings;[60] as they do in the construction of the original pleadings which are objected to as defective.[61]

e. Issues, Proof, and Variance. Although the courts will construe the pleadings liberally, yet if they have raised a definite issue between the parties, he who has the affirmative of the issue must support it by competent proof;[62] and he

c. Proceedings Upon Trial. These follow the ordinary course of a suit in equity,[74] except as they are regulated by local statute.[75] If there are disputed questions of fact, these may be referred to a jury for determination,[76] under proper instructions from the court.[77] If the bill asks for a dissolution of the firm and an accounting, a finding of the fact of partnership should precede an order for an account;[78] but if the partnership is admitted and the court orders it dissolved,[79] or if the bill is simply for an accounting after the dissolution of an admitted partnership, an interlocutory order or decree for an accounting is of course, unless plaintiff has lost his right thereto by laches or the statute of limitations or for some other cause.[80] A party who has drawn and entered such an order or judgment is bound by its terms.[81]

11. Other Proceedings on Accounting. The defendant's liability to account, where it is disputed, should be determined before a reference to a master or referee to take the account is made;[82] for if the question is decided against complainant it may end the litigation.[83] The plaintiff is not debarred from a reference

Filing verified account.— In New York a party in a suit for the dissolution of a partnership and for an accounting, adjudged to account, should, as required by chancery rule 107, file a verified account, and the adverse party, if not satisfied, should file objections and specify what surcharges he claims should be made, thereby making issues for litigation.

12. CHARGES AND CREDITS — a. In General. In stating the account, as intimated in the last paragraph, each partner is to be credited with every contribution which he has made to the partnership estate, as shown by the books,[95] or by other competent evidence.[96] But he is not entitled to credit for expenditures made for the firm, or extra services rendered to it, unless he can show authority from the firm for such charge, or its acquiescence therein.[97] Nor, as a rule, are matters having nothing to do with the partnership business to be taken into consideration.[98] A partner is to be charged with all sums of money drawn from the firm and with all other forms of its property appropriated by him,[99] as well as with all losses sustained by the firm through his failure properly to perform his duties as partner.[1] In most jurisdictions he will be charged with interest on a liquidated indebtedness to the firm,[2] especially if it results from the wrongful abstraction of firm property.[3] If one partner has excluded his copartner from the business, or has taken the assets and assumed the payment of the debts out of such assets, he is to be charged with the receipts from the business and credited with the legitimate expenses of conducting and closing it, and any balance is to be divided as profits.[4] And generally the share of a partner as determined by a final accounting is his proportion of the residue, after the payment of non-partners, and after the several partners have been credited with the sums due them from the firm and have been charged with the sums due from them to the firm.[5]

b. Effect of Partnership Agreements and Settlements. The foregoing rules as to charges and credits are often modified by the agreements of the partners in their original articles,[6] or upon intermediate settlements,[7] if these are made in good faith.[8]

able with property or payments of a partner, although connected with the business, of which it does not get a proprietary benefit.[10]

d. Debts, Losses, and Expenses. A partner who pays the debts of his firm or defrays its legitimate expenses or losses out of his own property is to be credited therewith in the firm account.[11] Such credit should include interest and discount charges paid by him in connection with these matters.[12] The amount to be credited as expenses, when accounts thereof have not been kept, may be shown by the testimony of experts.[13] A partner who compromises a firm debt is to be credited with only the amount which he has paid.[14] The account of each partner is to be charged with all debts which he owes the firm.[15] Also with all losses which his misconduct has caused the firm,[16] but not those due to honest mistakes as distinguished from clear violation of duty.[17] An agreement to share profits implies an agreement to share costs in the same proportion, unless the capital of one partner is staked against the skill of the other.[18] All members of a firm are chargeable with their share of expenses incurred after dissolution of a firm in defending actions commenced against it before such time and continued thereafter.[19]

e. Duty to Keep Accounts. If a party fails to perform his duty of keeping accurate account of partnership affairs, all doubts respecting particular items will be resolved against him, unless there is some reason for not applying the rule,[20] and in such case the court will resort to the best evidence obtainable to ascertain the true state of the account.[21]

f. Partnership Books and Statements. Each partner is entitled to an inspection of the firm books, in an action for an accounting.[22] If it is shown that all the partners had access to the books, at or soon after the time when the entries were made, such entries are presumed to be correct and are admissible as between the partners,[23] or their representatives,[24] even though they do not accord with the partnership articles.[25] Their evidential value is increased if their correctness is attested by the verified pleading of a partner,[26] and, as against himself, it is increased by a partner's presentation of an account based upon them.[27] The presumption does not attach to entries in the private books of a partner,[28] nor to those in firm books as against a dormant partner;[29] and entries in firm books, made after the retirement of one of the partners, are not admissible in evidence, in favor of the firm, against such retired partner.[30] Even in the case of firm books, the presumption may be rebutted by evidence of mistake or fraud,[31] unless the party offering the evidence is estopped from questioning their accuracy.[32] Accounts current rendered between partners are admissible to show, by the admissions of the parties, that the items are not items of partnership account.[33] An account, proved to be in the handwriting of one partner, is evidence to go to the jury in an action between the partners, although it is not signed.[34]

13. CONVERSION OF ASSETS INTO MONEY AND ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS — a. Collections. Until a receiver is appointed, each partner has authority to collect debts due the firm.[35] From and after such appointment this authority vests in the receiver,[36] and he is entitled to all collections made by a partner and for which he has not accounted to the firm.[37] He has the same right against the assignee of the firm appointed in a proceeding which has been judicially declared illegal and void.[38]

b. Sale of Firm Property. In an action for partnership dissolution and accounting, the entire property of the firm is to be converted into cash, unless all the partners, by an honest and lawful agreement, assent to a distribution of the assets in specie; and such conversion is ordinarily made by a sale of the property.[39]

Entries by partner winding up business.— The rule that entries in the books of a firm are evidence against all of the parties is true only of those made while the firm is doing business. Entries so made by a partner who is winding up the partnership under a transfer to him for that purpose are not per se evidence for him against a copartner. Clements v. Mitchell, 62 N. C. 3.

Effect of possession by partner after bill for dissolution.— The fact that one of the partners of the firm, who remained in possession of the shop and stock of goods after a bill was filed for a dissolution of the partnership, kept possession of the books, and refused to give them up, is no reason for excluding the books as prima facie evidence, at least, of the affairs of the concern, there being no proof of the allegation that the books were altered or mutilated by him. Moon v. Story, 8 Dana (Ky.) 226.

Expert's books.— In an action for the dissolution of a partnership and for an accounting, where the evidence showed that the books had been so improperly kept by defendant that it was impossible to tell anything about the condition of the affairs of the partnership, the attorneys stipulated that experts should be employed by the referee to reduce the books to intelligible shape. The experts made out a set of new books from the old books. It was held that the expert books were properly admitted in evidence in connection with the report of the referee. Roberts v. Eldred, 73 Cal. 394, 15 Pac. 16.

Expert's account from altered books.— Although ordinarily plaintiff would have had no right to introduce books as evidence of the settlement of partnership affairs after the dissolution of the partnership, when he had altered such books, a statement of account by an expert, made from such altered books, was admissible, where there was other evidence showing the correctness of the statement. The sale should include as a rule the good-will of the firm[40] as well as its real estate.[41] It should not be ordered, however, unless the partnership is actually dissolved,[42] nor should it include property which does not belong to the firm,[43] nor for the sale of which there is no necessity,[44] nor when it will give one or some of the partners an unfair advantage over others.[45] Where the wife of a partner has a dower right in real estate to be sold in a suit for a partnership accounting, her right should be determined and protected under a statute requiring this in the case of judicial sales.[46] The rule that if a trustee, or one standing in a similar capacity, becomes a purchaser of the trust property, such act is voidable at the instance of the person whom he represents, applies with full force to a sale of partnership property by a master, pursuant to a decree in partition, and under this rule, where the same is purchased by one of the partners, the other partner may avoid the sale.[47]

c. Presentation and Allowance of Claims. Provision is ordinarily made by the court for the presentation of claims before final distribution,[48] in order that those only shall be paid which are fairly chargeable against the firm.[49] Where all the creditors of a partnership are on the same plane in the order in which assets are to be marshaled for distribution among them, any agreement favoring a few to the exclusion of the others will not be upheld, unless made with the assent of all.[50]

If the action seeks a dissolution of the partnership, it is proper for the decree to fix the date of the dissolution,[59] as well as the terms thereof.[60] With respect to accounting and distribution, the decree should provide for a final adjustment of all controverted questions before the court and for a final distribution of all firm effects.[61] It may and often does include an adjudication that a balance is due from one or more

The following is a simple form of judgment for a partnership account: "Let an account be taken of all partnership dealings and transactions between the plaintiff and the defendant as co-partners from the —— day of ——. And let what upon taking the said account shall be certified to be due from either of the said parties to the other of them, be within one month of the Master's certificate paid by the party from whom to the party to whom the same shall be certified to be due. Liberty to apply." Lindley Partn. (7th ed.) p. 561; Seton Decrees (6th ed.) 2166.

partners to another.[62] If the court finds that a partnership agreement is void in its inception, because one partner fraudulently induced the other to make the agreement, it may decree that the wrong-doing partner shall repay to the other all sums of money contributed by the latter to the firm, make reasonable reparation for his services, and indemnify him against all partnership liability.[63] No personal decree should be rendered in partnership dissolution proceedings against individual partners until the assets have been converted into money.[64]

b. Determination as to All Parties. It follows from the general principles stated in the foregoing paragraph that the decree should settle partnership concerns between all the partners,[65] unless the nature of the partnership is such that plaintiff's share of the profits for which he brings suit is separable from the rest of the firm business.[66] The decree should not undertake to determine rights of third parties, not brought into the suit,[67] nor the rights of partners in transactions outside of the partnership business.[68]

c. Joint or Several Judgment. Ordinarily the accounts of the partners with the firm should be taken separately and separate judgments be rendered as to each partner.[69] But this rule does not apply where two or more of the partners are joint contractors on the one side, with the plaintiff partner on the other side,[70] nor when two or more partners have acted jointly in wronging plaintiff.[71]

d. Conformity to Pleadings and Findings. A judgment is not authorized which contains a material provision not supported by the findings,[72] nor within the issues as shown by the pleadings.[73] But if its terms are indefinite or ambiguous, it will be so construed as to sustain its regularity and validity, if it is susceptible of such construction.[74] The prayer for general relief will authorize the court to apply the firm assets to the payment of the firm debts,[75] and to decree to the partners any balance found due them.[76]

16. APPEAL AND REVIEW. Appeals in suits for dissolution of partnerships and accountings are governed by the same principles as appeals generally in equity cases.[77] A judgment or decree will not be reversed for error based on a finding of fact, where the testimony is conflicting,[78] or on a finding requested by the appellant,[79] or where it appears that the judgment does substantial justice to both parties.[80] But it may be reversed or modified where it is apparent that a mistake in computation has been made,[81] or that it does not rest upon any satisfactory evidence,[82] or is based upon an erroneous conception of law.[83] Where plaintiff sued for the appointment of a receiver for a partnership and for a settlement and an accounting, and an order refusing to appoint a receiver is affirmed, the right will be reserved to plaintiffs to sue for a settlement and an accounting.[84]

17. COSTS. As a rule the costs of a suit for a partnership accounting, including the fees of experts and of attorneys,[85] are to be paid out of the partnership

18. Effect of a Judicial Accounting — a. Its Conclusiveness. A judgment in an action for partnership accounting and settlement is conclusive upon the parties thereto as to all issues properly before the court, until it has been regularly set aside;[91] but it does not conclude as to matters not before the court at the time of the settlement.[92] It does not bar an action for conversion by the executor of a deceased partner against the survivor and a third person, who joined him in converting the firm assets.[93] When a judicial accounting has been had, it so far fixes the rights of partners and creditors that the suit cannot thereafter be dismissed without their consent.[94] A partner, although discharged, by a settlement of the firm business, of the legal obligation to pay an additional sum to a copartner, may recognize a moral obligation to pay it, and, if he does so without fraud of the copartner, he cannot recover back the money paid.[95]

b. Opening or Setting Aside. A final judgment in actions now under consideration may be opened or set aside for the causes available in other equity actions.[96] If it is reopened, the parties will be entitled as a rule to an entire restatement of the account.[97]

Bl. 37, 48, Lord Loughborough said: "In many parts of Europe, limited partnerships are admitted, provided they be entered on a register; but the law of England is otherwise, the rule being, that if a partner shares in advantages, he also shares in all disadvantages." Partnership en Commandite, or Limited Liability Recognized and Permitted by the Existing Law of England (by Matthew B. Begbie, London, 1852), contains an argument that a legislative sanction in England until 1907.[99] On this side of the Atlantic it has always existed in Louisiana, whose jurisprudence is based upon the modern civil law of France,[1] and has been established by statute in most of the United States as well as in Canada.[2] New York was the first common-law state to introduce limited partnership.[3] Her example was followed a few months later by Connecticut.[4] Both statutes were framed upon the common model found in the French code of commerce, although they are quite independent pieces of legislation.[5] The New York statute has been copied more or less closely by many other states.

2. A SPECIES OF PARTNERSHIP. In all jurisdictions the limited partnership is dealt with as a modified form of the normal partnership, and not as a new and partnership can be organized and carried on, under the English common law, so as to secure one who furnishes a part of the capital with a right to a share of the profits, without subjecting him to a partner's liability.

"Limited partnerships were unknown to the common law, but in some countries of Europe have existed for hundreds of years. 13 Am. C. L. 804. In Italy they were known and recognized in the laws of Pisa and Florence as early as 1166; in Geneva in 1562; in France (Marseilles) 1253; also under Louis X in 1315; and still continue under the republic, being regulated by the new code of commerce, 'La Société en Commandite.' In England it is said that limited partnerships only exist as joint stock companies. Coope v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 37, 48. They seem to have been devised to enable persons to engage in mercantile business without being known or named, became the most frequent combination of trade, and in large degree contributed to the commercial prosperity which the above named countries afterward enjoyed. In our own state there was enacted a statute authorizing limited partnerships in the year 1822, being substantially a copy from the French act, and since that time similar laws have been adopted in most of the other states and territories which have patterned their statutes after that of New York. In these later days the object is to protect the special partner, enable him to employ his wealth in trade without risking more than he originally subscribed, and at the same time secure co-operation of men of integrity and ability." Moorhead v. Seymour, 77 N. Y. Suppl. 1050, 1054.

99. "An Act to Establish Limited Partnerships" (7 Edw. VII, c. 24). See 6 Mich. L. Rev. p. 525 (article by Francis M. Burdick on "Limited Partnership in America and England"). The latest previous attempt at legislation on this topic is recounted by Sir Frederick Pollock, in Essays in Jurisprudence and Ethics, c. 4, and in the introduction to the third edition of his Digest of the Law of Partnership. The appendix to this edition contains his proposed draft of the limited partnership clauses in the bill of 1880. They were omitted from the bill by the parliamentary committee and form no part of the Partnership Act of 1890. In his Essays in Jurisprudence and Ethics, Sir Frederick Pollock remarks: "This form of partnership has been known on the continent for many centuries. The Mediterranean trade of the middle ages was carried on principally by its means. In France, Louis XIV regulated it by an ordinance of 1673, which has been substantially adopted in the modern commercial code. How it failed to establish itself in England and Scotland, I am unable to say; it is not impossible that it was recognized by the special tribunals which administered the law merchant down to the seventeenth century, but of the proceedings of those courts we know hardly anything. . . . So it was, at all events, that when the law of partnership was formed by modern judges and chancellors, the notion of a partner with limited liability never appeared. . . . Thus we are left practically alone in excluding it; and I think there is a fairly strong presumption that we lose something by not possessing an institution which has been found useful by so many mercantile communities." Practical Opinions against Partnership with Limited Liability (by Edmund Potter, London, 1855), contains an emphatic protest against this form of partnership.

1. La. Civ. Code (1825), arts. 2799, 2810–2822; Civ. Code (1900), arts. 2828, 2839–2851. Sir Frederick Pollock observes: "Louisiana and Florida, not being English Colonies in the first instance, have always had the system of partnership en commandite." Essays on Jurisprudence and Ethics 101. This is true of Louisiana; but Florida adopted in 1822, as the basis of its legal system, the common law of England and the statutes in aid thereof, down to the fourth year of James I. Rev. distinct kind of business association.[6] Its characteristic features are that one or more of its members, although contributing to its capital and sharing in its profits, have no voice in its management and are not personally liable for its debts; but that the rights of its creditors are limited to the partnership fund and to the general partners.[7] It will be observed that the form of limited partnership contains one or more general partners whose personal liability is unlimited. In some states, however, a second form is authorized by separate legislation, which approaches more nearly to the corporation and in which the partnership assets are liable for partnership debts, while the individuals owning the partnership property are subject to no personal liability.[8]

3. What Law Governs. When the question before the court is whether a valid limited partnership has been formed, or whether it has carried on its business as a limited partnership, or what are the powers of the special partner, the law applicable thereto is that of the jurisdiction in which the partnership is formed and has its existence.[9] But the construction of a local statute authorizing a limited partnership,[10] or a question as to the manner in which such a partnership is to sue or be sued,[11] is governed by the local law.

4. Construction of Statutes. While some courts have favored a very strict construction of limited partnership statutes against the special partner,[12] the prevailing view at present is that the special partner should be held to an honest and full compliance with all of the statutory provisions which are designed for the protection of persons dealing with the partnership,[13] but that the general object of these statutes is to remedy a defect of the common law, and accordingly they are to receive a reasonably liberal construction.[14]

5. GENERAL REQUISITES TO CREATION. While the statutes differ in various respects on this topic, they generally confine limited partnerships to the conduct of a mercantile, mechanical, or manufacturing business;[15] require the execution, recording, and publication of certain papers;[16] and provide for at least one general partner whose liability for the debts is unlimited.[17]

6. PARTICULAR REQUISITES — a. Certificate. A prime requisite to the organization of a legal limited partnership, under all statutes, is the execution of a prescribed certificate.[18] This document as a rule must contain: (1) The name or firm under which such limited partnership is to be conducted[19] and its principal place of business;[20] (2) the general nature of the business intended to be transacted;[21] (3) the names of all the general and special partners, stating which are general and which are special and their respective residences;[22] (4) the amount of capital which each

St. 153 (the partnership was held to be a general one, because the contract provided that the general partner should sign no note or check for money without the knowledge and consent of the special partner's son). In Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Sirret, 97 N. Y. 320, 15 Abb. N. Cas. 318, the fact that the partnership articles provided that the special partner should bear a proportionate share of the firm losses was held not to turn the partnership into a general one, as this provision was in the interest of creditors, and the statute did not prohibit such agreement.

McGehee v. Powell, 8 Ala. 827 (the certificate should show that the business to be carried on is of a kind which the statute permits a limited partnership to conduct); Manhattan Co. v. Phillips, 109 N. Y. 383, 17 N. E. 129 (where the certificate described the business as "a general commission business, buying and selling grain, flour and produce on commission," while the advertisements described the partnership as formed "for the purpose of conducting a general commission business"; and the court held that there was no material variance between the statements); Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Sirret, 97 N. Y. 320, 15 Abb. N. Cas. 318 (the certificate need not state all of the details of the partnership agreement); Benedict v. Allen, 17 U. C. Q. B. 234 (a description of the business as that of "general dealers" is not a compliance with the statutory requirement on this point, as it is too indefinite).

In Hall v. Glessner, 100 Mo. 155, 13 S. W. 349, it was held that N was not made a special partner in one firm by the fact that special partner has contributed;[23] and (5) the period at which the partnership shall commence and shall terminate.[24] The statements thus required by the statute in the certificate must be true at the time the certificate and other required papers are filed.[25]

b. The Contribution by the Special Partner. It is not required by the statutes that the general partner shall make any contribution to the firm capital;[26] but they do require the special partner to make a contribution, and most of them require that this contribution shall be in cash.[27] When this requirement exists, the statute is not satisfied by contribution of stocks, bonds,[28] bills,[29] notes,[30] his copartner W in another firm paid his (W's) contribution as a special partner in the former firm by a check drawn in the firm name of "N & W," and charged to his individual account in such firm. In Webster v. Lanum, 137 Fed. 376, 70 C. C. A. 56, the person named as special partner was acting as a dummy for other persons, and the court declined to pass upon the question whether this fact made him liable as a general partner, because it was not raised by the pleadings.

23. Blumenthal v. Whitaker, 170 Pa. checks,[31] or other evidences of debt,[32] however readily these may sell in the market. It is usually held, however, that where the special partner has money actually in the bank to his credit, his check against such account, which gives absolute and final control to the general partner of the amount named in the check, is to be treated as an actual payment in cash.[33] In some states the special partner is allowed to contribute property, but he is generally required to describe it and give its cash or appraised value, so that those dealing with the firm can know how much in money's worth the special partner has contributed.[34] As a rule the statutes require the contribution to be made before the formation of the partnership, but the Missouri statute has been construed to permit the contribution to be made thereafter.[35] It is immaterial how the special partner has acquired the money or property which he contributes,[36] so long as he passes title to it to the partnership free from any lien or condition.[37] Nor is it necessary that the general partner keep the money in hand until the certificate is filed.[38] Moreover it is not in violation of the statute for the general partners to use the money in buying a stock of goods from the special partner, or from a firm of which he is a member, so long as the transaction is in good faith; or in other words, provided that the stock was needed by the new firm in its business, and that the price paid was fair and reasonable, and the transaction was not resorted to as a cover or device to evade the statute.[39] But the general partner's agreement to buy property from the special partner must not be made the condition of the latter's contribution to the firm's capital.[40]

c. Affidavit as to Contribution. One of the fundamental requirements of the statute, in most jurisdictions, is an affidavit of one or more of the general partners stating that the sums or property specified in the certificate to have been contributed by each of the special partners have been actually and in good faith paid or supplied.[41] The courts have held that the affidavit need not contain the exact language of the statute, but it must contain its substance.[42]. If the affidavit is false, all the persons interested in the partnership shall be liable for all the engagements thereof as general partners.[43] As the statutes of some of the states differ from the foregoing provisions, the reader should be careful to consult the statute governing a particular case.[44]

d. Acknowledging, Filing, and Publishing the Certificate. The statutory provisions on these points differ in matters of detail, but they usually require that the certificate be acknowledged before a specified officer,[45] and be published in certain newspapers,[46] or in some other manner,[47] and that the certificate with proof of publication and with the affidavit be filed or registered in a specified office.[48] Until these requirements have been complied with, the statutes usually declare no limited partnership has been formed.[49] While the courts insist upon a faithful performance of all these requirements in matters of substance,[50] yet failures in as a limited partnership, for, in the absence of an actual agreement to that effect when the capital was contributed, the partnership would be at liberty to use its capital, when it was received, in that or any other direction." matters of form are not treated as fatal, if the mistakes are not in bad faith and misleading to those dealing with the firm.[51]

e. Firm-Name and Sign. The statutes require that the partnership shall have a firm-name, and that this shall be set forth in the certificate. Generally they require that the firm-name shall contain only the names of the general partners,[52] although the use of the words "and Company" or "& Co." is permitted in some states, where there are two or more general partners.[53] The special partner's name is not to appear in the firm style, save when the limited partnership succeeds to a general partnership, whose name it is authorized by statute to adopt as its own.[54] If his name is used with his privity, and without such legislative permission, he shall be deemed a general partner.[55] A few statutes provide that the limited partnership shall put up in a conspicuous place in front of the building in which is its chief place of business a sign in legible English containing all of the names of the members, stating who are general and who are special partners.[56]

B. Duration — 1. The Original Term. The period at which the partnership shall begin and at which it shall terminate must be stated in the certificate; and hence all those dealing with it have notice of the term for which it is organized.[57] But the statutes expressly provide that a limited partnership shall not be formed until the certificate is executed, acknowledged, registered, and the affidavit made and filed, as required by statute.[58] If the partnership does business before these statutory requisites are complied with, its members are liable as general partners for the obligations incurred during that period;[59] but not for the obligations of the business incurred after the partnership has been duly formed.[60] So, if the partnership does business after the expiration of the period named in the certifi-bution of the special partner as five thousand dollars, when it should have been two thousand dollars, and the partnership was held to be a general one.

cate, it is thereby transformed into a general partnership as to its new engagements thereafter.[61]

2. CONTINUANCE OR RENEWAL. The statutes permit a continuance or renewal of a limited partnership, provided that it shall be certified, acknowledged, and recorded, and an affidavit of a general partner be made and filed, and notice given in the manner required for its original formation.[62] If this provision is not complied with, the firm which continues the business is a general partnership, although its members may not have intended this result.[63] Whether a valid renewal can be made when the original capital of the firm has been impaired is a question upon which the courts have differed.[64] In Massachusetts the present statute provides that no renewal of the limited partnership shall be made unless the capital contributed by the special partner is equal in amount to, or more than, the aggregate capital the special partner originally contributed.[65] The provisions now under consideration do not apply to an attempt by the members of a limited partnership to organize a new firm, as distinguished from continuing an existing one.[66]

C. Mutual Rights, Duties, and Liabilities of Partners. These are the same in the case of the general partners in a limited partnership as those of the members of an ordinary firm.[67] But the special partner is not entitled to a voice in the management of the firm,[68] nor to supervise its affairs or act in its behalf save to the extent which is authorized by statute.[69] His contribution passes under the ownership of the firm,[70] and he is not its creditor for that,[71] although he may be entitled to receive interest upon it.[72] Under some statutes he may sell property or loan money to the firm or buy or borrow from it as a stranger may do;[73] but under other statutes he may not thus become a creditor of the firm.[74] A

D. Rights and Liabilities of Partners to Third Persons — 1. Failure to Comply With Statute. continued after the period for which it was organized.[84] Whether a particular association, the members of which have failed to follow the statutory requirements, is to be deemed a general partnership for all purposes,[85] or is to be treated as a limited partnership whose members are liable as general partners to claimants against the firm, but not otherwise,[86] should depend upon the provisions of the applicatory statute. Most of the cases, but not all, may be reconciled upon this theory.[87]

2. Alteration in Members or Business. It is a fundamental requirement of the statutes that the recorded and published statements upon the organization of a limited partnership should fully advise all persons having transactions with it of its membership and its business. Hence the statutory provision that any alteration in the members of the firm except such as is specifically permitted by the statute,[88] or in its business, shall operate to dissolve the firm,[89] and render the special partner liable as a general partner in any business thereafter carried on with his consent.[90] An alteration in the business includes a removal of the partnership place of business into another county from that in which this was located when the firm was organized and the original papers filed.[91] In order that alterations may thus subject the special partner to a general partner's liability they must have been made with his assent.[92]

3. Withdrawal of Capital or Profits. The withdrawal of any part of the special partner's capital, either directly or under the guise of dividends, profits, or the assumption of his individual debts, is prohibited.[93] In some jurisdictions the statutory penalty for such withdrawal is liability as a general partner.[94] In others it is a liability to restore the amount thus illegally withdrawn,[95] and this only, unless the withdrawal amounts to an alteration of the capital of the firm, when, as we saw in the preceding paragraph, the liability becomes that of a general partner for future obligations.

A. 796, it was held that the special partner's failure to give notice of the dissolution of the firm at the expiration of the period for which its certificate stated it was formed did not render him liable for the subsequent debts of the firm, although a false statement in the original papers had made him liable as a general partner. The court said: "When the act declares that under certain circumstances a special partner shall be deemed a general partner, it certainly does not mean that he is in fact a general partner. . . . Nor do I see how the legislature can make a man a member of a firm without his consent. . . . It may, indeed, make him liable for the debts of a firm as though he were a general partner, and this is all the legislature probably intended to do."

4. ESTOPPEL. It is clear that a special partner will become liable as a general partner, when he induces a person to deal with the firm on the strength of his representation that he is a general partner.[96] He may also estop himself from showing that the limited partnership was not duly organized;[97] but he is not so estopped against one who has dealt with the firm as a general partnership and who offers no evidence that he gave credit to it as a limited partnership, or in any way acted on the faith of any representation that it was such.[98] There is authority for the view that persons who deal with a firm as a limited partnership are estopped from denying the validity of its organization;[99] but the better doctrine is that creditors are not thus estopped,[1] unless they have advised the partners to carry on their business in this irregular manner[2] or have expressly assented to the limited liability of the special partner.[3]

5. RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF SPECIAL PARTNERS. The statutes usually deny to a special partner any right to participate in the management of the partnership, and vest the entire power of control in the general partners.[4] Accordingly the

Ct. 486, it was held that the receipt of a dividend under an order on an accounting in proceedings on an assignment for the benefit of creditors, made by a special partnership, and an appearance in such proceedings, do not estop the creditor from bringing an action thereafter, for the balance of the claim, against all the partners, and enforcing the liability of the alleged special partner as a general partner; it not appearing that the court in the assignment proceedings had power to litigate the question whether such alleged partner was a general or special partner, or that such question was there litigated.

special partner has no implied authority to bind the firm by his acts;[5] and if he does take part in the firm's management, in violation of the statute, "he shall be deemed and be liable as a general partner."[6] The general partners have no authority to change the nature of the business, without the consent of the special partner.[7] They may change it with his consent,[8] but in that event he becomes liable as a general partner.[9]

6. Insolvent Limited Partnerships. As soon as a limited partnership becomes insolvent, or is in contemplation of insolvency, it is prohibited by statute from making transfers of its property, of creating liens thereon, or of confessing judgments, with intent of giving a preference to any creditor; and this prohibition is extended to each of the partners.[10] In case of such a violation of the statute, any partnership creditor may institute an action, without obtaining a judgment at law, to have the prohibited transfer, judgment, or lien set aside and to have a receiver appointed to take possession of and distribute the partnership assets ratably among all the firm creditors.[11] If such violation has been assented to by the special partner he becomes liable as a general partner.[12] It is not a violation of the statute for the partners to allow a judgment to be taken or an attachment to be obtained against the partnership by default,[13] nor to make a general assignment for the benefit of creditors without preferences,[14] nor to make a sale of firm property to a bona fide purchaser.[15]

The law making a special partner who accepts a transfer from the partnership, knowing it to be insolvent, with intent to secure a debt, liable as general partner, the liability so incurred is not a penalty which will not be enforced in another state, since the law simply withdraws the protection accorded and leaves him to the

7. Application of Assets to Liabilities. From the principles stated in the last preceding section it follows that, until a receiver is appointed of an insolvent limited partnership, its property may be levied upon by a firm creditor under a valid judgment.[16] But an execution in favor of an individual creditor of a special partner cannot be levied upon the firm property by the sheriff's taking such property from the possession of the general partners, nor can the sheriff by a sale under such an execution, convey title or give possession to such property, or deprive the special partner of his interest in the firm.[17] A creditor of a general partner, although he be the special partner, is subordinated to the creditors of the firm, as in an ordinary partnership.[18] Whether a special partner can share in the firm assets as a general creditor depends upon the statutory provisions in the particular jurisdiction.[19] A creditor who secures a preference which is avoided as a violation of the statute does not lose his right thereby to share pro rata with the other creditors of the firm.[20]

E. Actions By or Against Firms or Partners — 1. In General. When a limited partnership has been duly organized, all suits by or against it respecting its business while it is a going concern, as well as those common-law actions instituted during the winding up of its affairs, are to be brought and conducted by and against the general partners, in the same manner as if there were no special partners.[21] But if the partnership has not been validly organized, or if the action involves a case where the special partner has become liable as a general partner, all the partners who are liable as general partners may and should join or be joined as parties plaintiff or defendant,[22] unless the facts establish a case of

estoppel.[23] Although a creditor has obtained a judgment at law against the general partners, he may maintain an action against the special partner upon discovering the facts which render the latter liable as a general partner.[24] Actions brought to wind up the affairs of the firm and for a receiver may properly include the special partner or his personal representative.[25] An action may be brought against the special partner alone to enforce his individual liability,[26] as one may be brought by him to redress an injury to him or his property by a firm creditor, or a creditor of the general partner.[27]

2. INJUNCTION AND RECEIVER. An injunction may be obtained by or against a limited partnership, when it would be obtainable against a general partnership.[28] It may also be obtained and a receiver appointed, as soon as the partnership is insolvent, upon the application of any firm creditor,[29] although the creditor would not be entitled to such relief, if the partnership were a general one.[30]

3. PLEADINGS. The complaint in an action against all the members of a limited partnership need not allege an attempt and failure to form such partnership, but it may treat them all as general partners; and under such complaint plaintiff may show upon the trial that all are liable as general partners.[31] If the complaint is against a limited partnership as such it properly names as defendants the general partners only.[32] When the special partner is sued as a general partner, and bases his defense upon the valid formation and conduct of a limited partnership, he should plead compliance with the statutory requirements.[33] In case such answer is interposed, it would seem to be the safer course for plaintiff to reply, pointing out the specific violations of the statute on which he relies to charge the special partner as a general partner.[34] The debtor of a limited partnership is not entitled to counter-claim an individual indebtedness of the general partner to him.[35]

4. TRIAL AND JUDGMENT. A plaintiff who brings an action upon a partnership obligation is bound to establish the existence of a partnership.[36] If he alleges a limited partnership, and proves that the special partner is liable as a general partner, he is entitled to recover nevertheless.[37] But if he alleges that a partnership which was organized as a limited one has become a general partnership, or that the special partner has become liable as a general partner, the burden is upon him to establish the truth of such allegation,[38] for the affidavit and other papers required by statute are prima facie evidence of the due formation of a limited partnership.[39] The books of a limited partnership are admissible against the special partner as well as against the general partner.[40] When the facts are undisputed, and reasonable men cannot differ as to the proper inferences therefrom, the only questions upon the trial are for the court.[41] Where the facts are in dispute, or the inferences from the evidence are uncertain, a question is presented for the jury.[42] A judgment against the special partner is not authorized in an action against a limited partnership upon a partnership obligation.[43] In an action, however, which charges a special partner with liability as a general partner, such a judgment is proper;[44] and when a court of equity has acquired jurisdiction in an action to wind up the affairs of a limited partnership it may render such personal decrees as the rights and liabilities of the parties require.[45]

F. Dissolution, Settlement, and Accounting — 1. Causes and Manner of Dissolution. A limited partnership may be dissolved for the causes which justify a dissolution of a general partnership;[46] and it is dissolved by operation of law whenever a general partnership would be thus dissolved,[47] unless the statute provides to the contrary.[48] When it is dissolved by the expiration of the term for which it was organized, notice of the dissolution need not be given, as in the case of a general partnership, as the recorded papers are notice to all the world of the term of the partnership.[49] Dissolution of a limited partnership by the acts of the parties is specifically regulated by the statutes. Acts of alteration or of prohibited interference by the special partner operate to dissolve the firm as a limited partnership, and render all the members liable as general partners.[50] In case of dissolution by mutual consent, the statute usually provides that this shall not take place until a notice of it shall have been filed and recorded in the office where the original papers are recorded, and published in certain papers for a specified period.[51]

2. Rights, Powers, and Liabilities of Partners. When a limited partnership has been duly dissolved, the general partners have the right and power to wind up its affairs;[52] but they have no implied authority to bind the special partner by new obligations.[53] If the business is carried on after the parties have effected a dissolution as between themselves, but before it has been perfected in accordance with the statute, the special partner is liable for all obligations incurred in the business during this period.[54] Whether a firm creditor may sue the estate of a deceased special partner, where he would be liable to such suit if he were living, without exhausting his remedies against the surviving partners, depends upon the jurisdiction.[55] A special partner does not incur the liability of a general partner by instituting a suit to wind up the affairs of the firm, and becoming receiver thereof, because of a general partner's misconduct.[56]

3. Distribution and Settlement Between Partners. The rules upon this topic are the same as in the case of general partnerships,[57] except as they are modified by statutory provisions.[58]

4. Actions For Dissolution and Accounting. I. NATURE OF PROPERTY OR RIGHT IN GENERAL.

A. Definition and Nature. The term "party-wall" may be used in four different senses: (1) In the ordinary acceptation and primary meaning of the term, it is a wall of which two adjoining owners are tenants in common.[1] (2) A wall divided longitudinally into two strips, one belonging to each of the neighboring owners.[2] (3) A wall which belongs entirely to one of the adjoining owners, but is subject to an easement or right in the other to have it maintained as a dividing wall between the two tenements.[3] (4) A wall divided longitudinally into two moieties, each moiety being subject to a cross easement in favor of the owner of the other moiety.[4] In the United States the general rule is that the owners of a party-wall standing in part upon the land of each are not tenants in common of the wall, but each owns in severalty so much thereof as stands upon his lot, subject to the easement of the other owner for its support, and the equal use thereof as an exterior wall of his building.[5]

A party-wall has also been defined to be a structure for the common benefit and convenience of both tenements which it separates, and either party may use it. Such a wall is a substitute for a separate wall to each adjoining owner, and neither may impair its value to the other. Each adjoining proprietor is the owner in severalty of his part, both of the wall and of the land on which it stands, subject to the gross easement of support, and for other common needs in favor of the other proprietor. A. 110; Bellenot v. Laube, 104 Va. 842, 847, 52 S. E. 698.

A common or party-wall is one which has been built at the common expense, or one which has been built by one party, but in which another has acquired a common right. Every wall or separation between two buildings is presumed to be a common or party-wall. Campbell v. Mesier, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 334, 340, 8 Am. Dec. 570.

In New York the term "party-wall," when used in an executory contract for the sale of land, without restrictive terms, and in its general ordinary signification, bas been defined as a dividing wall between two houses, to be used equally for all the purposes of an external wall, by both "parties"; that is, by the respective owners of both houses. Fettretch v. Leamy, 9 Bosw. 510.

In England by statute it is defined as being "every wall used or built in order to be used as a separation of any building from any other building, with a view to the same being occupied by different persons." Metr. Bldg. Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, § 3) [quoted in Wheeler v. Gray, 6 C. B. 606, 609, 5 Jur. N. S. 916, 28 L. J. C. P. 200, 7 Wkly. Rep. 325, 95 E. C. L. 606].

Synonymous with "wall in common."—The examination of statutes and authorities clearly shows that the terms "wall in common" and "party-wall" are used synonymously, and that neither term is of particular value in determining the legislative intent. the two proprietors.[6] However, in the absence of a special agreement or controlling custom to the contrary, it is an essential characteristic of a party-wall that it should be capable of substantially similar use by each of the adjoining owners.[7]

111, 116, 37 Pac. 192, where it is said: "I think the phrase 'partition wall,' in the first section, and 'division partition wall,' in the second, must be understood as applied to a wall which is merely a fence. 'Partition wall' is not a phrase which in legal technology is used to designate a wall used by adjoining owners as a party wall. A party wall is always, at least in this state, such by agreement. A division fence is provided for in our code."

A right to a party-wall is a right which an owner of land has to build a division line partly over his line on the land of another. It is therefore a right appurtenant to land, and may properly be called an easement and servitude. Roberts v. Bye, 30 Pa. St. 375, 72 Am. Dec. 710.

Nature of foundation as test.— The character of a party-wall may be determined in part from its foundation. If a builder starts a wall upon the line and thus takes the land of the adjoining owner, he must carry it up strictly as a party-wall, or at least in such manner as to give the adjoining owner all the benefits of such wall. Milne's Appeal, 81 Pa. St. 54 [approved in Western Nat. Bank's Appeal, 102 Pa. St. 171]. But compare Pile v. Pedrick, 167 Pa. St. 296, 31 Atl. 646, 647, 46 Am. St. Rep. 677, where the wall was not considered to be a party-wall, notwithstanding the builder extended it in some places a few inches over on to the land of the adjoining proprietor, it appearing that by reason of a mistake in the survey this was done without any intention on the part of the builder to consider the wall as a party-wall. The builder of a wall extending beneath the surface upon the adjoining owner's property is bound to maintain it as a party-wall, although the wall above the basement or foundation is wholly within the line of his own lot. Western Nat. Bank's Appeal, 102 Pa. St. 171. Contra, Trulock v. Parse, 83 Ark. 149, 103 S. W. 166, 11 L. R. A. N. See also infra, note 14.

Co., 130 Iowa 157, 106 N. "The central idea, the true, comprehensive and undivided meaning of the term 'party-wall' . . . would seem to be that of 'mutuality of benefit.'" Harbor v. Evans, 101

A wall may be a party-wall as to a portion of its height, and cease to be a party-wall for the rest of its height.[8]

C. Statutory Provisions in General. In many jurisdictions there are statutes regulating the construction of and the rights of adjacent owners in party-walls.[9] Some of the statutes confer the power upon municipalities to regulate these rights by ordinances.[10] Such statutes are sustainable on the principles of the police power, and that equality is equity, and are governed by the strict letter of the statutes providing therefor.[11]

II. CREATION AND EXISTENCE OF RIGHT.

A. In General. In the legal sense of the term a party-wall can only exist in two ways — by contract[12] or statute.[13] The common law creates no such right.[14] agreement for the construction of a party-wall has been executed by one of the parties.[18]

C. Use or Acquiescence in Use. The use of a division wall by an adjoining owner, or his acquiescence in the erection or use thereof by the other adjoining owner, may estop him from denying that such wall is a party-wall.[19]

D. Prescription. A right to a party-wall may arise by prescription, and where a wall between adjoining houses has for a prescriptive period, usually twenty years, been used as a party-wall by their respective owners, such wall becomes a party-wall, within the legal meaning of the term, at least to the extent of the user, made thereof.[20]

Lukens v. Lasher, 202 Pa. St. 327, 51 Atl. 887.

Secret user.—A preliminary injunction to restrain the taking down of an alleged party-wall will not be sustained, where it appears that the wall was entirely on the land of defendant, and where, there being no express grant, the easement or right of plaintiff to have the wall maintained as a party-wall must depend solely upon prescription based upon a user invisible to and unknown by the owner who was a successor in the title after the alleged imposition of the easement. Schafer v. Baker, 16 App. Cas. (D. C.) 213. Where two houses were built by the same person at different times, and the wall of the house first built was used to support the house afterward built, the allotment of the house first built and the ground on which it stood to one of the heirs of the original owner passed the title to the entire wall, giving to the heir to whom the other house was allotted only a right to the use of the wall as a support for his house; and that the fact that the second house was built a story higher than the first, and that the upper story was made to rest on and extend over the wall of the first house, did not change the location of the original division line or affect the title of the wall originally constructed. Smith v. Martin, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 442. Where the vendor of a lot, carved out of a larger lot owned by him, conveyed by metes and bounds in such a way as to include a strip fourteen inches wide

F. Statutory Provisions. Some statutes expressly authorize every owner of land adjoining a wall to make it a party-wall, by reimbursing the owner of the wall one half of its value, and one half of the value of the soil upon which the wall is built, where the foundation of the wall is laid entirely upon the estate of the builder thereof.[23] In some jurisdictions, by express provision of statute, every separating wall between buildings is, as high as the upper part of the first story, presumed to be a wall in common, in the absence of proof to the contrary.[24]

III. TERMINATION OF RIGHT.

A. Duration of Easement. The general rule is, that where the right to use a party-wall is perfected, it is not lost by any number of years' omission to use it.[25] Where the occupants of adjoining lots, who erect a party-wall for mutual support, are merely tenants for a term of years, the easement continues only during the term common to both, and does not constitute a charge upon the reversion, either against the reversioners or their grantees.[26]

B. Destruction or Decay of Wall. The casement of support by means of the common party-wall, which belongs to adjoining buildings, ceases with the state of things which created it, when the wall is accidentally destroyed, or is so much decayed as to require rebuilding from the foundation.[27]

occupied by the foundation of his house on the portion of the lot retained, without any express reservation of an easement for the support of such wall, and it was held that no such easement could be subsequently asserted by the purchaser against the grantee of the remaining portion of the lot. Sloat v. McDougal, 9 N. Y. Suppl. 631. The owner of two lots executed deeds for the same to two separate parties. One deed provided that, if the building erected on the lot was over twenty-five feet in width and extended over the line of the other lot, the wall so extending over such line should be held a party-wall, so that the grantee in the deed should not be compelled to take it down "past his own pleasure." The deed to the second lot provided that, if the building erected on the adjoining lot should extend over the line of the lot and on to the lot conveyed by the second deed, the wall should be held to be a party-wall between the lot conveyed by such second deed and the adjoining landowner, so that such landowner should not be compelled to take down said wall "past his own pleasure." It was held not to constitute an agreement between the respective vendees and their successors in title that the wall then existing should remain a party-wall, not to be taken down except at the pleasure of the grantee of the first lot or those claiming under him. Heron v. Houston, 217 Pa. St. 4, 66 Atl. 109. The vendor of a building of which the wall is in the condition of a party-wall may reserve the right of the party-wall himself. This right to a common wall applies to the eventual rights of the vendor or his representatives in either of two alternatives; that is, to make the wall common without payment of the compensation provided by art. 518 C. C., should he acquire the adjoining premises, or to recover such compensation from the owner of such adjoining premises making it a party-wall. Duperrault v. Roy, 28 Quebec Super. Ct. 519.

23. Bryant v. Sholars, 104 La. 786, 29 So. 350, holding, however, that the statute applies only to walls properly so called, and hence does not apply to the side of a wooden building.

25. Beaver v. Nutter, 32 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 179 (holding that where the owner erected a wall partly on his own lot and partly on the lot adjoining, and he then purchased the adjoining lot, and sold the first lot to defendant, defendant's property was burdened with an easement for the support of the party-wall, the owner's unity of title suspending, but not extinguishing, the easement); Roudet v. Bedell, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 366. See also Ribet v. Howard, 109 La. 113, 33 So. 103, holding that where a wall of a brick house rests partly on two city lots, as walls in common are usually constructed, but there is no evidence as to when or by whom the house was built, or by whom the wall was paid for, it will not be assumed that the owner of the lot adjoining that on which the house stands has forfeited his right to make such a wall in common, or that the same is barred by prescription.

Agreement as to length of use.— The provision in a party-wall agreement that the rights of the parties shall continue "so long as the wall shall stand" does not mean so long as any portion of the wall itself shall remain, but so long as the wall shall remain fit for use as a party-wall, and therefore it does not violate a provision in the agreement that "no perpetual right or easement shall be thereby acquired." IV. RIGHTS, DUTIES, AND LIABILITIES OF ADJOINING OWNERS.

A. With Respect to Building and Construction — 1. In General. In the absence of agreement, or statutory provision imposing such duty, there is no legal obligation upon the owners of adjoining lots in a city to unite in building a party-wall on the dividing line of such lots.[28]

2. Manner of Construction — a. In General. While it is the duty of one erecting a party-wall to make it of sufficient strength to support another building similar to the one of which it forms a part,[29] yet he is not bound to make it strong enough to support any kind of a building which may be erected by the adjoining proprietor.[30]

b. Statutory and Municipal Provisions. Statutes and ordinances enacted in pursuance thereof may, and usually do, prescribe the character of the wall, the material to be used in its construction,[31] and the minimum and maximum dimensions thereof.[32]

Atl. 786 (holding that the right to use a party-wall which does not involve any interest in the soil apart from the building is extinguished by the destruction of the building); Hoffman v. Kuhn, 57 Miss. 746, 34 Am. Rep. 491; Heartt v. Kruger, 121 N. Y. 386, 24 N. E. 841, 18 Am. St. Rep. 829, 9 L. R. A. 135 [affirming 56 N. Y. Super. Ct. 382, 5 N. Y. Suppl. 192]; Partridge v. Gilbert, 15 N. Y. 601, 69 Am. Y.) 334, 8 Am. Dec. 570, 6 Johns. Ch. 21]. See infra, IV, B, 1, c.

However, there is authority for the doctrine that an easement in a party-wall between adjoining buildings, although suspended by the destruction of the buildings by accidental cause, is revived by the reconstruction of the buildings, including the party-wall, as they originally existed. Douglass v. Coonley, 156 N. Y. 521, 51 N. E. 283, 66 Am. St. Rep. 580 [reversing 84 Hun 158, 32 N. Y. Suppl. 444], in which case both parties united in the reconstruction of the buildings and party-wall.

Abandonment.— Where one owning an easement in a wall which forms a side of his building, after the destruction of the wall and building, erects a new building on a different foundation, he thereby abandons and extinguishes the easement. Duncan v. Rodecker, 90 Wis. 1, 62 N. W. 533.

Partial destruction.— If a party-wall is built partly on the land of an adjoining owner, its partial destruction and weakening by fire do not divest the builder of his interest in the land of such adjoining owner so as to render the latter the sole owner of that part of the wall standing on his land, and make him liable for its dangerous condition. Code, art. 671.

Code, art. 675, that the wall in common should be built in stone or brick, applies only to the wall and its foundation proper, and does not forbid the use of heavy timbers to make a firm and smooth basis on which to build the brick foundation, any more than it would apply to wooden piles driven for the same purpose); Duncan v. Labouisse, 9 La. Ann. 49; Vollmer's Appeal, 61 Pa. St. 118; Kraft v. Stott, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,929, 1 Hayw. & H. 33 (holding that under the building regulations of Washington, D. C., Oct. 17, 1791, there is no right to build a party-wall for a brick house when there is already a frame building on the adjoining lot); Reg. v. Copp, 17 Ont. 738 (holding that Ont. Rev. St. c. 184, § 496, subs. 10, does not apply to internal walls separating buildings belonging to the same owner, for to constitute party-walls they should separate the adjoining property of different owners, and therefore the municipal councils have no power to prescribe of what material such internal walls should be).

Acquiescence by the owner of a lot in the construction of a party-wall estops him and any one claiming under him from objecting, after its completion, to the method by which, or the materials with which, it was constructed. Code, art. 675, restricting the right of one co-proprietor to rest a wall on more than nine inches of the land of his neighbor, applies to the wall itself and not to its foundation which in New Orleans must

3. Right to Use Adjoining Land — a. In General. In the absence of statutory regulations, each party must build his wall upon his own land, unless he makes an agreement with the adjoining owner to build one half upon the land of the latter.[33] In many jurisdictions, however, the statutes give the right to the owner of a lot to build his party-wall partly on the land of the adjoining owner, under certain specified restrictions.[34]

b. Remedy For Encroachment. Where a party-wall encroaches on the property of an adjoining owner, but the latter allows the building to be completed without complaint, he is guilty of laches, and an injunction will not lie in his favor, but he will be left to his remedy at law.[35]

B. With Respect to Destruction, Rebuilding, Additions, and Alterations — 1. For Destruction and Rebuilding[36] — a. In General. Where a party has gained an easement in a party-wall, by prescription or otherwise,[37] the adjoining landowner has no right to destroy or remove such wall, or to so deal with it as to render it insufficient for the support of the former's building, or to impair his easement therein, without his consent.[38]

W. 192 (holding, however, that the Iowa statute does not authorize the erection of such a wall where the wall, if erected, will destroy a stairway on the adjoining land, since the expression "wall on the line" refers, not merely to the actual wall of a building, but to any part of a building); Carrigan v. De Neufbourg, 3 La. Ann. 440 (holding that Civ. Code, art. 671, which gives a right to the owner who first builds to rest half of his wall on the land of his neighbor, establishes a servitude on urban property, without reference to title or the agreement of parties); Larche v. Jackson, 9 Mart. b. Dangerous or Insufficient Wall — (i) In General. In many jurisdictions the right of an adjoining owner to take down an insufficient party-wall and replace it by one strong enough to support the building which he is about to erect is well recognized.[39] The coöwner, however, it seems, is entitled, under such circumstances, to reimbursement for the necessary expenses incurred by him in protecting his property during the change.[40]

(ii) Upon Due Notice to Adjoining Owner. Where a party-wall between two buildings is so much dilapidated as to be dangerous to life or property, the owner of one estate, upon giving reasonable notice to the owner of the other, may tear down and rebuild the wall; and if he uses proper skill and makes no unnecessary delay, he is not answerable to the occupant of the adjoining building for injury to the building or its contents caused by the weather or otherwise.[41]

Suppl. 848, holding that one of the adjoining owners of a party-wall, who desires to erect a new building, requiring a deeper foundation than his own building, has no right, against the objection of the other owner, to tear down the party-wall, and rebuild it, merely because so doing would render it more convenient and less expensive for him in putting in the foundation for his new building, where such wall is not dilapidated, and affords a sufficient support for his present building, as well as for the building of the other owner. At common law no action lies against a tenant in common for pulling down a party-wall for the purpose of building a new one or for repairing the wall or for replacing an old foundation by a new one even without notice to the adjoining owner. In such case there is no destruction or destructive waste.

(III) When Wall Condemned. An owner of a party-wall may be compelled to remove it, where it has been condemned by proper authority.[42]

c. Wall Accidentally Destroyed. In the absence of express agreement, where a party-wall is destroyed by accidental cause, there is no implied agreement or legal obligation on the part of adjoining owners to contribute toward rebuilding it.[43]

2. Additions and Alterations — a. In General. The law seems to be well settled that where there is a party-wall, each of the owners may, within the limits of his own lot, increase the height, length, or thickness thereof, when it can be done without injury to the adjoining building, and without impairing the value of the cross easements to which the adjoining proprietor is entitled.[44] However, one owner cannot so alter the wall as to thereby injure or destroy the adjoining owner's easement therein.[45]

alterations to party-walls are to be liberally construed in favor of the grantee, and not according to the literal construction of the agreement.[47]

3. INJURIES OCCASIONED[47a] — a. In General. The owner of a party-wall, it has been held, is absolutely responsible to his coöwner for any damage which the change by reason of an addition or alteration occasions when not required for purposes of repair.[48]

b. Injunction. On the ground of preventing a continuing injury the wrongful erection of an additional story to a party-wall has been enjoined,[49] as has the destruction of a party-wall which supported the roof of complainant's house;[50] but an injunction has been refused where the injury could be compensated in damages.[51]

The central idea, the true comprehensive and undivided meaning of the term "party-wall," when used in an agreement by the owners of adjoining lots of land, providing that one may build a wall resting one half on each lot, and that the other shall have the right to use it on payment of one half of its value, is that of mutuality of benefit

2. CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACTS GOVERNING.[56] In the case of an express grant, the fact of the creation of the easement, as well as its nature and extent, is to be determined by the language of the instrument, taken in connection with the circumstances existing at the time of making it.[57]

3. FLUES IN WALL. The general rule is that a party-wall may be used by the adjoining owners, for whose benefit it was created, for the construction therein of fireplaces and flues.[58]

adjoining owner pays one half of the cost of a wall erected partly on his premises, it is not a party-wall, and the builder can open or shut apertures therein at his pleasure,[63] subject only to police regulations, since in so doing he exercises a right of property, and not a right of servitude.[64] So too it has been held that under statutes regulating the erection of party-walls, such walls may be constructed with windows or openings in them[65] in the absence of express prohibitory clauses in such statutes.[66]

5. Land in Front of Wall. The land lying in front of a party-wall, between that and the line of the street, is to be exclusively enjoyed by its owners, free from any burden or easement growing out of a simple party-wall agreement, or created by statute, and is to be occupied by the adjoining owners according to the boundary lines of their lots for the construction of their fronts.[67]

D. Contribution and Compensation — 1. For Cost of Erection and Use — a. In General. While parties may stipulate by agreement to pay each one half of the cost of building a party-wall,[68] the mere building of a party-wall gives no claim for contribution from the owner of the adjoining lot, in the absence of any express agreement between the parties or of use of the wall by such adjoining owner.[69] It has been held that an agreement between adjoining owners that one of them is to construct a party-wall on the division line and that the other is to pay one half of the cost when he utilizes it is binding on the parties and creates an equitable lien on the land of the other owner in favor of the one constructing the wall.[70]

Where wall is not a party-wall.—An owner of land has the right to place windows and doors in a wall overlooking the land of his neighbor, if the wall is not a party-wall but is wholly on the former's land and the neighbor has no remedy for the overlooking of his privacy, if he is not guarded therein by deed or contract, except to build on his land opposite the offensive windows and doors. b. Use of Wall as Fixing Liability — (i) In General. A proprietor of land has no right to avail himself of a division wall built by an adjacent proprietor before paying his proportionate share of the cost of its erection,[71] for until he pays his share of the cost the wall is not one in common, but the exclusive property of the builder;[72] but where he does make use of such wall the party first building may recover one-half the cost of construction of the wall thus used in common,[73] or a moiety of the charge of such part of the wall as he shall use.[74]

(II) What Constitutes Use. Under an agreement of an adjoining owner to pay for the use of a party-wall whenever he should thereafter use it, the wall cannot be said to be used until the erection of an adjoining building and the appropriation thereby of so much of the wall as was intended to be used.[75] To make an adjoining owner liable for the use of a party-wall he must actually use the party-wall, mere passive benefit not being sufficient to charge him.[76]

2. FOR COST OF REPAIRS, ALTERATIONS, ETC. The same rules seem to apply to the apportionment of the cost of repairs, alterations, and the like to party-walls as to the cost of their original erection;[79] and where one party has borne the whole cost an adjoining owner is liable for his share thereof as soon as he takes advantage of the wall in its repaired or altered condition.[80]

E. Injuries Incident to Construction, Alteration, or Removal[80a]— 1. IN GENERAL. One of two joint owners of a party-wall is answerable to the other for any damages resulting from his interference with the wall where the necessary precautions are not taken to avoid injury.[81] However, since, if in the lawful use of one's property, injury is occasioned to an adjacent owner, which the exercise of due care could not have prevented, there is no remedy, a part-owner of a party-wall is not liable to an adjoining owner for damage to his property caused by the lawful use of such wall.[82]

2. TEARING DOWN OR REPAIRING — a. In General. Some of the authorities broadly state the rule that a part-owner of a party-wall is liable to an adjoining owner for all damages caused by making repairs to or demolishing and rebuilding such wall;[83] while others hold that he is only liable where the work is done in a cision as to the value of the wall by regulators, as provided for in the act of March 6, 1820. See also Hileman v. Hoyt, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 533.

careless or negligent manner,[84] and that, where the adjoining owner refuses or neglects to join in the expense of repairing or rebuilding a dangerous wall, he cannot maintain an action for the inconvenience or damages occasioned thereby, where the work is done with due care and despatch.[85]

b. Failure to Tear Down or Repair. A part-owner of a party-wall who negligently permits it to stand after its partial destruction and weakening by fire is liable to another part-owner who is using part of the wall for damages resulting to the latter from a falling of another portion of the wall in which he has no interest and is not using.[86] The builder of a party-wall, under a contract that he shall be the owner of such wall until the other party to the contract makes payment therefor, is liable for damages for failure to maintain it in a safe condition.[87]

V. RIGHTS, DUTIES, AND LIABILITIES OF PURCHASER.[88]

A. Independent of Covenant or Agreement — 1. IN GENERAL. As has already been stated, the rule is that where, after erecting a party-wall between two lots, the owner sells one lot, such conveyance, unless there is an express reservation to the contrary in the conveyance, conveys to the purchaser the right to use the party-wall.[89] One who buys land bounded by a party-wall, in ignorance that his vendor has not paid his share of the cost of the wall, does not acquire the right to use the wall.[90]

2. RIGHT TO COMPENSATION. Under statutes giving to the builder of a party-wall, located partly upon an adjoining lot, the right to compensation for half the cost of so much thereof as the adjoining owner shall thereafter use, the purchaser of the lot from the builder of the wall is entitled to such compensation and not his vendor.[91]

Easements by prescription.— Where an adjoining owner obtains by prescription an easement for the support of his building on his neighbor's wall, such easement becomes appurtenant to his estate, and passes to his grantee. Barry v. Edlavitch, 84 Md. 95, 35 Atl. 170, 33 L. R. A. 294.

Where grantor was not liable.— In Eckleman v. Miller, 57 Ind. 88, it was held that such use of the party-wall by the grantee will not bind the grantor, in the absence of special agreement on the grantor's part to bear his share of the cost of its erection.

91. Halpine v. Barr, 21 D. C. 331; Thomson v. Curtis, 28 Iowa 229; Hunt v. Ambruster, 17 N. J. Eq. 208.

The Pennsylvania act of April 10, 1849 (Pamphl. Laws (1849), p. 600), provides that in all conveyances of houses and buildings the right to compensation for party-walls passes to the purchaser, unless otherwise expressed. It has been held, however, that a conveyance made before the passage of this act, and containing no express conveyance of the right to compensation for a party-wall, did not pass such right to the vendee. Voight v. Wallace, 179 Pa. St. 520, 36 Atl. 315; Bell v. Bronson, 17 Pa. St. 363; Dannaker v. Riley, 14 Pa. St. 435. See Lea v. Jones, 209 Pa. St. 22, 57 Atl. 1113, holding that this act makes the right to compensation pass with the land and vest in the owner at the time of such use, and where such right has actually vested it does not pass by a subsequent conveyance.

3. LIABILITY FOR COST OF REBUILDING. In some jurisdictions the rule is that where a party-wall becomes so ruinous that it is necessary to rebuild it the expense of tearing it down and rebuilding is an equitable charge on the wall, which will bind the purchaser to contribute one-half the expense thereof.[92]

4. RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES BETWEEN GRANTOR AND GRANTEE — a. In General. An easement in a party-wall may be granted in fee, so that the grantee cannot be disturbed by ejectment, or otherwise, in his enjoyment of it.[93]

b. Recovery For Breach of Covenant Against Encumbrances.[94] While the right of an adjoining owner to use a party-wall does not constitute such an encumbrance upon the premises, or defect in the title thereof, as will relieve the vendee from his contract for purchase thereof,[95] a mutual easement of adjoining proprietors in a party-wall being a benefit and not a burden,[96] where a vacant lot supports the half of the wall of the building erected on an adjoining lot, and a purchaser of the vacant lot is bound by the terms of a party-wall agreement entered into between his grantor and the adjoining owner to pay half of the cost of such wall in order to use the same, it is held that the purchaser may sue for a breach of the covenant against encumbrances.[97] So too the existence of a party-wall wholly on one of two adjacent lots of land, yet subject to the right of enjoyment by the owner of the other, constitutes an encumbrance, and is a breach of the covenant against encumbrances.[98]

B. Covenants and Agreements as to Party-Walls as Affecting Purchasers[99] — 1. CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION IN GENERAL. Where by a party-wall agreement one party agrees to erect the wall, and the adjoining owner agrees that whenever he or any one claiming under him shall make use of such wall he will pay to the builder his proportionate share of the cost of its erection, a subsequent purchaser of the adjoining land, by whom the wall is used, with full notice[1] of the builder's rights, cannot avail himself of the use of the wall without compliance with the terms under which it was built.[2]

92. Campbell v. Mesier, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 21. See, however, Davis v. Marshall, 9 La. Ann. 480, holding that where one buys after the reconstruction of a party-wall which neither he nor his vendor is shown to have used, unless he has personally undertaken to pay half the cost, he is not bound to do so.

In Iowa, however, where the statute gives the right to rest half of the wall upon the contiguous lot and requires the owner of the vacant lot to pay his proportionate share of the expense of the wall before he enters upon its enjoyment, the purchaser of the vacant lot cannot maintain an action for breach of a covenant against encumbrances. Y.) 297, where L, plaintiff, owned a lot in fee, and C held a contract for the adjoining lot. L erected a building upon his lot, and, by agreement with C, placed half of the partition wall on C's lot. When C built upon his lot, he and those deriving title under him were to pay L half the cost of the wall. C sold his interest to W, who obtained a deed from the owner of the fee. W then conveyed the lot to B, defendant, allowing him a deduction of one hundred dollars from the purchase-money, on account of the liability to L for half the wall. The deed to B

2. Covenants and Agreements Personal or Running With the Land. Upon the question as to whether the assigns of the builder of a party-wall can recover on a covenant for contribution, and whether the assignee of the covenantor is liable on such covenant, there is a conflict of opinion which it is difficult to reconcile.[3] However, according to the seeming weight of authority, the right to reimbursement for the use of a party-wall under an agreement with an adjoining owner is personal, and does not run with the land, so as to inure to the benefit of the assignee of the covenantee;[4] although in some jurisdictions, in the absence of contract and stipulations to the contrary,[5] it is held that the covenants of party-wall contracts do run with the land, and that all their benefits and burdens — the liability to perform and the right to take advantage of them — both pass to the heir or assignee of the land to which the covenant is attached.[6] Upon the second part of the question, namely, as to whether an agreement whereby the builder of a party-wall is to be paid for the use thereof by an adjoining owner is a covenant running with the land, so as to bind the assigns of the adjoining owner, there is contained this clause: "The above conveyance is executed, subject to the wall now standing on the north line of said lot, the party of the second part assuming all liability under or by reason of any contract now existing in respect to said wall." B erected a building on his lot, using the partition wall. It was held that this was not an agreement in terms to pay L, or to pay for the wall or any part of it, but was simply an undertaking to assume W's liability. The parties thereto intended only to limit W's covenant, and to save him harmless from all personal liability. See also Houghton v. Mendenhall, 50 Minn. 40, 52 N. W. 269; and cases cited infra, note 13. See, however, Joy v. Boston Penny Sav. Bank, 115 Mass. 60, holding that a contract not under seal between adjacent landowners that one shall build a division wall, half on the land of each, and the other pay half the expense, gives the builder no interest in the land of the other, enforceable by the builder or his grantee in a suit at law. Compare Lincoln v. Burrage, 177 Mass. 378, 59 N. an even greater conflict of authority, the decisions not even harmonizing in the same jurisdiction. There is weighty authority for the rule that such an agreement is a covenant running with the land,[7] some of the decisions being based on the ground that the burden of the agreement runs with the land,[8] and others seemingly upon the clearly expressed intention of the parties to the agreement to bind the assigns of the covenantor;[9] nevertheless there is eminent authority to the effect that such covenants are not in the nature of covenants running with the land, but purely personal, and that the right to exact payment does not pass to the grantee of the one, and the obligation to pay does not rest upon the grantee of the other;[10] and yet even in jurisdictions where the latter rule obtains there are decisions to the effect that where a party-wall agreement expressly provides that the covenants thereof shall run with the land, it will be construed as running with and charging the land, the effect of the covenant being to grant or create an interest in the premises.[11] In at least one jurisdiction there are decisions drawing a distinction between the benefit and burden of the agreement, and holding that the former is purely personal, while the latter concerns the land and runs with it.[12]

3. Notice of Party-Wall Agreement — a. Operation and Effect. Where the owner of land builds a wall under an agreement with an adjoining owner that the latter shall, on using any part of the wall, pay proportionately therefor, a purchaser with notice from such adjoining owner will be liable for any part of such wall used by him.[13] However, to affect a purchaser of property with notice of an easement in favor of an adjoining owner, the easement must be obvious and apparent to any observer. An apparent sign of servitude must exist on the premises purchased, in favor of the adjoining owner, or, as expressed by some of the authorities, the marks of the burden must be open and visible.[14]

b. Record as Notice. In some jurisdictions the proper registration of a party-wall agreement is notice to all purchasers of the real estate affected by the agreement.[15]

VI. ACTIONS.

A. Nature and Form. An action at law is the proper remedy to recover of an adjoining owner, who uses a party-wall, his proportion of the cost of such wall.[16] Ejectment will lie by an adjoining owner for encroachment of a party-wall on his lot.[17] At common law no action lies for opening windows lawfully in party-walls, although the privacy of the adjoining premises is thereby destroyed;[18] but a party to a party-wall agreement is entitled to the intervention of equity to restrain its violation by the other party's replacing the original wall by one in which numerous openings occur, and is not remitted to an action at law for damages.[19]

B. Defenses. It is no defense to an action to recover from an adjoining owner, under a party-wall agreement, his share of the cost of the wall, that it was not constructed in precise accordance with the agreement, where defendant has used the wall without objection thereto;[20] nor that before defendant used the wall it was partially impaired by fire;[21] nor that plaintiff or his assignor had not

A. 462 (holding that one who builds a party-wall partly on the land of a neighbor on the latter's express promise to pay one half of the expense thereof when he shall use it may recover upon the promise at common law); Walker v. Stetson, 162 Mass. 86, 38 N. Y. 684 (holding, however, that where an adjoining owner agreed to pay for the use of the party-wall when used, an action for contribution brought against such adjoining owner's grantee is prematurely brought if there has been no building erected on the adjoining property); Rindge v. Baker, 57 N. Y. 209, 15 Am. Rep. 475 (holding that where, under a parol agreement between two adjoining proprietors to jointly build a party-wall, one half on the premises of each, the parties have gone on and built a portion of the wall, one party, who has prepared his materials and planned his building in view of and relying upon the performance of the contract, upon the refusal of the other to proceed, is not limited to an action for specific performance, but may, after notice to the other, complete the wall and recover of the other one-half the expense). See Mulligan v. Fitzpatrick, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 179, holding that under the building laws of the city of Philadelphia, affording a person interested in a party-wall relief in case of its defective construction, by application to the building inspectors, a court of equity has no jurisdiction to compel the removal of the wall.

Condition precedent to action.—Under Iowa Code (1873), § 2020, providing that if a party refuse to contribute to the erection of a party-wall he shall have the "right of making it a wall in common by paying to the person who built it one half of the appraised value of the wall before using it," it is not necessary, before bringing an action for half the cost of the wall which defendant has used as a party-wall without permission, that the value should be ascertained by appraisal. Dismissal of a bill to restore a party-wall was held to be proper, where it appeared that the injury to the party-wall was caused by an independent contractor of defendant, contrary to the stipulation in the building contract, encroaching on plaintiff's property, and that plaintiff has a full legal remedy, and that he delayed for months, until the alleged injury was completed, and that the removal was of a part of the wall which was in no way necessary to the security of plaintiff's property. Wakeling v. Cocker, 208 Pa. St. 651, 57 Atl. 1104.

20. Warner v. Rogers, 23 Minn. 34; Oakes v. Senneff, 4 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 413, holding that where one has made use of a party-wall without paying the compensation therefor, he cannot afterward avail himself of the non-compliance with the law regulating party-walls, as a defense in equity against the payment of said compensation properly assessed.

21. Thornton v. Royce, 56 Mo. App. 179, holding that defendant's contract was to pay for half the cost of the wall, and not half of its value at the time he used it.

actually paid for the construction of the wall;[22] and in such action defendant has no interest to question plaintiff's title further than to ascertain whether the claim demanded can safely be paid to the claimant.[23] In an action for damages for tearing down a party-wall, contributory negligence is no defense, such action not being based upon negligence.[24] But the fact that defendant parted with the ownership of the adjoining lot before use of the wall is a matter of defense.[25] Likewise the statute of limitations is a good defense to an action to compel payment by way of contribution for the building,[26] or compensation for the use of a party-wall.[27]

C. Pleading[28] and Parties.[29] Where suit is brought against an adjoining owner for infringement of the right to support a party-wall, the fact that plaintiff in his complaint charged negligence in the making of the excavation which affected the wall's condition will not change the nature of the action.[30] In an action to enjoin defendants from using a certain wall as a party-wall, an answer alleging that said wall rested in part on defendant's land sufficiently raises the issue as to whether plaintiff's building extended over the dividing line.[31] A supplemental answer need not be filed setting up the facts that defendant has closed the openings in the party-walls, where at the trial it appears that he offered to close up the openings; it being presumed that he had closed them before the trial.[32] Where the claim for reimbursement for the moiety of the cost of a party-wall is personal, suit therefor should be brought in the name of the original owner, and not in the name of the purchaser.[33] Where the party entitled to recover is dead, his executor or administrator is the proper party plaintiff.[34]

D. Evidence.[35] In the absence of any showing to the contrary, an old wall from long usage may be presumed to be a party-wall, either from some agreement to that effect, or from its being built upon the line of the two lots for that purpose by the respective owners.[36] Where a half wall rests upon a vacant lot, the presumption is that it belongs to the owner of the contiguous lot whereon rests the main building; otherwise, however, if such half wall has been used by the erection of a building supported therein on the lot vacant when the other half

22. Watkins v. Glas, 5 Cal. App. 68, 89 Pac. 840, holding that under an agreement that on the erection of a party-wall by either of two adjoining owners the other owner would pay half the cost of the wall, an action lay by the assignees of the owner building the wall against the other to recover one-half the cost, even though the party building the wall had not paid for the construction thereof.

23. Irwin v. Peterson, 25 La. Ann. 300. See McCourt v. McCabe, 46 Wis. 596, 1 N. W. 192, where a party-wall agreement provided that one party should construct the same, and the other, on paying his share, should receive a bill of sale for one half thereof, and it was held, in an action on an award made on submission of the question of how much should be paid therefor, that the bill of sale was not necessary to pass title to the half of the wall standing on defendant's land, and that his only objection to paying the award having been that it was excessive, he could not set up as a defense that the deed had not been tendered.

27. Pier v. Salot, 134 Iowa 357, 111 N. W. 989, (1906) 107 N. W. 420, holding that the fact that a party, in beginning an action against the adjacent owner to enjoin him from closing a chimney in a party-wall, held to the theory that his use of the wall was not such as to render him liable under the party-wall statute for any part of the value thereof, does not affect his right to rely on the statute of limitations as against defendant's claim to compel plaintiff to pay for a part of the value of the wall.

wall was built.[37] In an action to recover the value of a party-wall erected by plaintiff partly on defendant's land, no express agreement as to payment being shown, the jury may infer a promise to pay, if plaintiff undertook and completed the wall with the expectation that defendant would pay for it, and defendant had reason to know that plaintiff was so acting with that expectation, and allowed him so to act without objection.[38] In an action on a party-wall agreement, the rules as to the admissibility of evidence[39] and burden of proof[40] are the same as those governing actions on contracts generally.

E. Trial — 1. In General.[41] Questions of procedure on the trial of actions relating to party-walls, such as the giving of instructions,[42] the verdict and findings,[43] and the decree[44] are governed by the rules applicable to the trial of civil actions generally.

39. See CONTRACTS, 9 Cyc. 747 et seq. And see Watkins v. Glas, 5 Cal. App. 68, 89 Pac. 840 (holding that in an action for contribution under a party-wall agreement, the contract between the owner building the wall and the contractors, specifying the extent of the work to be done and showing that under its terms the contractors were to erect the wall in question, was admissible in evidence); Simonds v. Shields, 72 Conn. 141, 44 Atl. 29 (where defendants introduced, as authority for inserting timbers into plaintiff's wall, a deed granting them the right to build against or upon his wall. Plaintiff offered in evidence a deed whereby defendants reserved the right to build on the foundation of plaintiff's wall, and also offered witnesses to prove that this foundation projected beyond the wall, and it was held that this deed and testimony were admissible, as bearing upon the construction of the deed from plaintiff); Price v. Lien, 84 Iowa 590, 51 N. W. 52 (holding that an oral agreement for the erection of a wall on the line between two owners is a special agreement, within the meaning of section 2030 of the code, providing that no evidence of such agreement shall be competent unless it be in writing, etc.); Wickersham v. Orr, 9 Iowa 253, 74 Am. Dec. 348 (holding that it was harmless error to admit parol evidence of the terms on which a person had permission to use a party-wall, where they in nowise differed from the contract which the law would enforce in their absence); Hammann v. Jordan, 129 N. Y. 61, 29 N. E. 294 [reversing 59 N. Y. Super. Ct. 91, 13 N. Y. Suppl. 228] (holding that in an action to recover half the price of a party-wall built by plaintiff under a contract that defendant, when he used the wall, was to pay for half of it, where the objection is made that the wall was improperly built, in that it contained flues which encroached two inches on defendant's portion of the wall, it is proper to ask an architect whether it was customary to build flues in party-walls).

40. Watkins v. Glas, 5 Cal. App. 68, 89 Pac. 840, holding that in an action for contribution under a party-wall agreement providing that the cost of the wall should be fixed by an architect, the burden was on defendants to show any error or mistake in the appraisement made by the architect prejudicial to them.

41. Trial generally see TRIAL.

42. Instructions generally see TRIAL. See also Waller v. Lasher, 37 Ill. App. 609, where plaintiff and defendant were adjoining proprietors, the north wall of plaintiff's house being a party-wall, the agreement providing for the use of the same by defendant after paying one half of the value thereof. In an action for injuries to plaintiff's house caused by defendant cutting into such wall, defendant not having paid the half value thereof, there was evidence of a license to use such wall, and it was held that it was error to instruct the jury that defendant was liable for the damages necessarily resulting from defendant's making use of the wall, as in case of a license the agreement was a good defense.

43. Verdict or findings generally see TRIAL. See also Tate v. Fratt, 112 Cal. 613, 44 Pac. 1061 (holding that where it was the original purpose of defendant to construct openings in the wall erected by him upon the party-wall, but where, in the answer to a complaint seeking to enjoin its erection there is an offer to close up the openings, a finding that the new wall is solid and has no openings will be sustained when there is no specification of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings); Nalle v. Paggi, (Tex. 1888) 9 S. W. 205, 1 L. R. A. 33 (holding that in an action on an agreement to pay half the cost of a party-wall, it is not error for the court to fail to find whether the advantage gained by plaintiff in space was greater than the benefit derived by defendant from the wall, the benefits accruing to each owner being necessarily the same).

44. Judgment or decree generally see EQUITY; JUDGMENTS. See also Springer v. Darlington, 207 Ill. 238, 69 N. E. 946 (holding that a decree in an injunction suit to restrain the violation of a party-wall agreement, which enjoins defendant from maintaining openings in the wall as reconstructed by him, and from interfering with the complainant in closing them up, is not objectionable as wrongfully depriving defendant of the possession of his property); Pier v. Salot, 134 Iowa 357, 111 N. 2. Questions For Jury. In an action on a party-wall agreement, the questions as to whether a slight encroachment by the flues was a substantial defect in the construction, and whether it prevented defendant from using the wall in the same way that plaintiff might,[45] and where it is alleged by defendant that the wall is not upon the division line, the question whether defendant, by accepting and using the wall with full knowledge, has precluded himself from claiming damages therefor on his counter-claim,[46] are for the jury, under proper instructions.

of plaintiff's building was built against a party-wall in such a way as to form a gutter liable to become out of repair, to the injury of defendant, the decree settling the rights of the parties should require plaintiff to keep the gutter in repair, and clear of accumulations of ice, snow, or other materials likely to cause water to overflow and soak into and through the wall); Mott v. Oppenheimer, 135 N. Y. 312, 31 N. E. 1097, 17 L. R. A. 409 (where, in an action to restrain defendant from using a party-wall except on payment of half its cost, and for such other relief as might seem just, it appearing that relief by way of injunction was not proper, but that plaintiff was entitled to such amount, and that defendant's premises were charged therewith, it was held proper to decree that unless payments be made the premises should be sold therefor); Campbell v. Mesier, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 21 (where, in a suit for contribution for the expense of erecting a party-wall, it was admitted between one of defendants and his vendor that the latter was to indemnify him against any claim of plaintiff for the expense of such wall. Both the vendor and purchaser were parties defendant, and it was held that a decree directing the vendor to pay the moiety of the expense of the wall with interest, and dismissing the bill as to the purchaser without costs, was proper).

I. NATURE OF PATENTS.

A. In General — 1. GRANT. A patent for an invention is a grant by the state to the inventor, his heirs or assigns, of the exclusive right to make, use, and vend the thing patented for a definite period of time.[1] The inventor has a natural right to make, use, and vend his invention, and therefore the patent confers upon him no right save the right to exclude others from making, using, or selling his invention.[2]

2. NO COMMON-LAW RIGHT. At common law the inventor has no right to prevent others from using his invention,[3] but he may keep it secret and in that way deprive the public of its benefits.

1. U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 4884 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3381].

Other definitions are: "A grant made by the government to an inventor, conveying and securing to him the exclusive right to make and sell his invention for a term of years." Black L. Dict.

"Public franchises granted to the inventors of new and useful improvements for the purpose of securing to them, as such inventors, for the limited term therein mentioned, the exclusive right and liberty to make and use and vend to others to be used their own inventions, as tending to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, and as matter of compensation to the inventors for their labor, toil, and expense in making the inventions, and reducing the same to practice for the public benefit, as contemplated by the Constitution and sanctioned by the laws of Congress." Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 516, 533, 20 L. ed. 33.

"Patent right."—"A monopoly of a certain way of doing a thing. It is an exclusive right of way, in the region of invention, secured to one for a limited period as a compensation for having first discovered it" (Vose v. Singer, 4 Allen (Mass.) 226, 230, 81 Am. Dec. 696, where it is said to be analogous to a right of way or a right to collect tolls); "the exclusive liberty conferred by letters patent from the sovereign on an inventor or his alienee of making and vending articles according to his invention" (Avery v. Wilson, 20 Fed. 856, 858); "the right, protected by letters patent, to use the process, combination, or appliance, discovered by the patentee, for the production of a certain result" (Com. v. Central Dist., etc., Tel. Co., 145 Pa. St. 121, 127, 22 Atl. 841, 27 Am. St. Rep. 677); "the right to make, use or vend a patented invention, or inventions claimed to be patented" (State v. Peck, 25 Ohio St. 26, 28); a right which is said to "resemble a franchise in being a privilege which concerns, and is intended to benefit the public, which depends for existence and preservation upon the authority which confers it" (Crown Cork, etc., Co. v. State, 87 Md. 687, 698, 40 Atl. 1074, 67 Am. St. Rep. 371); it has also been said to be an exclusive right, a monopoly (Gilbert El. R. Co. v. Kobbe, 70 N. Y. 361, 370; King v. Platt, 37 N. Y. 155, 4 Transcr. App. 19, 3 Abb. Pr. N. S. 434, 35 How. Pr. 23); and is "incorporeal property, not susceptible of actual delivery or possession" (Waterman v. Mackenzie, 138 U. S. 252, 260, 11 S. Ct. 334, 34 L. ed. 923).

"Patented."—A thing is "patented" by the actual issuance of the patent under the seal of the government, speaking the exercise of sovereign will, investing the patentee with the grant of a monopoly, and does not mean the preliminary proceedings. Edison Electric Light Co. v. Waring Electric Co., 59 Fed. 358, 364.

2. "A patent does not confer even the right to use the invention. The inventor had that right before. It is merely an incorporeal right to exclude others from using the invention throughout the United States conferred by the government upon compliance with certain requirements." Jewett v. Atwood Suspender Co., 100 Fed. 647, 648. See also Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed. 1115; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 516, 20 L. ed. 33; Bloomer v. McQuewan, 14 How. (U. S.) 539, 14 L. ed. 532; Fruit-Cleaning Co. v. Fresno Home-Packing Co., 94 Fed. 845.

The government makes no transfer to the patentee of a right preferred, or estate theretofore vested in itself.— The essential right is in the inventor before he obtains the patent. Western Electric Co. v. Sperry Electric Co., 59 Fed. 295, 296, 8 C. C. A. 129.

3. Dudley v. Mayhew, 3 N. Y. 9; Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed.

3. CONSIDERATION FOR GRANT. In order that inventions may be disclosed to the public so that all may obtain the benefits,[4] the state grants to the inventor the exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention for a limited time on condition that the inventor furnish such full, clear, and exact description of the invention as will enable those skilled in the art to which it relates, or to which it is most nearly related, to make and use it after the expirations of the patent.[5]

4. CREATION OF STATUTE. The exclusive right which inventors have to their inventions is statutory,[6] and therefore statutory provisions must be complied with in all essentials.[7]

5. CONTRACT. While a patent is a grant, it also has the elements of a contract, since it is based upon consideration flowing from the inventor to the public represented by the officials of state.[8]

6. MONOPOLY. While, under the patent laws, a patent creates a monopoly,[9] it is not a monopoly of what existed before and belonged to others — which is the true idea of a monopoly — but is a monopoly of what did not exist before and what belongs to the patentee.[10] In consequence it does not create an odious monopoly,[11] and the rights of patentees thereunder are to be liberally construed,[12]

1115; Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. (U. S.) 477, 13 L. ed. 504; Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. (U. S.) 646, 11 L. ed. 1141; Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. (U. Gaz. 171. And see infra, I, A, 4.

4. The benefit to the public by the disclosure of inventions is the primary consideration for the grant of patents (Kendall v. Winsor, 21 How. (U. S.) 322, 16 L. ed. 165; Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 218, 8 L. ed. 376; Rubber Tire Wheel Co. v. Milwaukee Rubber Works Co., 154 Fed. 358, 83 C. C. A. 336; International Tooth Crown Co. v. Hanks' Dental Assoc. 111 Fed. 916; Liardet v. Johnson, Buller N. P. 76; Newbery v. James, 2 Meriv. 446, 16 Rev. Rep. 195, 35 Eng. Reprint 1011), the interests of the public in the granting of patents being paramount to those of inventors (Warner v. Smith, 13 App. Cas. (D. C.) 111).

The purpose of granting temporary monopoly is to induce disclosure. Gayler v. Wilder, 11 How. (U. S.) 477, 13 L. ed. 504; Carr v. Rice, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,440, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 198; Goodyear v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co., 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,563, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 626, Wall. Jr. 356.

and in harmony with the intent and purpose of the patent law and doubts resolved in their favor.[13]

B. Rights of Patentees[14]—1. Nature of Right. The grant of a patent gives nothing to the patentee except the right to exclude others from making, using, or selling his invention;[15] but the right is transferable by an instrument in writing.[16]

2. Territory Covered by Right. The right conferred by a patent extends to all territory mentioned in the grant and in the statutes authorizing the grant.[17] In the United States it extends throughout the several states and territories,[18] but not to unorganized territory in its possession;[19] nor are the rights of the patentee operative outside of the limits of the United States.[20] While the rights extend to American vessels on the high seas,[21] they do not extend to foreign vessels in our ports.[22]

3. Need Not Use Invention or License Others to Use. In the United States the inventor does not forfeit his patent or his right to exclude others from using his invention by his failure to make use of it himself,[23] or his refusal to license others to use it upon reasonable terms.[24] The question of licensing others to use his invention is one which the patentee alone has the right to answer, and courts cannot lawfully compel him to make use of his invention, or to permit others to use it against his will.[25] In many countries it is required that the invention be worked or the patent is void.[26]

4. Right of Government to Use Invention. Although the consent of the owner of a patented device is not positively necessary in order to enable the United States government to use the invention described in the letters patent, particularly in cases where it relates to the mode of construction of implements of warfare needed by the government,[27] it has no right to use a patented invention without compensation to the patentee.[28] When it grants letters patent for a new invention or discovery in the arts, it confers upon the patentee an exclusive property in the patented invention which cannot be appropriated or used by the government itself, without just compensation, any more than it can appropriate or use without compensation land which has been patented to a private purchaser.[29] Nevertheless, no injunction can be obtained against the government or against an official acting for the government,[30] unless expressly permitted by act of congress,[31] nor can suit be maintained against the government for damages for infringement. It is not liable to suits founded in tort.[32] While compensation can be obtained by suit on an express or implied contract, this is the only method by which it may be obtained.[33]

5. Government Cannot Cancel Patent. In the United States a patent cannot be canceled by any officer of the government,[34] but may be canceled upon an

The United States has no such prerogative as that which is claimed by the sovereigns of England, by which it can reserve to itself, either expressly or by implication, a superior dominion and use in that which it grants by letters patent to those who entitle themselves to such grants. The government of the United States, as well as the citizen, is subject to the constitution; and when it grants a patent the grantee is entitled to it as a matter of right, and does not receive it, as was originally supposed to be the case in England, as a matter of grace and favor. C. Patents as Property[36] — 1. Personal Property. A patent right is personal property,[37] and in so far as its incorporeal nature permits is subject to the general laws relating to such property,[38] and is surrounded by the same rights and sanctions which attend all other property.[39]

2. Location. It has no definite situs within the territorial jurisdiction of any court but is coexistent in every part of the United States.[40]

3. How Reached by the Courts. It can be reached by the courts only by securing jurisdiction of the owner.[41]

D. Constitutional Authority For Patents — 1. In General. In the United States congress has power to grant patents under the constitutional provision that it shall have power "to promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries."[42] The power of congress to grant to inventors is general, and it is in their discretion to say when, for what length of time, and under what circumstances the patent for an invention shall be granted.[43] The power may, under the constitution, be exercised in making special grants to inventors,[44] and it may patent what is in public use.[45] Congress cannot, how-in which it was said: "The only authority competent to set a patent aside, or to annul it, or to correct it, for any reason whatever, is vested in the judicial department of the government, and this can only be effected by proper proceedings taken in the courts of the United States."

2. GRANT TO INVENTORS NOT TO IMPORTERS. Congress has no authority to grant patents to any one save inventors and discoverers, and hence cannot grant a patent to a party who merely imports a device not before known and used in this country.[47] The patentee must be the inventor.[48] In England, however, one who imports knowledge of an invention from abroad is entitled to a patent.[49]

3. PATENTS GRANTED BY STATE. While some states granted patents for inventions before the passage of a patent law by the United States they have no such right now that congress has assumed control of the matter.[50]

II. SUBJECTS OF PATENTS.

A. Patentable Subject-Matter — 1. IN GENERAL. In the United States patentable subject-matter consists of any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof,[51] or any new, original, and ornamental design for any article of manufacture.[52]

2. STATUTORY CLASSES OF INVENTION. Nothing is patentable, however beneficial and novel, unless it comes within one of the statutory classes of patentable inventions.[53]

3. PHYSICAL THINGS ONLY ARE PATENTABLE. The subject-matter of patents is limited to physical things or acts producing physical effects and does not include mental theories or plans of action.[54] An idea is not patentable, but only the public, in the sense of the fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States, so as to prevent the subsequent allowance of a patent for such invention, by act of congress, unless there was, in a particular case, a reduction of the invention to use and practice, by its embodiment in some apparatus prior to the issue of such patent. Constitutionality of statute.— U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 4886 [amended by U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3382], is not unconstitutional because it provides that inventions or discoveries may be either arts, machines, manufactures, or compositions of matter, and that presumptively no two of these subjects are one invention. Inventions have been thus distinguished continuously since 1793, and the supreme court of the United States has frequently recognized the validity of this division. In re Frasch, 27 App. Cas. (D. principle in the abstract, it has been said, is a fundamental truth; an original cause; a motive; these cannot be patented, because no one can claim in either of them an exclusive right.[60] The patentee is always restricted to the particular device by which he has undertaken to avail himself of the beneficial influence of the principle.[61] So as to laws of nature the processes used to extract, modify, and concentrate them constitute the invention. The elements of the power exist; the invention is not in discovering them, but in applying them to useful objects.[62] And it is for the discovery or invention of some practicable method or means of producing a beneficial result or effect that a patent is granted and not the result itself.[63]

5. Means Are Patentable. The means devised for utilizing the principle or accomplishing the end or result may be patentable,[64] whether it is by chemical agency or combination, or by utilizing principles of natural philosophy or mechanics.[65]

B. Art — 1. In General. An art or process is patentable as well as machinery.[66] The term "art" has been defined by the United States supreme court as follows: "It is an act, or a series of acts, performed upon the subject-matter to be transformed and reduced to a different state or thing. . . . The process requires that certain things should be done with certain substances, and in a certain order."[67]

it is not necessary that the thing produced shall be new, since a new process for accomplishing an old result is patentable.[71]

2. Must Produce Physical Result. It must be a method of effecting a physical result and not a mere plan or theory of conduct.[72] The physical result, however, need not be a permanent condition of the article or substance acted upon, but may be temporary, as in the case of transmitting speech by certain regulated undulations of the electric current in the telephone.[73]

3. Function Not Patentable. The mere function of a machine is not a patentable process, although a patentable process may be performed by machinery.[74]

4. Independent of Apparatus. A patentable process is separate from and independent of any machine or apparatus used in performing it.[75] A process may be patentable irrespective of the particular form of the instrumentalities used.[76] It may be said in general that processes of manufacture which involve chemical or other similar elemental action are patentable, although mechanism may be necessary to the application or carrying out of such a process, while those which consist solely in the operation of a machine are not.[77] "Most processes which have been held to be patentable require the aid of mechanism in their practical application, but where such mechanism is subsidiary to the chemical action, the fact that the patentee may be entitled to a patent upon his mechanism does not impair his right to a patent for the process; since he would lose the benefit of his real discovery, which might be applied in a dozen different ways, if he were not entitled to such patent."[78]

5. Chemical or Elemental Action. Arts or processes within the meaning of the term in patent law have been defined as those in which chemical or elemental action is called into play and such processes have always been regarded as patentable.[79]

6. Mechanical Processes. It would seem, however, that mechanical processes involving simple manipulation may be patentable, even where there is no chemical or elemental action.[80] The mere fact that the use of machinery may be necessary in carrying out the process does not render it unpatentable.[81]

7. Knowledge of Principles Involved Unnecessary. An art may be patentable, although the inventor himself does not know the philosophical or abstract principles involved in the practice of the art.[82] He must, however, know and describe the steps by which the result is accomplished so that those skilled in the art may practice the invention.[83]

C. Machines. A machine is a combination of mechanical elements adapted to perform a mechanical function.[84] It includes movable parts and differs from an article or implement in that it has a rule of action of its own. It differs from a process, in that a new process is usually the result of discovery, and a machine of invention.[85]

D. Manufacture. An article of manufacture is any article or implement produced by human agency and adapted to perform a mechanical function but having no rule of action of its own.[86]

As used in the patent law, it is a word of very comprehensive meaning, and embraces whatever is made by the art or industry of man, not being a machine, a com-

E. Composition of Matter. A composition of matter is a mechanical mixture or chemical combination of two or more substances,[87] and may be patentable.[88] The test of patentability is the same as in machines.[89]

F. Improvement — 1. In General. An improvement is an addition to, or change in, a known art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter which produces a useful result,[90] and is patentable[91] if it amounts to invention.[92] The improvement may be upon the patentee's own invention.[93]

2. Superiority Unnecessary. In the sense of the patent law it is not necessary that the improved article be superior to the original in all respects.[94] It is sufficient that the thing including the improvement is useful and possesses some advantage over the original for some purposes.[95] The advantage may reside in position of matter, or a design. Johnson v. Johnston, 60 Fed. 618.

G. Designs — 1. In General. A patentable design may consist of a new and ornamental shape given to an article of manufacture or of an ornamentation to be placed upon an article of old shape.[97] The design law was intended to encourage the decorative arts, and therefore deals with the appearance rather than the structure, uses, or functions of the article.[98] The design must be novel and must have called for an exercise of the inventive faculties as distinguished from ordinary skill.[99] The patentability of a design does not depend on its æsthetic value.

Ct. 768, 37 L. ed. 606; Gorham Mfg. Co. v. White, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 511, 20 L. ed. 731; Jennings v. Kibbe, 10 Fed. 669, 20 Blatchf.

The design act, as construed by the courts, intends that the patentability of a design shall be determined by its appeal to the eyes of the ordinary man, and not to the eyes of a jury of artists.[1] The same rules as to construction and validity apply as in the case of mechanical inventions.[2]

2. TERM. Design patents are granted for three years and six months, for seven years, or for fourteen years, as the applicant may in his application elect.[3]

III. PATENTABILITY.[4]

A. In General. The subject-matter of patents must not only come within the statutory classes, but must be new[5] and useful.[6] It must further be of such a character as to have called for an exercise of the inventive or creative faculties of the mind, as distinguished from the mere exercise of the knowledge and judgment expected of those skilled in the particular art.[7] It must not have been abandoned by the inventor,[8] nor have become public property by forfeiture under statutory provisions.[9]

B. Novelty[10]— 1. IN GENERAL. The subject-matter of patents must be new.[11]

353. The test of identity is the sameness of appearance to the eye of the ordinary observer. Smith v. Whitman Saddle Co., 146 U. S. 674, 13 S. Ct. 768, 37 L. ed. 606.

Utility is to be considered in determining invention. Smith v. Whitman Saddle Co., 148 U. S. 674, 13 S. Ct. 768, 37 L. ed. 606; Lehnbeuter v. Holthaus, 105 U. S. 94, 26 L. ed. 939.

Novelty either in result or mode of operation is necessary. Batten v. Clayton, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 1,105.

This is equally the case whether the invention claimed consists of an entire machine or improvement of a machine, or a combination of several mechanical powers.[12] Patent rights of this kind are given only to inventors or discoverers of some new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or some new and useful improvement thereof.[13] And to be new the thing must not have been known to any one before.[14]

2. PRIOR KNOWLEDGE IN THIS COUNTRY. It must be new not merely to the patentee but to all people in the United States.[15]

3. EXTENT OF PRIOR KNOWLEDGE. To negative novelty the prior knowledge must have been of the complete operative invention and must not have been mere theory or speculation as to what might be done.[16] Prior knowledge by a single person, however, is sufficient.[17]

4. DATE OF KNOWLEDGE. The question of novelty is to be determined by the knowledge possessed by people in the United States at the time that the patentee makes the invention,[18] and not at the time that he secures his patent or files his application.[19]

5. PRIOR KNOWLEDGE OR USE ABROAD. By the express provision of the federal

Making and selling a part of an old and known manufacture as a new article of trade is not patentable. Seligman v. Day, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,643, 2 Ban. & A. 467, 14 Blatchf. 72.

An article is not new merely because made by a new process. Cochrane v. Badische Anilin, etc., Fabrik, 111 U. S. 293, 4 S. Ct. 455, 28 L. ed. 433; American Wood Paper Co. v. Fiber Disintegrating Co., 23 Wall. (U. S.) 566, 23 L. ed. 31.

Evidence of novelty.— In all cases the great commercial success of a patented device, and the fact that it supplants or supersedes other devices of the same kind used for the same purpose, are evidence of patentable invention, novelty, and utility of no mean order or low degree, and such facts are in many cases persuasive evidence of a most valuable conception. Heywood Bros., etc., Co. v. Syracuse Rapid Transit R. Co., 152 Fed. 453. Although the fact that a device has supplanted prior devices in the trade may turn the scale in favor of the existence of invention, where that question is in doubt, yet such fact has no weight where the want of patentable novelty is already reasonably clear. Utility is not novelty. In re Garrett, 27 App. Cas. (D. C.) 19.

statutes relating to patents and devices known and used in foreign countries, but not patented there nor described in a printed publication, such inventions or devices are patentable in the United States by a person without notice thereof.[20] If, however, he has notice thereof he cannot obtain a patent even though the invention or discovery had not been patented or described in any printed publication abroad.[21] Prior to the enactment of the statute under consideration, a patent could not be allowed to an inventor unless he showed that he was the original inventor in relation to every part of the world.[22]

6. PUBLICATION OR PATENT ABROAD. By the express provisions of such statutes, however, an invention or discovery cannot be patented in the United States, where it has hitherto been patented or described in a printed publication abroad.[23]

7. NOVELTY OF MEANS. Patentable novelty may reside in the particular means used for accomplishing an old result.[24]

8. NOVELTY OF FUNCTION OR RESULT.[25] Novelty may also reside in the use of old means in a new way or in a new relation where it performs new functions and produces a new result.[26] It is not negatived by the existence of the same thing

Substitution of equivalents.— If a patentee shows a new result to be attained, and means which are new and novel for attaining that result, and the device indicated is operative, used for another purpose where the new use is one which would not occur to one using the original thing.[27]

9. Novelty of Form. Changes of shape or form to produce new functions and results may be patentable;[28] but patentable novelty includes more than mere changes from prior inventions since the changes must amount to invention;[29] mere novelty of form is insufficient.[30]

10. Novelty in Combination.[31] Novelty may reside in the arrangement or combination of old elements whereby an advantageous result is accomplished.[32]

his patent is good, even if in subsequently applying it he varies the means employed by substituting equivalents. Hillard v. Fisher Book Typewriter Co., 151 Fed. 34 [affirmed in 159 Fed. 439].

Where the question of novelty is in doubt, the fact that a new combination and arrangement of known elements produces a new and useful result, displacing other devices employed for a like purpose, is sufficient to turn the scale in favor of invention. In re Thomson, 26 App. Cas. (D. C.) 419.

A change in prior devices, in order to be patentable, must be made by transferring an old device to use in an entirely different and unrelated art. In re Thurston, 26 App. Cas. (D. C.) 315.

New result necessary.— Unless the combination of well-known elements accomplishes some new result, the mere multiplicity of elements does not make it patentable. So long as each element performs some old and well-known function, the result is not a patentable invention, but an aggregation of elements. In re Hill, 26 App. Cas. (D. C.) 318.

Substitution of element performing similar result.— The substitution for an old element, in a combination, of an element performing a similar function, but constructed in a different way, does not render the combination itself patentable where there is no resultant change in the operation. In such a case, although the substituted element may be superior, the invention lies in the element, and not in the combination. In re Hawley, 26 App. Cas. (D. C.) 324.

Determination as to novelty.— Where the elements of a combination sought to be patented are well known, and, if not known in the combination described, are known in analogous combinations, the court is at liberty to determine whether there is any inven-

C. Anticipation[33] — 1. In General — a. Introductory Statement. A patentee's claim to an invention is anticipated when it appears that another made the invention before the date when the patentee made it.[34] Such anticipation may consist of prior patents or publications.[35] To authorize the allowance of a patent there must be a substantial difference in principle from prior inventions.[36] If the prior invention relied on to defeat a subsequent patent existed and was used, it is of no consequence whether it was patented or not,[37] and abandonment of prior invention does not prevent anticipation.[38] Nevertheless mere surmises of earlier students of the same subject do not anticipate.[39]

b. Full Disclosure Necessary. Nothing is an anticipation which is not a full and complete disclosure of the invention to the public such as will enable those skilled in the art to make and use it.[40] A disclosure which is insufficient to support a patent cannot be relied upon as an anticipation.[41] To amount to anticipation, however, it is not necessary that the ordinary laborer or mechanic could understand the disclosure.[42]

c. Identity.[43] To amount to anticipation there must be identity in substance and not merely identity in form.[44] The two things must accomplish the same tion in using them in the exact combination claimed. In re Hill, 26 App. Cas. (D. C.) 318.

Claim to combination is an admission that elements are old. Overweight Counterbalance Elevator Co. v. Improved Order of Red Men's Hall Assoc., 94 Fed. 155, 36 C. C. A. 125.

Novelty of design, how determined. — The novelty of a design is to be determined by the comparative appearance of the designs to the eyes of average observers, and not to the eyes of experts. In re Schraubstadter, 26 App. Cas. (D. C.) 331.

Resemblance without identity is insufficient.[46] But identity need extend no further than to matter claimed.[47] And mere superiority of the invention for which a patent is sought does not prevent anticipation.[48] What would infringe the claims of a patent will anticipate it if prior in date.[49]

d. General Knowledge of Public Unnecessary. It is not necessary that the anticipating invention be known generally or that it is a matter of common knowledge,[50] but it is sufficient that some members of the public in this country knew of the invention.[51] Knowledge by a single member of the public is sufficient.[52]

e. Patentee's Knowledge of Anticipation Unnecessary. It is not of consequence that the patentee made the invention by his own efforts and thought and in ignorance of the prior invention by another, since the fact of prior invention is what controls.[53]

2. Prior Patents — a. In General. A patent disclosing the invention granted in this country or abroad before the claimant's date of invention is a bar to the grant of a patent to him for that invention.[54] A prior patent alleged to anticipate must be taken in the meaning disclosed upon its face, and extrinsic evidence is not admissible to reconstruct it, as by showing that a word having a sensible meaning in the context was erroneously used for another word.[55] It cannot properly have implied into it, from necessity, more than it fairly shows, to make it represent an operative structure. What is required and not so shown is left for later inventors.[56] An impracticable prior device, not capable of performing the functions of a subsequent patented device that is practicable and useful, is not an anticipation.[57] Furthermore in order that a prior patent may operate to defeat a subsequent patent, the two must be for the same invention.[58]

b. Foreign Patents. A foreign patent in order to invalidate an American patent must antedate the invention patented,[59] not merely the application for letters patent,[60] or the issuance of the patent by the United States.[61] A foreign patent exists as a patent only as of the date when the invention was published or made accessible to the public.[62] An invention is not "patented" in England within the meaning of the act of congress until the enrolment or sealing of the complete specifications.[63] The enrolled specification takes effect only from the date of its enrolment, and not from the date of the filing of the provisional specification.[64] The instrument known under the German law as "Gebrauchsmuster" is not one the filing of which charges any one with notice of its contents or which has the effect of a foreign patent as an anticipation of a subsequent United States patent.[65]

c. Paper Patents. It is well settled that mere paper patents may negative otherwise patentable novelty, provided they sufficiently disclose the principles of the alleged invention, or provided the alleged objections can be obviated by mere mechanical skill.[66] But anticipatory matter which has never gone into practical use is to be narrowly construed.[67]

d. Secret Patents. The expression "patented," as used in a statute,[68] providing that, in an action for infringement, defendant may prove that the patentee's invention had been patented prior to his supposed invention, means only invention laid open to the public and protected to the inventors.[69] There are, however, in some foreign countries, patents which may, for public and special reasons, be kept secret. Therefore defendant must show whether the alleged anticipating patent was a public or a private grant.[70]

e. Sufficiency of Description. A prior patent to invalidate a subsequent patent must describe the invention in such full, clear, and exact terms as to enable one skilled in the art to construct and use it without the necessity of making experiments.[71] The sufficiency of the description in the prior patent must be

However a patentee cannot be denied invention because of a prior patent for a device which never came into use, unless the idea upon which his patent is predicated is so clearly set forth or suggested in the alleged anticipating patent that a mechanic with such patent before him could by the exercise of mere mechanical skill so modify proportions or change the mode of operation as to overcome the difficulties which excluded the prior device from commercial utility. tested by the knowledge of persons skilled in the art as it existed at the date of such patent.[72]

f. Failure to Claim Immaterial. It is immaterial whether the prior patent includes a claim to the subject-matter so long as it discloses it with such clearness as to enable one skilled in the art to make and use it.[73] The failure of the patentee to include the device among the claims of his own invention implies either that he abandoned it to the public or that he regarded it as well known.[74] The patent is evidence of the state of the art at the time the drawings and specifications upon which it was afterward granted were made, and it is the state of the art and not the patent which constitutes anticipation.[75]

3. Prior Publication — a. In General. A prior publication is a printed book, newspaper, or document of public character disclosing the invention intended and actually employed for the purpose of conveying information to the public.[76] The invention must be intended for the public and actually published.[77]

b. Sufficiency of Publication. Publication in a book of general circulation is sufficient.[78] But mere business catalogues or circulars intended for particular persons engaged in the trade are not publications within the meaning of the law.[79] Otherwise, however, as to trade magazines found in libraries.[80] A published drawing without description is a publication of the invention if the disclosure therein is sufficient to enable one skilled in the art to make and use it.[81] A provisional specification published in England amounts to publication.[82] A book containing the minutes of a company,[83] or an application for a patent,[84] is not a publi-

Insufficient descriptions.— A patent so obscure in its terminology that two conflicting theories as to its meaning may be deduced therefrom and supported by equally plausible arguments is too indefinite to operate as an anticipation. Cimiotti Unhairing Co. v. Comstock Unhairing Co., 115 Fed. 524. cation. So a single copy of a book published in a foreign country not entered in the list of books contained in a library is not a publication.[85] Copies of foreign patents in the patent office or public libraries accessible to all amount to sufficient publication.[86]

c. Sufficiency of Description. The publication must describe the invention so fully as to enable one skilled in the art to which it belongs or pertains to construct or use it.[87]

4. Prior Knowledge and Use — a. Sufficiency of Knowledge. Anticipating knowledge must be of the complete operative invention such as will enable those skilled in the art without further instructions to make and use it.[88]

b. Mental Idea Insufficient. Anticipating knowledge includes not the mere mental conception that the thing can be done,[89] and of the means for doing it, but the certainty of information derived from a practical demonstration.[90] Mere theories are insufficient.[91]

c. Necessity For Perfected Invention. To constitute an anticipation the invention must have been in a form adapted and intended for immediate practical use.[92] An inoperative device will not anticipate.[93]

a court in overthrowing a patent granted for what appears to be a new and useful invention or improvement, on the ground that the device has been anticipated by another and earlier invention, the court should be well satisfied by clear and credible testimony that the alleged earlier invention actually existed; that it was a perfected device, capable of practical use, and that it was embodied in distinct form, and carried into operation as a complete thing, and was not merely an unperfected or abandoned experiment.[98]

f. Models and Unpublished Drawings. Models or unpublished drawings or descriptions, however completely they may disclose the invention, do not anticipate.[99] Illustrative drawings of conceived ideas do not constitute an invention, and unless they are followed up by a seasonable observance of the requirements of the patent laws they can have no effect upon a subsequently granted patent to another.[1]
