To

CHARLES WALTER DUMONT

more than to any other man is due the existence of the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure. His was the idea; his was the plan; and his has been the business ability and energetic management, as organizer and president of The American Law Book Company, which have made possible the successful publication of these volumes, which are therefore respectfully dedicated to him.

I. DEFINITIONS.

A. Suretyship — 1. IN BROAD SENSE. Suretyship, in its broadest sense, is the relation occupied by a person liable for the payment of money or for the performance of an act by another, such liability being collateral as to such person, and who is liable to suffer loss in event of the failure of such other person to pay or perform, but whose liability is terminated at once, fully and completely, if such other person does pay or perform.[1]

2. IN NARROW SENSE. Suretyship, in its narrower sense, is a legal relation, based upon contract between competent parties, in which one person undertakes, as the object of such contract, to answer to another for the debt, default, or miscarriage of a third person; the third person's liability to the second person being thus similar to that of such first person.[2]

B. Surety[3] — 1. IN GENERAL. A surety, in the broadest sense,[4] is the person collaterally liable for the payment or performance by another.[5] In the narrower

1. Childs Suretyship 1. See also Smith v. Shelden, 35 Mich. 42, 24 Am. Rep. 529; Wendlandt v. Sohre, 37 Minn. 162, 33 N. W. 700.

In its broadest sense, suretyship exists in every instance where one person is primarily liable for the payment of money or for the performance of some act, and a second person, as between himself and the one primarily liable, expects to pay or perform in event only of the failure of the other to do so. Suretyship, in its broadest sense, includes guaranties (see GUARANTY, 20 Cyc. 1392) and suretyship in its narrower or technical sense (see infra, I, A, 2).

Other definitions are: "A contract . . . accessary to an obligation contracted by another person, either contemporaneously, or previously, or subsequently to answer on the default of the principal." Russell v. Failor, 1 Ohio St. 327, 329, 59 Am. Dec. 631.

"A contract by one person to be answerable for the payment of some debt, or the performance of some act or duty, in case of the failure of another person who is himself primarily responsible for the payment of such debt or the performance of the act or duty." Roberts v. Hawkins, 70 Mich. 566, 571, 38 N. W. 575.

"A contract that the surety will see that the principal pays or performs." American Bonding Co. v. Pueblo Inv. Co., 150 Fed. 17, 23, 80 C. C. A. 97, 9 L. R. A. N. S. 557.

"A contract whereby one person engages to be answerable for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another." State v. Parker, 72 Ala. 181, 183.

"A direct contract to pay the debt of another." McIntosh-Huntington Co. v. Reed, 89 Fed. 464, 466.

Pothier says a suretyship is a contract by which a person obligates himself on behalf of a debtor to a creditor for the payment of a whole or a part of what is due from such debtor, by way of accession to his obligation. Ringgold v. Newkirk, 3 Ark. 96, 108.

Statutory definitions of suretyship exist in many states. La. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3035, defines "suretyship" to be "an accessory promise, by which a person binds himself, for another already bound, and agrees with the creditor to satisfy the obligation if the debtor does not." Bayne v. Cusimano, 50 La. Ann. 361, 363, 23 So. 361; Lachman v. Block, (La. 1894) 15 So. 649, 650. See also Ringgold v. Newkirk, 3 Ark. 96, 108; and the statutes of the several states.

In Quebec suretyship in connection with a negotiable instrument is called an "aval." Patterson v. Lynch, 1 L. C. Rep. 219.

Collateral to primary valid obligation.—A contract of suretyship is collateral to and predicated upon a primary obligation. In order to establish suretyship, it is first necessary to prove the existence of the primary contract. Thornburg v. Allman, 8 Ind. App. 531, 35 N. E. 1110. "It is of the essence of the contract, that there be a subsisting valid obligation of a principal debt. Without a principal, there can be no accessory, and by the extinction of the former, the latter becomes extinct." Russell v. Failor, 1 Ohio St. 327, 329, 59 Am. Dec. 631. See also Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Nicholas, 98 Ala. 92, 12 So. 723; State v. Parker, 72 Ala. 181, 183; Bernd v. Lynes, 71 Conn. 733, 43 Atl. 189; Sherman v. Shaver, 75 Va. 1, 4; and infra, IV, B; VIII, E, 1.

2. Childs Suretyship 2.

3. Surety company defined see infra, X, A.

4. Suretyship in its broad sense see supra, I, A, 1.

5. Childs Suretyship 1. See also infra, II, D; IV, A.

In its broadest sense the term includes every person whose estate is obligated to sense,[6] he is a person who undertakes, by an express contract for that very purpose, to become liable for the debt, default, or miscarriage by another, the effect of the term being that the liability of the latter is similar to that of the surety.[7]

2. Cosurety[8] — a. In General. Cosureties are those equally bound,[9] as among themselves, on a contract of suretyship, for the same debtor and for the same debt, although not necessarily in equal amounts, or on the same instrument.[10] This is answer for the default of another. Watriss v. Pierce, 32 N. H. 560; Magill v. Brown, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 662, 50 S. W. 143, 642. He is "a person who, being liable to pay a debt or perform an obligation, is entitled, if it is enforced against him, to be indemnified by some other person, who ought himself to have made payment or performed before the surety was compelled to do so." Smith v. Shedlen, 35 Mich. 42, 24 Am. Rep. 529 [quoted in Chattanooga Foundry, etc., Works v. Hembree, 117 Ala. 295, 301, 23 So. 38]; Cassan v. Maxwell, 39 Minn. 391, 393, 40 N. W. 357; Wendlandt v. Sohre, 37 Minn. 162, 163, 33 N. W. 700; Wise v. Miller, 45 Ohio St. 388, 399, 14 N. E. 218; Hoffman v. Habighorst, 38 Oreg. 261, 268, 63 Pac. 610, 53 L. R. A. 908. See also Johnson v. Young, 20 W. Va. 614, 655.

6. Suretyship in a narrow sense see supra, I, A, 2.

7. Childs Suretyship 2.

Other definitions are: "A co-obligor or co-promisor, entering into a contract, with the principal jointly, or jointly and severally, and at the same time." Read v. Cutts, 7 Me. 186, 189, 22 Am. Dec. 184.

"Any one who is bound on the same instrument for its payment with another, who, as between themselves, is the principal debtor, whatever may be the particular form of the undertaking." Hammel v. Beardsley, 31 Minn. 314, 316, 17 N. W. 858. Within the meaning of Minn. Gen. St. c. 66, § 36. Compare Gagan v. Stevens, 4 Utah 348, 9 Pac. 706, under Comp. L. (1876) p. 403. § 1240.

"A person who binds himself for the payment of a sum of money, or for the performance of something else, for another who is already bound for the same." Young v. McFadden, 125 Ind. 254, 255, 25 N. E. 284.

"One bound that something shall be done, not by himself in the first instance, but, by some other, and, in case of default by this prime agent, that the obligor shall perform the act, or compensate for nonperformance." Field v. Harrison, Wythe (Va.) 273, 281.

"One who becomes responsible for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person." Hall v. Weaver, 34 Fed. 104, 106, 13 Sawy. 188.

"One who contracts for the payment of a debt in case of the failure of another person who is himself principally responsible for it, or, as it has otherwise been expressed, a surety is a person who, being liable to pay a debt, is entitled, if it is enforced against him, to be indemnified by some other person, who ought himself to have paid it before the surety was himself compelled to do so. Brandt Sur. & G. § 1 [quoted in Deering v. Veal, 78 S. W. 886, 887, 25 Ky. L. Rep 1890].

"One who contracts to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another." Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Nicholas, 98 Ala. 92, 126, 12 So. 723.

"A person who, being liable to pay a debt or perform an obligation, is entitled, if it is enforced against him, to be indemnified by some other person, who ought himself to have made payment or performed the obligation before the surety was required to do so." Reissaus v. Whites, 128 Mo. App. 135, 140, 106 S. W. 603.

Webster defines the term as meaning "certainty . . . safety. Security against loss or damage — security for payment; and in law, one who enters into a bond, or recognizance, to answer for another's appearance in court; or for his payment of a debt; or for the performance of some act." Pitkins v. Boyd, 4 Greene (Iowa) 255, 259.

As defined by statute a surety is one who, at the request of another and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person or hypothecates property as security therefor. Sather Banking Co. v. Arthur R. Briggs Co., 138 Cal. 724, 729, 72 Pac. 352; Valentine v. Donohoe-Kelly Banking Co., 133 Cal. 191, 195, 65 Pac. 381; O'Conor v. Morse, 112 Cal. 31, 44 Pac. 305, 53 Am. St. Rep. 155; London, etc., Bank v. Smith, 101 Cal. 415, 419, 35 Pac. 1027, 1028.

In Scotch law a surety is called a "cautioner." Black Dict.

8. Rights and remedies of cosureties see infra, IX, C.

9. A surety not legally bound is not a surety in any real sense of the term and is therefore not a cosurety with other sureties. Stockmeyer v. Oertling, 35 La. Ann. 467; Landers v. Tuggle, 22 La. Ann. 443; Russell v. Failor, 1 Ohio St. 327, 59 Am. Dec. 631.

10. Waldrop v. Wolff, 114 Ga. 610, 40 S. E. 830 (holding that where two principals and a surety bind themselves jointly and severally in an eventual condemnation money bond, each principal is a cosurety with the surety as to the other principal); Houck v. Graham, 106 Ind. 195, 6 N. E. 594, 55 Am. Rep. 727; Stockmeyer v. Oertling, 35 La. Ann. 467; Harris v. Ferguson, 2 Bailey (S. C.) 397. See Wanack v. Michels, 215 Ill. 87, 74 N. E. 84 [affirming 114 Ill. App. 631], holding that the Dram Shop Act (Ill. St. c. 43, § 5), providing that the owner of a building, who knowingly permits true, although they became sureties at different times [11] without communicating with each other,[12] and each without knowledge that the others had entered into the relation.[13] While it does not follow necessarily that sureties for the same obligation are cosureties,[14] if they have executed the same instrument in the same capacity they are presumed to be cosureties.[15] On the other hand, those who sign the occupation of his premises by a person dispensing intoxicating liquors therein, shall be jointly liable with the latter for all damages sustained in consequence of the sale of such liquor, does not constitute the owner a surety of the dram-shop keeper, and he is therefore not a cosurety with the sureties on the dram-shop keeper's bond required by the statute. See also Childs Suretyship 5.

Sureties under a bond binding them severally in penal sums aggregating that for which the principal is liable are cosureties. Toucey v. Schell, 15 Misc. (N. Y.) 350, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 879.

Where a renewal note, signed by the former sureties, is also signed by an additional surety, all of the sureties are cosureties. Shufelt v. Moore, 93 Mich. 564, 53 N. W. 722; Prescott v. Perkins, 16 N. H. 305; Flanagan v. Post, 45 Vt. 246. But compare Sponhaur v. Malloy, 21 Ind. App. 287, 52 N. E. 245, holding that where after the death of the principal on a note, the surety thereon gave a renewal note signed also by the widow of the principal, the principal having died insolvent, that the surety thereby became primarily liable, and the widow was therefore his surety.

12. Norton v. Coons, 6 N. Y. 33.

13. Chaffee v. Jones, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 260; Wells v. Miller, 66 N. Y. 255; National Surety Co. v. Di Marsico, 55 Misc. (N. Y.) 302, 105 N. Y. Suppl. 272; Moore v. Hanscom, (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 103 S. W. 665; Stout v. Vause, 1 Rob. (Va.) 169. But compare Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Burch, 145 N. C. 316, 59 S. E. 71, holding that where one signed as surety, a note signed by two persons, without knowledge of the fact that one of the signers was a surety, he could not be held a cosurety with such signer.

14. Sweet v. McAllister, 4 Allen (Mass.) 353; Wells v. Miller, 66 N. Y. 255, holding that where one of two partners indorsed, without adding the word "surety" to his name, a note which he knew was to be used for the other partner's individual benefit, and which he knew a third person was going to indorse as surety under the misapprehension that the note was for a partnership purpose, the indorsing partner was not a cosurety with such third person.

Sureties who are not bound for the same debt or who do not occupy between each other the same relative position cannot be considered cosureties. Day v. McPhee, 41 Colo. 467, 93 Pac. 670.

Supplemental surety not a cosurety see infra, I, B, 3, a.

The relation of cosuretyship between indorsers upon a promissory note is not established by showing that the second indorser used language which led the first to believe that he intended to stand in that relation, and the first indorser was induced thereby to indorse it, if the second indorser in fact did not agree nor intend to stand in that relation. Sweet v. McAllister, 4 Allen (Mass.) 353.

To constitute a surety on a note a cosurety with another signing the note, there must be a mutual understanding between the parties to that effect. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Burch, 145 N. C. 316, 59 S. E. 71.

Where a surety on a note is executor of the principal with sufficient property to satisfy a judgment on the note, he occupies the position of principal as to a cosurety on the note. Robinson v. McDowell, 130 N. C. 246, 41 S. E. 287.

H. 305 (holding that where the goods of the principal on a note were attached, and a third person receipted to the sheriff for them, the sureties on the note and the receiptor were not cosureties); National Surety Co. v. U. S., 123 Fed. 294, 59 C. C. A. 479 (holding that a surety on a proposal bond, in regard to a mail route contract, is not a cosurety with a surety on the bond of a contractor given after the letting of the contract to secure the performance thereof). See Hutchison v. Roberts, 8 Houst. (Del.) 459, 17 Atl. 1061, holding that sureties on separate instruments for separate debts do not become cosureties by being coöbligees in a bond of indemnity from the debtor for the debts.

Thus sureties on the general bond of an officer are not cosureties with the sureties on a bond given by such officer for some special fund not within the operation of the general bond. Lacey v. Robbins, 74 Tex. 566, 12 S. W. 314, holding that sureties on the general bond of a county clerk are not cosureties with those on a bond given for the safekeeping and disbursement of a school fund. But if the general bond covers the duties for which the special bond is given, sureties on the special bond are cosureties with the sureties on the general bond. Elbert v. Jacoby, 8 Bush (Ky.) 542 (holding that the surety for a guardian in his general bond was cosurety with a surety in a bond executed by the guardian upon a decree for the sale of the ward's land); Burnett v. Millsaps, 59 Miss. 333 (holding that sureties on the general bond of a sheriff are cosureties on a bond given by him with regard to taxes); Cherry v. Wilson, 78 N. ent instruments for equal portions of one debt cosureties;[20] but sureties on one instrument are cosureties, although each has limited his liability to a portion only of the entire amount called for therein.[21] Sureties on different bonds given in successive steps in litigation are not cosureties.[22]

3. Supplemental Surety[23] — a. In General. A supplemental surety is one who, as between himself and another surety or sureties, is collaterally bound; he is a surety for a surety; and, to him, another surety occupies the position of a principal, their liabilities being successive.[24] Hence a surety for a surety, a supplemental surety and the surety are not cosureties.[25] A person can become a supplemental surety is various ways.[26] He may be a maker of a promissory note, and yet be a surety for other makers who are sureties if such was the intention;[27] but such an intention is not shown by the fact that he signed several months after the others,[28]

Sureties on successive bonds are not cosureties if the latter bond supersedes the former, and if the liability of the surety on the first bond terminates as to the future when the second is given. W. 743, holding that a recital in a cumulative executive bond that one of the sureties in the prior bond had asked to be released therefrom, and another had removed from the county, does not show any agreement between the parties that the sureties on the second bond were to be primarily liable and the sureties on the two bonds are cosureties). nor can any such intention arise when the signer is not aware of the other sureties.[29] An indorser occupies the position of a supplemental surety for prior parties;[30] and one who becomes surety with the drawer of a bill of exchange is liable to subsequent holders only, and not to the accepter.[31] As joint debtors are sureties as to each other's share of the debt,[32] a surety for joint debtors would occupy the position of a supplemental surety as to each for the other's share of the debt.[33] A person who pledges his own note to secure the payment of another person's note is a supplemental surety as to an indorser on the latter note.[34] A very common method for the relation of supplemental surety to arise is by the giving of bonds in judicial proceedings. As between successive sets of sureties, those last in time are primarily liable, and those first in time become supplemental sureties for them.[35] Where a surety signs an instrument which purports to have been signed by the prior parties as principals, he is justified in considering himself a surety as to such prior parties.[36]

b. Validity and Effect of Stipulation. Upon the question whether a subsequent surety can stipulate that he is not to be a cosurety with prior parties, the cases are not entirely in accord. Some hold that he can so stipulate where the principal falsely informs him that all prior signers are principals,[37] or where he is ignorant

A person signing a note already executed by several partners, which he is justified in supposing to be a firm note, is not a cosurety with such partners as are actually sureties for the others. Bain v. Wilson, 10 Ohio St. 14 (holding that where a bill is signed individually by several partners of a dissolved firm, one being the principal and the others sureties, another person signing as surety will not be a cosurety with the prior sureties unless he had knowledge of the dissolution, or knew that the bill was not a firm obligation); Wharton v. Duncan, 83 Pa. of the existing suretyship,[38] or even where he has knowledge of the suretyship,[39] and although the prior sureties expected that the subsequent surety would be equally liable with them;[40] and in most jurisdictions the consent of those who have signed as sureties is not necessary to enable a subsequent signer to stipulate that his liability is to be that of a supplemental surety only.[41] Other cases hold, however, that a subsequent surety cannot stipulate for secondary liability as to other sureties unless such other sureties assent thereto.[42]

C. Principal. The principal is the person primarily liable upon the contract of suretyship.[43]

D. Creditor or Obligee. The creditor or obligee is the person who can enforce payment or performance by the principal or surety.[44]

II. DISTINCTIONS.

A. Surety and Guarantor.[45] The liability of a surety in the narrow sense and of a guarantor is very similar, and the distinctions between the two are technical rather than real. While each is, as to the principal, collaterally liable, the surety is, as to the creditor or obligee, primarily liable;[46] the guarantor being recognized by the creditor as collaterally liable. The surety promises to pay[47] or perform;[48] the guarantor does not undertake directly to pay or perform, but that another — the principal, will pay or perform.[49] The guarantor is liable for damages if he

The distinction is sometimes stated thus: A surety undertakes to pay if the principal does not, while a guarantor undertakes to pay if the principal cannot. McIntosh-Huntington Co. v. Reed, 89 Fed. 464.

A bond conditioned for the faithful performance of duties by the principal is not a guaranty; the undertaking is direct for the payment of money. Saint v. Wheeler, etc., Mfg. Co., 95 Ala. 362, 10 So. 539, 36 Am. St. Rep. 210; Indiana, etc., Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Bender, 32 Ind. App. 287, 69 N. E. 691; Page v. White Sewing Mach. Co., 12 Tex. Civ. App. 327, 34 S. fails to perform his collateral contract that the principal will pay.[50] The surety is usually, although not necessarily, jointly liable with the principal;[51] while the guarantor makes a contract entirely independent from that of the principal, although frequently on the same instrument. The surety is liable at the same time as the principal on an original promise; the liability of the guarantor does not arise until default of the principal, as the guarantor does not undertake to do what the principal does.[52]

B. Surety and Indorser.[53] An indorser, like a guarantor, is not liable on the same contract with the principal, but makes an independent contract.[54] The indorser's implied contract entitles him to notice of dishonor; but the surety's contract does not.[55]

C. Surety and Insurer. The distinctions between a surety and an insurer of the fidelity of an employee cannot be sharply drawn. A surety undertakes to pay a sum of money, with a condition that, if certain acts are performed by another, the contract shall be void. An insurer, for a valuable consideration, agrees, subject to certain conditions, to indemnify the insured against loss consequent upon the dishonesty or default of a designated employee.[56]

D. Surety and Principal.[57] The one receiving the money [58] or the goods [59] is the principal, and the other is a surety;[60] but the fact that one may benefit indirectly by the transaction does not make him a principal.[61] On the other hand

Terms compared.— "Surety" is a general term, and "guaranty" is a special. In a statute where there is nothing to limit it, "surety" is taken to include "guaranty." Gagan v. Stevens, 4 Utah 348, 9 Pac. 706. The words "surety" and "guarantor" are often used indiscriminately as synonymous terms; but, while a surety and guarantor have in common that they are both bound for another person, yet there are points of difference between them which should be carefully noted. A surety is usually bound with his principal in the same instrument, executed at the same time, and on the same consideration. He is an original promisor and debtor from the beginning, and is held ordinarily to know every default of his principal. Usually he will not be protected, either by the mere indulgence of the creditor to the principal, or by want of notice of the default of the principal, no matter how much he may be injured thereby. On the other hand, the contract of the guarantor is his own separate undertaking, in which the principal does not join. It is usually entered into before or after that of the principal, and is often founded on a separate consideration from that supporting the contract of the principal. The original contract of the principal is not his contract, and he is not bound to take notice of its non-performance. Hall v. Weaver, 34 Fed. 104, 106, 13 Sawy. 188.

For example the fact that the principal used the money to pay a debt owing by him to the surety does not make the latter any less a surety. Harvey v. Osborn, 55 Ind. 535; Mackreth v. Walmesley, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 19, 32 Wkly. Rep. 819; Shepley v. Hurd, 3 a person apparently may be undertaking to pay the debt of another, and yet the debt be his own, in which case he is none the less a principal.[62] So too, while the relation may exist between the principal and surety, the surety may have contracted as a principal with the creditor, and be held as such.[63]

III. CLASSIFICATIONS.

A. Enumerated. For convenience in designating the different ways in which the relation of suretyship may arise, two classifications are made: (1) As to the form of the contract, suretyship is voluntary or involuntary;[64] (2) as to the nature of the contract, it is personal or real.[65]

B. Voluntary Suretyship. Voluntary suretyship arises where the chief object of the contract is to become a surety.[66]

C. Involuntary Suretyship. Involuntary suretyship, or by operation of law,[67] arises where the chief object of the contract is to accomplish some other purpose than security, but its effect is to make one of the parties secondarily liable for a debt or for the performance of an act by another.

D. Personal Suretyship. Personal suretyship arises where the surety may be made to respond in damages generally for a breach of his contract.[68]

E. Real Suretyship. Real suretyship arises where certain specific property can be taken to enforce payment of another's debt, or the performance of some duty owing by another, and the owner of such property, if he would save it, must pay or perform, but he is not personally liable in damages.[69]

IV. CREATION AND EXISTENCE OF RELATION.[70]

A. In General. Generally the relation arises whenever a person becomes

C. Nature and Validity of Principal's Obligation[73] — 1. 2. Requirements of Statute.[79] The fact that the bond or obligation of the principal is not in the form required by law will not affect the liability of the surety or constitute a defense in an action against him for breach thereof,[80] unless such failure to comply with the statutory requirements actually invalidates the obligation of the principal.[81]

3. Duress.[82] Duress at common law, where no statute is violated,[83] is a personal defense, which can only be set up by the person subjected to the duress;[84] and duress to the principal will not avoid the obligation of a surety,[85] unless the the circumstances it was held to be immaterial whether the bond was binding on principal or not.

The exception to the general rule is where the relation of father and son or husband surety, at the time of executing the obligation, is ignorant of the circumstances which render it voidable by the principal.[86]

4. Fraud.[87] As a rule if the principal is not bound owing to fraud practised upon him by the creditor, the surety likewise is not bound,[88] and is entitled to withdraw the security deposited with the creditor, or, if the same has been converted, to recover its value.[89] But a surety cannot take advantage of fraud perpetrated on his principal, where the latter does not complain thereof.[90] Nor is a surety released from liability by the fraud of his principal in securing the execution of a contract for the performance of which the surety renders himself liable, where the creditor has no notice of such fraud, actual or constructive.[91] If a surety changes his position to that of creditor, as by executing his own note to the payee and taking up the original note, his right to defeat a recovery by setting up fraud on the principal is lost.[92]

5. Illegality[93] — a. In General. The agreement of a surety is not binding where the bargain between the primary parties out of which it springs is contaminated by positive illegalities.[94] A surety may set up in his defense the illegality of and wife exists between the principal and surety. Plummer v. People, 16 Ill. 358; Osborn v. Robbins, 36 N. Y. 365; East Stroudsburg Nat. Bank v. Seiple, 13 Pa. Dist. 575, 29 Pa. Co. Ct. 245; Owens v. Mynatt, 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 675.

If the surety has full knowledge of the duress, and, notwithstanding such knowledge, voluntarily enters into the obligation, he is bound thereby. Haney v. People, 12 Colo. 345, 21 Pac. 39. In Osborn v. Robbins, 36 N. Y. 365, 2 Transcr. App. 319, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 15, the surety knew the facts, although the case does not indicate that he knew that the proceedings were irregular. It was held that the duress of the principal was available as a defense to the surety. In Patterson v. Gibson, 81 Ga. 802, 10 S. E. 9, 12 Am. St. Rep. 356, it is said that knowledge of the fact of the imprisonment of the principal does not involve necessarily knowledge of its illegality.

Sureties are not liable on a gambling contract (Woodson v. Barrett, 2 Hen. & M. (Va.) 80, 3 Am. Dec. 612), or on one made for the purpose of compounding a crime (East Stroudsburg Nat. C. L. 2).

A contract providing for the construction of a building in a manner prohibited by the city ordinance is not invalid if it also pro-

the contract,[95] although the principal may not be in a position to urge the same defense.[96]

b. Collateral Transaction. If the contract itself is not illegal, the sureties are not discharged because certain collateral acts of their principal,[97] or of the obligee,[98] are illegal; thus sureties for a contractor cannot set up as a defense that he employed aliens in violation of the law.[99]

c. Ultra Vires Contract. Sureties on bonds to a corporate obligee are liable, although the transaction may be ultra vires as to the corporation;[1] the government vides that necessary changes may be made, and a change is made so as to avoid a violation of the ordinance. Higgins v. Quigley, 23 Ind. App. 348, 54 N. E. 136.

Contract to repay public money.— Surety is not liable on a contract for the repayment of public money improperly loaned to a private person. Hartford Tp. Forfeit for failure to run race.— It has been held that in the absence of fraud the surety on a note given as a forfeit for failure to run a horse-race cannot resist the collection of the note. Crump v. Secrest, 9 Tex. 260.

If property is leased for illegal purposes, sureties on a bond conditioned for the payment of the rent cannot be held (Mound v. Barker, 71 Vt. 253, 44 Atl. 346, 76 Am. Illustration.—Although a copy of the rules and regulations of the department of agriculture attached to a license to mine, provided that "in all cases where phosphate royalties are not promptly paid in the time provided by law, the license shall be suspended," and any mining done thereafter "shall be considered and treated as illegal," the liability of sureties for the payment of the royalty is not terminated by a failure of the department to suspend the license after the first default. 98. Eagle Roller-Mill Co. v. Dillman, 67 Minn. 232, 69 N. W. 910, holding that it is not a defense to the sureties on the bond of an agent to purchase grain that the obligee furnished scales for the use of the principal which had not been tested and sealed as required by Gen. St. (1894) § 2205.

1. American Bonding Co. v. Ottumwa, 137 Fed. 572, 70 C. C. A. 270. But in Edwards County v. Jennings, (Tex. Civ. App. 1895) 33 S. W. 585, it was held that a contract between a county and a private person by which the latter was to supply the county, and private individuals who wished, with water for a certain period, at an agreed consideration, was ultra vires, and a perfect defense to the sureties on the bond of the contractor.

Sureties for an agent appointed to negotiate bonds for a city are liable for money borrowed by him on the bonds which he did not pay over, although the council of the city transcended its powers in issuing the bonds. Indianapolis v. Skeen, 17 Ind. 628. Sureties for an agent appointed by a railway company to sell coal are liable for money collected by him, although the company did not have power to deal in coal. North Western R. Co. v. Whinray, 2 C. L. R. 1207, 10 Exch. 77, 23 L. J. Exch. 261, 2 Wkly. Rep. 523.

Sureties for a bank cashier are liable, although he is not a director as required by statute (Lionberger v. Krieger, 88 Mo. 160 [affirming 13 Mo. App. 313]), or for his wrongful conversion of bank stock issued to him, although he held the stock in violation of the banking act prohibiting loans on the security of shares of the capital stock of the bank (Walden Nat. Bank v. Snyder, 7 N. Y. Suppl. 934); and are not relieved from liability by showing that he was employed in the transaction of what was not properly banking business, the claim being for money appropriated by the principal, and not for losses occasioned by illegal transactions (Springer v. Canada Exch. Bank, 14 Can. Sup. Ct. 716 [affirming 13 Ont. App. 390 (affirming 7 Ont. 309)]. A provision in the charter of a banking company that its banking house shall be situated, and its banking operations shall be conducted in a certain city, is directory only; and sureties on the bond of its cashier are not discharged by a violation of such provision. d. Violation of Rights of Third Persons. Sureties are not obliged to perform their contract where performance would violate the rights of third persons.[3]

6. Incapacity or Disqualification of Principal.[4] Although the principal lacked capacity to enter into the contract made, the surety is bound nevertheless,[5] as he may be said to warrant the competency of his principal.[6] Hence a surety for an infant principal is bound,[7] unless the principal disaffirm his contract on attaining majority;[8] but even in such a case the surety remains liable if the creditor is not placed in statu quo by a return of the consideration.[9] So a surety is liable, although the contract is void as to a corporate principal because ultra vires;[10] or because the principal is a married woman,[11] or other disqualified or incapacitated person.[12]

7. Incomplete or Irregular Instrument.[13] Mere irregularities in or incomplete-thority of the bank, although the bank did not have power to issue such bills, and was not obliged to pay them. Wayne v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 52 Pa. St. 343.

Sureties for a contractor cannot claim that the city did not proceed properly to let the contract. Madison v. American Sanitary Engineering Co., 118 Wis. 480, 95 N. W. 1097. Sureties on the bond of a contractor for building a school-house are liable, although the school-board made the contract without authority by reason of a failure to advertise for bids. People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard, 136 Cal. 55, 68 Pac. 576.

Where a surety undertakes to pay the cost of repairing streets, it is immaterial how the city has raised the money to pay for the repairs. American Bonding Co. v. Ottumwa, 137 Fed. 572, 70 C. C. A. 270.

(Tenn.) 352, 27 Am. Rep. 760; Lyndon v. Miller, 36 Vt. 329 (holding that the sureties on a tax-collector's bond are bound, although the collector never took oath of office, if in fact he acted as collector). Contra see Levy v. Wise, 15 La. Ann. 38, holding that the rule that a surety cannot plead matters personal to the principal obligor cannot be applied to a case where the principal is alleged to be a slave, and consequently incapacitated from contracting, from motives of public policy.

ness of the instrument evidencing the obligation of the principal to the creditor or obligee do not affect the surety's liability,[14] even though the principal may not be bound by the instrument,[15] provided of course the irregularity or incompleteness is not such as to render the obligation insensible and void.[16]

8. Usury.[17] While a surety may set up the defense of usury,[18] it will not avoid a contract as to a surety beyond the extent to which it vitiates it as to the principal.[19] Therefore, where the effect of usury is not to vitiate the entire contract, but only to the extent of the usury, a surety is not discharged from liability by his principal paying or agreeing to pay usury,[20] although the payment or agreement to pay was not disclosed to the surety,[21] but he remains bound for the principal and legal interest.[22] It would be otherwise if the payment or agreement to pay usury was concealed from the surety for the purpose of inducing him to do what he would not otherwise have done, or it increased the risk taken by him in becoming surety.[23]

10. Want or Failure of Consideration.[29] Where the obligation is invalid as between the original parties by reason of a total lack of consideration,[30] or because supported by an illegal consideration, this being regarded as no consideration at all,[31] it will not bind the surety. Illegality of principal's obligation see supra, IV, C, 5.

This rule has been applied to a promise that the principal will not be prosecuted for embezzlement (U. S. Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Charles, 131 Ala. 658, 31 So. 558, 57 L. R. A. 212; Rouse v. Mohr, 29 Ill. App. 321; Gorham v. Keyes, 137 Mass. 583; Hartford Tp. Bd. of Education v. Thompson, 33 Ohio St. 321); to a loan of public funds for private use which is illegal as contrary to public policy (Hartford Tp. Bd. of Education v. Thompson, supra); and to an obligation given a debt which is not due, by reason of a failure of consideration against the principal.[32] Nevertheless as the obligation of a surety arises from the consideration received by his principal, he cannot avail himself of a want of consideration where the principal cannot.[33] If a contract is void by reason of being founded in whole or in part on an illegal consideration, a renewal of it is likewise void.[34]

D. Nature and Validity of Surety's Obligation[35]— 1. In General. To enter into a valid contract creating the relation of principal and surety, as in the case of other contracts,[36] there must be competent parties,[37] an offer and acceptance,[38] and a valid consideration,[39] as well as a sufficient compliance with the formalities required by law.[40] The contract of suretyship may be either express[41] or implied;[42] and it must[43] or need not[44] be in writing, depending upon the existence or not of requirements of law to that effect.

2. Notice to and Acceptance by Principal. It seems to be necessary as between the surety and his principal,[45] but not, as between the surety and the creditor,[46] that the principal should have notice of and accept the surety's offer to assume the relation. To make one surety a principal as to another surety it must be shown that the latter became surety at his request.[47]

3. Notice to and Acceptance by Creditor[48]— a. In General. Subject to the exception hereinafter stated[49] notice to and acceptance by the creditor of the

for a gambling debt (Leckie v. Scott, 10 La. 412; Harley v. Stapleton, 24 Mo. 248; Woodson v. Barrett, 2 Hen. & M. (Va.) 80, 3 Am. Dec. 612).

offer of one to become a surety for a principal is an essential requisite to a valid and binding contract of suretyship.[50]

b. Suretyship Not Apparent on Face of Instrument — (i) In General. Where the fact of suretyship is not shown upon the face of the contract, notice thereof to the creditor must be proved in order to enable the surety to avail himself of the protection which the law affords to sureties.[51]

(ii) Effect of Creditor's Knowledge. On the other hand, one of several makers of an instrument, who has signed the same as surety for the other makers, may avail himself of the protection which the law affords sureties as against the creditor, where the creditor has knowledge of the relation, although the relation does not appear upon the face of the instrument.[52] Knowledge of appear as such in the instrument are sureties, is not shown by the sure fact that the former paid the interest on the debt.[54]

4. Express Contract[55]— a. In General. The contract of suretyship when express[56] should comply with all the essential requisites of express contracts in general.[57]

b. Qualification of Liability.[58] It is not necessary that the obligation of the principal and surety be equal,[59] and a surety is at liberty to qualify his liability either by designating the relation which he occupies,[60] or by limiting the amount for which he can be held liable.[61]

c. Agreement to Become Surety — (i) In General. A contract to pay another to become surety or to lend one his credit is not unlawful,[62] is based on a sufficient consideration,[63] and is binding upon the promising surety,[64] although the obligation between the principal and the creditor does not absolutely conform to the agreement to become a surety.[65]

(ii) Operation and Effect. An agreement to become a surety does not make the promisor one,[66] nor will an unsuccessful attempt to do so;[67] but if one has made an agreement to become a surety, he is liable for a breach of his contract, if it has been relied on, to the same extent as if he had become surety.[68] A person who actually has not become a surety cannot be made liable by the false and fraudulent representation that he has become one.[69]

Butte v. Cohen, 9 Mont. 435, 24 Pac. 206. In Dangel v. Levy, 1 Ida. 722, it was held that where an injunction bond for two thousand dollars appeared to have "one thousand dollars" written and erased between the signature and seal of one of the sureties, the surety could not limit his liability as expressed in the body of the bond, if the amount were written before the bond was signed.

But compare Shiff v. Shiff, 20 La. Ann. 269.

5. Implied or Quasi-Contract[70]— a. In General. While the relation of suretyship is never implied, but must be the result of an express contract,[71] it frequently, however, happens that contracts are made whose chief object is to accomplish some purpose other than to become liable for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, but which by operation of law incidentally have that effect.[72]

b. By Execution of Joint Obligation. If two or more persons are jointly liable for the payment of money,[73] or for the performance of some act,[74] each is a principal for his proportionate share of the debt, or so far as his own acts are concerned, and a surety as to the shares or acts of the others; but in these cases the suretyship is restricted to those so jointly liable, and never can be imposed upon the creditor or obligee without his consent, as to him each is a principal as to the whole debt or duty.[75]

c. By Endorsement of Obligation. An indorser of a negotiable instrument, except an indorser "without recourse," [76] may be liable as a surety.[77] So the drawer of a bill of exchange may become a surety after its acceptance.[78] Again, an irregular or anomalous indorser [79] is sometimes presumed to be a surety.[80] A mortgagee may become surety for the mortgagor where by indorsement upon his mortgage he subordinates the same to a subsequent lien.[81] Accommodation parties, whether indorsers [82] or makers,[83] bear the relation of sureties to the party accommodated.

d. By Assumption of Indebtedness [84]— (i) In General. A common instance of involuntary suretyship is where one party to a contract, as a part of the agreement, assumes an indebtedness owing by the other, the one assuming the indebtedness becoming the principal, and the former debtor a surety,[85] at least as between themselves.[86]

So too the purchaser of a firm's business, by assuming the firm's debts, becomes the principal and the former parties are sureties therefor.[93]

e. By Mortgage[94] or Pledge.[95] One of the most common instances of real suretyship is a mortgage[96] or pledge[97] of property to secure a third person's debt. The extent of the interest of the surety in the property is immaterial.[98] A married woman mortgaging her property for her husband's debt in which she does not have a personal interest is a surety.[99] Where a prior mortgagee of land agrees to subordinate his lien to that of a subsequent mortgage, he occupies the position of a real surety as to the indebtedness secured by such subsequent mortgage.[1]

6. Changes in Relation[2] — a. In General. Subsequent dealings between the parties to a contract may cause the relation of principal and surety to arise;[3] and the respective liabilities of principal and surety may be reversed,[4] so that the principal becomes the surety,[5] and the surety the principal.[6] Subsequent arrangements may reëstablish the original relation, so that the surety will be entitled to all the rights of such position.[7]

b. From Surety to Principal.[8] A surety may become principal by some new arrangement between himself and the creditor irrespective of the principal debtor;[9] or the surety, by arrangement with the principal, may assume the indebtedness.[10] A surety does not become a principal by consenting to a change in the contract,[11] by giving a new obligation to the creditor in place of the old one,[12] by forbearance granted to him by the creditor,[13] by making a payment and agreeing to an extension,[14] by giving a mortgage to the creditor,[15] by losing security without his fault,[16] by receiving indemnity from the principal,[17] or by a gift from the principal of a part of the proceeds of the note on which he is surety.[18] Where one of two or more joint debtors undertakes to pay the entire indebtedness, he becomes the principal, and the remainder the sureties;[19] or if the surety receives part of the debt in money from the principal, they become joint debtors.[20]

c. Notice to and Acceptance by Creditor. Whether the creditor is compelled to recognize the changed relation when informed of it, there is lack of harmony in the decisions. In some jurisdictions the creditor is obliged to respect the rights of the surety;[21] in others he may ignore the relation unless he choose to accept the surety as such.[22]

Presumptions.[25] Generally there is no presumption that any of two or more parties to a contract are sureties;[26] nor, if it be known that some are sureties, is there any presumption, from the order of the names, which those sureties are;[27] but the creditor may be presumed to know that one person is the principal[28] if such person has obtained all of the benefit of the contract,[29] as by receiving all of the money,[30] or if the contract was entered into on account of a debt due from one person only.[31] If the contract be joint, there is knowledge of such suretyship as arises from joint liability.[32]

Illustrations.— In Com. v. Scanlon, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. 665, one whose name was signed as surety, testified that she did not sign. The principal and two others testified that she did; and a justice of the peace testified that she must have signed it or he would not have certified to an acknowledgment by her, although he did not have any recollection about the matter. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to establish the fact that the surety did not sign. But in Reg. v. Chesley, 16 Can. Sup. Ct. 306, the surety swore that he signed the bond in blank, and did not make any affidavit of justification. The attesting witness and the magistrate who certified the execution of the bond swore that the surety must have executed the bond properly, or the action taken by them would not have been taken. It was held that the weight of evidence was in favor of the due execution of the bond.

c. Burden of Proof. The burden of proof is upon one asserting the non-existence of the apparent relation of principal and surety which appears from the face of the instrument.[33]

d. Language of Contract — (I) In General. The relation may be shown from the language of the contract,[34] although it is not necessary that the instrument specify the relation.[35] As to whether a contract of suretyship has been entered into, the law regards the essence rather than the form of the language used,[36] and the name given to the transaction by the parties does not govern.[37] The language, however, must be sufficient to constitute such a contract.[38]

(II) Words "Surety" and "Security." If the word "surety" or "security" is affixed to some of the names, the presumption is that those are sureties, and the others principals;[39] although the use of the word "surety" does not indicate necessarily that the promise is collateral, or that there is another primarily liable.[40]

e. Parol Evidence.[41] In most jurisdictions the true relation between the parties may be shown by parol evidence,[42] and this even though the instrument is

8. Execution of Written Instrument[46]— a. In General. The most frequent method of becoming a surety is by the execution of a written instrument to that effect.[47]

b. By Principal[48]—(i) In General. As to whether the principal is required to sign the instrument in order that the sureties may be held liable thereon, there is some conflict of authority. The better rule seems to be that when the failure of the principal to sign the instrument affects the surety injuriously, the surety is not bound.[49] But when the failure of the principal to sign the instrument in no way affects the rights or liability of the surety, the instrument is valid, and the surety is bound,[50] unless the surety signed upon the express condition that the principal should also sign before delivery of the instrument to the obligee,[51] or the statute absolutely requires the principal to sign.[52] Thus where the liability of the principal in a bond is fixed by contract,[53] or by operation of law,[54] his failure to sign the bond does not affect the liability of his sureties thereon. On the other hand another line of cases hold broadly that a bond purporting to be the obligation of one as principal and others as sureties, but which has been executed only by the sureties, does not upon its face show any obligation on the part of the sureties,[55] unless it appears that the sureties waived the execution of the bond by the principal, and authorized its delivery to the obligee as a valid obligation.[56]

(II) UNAUTHORIZED EXECUTION.[57] There is the same conflict of authority where the name of the principal has been signed without his authority. Some cases hold that in such case the sureties are liable;[58] others hold that they are not.[59] But if the sureties sign with knowledge of the fact that the principal's signature has been attached without authority,[60] or the principal is already bound independently of the bond,[61] then the sureties are liable.

(III) DEPENDING ON FORM OF BOND. In some jurisdictions a distinction is made between joint and joint and several bonds. Thus it is held that the failure of the principal to execute a joint and several bond does not invalidate the same as to a surety,[62] unless there was an express agreement that the bond should not be valid until so executed.[63] But a bond which is the joint obligation of a principal and his sureties, and not joint and several, requires the signature of the principal to render it valid and binding upon the sureties.[64]

c. By Surety[65] — (I) Signature[66] — (A) Mode of Signing. Signature of the surety may be made by mark,[67] or a signature may be cut from one instrument and attached to another where the liability intended to be assumed is not changed.[68] A forged signature, however, does not impose any liability.[69] The addition of new names to an existing instrument does not constitute making a new instrument.[70]

(B) Place of Signing.[71] Where a signature is misplaced, it is for the jury to determine whether the signer intended to become a surety.[72] A witness who inadvertently places his signature under that of the obligor is not liable as a surety;[73] on the other hand, if the instrument indicates that a signer is a surety, he cannot escape liability because he signed in the place for witnesses.[74] A person may become a surety and jointly liable with the principal, by signing on the back of the instrument.[75]

(C) Affirming Genuineness of Previous Signature. It has been held that by signing a bond after other sureties have signed and executed the same the surety affirms a genuineness of the previous signatures,[76] even though the names of the principal and the cosureties were forged without his knowledge and without complicity of the holder of the instrument,[77] and especially if the payee or obligee has accepted the instrument without notice of the forgery.[78]

(D) Two Signatures and One Instrument. If the same signature appears twice, it may indicate an intention to act in two capacities.[79]

For example where a corporation began an attachment suit, and the bond was signed by the president in two places, the corporate seal being affixed to the first and a scroll to the second signature, it was presumed that the first signature was by the president in his official capacity, and the second by him individually as surety. (E) Two Instruments and One Signature. Where two contracts appear upon one sheet, the latter only being signed by the surety, it becomes a question of intention whether he is liable on both.[80] If a surety promises to become liable for work according to specifications to be agreed on thereafter, it is not necessary that he be a party to and sign the subsequent agreement.[81]

(F) Signing Upon Condition.[82] The surety may sign conditionally, which may [83] or may not [84] release him from liability depending upon the circumstances of the particular case.

(G) Revocation Before Acceptance. A surety has the right to revoke his signature before the instrument is accepted,[85] but not afterward.[86]

(II) CONDITIONAL EXECUTION — (A) In General. As has been seen the surety may execute the contract of suretyship by signing it upon condition.[87] If a surety has agreed to be bound only upon the performance of a condition, which is known to the obligee he is not liable unless such condition has been performed.[88] But if the condition is not known to the obligee, the better rule is that a breach thereof does not relieve the surety from liability.[89] A surety for the payment of money can stipulate for the performance of certain acts before he shall become liable, such as the institution of proceedings against the principal; [90] and if he promises to pay when the principal shall receive a certain sum of money, he is not liable if such sum is not paid.[91] A surety for the loan of money can require that the indebtedness be evidenced in a certain way, as by note,[92] or draft; [93] or that

Notice of performance.— If the condition is the performance of some act by the principal, formal notice to the surety of such performance is unnecessary. A surety having covenanted that if his principal paid a debt by a certain day he would pay the fee of the solicitor of the creditor is liable upon payment by the principal, without notice of such payment or of the amount of the fee. Newton v. More, 14 Ark. 166.

Demand of performance.— If the creditor has agreed to transfer a note to the surety, his retention of the note is not a violation of the condition if the surety never made any demand for it. Chaffe v. Taliaferro, 58 Miss. 544.

it can be secured by collateral given by the creditor.[94] Conditions annexed to a sale of property must be complied with, such as that it be sold at a certain place,[95] or that it be conveyed free from all encumbrances.[96]

(B) Execution by Principal. Where a surety signs a note or bond on condition that the principal also signs it, which condition is known to the payee or obligee, the surety is not liable thereon in case the principal fails to sign.[97] But if the obligee has no notice, actual or constructive, of the condition, the surety is bound,[98] especially if, upon learning of the non-performance of the condition he does not raise any objection.[99] So where a bond is good without the signature of the principal, and the sureties' recourse against him is in no wise impaired by his failure to sign, the fact that the sureties signed the bond on the express condition that the principal should also sign is no defense to an action thereon.[1]

(C) Execution by Other Surety. Where sureties sign a bond on condition that others shall also sign it before delivery by their principal to the obligee, it has been held in some cases that they are not bound where no other signatures are procured,[2] although the instrument provides that those who sign shall be liable notwithstanding such a condition.[3] In other cases it has been held, and this seems to be the better rule, that where a surety signs an obligation upon the condition that others are also to sign it, he is bound, although the instrument is delivered in violation of the agreement, if the obligee accepts it without notice of the condition, either actual or constructive,[4] or those signing it afterward waive such con-

persons should also execute it, is not a condition, the non-performance of which will impair the validity of the obligation delivered in reliance thereon,[14] although in such case the party signing may recover damages,[15] or set them up by way of counter-claim.[16]

(E) Performance of Condition. Sureties who sign on condition may demand a strict compliance therewith, and in default thereof are not bound.[17] Thus, while a condition that another sign as cosurety is sufficiently complied with if the signature of such person is affixed by an authorized agent,[18] it is otherwise if such signature is affixed by an unauthorized person, although subsequently ratified.[19] Nor is a condition that others sign as cosureties complied with by such persons signing a long time after a default by the principal;[20] nor if their signatures be obtained by fraud,[21] or be forged,[22] unless there is nothing upon the face of the instrument to put the obligee on notice, in which case the surety is estopped to deny the genuineness of such signatures.[23] Compliance with conditions will not be excused because the surety has not been injured by non-compliance, as for instance because such other person, whose signature was required, is insolvent.[24]

(F) Waiver of Condition. In all jurisdictions one signing a bond conditionally may afterward waive such condition and thus estop himself to deny liability on the bond.[25] But to make the principle of estoppel applicable, it must be shown that the party sought to be estopped had knowledge, actual or constructive, that his confidence had been abused.[26]

(G) Notice of Condition — (1) In General. By the weight of authority it is essential, in order that non-performance of a condition may constitute a defense to a surety, that the creditor or obligee have notice thereof.[27] If the creditor or obligee was unaware that the surety had signed on condition that others should sign as sureties,[28] or that the principal should execute the contract before delivering it,[29] the liability of the surety is not affected by such conditional execution.

(2) Circumstances Putting on Inquiry — (a) In General. Notice to the creditor or obligee may be constructive. If he has knowledge of facts which would cause a reasonably prudent person to make inquiry,[30] or the conditional nature of the execution is apparent upon the face of the instrument itself,[31] it is sufficient. But in order that a defect upon the face of a bond may serve to impute notice to the obligee, it must be of such a nature as may reasonably lead to a discovery of the real defect complained of.[32] Thus the mere fact that there are more seals than signatures to a bond,[33] that the instrument contains the word "sureties,"[34] or that there are unfilled blanks[35] does not impute to the obligee notice of any conditions upon which the sureties may have signed.

(b) Failure of All Persons Named to Execute. Where a bond is delivered to the obligee without being executed by all the persons named in the body thereof as obligors, it is sufficient to put the obligee upon inquiry whether those who signed consented to its being delivered without the signature of the others;[36] and the same

If the creditor or obligee have no notice, a surety is bound, although he signed on condition that all the creditors of the principal should sign a composition agreement (Whittemore v. Obear, 58 Mo. 280), that other cosureties should be unquestionably responsible (Hunt v. State, 53 Ind. 321; State v. Garton, 32 Ind. 1, 2 Am. W. 56), or that a judgment should be marked "Satisfied" (Fowler v. Allen, 32 S. C. 229, 10 S. E. 947, 7 L. R. A. 745).

An infant obligee is not affected by notice of conditions prejudicial to him. Bangs v. Osborn, 2 N. Y. St. 685.

Notice of conditions to an authorized agent of the obligee or creditor affects the latter (Deering v. Shumpik, 67 Minn. 348, 69 N. W. 1088; Cowan v. Baird, 77 N. C. 201; Wheeler, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Briggs, (Tex. 1891) 18 S. W. 555; Carleton v. Cowart, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 45 S. W. 749), although in some cases it is held that the rule does not apply to a public agent (Lewis v. Gordon County, 70 Ga. 486), for the reason that he does not receive such notice in an official capacity (Preston Independent School Dist. No. 45, Bd. of Education v. Robinson, 81 Minn. 305, 84 N. W. 105, 83 Am. St. Rep. 374).

is true if a name originally in the body of the bond is erased before delivery,[37] unless the erasure cannot be detected.[38] But by the weight of authority no presumption arises that such a bond was not to be considered binding upon those signing until executed by all the obligors named in the body thereof. as to bind his principal as surety thereon, either by express authority,[42] or where the execution of the instrument comes within the scope of his agency.[43] Where the authority is express, the surety is not bound if the agent exceeds it,[44] or unless the agent acts within a reasonable time.[45]

10. Consideration [80]— a. Necessity. With the exception of instruments under seal,[81] a contract of suretyship, like any other contract,[82] requires a consideration; otherwise it is void.[83]

b. Sufficiency — (i) In General. The consideration may be either some advantage to the surety,[84] or some disadvantage to the creditor or obligee; [85] or it may be both; [86] and it is immaterial how small it is; [87] but it must be legal.[88] The most common form of consideration in contracts of suretyship is disadvantage to the creditor or obligee — the altering of his condition for the worse,[89] which may be by incurring liability,[90] by the release of the principal [91] or of a former surety;[92] or the surrender of some security [93] or of a right.[94] If for any reason a surety is discharged from liability on a note, a renewal note, signed by him is without consideration.[95]

Illustrations of lack of consideration.— In the absence of proof of occupancy by a tenant, his surety is not liable, there not being any consideration for his promise if the lease is void. Andriot v. Lawrence, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 142. An assignee of a lease, upon reassigning, took an agreement with a surety, for the payment of the rent. As the liability of the assignee for rent terminated with the reassignment, the second assignee did not owe him anything, and the promise of the surety was without consideration. Later plaintiff paid defendant one half of the face of the note upon the latter's agreeing to become responsible for one half of the balance due from the buyer. It was held that there was sufficient consideration for the defendant's agreement.

(II) Extension of Credit to Principal. Another method in which the creditor alters his condition for the worse, raising a sufficient consideration, is by giving credit to the principal,[96] which may be by advancing money to him,[97] demising property to him,[98] performing work for him,[99] or selling goods to him.[1] The obligee may alter his condition for the worse by giving the principal an office or employment, and trusting his affairs to him.[2]

(III) Forbearance. Forbearance by the creditor or obligee is a sufficient consideration for the contract of a surety,[3] although a definite time is not agreed upon;[4] and if, in reliance upon the agreement of the surety, the creditor forbears to bring suit against the principal,[5] or grants him an extension of time within

There is no consideration for a note signed by a surety with the expectation that it would enable the principal to obtain an additional loan, but which is held by the creditor as collateral security for a note past due. Altoona Second Nat. Bank v. Dunn, 151 Pa. St. 228, 25 Atl. 80, 81, 82, 31 Am. St. Rep. 742.

A surety who signed an overdue note is not liable thereon, although it enabled the principal to obtain an extension of time, if the surety was not aware that the object of his becoming a party to the instrument was to obtain such extension. Pratt v. Hedden, 121 Mass. 116.

Where the surety's undertaking was for money "advanced or to be advanced" to the principal, and the principal was owing money

the surety becomes responsible for advancements to be made as well as for the former debt, and such future advancements are made, there is a consideration for the entire indebtedness, past and future.[14] If the surety's contract is to answer for past and future indebtedness of the principal, and the contract is not entire, the surety will be liable for the future indebtedness, although his contract as to the past indebtedness is without consideration.[15] If the surety signs after the delivery of the contract, but in accordance with a prior agreement, the surety is bound, as the consideration is that the creditor parted with value in reliance upon the signature of the surety to be obtained,[16] unless the creditor delays too long in requesting the surety's signature.[17]

11. Validity of Surety's Obligation[18]—a. In General. A surety is not liable on an unenforceable,[19] or on a void contract,[20] even though he believes it to be valid.[21] Generally, if one cosurety, for some reason, is not bound, the instrument is void as to all of the sureties,[22] even though such cosurety afterward agreed orally to consider himself bound.[23] However, he is not released from liability as surety by the fact that another surety on a separate instrument is not bound.[24]

b. Requirements of Statute[25]— (i) Rule Stated. It is not a defense to a surety that a bond given by him does not conform to the statute under which it at the time the surety executed his agreement, and there is no evidence that any was advanced afterward, the surety is not liable. Bell v. Welch, 9 C. B. 154, 14 Jur. 432, 19 L. J. C. P. 184, 67 E. C. L. 154.

was given,[26] or that the statute may be unconstitutional,[27] as it may be a good common-law bond, if voluntarily given, although not a statutory bond.[28]

(II) RULE APPLIED. Such bonds will be enforced, although a different obligee be named;[29] or if made joint only, and not joint and several;[30] or if the penalty be larger[31] or smaller[32] than the statute provides. The addition of a condition not specifically named in the statute will not invalidate the bond.[33] If a statute or by-law requires that a certain number of sureties shall sign a bond, fewer than that number will be bound.[34] So if security in addition to the sureties be required, the sureties are bound, although such security be not taken.[35] Where a statute forbids certain classes of persons from becoming sureties, they cannot plead their lack of legal qualification as a defense.[36]

c. Forgery. A contract is void as to a person whose signature as surety has been forged;[37] but it is not a defense to a surety that he was induced to sign an instrument on the supposition that a prior signature thereon was genuine.[38] He is bound, although the signature of the principal was a forgery.[39] Likewise the forgery of the signature of a cosurety will not affect the liability of a surety,[40] whether such forged signature was upon the instrument at the time he executed it,[41]

d. Fraud, Duress, and Concealment [44]— (i) In General — (a) Rule Stated. False or fraudulent statements made to a surety at the time of the execution of his contract, or during the negotiations leading up to it, is sufficient ground for his annulling it,[45] although it may be binding on the principal.[46] So too, if a surety acts under duress, he will not be bound on his contract.[47]

(b) Rule Applied — (1) What Held to Amount to Fraud. Very little said which ought not to have been said, and very little omitted which ought to have been said,[48] and except for which the relation might not have been entered into, will suffice to avoid the contract;[49] although it is not material that the surety would have executed the contract anyway if he had known the true facts;[50] nor is it material that the surety, on making inquiry of the creditor or obligee, said that a reply would be held strictly private and confidential, and as not making the creditor or obligee in any way responsible.[51] A surety is not liable if the representations made to him are untrue although honestly made.[52] It is regarded as a fraud on the surety falsely to tell him that the principal requested him to become such,[53] or to represent that the principal is not indebted,[54] or not a

Worthless debt.— In an action on the bond of an administrator by the widow, who was the sole distributee of the estate of her husband, it is a good defense to a surety that the administrator was insolvent at the time of his appointment, and has remained so, that the estate consisted solely of a note due from the administrator, that there were not any debts due from the estate, and that he was induced to become surety by the fraud of the widow and the administrator in order to make him liable for the worthless debt. only.[68] A certificate by an employer that an employee is not in arrears is not fraudulent, although the latter may not have remitted promptly.[69] Reports on the condition of a bank, not made for the benefit of prospective sureties for its officers, cannot constitute false representations;[70] nor is a published statement of an officer's account,[71] although erroneous, or of an auditor's report,[72] an implied representation on which subsequent sureties for such officer are justified in relying. Statements and representations made by an employer in good faith to a person about to become a surety for an employee are not warranties.[73] A holder in due course of a negotiable instrument takes it free from any defense of fraud which a surety may have.[74]

(b) STATEMENT OF CREDITOR'S INTENTION. A statement by the creditor as to his intention, to induce a surety to sign, will not affect the liability of the latter. A promise by the creditor to sell the principal more goods;[75] or to loan the principal more money;[76] or to take collateral security from the principal,[77] if broken, gives the surety, at most, but a right of action for the breach; and if the promise be for the performance of an illegal act, the surety cannot be defrauded.[78]

(3) STATEMENT SUBSTANTIALLY TRUE. If the statement of the obligee or creditor is substantially, although not strictly, correct, the surety is bound if there has not been any intent to mislead;[79] but if the creditor or obligee subsequently discovers, before the negotiations are complete, that a statement made by him was false, he is bound to correct it.[80]

property of the principal, thus decreasing the property available to creditors, does not discharge a surety in the absence of any misrepresentation;[82] nor will the fact that the obligee effects a settlement with the sureties on a prior bond constitute fraud on a surety on a subsequent bond, if beneficial to the latter.[83]

(II) Concealment — (A) In General. While a contract of suretyship is not one of those designated as uberrimæ fidei — imposing a duty on the creditor or obligee to make an entire disclosure,[84] nevertheless material facts unknown to a person asked to become a surety, and which, if known, would influence him in regard to entering into the contract,[85] must not be concealed, although inquiry is not made in regard to them;[86] and it is immaterial that undue concealment was not wilful, or intentional, nor with a view to any advantage to the creditor or obligee;[87] nor can the creditor or obligee excuse a failure to communicate with the surety by saying that they did not see each other prior to the delivery of the contract.[88]

(B) Material Concealment. It has been regarded as improper concealment not to disclose the fact that the principal refused to allow application to be made for the signature of the surety,[89] or that an agent of the creditor was also a partner in the firm who were the principals.[90] When persons become sureties for an employee, they will not be liable if the employer conceals from them a prior default by such employee,[91] although not amounting to actual dishonesty,[92] and

(2) In Absence of Inquiry on Part of Surety. In the absence of inquiry, the surety is not entitled to information which is as accessible to him as to the creditor or obligee,[13] and his ignorance will not excuse him,[14] even though the facts are not known generally, unless the creditor or obligee also knows that the surety is ignorant of them;[15] nor is there any duty imposed upon the creditor or obligee to point out the risk that the surety is incurring;[16] the very fact that security is called for should make him alert.[17]

(iii) Knowledge by Creditor — (a) In General. To enable a surety to avoid his contract by reason of fraudulent or false statements, it is essential that the creditor or obligee be connected therewith.[18]

(b) In Case of Fraud Perpetrated by Principal. Fraud practised by the principal alone upon the surety will not affect the liability of the latter;[19] as no duty is imposed on the obligee to seek out the sureties and ascertain whether they have been misled.[20] However, if the creditor, standing by in silence, permits the principal, by fraud, to induce the surety to execute the contract,[21] or overhears enough of a conversation between the principal and surety to put him on inquiry,[22] or if the circumstances are such as would lead a reasonable man to believe that the principal must have used fraud, but the creditor wilfully remains ignorant,[23] the surety has a complete defense.

(c) Where Surety Has Acquired Erroneous Impression. A surety cannot escape liability on account of erroneous impressions which he has acquired by himself,[24] such as a belief that some other person was to be the principal;[25] that a signature of a firm-name by one member thereof bound all of the partners;[26] that a corporate principal was a partnership;[27] that prior signers would be cosureties with him;[28] or that the principal was not largely indebted.[29] However, if the creditor or obligee knows that the surety executed the contract under an erroneous belief, a duty then arises to enlighten him. If the surety thinks that a note is to secure future transactions only and not past indebtedness,[30] or that it is in renewal of a prior note instead of being for additional indebtedness,[31] or that it covers all of the indebtedness of the principal,[32] the payee, if aware of the erroneous impression, cannot hold him.

(d) Where Creditor Himself Is Ignorant of the Facts. Likewise the obligee or creditor cannot be said to conceal matters of which he himself is ignorant; if the principal was in default at the time the sureties executed the contract, they are bound if the creditor or obligee did not know of such default;[33] even though a failure by the latter to discover it was the result of negligence in not examining the accounts of the principal,[34] unless such negligence was gross,[35] or the obligee wilfully abstained from an investigation after having a belief, founded on reasonable and reliable information, that the principal was a defaulter.[36]

(IV) Concealment of Fraud by Creditor's Agent — (A) In General. Fraudulent statements made by an agent of the obligee will avoid the contract,[37] if the agent had authority to make them;[38] but a surety is bound to take notice, when the principal is acting as agent for the creditor, that the authority is very limited, and the surety is liable, although he relied on fraudulent statements of the principal.[39]

(B) Knowledge of Principal's Prior Default. Knowledge of a prior default of the principal known to agents of the obligee at the time a surety executed a bond making himself liable therefor, will prevent an action being maintained thereon;[40] but the general rule is that knowledge by a public agent of prior defaults of a public officer will not affect the liability of sureties on the bond of such officer,[41] as a public agent has no authority to represent the state or county in such matters.[42]

(C) One Fraudulently Acting as Agent. If a person fraudulently acts as agent for the principal and for the creditor, the latter cannot be responsible for such fraud practised without his knowledge.[43]

whether a failure of the obligee to inform the sureties of a shortage of the principal indicates bad faith,[44] which may be shown by several facts and circumstances, although no one of them by itself would prove it.[45] The question whether the surety was induced to execute the contract by fraud is for the jury.[46] The fact that a surety is illiterate does not raise a presumption against the validity of the contract, but fraud must be alleged and proved;[47] and evidence as to what was said and done is admissible to show the circumstances under which the surety executed the bond.[48] The burden is on the creditor to show his lack of knowledge of fraud.[49]

e. Illegality.[50] An indemnity given for bail, whether given by the prisoner bailed or by another, has been held to be illegal.[51]

an instrument different from the one intended;[74] nor will a clerical error, which could not have misled, free them from liability.[75]

(II) Equitable Relief.[76] If a contract cannot be enforced against a surety according to its obvious intent, a court of equity will reform it,[77] although a surety will not be charged in equity further than he is answerable at law.[78]

12. Estoppel or Waiver[79]— a. In General. As a rule a surety cannot deny facts recited in his obligation,[80] unless such recital was inserted under a mistake of fact;[81] and he will not be allowed to claim that a bond was given without consideration,[82] that the judicial proceedings in which it was given were irregular,[83] or that the necessary preliminary steps were not taken.[84] If the obligation has accomplished the purpose for which it was given, the surety will not be permitted, thereafter, to free himself from its disadvantages.[85] But a surety is not estopped by the recitals of the bond, from questioning the legality of its execution.[86]

b. As to Compliance With and Validity of Statute. Sureties on a bond are estopped to set up, as a defense, that certain statutory provisions, as to its execution, were not complied with technically;[87] nor can they question the constitutionality of the statute under which the bond was given.[88]

Where a bond is given under the supposition that it is required, it does not constitute a mistake in fact. Thus where a bond is given under the mistaken impression that a former bond was no longer in force, both bonds are valid. Brooks v. Whitmore, 142 Mass. 399, 8 N. E. 117.

d. By Delay. Delay by a surety may estop him from setting up defenses of want of consideration,[95] extension of time,[96] fraud,[97] or non-performance of conditions as to signatures.[98]

e. Contracting in Special Capacity. One in fact a surety may by express terms obligate himself as a principal, and thus waive the rights accruing to him as a surety.[99] If a surety has contracted in terms "as principal," he can be held as such,[1]

even though the fact that he is a surety is known to the creditor,[2] unless he has added the word "surety" to his signature.[3] Partners who have executed a bond in the firm-name as a corporation are estopped to deny the truth as to the capacity in which they signed.[4]

f. Signing With Knowledge of Facts. A subsequent surety is bound if, at the time he signs, he has knowledge of the facts, although ignorant of their legal effect.[5] It is not a defense to a surety that the name of a prior surety was signed without authority, where the subsequent signer had the same facilities for ascertaining the authority that the creditor or obligee had.[6]

g. Treating Contract as Valid to Obtain Personal Benefit. If the surety treats the contract as valid for the purpose of obtaining a personal benefit for himself, he afterward will not be permitted to deny his liability to the creditor;[7] but he will not be estopped to deny his obligation simply because he has taken steps to protect himself in event of a failure of his defense.[8]

V. CONSTRUCTION, OPERATION, AND EFFECT OF THE CONTRACT.

If one provision is illegal and repugnant to the rest of the instrument, it will be rejected, if it can be separated from the other provisions, and the instrument treated as a valid obligation. Collins v. Gwynne, 7 Bing. 423, 9 L. J. C. P. O. S. 130, 5 M. & P. 276, 20 E. C. L. 192, holding that a provision in a public officer's bond for the payment of money instrument a part thereof, the former must be construed in connection with it,[19] and when the contract is entered into pursuant to a statute or charter the statute or charter forms a part of the contract which must be construed in connection therewith.[20]

C. Strict Construction in Favor of Surety. Sureties are said to be favorites of the law,[21] and a contract of suretyship must be strictly construed to impose upon the surety only those burdens clearly within its terms, and must not be extended by implication or presumption.[22] This rule is followed both at law to one not entitled to receive it will be rejected as surplusage.

and in equity.[23] Construction in favor of the surety should not, however, be carried to the length of giving the contract a forced and unreasonable construction with the view of relieving him.[24]

D. Conflict of Laws. The validity of the contract [25] and the liability of a surety [26] are governed by the law of the state in which the contract is entered into. The liability of a surety is determined also by the law in force at the time his contract is made.[27]

VI. Commencement, Duration, and Termination of the Relation.

A. Commencement and Continuance in General — 1. Commencement.

The surety's liability may extend to an indebtedness of the principal accruing after the execution of the bond, although the transaction out of which it arises had its inception prior to the execution.[28] But the contract of a surety is not retroactive and no liability attaches for defaults occurring before it is entered into,[29]

The meaning of the rule as to strict construction has been held to be that the surety's obligation cannot be extended to other subjects, persons, or periods of time than those embraced or necessarily included in the contract; otherwise it is subject to the ordinary rules of construction; but the surety shall be bound to the full extent of what appears to have been his engagement, and for this purpose it is said that the words of the contract are to be taken as strongly against him as they will admit. Canada.— Canada West Farmers' Mut., etc., Ins. Co. v. Merritt, 20 U. C. Q. B. 444, holding that a bond conditioned that the principal should pay all money which he had then received, or which he should receive, does not unless an intent to be so liable is indicated,[30] although sureties who sign an old bond are sometimes liable for breaches thereof occurring before they signed, as in the case of additional security required of particular officers by an order of court, under statute.[31]

2. CONTINUANCE. A surety bound for the fidelity and honesty of his principal, and so for an indefinite and contingent liability and not for a sum fixed and certain to become due, may revoke and end his future liability in either of two cases: (1) Where the guaranteed contract has no definite time to run; and (2) where it has such definite time, but the principal has so violated it and is so in default that the creditor may safely and lawfully terminate it on account of the breach.[32] If the facts indicate that the surety intended his obligation to be a continuing security for future credit to be extended to the principal, he is not discharged by payments made by the principal;[33] but the amount named by him in his obligation indicates the balance of the principal's account for which he may be held;[34] if the surety's liability is not continuing, he cannot be held for any credit extended to the principal after the amount designated by him has been reached, although future payments made by the principal have reduced the amount due.[35]

A surety for the price of goods sold is discharged if the seller terminates the contract by seizing the goods,[36] unless there is a stipulation to the contrary;[37] but the liability of a surety for the accrued rent of personal property under a contract of letting, reserving to the owner the option of requiring the return of the property, is not affected by a sale of the property and termination of the letting.[38] A surety is not relieved from liability because a cosurety has removed from the state where the obligation was executed.[39] or resignation [46] of an employee terminates the liability of his sureties as to anything that may occur afterward, although his employment by his principals may be continued thereafter.

b. Annual or Definite Term Offices — (i) In General. If the principal is appointed or elected annually, his sureties will not be liable for defaults occurring after the expiration of the year in which the bond was given, although he is reappointed or reëlected,[47] and although the bond is conditioned for the performance of duties by the principal during his continuance in office.[48] The fact that the office of the principal is an annual one need not appear in the bond; [49] and if the appointment of the principal was to a certain date only, his sureties are not liable beyond that date, although they did not learn that fact until some years after, and not until a default had occurred.[50] On the other hand sureties will be liable for subsequent terms if the language of their contract indicates such an intention; [51] but it is requisite, even in such cases, that the service of the principal be Longer or shorter periods.— While, in most of these cases, the office is an annual one, the principle is the same, although the period be longer or shorter, the point being that if the term of office be a fixed period sureties are not liable for acts occurring after that period has expired. In Richardson School Fund v. Dean, 130 Mass. 242, the period was three years.

It makes no difference that the sureties are directors and stock-holders of the corporation employing the principal, and that it was their duty to see that a proper bond was given. Welch v. Seymour, 28 Conn. 387.

Bond to officer as obligee.— The rule that sureties are not liable beyond the current term of an annual office applies where the obligee and not the principal is the officer. Thus a bond given by a bank to a county treasurer to secure deposits of funds made by him covers the term which he is serving at the time the bond is given and not subsequent terms. (II) Reasonable Time For Election of Successor. The liability of the sureties is held not to terminate at the exact instant the term of office expires, but to continue for a reasonable time for the election and qualification of a successor;[54] but if a successor is not chosen, and the principal continues in office without any reappointment or reëlection, the sureties cannot be held for any default occurring after his term expired.[55]

2. Default of Principal — a. General Rule. If a master or employer continue in his employ a servant or agent after discovery of a default or dishonest conduct in the course of the agency or employment, without notice to and the assent, express or implied, of the sureties in a continuing suretyship for the faithful performance of the duties of such agent or servant, the sureties will not be liable for any loss arising from the dishonesty or defalcation of such servant or agent during his subsequent service or employment,[56] although they remain liable for all the defaults committed prior to the discovery of a default.[57] The principle is that when a a bond "for and during the time of his employment by the said bank, whether under his present election or under any subsequent election to the said position," etc., it was held that the sureties were bound for the whole period of the principal's service, although he was not formally reëlected from year to year.

Until another is elected.— A bond stipulating for the good conduct of a treasurer until the directors "should elect another treasurer," will not remain in force after the principal's reappointment, as "another" does not mean necessarily another person. person employed commits an act of dishonesty or is unfaithful to his trust, the employer may end the contract for his own protection, and what he may do and ought to do for his own sake the surety may require to be done for his;[58] and so if, after notice to or knowledge on the part of the sureties of the default on the part of the principal, they consent to the latter's continuance in the employment, their liability will remain as before.[59]

b. Application and Limitation of Rule. Generally this rule[60] is held to have no application to cases of mere breach of duty or contract obligations by the servant or agent not involving dishonesty or want of integrity on his part, or fraud or concealment on the part of the master or employer.[61] In this respect there is some difference between the cases. Thus it would seem that on one hand there is no active duty whatever on the employer either to notify the sureties or to dismiss the agent or employee for a mere default which does not in itself involve dishonesty,[62]

A good statement of this rule may be found in Charlotte, etc., R. Co. v. Gow, 59 Ga. 685, 694, 27 Am. Rep. 403, where it is said: "When the agent of a corporation, appointed for an indefinite time, is under bond to account and pay over daily, and he fails to perform for one day, or any number of days, whether he can be afterward trusted with additional funds at the risk of the surety upon his bond, consistently with good faith and fair dealing, without first giving notice to the surety, depends upon the apparent cause of his failure. If the corporation, or its supervising officers, have reason to believe that it results from dishonest practices or intentions, such as a conversion of the money, or a purpose to convert it, no further funds can rightfully be committed to his custody. If, on the other hand, the circumstances do not point to moral turpitude, but to lax habits of business, mere negligence, procrastination, a want of diligence or punctuality rather than a want of honesty, the corporation may continue to trust him, treating his successive failures in promptness as breaches of contract only, and relying upon the bond for protection should ultimate loss occur."

after its expiration, although the lessee holds over,[74] and the lease gave the lessee an option for a renewal,[75] unless the language of the contract indicates the contrary.[76] A surety is discharged by a surrender of the premises accepted by the landlord,[77] remaining liable, however, for rent already due;[78] but a reletting of the premises by the lessor by the direction of the surety does not operate as a surrender.[79] A surety is not discharged by the lessee's abandonment of the premises without lawful cause, although the premises are occupied by others, the lessor not being instrumental in procuring such occupancy;[80] nor is the surety discharged because abandoned premises are not relet by the lessor when he had opportunity.[81] If the lease is from year to year, the surety has the same privilege as the lessee in regard to terminating his contract by notice.[82]

4. Destruction of Subject-Matter. Generally whether the liability of a surety ceases with the destruction of the subject-matter of the contract depends on the liability of the principal, the surety remaining liable if the principal does.[83] Destruction of a building which is the subject of a lease is not a defense to a surety for the rent,[84] unless the contract provides that the lease shall be at an end in such event.[85]

5. Changes — a. As to Principals — (i) In General. An assignment of a contract by the principal will discharge a surety for its performance,[86] unless the right to assign was contemplated by the contract.[87] So a surety for one person as principal is not liable for the acts of a partnership afterward formed by that person with another,[88] although the surety has knowledge of the partnership;[89]

nor is a surety for a firm liable after a new member is added.[90] Conversely, a surety for joint principals is not liable for one of them acting independently,[91] or when changes are made in the membership of a firm, or by dissolution thereof,[92] notwithstanding the obligee is not aware of the dissolution.[93] If the partnership has been formed for a fixed period, the surety is not liable beyond the time when it should have been wound up under the articles.[94] However, if the surety has become liable for the performance of a particular contract by a partnership, its subsequent dissolution before the completion of the contract will not release him from liability for each of the former partners so far as that particular contract is concerned.[95] A surety is not discharged by a removal of the principal from one place to another;[96] but if a surety has become liable for the principal in a particular building, the surety is not liable for another person who succeeds to the occupancy of that building, although the creditor is not notified of the change.[97]

(II) By Death. Death of the principal has no effect upon the liability of his surety as to anything which occurred prior to his death;[98] and, if the obligation was for a fixed term, the surety is liable as to defaults arising after the principal's death, whether an administrator has been appointed or not.[99] If, however, the liability of the principal terminates with his death, his sureties cannot be held for anything which arises thereafter.[1] So a surety for a firm is not liable for the acts

b. As to Creditors or Obligees — (I) In General — Death. Death of the obligee is held to terminate the suretyship, although his executors continue the principal in the same capacity as before.[4] And a surety on an undertaking given to two or more joint obligees or creditors, such as partners, are not liable after any change in the number of such obligees or creditors by death,[5] or otherwise,[6] unless the intention, appearing from the instrument, is to be bound to the obligees as a class or fluctuating body.[7] Where a corporation is the obligee, its dissolution releases sureties on bonds held by it.[8]

fully, as in the case of a bond for the payment of a sum certain, or for the performance of services, the surety is bound indefinitely, and cannot terminate his liability by notice,[18] even though by death or insolvency of cosureties he is the only responsible party remaining;[19] and the personal representative of a surety has no greater right, in this respect, than the surety had.[20] The right to terminate his contract is sometimes given to a surety by statute;[21] and of course a surety may expressly reserve that right in his contract.[22] Where such right is reserved, notice by the surety cannot operate instantly, but the right must be exercised reasonably, so as to enable the obligee to procure new security from the principal.[23] Formal notice by the surety is not required unless stipulated for in the contract.[24] Where the contract gives the creditor or obligee the right to annul it by notice, and notice is given, the surety remains liable for all breaches prior to such notice.[25]

E. 566], holding that where the consideration of a contract covering a certain period was a series of promissory notes, rescission of the contract by the holder of the notes, on default in the payment of some of them, does not release the indorsers of the notes maturing before the rescission.

Notice recalled.—A surety on a contractor's bond is not released because the obligee gave notice, if such notice subsequently was recalled, and the contractor allowed to proceed, although the default occurred afterward.

7. By New Obligation. While a new contract made by the creditor or obligee to take the place of a former one discharges sureties on the old contract,[26] a new bond does not take the place, necessarily, of the old one, but may be cumulative;[27] nor does the taking of bonds in judicial proceedings discharge sureties who were liable before such bonds were given,[28] unless the intention is clearly otherwise;[29] and if the relation terminates by the making of a new obligation, the sureties on the prior one are not discharged as to defaults which already have occurred.[30] In any event the release of a surety by the making of a new bond is not effected until the new bond is executed and accepted.[31]

Provision in contract for completing work. —A contract provided that, in case of a breach, the obligee had the right to order the work under the contract discontinued, and to finish the work "by contract or otherwise," and to charge the expense to the contractors. A breach having occurred, the obligee made a new contract with one of the former contractors, who also committed a breach, and the obligee completed the work. VII. Rights and Remedies of Creditor or Obligee.

A. In General. The liability of a surety,[35] or of a supplemental surety,[36] to the creditor or obligee is generally the same as that of the principal, even though the relationship be known.[37] The principal and sureties may be bound jointly or jointly and severally.[38] A joint and several liability is indicated where the language of the instrument is in the singular number.[39] Where the liability is joint and several, each signer can be held for the entire indebtedness, and an agreement by the creditor or obligee not to exact more than a proportionate share from each is not binding on him;[40] nor is the right of the creditor to proceed against the principal alone affected by the fact that other creditors of the principal may be unable to satisfy their claims.[41] If a surety has left the jurisdiction, his property may be attached, although the principal remains within the jurisdiction.[42] If sureties have bound themselves for specific sums, each is liable individually until that amount is exhausted.[43] Where the principal and sureties are severally bound, it is not a defense to one that the creditor or obligee has recovered a judgment against another, if that judgment has not been satisfied;[44] nor that a claim has a surety for the indebtedness of the principal can avail himself of the same cause of action by way of set-off.[55]

B. Estoppel. The creditor or obligee is not estopped by giving an erroneous certificate favorable to the principal, in the absence of bad faith;[56] nor by a mere expression of opinion that the sureties have been discharged.[57] If the surety is in the employ of the obligee, a continuance of the payment of his salary is not a relinquishment of a claim against him.[58]

C. Effect of Obtaining Additional Security. A surety is not discharged by the creditor or obligee taking additional security;[59] nor by receiving possession of property of the principal, although sufficient to pay the debt.[60] The addition of a guaranty to a note will not release a maker thereof who is a surety.[61]

But where, in order to authorize an action against an indorser, the execution against the maker or obligor in a note or bond must show that no property of the maker could be found on the execution against him, the return "nulla bona" is not sufficient, since these terms import merely a want of "goods." Woodward v. Harbin, 1 Ala. 104. And see, generally, EXECUTIONS, 17 Cyc. 878.

Where the contract requires all necessary steps for collection from the maker, etc., before resorting to the assignor of a note who, upon such condition, bound himself for the amount thereof, it was held that a capias ad satisfaciendum, being an available remedy, was a necessary step after judgment against the maker upon which a fieri facias issued and was returned nulla bona. Surety cannot control execution.—A surety has no right, after a judgment has been reand pursue the principal for reimbursement,[69] or to proceed under the statute to bring such action against the debtor as may be provided thereby for his protection.[70] It follows that, in the absence of a statute, forbearance to proceed against the principal will not affect the right of the creditor to pursue the surety,[71] whatever may covered against him and his principal, to have an execution issued and levied upon the property of the principal without the consent of plaintiff; and the latter has the right to discharge the levy and withdraw the execution. Forbes v. Smith, 40 N. C. 369.

Letting in junior judgments.—A surety is not discharged by delay in proceeding against the principal, although such neglect lets in junior judgments which take all of the principal's property. McGee v. Metcalf, 12 Sm. & M. (Miss.) 535, 51 Am. Dec. 122.

75. Shaeffer v. McKinstry, 8 Watts (Pa.) 258, holding that where the surety, an administrator, delayed in selling property, and the share which would have gone to the principal to be applied on the indebtedness went to the principal's children instead, the surety had not right to complain of the delay.

Injunction.—A surety cannot take advantage of a delay caused by his obtaining an injunction against the obligee from proceed-the claim against the principal will not release a surety, although it occurs after suit has been instituted.[76] Delay in issuing execution after judgment has been obtained,[77] or a stay of execution,[78] does not discharge a surety, even if the principal disposes of his property meanwhile,[79] or it is destroyed,[80] or is discharged from the lien of the judgment.[81] Delay after a levy on the principal's property is not a defense to his surety,[82] although the principal avails himself of an adjournment of an execution sale to procure a release of his property as exempt.[83] Statutes, however, sometimes require the creditor or obligee to pursue the principal first; [84] but

In Georgia under Code, § 2154, delay in entering judgment against a principal until he becomes insolvent discharges his surety. Hayes v. Little, 52 Ga. 555.

In Indiana, under Rev. St. (1894) § 2468, the estate of a deceased surety is exempt from liability unless the principal is insolvent or a non-resident; but the claim may be allowed, notwithstanding insolvency be not proved, and the amount be paid into court, which the creditor afterward may obtain by proving insolvency. Tremain v. Severin, 16 Ind. App. 447, 45 N. E. 620.

In Kentucky St. § 4669, providing that a surety is discharged if execution against the principal be not taken out within one year, applies to the master commissioner; and execution against a surety can be enjoined if the master commissioner did not take out execution within one year on a sale bond if he had authority to take out execution (Bridgewater v. England, 62 S. W. 882, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 338); but a surety is not discharged if the master commissioner did not have authority to collect the bond without an order of court (Turner v. Eastin, 51 S. W. 567, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 380). Section 4568, requiring a creditor to issue execution against the principal upon notice by a surety, does not apply if one execution already has been issued. National Surety Co. v. Arterburn, 110 Ky. 832, 62 S. W. 862, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 281. Under 2 Rev. St. c. 97, § 11, a surety on a bond having the force of a judgment was released in a general provision of law, or of a by-law, that a defaulting officer must be proceeded against, will not release his sureties, although such provision be ignored.[85] In equity, in some cases, the creditor may be required to exhaust his remedies against the principal first.[86] If the principal is dead, the creditor is not under any obligation to present his claim against his estate,[87] in the absence of a statute on this point;[88] but may allow the estate to be distributed among the principal's heirs without affecting the surety's liability.[89] The rule is the same in regard to the estate of an insolvent principal; the creditor is not obliged to have his claim case plaintiff failed to issue execution within one year; but this did not apply to judicial bonds, the collection of which is controlled by the court. Rankin v. White, 3 Bush 545; Barbee v. Pitman, 3 Bush 259. But a surety on a bond executed to the clerk of the court for money in litigation loaned under order of court was discharged if the party to whom the fund was adjudged failed to issue execution within one year after judgment. Wintersmith v. Tabor, 5 Bush 105. The statute applied as well to the issuing of a second execution after one had already been sued on a replevin bond, as to the first. Commonwealth Bank v. Patterson, 2 B. Mon. 378. Where an execution against a principal was not levied, or a levy was postponed, without the consent of the surety, the latter was discharged unless he had property of the principal in his hands. Glass v. Thompson, 9 B. Mon. 235. Under the statute of 1838 a surety was discharged if execution was not taken out for seven years. "Sureties on judgments" means sureties on the securities on which the judgments were recovered. Bray v. Howard, 7 B. Mon. 467. And if seven years elapsed after an execution was taken out a surety was discharged. Craig v. Gresham, 12 B. Mon. 401; Daviess v. Womack, 8 B. Mon. 383; Bray v. Howard, supra.

In Louisiana, Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3066, provides that suit shall not be instituted against a surety on an appeal-bond, or on the bond of an administrator, tutor, curator, executor, or syndic, until steps have been taken to enforce payment against the principal; but the sureties for a surviving partner as liquidator may be sued without execution having been issued against the principal. Macready v. Schenck, 41 La. Ann. 456, 6 So. 517.

In Texas, Rev. St. (1895) art. 1204, provides that a surety may be sued without suing the principal, if the latter be a non-resident or is dead. Art. 3814 provides that when the principal and surety are sued together, the surety may have the property of the principal first sold; but if sureties have given a trust deed with the principal, and the latter is dead, the trust deed can be foreclosed against the sureties without postponement to foreclosure of a trust deed given by the principal alone. other securities is where a resort to equity is necessary to obtain payment of a debt, and both principal and surety are parties to the suit, and then the court will compel the creditor to pursue the principal debtor first, and exhaust his estate before selling the property of the surety, unless to do so will, in the opinion of the court, unduly delay the creditor in the collection of his debt.

The surety, however, will not be liable until security has been exhausted if he has made that an express term in his contract;[4] or if there is a statutory requirement to that effect.[5] If the creditor has two or more securities, he is at liberty to resort to either,[6] and cannot be required to realize on any particular security first;[7] nor can he be required to take and apply security held by the surety,[8] or to wait until the surety realizes on it.[9] A court of equity, however, will in some cases require the creditor to resort to security given to him by the principal.[10] principal was insolvent at the time notice was given,[14] or becomes insolvent before the creditor can collect by process;[15] and the burden is on the creditor to show that action would have been unavailing.[16] The creditor is excused likewise if the principal be a non-resident,[17] even though the latter have property in the state which might be subjected to the payment of the debt;[18] and the burden is on the surety to prove that the principal is within the jurisdiction.[19] If the creditor, being ignorant of the principal's residence, shows that he has exercised reasonable diligence to ascertain it, but without effect, the surety remains liable.[20] Death of the principal is considered a removal from the jurisdiction of the court, and the creditor is not required, under the statute, to present his claim against the deceased principal's estate.[21]

b. Persons Entitled to Give. of them.[22] The statutory notice, as well as the notice allowed in some states in the absence of a statute, must be given by the surety himself,[23] or by one with authority,[24] such as an agent,[25] or the personal representative of a deceased surety.[26] It is not requisite that the relation shall appear from the instrument,[27] or even that the creditor shall have had knowledge of the relation at the time the liability was created.[28] The statute in most states restricts the privilege of giving notice to sureties on certain designated contracts.[29] It does not extend to involuntary sureties,[30] and the relation must have existed at the inception of the contract.[31] Generally an indorser cannot claim the privilege,[32] unless the indorsement was for the purpose of security merely;[33] but it has been held that an accommodation accepter can avail himself of it.[34] An indemnified surety is denied the privilege, as he has no equities;[35] but a surety's right is not taken away by the fact of his having had dealings with the creditor.[36]

c. To Whom Notice May Be Given. If there are two creditors, notice must be given to both.[37] Notice served on the person having the legal title is sufficient without seeking an equitable owner;[38] and generally notice may be addressed to the holder of the instrument whether he holds it for collection[39] or as collateral security.[40] Notice to an agent or attorney will not suffice if the authority of such agent or attorney to receive it does not appear,[41] even though the notice is in fact surety is discharged if the creditor, after notice, fails to present his claim. Daily v. Robinson, 86 Ind. 382. And the surety must show that the principal left an estate in the state, and that administration has been had. Whittlesey v. Heberer, 48 Ind. 260.

22. See the statutes of the several states.

23. Geddis v. Hawk, 10 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 33, holding that notice to an administrator of an obligee by the guardian of one of his heirs is insufficient.

24. Conrad v. Foy, 68 Pa. St. 381.

If a female surety afterward marries, notice given by her husband is sufficient. Medley v. Tandy, 85 Ky. 566, 4 S. W. 308, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 168.

25. Wetzel v. Sponsler, 18 Pa. St. 460, holding that a general agent who transacts all the business of a surety can give notice without special instructions to that effect.

26. O'Howell v. Kirk, 41 Mo. App. 523.

27. Ward v. Stout, 32 Ill. 399; Hamrick v. Barnett, 1 Ind. App. 1, 27 N. E. 106; Meriden Silver Plate Co. v. Flory, 44 Ohio St. 430, 7 N. E. 753. Contra, Terrel v. Townsend, 6 Tex. 149; In re Babcock, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 696, 3 Story 393.

29. Thus in Alabama, Laws (1821), c. 26, § 5, did not include the parties in a joint and several sealed bill. Ellis v. Jones, 1 How. (U. S.) 197, 11 L. ed. 100. In Arkansas a bond given to a municipal corporation to secure money to be paid by a public weigher is within Mansfield Dig. §§ 6398-6400. Monticello v. Cohn, 48 Ark. 254, 3 S. W. 30. In Illinois and Missouri, the application of the statute is restricted to bonds, bills, and notes for the payment of money or for the delivery of property. Taylor v. Beck, 13 Ill. 376; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Monaghan, 38 Mo. 432. In Missouri Wagner's St. p. 1302, §§ 1, 2, has no reference to obligations given for public uses, where the duty to bring suit devolves upon state or county officers. Johnson County v. Gilkeson, 70 Mo. 645; Jasper County v. Shanks, 61 Mo. 332; Cedar County v. Johnson, 50 Mo. 225.

36. Hayward v. Fullerton, 75 Iowa 371, 39 N. W. 651 (holding that the right of a surety on a note to require the holder to bring suit against the principal is not lost because the surety made a payment, and indorsed, on the note, an extension of time for the payment of the balance); Newton First Nat. Bank v. Smith, 25 Iowa 210 (holding that a surety's right is not affected because he is a director in the bank which is the creditor).

37. Kelly v. Matthews, 5 Ark. 223.

38. Gillilan v. Ludington, 6 W. Va. 128.

39. If the creditor has left the neighborhood, placing the obligation in the hands of an agent or attorney for collection, the request may be addressed to such agent or attorney. Wetzel v. Sponsler, 18 Pa. St. 460. If a creditor receives notes under a special agreement by which he is not to sue, but to collect in any other mode, notice may be given to him by one ignorant of the limitation of his powers. Pickens v. Yarborough, 26 Ala. 417, 62 Am. Dec. 728.

40. McCrary v. King, 27 Ga. 26.

41. Cummins v. Garretson, 15 Ark. 132; Driskill v. Washington County, 53 Ind. 532; Sapington v. Jeffries, 15 Mo. 628.

Notice to the counsel of an absent or nonresident plaintiff in a judgment is sufficient. Thomas v. Mann, 28 Pa. St. 520.

Notice to spouse.—Notice to a husband or communicated to the creditor;[42] and generally notice to a public officer will not release a surety.[43]

d. Time For Giving. Notice cannot be given before a cause of action accrues to the creditor;[44] nor before the amount due has been ascertained;[45] nor can the creditor, after recovering judgment against all on whom he could get service of process, be required to bring another suit.[46]

e. Sufficiency in General. As the statute is in derogation of common law, it must be complied with strictly; and if it prescribes the manner in which notice shall be given, it must be followed to effect the surety's release;[47] but if the creditor, knowing that the surety is about to give him notice, by his conduct prevents its being given, the surety is discharged if the principal afterward becomes insolvent.[48]

f. Form. The statutes generally call for a written notice, and in such case an oral one will not operate as a release of the surety;[49] but as the requirement as to writing is a personal privilege of the creditor, it may be waived by him,[50] which waiver may be either in express terms,[51] or implied, as where the creditor accepts oral notice and promises compliance therewith.[52] Written notice is not waived wife of the creditor is not sufficient. Shimer v. Jones, 47 Pa. St. 268; Hellen v. Bryson, 40 Pa. St. 472. But in McCoy v. Lockwood, 71 Ind. 319, where the surety, in addition to leaving notice with the wife of the creditor, with a request to deliver it to her husband, afterward informed the creditor of the leaving of the notice, and of its contents, the service was held to be sufficient.

42. Adams v. Roane, 7 Ark. 360; Bartlett v. Cunningham, 85 Ill. 22; Shimer v. Jones, 47 Pa. St. 268.

43. School Trustees v. Southard, 31 Ill. App. 359 (holding that notice to the treasurer of the board of trustees for a school fund is not notice to the board); Davis v. Snead, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 705 (holding that a person appointed as commissioner to sell lands under a decree of court and to take bonds for the purchase-money is not a "creditor" within the meaning of Code (1873), c. 143, §§ 4, 5.

Notice to levying officer.— After judgment has been obtained against the surety and principal jointly, a direction to the officer to proceed to collect the debt as soon as possible, and a request to tell the creditor to proceed, does not constitute a ground for the surety's relief, as the officer is not the creditor's agent to receive notice of the surety's wishes. An allegation that notice was given "at or about" the time of maturity is insufficient. Donough v. Roger, 10 Phila. (Pa.) 616.

45. Kauffman v. Com., 5 Pa. Cas. 385, 8 Atl. 600, holding that if the amount due on an administration bond is unliquidated, a surety thereon cannot compel collection before it has been fixed by a decree of the orphans' court.

47. Simpson v. State, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 440. Thus under Tenn. Acts (1801), c. 18, it was necessary that service be proved by two witnesses. Miller v. Childress, 2 Humphr. (Tenn.) 320. Under Mo. Rev. St. § 3898, service by mail is not sufficient, although receipt of the notice is proved. Conway v. Campbell, 38 Mo. App. 473. But where the notice is in duplicate, service of either is sufficient, although the statute directs the service of a "copy." Sparks v. Munson, 76 Mo. App. 83.

Where a surety was liable on two notes, by a failure to object to the introduction of evidence showing an oral request,[53] nor by bringing suit long afterward,[54] nor from a conversation which led the surety to presume that he was released.[55] Notice must be clear and explicit,[56] and not ambiguous;[57] and the burden is on the surety to show its nature and terms.[58] If the statute indicates the terms to be used in the notice, a substantial compliance therewith is essential.[59] The notice must amount to a command;[60] it is not sufficient to express a hope,[61] a wish,[62] or a desire;[63] nor will it be a suffic ent compliance for the surety to give a hint;[64] to make a request;[65] to urge;[66] to and written notice was given as to one only, but the creditor accepted it as applicable to both, promising to sue, this was held equivalent to formal notice. Clark v. Osborn, 41 Ohio St. 28.

Written notice is not waived by the creditor answering that he cannot sue until court meets. Keirn v. Andrews, 59 Miss. 39.

In Kentucky under Gen. St. c. 104, § 11, it is provided that notice in writing shall not be waived unless such waiver is in writing; hence, the dismissal of a suit begun by the obligee after an oral promise to sue is not a defense to another action against the surety. Hibler v. Shipp, 78 Ky. 64.

53. Davis v. Payne, 45 Iowa 194.

54. Kittridge v. Stegmier, 11 Wash. 3, 39 Pac. 242, where the delay was ten months.

55. Beasley v. Boothe, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 98, 22 S. W. 255, where the creditor, on receiving oral notice to sue, refused because of an agreement to extend, whereupon the surety claimed and the creditor admitted that he was released; but, as the surety did not claim that such admission by the creditor induced him to forbear giving written notice, the creditor was held not to be estopped from enforcing the claim against the surety.

56. Denick v. Hubbard, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 347.

The notice is not clear unless its meaning can be apprehended at once without explanation or argument. Shimer v. Jones, 47 Pa. St. 268. Where an order of court directed the payment of a sum of money on pain of attachment, and an indorser of a note given as collateral security for the payment of this sum gave notice to the holder that he would require him to exhaust the remedy by attachment previous to proceeding against him, the notice was held not sufficiently explicit. Warner v. Beardsley, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 194.

57. Greenawalt v. Kreider, 3 Pa. St. 264, 45 Am. Dec. 639.

58. King v. Haynes, 35 Ark. 463. A surety must prove notice in the very mode required by the statute. Simpson v. State, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 440.

59. Simpson v. State, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 440. Under Burns Rev. St. Ind. §§ 1224, 1225 (Horner Rev. St. (1897) §§ 1210, 1211) the notice must require the obligee "forthwith" to institute an action. McMillin v. Deardorff, 18 Ind. App. 428, 48 N. E. 233. Under the Iowa statute the notice should require the creditor to elect whether to sue or to permit the surety to sue in the creditor's name. Hill v. Sherman, 15 Iowa 365. In some states the notice must declare also that the surety will consider himself discharged if the creditor does not proceed. Kennedy v. Falde, 4 Dak. 319, 29 N. Rep. 301. Notice to sue "for the collection of the amount due" instead of specifically describing the contract is insufficient under Iowa Code (1873), § 2108. Moore v. Peterson, 64 Iowa 423, 20 N. W. 744. But in Routon v. Lacy, 17 Mo. 399, notice was said to be sufficient if its object could not be misunderstood, although it does not contain a description of the note. A notice to collect all moneys for which he stood as surety for the state, without designating the principal or the obligation, was of no effect under Clay Dig. Ala. p. 532, § 6. Shehan v. Hampton, 8 Ala. 942. Notice must demand suit against all parties, and not simply against the principal. Harriman v. Egbert, 36 Iowa 270. The notice need not follow the precise words of the statute, and require suit to be brought against "the principal debtor and other parties liable," but it is sufficient if they are mentioned by name. Christy v. Horne, 24 Mo. 242. Although the statute provides for notice if the surety apprehends that the principal is about to become insolvent, or is about to leave the state without paying the debt, it is not necessary that the surety's apprehension of these facts be set out in the notice. Shehan v. Hampton, 8 Ala. 942.

60. Denick v. Hubbard, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 347; Porter v. First Nat. Bank, 54 Ohio St. 155, 43 N. E. 165. "We notify you to commence an action" is sufficient. Meriden Silver Plate Co. v. Flory, 44 Ohio St. 430, 7 N. E. 753. If it is doubtful whether the surety intended to request suit as a matter of favor, or to require it as a matter of right, the jury should find, from the facts, how the parties understood the matter. suggest;[67] to advise;[68] or to state that the surety refuses to remain liable,[69] or that he will not pay except under compulsion.[70] The notice must be in effect a demand to sue,[71] and be more than instructions to dun the principal.[72]

g. Compliance. Upon receipt of notice to sue, the creditor must bring suit within the time prescribed by statute, or the surety will be discharged,[73] although

69. Lockridge v. Upton, 24 Mo. 184, holding that the words, "I will not stand good as security any longer," is not a requisition to sue. Nor is a notice sufficient which says that the principal's property would pay, and that the surety would pay nothing. Wilson v. Glover, 3 Pa. St. 404.

70. Williams v. Ogg, etc., Lumber Co., 42 Tex. Civ. App. 558, 94 S. W. 420, holding that the words, "We do not intend to pay any more of the notes until we are forced to do so," were not sufficient as a notice under Tex. Rev. St. (1895) art. 3811, tit. 84.

71. The following expressions are not sufficient: "To get it settled." Bowling v. Chambers, 20 Colo. App. 113, 77 Pac. 16. "To go and get his money." Maier v. Canavan, 57 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 504. "Make Daniel come to time." Lawson v. Buckley, 49 Hun (N. Y.) 329, 2 N. Y. Suppl. 178. Notice to collect may be sufficient if the language used indicates that the collection must be made by suit if necessary. The following expressions have been held to be sufficient: "To proceed at once to collect." Franklin v. Franklin, 71 Ind. 573; Iliff v. Weymouth, 40 Ohio St. 101. "To collect it, as he would not stand bail any longer." Strickler v. Burkholder, 47 Pa. St. 476. "To use every effort to collect." Sullivan v. Dwyer, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 42 S. W. 355. In the following cases the accompanying language was not deemed equivalent to instructions to sue: Darby v. Berney Nat. Bank, 97 Ala. 643, 11 So. 881; Coykendall v. Constable, 48 Hun (N. Y.) 360, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 9 [affirmed in 117 N. Y. 627, 22 N. E. 1128]; Parrish v. Gray, 1 Humphr. (Tenn.) 88. "Put in a train of collection, as he had reason to believe the principal would avoid payment if possible" was held insufficient. Bates v. State Bank, 7 Ark. 394, 46 Am. Dec. 293.

72. Wilson v. Glover, 3 Pa. St. 404, holding that notice "to push" the principal is not sufficient.

73. German-American Bank v. Denmire, 58 Iowa 137, 12 N. W. 237.

Reasonable time.— In some states action must be commenced within a reasonable time. This was the requirement in Alabama under the statute of 1821. Scott v. Bradford, 5 Port. (Ala.) 443. Where notice was received by a creditor on October 17, and action was not commenced until January 25, it was not instituted within a reasonable time as required by Ohio Rev. St. § 5833. Meriden Silver Plate Co. v. Flory, 44 Ohio St. 430, 7 N. E. 753. A delay of three months in bringing suit after notice has been held not sufficient to discharge the surety. Ingals v. Sutliff, 36 Kan. 444, 13 Pac. 828.

To first term of court.— In some states suit must be brought to the first term of court having jurisdiction, after notice is received by the creditor, if there is sufficient time to do so. Alabama Nat. Bank v. Hunt, 125 Ala. 512, 28 So. 488; Craft v. Dodd, 15 Ind. 380; Donough v. Boger, 10 Phila. (Pa.) 616. And suit is brought to the first court when the summons is made returnable to the next term, and served on defendant at least three days before the first day of such term, and duly returned on or before such day. Guttery v. Pickett, 125 Ala. 434, 27 So. 840. If the creditor might have brought suit in a court in session at the time notice is received, but he waits until a subsequent term, the surety is discharged. Hamrick v. Barnett, 1 Ind. App. 1, 27 N. E. 106; Wetzel v. Sponsler, 18 Pa. St. 460. Where the payee of a note, on receipt of notice, immediately endeavored to employ attorneys at the place of her residence, but was unable to do so, the attorneys being adversely interested, and on her first opportunity went to an adjoining town, twenty-six miles distant, and there employed attorneys who brought suit at the first term of the district court, there not being sufficient time before the return-day of the next term of the county court, the facts sufficiently showed diligence. Robertson v. Angle, (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 76 S. W. 317.

Within certain number of days.— In some states the statute specifies a certain number of days within which suit must be instituted. In Miller v. Gray, 31 Ill. App. 453, a delay of thirty-six days was too long. Where, by an alteration of the date, without the surety's consent, a note was made to fall due one year later than as originally drawn, but the surety demanded suit on the note according to its original tenor, a judgment subsequently entered on a cognovit without notice to the surety should be opened, and the surety be allowed to show whether he had been discharged by the payee's failure to bring suit promptly. Wyman v. Yeomans, 84 Ill. 403. In Missouri suit must be brought within thirty days in some court where service can be obtained on the principal as well as on the surety. Cox v. Jeffries, 73 Mo. App. 412. The disturbed condition arising from the Civil war was considered an insufficient excuse for non-compliance with the statute, if the courts were open. Cockrill v. McCurdy, 33 Mo. 365. Where suit was instituted, before a justice, two days after notice, but the summons was made returnable more than thirty days after, the surety was not released in the absence of evidence that the return-day had been set longer than necessary, two the latter does not sustain any actual injury from the delay.[74] If the statute will be complied with by bringing suit in any one of two or more courts, the creditor has the privilege of selecting either, although the matter might be expedited if another were chosen.[75] The statute sometimes provides who shall be made parties defendant.[76] If the suit fails through improper pleading, the creditor is in the same position as if he had never brought suit at all; [77] but the creditor is not compelled to resort to additional remedies, such as attachment, to enforce the collection of his claim.[78] The statute is not complied with by merely instituting suit, but it also includes the duty of prosecuting it with due diligence.[79]

h. Withdrawal. The surety may withdraw his notice by requesting the creditor not to sue,[80] or by acquiescing in the dismissal of a suit brought in compliance with his notice,[81] in which case the surety's liability continues; but the surety is no longer liable if he requests indulgence for himself alone, and not for the principal, and the creditor does not bring suit against the principal.[82]

F. Demand and Notice of Default. To hold a surety it is not necessary to make a demand on the principal for payment,[83] or for the performance of the of defendants living in different townships. Patton v. Cooper, 84 Mo. App. 427.

What statute governs.— Where the creditor commences action after the passage of one act, and prior to the enactment of another shortening the time in which suit must be brought, he is entitled to the time provided in the former statute. Nichols v. McDowell, 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 6.

It is a question of law whether a creditor has been duly diligent in proceeding against the principal. Neal v. Freeman, 85 N. C. 441.

Evidence of a cosurety's responsibility is admissible, on behalf of a surety, as showing the probability of a delay by the creditor in bringing suit. Vancil v. Hagler, 27 Kan. 407.

74. Sullivan v. Dwyer, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 42 S. W. 355.

75. Collum v. Fahrner, 83 Mo. App. 110; Robertson v. Angle, (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 76 S. W. 317. But where, by bringing suit in the circuit court, the creditor could sue both principal and surety jointly, he does not comply with the notice if he brings suit in a justice's court which has jurisdiction of one only of the defendants. Sisk v. Rosenberger, 82 Mo. 46; Hardy v. Worthen, 53 Mo. App. 580.

76. In Missouri, under Rev. St. (1889) § 8344, suit must be brought against the principal and surety; and the surety can show that the principal was living at the time of the institution of the suit, although since deceased. Davis v. Gillilan, 71 Mo. App. 498. Under a former act the creditor was not required to join the sureties as defendants. Perry v. Barret, 18 Mo. 140. In Alabama, under the statute of 1821, suit might be brought against the principal or surety or both. Scott v. Bradford, 5 Port. (Ala.) 443. In Rowe v. Buchtel, 13 Ind. 381, the creditor was not required to sue the surety. The creditor may sue the principal alone, or the principal and surety, but not the surety alone. Starling v. Buttles, 2 Ohio 303.

77. Hempstead v. Watkins, 6 Ark. 317, 42 Am. Dec. 696.

78. Robertson v. Angle, (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 76 S. W. 317.

79. Sisk v. Rosenberger, 82 Mo. 46.

It is the duty of the creditor to use all means of saving the surety which the law puts in his power, which a prudent man would adopt to save himself. Wetzel v. Sponsler, 18 Pa. St. 460.

If a suit be dismissed, although promptly instituted, diligence is not shown. Overturf v. Martin, 2 Ind. 507.

If the creditor fails to obtain service at the first term, he should take out an alias summons to the next term. Peters v. Linenschmidt, 58 Mo. 464.

Execution.— Delay to take out execution for fifty-two days after judgment will discharge a surety. Martin v. Orr, 96 Ind. 491. P. 364, sureties for a postmaster undertook that he would not commit larceny of any money, or of any letter containing the same which might come into his custody. He opened letters; and, having taken therefrom some checks, forged the payees' names thereto, warranted the genuineness of the indorsements, and cashed the checks at a bank. The checks were not paid, and the drawers issued duplicates, so that the bank lost the money. It was held that the sureties were not liable, as the forgery and warranty, not the larceny, were the proximate causes of the loss, the contents of the letters not belonging to the bank. But in City Trust, etc., Co. v. Lee, 204 Ill. 69, 68 N. E. 485 [affirming 107 Ill. 7. As Limited by Penalty. A surety on a bond is not liable beyond the penalty named therein;[9] and, after a surety on a bond to indemnify a surety, has paid the full amount of the penalty of such bond, he, as creditor, can recover from the latter surety a claim for which such surety was liable.[10] It is not a defense to a surety that judgments have been recovered to the amount of the bond, if the judgments have not been satisfied;[11] nor will a court enjoin proceedings against a surety because the aggregate amounts sought to be recovered exceed the penalty.[12] If the amount of the penalty is insufficient to satisfy all claims, it should be apportioned.[13] If sureties bind themselves severally for certain amounts, each is liable up to that amount,[14] but not beyond it.[15] Sureties, although not liable beyond the penalty as to some persons, may be liable beyond it as to others, if the bond so provides.[16] A surety is entitled to have the proceeds of security given him by counsel fees incurred in its recovery, took the amount due him less the fees and receipted, having participated in the recovery, he could not afterward come upon his debtor's surety for the amount of such fees. Gurnee v. Bausemer, 80 Va. 867.

Acts (1835), c. 20, gave jurisdiction to the chancery court against sureties for the performance of covenants and collateral conditions, where it had jurisdiction against the principal; but they might demur if they could not be embraced in the decree for re-trust and account.[28] The contract may require that suit against the surety shall be brought within a certain time after the principal's default.[29]

2. Venue. If the contract specifies a place of payment, sureties may be sued in that place;[30] but sureties cannot be sued at the place of performance if they are not residents of that place, if a place of payment is not specified.[31] The fact that the principal submits to the jurisdiction does not deprive the sureties of their privilege as to the place of being sued.[32] If the principal and surety are jointly liable, and are residents of different counties, suit may be brought in either county.[33]

3. Who Can Enforce Surety's Liability. The obligee of a bond is the only one who can enforce the liability of sureties thereon,[34] unless by virtue of a statute,[35] or of an express provision in the instrument.[36] A bond to one partner as obligee

4. Parties Defendant. If the principal and sureties are bound jointly, they should be joined as defendants;[52] and the fact that the word "surety" is added after some of the signatures does not alter the rule.[53] In event of the death of one, a surviving surety can be held liable.[54] If the principal and sureties are bound jointly and severally,[55] the creditor or obligee can proceed against one surety without joining the others;[56] or he can enforce his claim against the property only, the surety is not a necessary,[63] although a proper, party,[64] nor is a surety a necessary party where the object of the suit is an accounting by the principal.[65]

5. Service of Process. In order to obtain a valid judgment against a surety, it is essential that he be served with process,[66] unless there is a statute to the contrary which enters into and forms a part of the contract.[67] Service on the principal is not requisite in order to obtain a valid judgment against the surety,[68] unless the principal and surety are joined in one action and a joint judgment is rendered against them.[69]

6. Pleadings — a. Form of Action. The form of action against a surety will depend very largely upon the contract entered into by him. The fact that the word "surety" is appended to his signature does not prevent recovery on the common counts in assumpsit.[70] If recovery cannot be had in general assumpsit under the money counts, he must be declared against specially.[71]

b. Declaration, Complaint, or Petition. In determining whether a complaint states a cause of action the whole must be considered together.[72] The contract of the principal should be set out.[73] As a rule it is not necessary to say that the surety's contract was in writing; [74] but a consideration between the principal and the obligee must be shown.[75] An allegation of indebtedness is sufficient without averring a promise to pay it.[76] If a contract authorizes alterations therein, and alterations have been made, they should be set out; [77] but if the contract provides

Allegation of payment or lien.— Plaintiff alleged that she was the owner of described land and contracted with one of the defendants to erect a building thereon, and that he gave a bond with the other defendant as surety for the carrying out of the contract; that plaintiff had complied with the contract, and a third party had filed a lien on the building for materials furnished, and had sued to foreclose the same; that the sureties on the bond had been notified of the claim, and had refused to pay the expenses and attorney's fees in defending the same, and prayed for judgment for the amount of the lien and costs and attorney's fees. It was held that to charge the sureties on account of the materialman's claim, it must appear that she had paid the claim, and that it was, under the law, a valid lien on the property, and where there was no allegation of payment or that the lien was valid, the petition was demurrable. amend; [97] but the allowance of an amendment is not an adjudication as to the materiality or effect of evidence in support of the amendment.[98]

c. Plea or Answer — (i) In General. Where separate actions are instituted on the same instrument, a plea filed in one cannot be extended to the others, but a plea must be filed in each suit.[99] A plea filed in a suit against the principal and surety jointly should answer the action as to both.[1] A misjoinder of defenses will not prevent the surety from offering evidence thereunder.[2] The objection that the principal,[3] or a cosurety,[4] has not been made a party defendant, must be taken advantage of by a plea in abatement; if the sureties unite with the principal in a plea to the merits, they admit the suretyship.[5] A plea which traverses the facts alleged in the declaration amounts to the general issue [6] and is sufficient.[7] If defendant wishes to take advantage of a discrepancy between the covenant actually made and the one recited in the declaration, he should plead "non est factum" ; [8] and under this plea it may be shown that a deed was executed conditionally only, and as an escrow.[9] To obtain any benefit arising out of the relation, the surety must set up the fact of suretyship, and demand his privileges; [10] if his plea is inconsistent, he may lose them.[11] An answer setting up the suretyship merely is not a bar to the action unless connected with other facts.[12] A plea of a statutory defense is sufficient if it substantially adopts the language of the statute.[13] Certain defenses should be pleaded specially, such as delivery of the instrument without authority,[14] fraud,[15] and non-performance of conditions by plaintiff; [16] or that the liability of the surety has been terminated by a new obligation.[17] Likewise if the surety wishes to avail himself of his statutory exemption from suit until the principal has been sued,[18] or desires to prove error in a decree against the principal,[19] he must do so by a special plea. As a rule the objection that there is no writing as required by the statute of frauds need not be pleaded specially.[20] An answer which avers that the signature of the surety was obtained by false representations should add that he was uninformed as to the subject misrepresented.[21] If fraud on the principal is pleaded, the rescission of the contract

by the principal on account thereof is averred sufficiently by a statement that the principal refused to perform it.[22] A plea of duress of the principal by imprisonment should allege that the imprisonment was illegal, or used for an illegal purpose, and that the surety was ignorant of its real character.[23] A defense that conditions have not been performed by plaintiff should be accompanied by an allegation that he had notice of them.[24] The defense of want of consideration need not be pleaded specially.[25] A plea that the surety did not receive any consideration is bad.[26] A plea that the liability of the surety had terminated prior to the default of the principal, without stating any facts in support, is a mere conclusion, and insufficient.[27] Under a plea of the general issue, a surety may show that plaintiff has enough money of the principal to satisfy the demand.[28]

(II) Release and Discharge in General. As a general rule, the surety must specially plead that he has been discharged by an alteration of the instrument or contract;[29] an extension of time to the principal;[30] the relinquishment or loss of securities by plaintiff,[31] or that the principal has been discharged,[32] or released by plaintiff;[33] or by plaintiff's non-compliance with the statutory notice to sue.[34] If the surety sets up a discharge by reason of some act of plaintiff which injured him, he must allege the facts which caused such injury,[35] and show the consequent damage.[36] An averment that the surety has been "lulled into security by the surrender" of a note to the principal by plaintiff sufficiently indicates knowledge of the surrender by the surety and prejudice.[37] An answer that the surety has been discharged by failure of plaintiff to bring suit after notice to do so should aver that suit could have been brought at the time notice was given.[38] If an extension of time to the principal is claimed as a defense, the plea should aver that plaintiff had knowledge of the suretyship,[39] that it was given without the surety's consent,[40] that there was a consideration therefor,[41] and of what the consideration consisted;[42] but the consideration pleaded may be described in general

Amendment of plea.— Where defendant, sued as a principal on a note, filed a plea that he was surety only, it was error to refuse to permit him thereafter to file a properly verified amendment alleging that, by reason of usury exacted without his knowledge by plaintiff from the principal, a waiver of homestead in the notes had been avoided, which had increased defendant's liability as surety. terms.[43] The time for which the extension was granted should be named,[44] although it need not be with strict accuracy.[45] Facts which prove the extension need not be pleaded.[46] A plea that the principal had executed a promissory note to plaintiff does not indicate an extension.[47] A plea of a release on condition must allege performance of the condition by defendant;[48] and a plea that the principal has been released must be certain and definite.[49] A plea of relinquishment of security by plaintiff must show the value of such security;[50] and such defense cannot be made by alleging a change made in the contract.[51] An allegation that plaintiff, a bank, had not applied money of the principal "on deposit, and payable to his order," sufficiently shows that the deposit was a general one, and liable to appropriation on the debt.[52] A plea that plaintiff did not proceed against the principal on receipt of notice to sue from the surety should state with certainty all the material facts,[53] alleging that the notice was in writing, when this is required by the statute,[54] and that the principal was solvent at the time notice was given;[55] but defendant need not state that he apprehended that the principal was about to become insolvent or remove from the state;[56] nor that plaintiff had notice of defendant's character as surety.[57] It is not necessary that the notice be set out; and, if set out, an error is not fatal.[58] The failure of plaintiff to sue can be stated in general terms; and the exact time of delay need not be named.[59]

(III) Alteration of Instrument or Contract.[60] As already stated,[61] the surety must, as a rule, specially plead that he has been discharged by an alteration of the instrument or contract;[62] and the changes made should be set out;[63] but in some jurisdictions, under a general denial of execution, or the general issue, a surety may show that, after he signed the bond, and without his knowledge, it was altered, as by the erasure of a signature of a cosurety and addition of another.[64]

must aver acceptance by plaintiff.[66] On the other hand, a statement that "to the best of the information and belief" of defendant plaintiff gave the principal a receipt does not indicate payment.[67] Where the declaration claims a certain sum due, omitting interest, a plea that defendant paid that sum, with interest, is bad;[68] and a plea that the principal executed a promissory note to plaintiff is not a plea of payment;[69] nor will an equitable discharge of a surety support a plea of payment.[70] The defense of payment may be shown under a general denial.[71] A plea of performance admits the execution of the instrument.[72]

d. Replication or Reply. Where the answer of defendant is in effect a denial of liability, a reply is not required.[73] If defendant pleads a defense which covers a part only of the claim of plaintiff, and plaintiff, in his replication, simply denies the truth of this defense, such defense being sustained by the evidence, plaintiff cannot recover that part of the claim concerning which a defense was not made.[74] A replication, although unnecessarily long, and being substantially a new assignment, is good if it expressly deny the material part of the defense.[7] Where the plea of defendant is that he became surety for the principal for one year, and no longer, a replication denying that defendant became surety for the period in the plea mentioned, or for any other specified time, is sufficient.[76] To the answer of a surety that the name of a new surety was added to a note without his consent, a reply that defendant, with full knowledge of the facts, fully ratified the note, and agreed to pay, sufficiently alleges a ratification;[77] but, to an answer alleging that the note was signed after delivery without consideration, a reply that defendant agreed to pay one half of the note if another surety would pay one half, which the latter had agreed to do, is insufficient in not showing with whom the agreement was made, or the performance of the condition.[78] Where the plea is that defendant was discharged by failure of plaintiff to sue after defendant had notified him to do so, plaintiff cannot recover without pleading that defendant has not sustained any injury.[79] If defendant pleads that plaintiff obtained, in a prior suit, a verdict on a counter-claim for the identical damages claimed in the present action, a replication merely alleging that the recoupment, in the former suit, was directed to special counts only, which were not submitted to the jury, without showing that the plea of recoupment was withdrawn or disallowed, or that the finding did not extinguish all of his claim against the surety, is demurrable.[80]

7. Evidence — a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. The burden is on the creditor to show performance on his part,[81] and liability on the part of the surety, including all facts necessary to establish such liability,[82] and that the matter con-

Fraud.— Where a creditor seeks to enforce cerning which recovery is sought was covered by the surety's contract; [83] but he need not show that all matters preliminary to the giving of an official bond were complied with.[84] As a rule the burden is on the surety to show the relation sustained by him, if such relation is not shown on the face of the instrument; [85] that the instrument, which he admits having signed, was not accepted by the payee; [86] that the principal was within the jurisdiction of the court, so that he might be first proceeded against, as required by statute; [87] that the debt might be collected from the principal or his estate; [88] or that he has been discharged by some act of plaintiff,[89] or by failure of the creditor to sue the principal debtor after payment of a note against the surety whose signature was obtained by the fraud of the principal debtor, he has the burden of proving that he took the note without knowledge of the fraud. Monroe Bank v. Anderson Bros. Min., etc., Co., 65 Iowa 692, 22 N. W. 929.

Signature of other sureties as condition precedent to liability.— Where the names of two as sureties appear in the body of a bond, and one of them signs the same in the presence of the obligee and leaves it in his possession, without saying anything restricting his liability, no presumption arises that such bond was not to be considered binding upon him until the signature of the other surety should be obtained. App. 292; Columbia Finance, etc., Co. v. Mitchell, 72 S. W. 350, 24 Ky. L. notice,[90] or by performance.[91] But, by the weight of authority, the burden is on the creditor to show that the surety consented to an alteration of the contract,[92] or to an extension of time of payment or performance; [93] that the surety, after a discharge by an extension of time or otherwise, made a new promise; [94] that a note after the extension of the time of payment is a valid and existing obligation; [95] or that the surety was not injured by the relinquishment of a levy or other lien on the principal's property,[96] or by failure of the creditor to sue the principal debtor when notice to sue was given.[97] The amount acknowledged by a public officer to be due by him to the state, in his return to the auditor, is prima facie evidence of the amount due, not only against himself, but also against his sureties.[98]

b. Admissibility — (i) In General. Where sureties on two bonds unite in a plea, each bond is admissible in evidence.[99] Oral evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of the instrument upon which suit is brought,[1] nor to show agreements and dealings between the principal and surety with which the creditor or obligee is not connected,[2] nor in reference to irrelevant matters and undisputed points.[3] Where the sureties have alleged one defense, evidence of a different defense is inadmissible; [4] nor can the surety show an opinion expressed by the Presumption from taking order on third person and rebuttal.— Where a creditor takes from his debtor an order on a third person, payable generally and absolutely, and at a time certain, there is a presumption that it was taken in payment, and extended the time of payment, of the original debt, but such presumption may be repelled by proof that it was taken as collateral security. obligee as to the legal liability of the surety;[5] but matters subsequent to the contract can be shown by the surety in his exoneration,[6] such as an extension of time to the principal,[7] or an alteration of the contract.[8] Conversations and correspondence between the principal and creditor can be offered in evidence by the surety to show the circumstances under which the contract was made,[9] and the creditor can show a conversation between himself and the principal indicating that the creditor was induced to grant an extension upon a representation by the principal that the surety agreed thereto.[10] The principal personally can testify as to transactions between himself and the obligee;[11] and, if the surety is sued alone, the husband of the principal is a competent witness either against or in favor of the surety.[12] The right of the obligee to recover is not taken away by a loss of written instruments;[13] but their contents may be shown in other ways.[14]

A surety on an appeal-bond cannot attack the judgment appealed from;[26] and a decree that an injunction was sued out wrongfully by the principal is conclusive against a surety on the injunction bond who has undertaken that the principal will pay all damages which may be adjudged.[27] If there has been fraud or collusion in obtaining a judgment against the principal, such fact may be shown by the surety.[28] Where the surety has had an opportunity to contest the claim of the creditor or obligee, he cannot afterward contest it;[29] nor can he enjoin a judgment recovered against him.[30] A judgment in favor of the principal is admissible on behalf of the surety, in connection with proof that it is for the same demand, and that it has been satisfied.[31] creditor to fix liability on the surety, and if there be fraud between the creditor and the principal in this respect the surety can obtain relief from it.[38]

c. Sufficiency. Uncontradicted evidence of an admission, by one of the defendants, that a debt is his own, supports a finding that he is the principal;[39] but the relation of principal and surety is not shown by the fact that a judgment has been obtained against one only of two makers of a note;[40] nor by a statement by one of the signers of a note that it was genuine and given for value, and that there was no defense thereto.[41] Where the liability of sureties on a bond is alleged, and a breach of the contract of the principal is proved, a judgment against the sureties is supported by the proof.[42] The same facts which establish the non-payment of a debt on a bond against the principal affect the sureties.[43] If the bond of suretyship provides that a written statement by an employer, based on the accounts of the principal, "shall be prima facie evidence" of a loss sustained by the wrongful act of the principal, the employer makes out a prima facie case by offering such a statement in evidence.[44] But where a building contractor and his surety agree to secure the owner against all liens, and liens are filed, a judgment by default against the owner is not conclusive on the surety;[45] nor is a breach of a guardian's bond shown by proof that his ward did not receive the proceeds of a sale of real estate, as the guardian may have expended it properly.[46] Where the burden of proof is on the creditor, it is not sustained by contradictory evidence.[47] The jury are not obliged to believe any witness, and are not bound to find that certain defendants are sureties when the instrument is silent as to that point.[48] A variance between the evidence offered by a surety, and the allegations in his answer, will not be fatal if the evidence sustains the gist of his defense.[49] If the evidence is conflicting, the court will not disturb a finding by the jury that representations made to a surety were fraudulent;[50] that conditions annexed by him have not been complied with;[51] that his contract has been altered;[52] or that an extension of time was granted to the principal without the consent of the surety,[53] or with his consent.[54]

8. Trial — a. In General. The surety cannot complain of irregularity in the proceeding which does not affect him;[55] and he is bound by the agreement of the principal with plaintiff for a judgment and stay of execution, although entered into without his knowledge and consent.[56] The action of the creditor against the surety cannot be delayed by a cross action of the surety against the principal;[57] nor is a surety on the bond of a contractor, when sued for damages, which the obligee has been compelled to pay on account of the negligence of the contractor, entitled

b. Questions of Law and Fact. As in other cases,[61] questions of law are for the court,[62] while questions of fact are for the jury.[63] It is for the jury to decide whether a surety lacked capacity at the time he executed the contract;[64] and, where it is doubtful from the testimony what relation the defendant assumed, that point should be left with the jury.[65] The jury should decide also whether a contract set out in the declaration was the one for the performance of which defendant gave bond;[66] and whether plaintiff has exercised due diligence in giving notice of acts of the principal,[67] or in enforcing a lien.[68] The jury likewise should pass upon the point of acceptance of work by the obligee as performance of the contract,[69] or whether alleged transactions between the obligee and principal have taken place.[70]

c. Instructions. In an action against a surety the court should properly instruct the jury as to all the issues raised by the pleadings and evidence;[71] but

71. See, generally, TRIAL. In a suit on a note by the indorsee bank against the maker, in which the maker alleged that the note was made for the accommodation of the payee investment company, a charge that if defendant signed the note as accommodation maker, and plaintiff had notice thereof, and if, at the time of making the same, it was agreed by plaintiff that it would hold certain stock as security for the same, and afterward the investment company agreed with plaintiff that its cashier could realize on the stock, and pay pro rata on certain of the investment company's notes, held by

should not instruct as to issues not so raised.[72] An instruction submitting an issue not raised by the evidence, such as premature payment,[73] or ratification of an alteration,[74] is erroneous; but an instruction that an agreement for an extension need not be in express terms is harmless where the agreement, if it existed at all, was express.[75] An instruction that the defenses of the principal and surety depend upon the establishment of the fact that an extension has been granted is not erroneous, where the principal claims that the action has been prematurely brought because the extended time has not expired, and the surety claims a discharge because of such extension.[76] Where the defense of a surety is that the creditor surrendered certain bonds held as collateral security for the debt, an instruction that plaintiff "controlled" the bonds implies that there had been a delivery and acceptance of the bonds by him.[77] When the court has substantially given the charge asked by a surety upon his defense, the refusal to repeat the charge is no ground of complaint.[78]

d. Verdict and Findings.[79] A verdict is not objectionable by reason of words which are mere surplusage.[80] If the contract stipulates that an extension shall not release the surety thereon, there need not be a finding that there was an extension.[81]

9. Judgment[82] — a. In General. A surety cannot be made liable by a judgment entered without any proceeding against him;[83] nor can a judgment against a surety be based on a verdict against the principal alone;[84] and, in an action against a sheriff, if the record fails to show that proof was made as to who were the sureties on his bond, the judgment can be considered as against him only.[85] If suit be brought against the principal and surety jointly on the same instrument, the judgment must be against all or none,[86] and rendered against all at the same time.[87] If judgment be obtained against the principal alone, the sureties are plaintiff without the knowledge and consent of defendant, they should find for defendant, was as favorable to defendant as the facts warranted. Smith v. Traders' Nat. Bank, 82 Tex. 368, 17 S. W. 779. A ruling that a surety in an agreement to pay such sums of money as arbitrators should award is discharged if, by consent of the parties, matters are embraced in the award which were not included in the submission referred to in the agreement, and that, as to everything not appearing upon the face of the award, the jury may determine whether matters were embraced in the award which were not submitted, furnishes to the surety no ground of exception in an action against him upon his agreement. Hubbell v. Bissell, 2 Allen (Mass.) 196.

Instruction construed.— A surety claimed a release because his principal had given a mortgage to secure both the surety and other debts. The court charged that "plaintiff could not release any of the mortgaged property or appropriate it to any purpose other than the payment of the mortgage debt," without releasing the surety to the extent of the value of the property otherwise appropriated. It was held that this did not charge that the mortgaged property must be first appropriated to pay the surety debt. De Goey v. Van Wyk, 97 Iowa 491, 66 N. W. 787.

Burden of proof as to residence.— When a surety claims the benefit of Rev. discharged;[88] but judgment may be rendered against the surety alone if the principal become insolvent pending the suit,[89] or if the contract be several as well as joint.[90] Separate judgments, however, may be rendered in favor of a principal and sureties jointly sued.[91] At common law, a judgment need not designate that one or more of the defendants are sureties;[92] but in many states by statute such designation is requisite.[93] The statute, however, does not apply where the principal is not before the court,[94] nor where judgment is by default,[95] nor if evidence is not introduced to show the relation;[96] nor if all the defendants are principals, although sustaining the relation of sureties among themselves.[97] Judgment must be for the same amount against all the defendants,[98] unless sureties on a bond are bound in different amounts, in which case a separate judgment should be rendered against each for the full amount for which he is bound, although more than the amount due from the principal cannot be collected.[99] If suit be brought on several bonds against a person who is surety on each, separate judgments should be entered on each bond, and not one judgment for the gross penalties.[1] In some states, by statute, a judgment should direct that the sheriff levy upon the property of the principal first.[2] A decree in equity should provide for first exhausting the estate of the principal,[3] unless he is utterly insolvent;[4] and may adjust the rights of the surety as to the creditor.[5] If the statute allows, a judgment may provide also for the enforcement of the rights of the sureties against the principal,[6] when sued jointly, and against each other.[7] If, after the death of the principal, judgment be entered against him and his sureties, it will be stricken off as against him, but not against his sureties; [8] but if the principal die after judgment is rendered, and before satisfaction, a scire facias may go against his administrators.[9] A judgment entered on an altered bond will be opened, even as to the one who made the alteration;[10] and if a judgment against a principal and surety is void as to the former, it is void as to the latter also.[11]

pay the larger sum.[17] Generally there is no requirement that any particular property shall be levied upon first.[18] In the absence of proof to the contrary, an execution will be presumed to have been returned for sufficient reasons.[19] At common law, the judgment creditor is at liberty to levy first upon the property of the surety if he choose to do so,[20] even though the principal is concealing his property in the mean time,[21] or becomes insolvent pending the delay;[22] but in chancery the decree usually provides that the property of the principal shall be subjected first to the discharge of the obligation;[23] or, in event of the death of the principal, his heirs or devisees or legatees who have received assets by descent or will are made liable before resort can be had to the sureties.[24] So too at common law, where there are two or more sureties, the judgment creditor is at liberty to levy execution on the property of any one of them.[25] However, in many states, by statute, the common-law rule has been changed, so that a surety is entitled to have the property of the principal, both real and personal,[26] exhausted before a levy can be made upon the property of the surety,[27] provided, in some states, the surety can point out property which belongs to the principal.[28] It is insufficient that the surety believes there is sufficient property of the principal to satisfy the execution.[29] The statute does not apply where the principal is not sued;[30] nor if he is insolvent;[31] nor where his property is not readily available,[32] as by being in litigation,[33] and in the custody of the court by its receiver,[34] or has passed from the possession of the principal;[35] or where to reach the property of the principal would involve great delay.[36] If the property of the principal cannot be sold for want of bidders, the execution may then be levied upon the property of the surety.[37] The statute does not apply where both defendants are principals, although, as between them, the relation of principal and surety exists;[38] nor where the judgment does not indicate that any of the defendants are sureties.[39] Failure of an execution to designate that some of the debtors are sureties will not avail the principal;[40] nor can a stranger, whose interests are adverse to the surety, claim the benefit of the statute for the latter;[41] nor does the statute apply as between a surety and a supplemental surety.[42] If the officer disregards his instructions, the execution sale is nevertheless valid, but he is liable in damages to the surety.[43]

11. Appeal and Error. When judgment is rendered improperly against the principal and his sureties, the judgment may be reversed as to the sureties, and affirmed as to the principal alone,[44] or it may be reversed as to the representatives of a deceased surety;[45] but if a joint judgment against the principal and surety is erroneous as to the principal, although not complained of by him, and beneficial to the sureties,[46] or is erroneous as to the sureties, it must be reversed as to all.[47] Where a verdict is found upon a plea of non assumpsit, and the jury do not pass upon a plea by the surety that he was discharged because plaintiff gave the principal time for payment without the consent of the surety, the judgment will not be reversed.[48] Judgment against two cosureties can be affirmed as to one and reversed as to the other, although it might result that the right of contribution would be lost to the former if the latter succeeded on the new trial.[49] If the principal has set up a counter-claim, and a judgment for the excess is rendered inadvertently for both the principal and surety, it will be reversed merely so far as it grants affirmative relief to the surety and affirmed as to the principal.[50]

I. Recourse to Indemnity or Security to Surety. If a surety receives security as indemnity from his principal, the creditor is entitled to the benefit thereof,[51] as, in equity, it is regarded as a trust for the better security of the debt.[52] This security is available to the creditor, although he was ignorant of it at the time it was given;[53] and it is immaterial whether the surety received it at the time he incurred liability, or at a later date[54] This right of subrogation is not defeated by the fact that the personal liability of the surety can no longer be enforced by exhausting the property of the principal is irregular, and cannot be upheld. And in Miller v. Hudson, 114 Ind. 550, 17 N. E. 122, it was held that if a joint execution issues against the principal and surety, and before exhausting the effects of the principal, the officer levies upon property of the surety subject to execution, replevin is not the proper remedy of the surety.

priority which such mortgage may have over claims held by other creditors of the principal; [73] nor is the right lost by the fact that the surety has foreclosed a mortgage held by him.[74] Liens,[75] bonds,[76] promissory notes,[77] and other choses in action [78] placed by the principal in the hands of the surety, or a judgment confessed by the principal as indemnity to the surety,[79] can be reached by the creditor. If the security is to protect sureties liable for different debts, the security should be apportioned among the several creditors.[80] Some conflict exists as to the rights of the creditor where the property is given by the principal to secure a debt due by the principal to the surety as well as to indemnify the surety for the debt due the creditor. Some courts hold that the creditor is entitled to all of the security if necessary to satisfy his claim,[81] while other courts hold that the surety is entitled to indemnify himself in full as to his individual claims before the creditor is entitled to anything; [82] but if the creditor pays the individual claims of the surety, he is then entitled to all of the security.[83] In cases of real suretyship, the surety is entitled to indemnify himself before the creditor can demand the property of the principal in his hands.[84] On subrogation of the creditor to security held by the surety, the latter is entitled to be released to that extent, from his liability to the creditor,[85] unless the property delivered by the principal to his surety, and by the latter to the creditor, is in effect the property of the creditor which the principal has taken wrongfully.[86] The creditor cannot enforce directly for his benefit a trust created for the benefit of the surety; [87] but the proper procedure is to file a bill asking for subrogation; and, as a part of the relief granted, the property can then be applied in payment of the debt.[88] Should the creditor, for any reason, fail in establishing his rights to subrogation, he is not deprived from afterward attaching any property of the principal in the hands of the surety; [89] and where the creditor has the right of subrogation, a resort to equitable proceedings is not necessary. If the surety is willing, he may at any time assign to the creditor any property of the principal in his hands,[90] provided he holds it as indemnity for the debt owing to such creditor.[91] The effect is the same as if a decree in chancery had been made directing such assignment.[92] The substitution of the creditor in place of the surety as to property in the hands of the latter does not give the creditor any rights greater than the surety had.[93] If the surety could not have enforced the security except on the happening of a contingency, the creditor cannot enforce it unless the contingency arises; [94] and if the principal has given the surety property to indemnify him in event of a judgment being obtained against him, such security is not available to the surety, and consequently not to the creditor, until the surety has been harmed [95] and if the property was to reimburse the surety in event of payment by him, the creditor cannot be subrogated thereto if the surety has not made payment.[96] If the surety has foreclosed a mortgage given him, the creditor is not entitled to vacate the sale.[97] As the right of subrogation is an equitable one, growing out of the relation arising through contract, it does not exist where the contract was not executed by the principal,[98] nor by one who intended to become surety.[99] The creditor has no right to security given for indemnity to the surety by a third person,[1] although such third person is a partner of the principal,[2] nor to security given by cosureties to each other; [3] or by a surety to a supplemental surety.[4] cannot be impaired by the latter [6] diverting it to other purposes.[7] The equitable lien of the creditor attaches as against an assignee,[8] or a pledgee [9] of such security. If, however, before the creditor has taken steps to subject the security to his claim, the surety, in good faith, releases it to the principal, the creditor cannot complain,[10] unless the principal [11] or the surety [12] be insolvent. If the surety unjustly releases the security, the right of the creditor therein is not defeated,[13] unless the rights of third persons have intervened,[14] and the surety is liable to the extent of the value of the security wrongfully released.[15]

VIII. DISCHARGE AND OTHER DEFENSES OF SURETY.

A. In General. Generally the same defenses can be made in an action at law as can be made in a court of equity;[16] but they must be pleaded,[17] and sustained with sufficient evidence.[18]

B. Matters Personal to Principal or Cosurety. Defenses do not operate in favor of a surety which are personal to the principal,[19] or to a cosurety.[20]

C. Matters Personal to Surety. Matters personal to a surety may be set up by him in his defense,[21] although they are not available to the principal;[22] and the surety may intervene to set up such a defense if the principal is insolvent and does not defend, and the rights of the surety are endangered.[23] But a surety cannot complain of any act committed or omitted not affecting his rights.[24]

D. Matters Existing at Time of Entering Into Relation — 1. In General. Practically all such defenses available to a surety, as such, have already been considered;[25] such as incapacity of the parties;[26] invalidity of the contract,[27]

2. Usury [46]— a. In General. Generally the defense of usury is available to a surety to the same extent that it is to the principal,[47] although the failure of the principal to take advantage of such defense will not interfere with the right of the surety to do so.[48] As usury is a wrong created purely by statute, the right of a surety to take advantage of it varies in the different states. In some a surety is not discharged by an agreement to pay usurious interest;[49] in others, while a surety may set up usury as a defense,[50] the extent to which it is available is not the same. The surety may be bound for the principal debt, although discharged as to the interest;[51] or his entire contract may be void.[52] If the contract was

For example sureties on a bond for the payment of money, wishing to foreclose a deed of trust given to them by their principal, gave the creditor their note in place of the bond, so that they could use the bond in payment at the foreclosure sale. Afterward, when suit was brought on their note, it was held, by a divided court, that the note was not payment of the bond, and that they were entitled, under Code, c. 96, § 6, to have credit for usurious interest which had been paid on the bond. void originally, a subsequent arrangement between the creditor and the principal, purging it of usury, without the assent of the surety, cannot make the latter liable.[53] A surety is not discharged if the usury does not increase his risk,[54] as where the claim of the creditor amounts to more than that for which the surety is bound;[55] nor will a collateral agreement between the principal and the creditor for the payment of an illegal rate avoid the contract of the surety,[56] even though the principal pay the usury.[57] Equity, in relieving a surety from usury, will require him to pay legal interest.[58]

b. Conflict of Laws.[59] If the contract is made payable in another state where the rate of interest provided for is lawful, it will be enforced against the surety in the state where the contract was made, although the interest exceeds the legal rate allowed in the state where made, unless there was an intention to evade the usury laws;[60] and if a note is executed by the principal in one state, and by a surety in another, the surety will be liable if the note is valid in the state where the principal is, although usurious by the law of the state in which the surety executed it.[61]

E. Matters Arising After Entering Into Relation — 1. Discharge of Principal — a. In General. amount to extinguishment of the obligation,[63] nor is a conditional agreement to cancel of any effect until there is performance or an offer to perform the condition.[64] Whenever a note or bond comes into the hands of the principal, with a right to enforce it a surety thereon is discharged.[65] Similarly, if a mortgagee purchase the mortgaged land,[66] or if a purchaser of land takes an assignment of a judgment which is a lien on the land,[67] a surety for the indebtedness is discharged by the merger of the right and liability in one person. So, if a landlord takes an assignment of a lease, a surety for the rent is no longer liable.[68]

b. Judgment in Favor of Principal. A surety can set up, as a defense, that a judgment has been rendered in favor of the principal in an action for the same alleged default,[69] even though the surety was not a party to the action in which judgment was rendered,[70] and although judgment has been obtained against the sureties, if judgment afterward is rendered in favor of the principal, the sureties are released.[71] If the principal succeeds only in reducing the amount of the claim against him, the sureties are released to the same extent.[72] A surety cannot be held under a judgment void as to his principal.[73]

he is benefited,[74] whether such injury arises from some positive act or omitting to do something which it was the duty of the creditor to perform;[75] and matters which would discharge a surety before maturity of a debt will have a like effect if arising after maturity.[76] If for any reason the creditor forfeits his right to participate in the estate of an insolvent principal, he has no right to enforce his claim against a surety.[77]

b. Release[78]—(i) Consideration. A release without consideration,[79] such as a receipt in full given to a guardian,[80] is insufficient as a defense, although if there is a consideration, the release being in writing, it need not be recited.[81] A payment by the principal[82] or by the surety[83] will not constitute a consideration for a release if such payment is to be applied on the indebtedness; but a payment by the surety which is not to be credited on the indebtedness,[84] or a note of the principal for an additional sum,[85] is a sufficient consideration. Likewise a consideration exists if, by agreement of all the parties, the creditor, having property of the principal to apply to the secured debt, is to apply it in extinguishment of another debt of the principal for which the surety is not liable;[86] or if the surety has performed,[87] or agrees to perform services.[88] A refusal of a judgment creditor to levy upon the property of the principal at the instance of the surety,[89] the acceptance of another surety[90] or of a mortgage,[91] or the agreement of the surety to refrain from taking indemnity from the principal,[92] each constitutes a consideration; but if the release is upon condition that a mortgage shall be given,[93] or upon some other condition, such as that all creditors of the principal shall assent to an assignment by the latter, it is not effective unless the condition is performed.[94]

(II) Effect — (A) In General. A release of one employee will not release the sureties of another, although the two have aided each other in committing the default;[95] but a release of third persons from liability to the obligee will discharge the sureties of an officer if it interferes with their rights and causes them injury.[96] If a release be procured by the fraud of the principal, the surety is not discharged,[97] unless the surety is injured by the passiveness of the obligee after discovery of the fraud.[98] A surety who has been discharged by a release can enjoin the creditor from proceeding against him;[99] but if the surety only is discharged, it is improper for him to make the principal a complainant in the bill.[1]

(B) Of Release of Principal — (1) In General. The general rule is that the release of the principal debtor, without the consent of the surety, releases the surety,[2] as where the release arises out of a composition agreement,[3] or a covenant not to sue,[4] unless the right to go against the surety is reserved in the instrument of release,[5] or it appears from the whole transaction that it was intended that the surety should remain bound.[6] But the rule at common law that the release of a debtor whose person was in execution upon a capias ad satisfaciendum extinguished the judgment itself,[7] does not apply to a commitment in contempt proceedings so as to release the sureties of the contemner,[8] or to a discharge from imprisonment under a capias ad satisfaciendum, where the statutes preserve the judgment.[9] As a surety occupies the position of principal to a supplemental surety, a release of the surety will discharge the supplemental surety.[10] A release of the principal also will release sureties liable on collateral security for the debt,[11] and property pledged [12] or mortgaged to secure the debt.[13] The liability of a surety once released cannot be revived without his consent; [14] and if the surety, in ignorance of the release of the principal, has made payment, he can recover the amount paid.[15]

(c) Of Release of Surety. While a release is a good defense for a surety,[18] an understanding that he is not to be liable will not be;[19] nor would steps taken by the obligee merely looking to a release be sufficient.[20] An agreement between the principal and the creditor for the release of the surety is a defense to the latter;[21] but an arrangement between two joint debtors that one alone is to make payment will not release the other, although made in the presence of the creditor;[22] nor is a retiring partner released as surety because the creditor has all of his dealings with the continuing partners.[23] A release of the surety does not affect the liability of the principal.[24]

New bond under order of court.—A probate decree, under statute discharging a surety on a bond of a trustee from further liability, and the giving of a new bond by the principal, approved by the court, operates as a discharge of a cosurety for acts of the principal committed thereafter, notwithstanding a recital in the new bond that it is in addition to the one discharged. c. Necessity of Knowledge of Relation. In order that a surety, as such, may be discharged by acts of the creditor or obligee, the latter must have knowledge of the existence of the relation;[78] and if the creditor or obligee have knowledge, it is not necessary that the relation be shown on the face of the instrument;[79] but he is not obliged to make inquiry,[80] although he may be held to have notice if negligently although not wilfully ignorant.[81] Although the creditor or obligee did not possess such knowledge originally, or if the relation arose from transactions occurring after the contract was entered into, he must respect the rights of the surety when informed that the relation exists.[82]

Any deviation from such usage will dis-to an alteration,[7] diversion,[8] extension of the time of payment,[9] relinquishment of security,[10] or to acts which result in a loss thereof.[11] Where consent is to be implied the facts from which it is to be implied must very clearly warrant the implication.[12] Mere knowledge of acts done by the creditor or obligee subsequent to the making of the contract of suretyship without objection on the part of the surety is not consent by the latter.[13] But knowledge at the time of entering into the contract of suretyship of acts done prior thereto without notice of dissent will estop the surety from claiming the advantage thereof.[14]

A waiver by the principal is not a waiver by the surety. Maryland Fidelity, etc., Co. v. U. S., 137 Fed. 866, 70 C. C. A. 204, holding that where a principal and surety were discharged by the government materially shortcosureties, has not been performed;[16] or that there has been an alteration or change in the contract,[17] or that an extension of time has been given to the principal;[18] and a request by a surety for an extension of time for payment, after an alteration of his contract,[19] or after an extension of time to the principal,[20] is a waiver of the defense. But it is essential that he have knowledge of the facts which would justify his considering himself discharged or not bound,[21] although it is not necessary that he be aware of their legal effect.[22] The burden is on the creditor to prove such waiver or ratification.[23] A surety cannot waive his defense to the detriment of his own creditors.[24]

(II) By New Promise. If a surety makes a new promise, express or implied to pay the debt or unqualifiedly acknowledges its continued existence, he thereby waives any defense he may have, such as that he had been discharged by an extension of time granted by the creditor to the principal without the surety's consent,[25]

ening the time for the performance of a contract, a waiver by the principal resuming work is ineffectual as against the surety.

25. Alabama.— Ellis v. Bibb, 2 Stew. 63, holding, however, that the surety will be bound by the new promise to the extent only of the legal liability of the principal, and diversion of instrument,[26] relinquishment of means of enforcement of payment from the principal,[27] alteration of the contract,[28] or non-performance of a condition that another should sign as cosurety.[29] A new consideration is not as a general rule necessary to hold the surety;[30] but where the surety has been discharged by an alteration of the contract, it is held that a new consideration is necessary in order to revive the obligation.[31] The payment of interest by a surety, after his release, will not alone operate as a new promise.[32] Nor will payment with the money of the principal, although the surety does not state that he acts as agent of the principal;[33] nor will declarations that he may have to pay or expects to pay,[34] or negotiations looking to a settlement.[35] As a general rule it is for the jury to determine whether acts and statements amount to a new promise.[36]

(III) By Taking Indemnity After Default. Upon the question whether a surety waives a defense by taking indemnity from the principal after knowledge of the facts, the cases are not in entire accord, it having been held that this is not a waiver,[37] while other cases are to the contrary.[38] And if a surety erroneously supposing himself liable takes security, he may be liable to the extent thereof.[39] But a surety does not waive a defense if he did not in fact accept the

will be relieved in equity if the new obligation is for a greater amount.

f. Reservation of Rights Against Surety. A transaction between the principal and the creditor or obligee, which otherwise would operate to discharge a surety, will not as a general rule have that effect if the creditor or obligee reserve all rights against the surety,[43] or reserves the right to sue the principal, at the request of the surety,[44] the effect of such reservation being to make the agreement with the principal conditional upon the consent of the surety.[45] Thus where rights are reserved a surety is not discharged by an extension of time to the principal,[46] or a release [47] or a covenant not to sue the principal,[48] or an agreement not to enforce a judgment against him,[49] or by a renewal, provided the original instrument is retained with the right of immediate action thereon;[50] although it is otherwise if the creditor bind himself not to proceed on the original note unless the renewal note is not paid at maturity;[51] nor will a release of a surety with a reservation of rights against the other cosureties affect the right of the creditor or obligee to recover from such other cosureties.[52] A reservation cannot be implied, but must be express,[53] and clear,[54] although not necessarily formal,[55] and it may be oral.[56] But if the transaction between the creditor and the principal is evidenced in writing, and the effect of admitting an oral reservation would be to vary the written one, evidence of the oral reservation is inadmissible.[57] Notice to the surety of the reservation is not necessary.[58] If the negotiations between the principal and the creditor have resulted in an absolute discharge or abandonment of the contract, a reservation against a surety would be unavailing, as there would be no rights to reserve,[59] as would be the case where the original contract is discharged by novation,[60] by a material alteration of the contract itself,[61] or by an absolute release of the principal extinguishing the debt.[62]

(B) By Surety. Payment by the surety is a complete defense to an action for the debt brought against him by the creditor or obligee;[74] but payment by a cosurety of his proportionate share does not release him as to the remainder.[75]

(C) By Third Person. As a surety is discharged by payment of the debt, it is immaterial by whom payment is made;[76] and payment by a third person at the request of the principal is as effectual as if made by the principal;[77] but if a third person pay money for the purpose of having the instrument assigned to him, such transaction does not amount to payment, and the instrument is not extinguished.[78] To operate as an assignment, however, it is necessary that the creditor receive the money with knowledge that it is not payment.[79] If the object be assignment and not payment, the person furnishing the money can allow the principal to act for him in procuring such assignment.[80]

(D) Form and Sufficiency — (1) IN GENERAL. It is not requisite that payment, in order to discharge a surety, should be in cash; any arrangement, in good faith, between the principal and the obligee, whereby the obligation is considered paid, is sufficient.[81] A receipt in full, signed by the obligee, without actual payment, will not suffice;[82] nor will unexecuted negotiations looking to a settlement.[83] A seizure or levy upon property of the principal, sufficient to pay the debt, is a satisfaction of it, and a surety is released;[84] but a sale, under execution, of property which was supposed by the creditor to belong to the principal, but which does not, will not discharge a surety who has not been misled to his prejudice;[85] nor will an attachment against the property of the principal discharge a surety, until applied in payment.[86] Payment is sufficient if made to one of two or more obligees;[87] or to an agent of the obligee, if authorized,[88] or to an unauthorized agent, if such payment is ratified by the creditor.[89]

(2) Payment With Property. Payment made by the principal in property, personal,[90] or real,[91] will discharge the surety if accepted in extinguishment of the debt. If the principal and obligee in good faith have placed a value on the property such value will govern.[92] If, however, the obligee is not authorized to receive anything but money, payment in property will not discharge the surety;[93] and if property received in settlement is taken from the creditor owing to the superior rights of third persons, the sureties are not released.[94]

(3) Payment With Commercial Paper. In the absence of agreement, a note given for a debt by the principal,[95] or by a surety,[96] does not as a general rule constitute payment of such debt. If, however, the note is accepted as payment, the surety is discharged,[97] and if the obligee accept a note of the principal in payment of a loss, a surety is discharged, although the obligee was ignorant of his right to proceed against the surety.[98] A surety will be discharged if the creditor or obligee accept a bond,[99] or a draft,[1] as payment; but it is otherwise if the draft is not considered payment unless it in turn is paid.[2] If the creditor take a check of the principal, which would have been paid if presented promptly, but which is retained by the creditor until there are not sufficient funds in the bank to meet it, a surety for the debt for which the check was given is discharged;[3] but by taking a worthless check the creditor does not release a surety if the latter is notified of its dishonor in time to protect himself.[4] A non-negotiable draft or note of the principal is not payment,[5] nor is a note which is not enforceable.[6] Payment by the note of a third person will discharge a surety;[7] but not if the obligee is induced by fraud to take one which is worthless, and he repudiates the transaction,[8] or the note is a forgery.[9]

(4) Illegal Payments. A surety is not as a general rule released by payment which is illegal by reason of its being a preference in violation of the bankruptcy act, and which the creditor is obliged to refund;[10] but if the creditor is aware of the illegal preference at the time he receives payment the surety is discharged.[11]

(E) Application of Payments[12] — (1) By Principal or Surety. has been made to a debt for which the surety was liable, it cannot be changed, although both the principal and the creditor wish it.[15] Similarly a surety, making payment, has the right to designate upon what part of the indebtedness it shall be applied.[16]

(2) By Creditor. If the principal, when making a payment, omits to designate how he wishes the money applied, the creditor may apply it to any part of the indebtedness of the principal, a surety not having any right to insist upon the application to the debt for which he is liable,[17] nor does it make any difference that the surety was not aware of the existence of any other indebtedness of the principal than that for which the surety became liable;[18] but application once made by the creditor to a debt for which the surety was liable cannot subsequently be changed even with the consent of the principal.[19] Such application can be made by the creditor at any time before trial.[20] If the indebtedness of the principal is a running account, for some of the items of which a surety is liable, the creditor is not under obligation to apply payments to the oldest items;[21] but if the creditor has made an agreement with the surety to apply certain future payments by the principal to the indebtedness for which the surety is liable, the creditor has no right to make any other application, even with the consent of the principal.[22] Where a surety has become responsible for the payment of money by the principal, and the latter receives money under his contract, which he pays over, the creditor or obligee has no right to apply such payments in any other way than to the relief of the surety.[23] Likewise payments by an officer of moneys received during his term of office must be credited so as to discharge his sureties for that term.[24] If the creditor or obligee

Such also will be the effect of a tender by the surety himself.[32] The tender must, however, be substantial, complete, and legally sufficient,[33] and if suit has been brought the tender must include the costs of the action.[34] Tender alone is sufficient, although it is not kept good,[35] unless the principal be a public officer, and his sureties have undertaken to be liable for his unfaithfulness or dishonesty.[36]

(iv) Compromise and Settlement; Accord and Satisfaction. A compromise or settlement between the creditor or obligee and the principal, by which the latter is discharged from liability, discharges his surety,[37] even though tinguished by a due offer of payment, if the amount is deposited in the name of the creditor with some bank of deposit and notice thereof is given to the creditor.

32. O'Conor v. Morse, 112 Cal. 31, 44 Pac. 305, 53 Am. St. Rep. 155 (holding that where one cosurety pays his proportionate part, offering to pay the balance, which is refused by the obligee, he is discharged from all liability); Hayes v. Josephi, 26 Cal. 535.

Tender must be in good faith.— Lee v. Lee, 67 Ala. 406, holding that a tender by sureties to a guardian which he, under a previous agreement with them, refuses to accept, will not discharge them.

33. Hiller v. Howell, 74 Ga. 174 (holding that a surety is not discharged because an incomplete tender made by the principal was rejected by the creditor); Bonner v. Nelson, 57 Ga. 433 (holding a tender in depreciated currency insufficient); Clark v. Sickler, 64 N. A settlement between a ward and his guardian, while the former was under age, does not prevent a right of action against a surety on the bond of the guardian. Magruder v. Goodwyn, 2 Patt. & H. (Va.) 561.

A mere agreement to compromise is not sufficient, it not being shown that the compromise was actually consummated. Tuckerman v. Newhall, 17 Mass. 581.

the discharge was the result of new security given by the principal to the creditor which has proved worthless;[38] but a payment on an unliquidated claim, which is not stated to be in full settlement, does not affect the liability of a surety for the balance.[39] Accord and satisfaction between the surety himself and the creditor, resulting from a transfer from the former to the latter, of collateral security obtained from the principal, is a good defense to the surety;[40] but acceptance, by the creditor, from one cosurety of his proportionate part of the debt, does not amount to accord and satisfaction.[41] A surety is discharged by failure of the creditor to rescind promptly after knowledge that a settlement with the principal was procured through fraud by the latter,[42] or through mistake.[43]

h. Non-Performance of Conditions — (i) In General. If a surety has annexed conditions, to be performed by the creditor or obligee after the contract has been entered into, a failure to perform them releases the surety from liability,[44] and the principal cannot waive performance.[45] Thus if the surety has entered into his contract under an agreement providing for security for himself,[46] or for an examination of the accounts of the principal,[47] or has stipulated that the principal shall be prosecuted criminally,[48] or that the surety shall be liable for a deficiency only after the application, upon the indebtedness, of security held by the creditor,[49] he cannot be held liable if the conditions have not been fulfilled. To relieve the surety, however, the creditor or obligee must have notice of the conditions,[50] and the surety is not relieved by non-performance of an agreement made with him by the principal, with which the creditor or obligee is not connected,[51] nor by the breach of an independent agreement between the creditor and the principal.[52] A substantial compliance with conditions is sufficient, if they are performed as fully as the circumstances will allow.[53] Where the liability of the surety is made conditional upon the creditor abstaining from certain acts, the surety is not discharged if these acts are done by third persons.[54] Failure to observe provisions in statutes, which are directory merely, will not discharge a surety,[55] nor will failure by a creditor or obligee to observe provisions in the contract which were inserted for the benefit of the latter;[56] or which were inserted for the benefit of the principal;[57] or if they

57. Enterprise Hotel Co. v. Book, 48 Oreg. 58, 85 Pac. 333, holding that where a building contract provided that if the owner should request, in writing, any alterations, the same should be made, sureties are not released because the contractor consented to alterations without first requiring the request therefor to be in writing. See also supra, IV, C, 5, c, note 2.

consist of restrictions so unreasonable as practically to amount to a release by tending to defeat recovery.[58]

(II) As to Notice and Demand. If the contract of suretyship stipulates that notice shall be given to the surety of the principal's default, failure to comply with the condition,[59] or to give notice within the time specified,[60] or to give notice promptly if the contract provides for immediate notice,[61] will prevent recovery from the surety. Similarly non-compliance with a condition that demand be made on the principal [62] or on the surety,[63] or that demand be made at a particular place,[64] will defeat an action against the surety on the contract.

(III) Building Contracts. The general rule as to the effect of non-performance of conditions [65] applies to sureties for building contracts, and to hold the surety conditions imposed by him must be complied with, such as notice of the commencement of the work,[66] the amounts to be paid during the progress of the

C. Q. B. 321 (holding also that where the condition of a bond was that a treasurer, on request made, would give a just account of all moneys received, and would pay over and deliver all balances due, the words "upon request to him or them made" apply both to the giving an account and to the paying over); O'Neill v. Carter, 9 U. C. Q. B. 254 (holding that if a surety has stipulated for the return of goods on request such request is not excused because the principal is out of the province).

Nor is it necessary that the alteration affect the validity of the contract; for although the surety is discharged, the principal,[80] and cosureties, who have consented to the alteration, will remain bound.[81] Inasmuch as a contract under seal cannot be varied by parol evidence, it has been held that an oral agreement between the obligee and the principal, changing the terms of a bond, will not discharge a surety thereon.[82] A waiver of some provision which is solely for the benefit of the principal or of the creditor is not such alteration as will discharge the surety.[83] The liability of the surety will not be revived by a restoration of the instrument to its original form,[84] nor by the fact that the principal attempts to perform the original agreement.[85] Alterations made without the knowledge or consent of the creditor or obligee do not affect the liability of a surety,[86] unless the creditor or obligee is put different position.[5] Changes to make the instrument conform to the intention of all the parties will not release the surety, although made without his knowledge,[6] nor is a surety discharged by a subsequent collateral or auxiliary agreement between the principal and the creditor or obligee which does not vary the terms of the contract,[7] as where the principal executes a mortgage to secure the note upon which the surety is bound.[8] The addition of words more accurately describing property mentioned in the contract,[9] and procuring attesting witnesses,[10] are immaterial alterations, and do not affect the liability of the surety.

(II) AS TO COMPENSATION. A surety is not, as a general rule, discharged by a change in the compensation of his principal,[11] by a change in the rate of commissions allowed,[12] by a change from commissions to a salary,[13] as to the mode of payment,[14] or because a guaranty of the payment of his commissions is withdrawn.[15] If, however, the compensation was an express term in the contract of the surety, so that a change therein amounts to a new agreement between the employer and the principal, a change in the amount of compensation,[16] or a change from a salary to a commission,[17] is held to be such a material alteration as will discharge the surety.

(III) As to Duties. As a general rule a surety is discharged by a material change or enlargement of the duties of his principal,[18] or in the place of employment,[19] but not by a mere change in the designation of the office of the principal, without a material change in his duties.[20] If the nature of the duties of the office are not recited in the contract, they are those which plainly and commonly belong to the class of employment by which the principal is designated.[21] Imposing additional duties on the principal, not materially changing or incompatible with his former ones, will not discharge the surety, the default not being connected with the added duties,[22] although it is otherwise if the added duties have enlarged the responsibility of the principal enabling him to commit the default.[23] If the principal already holds another office at the time the surety enters into his contract, the surety cannot urge the other duties as a defense;[24] but if the principal occupies two offices, and his surety became liable for the duties of the two offices combined, a removal of the principal from one has been held to discharge the surety.[25] Sureties are not discharged because the duties of the principal are increased by the natural growth of the business in which he is engaged;[26] nor does an increase in the capital of the obligee discharge the sureties of a cashier.[27] If the sureties have undertaken to become liable for all of the duties to which the principal may be assigned a change therein will not affect their liability.[28] While the resignation of a treasurer necessarily makes him a custodian of money in an individual rather than in an official capacity, his surety will not be discharged.[29] Whether a change in regard to making remittances will discharge a surety depends, as is usual in these cases, on whether the making of remittances was a term in the contract for which the surety expressly or impliedly agreed to become liable, if not a term in the contract, a surety will not be discharged, in the absence of injury occasioned thereby,[30] nor will a surety for an agent be discharged by a change in the rules governing his conduct, allowing him to give credit instead of requiring payment in cash.[31]

and a surety cannot complain that a note was used for a purpose different from the one he supposed it would be.[52] In some cases the rule is, that where a note is signed by a surety for the purpose of obtaining a discount, it is immaterial by whom the money is advanced, provided the purpose has been accomplished, and although the note may be sold to another than the payee,[53] or, such is the result if the party who takes such note has no knowledge of any limitation upon the purpose of the instrument imposed by the surety, the fact that it is made to a particular payee being considered insufficient to give such notice,[54] or where there is a general intention to become surety to raise money without regard to whom the note should be passed.[55] In other cases, however, it is held that if a note is not delivered to the payee but is sold to a third person without the consent of the sureties thereon it cannot be enforced against them.[56]

Note held by creditor upon refusal of bank to discount.— Where a note with sureties was intended to be discounted by a bank, and the proceeds applied in paying a note held by the bank, and the balance to be applied in payment of debts due by the principal to a third person, and such third person was given the note to be presented to the bank, but the latter refused to dis-

(VIII) BUILDING CONTRACTS. Material changes in building contracts discharge sureties on bonds given to secure their performance,[57] but immaterial changes involving neither extra expense nor time do not.[58] Thus material changes in the plans or specifications,[59] such as increasing the dimensions,[60] or the amount to be paid the contractor,[61] will discharge the sureties; but an immaterial change in location will not.[62] The fact that the owner permitted the principal to complete the work after the contract time,[63] or that the obligee, in completing the count it, and such third person obtained judgment on the note in the name of the payee, claiming that, after refusal of the bank to discount it, he was authorized to retain it as security, it was held that the judgment should be held first for the person paying the debt to the bank, and, second, for the satisfaction of the claims of the third person. work after abandonment by the principal, made some changes from the plan and specifications, due allowance being made for the difference in price,[64] will not discharge the sureties. Material changes as to payments,[65] such as making them prematurely, discharges the surety.[66] Retention, by the owner, of money owing the contractor, to pay debts of the latter does not discharge the sureties,[67] nor are the sureties discharged because payment was made by the owner to the principal while there were claims unpaid, in the absence of any term in the contract forbidding it.[68] Sureties are not discharged by a change in the work made necessary by the negligence of the principal;[69] nor by an independent collateral agreement between the owner and the principal,[70] nor are sureties discharged because the principal performs additional work not demanded by the owner.[71] Provisions in the contract for the benefit of the obligee alone may be waived without affecting the liability of the surety, such as an option to retain a portion of the contract price;[72] and it has been held that the principal can waive a provision intended solely for his own benefit, which requires notices from the owner to the surety to be in writing.[73]

(IX) LEASES. A surety for a lessee cannot be held for rent after a change in the terms of the lease,[74] or in the terms of the surety's contract by the provisions of the lease,[75] and will be discharged by the substitution of a new contract between the lessor and the lessee without the surety's consent.[76] Subletting will not discharge the surety;[77] and the fact that the lessor occupied part of the premises for a portion of the term with the consent of the tenant, no change having been made in the contract, does not release the surety.[78]

(X) CHANGES AND AMENDMENTS IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.[79] A surety on an undertaking given during judicial proceedings is released by a change in the return-day,[80] or in the parties to the proceedings,[81] or if one of the parties defendant is dismissed;[82] but if a bill is filed by a creditor in behalf of himself and others who might come in, an intention is shown to allow such changes and sureties are not discharged.[83] In admiralty, so long as the cause of action remains practically the same, sureties will not be discharged by change as to parties.[84] Generally a surety is not released by amendments to the pleadings,[85] although

W. 137 (where, during the life of a lease for three years, an agreement was entered into by lessor and lessee, by which the latter was to surrender the premises at the end of the second year, and pay certain sums, etc., in full of all rent due under the lease); Holme v. Brunskill, 3 Q. B. D. 495, 47 L. J. Q. B. 610, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 838. But an agreement by the lessor with the lessee to rent the premises for the latter and at his risk and give him the benefit of all the rent received, qualified by the stipulation that the agreement should not be construed as impairing or altering the lease, etc., makes no change in the terms of the lease or the obligations of the tenants. 78. Medary v. Cathers, 161 Pa. St. 87, 28 Atl. 1012; Sutherland v. Shelton, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 374, holding that, although the lessor may have occupied or used some part of the land not included in the reservation to her by the lease, the sureties contracted only for the performance of the contract of their principal, which was for the payment of the rent and the performance of the other duties agreed upon, and this was not made dependent upon the performance by the lessor of her agreement as to the occupation; that if the lessor occupied or used more of the land or houses than she had reserved, she did so as the tenant of the lessee for which she might be bound to him for rent or for use and occupation, but such conduct on her part, assented to by the lessee, could not release the sureties.

85. Lanahan v. Porter, 148 Mass. 596, 20 N. E. 460 (holding that where, in an action on a note, notice to an indorser was not averred; and, after a judgment against de-

they change the form of action,[86] or increase the damages claimed.[87] The liability of sureties is not affected by immaterial variations in the proceedings not increasing their liability.[88] Sureties are not released because a judgment has been entered by consent of the parties;[89] nor because a stipulation is entered into to waive the right to a deficiency judgment in an action to foreclose a mortgage.[90]

j. Extension of Time — (I) Effect — (A) General Rules. The rule is well settled that if a creditor or obligee, by a valid and binding agreement, without the assent of a surety, gives further time for payment or performance to the principal debtor, the surety will be discharged.[91] And where two persons are bound fendants, it was set aside on their motion upon giving a bond with sureties, the amendment of the declaration by the addition of an allegation of notice to the indorser will not release the sureties); Newell v. Norton, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 257, 18 L. ed. 271.

Bond for compliance with any judgment.— The amendment of a complaint so as to demand a money judgment instead of specific performance does not release a surety on a bond conditioned for compliance with any judgment to be rendered. The surety in a debtor's relief bond is discharged if the time for the principal to such debtor occupies the position of a principal debtor to the creditor,[92] as where debtors become sureties by another assuming the indebtedness.[93] In some cases it is held that where the parties are jointly bound the defense of an extension of time granted to the principal cannot be taken advantage of by the surety.[94] The defense is personal to the surety and cannot be set up for him by another creditor of the principal.[95] An extension of time granted to the surety does not affect the liability of the principal;[96] nor does an agreement by the creditor with the principal not to sue the surety until after a certain time discharge the latter.[97] An extension of time to an ostensible principal, who is really a surety, does not discharge a surety who is really a cosurety.[98] The right of a surety to consider make his disclosure is extended by the obligee beyond the six months prescribed in the bond. Phillips v. Rounds, 33 Me. 357.

himself discharged by an extension of time to the principal is not affected by the fact that the surety executed the note without the knowledge of the principal,[99] or that the principal was insolvent,[1] or a discharged bankrupt;[2] nor that the extension benefited or did not injure the surety, his contract being changed.[3] A surety who has been discharged by an extension of time to the principal need not wait until he is proceeded against, to take advantage of his defense; but he is entitled to relief in equity,[4] and can obtain an injunction restraining proceedings against him,[5] or against execution on a judgment obtained before he had notice of the extension of time.[6]

Although the mortgage is to indemnify sureties, where that protection is to be given not by reimbursement of sums which the sureties might have to pay, but by sale of the property to pay the debt in the first instance, it follows that the property becomes directly responsible for the original debt and therefore surety for it, and the mortgage will be discharged by an extension which would discharge a surety from personal liability. Sureties on collateral note.— Where the payee of a note held another note of the same makers with sureties as collateral, an the pledge cannot be retained as security for a renewal except with the consent of the owner.[8]

(c) As to One or More Instalments. If a surety is liable for different payments,[9] such as instalments of rent, an extension of time as to one or more will not affect the liability of the surety for the others;[10] nor will an extension of time granted to the principal for a portion of his indebtedness discharge a surety as to the balance.[11]

(d) As to Surety Having Indemnity. A surety by taking security from his principal against liability by reason of the suretyship in effect appropriates that portion of the property or effects of the principal to the payment of the debt and will not be permitted to urge a discharge by reason of an extension of time by the creditor.[12] If, however, security taken from the principal by a surety to indemnify him against loss proves to be worthless,[13] or is lost without the fault of the surety,[14] he will be discharged by an extension of the time of payment; likewise, if security taken by him be returned to the principal before the extension is granted, the creditor not being aware of the indemnity at the time the extension is granted.[15]

(ii) Binding Agreement Required — (a) General Rule. The general rule is that an agreement between the creditor and the principal for delay merely,[16] which does not prevent the surety from making payment at any time,[17] will not

itor and a stranger to give time to the principal does not discharge the surety;[32] and to constitute a valid agreement it is essential that any one acting on behalf of the creditor or obligee have authority to grant an extension.[33] However, if the creditor, on learning that some one assuming to act for him has granted an extension of time, does not insist upon his objection thereto, a ratification thereof may be indicated.[34] An administrator[35] or an executor of a creditor has power to grant an extension of time to the principal which will discharge the surety.[36]

(2) By One of Several Creditors or Obligees. An extension of the time of payment,[37] or a stay of execution,[38] granted to the principal by one of two joint creditors, will release the surety as to both; but where a contractor gives a bond to secure laborers and materialmen, as well as to secure the performance of his contract, an extension of time for completing the work will not affect the liability of the sureties on the bond, for labor and material furnished.[39]

(3) To One of Several Principals. An extension of the time of payment to one joint maker of a note releases the sureties.[40]

(d) Consideration — (1) In General. To effect the discharge of a surety by an extension of time the agreement for a stay of execution[41] or for the extension must be supported by a sufficient consideration,[42] pursuant to the general rule

Extension not to principal.— The liability of sureties on a bond of an abstracter of titles to a purchaser of land for the omission from the abstract of an outstanding mortgage on the land are not discharged by an extension of time granted by the vendee to the vendor to make good his covenants of warranty against encumbrancers, the extension being to the vendor alone and of his liability alone, and the security accepted is collateral to that liability only and not to the liability of the abstract company. will tie the hands of the latter. Under this rule the payment of a sum of money,[43] although not made until several days afterward, and the creditor begins suit on that day,[44] or giving a note for an additional sum,[45] is a sufficient consideration; but a promise to pay the debt at a future time,[46] or out of the proceeds of some particular property, is not.[47] A confession of judgment by the principal in favor of his creditor is sufficient; [48] so is a purchase of property by the principal from the creditor at the request of the latter.[49] One promise is a sufficient consideration for another, and an actual money consideration is not required to effect an extension of time.[50]

(2) PAYMENTS.[51] Part payment of the amount due is not a sufficient consideration for an extension of the time of payment of the balance,[52] nor would the payment of another matured debt owing by the principal to the creditor; [53] but part payment, before maturity, of the debt for which the surety is liable,[54]

Part of bonds not due.— Where the obligee on several bonds executed by the same person agreed that, in consideration of the immediate payment of a certain sum on each bond, some of which were not due, and of or the promise to pay, before maturity, another debt of the principal is a sufficient consideration.[55]

(3) Obtaining Security. If the principal, as consideration for an extension of time, gives his creditor additional security, it is sufficient,[56] although inadequate.[57] A transfer of property by the principal,[58] or an order upon a third person for property,[59] an assignment of the interest of the principal in a partnership,[60] giving a mortgage on real [61] or on personal property,[62] or giving another mortgage,[63] or giving another note as collateral security, is a sufficient consideration for an extension of time to discharge the surety.[64]

(E) Duration of Extension. As an agreement, to result in a binding contract, must be certain as to its terms, an extension to the principal, in order to release his surety, must be for a definite period.[65] It is not sufficient that the creditor actually the consolidation of the interest with the principal, he would give further time for the payment of the residue, the surety is discharged, although the whole amount paid does not equal the amount due. Smith v. Tunno, 1 McCord Eq. (S. C.) 443, 16 Am. Dec. 617.

does wait a long time after an agreement for delay; [66] but if the period be definite, it is immaterial how short it is,[67] even a day being sufficient to release the surety.[68] In some cases it has been held that where there is an agreement, on sufficient consideration, postponing the day of payment, although it may not be shown how long or to what particular time the payment is agreed to be postponed, the rule that an extension of time discharges the surety applies.[69]

(F) Fraud. It has been held that an agreement for an extension obtained by fraud practised upon the creditor, being voidable, will not discharge the surety;[70] but if the creditor, on learning of the fraud practised upon him by the principal, does not act promptly, the surety will be discharged unless it clearly appears

Evidence not showing fraud.— Where the principal on a bond made an agreement with the holder for an extension of the time for payment in consideration of twenty-five dollars to be paid, it is not fraudulent or a trick to take the holder by surprise, for the principal a few days later to drive up to the store of the holder, hand him twenty-five dollars, and drive off at once after saying, "Here is that money I promised you." Forbes v. Sheppard, 98 N. C. 111, 3 S. E. 817.

Executed contract.— Where the payee of a note accepted a new note of the principal secured by a mortgage on land which the principal did not own, but to which he appeared to have title by a forged deed, the

that he has not been prejudiced.[71] The rule is applied where the creditor has granted an extension of time because of a representation by the principal that the surety has consented thereto,[72] because he fraudulently has been induced to accept a worthless note,[73] or where the creditor gave time to the principal on condition that a new bond [74] or note be executed, and the principal forged the signatures of the sureties to the new instrument.[75] But where the signature of a surety to a renewal note was obtained by a false representation of the principal to which the creditor was not a party, extension was held valid and the surety on the original note released.[76]

(G) Performance of Conditions. Not only must the agreement for an extension be complete;[77] but if the creditor has annexed conditions to his agreement for an extension of time, the agreement is not binding if the conditions are not performed, and the surety is not discharged.[78]

(III) Various Transactions as Effecting Extension and Discharge — (A) In General. Any contract upon sufficient consideration which, in its consequences, may have the effect of giving an extension of time discharges the surety.[79] An agreement that the indebtedness may be paid in instalments,[80] an agreement not to sue, the continuance of an action or the proceedings therein,[81]

thereof on credit, it will constitute such an extension as to discharge a surety.[87] Consent by the creditor to wait until the principal can go to a certain place to get funds will not discharge the surety.[88] It is not necessarily an extension of time to permit a contractor to complete his work after the time specified in the contract;[89] and notice to the principal that he will be sued if he do not pay before a certain time,[90] or the signification of a willingness to extend credit, are not agreements for an extension.[91] Where the surety has become liable for all debts of the principal to become due, extensions granted to the principal will not discharge the surety if the debt as extended answers to the description of those intended to be secured; [92] or if the surety has agreed to become responsible for all debts owing by the principal at a certain future time, any extensions granted to the principal which do not expire later than such time will not affect the liability of the surety.[93]

Extending usual credit.— Under a bond executed to a brewing company by a liquor dealer to secure payment for liquors to be delivered in future, which provided that the principal should pay the accounts for liquor "as often as the same shall fall due, or when thereunto legally required" and no contract was made as to the time within which payments were to be made, and purchases were made every few days and payments made from time to time, it was held that it would be presumed, in the absence of any stipulation on the subject that it was contemplated by all the parties that there would be an allowance of the usual credits; that under the terms of the bond in this case, however, it was not necessary to resort to presumptions, since under the bond there could be no default except by a failure by the principal to pay when due according to express or an implied agreement, and that the allowance of credits usual under the custom of business on purchases made did not vary the contract. Running of time from date of credit.— In Boyle v. Bradley, 26 U. C. C. P. 373, it was held that where a surety becomes liable for goods to be purchased to "the amount of $200, payable in six months," the six months begins to run from the time credit is extended to the principal, and not from the date of the surety's contract, nor from the default of the principal; and the principal having given his note on the day of the last shipment to him, payable in six months, the surety became liable immediately on default of the principal at the expiration of the six months' credit.

Days of grace.— Where the contract of the surety was for the payment of all claims within three months from the delivery of goods, taking a note from the principal payable three months from the time of delivery, but which, on account of days of grace, was due three days later, is an extension of time which discharges the surety. Appleton v. Parker, 15 Gray (Mass.) 173.

(B) Payment of Interest — (1) IN GENERAL. A promise to pay,[94] giving a note [95] for, or the payment of accrued interest is not a consideration for an extension of time; [96] nor does the payment of interest as it becomes due after an extension,[97] although at a greater rate,[98] constitute a consideration, even though, because of such payments, the creditor continues indulgence to the principal.[99] But the payment of interest in advance,[1] or giving a note therefor, is a sufficient consideration to support a contract for an extension of time to the principal so as to discharge the surety.[2] The mere fact of the acceptance of interest in advance,[3]

Mere remittance in advance insufficient.— Previous to the maturity of a promissory note, the principal sent the holder a draft, saying that he hoped to be able to pay the note soon, in which case the draft was to be applied as part payment; but that, if he could not do so, the holder should take the sum as interest in advance for three months. The holder did not reply, but cashed the draft, holding the proceeds without making any application thereof until the expiration of three months, when he indorsed it as three months' interest on the note, and it was held that these facts did not import a binding contract to delay the payment of the note, and that a surety thereon was not discharged thereby. Presumption of fact.— The presumption of an agreement to extend the time of payment, arising from the payment of interest in advance, is one of fact and not of law. Guerguin v. Boone, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 622, 77 S. W. 630.

The voluntary payment of interest by the principal about the time it is due (English v. Landon, 181 Ill. 614, 54 N. E. 911 [reversing 75 Ill. App. 483]), or shortly before it is due is held not to discharge the surety (Weaver v. Prebster, 37 Ind. App. 582, 77 N. E. 674).

A mere indorsement on a note that the time of payment is extended to a given day, up to which time interest at the rate named in the note has been paid, does not discharge a surety, there being nothing to show that the payment was in advance or that the principal bound himself to keep the money, etc. Crossman v. Wohlleben, 90 Ill. 537. And an indorsement on an overdue note of a payment of more than enough to pay the accrued interest does not imply necessarily an agreement for an extension of time. Vore v. Woodford, 29 Ohio St. 245. But in Dubuisson v. Folkes, 30 Miss. 432, it was held that an indorsement: "Six months further time is given on the within note, and the interest paid to January 2d, 1853," and signed, accompanied by prepayment of interest, is sufficient evidence of a contract to extend the time of payment, so as to discharge a surety.

Indorsements alleged to have been by mistake.— Where as against a surety plaintiff claimed that credits of interest were indorsed on a note by mistake and that no interest was in fact paid and it appeared that the account of the principal with plaintiff bank had been charged with interest and that the bank credited its interest account by such amount as collected, and that there had been deposits made after the charge, it was held that in the absence of evidence that the subsequent deposits were insufficient to cover the balance due when the charge was made it would not be presumed that it was not so covered; that it was incumbent on the bank to prove that the subsequent deposits were insufficient to cover such balance due on the account when the charge was made. interest on interest,[7] is a sufficient consideration for an extension of time. In some states a promise to pay interest at the rate specified in the original contract,[8] or at the rate which the principal is bound, by law, to pay,[9] or a reduced rate,[10] is regarded as not constituting any consideration for an extension of time; in other states the contrary is the rule.[11] Whether an executory agreement to pay usury will constitute a sufficient consideration for an extension of time to the principal depends largely upon the effect of usury upon the contract under the statutes of the different states. If such agreement is made illegal, the agreement for an extension is not binding, and hence the surety not discharged,[12] although the delay is actually given in pursuance of the agreement,[13] and the usury subsequently is paid;[14] in other states the surety is discharged.[15] If usury has been paid for note [34] or bill of exchange of the principal for the purpose of having the proceeds thereof, when obtained, applied on the original indebtedness,[35] although such action has been taken by the principal with the expectation that the creditor will refrain from pressing for immediate payment.[36] If a note of the principal is not taken as payment of the original debt, or if it does not suspend the creditor's right of action, the surety is not discharged.[37]

(D) Stay or Extension by Authority of Law. A stay under a statutory provision will not discharge a surety.[38] The state, in the collection of penalties, is held not to occupy the position of an ordinary creditor, and the respite of a replevied fine by the governor will not release the sureties on the replevy bond.[39] A court having no authority to enter an order giving a collector of taxes an extension of time for their collection does not, by such an order, discharge sureties;[40] and an extension of time for the filing of the final account of an administrator, whether the order be valid or not, is held not to affect the liability of his sureties for a dividend which, by the decree, he is ordered to pay.[41]

(E) As to Duties of Office or Employment. Where no particular time of settlement is provided for under a bond securing the faithful performance of the duties of an agent in paying over money, but it is left to the discretion of the obligee, it is not a good plea on behalf of the surety that the obligee changed the time and manner of settlement;[42] but if the contract of employment required remittances at stated periods, a surety will be discharged by authority given to the principal

The giving of a note by a contractor for government work for the amount of an account rendered for materials furnished does not release the surety on his bond given pursuant to the act of Aug. 13, 1894, 28 U. S. St. at L. 278, c. 280, § 1 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 2523], from liability for such material, the action on the bond being based on the account and not on the note. U. S. v. Axman, 153 Fed. 982.

(Pa.) 372); and it must be shown to have been substituted for the previous liability of the principal (Lutterloh v. McIlhenny Co., 74 Tex. 73, 11 S. W. 1063).

But taking a renewal note, although the original note is not marked "paid," is held not the taking of collateral security, but an extension of time of payment of the original note, discharging a surety thereon. Schnitzler v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 1 Kan. App. 674, 42 Pac. 496.

to retain the money a longer time.[43] The allowance of delay by municipal authorities to a tax collector for the making of his settlement will not discharge his sureties.[44] Where by express statutory provisions the time for the settlement of an officer's accounts, as in the case of a tax collector, may be extended, such an extension will not discharge his sureties,[45] and in a number of decisions a statute extending the time for the settlement of such officer, although enacted after the execution of the bond, is not permitted to discharge the sureties who are held to have bound themselves subject to the right of the state to make such provision.[46] Upon this last point, however, the authorities are not uniform, and it is elsewhere held that the general rule under which sureties are discharged by an extension of time [47] applies between the state and an individual,[48] and that such a statute will discharge the sureties.[49] And where the time for the discharge of the duties of an assignee is fixed by statute, an extension of the time by statute, after the execution of a bond for the performance of such duties, is held to discharge the sureties as to acts of the principal done after the expiration of the original period.[50]

k. Inducing the Surety to Refrain From Protecting Himself. A surety is discharged by a concealment of material facts by the creditor, when inquiry is made by the former,[57] or by any act of the creditor which causes the surety to forego taking steps to protect himself.[58] Thus informing a surety that the debt is paid or settled, thereby lulling him into security and preventing him from taking steps to protect himself, will estop the creditor from thereafter proceeding against the surety.[59] In like manner a statement by the creditor to the surety that the creditor will look to and enforce the obligation only against the principal, in

Burden does not shift.— On the other hand it is held that where an unauthorized extension is set up by a surety in the defense of an action on a note, the substance of the issue between the parties is whether plaintiff at the date of his writ had an actionable contract against defendants in the form of a promissory note; that when plaintiff produces and proves the note he makes out his prima facie case to avoid the effect of which it is incumbent upon defendant to offer some evidence, but the burden of proof is not thereby shifted, but remains on plaintiff throughout the trial; that while the proof of the extension of time of payment necessarily commences on the part of defendant after production and proof of the note, it is not because the burden of proof has shifted but because plaintiff has offered proof sufficient to establish the validity of the contract and its breach unless rebutted by proof of equal or greater weight. reliance upon which the surety refrains from securing himself will prevent recovery from the surety;[60] but it must appear that in consequence of such statement the surety did in fact alter his line of conduct to his injury.[61] A mere statement that the principal is good for the amount,[62] that the creditor will not look to him,[63] that security held by the creditor will be sufficient,[64] that he does not want the surety any longer,[65] that he does not consider him bound,[66] or that he need not trouble himself [67] is not sufficient to estop the creditor from proceeding against the surety unless in consequence of such statement the latter has changed his situation to his injury.[68] While a surety is justified in relying upon statements made by an authorized agent of the creditor,[69] it is not a defense that he relied upon information from the principal,[70] although fraudulent,[71] unless the creditor was a party to the fraud.[72] to the extent of the value of the security relinquished or lost. So if the creditor having levied an execution on the property of the principal afterward releases the levy he thereby deprives himself of recourse against the surety,[9] and release of a levy of the property of a cosurety releases the other cosureties to the extent of the proportion of the debt equitably due from the cosurety upon whose property the levy was made and released.[10] But a surety is not discharged because the creditor discontinues proceedings which have been begun;[11] nor by the return, at the request of the creditor, of an execution against property of the principal before a levy;[12] and if a judgment is a lien upon real property whether levied upon or not, a dismissal of a levy upon the real property will not discharge the surety.[13] So it has been held that the surety is not discharged by the release of an attachment against the property of the principal,[14] unless the suit and attachment were at the request of the surety, in which event it has been considered that the surety will be discharged.[15]

(III) MISAPPLICATION OF SECURITY.[16] The creditor, having received property of the principal, must account for it,[17] it being his duty to appropriate such property[18] and any profits therefrom[19] to the debt for which the security was given. If the creditor fraudulently encumbers or conceals the property of an insolvent principal,[20] or having received security for the debt for which the surety is bound applies it to a purpose other than the satisfaction of that debt[21] the surety is discharged to the extent of the value of the security misapplied. But the fact that proceeds of the property of the principal were distributed improperly by an erroneous judgment of a court does not discharge the surety,[22] and if the creditor applies security given by one cosurety to the share of that cosurety, the liability of the other cosurety for his share is not affected;[23] nor can the right of the creditor to proceed against a surety be prejudiced by the misappropriation of property of the principal by a cosurety.[24]

(IV) SUBSTITUTION OF SECURITY. A surety is not discharged merely because the creditor exchanges security for other security of the same kind, without loss to the surety;[25] but if injury results the surety will be released pro tanto.[26]

Substitution of security of a different kind has been held to discharge the surety, although the security substituted was as good as the security surrendered.[27]

(v) Disposition of Security For Less Than Value. If property of the principal is sold irregularly, or negligently by the creditors so that it brings less than its value the surety is discharged pro tanto.[28] But the mere fact that property is sold for less than its face value will not release a surety, if the sale was made in good faith;[29] and if the property was sold for its full market value the surety remains liable, although it might be worth more to him.[30]

(vi) Failure to Register or Record Instrument. While it has been held, particularly in earlier decisions, that a surety is not discharged by failure of the creditor to record the instrument evidencing the obligation, such as a mortgage in consequence of which the security is lost,[31] especially if the surety did not request the creditor to record the instrument,[32] there are later cases to the contrary.[33] Thus it has been held that a surety is discharged by omission of the creditor to file a warrant of attorney,[34] or a bill of sale,[35] whereby the benefit of the security is lost to the surety. If the creditor has agreed to record a mortgage he must do so within a reasonable time.[36]

not impair any security to the benefit of which the surety is entitled, the latter is not discharged.[39] If payments are made according to the provisions of the contract the sureties are not released merely because such payments were made before the expiration of the time allowed by statute for filing liens,[40] and if the contract provides for extra payments when needed for additional labor, an extra payment in good faith will not release the sureties, although not actually necessary.[41] A loan by the owner to the contractor, to be repaid out of the next instalment of the contract price,[42] or the acceptance of an order drawn by the contractor in favor of a person furnishing materials, and which is paid from a subsequent instalment,[43] will not avoid the obligation of the surety; and a surety cannot complain if premature payments have been induced by his own representations as to the integrity of the contractor;[44] nor are sureties for a subcontractor discharged because premature payments may have been made to the contractor.[45]

it is offered,[49] and can take security for other claims for which the surety is not liable.[50] The creditor is not bound to revive judgment,[51] or to prevent the principal from removing property not in the possession of the creditor,[52] it being the duty of the surety and not that of the creditor to invoke the law in such cases.[53] Nor is the creditor under any duty to take active steps to preserve security,[54] as to insure,[55] pay taxes,[56] or make repairs;[57] nor is he under any duty to administer on the estate of a deceased principal in order to protect the surety if the latter has an equal opportunity of doing so.[58] Likewise the owner of a building in progress of erection is not under any obligation to see that the contractor applies the payments made to him, in discharge of claims for material and labor;[59] and a surety is not discharged although, by delay of the creditor, property in the possession of the latter has depreciated in value,[60] or has been injured by fire.[61] The creditor is not proscribed from buying property from the principal merely because it deprives him of the right to attach it.[62]

the place where the security is enforceable.[66] The liability of the surety is not affected if he has not suffered any injury by the act of the creditor,[67] but the burden is on the creditor to show that the surety has not been injured.[68] If the contract provides for a surrender of a part of the security upon payment of a portion of the indebtedness, and a surrender is made without the payment of interest in arrears, the surety is released as to such interest.[69] In ascertaining the value of goods released from a levy, the expenses of a sheriff's sale should be deducted.[70]

3. Operation of Law — a. In General. The general rule that a surety is discharged when the liability of his principal is extinguished[71] does not apply when the extinction is caused by operation of law, and not by the act of the creditor,[72] and the defense is personal to the principal,[73] but the surety remains liable.[74] If the contract of the principal is changed or enlarged by legislative enactment,[75] or by order of court,[76] the surety is nevertheless discharged.

(III) OF SURETY. While a discharge in bankruptcy [89] or insolvency [90] of the surety himself may be an available defense, a surety is not released as to indebtedness maturing after his own discharge in bankruptcy.[91]

c. Statute of Limitations and Laches [92]— (I) DEBT BARRED AS TO SURETY. The right to recover from a surety may be barred by the statute of limitations; [93] and, regardless of the statute, laches on the part of the creditor in delaying action, may defeat his right.[94] The statute in effect at the time of the breach governs, and not that in force at the time of the execution of the contract; [95] and if the statute provides the time within which suit must be brought against a surety, suit cannot be brought thereafter, although the obligee was ignorant of the suretyship.[96] While the surety may be discharged by lapse of the period of limitation specially applicable to sureties, a mortgage given by him will not be barred until the debt itself is barred.[97]

(II) DEBT BARRED AS TO PRINCIPAL. A surety is not discharged merely because the cause of action against the principal is barred.[98]

(III) FAILURE TO PRESENT CLAIM AGAINST PRINCIPAL'S ESTATE. Failure of the creditor or obligee to present his claim against the estate of a deceased principal in time to have it allowed does not discharge the surety; [99] and it is

In Illinois, prior to the acts of 1869, page 305, the common-law rule prevailed. Villars v. Palmer, 67 Ill. 204; People v. White, 11 Ill. 341. But this has been changed by Rev. St. c. 132, § 3. Waughop v. Bartlett, 165 Ill. 124, 129, 46 N. E. 197; Brockman v. Sieverling, 6 Ill. App. 512. The act of 1869 was not a mere statute of limitations, but was a part of the contract upon which the sureties competent for the surety to pay the amount due, and prefer his claim against the estate.[1]

(IV) Debt Barred as to Cosurety. A surety is not discharged because the statute of limitations has run in favor of a cosurety;[2] but he remains liable for the whole debt.[3]

(V) When Statute Begins to Run — (A) In General. The statute of limitations begins to run against a surety on a note from its maturity and not from its execution;[4] it begins to run at once on a demand[5] or on an overdue[6] note, unless there has been an extension, in which case the statute begins to run from the expiration of the extension.[7] On a breach of a fidelity bond the statute begins to run at once, and not from the end of the term for which the principal was elected.[8] The contingent liability of a surety is not such a claim against his estate as must be presented and probated within the statutory time.[9]

(B) Waiver of Breach or Default. There may be successive breaches of a bond, in which case the obligee may waive the first, and the statute of limitations will not begin to run until later.[10] So the owner of a building in course of erection can waive the default of the contractor in failing to complete the same within the time prescribed,[11] or he can waive the apparent breach caused by the mere filing of a materialman's lien, and wait until the rendition of a judgment thereon, and the statute will begin to run from such latter breach.[12]

(VI) Suspension of Running of Statute — (A) In General. A delay does not prevent the statute of limitations running in favor of a surety;[13] nor can the principal waive the benefit of the statute for his surety.[14] The fact that the surety has undertaken to be liable for a note "until paid" does not continue his obligation beyond the statutory time.[15]

(B) By Part Payment. If the statute prescribes a period within which action had a right to rely. House v. School Trustees Tp. 35, 83 Ill. 368. The provision "that this act shall not be construed so as to release any surety from the payment of the whole or any part of such debt that may remain unpaid after the estate of the decedent is fully administered" applies only to notes presented for allowance; and the holder could not recover such balance as would have remained unpaid if the note had been presented. Huddleston v. Francis, 124 Ill. 195, 16 N. E. 243 [affirming 26 Ill. App. 224]. And it was immaterial whether the estate was solvent or not. A note made and matured between the passage of the act of March 4, 1869, and that of July 1, 1874, would be governed by the prior statute. Under the latter statute, failure of the creditor to present a note to the estate of a deceased principal discharges the surety to the extent only that it might have been collected from the estate if presented within the proper time after the granting of letters of administration. Tipton v. Carrigan, 10 Ill. App. 318.

In Minnesota in Siebert v. Quesnel, 65 Minn. 107, 67 N. W. 803, 60 Am. St. Rep. 441, it is held that a surety is discharged if the claim is not presented against the estate of a deceased principal if sufficient to discharge all claims against it.

must be brought against a surety, a payment, whether made by himself or by the principal, will not extend that period.[16]

(c) By Fraud of Principal. If the running of the statute has been suspended as to the principal on account of concealed fraud, it is suspended likewise as to his surety, although the latter is innocent.[17]

(vii) By Special Limitation in Contract. A provision in a contract of suretyship that any action thereon must be brought within six months is reasonable, and will be upheld;[18] and, in order to hold the surety, suit must be brought within six months after the obligee had knowledge[19] of a breach; but the principal cannot take advantage of such a provision in his bond if he is sued on the contract to secure the performance of which the bond was given.[20]

IX. Rights and Remedies of Surety.

A. As to Creditor or Obligee [1]— 1. In General. A surety for a contractor has no right to require payment of the contract price to himself.[2] The surety may have such right, however, where the agreement of the parties provides therefor,[3] and he may acquire it by completing the work on default of the principal,[4] in which case he is entitled to recover the contract price, less any amounts paid to the principal prior to his abandonment of the contract,[5] and less deductions for defects in the work and material furnished by the principal.[6] If the surety's contract was induced by fraud, he may have it canceled so far as he is concerned,[7] and the Ferris v. Kingston Tp., 12 U. C. Q. B. 436, holding that after one man takes a job of work, putting forth another person as his surety for the due performance of it, the surety cannot, by arrangement between the two, be intruded upon the other party to the contract as the principal; that if the surety does the work it is for the person who undertook to do it and not for the other party to the contract.

Bond and contract construed together.— In Madison First Nat. Bank v. School District No. 1, 77 Nebr. 570, 110 N. W. 349, it was held that where a contractor's bond provides that in case of his default in performance the surety may take possession of the building and complete the work, and that in such event the reserve in the hands of the owner of the building together with any other moneys due or to become due shall be paid to the surety, the building contract and the bond being interdependent and taken over at the same instant should be construed together as constituting a trilateral contract between the parties and that upon default by the contractor and completion of the building according to the contract by the surety the latter does not stand in the position of assignee with respect to the "reserve" in the hands of the owner and the "other moneys due or to become due" but as an original party to the trilateral contract. To the same effect see American Bonding Co. v. State University, 11 Ida. 163, 81 Pac. 604.

Completion creating no liability to surety. — But in Hall v. Gilmour, 9 U. C. Q. Application of distributive share in estate. — Where one of the next of kin of an intestate is indebted to the estate in a bond secured by a surety, the latter has a right, in equity, to compel the administrator to apply the distributive share of his principal toward the satisfaction of the bond. Allen v. Smitherman, 41 N. C. 341.

In behalf of surety's vendee.— Where a judgment was recovered against the administrator of an estate and a surety on the bond of such administrator, and the surety has received nothing either from the assets of the estate or from the administrator as security [15] in the hands of the creditor or obligee, before resorting to the surety, or to any security furnished by the latter,[16] provided the security furnished by the principal is as available as that furnished by the surety,[17] and it does not cause any injury to the rights of third persons.[18] The surety likewise is entitled to an accounting of security received by the creditor or obligee.[19] The creditor is not such, and is insolvent, and the administrator has converted the interest of the judgment creditor in the estate, and is solvent, the judgment creditor will be restrained from selling lands purchased by plaintiffs of the insolvent surety until the property of the administrator has been subjected to the payment of the judgment. In Prout v. Lomer, 79 Ill. 331, it is said that the equitable principle that when a party has a lien upon or interest in two funds out of either of which his debt can be paid, another party, having a lien upon or interest in one only of such funds for his debt, has the right in equity to compel the former to resort in the first instance to the other fund for satisfaction, is applicable to sureties in the narrow sense only, and not in favor of an accommodation maker of a note.

Part of contract price retained.—Where the bond of a contractor provided for the retention of a part of the price for thirty days after the completion of the work, his sureties are entitled to have such reservation applied in part liquidation of the cost of completing the work after he discontinued it; a provision in the bond that it should not be rendered void by any payment in advance does not prevent the sureties from having the benefit of the entire amount of the reservation, although a part of it has been paid to the principal. Guttenberg v. Vassel, 74 N. J. L. 553, 65 Atl. 994.

After judgment against surety.— Where a vendor's lien is retained to secure a bond for purchase-money, and a judgment is obtained by the assignee of the bond against the principal and surety, the surety in equity cannot compel such assignee to exhaust his lien before enforcing his judgment against the surety, although the principal is insolvent. Payment of deficiency into court.— If a surety, before suit is brought against him, applies to a court of equity to be released, and it appears that the estate of the principal would not have paid the whole debt, the court will require the surety to pay the deficiency into court for the creditor, but permit him to deduct his costs. Where the surety is allowed to recover payments made by him, he usually is entitled to interest thereon;[45] but if the surety would not be entitled to interest on security given by him to the creditor, he is not entitled to interest on the proceeds thereof.[46]

b Usury. The surety can recover usury paid by him.[47] As to payments made by the principal, however, the rule is not uniform. It has been held that a surety in a bond may claim credits for sums exacted from his principal as usurious interest,[48] while on the other hand the recovery of such voluntary payments is held to be a personal privilege of the principal which does not inure to the benefit of the surety[49] A surety having paid nothing for his principal cannot recover back usurious interest paid by the principal on other instruments or in other transactions in which the surety was not bound as such.[50]

B. As to Principal — 1. Rights as to Consideration For Undertaking. If a surety has received something as a consideration, he is entitled to retain it without accounting for it;[51] and if he has incurred liability on the promise of consideration, bringing suit thereon, has received from a surety part payment of the debt and costs, and has agreed to use diligence to collect the debt from the principal and to pay the surety one half of the amount he might be able so to collect, the holder is bound to resort to legal proceedings, if necessary, and will be liable for a breach of the agreement; he cannot set up that the principal could successfully defend the action by reason of the payment by the surety).

Subsequent contract by surety.— Where the real estate of a bankrupt is sold under a judgment, and is bid in by his assignee, and the latter sells it to a surety liable for such judgment, under an agreement by which the surety is to pay the indebtedness to the judgment creditor, and the surety pays the assignee, who pays the creditor, the court will not look behind the contract of the assignee with the surety, and the latter cannot recover usury included in the amount paid. Construction and sufficiency.—Where a chose in action was assigned to secure the repayment of a certain advancement "and also of all other sums which might thereafter become due from" the assignor to the assignee "whether in respect of principal, interest, discount, commissions, or otherwise howsoever," it covers money subsequently paid by the assignee as surety for the assignor. So where a mortgage was executed by the principal to his surety to indemnify the latter against notes, which the latter agreed to sign, payable at some bank in a designated place to an amount not exceeding a specified amount, "and against all other notes which the said" surety may sign as such, it was held that the mortgage was security for two classes of notes, one comprehending those payable at some bank in the place designated, and the other including notes payable elsewhere, or not mentioning any place of payment, the latter not being restricted as to amount. Money of ward.—But an agreement between a guardian and his surety that the latter, for his indemnity, shall hold the moneys of which the guardian is the legal custodian, is subversive of the objects of the appointment, and therefore void. Poultney v. Randall, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 232. But in Rogers v. Hopkins, 70 Ga. 454, it was held that it is not illegal for a guardian to deliver to his surety for the protection of the latter property of the ward, if there was no intention for the surety to use the property, and the guardian does not lose proper control over it.

other property may be placed in the hands of the surety for his protection,[62] and the principal may confess judgment in favor of the surety for that purpose.[63] If the surety has entered into his contract,[64] or into a renewal thereof, in reliance on security to be given him, there is a sufficient consideration;[65] and, after he has entered into the relation, and before a breach, his liability to pay the principal's debt constitutes a sufficient consideration.[66] If the title to the security is transferred to the surety, immediate delivery thereof may not be necessary;[67] but if the security is of the character which requires registration, and registration is not had, the surety cannot hold it as against subsequent bona fide purchasers.[68]

b. Rights Under and Enforcement of Security — (I) In General. The right of the surety to such security is superior to secret equities of third persons;[69] to subsequent liens;[70] and to the rights of subsequent purchasers,[71] mortgagees,[72] assignees in insolvency,[73] receivers,[74] and of other creditors.[75] But the sureties cannot retain security as against prior liens unless the holders thereof delay the enforcement of their claims;[76] nor against prior attaching creditors;[77] nor against those acquiring rights under a prior contract with the principal.[78] If the security be notes, the sureties can bring suit thereon.[79] The death of the principal does not affect the right of the sureties.[80] And as sureties may have a right to two

(II) Retention of Security. The principal cannot recover security from the surety so long as the surety is liable to the obligee,[82] but it is otherwise when the surety's liability ceases.[83] If the sureties have agreed to surrender security on being indemnified, such condition must be performed before the surety can be compelled to part with his security;[84] but if the sureties, having agreed to surrender security and take a bond instead, break their agreement, they are liable for the expenses necessarily incurred in procuring and offering the bond.[85]

(III) Application of and Accounting For Security — (A) In General. A surety holding security is entitled to have it applied in satisfaction of the debt[86] for the amount for which he is actually liable;[87] and he is entitled to retain the profits also of any such security as incident to it,[88] until he is discharged from liability. discharge of the surety cannot be recovered by him or his assignee having knowledge of the facts.[1] The surety must account for the proceeds of security, although he has taken an assignment of prior liens thereon discharged by him.[2] In accounting for property placed in the possession of the surety, its value at the time it was transferred to him will be taken;[3] and the surety has been held responsible for its profits, and for all losses which, with due care, could have been prevented.[4]

(D) Application of Excess. If the surety has paid the debt, he must account for any excess of the security over the amount paid,[5] and other creditors of the principal are entitled to the benefit of any excess of security over the debt of the principal for which the surety is liable,[6] unless the principal has instructed the surety to pay such excess to others.[7]

3. Before Payment or Satisfaction — a. In General. Whether a surety is deemed to be a creditor of his principal from the date of his suretyship or from the date of his payment of the debt depends upon the character of the proceeding which raises the question.[8] While many of the rights of a surety depend upon payment by him, he possesses many before payment; and such rights have their inception as soon as he executes the instrument,[9] and are fixed by the law in force at that time;[10] but usually the surety, before payment, cannot interfere with the right of the principal to deal with his property as he pleases.[11] Ordinarily, and this is the common-law rule,[12] where one is surety for another for the payment of a debt, the right of action by the surety against the principal,[13] or against his estate,[14] accrues at the time of the payment by the former; and the payment must be made before the action for reimbursement is brought.[15] In some jurisdictions this rule has been changed or modified by statute [16] or the equitable remedy for exoneration has been supplemented.[17]

b. As to Debts Due Principal From Surety. When the surety is sued by the principal on a claim held by the latter against the former, the mere fact of the suretyship will not be a defense to the surety if no action has been taken against

In Louisiana, under Code Civ. Proc. art. 3026, a surety was given the right to sue the principal for indemnification: (1) When a suit for payment exists against him; (2) when the principal has become bankrupt; (3) when the principal was bound to discharge him within a given time; (4) when the debt has become due by the expiration of the time for which it was contracted. The party suing must bring himself within the statute. Edwards v. Prather, 22 La. Ann. 334. See also Iberia Cypress Co. v. Christen, 112 La. 448, 36 So. 490; Mudd v. Rogers, 10 La. Such provisions give a remedy which the surety of an administrator exercises in his name personally and in no wise for or on account of creditors of the estate nor by virtue of any right of action borrowed by him on the debt for which he is surety;[18] nor will it be a defense against the personal representative of the principal,[19] and it is held that he cannot refuse to pay claims which have been assigned to the principal, if the surety has not paid anything on the debt for which he is liable, although judgment has been obtained against him.[20] The principal has the right to assign to the creditor, as security, a debt due from the surety to the principal.[21] And a surety who has been fully indemnified by the principal cannot object to paying a debt owing by him to the principal.[22] If, however, the principal,[23] or his estate,[24] is insolvent, equity recognizes the right of the surety to retain any funds of the principal in his hands,[25] even as against an assignee of the principal;[26] and the principal will not be allowed to recover from his surety without first indemnifying the latter.[27]

Protection of surety's estate.— Where an executor sued to pay debts out of the real estate of his testator, and the estate was indebted largely for suretyship for which there were judgment liens against the principal, and in the suit the lien creditors of the principal had been convened, it was held that the principal was not entitled to claim the benefit of a statutory provision that a sale shall not be made of his realty unless the rents and profits of the real estate will not satisfy the liens in five years, but that his land first should be subjected to the exoneration of the lands of the surety. Alderson v. Alderson, 53 W. Va. 388, 44 S. E. 313.

Nash v. Burchard, 87 Mich. 85, 49 N. W. 492, where the surety was denied the right to proceed in equity before payment, having been secured by the principal and the court refusing to change the contract of the parties by requiring further security. the surety has to be protected by the principal.[43] The form in which that protection may be secured is not material where the right to it exists and can be had without prejudice to the creditor.[44] The creditor entitled to the debt for which the surety is liable should be made a party defendant in order to receive payment from the principal,[45] and the bill should allege that the surety is still liable for the debt.[46]

4. After Payment or Satisfaction — a. Reimbursement or Indemnity in General — (i) Rules Stated. There is always at the least an implied contract between the parties which obliges a principal to reimburse his surety when the latter has paid the debt;[47] he then becomes a creditor of the principal,[48] and, the debt having matured and being due,[49] is entitled to recover from the latter the amount so paid,[50] even though the creditor was not bound to respect the suretyship;[51] nor are the rights of sureties against their principal affected by any private arrangement among themselves for the distribution of the liability,[52] or by the particular manner in which the relation arose.[53] But a surety has no claim by reason of his suretyship after payment of the debt by a principal,[54] nor does one surety have any right against the principal where payment of the debt was made by his cosurety,[55] and the payment of a note by the surety therein cannot be regarded as a payment by him of an original debt of the principal which was discharged by the proceeds of the secured note, so as to deprive the principal of a right which depended upon his having paid such original debt.[56]

(II) Against Estate of Principal. If the principal is dead, the surety can prove his claim against the estate of the principal;[57] and if a surety becomes administrator or executor of his principal, he need not bring a formal action to recover indemnity, but, from the assets in his hands, may retain the amount paid.[58]

In order to pay this amount his son took up a note held by a third person against the party to whom the amount was due, by giving to such third person his own note with his father as surety thereon, and in order to meet the last note proceeds were raised by another note also executed by the son and father as principal and surety respectively. The last note was paid by the surety, and it was held that the payment could not be considered as a payment of the original debt due on the cost of the improvements; that such payment was made by the son, although the father might be entitled to reimbursement.

A surety, after contributing to a cosurety who has paid the creditor, has a right to be reimbursed by the principal. Goodall v. Wentworth, 20 Me. 322; Ilsley v. Jewett, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 168. So where an administrator sold property to one of his sureties for which payment never was made, and another surety was compelled to pay a judgment recovered upon the administration bond, the latter surety is entitled to have the shares of the administrator and of the purchaser as distributees of the estate refunded to him. Norfleet v. Cotton, 16 N. C. 334.
Part of claim discharged as to one surety.— If after contribution by a surety by paying one half of the debt to a cosurety who had paid the whole and recovered a judgment therefor against the principal, the cosurety assigns the judgment, the assignee takes no greater right than the assignor had and could not enforce satisfaction for more than one half of the judgment; and where the judgment debtor becomes the owner of the judgment under a bequest from the assignee, it cannot be held that the whole debt is because the latter has received money [64] or property from the principal.[65] The principal cannot recover from his surety,[66] even though the former appears to be the surety; [67] but, after a change in the relation, a former principal who has become surety can recover from the former surety who has become principal,[68] unless there was some express agreement in regard to the matter; [69] and defendant can show that the relation has changed.[70]

(B) Where Principal Was Agent For Another. If the principal acted as the agent of another person, and the surety pays money in a matter within the scope of such agency, the surety can recover from such third person,[71] although the existence of the agency was unknown to the surety at the time of payment.[72]

(C) Surety For One of Several Debtors. If a person becomes surety for one only of two joint debtors, he cannot recover from the other; [73] but where a surety for one

64. A surety for a tax collector cannot recover from a person who borrowed money from the collector, not knowing that it was tax money, and who, in good faith, delivered goods in repayment of the loan. Brown v. Houck, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 16.

65. A surety for the purchase-money of property bought by a woman cannot recover from the husband after her marriage, although by the marriage the property becomes his. Cureton v. Moore, 55 N. C. 204.

Want of privity between surety and assignee or vendee of principal.— So where a contract for the sale of land, the purchase-price of which was evidenced by notes executed with a surety, was assigned under an agreement with the assignor and assignee, and in part consideration for the assignment, that the assignee should pay the original notes, it was held that although the agreement of the assignee to pay such notes was valid, there was no privity between him and the surety on the notes which would sustain an action by the surety against the assignee for reimbursement after payment of the notes by the surety. Hoffman v. Schwaebe, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 194. And where a mortgagee, in a mortgage in which a surety on a joint bond for the payment of an advancement joined a surety, afterward by indenture to which such surety was not a party sold the estate to another, who engaged to pay the mortagee the sum first advanced, and covenanted to indemnify the mortgagor and his surety, and the latter afterward advanced the money to pay said debt, it was held that he was not entitled to recover from the vendee of the mortgagor in an action for money paid; that the surety's remedy was against his principal, or an action against the vendee on the covenant to indemnify, in the name of his principal. Crafts v. Tritton, 2 Moore C. P. 411. But as to the right of sureties to set up in equity a condition by parol under which a mortgagee of the principal agreed to pay the secured debt out of the land see Rodes v. Crockett, 2 Yerg. (D) Where There Are Two or More Principals. Coöbligors who are principals are jointly liable to their surety.[75] But a surety can recover the full amount from either of his several principals,[76] although the default was committed by one and one of them give bail, such bail cannot, upon being compelled to pay the debt by proceedings against him as such, sustain an action against the other obligor for money paid to his use, there being no privity between the bail of one obligor and his coobligor. To the same effect see Bowman v. Blodgett, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 308, where, after dissolution of a partnership, a suit was brought against both of the former partners for a partnership debt, and one of them was held to bail, and the bail was compelled to pay the amount of a judgment against both.

So in Hikes v. Crawford, 4 Bush 19, a similar rule was announced where the note was given for a firm debt, although it was signed by one partner only, but in so far as this case held that a note so signed made the firm as such liable thereon it was overruled in Macklin v. Crutcher, 6 Bush 401, 99 Am. Contra.—As opposed to the cases above cited in this note see Asbury v. Flesher, 11 Mo. 610. Other cases which hold that a recovery cannot be had against another member of a firm upon an obligation signed by an individual member have been distinguished from those above cited in this note. In Tom v. Goodrich, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 213; Krafts v. Creighton, 3 Rich. (S. C.) 273; and U. S. v. Astley, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,472, 3 Wash. 508, it is held that where bonds had been executed by one member of a firm, to secure duties to the United States government upon property imported into the United States, the other copartner was not liable to refund to the surety. These decisions have been said to have proceeded upon the circumstance that the bond in such a case excluded all liability of the party proceeded against for the payment of the duties and that for this reason he could not be called upon to refund the amount paid out by the surety in the bond, and in this respect are distinguishable from the authorities first above cited in this note. Donegan v. Moran, 53 Hun (N. Y.) 21, 5 N. Y. Suppl. 575.

Sealed instrument.—Although one partner may not have authority to bind the other members of the firm by the execution of a sealed instrument, yet if the matter is a partnership transaction and a surety thereon has paid the debt either voluntarily (Wharton v. Woodburn, 20 N. C. 647), or after recovery against the party who signed the note secured (Purviance v. Sutherland, 2 Ohio St. 478) he may recover against another member of the firm.

Administrator as member of firm.— Where a surety signed an administration bond under a representation from a firm of which the administrator was a member, that they intended to take possession of all of the assets of the estate and make the administration a matter of partnership business, sharing the gains and losses resulting therefrom, so that the surety would become a surety for the firm, he cannot recover from the firm, as it is against the policy of the law for an administrator to allow others to control the property of the estate or share in its administration. Renewal fraudulently procured.—Where the surety on a note, with knowledge that one of the principals thereon has absconded and concealing the fact, procures the other principal to execute a renewal which the latter does with the understanding that it is to be executed by the other principal, but the only,[77] unless such default was committed with the connivance of the surety,[78] or there was an express agreement that the principals were to be liable in certain proportions.[79] It does not make any difference that judgment has been rendered against some of them only; [80] or that the surety executed the instrument before some of the principals had signed it.[81]

(E) One Who Assumes Liability Without Principal's Request. A surety who executed the contract without the knowledge of the principal cannot recover from the latter; [82] there cannot be an implied promise on the part of the principal to pay the surety if there was no request to incur the liability; [83] but it is held that a request from the principal may be implied from his accepting the benefit of the surety's contract.[84]

(V) Enforcement of Security. After payment by the surety, there is no longer any obstacle in the way of his enforcing any security he may hold,[85]

surety, who also executes the renewal, takes up the original note with the renewal without its being signed by the absconding principal and subsequently pays the renewal note, he is entitled to recover the amount from the principal on the renewal note, the payment being referred to the original debt. After election to pursue real principal.— In Pickering v. Marsh, 7 N. H. 192, plaintiff, at the request of the real principals in a note, signed it as surety upon their promise to indemnify him, they executing the note as sureties and another signing it as principal, the note being in fact for the benefit of the parties who signed as sureties. Plaintiff having paid the note and resorted to the parties at whose request he signed, as his principals, by claiming under an assignment by them for the exclusive benefit of their indorser, etc., it was held that if he had an election in the first instance to treat the party who signed as maker as his principal, by reason of the description of the parties in the instrument, such election no longer existed after plaintiff, with knowledge as to who were the actual principals, resorted to them as such and gave them a discharge.

without any previous suit against the principal to determine the liability of the latter;[86] but if the surety has not been given any security, he does not acquire a lien on the property of his principal by the mere fact of having made payment.[87] The surety will not be restrained from enforcing security because he entered into a compromise with the creditor, if made in good faith and manifestly to the advantage of the principal;[88] nor will the fact that the debt of the principal was usurious prevent the surety from retaining his security.[89]

After proof of claim against insolvent.— Where a deed of assignment by the principal contained a clause that creditors should be entitled to receive dividends upon the excess only of their claims over security held by them unless they consented to abandon such security, a surety proving his claim for the full amount will not be deemed to have abandoned a policy of insurance on the life of the principal, as such policy did not possess any value in the lifetime of the principal. Liability as surety.— In Cosgrove v. McKasy, 65 Minn. 426, 68 N. W. 76, it is held that the doctrine of equitable set-off cannot be extended so far as to allow a surety for a debt due to an assignee in insolvency to offset, as against it, the amount of an obligation which he has been obliged to pay as a surety for the assignor. The latter is, in every respect, a debt due to the surety from the estate; but the former is not, strictly speaking, or for the purpose of invoking the equitable powers of the court, a debt due from the surety.

As between several sureties.— Where two of five sureties upon a joint and several bond to a county, who were also indebted to their principal by a promissory note, one as principal and the other as surety, paid the county a certain amount as sureties on such bond after an assignment of the principal in the bond for the benefit of his creditors, the principal debtor in the note was not entitled to have more than one fifth of the amount due to the county on the bond offset as against the sum due on the note, upon the principle that when two or more sureties stand in the same relation to a principal they must bear the burdens of their position equally. Where a surety of an administrator succeeds him, owing to a breach of the bond, and indorses upon the bond a receipt of the money due thereon as money received from himself as surety, and has charged himself with the same in his inventory, he can maintain an action against the administrator for money paid for the use of the latter. Hazelton v. Valentine, 113 Mass. 472.

That the principal had a demand against the creditor, of which the surety did not take advantage, is no ground of objection to the surety's right to recover reimbursement of the principal. Rawson v. Rawson, 105 Mass. 214, holding that evidence of such demand is immaterial because if the surety had been sued separately he could not set off a demand due the principal, and if the principal and surety had been sued jointly the demand in favor of one of them could not be set off.

5. Bates v. Merrick, 2 Hun (N. Y.) 568, holding that where an insufficient undertaking given upon an appeal has been accepted and received as proper and lawful, and the proceedings stayed by virtue of it, the principal is estopped from questioning its validity in an action by the sureties.

C. 437, holding that as the obligation of a forthcoming bond is only that the property shall be delivered to the officer, and not that the execution shall be satisfied, a surety on such bond who pays the execution without request of the principal cannot recover the money from the latter.

Before accounting.— Before legal liability arises the surety cannot voluntarily pay moneys which may never be due from him or his principal, as where an accounting by the principal in a trust capacity may be necessary to fix liability. See Richardson v. Day, 20 S. C. 412. And as to condition precedent to action on bonds see EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, 18 Cyc. 1280; GUARDIAN AND WARD, 21 Cyc. 240. But the parties interested may occupy such relations as to estop themselves to object that the payment was made before such accounting. Richardson v. Day, 20 S. C. 412, holding that where an intestate's wards, who were also her heirs at law, asserted a liability against a surety on the guardianship bond and accepted a settlement from such surety, in an action afterward brought by the surety to subject the lands of the deceased guardian to the repayment of the amounts so paid by him, these wards and heirs at law are estopped from objecting that the surety was not liable until after an accounting by the guardian.

Payment to improper person.—A surety cannot recover from the principal for a payment made to an improper person as to a guardian of a different fund. Strickler's Estate, 11 Lanc. Bar (Pa.) 107.

Rights to security.— If the surety is not liable for the debt, he cannot acquire any rights to security, by making payment. Smith v. McGehee, 14 Ala. 404 (where principal had paid and surety had been notified not to pay); Roe v. Kiser, 62 Ark. 92, 34 S. W. 534, 54 Am. St. Rep. 288; Howe v. White, 162 Ind. 74, 69 N. E. 684.

Ignorance of facts.—A payment will not be merely voluntary if the surety was ignorant from liability,[7] and the payment was made with knowledge of the facts.[8] And while the principal must have been bound legally for the debt,[9] it is held that if the creditor can hold the surety, it will not necessarily be a defense to the principal that the latter could not be compelled by the creditor to pay the debt,[10] and where the creditors, in a composition deed, have released the principal, but stipulate for a reserve of remedies against sureties, the latter, having been compelled to pay the debt, can recover from the principal.[11] A part only of the payment by the surety may be voluntary, within the inhibition against payment where there is no legal liability in which case he can recover for the part only which was not voluntary.[12]

(D) Waiver of Objection or Defense by Surety. The surety is not compelled to take of the facts constituting a defense (Turman v. Looper, 42 Ark. 500; Gasquet v. Oakey, 19 La. 76; Thompson v. Wilson, 13 La. 138; Stinson v. Brennan, Cheves (S. Where the principal has been discharged by an alteration without his consent, such alteration being the addition of the signature of the surety, the latter cannot recover from the estate of the principal, as payment by the surety was not of any benefit to the estate. Windle v. Williams, 18 Ind. App. 158, 47 N. E. 680.

Dismissal of suit as to others than principals.— Where a transfer of goods was attacked as in fraud of creditors, and the goods were attached, and the buyer gave a replevin bond for the release of the goods, on which complainants were sureties, the fact that the attachment was dismissed as to the alleged fraudulent transferrer but continued as to others did not require a dismissal of a suit by such sureties, who afterward had been compelled to pay a liability under the replevin bond, as against their principal, since the transferee was the principal in the attachment litigation, so far as the sureties were concerned, and dismissal as to the transferrer was immaterial. advantage of every technical objection.[13] And he can waive a personal defense,[14] such as incapacity from coverture,[15] or a change in the contract between the creditor and the principal.[16] If the surety pays after the debt is barred both as to him and to his principal, he cannot recover;[17] but if the debt is not barred as to the principal, the surety can waive the statute of limitations for himself, and payment under such circumstances will not be voluntary.[18] So the rule permitting the surety to waive defenses is applied to the defense of the statute of frauds; he may pay the debt, although his promise was not in writing, and recover the amount from the principal.[19]

Canada.— Potts v. Leask, 36 U. C. Q. B. 476, holding that under the statute controlling a defendant could not issue an execution in the name of plaintiff against the other defendant for one half of the amount paid, without applying to plaintiff or tender-his principal, whenever judgment is rendered against the surety, even though such judgment remains unpaid.[48] So a summary remedy is provided sometimes,[49] by motion for judgment against the principal and in favor of the surety who has been charged,[50] upon notice to the principal,[51] and, as in other instances of summary remedies, such statutes are construed strictly, and the requirements thereof must be strictly pursued.[52]

(II) ATTACHMENT.[53] Since upon payment by the surety he becomes a creditor of the principal,[54] he is not entitled to an attachment against his principal's property before that time.[55] After payment of the debt by the surety he may have ing him any indemnity; and an execution so issued will be set aside.

The remedy given accepters, indorsers, or guarantors is held not to extend to a surety maker of a note. Harris v. Harris, 92 Ill. App. 455.

Partial payment.— So much of the judgment as remains unsatisfied may be prosecuted to execution for the benefit of a surety who has made any payment which is applied on the judgment. Murray v. Meade, 5 Wash. 693, 32 Pac. 780.

Jurisdiction.— In Elliott v. Clements, 5 Ala. 470, under a statute providing for judgment in favor of the surety when he is sued, upon notice to the principal, it is held that the motion must be made in the court where the original judgment was recovered. But in Hall v. Tompkins, 9 Humphr. (Tenn.) 592, the statute in that state was held to give the right to the surety to move in the circuit court of any county other than that in which the judgment against the surety was rendered.

Judgment against the principal's estate may be entered on such motion where the administrator is a party to the action. Whiteside v. Latham, 2 Coldw. (Tenn.) 91.

51. Brown v. Wheeler, 3 Ala. 287 (holding that notice should be given to the principal of proceedings against the surety although not provided for by the statute); Scott v. Bradford, 5 Port. (Ala.) 443 (notice to principal when the surety is sued alone).

Notice not required.— In Tennessee the statute giving a summary remedy against the principal by judgment over in favor of the surety, not having provided for notice to the principal it was held that no notice was necessary. Newman v. Campbell, Mart. & Y. (Tenn.) 63; Williams v. Greer, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 235. But such statute is held to be operative only within the state where passed, and not to empower citizens of such state to obtain judgments against non-residents without notice. McNairy v. Bell, 5 Rob. (La.) 418.

Service.— Notice may be served on the principal in another county. Herndon v. Mason, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 575.

Sufficiency.— A notice is sufficient if it is certain to a common intent (Pait v. Pait, 19 Ala. 713; Dorsey v. Beall, Hard. (Ky.) 564), is in substantial compliance with the statute (Bragg v. Cason, 4 Ind. 632), and apprises the principal of the ground of the motion (Graves v. Webb, 1 Call (Va.) 443).

The remedy of a surety on a bond, bill, or note "for the payment of money or delivery of property" is held not to extend to sureties on bonds given to secure the performance of private official trusts. State v. Darby, 11 Mo. App. 528.

Bail was held not to be security under a statute giving a summary remedy to a surety against whom judgment has been rendered, who has paid the debt of the principal. Worley v. Taylor, Ky. Dec. 344. But it was held otherwise under the statute in Tennessee. Scott v. Lanhan, 8 Yerg. (Tenn.) 420.

A surety for the stay of execution is held not to be a surety within the summary remedy statute in Tennessee. Judgment against the stayor is not a judgment on the original cause of action against the principal or on any preëxisting liability. Frost v. Rucker, 4 Humphr. (Tenn.) 57.

Record must show relation.— In Brown v. Oldham, Walk. (Miss.) 493, it was held that under the statute controlling, to entitle a surety to recover on motion, the record should show facts indicating the relation.

an attachment.[56] And under various statutes the surety is given the remedy by attachment before payment, or even before the debt is due, as a means of enforcing indemnity against loss by reason of his suretyship.[57]

(III) Statutes Not Exclusive. Statutory remedies of the surety are held to be cumulative and they do not exclude such common-law remedy as might have been available to the surety before the statute.[58]

c. Time to Sue and Limitations. As the surety cannot bring an action against his principal on the implied promise for reimbursement until payment by the former,[59] the statute of limitations begins to run from that time.[60] So if the Attachment of guardian.— A remedy by attachment of a delinquent guardian to enforce the delivery of the estate by him to his successor does not extend to justify such attachment in favor of a surety who has made good the deficiencies of a removed guardian, the claim of such surety not differing from any original debt for which no arrest can be made. Noll's Estate, 5 Pa. Dist. 716.

57. Arkansas.— Rice v. Dorrian, 57 Ark. 541, 22 S. W. 213 (holding that an indorser is not a surety under such statute); Uptmoor v. Young, 57 Ark. 528, 22 S. W. 169 (which cases are under the statute giving the surety the right to sue for indemnity before the obligation is due, and without having paid the same, whenever any grounds exist upon which an attachment may issue, and which statute was held to create no new right but to secure and make more effectual the equitable right to exoneration).

Kentucky.— Patterson v. Caldwell, 1 Metc. 489 (holding that the remedy is available only in cases provided for by statute and the mere fact that the surety is without indemnity furnishes no ground for attachment); Rice v. Downing, 12 B. Mon. 44 (holding that the surety must be confined to the grounds provided for by the statute and is not a creditor); Meyer v. Ruff, 16 S. W. 84, 13 Ky. L. Ohio.— Brannin v. Smith, 2 Disn. 436, holding that while the surety may sustain an attachment on behalf of the creditor against the principal for a debt past due on the ground of non-residence, where the debt is not due the surety, like the creditor, is restricted to the particular ground of attachment prescribed for such cases.

surety is compelled to pay the debt, the fact that the creditor could not have enforced it against the principal on account of the statute of limitations is not a defense when the surety sues for reimbursement.[61]

d. Parties — (I) PLAINTIFF. Cosureties who have not paid anything have no interest in the suit to recover back the amount paid by plaintiff.[62] The action is properly brought by the surety who makes the payment,[63] and at law sureties who have paid the debt cannot join as plaintiffs but must sue separately,[64] unless they are permitted to do so by statute,[65] or have made payment jointly.[66] So it is held that if a suit is necessary to enforce securities, cosureties are not necessary parties thereto.[67]

In summary proceedings.— Under a statute giving a surety a summary remedy by judgment over against the principal as soon as the creditor shall have obtained judgment against the surety, the foundation of the summary judgment is the judgment against the surety and not the amount paid by him, and therefore several sureties cannot each have a separate judgment for the whole amount of the judgment against them, and must join in the proceedings. tions, a separate action must be brought against each one.[69] A surety who has paid a note and received contribution from a cosurety is not a necessary party to a suit by the latter against the principal for the amount contributed,[70] and so where the surety has paid the debt, he may proceed against the principal or may subject a fund without making the creditor a party.[71] When the surety proceeds in equity [72] all interested parties who are not complainants should be made defendants,[73] and where the debt is unpaid and the surety seeks exoneration or indemnity by such suit the creditor must be a party, for the ultimate relief is not to have the amount paid to the surety but to the creditor.[74]

e. Pleading.[75] The surety cannot obtain specific relief except such as is consistent with the allegations and prayer in his complaint;[76] but a declaration or complaint which alleges the original liability of plaintiff and defendant to the creditor that plaintiff was surety for defendant, payment by the surety, and that defendant has not made payment,[77] although requested,[78] and asking for judgment is sufficient, and is founded on the implied contract of indemnity, notwithstanding the original claim was based on a note which is shown to have been satisfied,[79]

f. Defenses [81]— (I) In General. When sued by a surety, defendant may show that he is a cosurety with plaintiff, and not a principal,[82] although plaintiff actually supposed that defendant was a principal,[83] and in a suit for reimbursement by the assignee of a surety who had paid the debt, the principal may rely upon any defense he may have had against the surety.[84]

(II) Incapacity of Principal. If the original contract secured may be avoided upon the ground of incapacity of the principal, he may defeat an action by the surety founded on an implied contract for reimbursement.[85]

(III) Non-Execution of Contract by Principal. A surety cannot recover from the principal if the latter did not execute the contract, as where the name of the latter was signed without authority; [86] unless the principal is liable without having executed the contract.[87]

forth a copy of the judgment, the action being upon the implied contract (Scherer v. Schutz, 83 Ind. 543; Harker v. Glidewell, 23 Ind. 219), nor to allege that the court rendering it was within the state, and had jurisdiction (Hopewell v. Kerr, 9 Ind. App. 11, 36 N. E. 48). In Kimmel v. Lowe, 28 Minn. 265, 9 N. W. 764, it was held that a complaint alleging that plaintiff, defendant, and another executed a note, the entire consideration of which was received by defendant, and that the others were sureties; that, default having been made in the payment of the note, the holder thereof recovered a judgment thereon against defendant and such sureties in a court in Maryland having jurisdiction; that plaintiff has paid the judgment, and has taken and filed in the office of the clerk of said court an assignment thereof in writing; that a statute of Maryland provides that "when any person shall recover a judgment against the principal debtor and surety, and the judgment shall be satisfied by the surety, the creditor shall assign the same to the surety; and such assignment being recorded in the court where the judgment was rendered, the assignee shall be entitled to execution in his own name against the principal," states a good cause of action whether the action be regarded as founded on the judgment or on the implied liability for money paid.

In summary proceedings by the surety the principal may avail himself of any equitable circumstances to show that he was not bound to pay the entire demand. Tennell v. Dozier, Hard. (Ky.) 47, holding that the proper action at law was assumpsit; that under the plea of non assumpsit defendant might avail himself of any equitable circumstances to show that in equity and good conscience he was not bound to pay the demand, and that such proceedings should be permitted under the act as would place the parties as near as possible in the same situation as they would stand in a trial at common law.

85. Ayers v. Burns, 87 Ind. 245, 44 Am. Rep. 759, where it was held that the surety of an infant on a promissory note could not recover for reimbursement against the infant; that if payment by the surety raised an implied contract, it was not binding on the infant, and indicating further that infants may be bound only on implied contracts for necessaries, and not on express contracts, as by bond or note, even if they are given for necessaries.

Where an infant is bound for the original debt his surety may recover for reimbursement. Conn v. Coburn, 7 N. H. 368, 26 Am. Dec. 746, where plaintiff was surety on an infant's note given for the purchase of necessaries. So in Fagin v. Goggin, 12 R. I. 398, it was held that an infant was bound on a recognizance and was liable to reimburse his surety to the amount of the judgment recovered by the state upon the recognizance and paid by the surety, because the law required the infant to enter into the recognizance with surety.

(IV) ILLEGALITY. Where a surety pays, knowing of facts which render the transaction illegal, such payment is a voluntary one, and no recovery can be had from the principal.[88] So sureties cannot recover from their principal if their agreement is illegal, although the contract between the principal and the creditor is perfectly legal and valid,[89] or upon an implied contract against public policy.[90] But the fact that the transaction which necessitated the giving of the contract of suretyship was illegal will not make the contract itself illegal.[91] A surety on a usurious contract, which is not enforceable against the principal, voluntarily paying the same with knowledge that it was usurious, cannot compel the principal to reimburse him or enforce security given to indemnify him; [92] but on the other Reimbursement of bail — In general.— There is some conflict of authority as to the right of bail in a criminal case to recover reimbursement. The better opinion is against the right to recover the amount forfeited by reason of the non-appearance of the accused upon the ground that such a recovery would be contrary to public policy. U. S. v. Ryder, 110 U. S. 729, 4 S. Ct. 196, 28 L. ed. 308, holding that the act of congress declaring that sureties on bonds given to the United States shall have the same right of priority which the United States have by law does not embrace recognizances in criminal cases. It appears also in this case as well as others that there may be an express contract to indemnify bail in a criminal case. Cripps v. Hartnoll, 4 B. & S. 414, 10 Jur. N. S. 200, 32 L. J. Q. But the last case was at nisi prius, and was a case of bail in a civil proceeding and consequently not authority in the case of criminal bail, as shown in Cripps v. Hartnoll, supra. See also Stevens v. Hay, 61 Ill. 399, where, however, the bail was in fact enforcing a mortgage security.

91. Green v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Co., 103 Iowa 252, 72 N. W. 655, holding that the fact that the sale of beer at retail by an agent to whom it was sent for sale violated the law, and caused the seizure that necessitated the giving of a replevin bond by his employer, on which he became surety, does not avoid the implied contract of the principal to repay the surety.

Bond in groundless and malicious suit.— It is not a defense to the principal in a replevin bond that the surety knew, when he signed the bond, that the replevin suit was groundless and malicious; the surety's suit is not brought upon any illegal contract. Smith v. Rines, 32 Me. 177.

On replevin bond for property fraudulently conveyed.— In an action by a surety on a replevin bond given in an attachment suit to save property conveyed in fraud of creditors, where it appeared that the surety had full knowledge of the fraud when he became such, such fact did not preclude him from maintaining a creditor's suit to subject property held by the principal's wife in fraud of creditors to the payment of the amount complainant was compelled to pay by reason of his liability on the bond, on the ground that complainant did not come into equity with clean hands. hand, it is held that where usury does not render the contract void, and the principal may waive it as a defense if he desires to do so, a surety can recover from the principal, unless the latter notifies him not to pay.[93]

(v) Payment, Satisfaction, and Release. The principal can show in his defense that he already has reimbursed his surety,[94] or facts which show a good defense by way of accord and satisfaction or as an executed compromise,[95] and release [96] and a supplemental surety cannot recover from a surety if the former made payment with money of the principal.[97] But when one cosurety has paid the creditor, the principal cannot escape liability to him by showing payment to another cosurety.[98]

g. Evidence and Burden of Proof — (i) In General. The burden is upon the surety to show the relation, in an action in which his right to a particular recovery depends upon his relation as surety to another as principal,[99] and if the surety has paid voluntarily he must show that the debt was in fact recoverable.[1]

Payment of money borrowed by surety.— If the surety borrows money to pay the secured debt, and the principal pays the surety's creditor and discharges the surety from liability for the amount so borrowed, the surety has no claim against the principal. Morrison v. Cassell, 25 Ill. 368.

Worthless notes.— In Taylor v. Cox, 32 W. Va. 148, 9 S. E. 70, it was held that if the principal has transferred notes to his surety in payment, and the notes prove worthless, such payment is not a bar to an action by the surety.

To show the relation, he should prove the original agreement by proof of the bond or other contract, and if the fact do not appear on the face of the instrument he should show it by other means.[2] Evidence is always admissible to show the equitable rights of the principal and surety toward each other,[3] and which is material to the right to recover the amount alleged to have been paid by plaintiff as surety,[4] and, as between the immediate parties, to show their true relation in fact, although different from that indicated by the instrument or their relative positions thereon.[5] Slight proof of payment may be sufficient to support a recovery in favor of the surety against his principal.[6] The note upon which the payment was made is admissible in evidence,[7] and the possession of the note by the surety is prima facie evidence of payment by him.[8] If it does not appear when the surety made payment, it will be presumed that it was at maturity of the debt,[9] and before suit was brought by the surety.[10]

Immaterial variance — In general.— Where sureties, having been compelled to pay a judgment against them, alleged in a bill to recover from their principals that they were sureties on replevin bonds given in attachment, and sought to recover the amount paid by them as such, the fact that the executions introduced in evidence showed that complainants' debt arose from a liability on an appeal-bond did not necessitate a dismissal of the bill for variance between the allegations and the proof, where parol evidence, unobjected to, also was introduced to the effect that they were sureties on the replevin bond, as alleged, and that the judgment paid was taken against them as such. Insufficient evidence of agreement for delay. — The evidence was held sufficient to support a judgment for the surety where the principal testified that the surety had agreed to give him indulgence in the payment of the amount due, but the surety denied this, and it was shown that he had made repeated efforts to collect his claim, and that the principal did not make any attempt to set up the alleged agreement. surety is not binding on the principal who was not a party to the suit,[12] although it is otherwise where the principal has notice of the suit,[13] unless there was collusion between the creditor and the surety, or negligence by the latter.[14] On the other hand, where the judgment has been rendered against the principal as well as the surety, the former is concluded [15] as to all matters actually determined against or waived by him.[16] But the mere fact that the judgment is against the surety alone in an action against him and the principal has been held not to preclude the surety, afterward in an action against the principal, from showing that the debt was that of the principal.[17]

h. Judgment [18] — (i) In General. In a summary proceeding for judgment against the principal [19] the judgment must show the necessary jurisdictional facts; [20]

Suretyship and claim — In general.— It has been held that such a judgment is prima facie evidence of the amount of the surety's claim and the measure of recovery to which he is entitled as against the principal. Lyon v. Northrup, 17 Iowa 314, Murphy v. Jones, 4 Pa. Cas. 52, 6 Atl. 726. On the other hand it is held that a judgment against the surety is evidence only of the identity of the claim but not of the amount thereof or of the original contract of suretyship. Austin v. Dorwin, 21 Vt. 38. And so the record of a judgment in an action on a bond is held to be admissible to prove that plaintiff had been sued and had paid the money on the execution, but the question of his suretyship is not determined in such an action and therefore the record therein does not prove it. 14. Hare v. Grant, 77 N. C. 203, where it is said that the rule that the principal is bound if the surety notifies him of the suit so as to enable him to defend would not apply where there was fraud or collusion between the surety and creditor, and probably would not apply where there had been negligence on the part of the surety in using the defenses within his power, or which were furnished him by the principal.

Judgment by confession or default.— Although a surety is prohibited by a statutory provision from suffering judgment to go against him by confession or default when the principal debtor is willing to defend, yet, if he does suffer such judgment to be rendered, he can maintain an action to recover the money from the principal; but in such case he occupies the position of the creditor suing on the original debt, and must establish its validity and repel all defenses against it. if there are several principals the judgment against them should be joint,[21] and if there are several sureties the judgment for them, before payment, must be joint.[22] In a suit by the surety for indemnity before payment, under the statute giving such remedy,[23] the judgment against the principal should be for a particular sum to be realized on execution, and not merely that the principal indemnify the surety.[24]

(II) EXTENT OF RECOVERY[25]— (A) In General. Prima facie the amount due from the principal to the surety is the face value of the claim of the creditor;[26] but the surety is not allowed to speculate on his principal, and cannot collect any more than the amount actually paid by him,[27] although he may have taken an assignment of the claim.[28] The same rule governs between a supplemental surety and a surety.[29] The surety cannot recover for remote and indirect losses suffered by him which could have been avoided by payment of the debt.[30]

(B) As Affected by Medium of Payment. A surety who makes a payment in property, as in land,[31] or with a mortgage, may recover to the extent of the value thereof.[32] So where the surety pays in depreciated paper,[33] he cannot recover more than the value thereof. But the promise implied upon payment by a surety is a promise to pay the debt not the value of the property;[34] therefore if the property is of greater value than the amount of the debt the surety cannot recover the excess from the principal,[35] and if the debt is satisfied by execution sale of the surety's property his recovery is measured by the judgment satisfied and not merely by the value of the property.[36] The value of the property is its market value[37] at the time[38] of payment; but if the principal and surety agree upon the value of such property, other creditors of the principal do not have any right to object.[39]

(C) Interest. The surety is entitled to recover against the principal reimbursement for interest paid by the former to the creditor;[40] and is entitled to recover interest also on the amount which he has been required to pay to the creditor,[41] of his property on execution for less than its value.

A contract of general indemnity against loss arising from the suretyship should be construed to embrace all losses arising directly or by immediate consequence from the failure of the principal to pay the secured debt, but not remote or unexpected consequences, such as the effect of the suretyship on the surety's mercantile credit, his personal inconvenience, or his loss of office owing to the embarrassment of his mind. Worth of property to parties.— The rule of the text must yield to particular circumstances, however. Thus in Southall v. Farish, 85 Va. 403, 7 S. E. 534, 1 L. R. A. 641, a surety on a note held by a bank which had become insolvent, against whom, together with the principal on the note, judgment had been obtained, had funds deposited with the creditor bank, and upon the insolvency of the bank a stranger had agreed with such surety to take his deposits at their face value, but the bank refused to transfer the fund except upon payment of a security debt. The principal agreed with the surety that if he would satisfy the debt out of his deposits he, the principal, would make reimbursement at the face value of the deposits. The secured debt was paid by charging the judgment against the deposits. It was held that the worth of the deposits to the parties at the time the judgment was so discharged determined the amount which the surety paid and which he was entitled to recover back, although the assets of the insolvent bank ultimately realized only sixty cents on the dollar.

or if the litigation was advantageous to the latter, as by procuring the remission of a forfeiture of a bail-bond.[52] If the surety was liable on a note with an attorney's fee clause, and is compelled to pay such fee, it being reasonable, he can recover it from the principal.[53]

C. As to Cosureties — 1. Contribution [54]— a. Nature and Origin of Right. The right of contribution among cosureties is not founded on contract, but results from the application of the general principle of equity which equalizes burdens which two or more may be called upon to bear.[55] This equitable obligation springs up at the time the relation is entered into, and the surety is an existing creditor of a cosurety from the date of the execution of his contract, although the right is not consummated until payment of the debt.[56] The doctrine originated in equity, although the common law at a later period adopted the equitable principle.[57] The right to contribution is not affected by the fact that the surety has received security on account of his liability.[58]

An indemnified surety assuming the debt cannot have contribution. Silvey v. Dowell, 53 Ill. 260. But the transaction was held not to be an assumption of the debt, but a mere taking of security accruing to the benefit of all the sureties, where a surety took from his principal, after default, a transfer of property, absolute in form, giving in return an agreement to sell same and pay the principal the balance over such sum as the surety might be obliged to pay, and a sale could not be made, and the surety retained the land, which was worth little more than the amount of his liability, which he paid subsequently. (III) Surety Who Signs At Request of Cosurety. In some jurisdictions it is held that if a surety requests another person to become a surety with him, he is not entitled to contribution from the latter;[67] but in other jurisdictions the right to contribution is held to exist in the absence of a contract of indemnity.[68]

where the administration has been closed or the personal assets exhausted, the heirs of a deceased cosurety may be held liable to the extent of realty they have received.[72] If a surety becomes executor for his cosurety, he can retain, out of the estate, the amount due.[73]

c. Payment — (I) As Condition to Consummation of Right.[74] A surety, as a general rule, is not entitled to contribution from a cosurety until he has paid more than his proportionate share of the debt.[75] But if the surety pays less than the whole debt, or less than his proportionate share, he will be entitled to contribution if such payment discharges the whole debt as to himself and his cosureties.[76]

Whether the cosurety died before or after the default contribution can be had from his estate. Wyckoff v. Gardner, (N. J. Ch. 1886) 5 Atl. 801. But see Waters v. Riley, 2 Harr. & G. (Md.) 305, 18 Am. Dec. 302, holding that where one of two sureties on a joint bond is compelled, by reason of the insolvency of the principal, to pay the debt after the death of a cosurety, he does not have any remedy in equity against the representatives of the deceased.

Statutory provisions exist in some states to the same general effect as the rule stated in the text. See Beach v. Bell, 139 Ind. 167, 38 N. E. 819 (holding that under the prevailing statutes the lien created in favor of cosureties by their payment of a judgment rendered against them and deceased, where the sums paid by them are entered as credits upon the docket, continues against the realty of deceased until discharged by decree or payment); Reeves v. Pulliam, 7 Baxt. 77. Edmonds v. Sheahan, 47 Tex. 443, holding that payment in Confederate money was sufficient if it discharged the debt.

Payment in the form of a purchase of the debt is sufficient. Fanning v. Murphy, 126 Wis. 538, 105 N. W. 1056, 110 Am. St. Rep. 938, 4 L. R. A. N. S. 666.

A payment otherwise sufficient is not vitiated because a surety, through a bequest, where a surety individually has assumed the debt,[78] or where he has given security for its payment.[79]

(B) Payment With Real Property. Payment may be made in land,[80] or by a mortgage thereon.[81]

(C) Payment With Commercial Paper. Payment is sufficient to give a right to contribution, if made by commercial paper, received by the creditor as payment,[82] even though such commercial paper has not been paid by the surety giving it.[83] But a new note signed by the principal and one of the sureties merely changing the form of the original contract is not payment by the signing surety.[84] If, however, such new note is given as collateral security only, the right of contribution on ultimate payment of the original note is not affected.[85]

(III) Payment Not Within Scope of Sureties' Undertaking. The mere fact that one cosurety has made payment to the creditor is not of itself sufficient to give him the right of contribution, if such payment was outside the contract on which the sureties were liable.[86] Thus, where a surety makes a pay-afterward comes into possession of property which was sold under an execution against him to satisfy the debt (Caldwell v. Roberts, 1 Dana (Ky.) 355); nor because the creditor, through fraud of the surety, may have accepted in settlement a less sum than was due (Shepard v. Pebbles, 38 Wis. 373).

Facts held insufficient to constitute payment.— A surety on an official bond cannot claim to have made payment thereon because the principal, through default of duty, is liable to him in damages (Mitchell v. Turner, 37 Ala. 660; Rutland v. Paige, 24 Vt. 181); nor can a surety claim contribution where the payment made by him was on a bond given for the price of property which he acquired by the formation of a mere paper corporation in which he held the great majority of stock for which he did not pay anything (Moore v. Drew, 51 La. Ann. 740, 25 So. 402).

78. See cases cited infra, this note.

A surety replevying the debt by a valid replevy bond extinguishes the judgment thereby, and may proceed against his cosureties as if he had made payment in money. Lucas v. Chamberlain, 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 276; Burns v. Parish, 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 8.

Surety of guardian succeeding him.— A surety of a guardian having been appointed successor on the death of the latter, and having charged himself with the balance due from his predecessor, is entitled to contribution. Flickinger v. Hull, 5 Gill (Md.) 60.

79. Lytle v. Pope, 11 B. Mon. (Ky.) 297.

80. Frost v. Tracy, 52 Mo. App. 308, holding that where executions being levied on the land of a surety, he conveyed it to his cosurety in consideration of the latter satisfying the executions, which was done, the land having paid the judgments, the grantor was entitled to contribution from the grantee, as the deed and agreement were not a final settlement, or a new contract superseding their prior relations.

It is immaterial that the mortgage is not paid until after suit for contribution has been brought (Patterson v. Patterson, 23 Pa. St. 464), or that it is not paid at all (Robertson v. Maxcey, 6 Dana (Ky.) 101).

82. Meeske v. Pfenning, 120 Mich. 474, 79 N. W. 795, holding that payment of a judgment on a bond by the check of a company not a party to the suit, of which a surety on the bond was a member, the check being charged to such surety on the books of the company, was payment by the surety, entitling him to contribution from his cosurety.

Payment may be made by negotiable note. — Pinkston v. Taliaferro, 9 Ala. 547; Anthony v. Percifull, 8 Ark. 494; Sloan v. Gibbes, 56 S. C. 480, 35 S. E. 408, 78 Am. St. Rep. 559 (holding also that a note which includes other indebtedness than that on which the maker is liable as surety is payment of the debt for which the maker was liable as surety); Prescott v. Newell, 39 Vt. 82. But see Brisendine v. Martin, 23 N. C. 286, holding that where a surety brings an action of assumpsit, for money paid for the use and at the request of defendant, against his cosurety, to obtain contribution, it is not sufficient for him to show that he has given his note for the debt due by the principal, and that the same has been accepted by the creditor as a payment and discharge of the debt, and that to entitle him to recover in this action, there must be an actual payment in money, or in money's worth, such as bank-notes, the note of a third person, or a horse or the like, which is valuable in itself to the surety who parts with it.

Payment may be made by bond.— Robertson v. Maxcey, 6 Dana (Ky.) 101.

85. Adams v. De Frehn, 27 Pa. Super. Ct. 184.

86. Halsey v. Murray, 112 Ala. 185, 20 So. 575 (holding that where an injunction was granted against levy on individual property of members of a firm under a judgment

ment to prevent the very default on the occurrence of which the sureties were to be liable, it has been held that a right of contribution does not exist, as the default for which the sureties had undertaken never occurred.[87]

(IV) VOLUNTARY PAYMENT — (A) In General. A surety who voluntarily pays the debt when he is not under legal liability to do so is not generally entitled to contribution; [88] but where a legal liability exists payment may be made as soon as the principal is in default,[89] and payment is not voluntary because a surety against the firm, and the injunction bond provided for payment of the judgment "herein enjoined," a surety on such bond who, after dissolution of the injunction, paid the amount of the judgment cannot enforce contribution, as the injunction was not directed against the judgment, and the bond did not create any liability for its payment); Novak v. Dupont, 112 Iowa 334, 83 N. W. 1062 (holding that if one cosurety on a bond conditioned that the principal would "pay or cause to be paid" all notes executed to a bank, becomes surety on a note by the principal to such bank, which such surety pays, he is not entitled to contribution from his cosurety on the bond, as the principal had caused such note to be paid); Henkle v. Allstadt, 4 Gratt. 87. Ladd v. Portland Chamber of Commerce, 37 Oreg. 49, 60 Pac. 713, 61 Pac. 1127, 62 Pac. 208, holding that where a part of the sureties borrow money on their personal credit to prevent the default of the principal they cannot compel a surety who has taken no part in such transaction to contribute thereto as a surety has no right to obligate his cosurety to prevent a default of the principal. But see Bottoms v. Leonards, 53 S. W. 273, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 862, holding that where sureties guaranteed that a turnpike-road company should complete its road "free from debt" by a certain time, and some of them advanced money to enable the company to complete the road free from debt within the required time, the others, under the statute regulating contribution between cosureties, may be required to contribute.

California.— Curtis v. Parks, 55 Cal. 106, holding that if, after a default by their principal, the sureties expressly agree among themselves to make payment in certain definite proportions, one of them paying the whole amount cannot recover anything, as, under their agreement, the payment in excess of his share was voluntary as to them.

See 40 Cent. Dig. tit. "Principal and Surety," § 615.

When payment is voluntary in part the surety cannot have contribution as to the part that was voluntary. Briggs v. Hinton, 14 Lea (Tenn.) 233, holding that where the amount against the principal was swelled owing to an appeal by him alone, a surety paying the excess over the amount of the original judgment could not have contribution as to such excess.

89. Dussol v. Bruguiere, 50 Cal. 456 (holding that, although an executor of a surety makes payment without having the claim allowed in the probate court, he is entitled to contribution); Hoyt v. Tuthill, 33 Hun (N. Y.) 196 (holding that payment may be made, although the cosureties have not requested it); Fanning v. Murphy, 126 Wis. 538, 105 N. W. 1056, 110 Am. St. Rep. 946, 4 L. R. A. N. S. 666; Pitt v. Pursord, 5 Jur. 611, 10 L. J. Exch. 475, 8 M. & W. 538 (holding also that the rule stated in the text applies, although no demand has been made by the creditor).

If a surety is compelled to pay a note, it is not competent for his cosurety to show that the note, as between the principal and the payee, was without consideration. Cave v. Burns, 6 Ala. 780.

Superseding judgment.— A surety against whom a judgment is rendered does not lose his right to have contribution by suing out a writ of error and superseding the judgment. John v. Jones, 16 Ala. 454.

In Louisiana.— Civ. Code, art. 3058 (3027), providing that, "when several persons have been sureties for the same debtor and for the same debt, the surety who has satisfied the debt, has his remedy against the other sureties in proportion to the share of each; but this remedy takes place only, when such person has paid in consequence of a lawsuit instituted against him," is held to be mandatory; and to entitle a surety to contribution, payment of the debt must have been enforced by suit at law against him. Stockmeyer v. Oertling, 35 La. Ann. 467; Monson's Succession, McGloin (La.) 368. But see Bond v. Bishop, 18 La. Ann. 549; Ferriday v. Purnell, 2 La. Ann. 334.

does not interpose, against the creditor, a technical or unmeritorious defense,[90] nor when he pays in ignorance of a good defense,[91] or waives a defense personal to himself.[92]

(B) Payment After Debt Barred by Statute of Limitations. Payment by one of the cosureties after the claim against them has been barred by the statute of limitations is voluntary and does not entitle him to contribution from the other cosureties.[93] But it is no defense to a cosurety, from whom contribution is sought that the creditor could not have enforced payment from him because the statute had run, if the cosurety making payment could not have set up that defense against the creditor.[94]

(V) PAYMENT BY PRINCIPAL OR WITH PRINCIPAL'S FUNDS. A surety has no right to contribution unless he has made payment with his own money. If payment has been made by the principal,[95] or by the surety with money or property

90. Harts v. Latham, 84 Ill. App. 483. In Deakyne v. Buchanan, 3 Houst. (Del.) 124, it was held that a surety in an executor's bond could compel his cosurety to contribute where a judgment had been obtained by default against him severally by a judgment creditor of the testator, although such creditor had not been required to prove a sufficiency of assets, and that the debt should have been paid by the executor.

implied by law.[3] A conditional agreement regulating the right of contribution cannot be enforced if the condition has not been complied with,[4] but a condition imposed on the principal by the surety, the non-performance of which would not be a defense as to the creditor, will not affect the liability of such surety to contribute.[5]

(II) RELEASE OR DISCHARGE — (A) Of Surety.[6] Release by a surety of his cosurety terminates the liability of the latter for contribution,[7] and is equivalent to payment by such cosurety, so far as other cosureties are concerned, and the latter cannot be held liable for any portion of the share of such released cosurety;[8] but a discharge of one cosurety by the creditor will not affect the right of the others to contribution from the surety released,[9] unless they have consented to the release,[10] or have paid with knowledge of the facts.[11]

(B) Of Principal. A release of the principal by a surety will prevent such surety from obtaining contribution from his cosureties,[12] and likewise a dis-

letter signed by the others agreeing to hold him harmless in respect to his indorsement such director became secondarily liable as among themselves.

Discharge by statute.— It is held that a surety, having obtained his discharge by giving the statutory notice to the creditor, is not liable for contribution. Letcher v. Yantis, 3 Dana (Ky.) 160, holding, however, that if the contract of suretyship was made prior to the enactment of the statute providing for the release of a surety by giving notice to sue, the right of a cosurety to contribution is not affected by such release. But see Reiter v. Cumback, 1 Ind. App. 41, 27 N. Dec. 98, holding that this result is not affected by the fact that the release was executed upon a nominal consideration, nor by the fact that the surety did not have in mind the operation of the release as to his cosureties.

Where the will of a surety extinguishes the debt of the principal, contribution cannot be had. Hobart v. Stone, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 215.

Facts held not to constitute a release.— Where a surety filed his claim against the estate of a deceased principal, and contracted with an heir of the principal whereby the claim was withdrawn without participation charge of the principal by the creditor or obligee releases all the sureties from liability for contribution.[13]

(c) Extension of Time to Principal or to Surety.[14] An extension of time to the principal by a surety,[15] or by the creditor with the consent of a surety,[16] takes away the right of such surety to enforce contribution. But an extension of time by the creditor to a surety will not affect the latter's right to contribution from a cosurety.[17]

(d) Effect of Causing or Participating in Default of Principal. A surety cannot have contribution if the default resulted from his wrongful act,[18] or if he participated in the wrongful act of a principal,[19] unless all of the sureties were equally at fault or acquiesced.[20]

e. Measure of Contribution — (i) In General. Where one of two or more cosureties has paid the debt for which they were all bound his cosureties are liable to him for their proportionate shares.[21] If partners have become sureties in the in dividends, receiving certain property in full satisfaction, the transaction was only a payment by the estate to reduce the liability, and not a release of the principal so as to release cosureties from liability. Bull v. Rich, 92 Minn. 475, 100 N. W. 212, 101 N. W. 489. A surety who pays less than the amount of a judgment under a compromise with the creditor, by which it is agreed that the principal only is to remain bound to the creditor for the balance, and to the sureties for the amount so paid, can compel contribution from his cosureties, although he stipulated not to use the judgment against the principal, since the principal may afterward be made to respond to the sureties in an action at law for money paid. Cummings v. May, 91 Ala. 233, 8 So. 790.

Where the release results from mistake in the execution of an instrument the right to contribution is not affected. Vorley v. Barrett, 1 C. B. N. S. 225, 26 L. J. C. P. 1, 5 Wkly. Rep. 137, 87 E. C. L. 225. But a mistake of law as to the effect on contribution of a release given to the principal will not prevent such release discharging the cosureties. 13. Hamilton v. Glasscock, (Tex. 1888) 9 S. W. 207. If after the recovery of a judgment against the principal and his two sureties, the creditor releases the principal and one surety, but does not enter the release on the record of the judgment, and subsequently issues execution against the other surety which is paid, the latter should recover his property. Rep. 230, holding that if the sureties, in their original contract with the obligee, have agreed to be treated as principals and not to be released by reason of time being given to the principal, and one surety, on making payment, takes an assignment of the bond from the obligee, such paying surety stands in the place of the obligee, and an agreement between the surety and the principal not to enforce the liability of the latter for a certain time will not defeat the right to contribution.

(II) Effect of Cosureties' Insolvency or Absence From Jurisdiction. It is generally held that if contribution be sought at law, each surety is liable for no more than his exact aliquot proportion, ascertained by dividing the amount for which all the sureties were liable, by their entire number, without respect to the solvency of any of them.[24] In equity, if some of the sureties are insolvent,[25] or out of the jurisdiction, the amount for which cosureties are liable in contribution is apportioned among the solvent sureties within the jurisdiction.[26]

The equitable doctrine is sometimes followed at law.[27] But the death or insolvency of some of the cosureties does not affect the liability of the others on an express agreement made by all.[28]

(III) Effect of Relinquishment or Loss of Security. If before the liability of his cosureties is terminated a surety voluntarily relinquish,[29] or lose security held by him, a cosurety can resist contribution to the extent of the value of the security so lost or relinquished,[30] and a surety who induces cosureties to

Dec. 177 (holding that there is no logical foundation for the distinction between the legal and equitable doctrine).

Adoption by statute.— The equitable doctrine is sometimes adopted by statute. Couch v. Terry, 12 Ala. 225; Bottoms v. Leonard, 53 S. W. 273, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 862.

In Missouri the statute providing that sureties are liable to each other for their "due proportion" of the amount paid in settlement of the debt is construed in the light of the equitable doctrine to apportion the debt among the solvent sureties only, both at law and in equity. Dodd v. Winn, 27 Mo. 501.

The relinquishment must amount to a fraud on the cosurety in order to take away the right to contribution. Paulin v. Kaighn, 27 N. J. L. 503. In Brandon v. Medley, 54 N. C. 313, it was held that where cosureties on an administration bond compromise a suit against them, under the advice of counsel and from an honest belief that both were liable to the larger sum, on account of the devastavit and insolvency of their principal and it was afterward discovered that one of them who had administered on the estate of the principal had erroneously given up assets of the principal to another, acting under legal advice and by a misapprehension of law, but in good faith, which assets, if they had been held, would have saved both sureties from loss by reason of their suretyship, the whole burden could not be thrown on the surety who had thus given up the assets, it not appearing that he had concealed the facts from his cosurety and there being no allegation of fraud or imposition.

Whether the relinquishment is before or after payment of the debt is immaterial. Paulin v. Kaighn, 29 N. J. L. 480.

If the surety was compelled to surrender the security to third persons, provided he shows that the claim of such third persons was a superior one, he does not lose his right to contribution. Cornett v. Holcomb, 62 S. W. 477, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 34.

An exchange of security, in good faith, which does not occasion any loss, will not affect the right to contribution, although such change is made without the knowledge of the cosurety. Carpenter v. Kelly, 9 Ohio 106.

surrender collateral security held by them for their protection, will be estopped from enforcing a claim for contribution to the extent of the collateral surrendered.[31] But a surety is not obliged to accept security; and his refusal to do so will not defeat his right to contribution.[32]

(iv) Cosureties Bound For Different Amounts. Cosureties who have executed separate instruments for different amounts are liable for contribution in proportion to the amounts named in the respective instruments;[33] and where sureties on the same instrument are liable for different amounts, each must contribute the proportion that the amount for which he is liable bears to the aggregate sum.[34]

(v) When Full Amount Paid Is Recoverable. In some cases a surety

Moorhouse v. Kidd, 25 Ont. App. 221, it is held that where a surety had security equally available to his cosureties and which they could have enforced, he is not deprived of his right to contribution by reason of the fact that he did not enforce it and depreciation resulted.

can recover the entire amount paid by him from another surety, as where the latter by his wrongful act caused the default of the principal;[35] or where the amount sought to be recovered is interest charged to the principal on money borrowed by the surety from whom contribution is sought.[36] If one of two or more sureties has agreed to be primarily liable as between himself and the others, the entire amount can be collected from him.[37]

(VI) Basis of Apportionment — (A) In General. Contribution is based upon the exact amount paid to satisfy the liability of the sureties, whether the payment is in full or by way of compromise of the whole debt.[38] But a surety cannot recover contribution for an amount paid by him in excess of the original debt.[39] Any payments procured from the principal must be deducted from the original amount, the remainder being the liability of the sureties, and their proportions are based thereon.[40] Nor can a surety recover any more by having his payment take the form of an assignment of the claim of the creditor; he is still entitled to contribution only on the basis of the actual settlement.[41]

(B) Payments and Proceeds of Security From Principal. In ascertaining the amount which forms the basis of contribution, there must be deducted from the entire amount any payments made by the principal to the surety seeking contribution,[42] and any funds or proceeds of security held by the latter belonging to the reduction of the demand of the creditor;[54] and contribution for attorney's fees paid in resisting the claim of the creditors is allowed under the same conditions.[55] A surety, who having paid his proportionate share of the debt to the creditor is sued for and compelled to pay the balance of the debt can recover from his cosurety the necessary costs of the creditor's action against him,[56] and mere willingness, unaccompanied by an offer to pay his share of the original debt before action brought for the recovery thereof, will not relieve a surety from liability to contribution for costs,[57] nor will payment of his share after suit begun;[58] and it will not avail a surety to show that he was not served with process in the original action by the creditor.[59] A surety can recover costs incurred in the suit against his cosurety who has failed to make contribution after demand.[60]

an individual claim against the principal, and being given security which he is not instructed to hold for the benefit of his cosureties, is not under any duty to share it with them if it is not sufficient to indemnify him as to the individual debt.[72] Where the surety holds security to indemnify him as surety on several debts, on some or all of which there are cosureties, and such security is insufficient to satisfy all of the debts, it should be applied on all of them in the proportion that each bears to the aggregate sum.[73]

(3) Security Given For Benefit of One Surety. A surety may at the time of entering into the relation stipulate for security for his exclusive benefit and security thus obtained inures to the benefit of his cosureties only to the extent of the surplus after his exoneration.[74] But security given to a surety after entering into the relation inures equally to the benefit of all, even though intended for the sole benefit of the one to whom it was given,[75] unless the other sureties consent to the arrangement, in which case they waive their right of participation.[76]

(4) Rights as to Third Persons. The right of a surety to security given to a cosurety is superior to the rights of subsequent judgment creditors of the principal [77] or the cosurety.[78] As against the creditors of the principal, a surety is entitled to security held by a supplemental surety.[79] Security given to a surety can be followed by his cosureties into the hands of third persons, if it can be done without injury to the latter,[80] or if they have acquired their interests with notice.[81]

(B) After Mutual Rights of Cosureties Are Adjusted. After the creditor has been paid, and the cosureties have adjusted their rights and liabilities as to each other, the equities between them cease, each becoming an independent creditor of the principal for the amount paid by such surety, so that any security[82] or funds[83] thereafter received by one of them from the principal does not inure to the benefit of the others.

(II) FROM THIRD PERSONS. The rule that any security given to one cosurety inures to the benefit of all has been held to apply only to security given by the principal, and does not apply to security given by a third person.[84]

g. Actions and Proceedings — (I) REMEDY AT LAW OR IN EQUITY. Although the doctrine of contribution originated in equity, the common law, at a later period, adopted the equitable principle by implying a promise from each cosurety to reimburse each of the others for any payment in excess of his proportion of the debt.[85] Courts of equity, however, retain jurisdiction in such cases,[86] so that frequently there is a remedy either at law or in equity.[87] But where the machinery of the law is manifestly insufficient, the only adequate remedy may be in equity,[88] and in many cases it is held that in order to proceed against his cosurety the laws in force at the time they are brought, although enacted after the contract was entered into.[95]

(B) Proceeding on Original Debt or Judgment. A surety can enforce contribution from his cosureties by proceeding on the original contract, where, by subrogation,[96] he acquires the rights of the original creditor,[97] or where he can acquire the rights of the creditor by assignment.[98] But in some jurisdictions after a judgment against cosureties is paid by one of them, it is held to be satisfied so that contribution cannot be enforced by means thereof.[99] In some states there are statutory provisions allowing contribution to be enforced by means of the judgment.[1]

(C) Summary Remedies. In many states statutes prescribe a summary remedy for the enforcement of contribution by sureties against their cosureties.[2] These statutes must be strictly construed to embrace cases only therein provided for,[3] and

(IV) DEFENSES — (A) In General. The cosurety, when sued for contribution, can generally set up any legal or equitable defense.[11] Thus he may defend on the ground that he did not execute the contract of suretyship,[12] that it was defectively executed,[13] that there was no consideration,[14] or that it was executed as part of an unlawful transaction.[15] Subsequent insanity of the surety from whose estate contribution is sought is not a defense.[16]

(B) Judgment in Favor of Defendant Cosurety. Where, in an action by the creditor against cosureties, judgment is taken against one surety only,[17] or one only is found to be liable, such surety cannot compel contribution from the one against whom judgment was not rendered.[18] If judgment is rendered in favor of both sureties, but the creditor, on appeal as to one only, obtains judgment, the other is not liable to contribution.[19]

(C) Payment by Defendant. As a surety is equitably liable for his proportionate share only,[20] it is a good defense, to an action for contribution, that he has paid such proportion to the creditor,[21] or to the plaintiff cosurety;[22] but if after cosureties have adjusted their accounts, and supposed they had settled them, one of them is forced to make further payment, he can have contribution as to such additional sum.[23]

(D) Set-Off. A surety, in an action against him for contribution, can set off a debt due to him from the cosurety seeking contribution.[24] Conversely, a surety in an action against him for a debt owing his cosurety can set off a claim against the latter for contribution.[25] But in an action for contribution defendant cannot set up a defense that plaintiff was indebted to the principal in a greater sum than he has paid as surety,[26] nor can defendant set off debts due to him individually from the principal.[27]

(V) Limitations.[28] Provisions in statutes of limitations in regard to implied contracts in general [29] apply to actions between cosureties for contribution.[30]

(B) Defendant. At law an action for contribution must be brought against each cosurety separately,[34] and a surety and the principal cannot be joined as defendants.[35] But in equity all the cosureties and the principal should be joined to prevent a multiplicity of suits.[36] Persons, however, from whom nothing can

Laches in seeking contribution by subrogation.—In Pickering v. Lieberman, 41 Fed. 376, it was held that one of two or more sureties, who had paid the debt and who was entitled to contribution and by statute to be subrogated by an assignment on the record to his use of a judgment for the debt, must proceed with diligence and a delay of nearly eighteen years is such laches as to move a court of equity to refuse relief, and the fact that one of the other sureties had been adjudged insane at a time subsequent to the judgment affords no excuse for the delay, since his trustee stood in his place and ready to answer all such claims.

be collected are not necessary parties.[37] In a suit in equity brought by a surety before payment of the debt to compel a cosurety to contribute his share, the creditor should be made a party, as otherwise he could not be compelled to accept payment;[38] but the creditor is not a necessary party to a bill in equity to subject indemnity to the claims of cosureties.[39]

(VII) PLEADINGS. Although a surety can recover from his cosureties under the common counts,[40] he may also plead specially.[41] A complaint in an action for contribution is sufficient which alleges the execution of the contract by the principal and sureties, their relation, the liability of the sureties thereon, payment by plaintiff, and failure of defendant,[42] or of the personal representative of a deceased cosurety, to contribute, and which prays that he do so.[43] It is not necessary to allege that the default of the principal occurred after the defendant executed the contract,[44] or notice to defendant of suit against plaintiff.[45]

(B) Judgment by Creditor or Obligee.[53] In an action for contribution, a judgment obtained against the sureties by the creditor or obligee is admissible in evidence,[54] and is conclusive as to all questions of liability within the issues determined in that action.[55] But a judgment or decree is not conclusive on a surety

C.) 403 (holding that the decree of the ordinary against an administrator is evidence to charge the sureties in an action for contribution).

Decree not competent or admissible.— A decree in chancery against one of the sureties on a bond of a deceased administrator, in favor of a successor, founded on the default of the deceased, is not competent or admissible against a cosurety not a party to the suit, to show the common liability of the sureties. Means v. Hicks, 65 Ala. 241.

55. Waller v. Campbell, 25 Ala. 544 (holding that sureties on a guardian's bond against whom judgment has been rendered cannot go behind the judgment to show that the guardian's default for which such judgment was rendered was not covered by a bond in that suit but by a prior bond); Rochelle v. Bowers, 9 La. 528 (over a defense pleaded that the cosureties sued for contribution, had never signed the bond upon which judgment was rendered in the action by the obligee thereon).

The judgment is conclusive as to the amount if it was rendered against all the sureties, and defendants in contribution allowed a default by reason of negligence or confidence in their cosurety. Sutliff v. Brown, 65 Iowa 42, 21 N. W. 164.

As to suretyship.— Where the issue of suretyship is not raised by the pleadings in an action by a creditor against several debtors, the judgment cannot conclude the parties in a subsequent action by one of the defendants against another for contribution. Knopf v. Morel, 111 Ind. 570, 13 N. E. 51 (holding that, although the liability of one who writes his name on the back of a promissory note is prima facie that of an accommodation indorser, yet a complaint by the creditor showing the indorsement will not confer jurisdiction to render judgment that the indorser was a surety for those whose names appear as makers); Leaman v. Sample, 91 Ind. 236 (holding that in an action against the principal and sureties on a promissory note, where the answer of one of the defendants sets up liability only as surety, the judgment against the parties in said relation and that the property of the principal be first exhausted does not conclude the other surety so as to bar his right to contribution); Githens v. Kimmer, 68 Ind. 362. And in Points v. Jacobia, 12 Kan. 50, it was held that where a judgment was rendered against one of the defendants as principal and against another as surety in the absence of the supposed principal and without any notice to him, such judgment is not a final adjudication as between him and the other defendant as to who is principal and who is surety, under the statutory provisions that where it is made to appear that one or more persons jointly or severally bound who signed as surety, etc., it shall be the duty of the clerk to certify which are sureties and that the property of the principal debtor shall be exhausted before that of the surety, etc., but who was not a party to the suit in which it was rendered,[56] unless he has notice of the suit and an opportunity to defend, in which event it has been held that he will be concluded as to such matters as he might have interposed in that suit.[57] A judgment is admissible by way of inducement to evidence to show its payment by plaintiff,[58] and the amount.[59]

(IX) JUDGMENT OR DECREE. Judgment should be rendered against each defendant separately.[60] If a bill in equity prays for repayment of the entire amount by defendant on the theory that he is primarily liable to the complainant, the decree may provide for equal contribution, such relief being within the general scope of the bill.[61] If the bill prays for contribution from cosureties on an official bond, a confirmation of a master's report fixing the amount due to creditors in accordance with an order of court is a sufficient decree upon which execution may issue.[62]

2. EXONERATION IN EQUITY. It has been held that a surety, before he has paid the debt, may file a bill in equity to compel his cosureties to contribute,[63] or to compel a cosurety to pay to the creditor any money of the principal in his hands which should be applied on the debt,[64] or to restrain the collection from him of the share of another surety in whose hands the principal placed funds to satisfy the debt,[65] and a judgment against a cosurety may be enjoined for equitable reasons involving new issues and new parties which were not before the court in the action at law.[66] Where a solvent surety is indebted to an insolvent cosurety, equity will interfere to prevent the collection of such debt, although the creditor surety has not paid the debt of his principal.[67]

D. As to Supplemental and Successive Sureties.[68] A supplemental surety can recover from the surety, as to whom he was supplemental, the entire amount which he has been compelled to pay,[69] and in the case of successive bonds such a judgment is only a direction to the officers that the property of the person certified as principal shall be taken first in execution.

Filing designation of agent.— Turner v. Franklin, (Ariz. 1906) 85 Pac. 1070. Failure of an agent of a foreign surety company to deposit in the clerk's office of the county the power of attorney under which he acts, as required by Burns Rev. St. (1901) § 3453, does not render a bond given by him invalid. Barricklow v. Stewart, 31 Ind. App. 446, 68 N. E. 316. Presumption of compliance.—A certificate of the insurance commissioner that a surety company is entitled to transact business in the state raises the presumption that it has complied with the requirements of the statute. Gutzeil v. Pennie, 95 Cal. 598, 30 Pac. 836. In some states it is held that, in the absence of proof to the contrary, compliance with the laws of the state will be presumed under the maxim "Omnia rite acta præsumuntur." New York Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Eickhoff, 63 Minn. 170, 65 N. Penalties denounced against surety companies transacting business without complypanies are governed by special regulations, the general law pertaining to foreign corporations is not applicable to them.[79]

C. Mode of Executing Contract.[80] A surety company must sign and execute the instrument in the manner required by law for signing and executing such instruments.[81] If a foreign company has complied with the requirements of the law, it is not necessary to state in a bond which it signs, that it is authorized to transact business in the state.[82]

D. Justification. While surety companies are sometimes permitted to become sureties on bonds and undertakings without justifying,[83] it is usually provided that ing with statutory provisions can be recovered by a suit in the name of the state only; and penalties against the corporation have no application to an agent of the company. Davis v. Pullman Co., 34 Tex. Civ. App. 621, 79 S. W. 635, holding that a palace car company which does not solicit business for a surety company and which never transmitted applications other than for itself is not an agent of the surety company within §§ 8–10, c. 165, p. 247, Acts 1897; and is not liable for the penalties prescribed.

Where a foreign surety company has ceased to do business in the state, after signing an injunction bond, by reason of failure to comply with the statute requiring bonds to be deposited in the office of the secretary of state, defendant has a right to call for other security, and the fact that the company is settling its unfinished business in the state and has property left there, the value of which does not appear, does not afford sufficient security to enable plaintiff to sustain the validity of the bond furnished. Ansley v. Stewart, 121 La. 629, 46 So. 675, where, under such circumstances, time was granted within which to furnish a new bond.

83. State v. Hennepin County Inv. Co., 58 Minn. 351, 59 N. W. 1055, holding, however, that such a statute is only permissive, and does not make it compulsory on the court to accept a surety company as surety without justification. Mich. Pub. Acts (1895), No. 266, declaring that any bond required by law to be given with surety or sureties may be executed by a surety company, and that such execution shall be in all respects a full and complete compliance with every requirement as to the execution of such bond by sureties, and that in those cases where, by the laws of the state, more than one surety is required, it shall be lawful to approve and accept a bond with but one surety, provided the surety is a corporation duly qualified, and that the certificate of the insurance commissioner shall be conclusive proof of the solvency and credit of such company for all purposes, and of its right to be accepted as sole surety, and of its sufficiency as such, does not operate to compel those charged with the duty of accepting and approving bonds of saloon keepers under Act No. 313, Pub. Acts (1887), to accept a bond with a foreign corporation as sole surety, where their refusal is based on an honest doubt as to the sufficiency of the surety proposed. Schmitt v. Clinton, 111 Mich. 99, 69 N. W. 153.

Constitutionality.—A statute may constitutionally authorize a surety company to become sole surety on bonds required by law without an affidavit showing qualifications, although such an affidavit is required for other sureties. King v. Pony Gold Min. Co., 24 Mont. 470, 62 Pac. 783.

Constitutionality of statute controlling discretion of court.— In Pennsylvania it has been held that the power of courts of record to require security from persons subject to their order where there are interests demanding its protection is an inherent one, essential to the due administration of right and justice which the constitution has placed beyond the possibility of legislative interference, especially in the case of the orphans' court; and that, under the constitutional distribution of governmental powers, the legislature, in authorizing surety companies to become surety on bonds required by law, like guardianship bonds, cannot dictate to the courts how they shall decide as to the sufficiency of the security, or compel the courts to accept as good and sufficient security which is insufficient, or compel the courts to accept the decision of an officer having no judicial recognition under the constitution as to matters affecting their own procedure and the performance of their own judicial functions, or confer upon such officer the right to decide questions of law, such as the due incorporation of a foreign surety company, the extent of its corporate powers, and whether or not it has brought itself within the terms of the statute authorizing it to act as surety; and therefore, that Pa. Act, June 26, 1895 (Pamphl. Laws 343), as to the acceptance as surety or guarantor of comsuch a company, if excepted to, shall be required to justify.[84] Unless otherwise provided, justification by a surety company is made in the same manner as by any other surety.[85] It should appear on such justification that the surplus assets of the company are equal to the amount of its undertaking.[86] Such a showing does not, however, absolutely require approval and acceptance;[87] but sufficient facts must be presented by the objections to overcome the presumption of solvency before a refusal to approve can be justified.[88]

E. Construction and Operation of Contract.[89] Generally speaking, a contract of suretyship by a surety company is governed by the same rules as the contracts of other sureties,[90] but some distinctions are made by the courts in construing such contracts. The doctrine that a surety is a favorite of the law, and that a panies qualified to act as such, is unconstitutional in so far as it purports to control the discretion of the orphans' court in accepting any given company as such surety. In re American Banking, etc., Co., 4 Pa. Dist. 757, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 274.

85. Earle v. Earle, 49 N. Y. Super. Ct. 57.

Prescribed mode not exclusive.—A mode of justification prescribed by statute is not necessarily exclusive. Haines v. Hein, 67 N. Y. App. Div. 389, 73 N. Y. Suppl. 293, holding that testimony of an officer of a surety company, having knowledge of its financial condition, is sufficient as to its standing; but that a certified copy of the annual report of a surety company filed in the office of the state superintendent of insurance is an insufficient justification under Code Civ. Proc. § 811, and Laws (1893), c. 720, § 4, amended by Laws (1895), c. 178.

86. Fox v. Hale, etc., Silver Min. Co., 97 Cal. 353, 32 Pac. 446.

Certificate of authority.— Under some statutes the certificate of authority of a surety company is evidence of the solvency of such company (Romine v. Howard, (Tex. Civ. App. 1906) 93 S. W. 690); and is sufficient to justify the approval of a bond or undertaking (Germantown Trust Co. v. Whitney, 19 S. D. 108, 102 N. W. 304).

The certificate of approval need not show the authority of the corporation to execute the bond. Germantown Trust Co. v. Whitney, 19 S. D. 108, 102 N. W. 304.

87. Earle v. Earle, 49 N. Y. Super. Ct. 57, holding that a judge must exercise his discretion in each particular case as to whether the actual statement of the company's business justifies an approval.

89. Validity of agreement between principal and surety.— In Maryland Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Butler, 130 Ga. 225, 60 S. E. 851, 16 L. R. A. N. S. 994, it was agreed between a guardian and a surety company that, if the latter would become surety on the bond of the former, he would deposit the wards' funds in some bank in the city of the guardian's residence, to be approved by the surety, and that no part of this money should be withdrawn without the joint check of the guardian and the surety, through its local representative. The arrangement was stated to the bank's officers. Deposits were made, and afterward an interest-bearing certificate of deposit was issued to carry into effect the agreement of the parties. It certified that the guardian had deposited a named sum payable to the order of the surety. This was received by the guardian and retained, with the understanding between him and the surety that no part of the fund should be withdrawn from the bank without the joint check of the guardian and the surety, and that, if the whole should be withdrawn at once, the certificate of deposit should be indorsed jointly by them. It was held that such an arrangement had the effect to surrender in part the custody and control of the ward's funds to another than the guardian appointed by law, and to put it beyond the power of the guardian to withdraw the fund in case of an emergency, and that it was contrary to public policy. Discharge.—A surety company, like any other surety, has a right to require a strict compliance with the terms of the contract; and it will be discharged by any material alteration of the contract between the principal and the obligee without its consent, by an agreement on the part of the obligee not to sue the principal, by an extension of the time of payment, and in like cases, to the same extent as other sureties. claim against him is strictissimi juris,[91] does not apply where the bond or undertaking is executed upon a consideration by a corporation organized to make such bonds or undertakings for profit.[92] While such corporations may call themselves "surety companies," their business is in all essential particulars that of insurers.[93] Their contracts are usually in the terms prescribed by themselves, and should be construed most strongly in favor of the obligee.[94] Limitations on the powers of an agent of a surety company do not affect persons dealing with the agent without knowledge thereof.[95] A surety company is estoped by the material recitals in a bond which it has executed.[96]

F. Relief From Further Liability.[97] A statute providing for relief of "sureties" generally from further liability on a bond or for petition for such relief applies to surety companies which, by an amendment of the statute, have been authorized to become sureties on bonds or undertakings required by law, where there is nothing in the original statute or the amendment excepting them.[98]

12. Webster Unabr. Dict. [quoted in Arthur v. Moller, 97 U. S. 365, 367, 24 L. ed. 1046], where it is added: "Hence, specifically, to strike off an impression or impressions of, from types, stereotype or engraved plates, or the like, by means of a press; to multiply by the press; as, to 'print' newspapers, handbills, books, pictures, and the like. To mark by pressure; to form an impression upon; to cover with figures by a press or something analogous to it; as, to 'print' calico, &c."

13. "Print" is familiarly used in the sense of "publish," and in that sense the word receives recognition in many if not all of the dictionaries. State v. Cronin, 75 Nebr. 738, 742, 106 N. W. 986; Nebraska Land, etc., Co. v. McKinley-Lanning L. & T. Co., 52 Nebr. 410, 414, 72 N. W. 357.

In the sense of "publish."— Where a statute requires the publication of a notice of foreclosure in a paper "printed" in the county, a compliance with the law is not shown by the certificate that such notice was published in a newspaper published in the county. A newspaper may be published in a county, and yet not printed there. A strict compliance with the statute must be shown. Bragdon v. Hatch, 77 Me. 433, 434, 1 Atl. 140; Blake v. Dennett, 49 Me. 102, 104. But under a similar statute it is held that a notice of judicial sale is not invalid because the newspaper in which it was inserted though published in the proper county was partly printed outside of such county. Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Wortaszewski, 63 Nebr. 636, 637, 88 N. W. 855. This doctrine has been upheld in the case of notices in actions against non-residents. Palmer v. McCormick, 30 Fed. 82, 83. And so under a statute requiring the proceedings of a city council to be published in a newspaper printed and published in such city where the contract for publishing such proceedings was awarded to a newspaper, the matter for which was composed, set up, and placed in form in such city, and then sent to another place where the press work was done, the papers being then sent back to such city from whence they are issued to subscribers, it was held that this was a compliance with the statute. I. TERMINOLOGY.

A. Prison. A prison is a place of confinement for the safe custody of persons, in order to their answering in any action, civil or criminal.[1] In its general sense it may be said to include the various buildings, whether designated as prisons, jails, penitentiaries, houses of correction, or otherwise, which are used for the confinement of persons in judicial custody, in civil or criminal proceedings, either as punishment by imprisonment or to insure their production in further proceedings as parties or witnesses.[2]

B. State Prison. In a general sense the term means a place of confinement for state prisoners; that is, for persons charged with political offenses, and confined for reasons of state.[3]

7. Jacob L. Dict. [quoted in Scarborough v. Thornton, 9 Pa. St. 451, 454].

As defined by statute a prisoner is any person held in custody under process of law, or under lawful arrest (N. Y. Pen. Code (1903), § 93); every person held in custody under process of law issued from a court of competent jurisdiction, whether civil or criminal, or under any lawful arrest (N. D. Rev. Codes (1899), § 6957; S. D. Pen. Code (1903), § 153).

A prisoner committed on mesne process is not a prisoner committed for debt within the meaning of a statute making the sheriff liable to the creditor or person to whose use any forfeiture was adjudged, or any debt, damages, or costs awarded against such prisoner, for the full amount of such debt, damages, and costs, for the escape of such prisoner, through the insufficiency of the jail or prison in any county. Lovell v. Bellows, 7 N. H. 375, 389.

"A prisoner who gives security for the prison bounds, is from thenceforward no otherwise in the custody of the Sheriff, than as may be sufficient to protect the Sheriff against any suit which the creditor may bring against him for not confining the debtor within the walls of the prison. He is in the eye and contemplation of the law, a true prisoner; being . . . in the custody of the law: but the Sheriff hath no longer any power over him, either to restrain him, or to discharge him, if he reside not within the prison." Meredith v. Duval, 1 Munf. (Va.) 76, 80.

although a literal compliance with the letter of the law is not always necessary.[12] In some states the authority to construct and maintain prisons is conferred on a county board or on the county court,[13] which is the sole judge as to size, cost, quality of material,[14] and location.[15] The records should always show what buildings or apartments are intended for the use of prisoners, and such records cannot be contradicted by parol evidence or proof of usage,[16] although when the records cannot be found ancient usage is sufficient evidence that apartments have been appropriated for a prison.[17]

2. Use by United States of State Prison or County Jail.[18] The various states have made it the duty of their officers to receive and keep in the state or county prisons any prisoners committed thereto by process or order issued under the authority of the United States, as if they had been committed under the authority of the state, provision having been made by the United States for the support of such prisoners,[19] and for certain purposes and to certain intents a state jail lawfully used by the United States may be deemed to be the jail of the United States, and the jailer or keeper to be a United States official.[20]

B. Status as City, County, or State Institution. There is a recognized distinction between state prisons and those of cities and counties;[21] but unless restricted by law, the prisons of a county, city, or town, all become the public prisons of the state.[22] A city is, as a general rule, allowed to use the county jail,[23]

C. Regulation and Supervision. The regulation and supervision of prisons is vested in officers designated by statute,[25] who are authorized to adopt rules and regulations for the government of the prison or prisons under their control,[26] but who have such supervision only over matters connected with the prisons as may be provided by law.[27] Where a measure of discretion was left to the prison inspectors in the execution of a statute, the courts have refused to control that discretion.[28]

entitle them to act independently until the jailer has had a reasonable time after such rejection to make another appointment.[34] A court subject to whose approval the appointment of certain prison officials is required to be made is bound to make every intendment in favor of the appointment as a discreet exercise of the power, and cannot review such an appointment in pursuance of views, preferences, and opinions of any section of the community.[35]

2. ELIGIBILITY. Under some statutes a person holding a judicial or lucrative office is not eligible to appointment as a prison director.[36]

3. TERM OF OFFICE. The term of office of the higher prison officials is usually fixed by statute,[37] but where the law does not fix a term, the office is held during the pleasure of the appointing power.[38] The term begins at the date of the appointment where the statute creating the office fixes no definite time for its commencement.[39]

4. REMOVAL. A prison official has no property or vested right in his office;[40] but he is entitled to exercise the functions and receive the prescribed compensation thereof until the end of his term, unless his incumbency is sooner terminated by resignation, or forfeiture of or removal from the office in the manner provided by law.[41] Where there is no term or tenure fixed by constitution or statute, or where the office is to be held during the pleasure of the appointing power, the power of removal is discretionary and without control;[42] but where such an officer is chosen for a definite term, and provision is made for his removal for cause, the causes of removal must be alleged, the party notified, and a hearing had.[43] Where the statute gives power of removal for cause, without specifying the causes, the power is necessarily of a discretionary nature, and the removing authority is the exclusive judge of the cause and the sufficiency thereof;[44] but where the statute specifies

Where the reasons assigned for removal are sufficient on their face to warrant a removal, the court cannot go beyond that and determine whether the reasons had existence as a matter of fact, and cannot consider the ex-

the causes for removal, and prescribes the procedure, removals cannot be made for other causes,[45] or in any other method than that prescribed.[46] Where the incumbent of one office holds another office ex officio his removal from the principal office removes him from the other office also.[47]

B. Sheriff as Jailer Ex Officio. The sheriff is jailer ex officio, and has a common-law right to the custody and control of the public prisons, and of the prisoners confined therein.[48] Some cases hold that where the statutes are silent on the subject of the rights of the sheriff, but the constitution recognizes the common-law rights attached to the office of sheriff from time immemorial, they cannot be detached by statute;[49] but other cases hold that the office of sheriff is a purely ministerial office, the functions and province of which is to execute duties prescribed by law, and which may be contracted, enlarged, or transferred at the will of the legislature.[50]

C. Bond.[51] The statutes very generally require the warden or jailer to give a bond for the faithful discharge of his duties [52] and authorize the taking of such a bond from subordinate prison officials.[53] But it has been held that, in the absence of any statutory requirement to that effect, the warden of a penitentiary cannot be required to give a bond.[54] A statutory requirement that the bond of the warden is to entirely deprive such an official of compensation.[69] A jailer may be entitled to pay for attendance on court as a witness,[70] and guards engaged on a monthly compensation are not subject to a deduction of salary while taking a convict before the court under a subpœna.[71] In Louisiana it is held that deputies of the sheriff designated for duty at a prison are not employees of the prison within a statute requiring a city to pay the salaries of such employees.[72] A jailer who continues the performance of the duties of his office for several months after the rate of compensation has been reduced impliedly accepts the lower rate and cannot subsequently question its reasonableness.[73] Where a city jailer receives and keeps county, state, and United States prisoners, the city cannot compel him to account to it for the fees received for such services,[74] except to the extent that the salary paid by the city to the jailer exceeds the minimum salary which under the law it is obliged to pay.[75] It has been held that a sheriff may receive a share of the fees and emoluments of his deputies, if the parties so agree; [76] but where the appointment of a jailer and the amount of his salary is prescribed by law, the sheriff, receiving such salary to the use of the jailer, cannot refuse to pay it over, even on the ground of the illegality of the appointment.[77] A de facto jail officer is entitled to the emoluments of the office of which he is actually incumbent; [78] but a mere intruder has no right to fees or salary for services rendered during such usurpation.[79] Where a duly appointed officer is unlawfully prevented from performing his duties he is entitled to recover as if he had performed them.[80] The statutes sometimes require jailers to make periodical reports of the fees received by or due to them.[81]

constituting a state board of prison commissioners may lawfully hold a meeting and transact such business as the board is authorized to transact.[85] It is sometimes made the duty of the jailer to receive and care for any property which a convict has on his person when he enters the prison;[86] but a statute so providing does not authorize the jailer to receive payment of a certificate of deposit belonging to a convict.[87] A jailer need not receive a debtor without sufficient written evidence of authority to receive and hold him,[88] but if he sees fit he may waive this without rendering himself or the sheriff liable for any consequences which may follow.[89] The superintendent of a workhouse cannot lawfully receive an inmate's child into that institution or permit it to remain therein even on payment of its board.[90] A statute providing that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for state employees is not applicable to penitentiary employees who are paid annual salaries under a statute passed after the eight-hour law.[91] A contract by a jailer to lease that part of the jail set apart for his own use is void;[92] but the sheriff is not chargeable with rent for the part of the jail building occupied by him as a residence.[93]

F. Liabilities[94]— 1. In General — a. Civil Liabilities. When the exigencies of a case require an officer of a prison to exercise judgment, his determination thereon is in the nature of a judicial, and not of a ministerial, act, for which, in the absence of malice or fraud, no personal liability is incurred.[95] The warden of a jail is not bound to pay into the county treasury money received by him for keeping prisoners from another county.[96] If a jailer takes a note for a fine and costs, it is equivalent to the receipt of so much money and renders the jailer liable for the amount.[97] The liabilities of a jailer do not attach to one who in case of emergency looks after the discipline of the convicts and the protection of the property of the state until further notice at the request of a superior official.[98]

2. For Injuries to Prisoners. Where punishment inflicted upon a prisoner is proper and authorized, and not cruel or excessive, and is not inflicted with malice or intent to injure, the officer is not liable for an injury resulting therefrom.[1] And a fortiori a prison official is not liable for an injury to a prisoner of which his act or neglect was not the proximate cause,[2] nor is he liable for failing to furnish attendance and care to a prisoner injured by a fellow prisoner when it does not appear that he knew or should have known of the injury.[3] Neither is a city marshal responsible for injuries caused by the unhealthy condition of a cell when it does not appear that he knew of such condition and had control of the cells.[4] But a sheriff who knowingly permits one prisoner to assault another, and uses no reasonable means to prevent it, is liable to the assaulted prisoner.[5]

3. Liability on Bond. Where a prison official is required to give a bond conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, such officer and his sureties are liable for the faithful performance of all the duties imposed, whether by statute or by the rules and regulations of the prison directors;[6] but the sureties are not liable with respect to matters not coming within a fair construction of the statutes or rules.[7] The liability of the sureties on such a bond is a joint one with the officer, and they may be sued, together with the officer, directly upon the bond, for his nonfeasance or misfeasance in office, and they will be liable together with him thereon.[8]

G. Actions[9] By or Against Officers. The superintendent of a county penitentiary is an officer within the meaning of a statute providing that an action against a public officer for an act done by him in virtue of his office must be tried in the county where the cause of action or some part thereof arose.[10] Under a statute providing that all suits necessary to protect the rights of the state connected with the penitentiary shall be prosecuted in the name of the board of directors, a suit against a warden to secure funds of the state unlawfully converted by him is properly prosecuted in the name of the board.[11] In an action against a retired sheriff for failure to deliver to his successor a prisoner on civil process admitted to the jail limits, evidence of his reason for such failure is admissible,[12] and an omission of plaintiff to cause the prisoner to be retaken by issuing a second execution to the new sheriff may be considered in mitigation of damages.[13]

IV. Fiscal and Business Management.

A. Property and Funds. Where the statute provides that the warden of a state prison shall have the custody of all the property pertaining to the prison, that he shall be treasurer of the prison, that all contracts of the prison shall be made by him, and that he may sue and be sued thereon, money deposited in a bank by such warden in his official capacity cannot be regarded as the property of the state or held in trust for it by the bank.[14] Prison inspectors, while at the prison in the discharge of their official duties, have a right to be furnished with meals at the expense of the prison funds,[15] and such funds are also chargeable with the expenses of a journey made by the inspectors and the warden to inspect and become familiar with the use of a machine which the inspectors were authorized to buy to enable the warden to make a registry of all convicts under his care.[16] Under the English Prisons Act the legal estate in all prisons and prison property is vested in the prison commissioners.[17]

B. Contracts. The general rules as to the requisites of a valid contract[18] are applicable to contracts by prison officials relating to the care, custody, and maintenance of prisoners or prison property.[19] It is sometimes required by statute that all contracts on account of the prison shall be made by the warden in writing,[20] and approved by the prison inspectors in writing.[21] A contract made by prison

C. Leases.[23] The prison authorities are sometimes given power to lease convict labor, and the penitentiary grounds, shops, machinery therein, and other property of the prison,[24] and it is within the powers of the board having supervision of prisons to provide by contract for the feeding and clothing of convicts in the penitentiary as one of the considerations for the leasing of their labor.[25] But a statute authorizing the prison authorities to lease the prison shops and such vacant grounds as they deem proper authorizes them to lease only the shops, buildings, and grounds owned by the state at the time of the execution of the lease or during its continuance, and does not authorize them to bind the state by a covenant to supply other or additional shops or grounds.[26] The liability of the lessee of the penitentiary to pay rent depends upon the compliance by the state with its undertaking to permit him to enjoy uninterrupted possession of the premises, machinery, fixtures, etc., and to employ the convicts at such labor as will be most profitable;[27] and while the state has the right, notwithstanding the lease, to make necessary and proper improvements to the prison,[28] the lessee has the right to set off against the rent such damages as he has sustained by reason of the interference with his use of the premises and of the convicts occasioned by the improvement.[29] Where a lease provides that the annual rent shall be a certain amount "net," this means that the state shall receive the amount stipulated and that the lessee shall pay the expenses of administration.[30] Where a lease provides for payment by the state to the lessee of a certain amount each month, the measure of damages for a breach of the contract is the amount so named.[31] A statute authorizing the superintendent, with the governor's approval, to make such improvements in the penitentiary as he deems advisable, not to exceed the sum to be paid by the lessees, and providing that amounts due the state from the lessees shall not be expended or appropriated for any other purpose, appropriates for improvements only such amounts as, in the judgment of the superintendent and the governor, are needed, and does not create a contract with the lessees that all the rent shall be expended for improvements.[32] Where an act of the legislature to aid in the construction of a railroad authorized the lessees of the penitentiary to transfer such lease of it and of the convicts "for the unexpired term thereof" to the railroad, and provided that on execution of the transfer the lessees should be released from any further liability to the state, a transfer not made until nineteen months after the passage of the act was not a compliance therewith and did not release the lessees or the sureties on their bond from liability under the lease up to the time of the transfer.[33] The lessee of a state penitentiary is liable in assumpsit for work performed by one who was illegally imprisoned.[34]

D. Purchase of Supplies. In purchasing or providing supplies for the prison the officials must be governed by the statutory regulations on the subject,[35] and a prison official may be compelled by mandate to fulfil the duties imposed upon him by statute in reference to the purchase of and payment for supplies.[36] Where the statute requires the sheriff to furnish necessary articles for prisoners and provides that all charges for keeping and maintaining prisoners shall be paid from the county treasury, the sheriff may procure necessary articles on the credit of the county and the person from whom they were purchased may maintain an action directly against the county for the purchase-price.[37] Where the statute requires the various counties to maintain jails at their expense, the county supervisors have, without any express provision to that effect, authority to purchase on behalf of the county the necessary furnishings for the jail.[38] In Nebraska it is held that independent of statute an action may be maintained on the relation of the warden of the penitentiary against the board of purchase and supplies to require them to provide the necessaries for the support of the penitentiary.[39]

E. Enforcement of Claims Against Prisons. A general statute providing that when any controversy arises or any suit is pending respecting any contract or claim on account of the state prison the warden may submit the same to the determination of arbitrators or referees to be approved by the inspectors is not pro tanto repealed by a resolution of the legislature authorizing certain officers to adjudicate upon and settle certain claims,[40] and after an award under such a submission the claimants cannot be deprived of their rights by subsequent legislation.[41]

V. CUSTODY, CONTROL, AND DISCHARGE OF PRISONERS.

A. In General. The original process for the commitment of a convict to jail, and not a mere copy thereof, should be left with the jailer as evidence of his authority to hold the prisoner.[42] It is the duty of the sheriff upon the election and qualification of his successor to turn over to the latter the jail and the prisoners therein;[43] and the new sheriff has no control over or power to hold prisoners who are not so assigned.[44] On the conviction of crime of a mother, her young children will not be permitted to accompany her to the penitentiary.[45] In the absence of any statutory restriction, express or implied, it is within the power of the board having charge of prisons to appoint an agent on behalf of the state to lease or manage the convict labor as well as the shops and machinery within the penitentiary.[46] A statute prohibiting the use of motive power machinery for manufacturing purposes "in any of the penal institutions of the state," and the employment of the convicts therein at certain labor, applies only to the state prisons and such other prisons and reformatories as are conducted by the state and at its expense.[47] In England it is held that a person committed to prison for acting as a solicitor, although not duly qualified, is a "criminal prisoner," [48] as is also a person committed to prison in default by distress for non-payment of a sum of money adjudged to be paid by a court of summary jurisdiction.[49]

B. Discipline[50] and Restraint. A jailer is vested with a certain amount of discretion with regard to the safe-keeping and security of his prisoners,[51] and the courts will not interfere with him unless it appears that he has misused his power for purposes of oppression.[52] A jailer is justified in punishing a prisoner who calls him foul names and uses abusive expressions toward him.[53]

C. Privilege of Prison Bounds. The tendency of modern legislation on the subject of imprisonment for debt is to render it as little irksome as possible — scarcely a privation of liberty,[54] by the establishment of what are termed prison bounds or jail liberties, which are designated areas, usually of considerable extent, within which the prisoner is permitted to go at liberty upon giving bond that he

Sufficiency of complaint for failure to assign prisoners.—A complaint which, after stating the due commitment of a prisoner by defendant as sheriff to the county jail, then proceeds to state the expiration of the term of defendant's office, the election of a new sheriff, the due qualification of the latter, and the service upon defendant of the certificate of the county clerk that such new sheriff had qualified and given the security required by law, and avers that defendant did not within ten days after such service deliver to the said new sheriff the prisoner then in defendant's custody on an execution and confined within the jail liberties, shows a clear and explicit neglect of duty and violation of the statute for which defendant is liable, and is enough to put defendant to his defense. Acts warranting interference of court.— It is cruel and unusual as disciplinary punishment, and unwarranted by law, to chain a prisoner by the neck with a trace chain and padlock so that he can neither lie down nor sit down, and leave him so chained in darkness alone for several hours of the night; and it is the duty of the court by appropriate action to protect prisoners from such arbitrary oppression. In re Birdsong, 39 Fed. 599, 4 L. will not go beyond the prescribed limits.[55] Jail liberties are sometimes allowed also to persons committed to jail for lack of bail on criminal charges;[56] but one who has been convicted of crime and sentenced to imprisonment is not entitled to jail liberties.[57]

D. Visitors. The jailer may require persons seeking admission to the jail as visitors to submit their persons to a proper and orderly examination or search,[58] or permit visitors to enter without being searched if, in his opinion, they are proper persons to be relieved of that formality.[59] If visitors to the jail do not consent to be searched they may be refused admittance, required to depart, or ejected;[60] but the jailer has no authority to search them by force or without their consent.[61] In England, where a material witness for a person accused of crime was confined in prison, it was held that the jailer should allow the attorney for the accused to see the witness in his presence, but properly refused to allow the attorney to see the witness apart.[62]

E. Place of Confinement[63] and Transfer of Prisoners. The state may provide in which one of its penitentiaries convicts or classes of convicts shall be confined,[64] and it has been held that a prisoner may be removed from one jail to another by authority of a parol order.[65] Although the legislature has conferred upon the inspectors of a state prison power to contract with a city for the confinement and maintenance of a certain class of convicted persons in the city house of correction, there is no authority for sentencing such convicts to be confined in the house of correction until the power granted the inspectors has been exercised by them and a contract entered into.[66] A sheriff would be liable to punishment if, without strong circumstances of excuse, he should put a debtor in a cell set apart for felons;[67] and a fortiori he will not be punished for refraining from placing a

A statute authorizing the executive council of the state to designate what convicts shall be confined in a particular prison is not in conflict with a constitutional provision vesting the judicial power of the state in the courts. O'Brien v. Barr, 83 Iowa 51, 49 N. W. 68.

Mode of designation.— Under such a statute the executive council may designate in whatever way will clearly point out the individual convicts or class of convicts who are to be confined in such prison, and may order the removal of a class of convicts, leaving it to the judgment of the prison warden which convicts come within the class designated. O'Brien v. Barr, 83 Iowa 51, 49 N. W. 68, holding that an order for the removal of twenty convicts "whose removal will in the judgment of the state warden be most consistent with the interests of the state and the proper treatment of its convicts, and with a due regard for the existing contracts for the employment of convict labor," was proper.

Construction of statute.— A statute providing that when there is no sufficient prison in a county the court may order "any person charged with a criminal offense, and ordered to be committed to prison" to be sent to the jail of another county, applies only to persons charged with crime and awaiting trial, and does not authorize the removal to another county of a person sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail as the punishment for a crime. debtor in such a cell without some strong reason for so doing.[68] Where a jailer discovers that one of the prisoners is suffering from a contagious disease, he should remove him to a suitable place and keep him there until he has served his sentence.[69] If a sheriff is to be imprisoned he cannot be confined in the county jail, but the coroner is left to the common-law rule by which he may make his own home or any other place a prison.[70]

F. Discharge of Prisoners. The statutes sometimes allow a discharge, at the discretion of the inspectors, of a convict who has served out the term of his imprisonment, without making payment of costs or fines and without making restitution.[71] County commissioners have no authority to make an order for the discharge of one who is in jail in execution of a criminal sentence.[72] A statute authorizing workhouse commissioners to discharge a prisoner under certain circumstances, even if constitutional, does not authorize them to discharge a person sentenced to a term in the workhouse where such sentence has been suspended and the person has never been sent to the workhouse.[73] A statute providing that a prisoner who is arrested charged with a misdemeanor and held to answer the same, or who is arrested by virtue of a capias or an indictment for a misdemeanor, shall be discharged by the committing magistrate or officer making the arrest under a capias on his own recognizance without security, does not authorize a sheriff to discharge a person not arrested by him or his deputy.[74] Under the Ohio statute the directors of a workhouse cannot discharge a person committed thereto, unless the order therefor be made at a meeting of the board at which a majority is present, uniting in its action.[75] When a pardon is granted [76] the jailer must liberate the prisoner.[77] After a prisoner has been admitted to the liberty of the jail limits on giving a bond, the sheriff has no longer any power to discharge him.[78]

G. Commutation of Sentence For Good Conduct — 1. In General. In a number of states the statutes provide for a reduction of the term of imprisonment to which a prisoner has been sentenced as a reward for good conduct during his confinement,[79] and a prisoner is entitled to his discharge at the expiration of the time for which his sentence runs less the time for which he is entitled to credit as good time earned.[80] The right to credit for good time is purely statutory,[81] and can only be acquired in the manner and under the circumstances pointed out by the statute.[82] The statutory provisions as to diminution of imprisonment for good time do not confer upon the prisoner any legal or vested right,[83] and so the right to a reduction of the sentence may be lost by misconduct.[84] But such statutes do confer a privilege of which the prisoner may avail himself,[85] and of which he cannot be deprived by legislation subsequent to his incarceration.[86] Neither has the governor any power at his discretion to deprive a prisoner of the benefit of such diminution.[87] The statutes usually make it the duty of the jailer to keep a correct register of each convict, showing the good time with which he is entitled to be credited.[88] If such a record is not kept by the jailer it cannot be supplied by parol evidence;[89] but in such case it is conclusively presumed that the prisoner's conduct was unexceptionable, and he is entitled to the full benefit of the good time credits which he would have earned by such conduct.[90] If the record is properly kept it may be sustained and corroborated by parol evidence;[91] and on behalf of the convict, it may be contradicted by such evidence if it is untrue.[92] Under some of the statutes convicts are entitled to be informed from time to time as to their records and of good time earned,[93] and of loss of good time and for what reason it is lost,[94] and a convict who is reported for an infraction of the rules involving a loss of good time should be given, if he so desires, an opportunity to be heard upon such reports.[95] Under some of the statutes the right to commutation for good conduct is dependent upon a report on that subject by the board of prison officials to the governor, and action thereon by the latter with the approval of designated state officers may be had.[96] The language of the statute must govern in determining how the term of the sentence and the deduction for good time is to be computed.[97] A prisoner is not entitled to credit for good time during his absence from the prison on parol, in addition to that earned while an inmate of the prison.[98] Under some of the statutes convicts who have served previous terms are not allowed good time, or are allowed less good time than convicts serving a first term,[99] or are required to serve out the time deducted from their previous terms in addition to their subsequent terms.[1]

Such support must include medical treatment as well as provisions and lodging, and if the patient has a contagious disease, and the expense of his support, maintenance and medical treatment is greater than otherwise would be, it may be unfortunate for the county, but it does not relieve it from its obligation nor authorize it to turn its prisoners loose upon the county town, or shirk its responsibility upon the local board of health."

A person sentenced to imprisonment for life is not entitled to the benefits of a statute providing for a deduction from the term of the sentence for good behavior;[2] and where a sentence of life imprisonment is commuted by the governor to a certain number of "years of actual time in the penitentiary," and the commutation provides that when the convict shall have served that number of "years of actual time" he shall be entitled to a discharge, the prisoner is not entitled to the benefit of the good time law for the purpose of reducing his term to less than the number of years specified in the commutation.[3] A statute allowing a diminution of sentences for good time does not apply to convicts whose sentences are in force at the time of the passage of the act.[4] Where the statute empowers the board of workhouse commissioners to discharge convicts for good conduct, after conviction and final sentence to confinement in the workhouse, from which there is no proceeding in error, the court has no power at a subsequent term to remit the remainder of the imprisonment during the good behavior of the prisoner.[5]

2. UNITED STATES PRISONERS.[6] The United States statutes formerly provided that prisoners confined in jails or penitentiaries of any state for offenses against the United States should be entitled to the same rule of credits for good behavior as other prisoners in the same jail or penitentiary,[7] and provided for certain deductions from the terms of prisoners confined in a state prison or penitentiary, where there was no system of commutation.[8] These early acts have, however, been repealed, and the statute now in force provides a uniform system of commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners, no matter where they are confined,[9] which is applicable to all sentences imposed subsequent to its taking effect,[10] but not to sentences imposed prior to that time.[11]

Prisons or jails to which statutes applicable.— U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 5543 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3721], referred to jails and penitentiaries within a state, regardless of whether they were state, city, or county institutions (U. S. v. Schroeder, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,233, 14 Blatchf. 344), but the act of 1875 referred merely to state prisons or penitentiaries, and did not include county jails or places employed for temporary confinement or confinement for short periods (In re Deering, 60 Fed. 265; In re Corcoran, 47 Fed. 211). It has been held that U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 5543 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3721], applied to a person confined in a county jail or prison in which no credits were provided, although the state had a commutation system applicable to other prisons, and that as regards prisoners in such jails this statute was not repealed by the act of 1875 (In re Deering, 60 Fed. 265); but other cases, without mentioning or considering U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 5543 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3721], have held that the act of 1875 did not apply to a prisoner in a state having a commutation system of its own, although such system did not apply to the jail in which he was confined (U. VI. ESCAPE OF PRISONERS.[12]

A. Necessity of Valid Judgment, Arrest, and Commitment. Before a prisoner can make an escape he must have been legally taken into custody, and this requires that the proceedings, such as the judgment, arrest, and commitment by which the prisoner was taken, must have been valid and sufficient.[13] If the court rendering judgment against a prisoner had no jurisdiction, the sheriff is not liable for an escape.[14] But if the judgment is not void, the fact that it may have been erroneous is immaterial, since a judgment cannot be attacked collaterally.[15] So whenever the process by which one is arrested is void,[16] or appears to be void,[17] no action lies for his escape; but advantage cannot be taken of a mere error or irregularity in the process.[18] It is well settled also that if a creditor gives a debtor in execution permission to go at large beyond the jail liberties, an action for escape cannot be maintained.[19]

B. Kinds of Escapes — 1. In General. There are, at common law, two kinds of escapes: The one, wilful or voluntary; the other, negligent.[20] A third kind of escape due to act of God or the public enemies is also recognized in the cases.[21]

A defendant can move to set aside the order of arrest, after the entry of judgment, on showing to the court that the judgment was recovered on a cause of action for which he was not liable to arrest, and hence that he cannot be legally imprisoned on a capias ad satisfaciendum issued on such judgment; but if he suffers the order of arrest to remain in force it must be held to be regular, for the purposes of an action for an escape from imprisonment on the capias ad satisfaciendum. 2. Voluntary Escape. Every going out of prison, with the knowledge or consent of the sheriff or keeper, is a voluntary escape. A voluntary escape occurs when a prisoner is allowed to go at large by permission or wilful default of the officer in whose custody he is.[22] It is of no consequence that the sheriff relied on the prisoner's honor and promise to return.[23]

3. Negligent Escape. There is a negligent escape when a prisoner has gone out of the sight and control of the officer in whose custody he was, without the knowledge or consent of such officer, but by reason of his careless or negligent conduct.[24]

C. Acts Constituting an Escape — 1. In General. An escape occurs when acts are done which are incompatible with custody, or when a relaxation of confinement is permitted so that the prisoner is not at all times in the control of the sheriff or keeper.[25] But although a sheriff may not, as an indulgence or privilege, allow a prisoner to go outside the jail,[26] there are some emergencies which have been declared a sufficient excuse for a prisoner's temporary liberty.[27]

2. Admitting Prisoners to Jail Liberties — a. In General. Ever since the establishment of prison liberties in England, they have been held by the courts of that country as in effect an extension of the walls of the jail,[28] and the same doctrine prevails in many of the United States.[29] It consequently follows that the departure from the walls of the jail of a prisoner entited to the liberties is not an escape so long as he keeps within the liberties,[30] but to admit a prisoner to the liberties, except in the cases provided by law, renders the jailer liable for an escape.[31]

Time of enjoying liberties.— In Massachusetts it has been held that if a prisoner for debt, having given a bond for the liberties, is found in the night-time voluntarily without the prison and in the yard appurtenant to the jail, it is an escape within the condition of the bond. Freeman v. Davis, 7 Mass. 200; Clap v. Cofran, 7 Mass. 98; Bartlett v. Willis, 3 Mass. 86. 31. Leonard v. Hoit, Brayt. (Vt.) 73; Lowrey v. Barney, 2 D. Chipm. (Vt.) 11.

The jailer is not bound to allow a prisoner the privilege of the prison liberties, unless the prisoner gives bond and security not to depart therefrom,[32] and it is held in some jurisdictions that as the bond is intended as a security to the jailer against the abuse of the privilege by the prisoner, he may waive such security, and grant the liberties without a bond.[33] In other jurisdictions, however, a sheriff is liable for an escape if he admits a prisoner to the liberties without giving a bond.[34] It is a common condition of a prison limits bond that the prisoner, if not legally discharged within a certain time from the day of his commitment, shall surrender himself to be held in close confinement.[35]

b. On Irregular or Insufficient Bond. The sheriff is liable for an escape if he admits the prisoner to the liberty of the yard on a bond, not in conformity with the statute,[36] unless the creditor has waived the irregularity and accepted the bond.[37] If the bail is sufficient when given, the fact that it afterward fails will not render the sheriff liable.[38]

3. Going Beyond Jail Liberties. Where a prisoner goes or is at large beyond the liberties of the jail, without the assent of the party at whose instance he is in custody, it is an escape.[39] In some cases a distinction seems to be drawn between a voluntary and an involuntary or inadvertent escape. Thus it has been held that if a prisoner admitted to the liberties of the jail knowingly and voluntarily goes beyond the limits, it is an escape for which the sheriff is liable.[40] But for a merely involuntary escape, as by accidentally or inadvertently going beyond the liberties which are bounded by an imaginary line, and returning immediately before action brought, the sheriff is not liable.[41] A bond for the liberties restrains the prisoner within the liberties established by law for the time being.[42] This contemplates the right of the legislature to alter the prison limits, and such alteration does not impair the obligation of a bond previously given.[43]

4. Removal of Prisoner From Prison by Legal Process. The removal of a prisoner from the prison or the jail liberties by virtue of a valid legal process which affords justification to the officer taking him is not an escape.[44] Thus it is not an escape to take a prisoner who is imprisoned on execution in a civil suit away from the jail liberties on a habeas corpus.[45] But if the sheriff suffers his prisoner to get out of his custody, except in obedience to the requirements of the writ, or goes with him out of the way, for the accommodation of the prisoner, it will be an escape.[46]

5. Discharge of Prisoner — a. In General. A sheriff has no power to discharge a debtor from prison of his own will; but such a discharge is an escape.[47] To relieve a sheriff from liability the discharge must be made either with the consent of the creditor,[48] by valid order of court,[49] by act of the legislature,[50] or under circumstances authorized by statute.[51]

b. By Order of Court. In an action against a sheriff for an escape it is a defense for him that a valid order for the discharge of the prisoner has been made,[52] although it has never been formally served on him.[53] If the court making the order had jurisdiction, the sheriff is justified in obeying it, although it may have been for an insufficient cause, or founded on an irregular proceeding.[54] But if the court had not jurisdiction, the order of discharge is void, and the sheriff is liable for his act in discharging the prisoner.[55] Hence to protect the sheriff either the order of discharge must show the facts giving the court jurisdiction,[56] or it must be made to appear by proof aliunde that the court had jurisdiction to make the order.[57]

6. Constructive Escape. The whole doctrine of escapes rests upon the notion that there should be an imprisonment of the party within the proper limits,[58] and the fact that a person is at liberty to go where he pleases without any restraint, acting or ready to act upon him, either physically or morally, seems to exclude the notion of imprisonment.[59] The law has therefore adjudged that where a party imprisoned is allowed any liberty or authority incompatible with the notion of custody, not merely salva et arcta custodia, but of any custody at all, it shall be deemed an escape.[60] Thus at common law, if the sheriff be arrested and committed to the county jail, it is an escape, for he cannot be imprisoned in a jail, of which he has the custody.[61] On the same principle, if a jailer is committed to his own jail and no new keeper is appointed, it is an escape of the jailer for which the sheriff is liable; [62] but it is not an escape of the other prisoners, if they are in fact kept in custody.[63] So it is asserted to be an escape, if the sheriff make a prisoner of the jailer, and give him the keys.[64] And if a sheriff intrust a prisoner with the keys to the prison, it is an escape, for no man can be his own jailer.[65] But the correctness of the doctrine of constructive escapes has been denied, as being inapplicable to cases arising under a statute giving prisoners the benefit of the prison bounds.[66]

D. Liability — 1. Of Sheriff or Jailer to Creditor — a. In General. It is the keeper of the jail who is liable for an escape; where a sheriff is held liable, he is held qua jailer and not qua sheriff.[67] Therefore, where the sheriff is not the keeper or jailer, and has no control over the jail, he is not liable for an escape.[68] It has been held that a sheriff is not liable for the negligent escape of a debtor committed from another county.[69] The responsibilities of a sheriff are the same whether a prisoner is arrested under federal or state process after the prisoner has been committed.[70]

b. After Taking Bond For Liberties. A bond given to entitle a prisoner to the liberties of the prison yard is in effect a substitute for the custody of the sheriff, and, if regularly taken and allowed, it discharges the sheriff from any further responsibility for the prisoner's remaining in his custody.[71] Such a bond is assignable;[72] and if the sheriff refuse to assign it to the creditor, on request, after breach of condition, an action on the case will lie against him.[73]

c. For Escape of Prisoner Received From Predecessor. The sheriff who receives the public jail from his predecessor, although without a deed of assignment, is responsible from that period for the safe-keeping of prisoners there, as if they had been originally committed to his custody.[74] And if a new sheriff receives a prisoner from his predecessor he is answerable for his escape, although a voluntary escape may have existed in the time of his predecessor.[75]

2. Of Jailer to Sheriff. A sheriff has a right to take a bond from the jailer to indemnify him for all losses to which he may be subjected by the escape of a prisoner, while in the custody of the jailer;[76] but without a bond of indemnity the jailer is liable to the sheriff only for want of fidelity or due care in the discharge of his duty.[77]

E. Defenses — 1. In General. It may be deduced as the rule from the earlier cases on the subject that nothing but the act of God or the public enemy will relieve a sheriff from liability for the escape from jail of an execution debtor.[78] But under the new and enlightened systems prevailing at the present day most of this law is practically obsolete.[79] A sheriff is not to be held conclusively liable as for an escape upon proof that he had taken or allowed the debtor to be out of jail, but he may show the circumstances which induced him so to act, and from such circumstances it may be determined whether the absence of the prisoner from the jail was but temporary and for justifiable and good cause, or was a mere indulgence or privilege granted the prisoner.[80] It has been held not a good defense that no prison fees were paid, even where it appeared that the prisoner was not able to pay such fees,[81] that the liberties were undefined by visible boundaries and monuments,[82] that the prisoner had license to go at large from plaintiff[83]

or his attorney,[84] that the prisoner forcibly broke jail,[85] that a satisfaction piece turned out to be a forgery,[86] that the pleadings were amended to enhance damages,[87] that plaintiff declared generally as in custody instead of declaring specially that he was in close custody,[88] that the order for bail was rescinded after it had been delivered to the sheriff and executed by him,[89] that after being apprised of the escape plaintiff delayed unreasonably to call for an assignment of the bond,[90] or that the prisoner was by law privileged from arrest.[91] But it is a good defense that an officer acted under an order of the court enlarging the limits, and that the prisoner was within those limits,[92] that one of two joint debtors was released because the other was discharged by the execution plaintiff,[93] or that the escape has been procured by fraud.[94]

2. Recapture, Return, or Death of Prisoner — a. On Escape From Mesne Process. At common law the sheriff might, if he pleased, suffer a prisoner in his custody upon mesne process to go at large without sureties, but it was at his own peril; when, however, he had suffered such prisoner to go at large, he might retake him at any time before return of the writ. And if he had the body in court upon the return of the writ, it was a good defense to an action for an escape.[95] But where a debtor arrested on mesne process, escaped after judgment, hisreturn before the issue of execution was no defense.[96]

b. On Escape From Final Process. If an officer suffer a debtor to escape after an arrest on a capias ad satisfaciendum, he is liable even though he have him in court on return-day.[97] In criminal cases there is no distinction between Contract of release.— The court says in Van Wormer v. Van Voast, 10 Wend. (N. escape from mesne and final process. The sheriff is answerable to the state, and the rights of the people demand a recapture.[98]

c. When Escape Is Voluntary. The general rule is that after a voluntary escape from custody and final process, the sheriff cannot retake the prisoner or receive him back without plaintiff's consent.[99] Nor will the voluntary return of the prisoner prevent the liability of the sheriff for the escape.[1] If a sheriff discharges a prisoner on the promise of another to pay his fine, and the fine is not paid, he cannot rearrest the prisoner, but is liable for the fine.[2]

d. When Escape Is Negligent. In case of a negligent escape, the jailer has a right to retake the prisoner on fresh pursuit, and return him to his former custody,[3] even where the negligence is occasioned by a misunderstanding of law;[4] and if he does so before action brought by the creditor for the escape, he is excused.[5] So the voluntary return of the prisoner after such escape and before action brought is equivalent to a retaking on fresh pursuit.[6] But the recapture on fresh pursuit, or the voluntary return, should be made before suit is brought for the escape.[7]

e. Under Statutes Granting Liberties on Bond. The statutes relative to jail liberties have not altered the common law as to the liability of sheriffs for escapes, or taken away their common-law rights as to fresh pursuit and recapture; and if a prisoner, who has given to the sheriff a bond for the liberties, voluntarily goes

What is a commencement of suit.— Where a prisoner on execution, admitted to the liberties of the jail, went beyond them on a Sunday, and plaintiff, before he returned, on the same day, sued out a capias against the sheriff for the escape and delivered it to the coroner, it was not such a commencement of a suit against the sheriff as would prevent his pleading a voluntary return before suit brought. Van Vechten v. Paddock, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 178, 7 Am. Dec. 303. A suit is not commenced unless the writ is served on the sheriff while the prisoner was actually off the limits. Carruth v. Church, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 504. But where a capais ad respondendum against a sheriff was delivered to the wife of the coroner at his house, the coroner being then absent, while the prisoner was actually off the limits, although he immediately thereafter returned, it was a sufficient commencement of the action to make the sheriff liable for the escape. beyond the limits, his bond is forfeited and the sheriff may retake him on fresh pursuit, and recommit him to custody, or bring an action on the bond.[8]

3. Defects in Jail. While it has been held that no action will lie against a prison keeper for the escape of a prisoner through the insufficiency of the jail and without negligence on the keeper's part,[9] the general rule is that a defect in the jail will not constitute a good defense.[10] And the sheriff has been held for an escape, although there was no jail at all in the county.[11]

4. Insolvency of Prisoner. The insolvency of the prisoner is no defense to an action against a sheriff for an escape.[12] If available at all, it is only by way of evidence in mitigation of damages,[13] and this has been denied.[14]

F. Actions — 1. Right of Action — a. In General. By the common law, arrest under a capias ad satisfaciendum is satisfaction, and if there is an escape, plaintiff has no remedy but to sue the sheriff.[15] To redress this hardship the statute of 8 & 9 Wm. III[16] which is of force in many of the United States was passed, under which the creditor, in case of an escape, might either retake defendant on a new capias ad satisfaciendum, or sue out a fieri facias.[17] Under the statutes allowing a prisoner in execution the benefit of the prison bounds on giving security, plaintiff may either retake him, or proceed against his security; or, in case the security shall prove deficient, against the sheriff, who is ultimately liable for an escape.[18] Under the act of Wm. III[19] plaintiff may have a capias ad satisfaciendum or a fieri facias. If he elects the first the second is relinquished.[20] So under the Prison Bounds Act, if plaintiff resorts to the bond, he cannot have the fieri facias,[21] and if he retakes and imprisons defendant, the bond is discharged.[22]

b. Waiver of Right of Action. What will amount to a waiver of the right to sue the officer depends on circumstances. For a creditor's attorney to appear and protest against a discharge,[23] or to resist an application for the benefit of the insolvent laws,[24] have been held not to amount to a waiver. Where a defendant detained under mesne process escapes and the sheriff obtains leave to appear and defend the original suit, and judgment is recovered on a declaration against the original defendant, plaintiff does not thereby elect to consider defendant in custody, or to discharge the sheriff, for the proceeding only determines the extent of the sheriff's liability.[25]

2. Form of Action — a. By Creditor Against Sheriff. Where the statute has not provided a different form of remedy, case is the only form of action which can be brought against a sheriff for the escape of a party committed to his custody.[26]

The statutes, however, frequently authorize an action of debt for the escape of a party committed upon an execution from a court of record.[27] In some states a sheriff is liable to an attachment where by his negligence and carelessness he suffers a prisoner to escape, and the injured party need not be driven to his action for an escape.[28] The action of debt given by the statute does not take away the common-law right of suing in case, but is a cumulative remedy.[29]

b. By Sheriff Against Jailer. Where a deputy sheriff or jailer permits an escape, the usual course for the sheriff is to resort to his bond;[30] and if he has omitted to take one the jailer is only answerable in assumpsit on his implied undertaking to serve the sheriff with diligence and fidelity.[31]

3. Persons Entitled to Sue. Unless plaintiff could have maintained the original action against the prisoner, no action can be maintained for an escape on mesne process.[32] Furthermore the only party entitled to sue is the one at whose suit the prisoner escaping is shown to have been arrested or charged in execution.[33]

4. Venue.[34] An action for an escape from prison in one county will lie in such county, although the judgment on which the suit against the prisoner was founded is of record in another county.[35]

5. Pleading[36] — a. Complaint or Declaration. In an action for escape, the complaint or declaration should contain substantive allegations showing that the prisoner escaped,[37] with the permission,[38] or through the negligence,[39] of the sheriff. An escape from the custody of the deputy sheriff may be declared on as

Under the New York code a complaint is sufficient which states all the facts essential to the common-law action of debt and prays judgment for the amount of the judgment on which the prisoner was committed. St. p. 240, § 1, provides that debtors shall be discharged on oath, unless the court, on rendering judgment, decides that the cause of action accrued from the wilful and malicious act of the debtor, and that a minute of such decision be inserted in the execution. Hence a declaration must allege that there was such a minute, and pleading over will not cure the omission. Barber v. Chase, 3 Vt. 340.

an escape from the sheriff.[40] Where a commitment has been alleged, such allegation will be considered as including all facts necessary to a legal commitment.[41]

b. Plea or Answer. The allegation that the sheriff permitted the escape should be denied either generally or specifically,[42] or by the insertion of an averment in the answer which, if true, would be inconsistent, or in conflict, with such allegation.[43] Each defense in an answer which, by its terms, is declared to be "a further and distinct defense" must be complete in itself, and cannot be aided by a resort to other parts of the answer to which it contains no reference in terms or by necessary implication.[44] A plea of recaption or return should show a detention down to the commencement of the action, or a legal discharge from such detention.[45] In case discharge is pleaded, it must be shown how the discharge was made.[46]

c. Demurrer. An objection which goes merely to the form and not to the substance of a pleading must be raised by special demurrer and cannot be taken advantage of on general demurrer.[47]

6. Variance. In an action against a sheriff for an escape a variance as to the amount of debt alleged to be due by the prisoner is not material, and will not defeat the action.[48]

7. Evidence[49] — a. In General. An actual escape must be proved by plaintiff;[50] and it is competent for the sheriff to prove that there was no negligence on his part, that he used due means to retake the prisoner,[51] or that the prisoner voluntarily returned before suit brought.[52] In proving the insufficiency of bail, it is not necessary for plaintiff to show that he proceeded to judgment against the bail without success.[53] Evidence on the part of the plaintiff that the prisoner was seen at large walking in the street is prima facie sufficient to entitle him to recover.[54]

b. Admissibility Under Pleadings. A voluntary return cannot be shown under the general issue,[55] but a defense of fresh pursuit may be.[56] Likewise it may be shown on the general issue, in mitigation of damages, that the debtor had no property.[57] Where there is a plea of voluntary return to a single count for escape, plaintiff may, without a new assignment, prove a single escape on any day before suit brought, and defendant may then show a return into custody before suit, and apply his plea to such return;[58] but if plaintiff has not newly assigned, defendant cannot show a previous escape and return as a defense.[59]

the sheriff on his liability independently of his bond, plaintiff, on proving the escape, is entitled to recover the whole amount of the debt and costs,[61] and interest.[62] But where the action is case, only the special damages occasioned by the escape can be recovered.[63] The sheriff's sureties are liable only for the damages actually sustained.[64] Where a state statute makes a sheriff civilly liable for the safe-keeping of prisoners, and any party aggrieved may sue on his bond in the name of the state, the United States may recover expenses of the arrest and keeping of the prisoner, and money expended in recapturing him.[65]

(II) In Action by Creditor Against County. In an action on the case against a county for the escape of an execution debtor by reason of defects in the jail, the special damage which plaintiff has sustained by his escape is the amount to be recovered;[66] and such damage may amount to the whole debt with interest and costs.[67]

(III) In Action by Sheriff Against County. The damages recovered against a sheriff for an escape in consequence of there being no jail is the measure of damages in an action by the sheriff against the county commissioners for not providing a jail.[68]

b. Mitigation of Damages. In an action on the case for an escape the defendant may show, in mitigation of damages, that the prisoner was insolvent or wholly destitute of property;[69] and this whether the escape was voluntary or negligent,[70] although general reputation of insolvency is not admissible.[71] But where the action is debt, or in the nature of debt, the defendant cannot show the insolvency of the debtor in mitigation of damages.[72]

9. Trial.[73] The general rules relating to the trial of civil actions generally are applicable to actions for escape.[74]

10. Judgment[75] and Enforcement Thereof.[76] So far as the judgment and its enforcement is concerned, the general rules on the subject apply.[77] Since a sheriff is answerable only for the original judgment, for the non-payment of which the prisoner was committed, he should have the benefit of any conditions upon which such judgment was payable, and the judgment against him in such a case should not be for a sum payable absolutely.[78] Nor can the sheriff be committed to jail for failure to pay the judgment rendered against him.[79] The court will stay execution on the judgment to allow the sheriff time to bring his action on the bond taken for the jail liberties.[80]

Custody and care pending preliminary examination.— Under Mo. Laws (1891), p. 146, § 11, providing that the sheriff, marshal, or other officer who shall have in custody or under his charge any person "undergoing municipality therefor.[86] The statutes sometimes themselves fix the compensation and allow for expenses,[87] and sometimes they leave it to be fixed by the county board, county court, or some other authority.[88] In determining the right to compensation and reimbursement, and the liability of the county or other body therefor, the general rule is that the sheriff takes the office with all its burdens, and subject to the power of the legislature to add new duties, and he can recover no other compensation than that which the law allows;[89] and the same is true of the warden of the penitentiary.[90] A court has no authority to direct a jailer not to receive a prisoner convicted of crime, except upon condition of bond being given for the prison charges; nor can the jailer require bond for their payment, except in civil cases.[91] Where the sheriff has contracted with the county to keep all the prisoners for a gross sum payable monthly, relinquishing to the county all fees allowed by law for such services, he cannot repudiate the contract, after it has been observed by the parties for several years, and recover the excess of the fees over the stipulated compensation, on the ground that the parties, in making the contract, acted under a mistake as to the constitutionality of the statute.[92]

2. Particular Services and Expenses[93]— a. In General. Where the statute merely allows a certain sum for the boarding of each prisoner, or allows the actual cost of boarding, the sheriff is not entitled to any additional compensation for services in keeping the jail or looking after the prisoners, as this is a part of his general duty.[94] He is entitled, however, to compensation or reimbursement for of right, to demand reimbursement for expenses incurred in recapturing him, or compensation for services performed in effecting the recapture.[4]

b. Jailer, Turnkeys, and Guards. In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, the sheriff's salary and fees cover his services as jailer, and he is not entitled to recover additional compensation therefor.[5] If he employs a jailer or turnkey, the expense of his services and board must be borne by him and not by the county,[6] unless a statute provides otherwise.[7] There are cases, however, in which the county has been held liable, even in the absence of a statute, for the expense of extra guards necessary to keep a prisoner safely;[8] and such expense is often allowed by statute.[9] The jailer cannot himself be appointed or act as guard and claim compensation therefor.[10]

Compensation not allowed.— It has been held, however, that a statute authorizing the sheriff to appoint a jailer, for whose acts he shall be responsible, does not entitle the sheriff to recover compensation for the jailer's services (Crossen v. Wasco County, 6 Oreg. 215); and that a statute providing that "for any service rendered by an officer wherein no fees are allowed by this act, nor any other act or provision by law, such officer shall be allowed a reasonable compensation therefor," does not apply to payment for services of a jailer hired by the sheriff (Sweetwater County v. Johnson, 2 Wyo. 259).

Necessity.— Under a statute providing that the sheriff shall have a jailer and as many guards as the county commissioners may deem necessary, who shall receive such compensation as the county commissioners may allow, the sheriff, to entitle him to an allowance for per diem paid by him for the services of a jailer, without previous authority for employing him, must show that the services of the jailer were necessary for the care and custody of the jail or of prisoners therein. 10. Vinsant v. Auditor, 1 Bush (Ky.) 72, holding that it is the official duty of a jailer to keep prisoners safely without a guard, that if the jailer be directed by order of the court to summon a guard to assist him, it is his official duty to superintend the guard so summoned, and that he cannot summon himself, or be legally appointed by the court, to act as guard, and that if he does so act, he is not entitled to compensation for his services.

to be allowed.[12] Where the statute makes the county liable for the maintenance of prisoners and requires the sheriff to board them, without fixing the compensation, he is entitled to recover the actual cost of boarding them,[13] but not for his personal services or for profits in his favor.[14] An act increasing the "fees" of county officers a certain per cent does not increase the compensation allowed the sheriff for boarding prisoners.[15] Where the statute fixes the amount to be allowed for boarding prisoners it cannot be changed, nor the sheriff deprived thereof, by the county commissioners.[16] If the circumstances are such that a prisoner in the custody of a sheriff cannot be confined in the jail, the county is liable for necessaries furnished him elsewhere.[17]

d. Insane Prisoners.[18] Since a court has no authority to commit insane prisoners as such to a jail, the presumption is that they were committed as prisoners for some offense, and therefore the sheriff is entitled to no extra compensation for their care.[19]

e. Change of Compensation. The state constitutions often prohibit an increase or diminution of the salary of a public officer during his term of office;[20] but it has been held that an increase or reduction in the allowance for boarding of prisoners does not come within such a provision,[21] unless the constitution uses a broader term than "salary." [22] A constitutional prohibition of any law increasing or diminishing the salary or emoluments of a public officer during his term is a limitation on the power of the legislature alone, and does not prevent the court from making changes in the emoluments of the sheriff as authorized by the statute in force at the time of his election.[23] Under a statute reducing the compensation of sheriffs for boarding prisoners in jail but declaring that it shall not apply to any sheriff in office at the time of the adoption of the constitution then in force, but shall be in operation after the expiration of the terms of such sheriffs, a sheriff who has been appointed since the passage of the act, to fill the unexpired term of one who was in office at the time of its passage, cannot claim the benefit of the proviso.[24]

3. Persons Entitled — a. In General. The sheriff, and not his deputy or jailer, is entitled to receive and collect the fees and other compensation for services as jailer, and for boarding and guarding prisoners in the jail,[25] unless the statute provides otherwise.[26] Where, by law, an allowance is made to a sheriff for the maintenance and care of prisoners, an individual who furnishes such care and maintenance must look to the sheriff for his pay, and not to the county.[27]

b. De Facto Jailer. It has been held that one who acts as jailer under color of title is entitled to the amount allowed him by the court for boarding prisoners, although he might not be entitled to fees for committing and releasing prisoners.[28]

4. Forfeiture of Compensation. Where, through negligence or misconduct, persons employed to guard prisoners have allowed them to escape, they are not entitled to full compensation,[29] and it has also been held that a jailer who allows prisoners to escape forfeits his fees for keeping them.[30]

B. Who Liable [31] — 1. State, County, City, or Town. In England, by an early statute, the expense of supporting prisoners in the common jails was made a charge upon the respective shires.[32] At present, under the Prison Act of 1877, the expenses incurred in respect of the prisons, to which the act applies, and of the prisoners therein, are no longer chargeable to the county, but are to be defrayed out of moneys provided for that purpose by parliament.[33] In the United States the statutes of the various states upon the subject impose the liability for the maintenance and care of prisons, according to the circumstances, upon the state,[34] the county,[35]

In Louisiana a parish has no right to charge for the mere use of its jail to incarcerate prisoners sent from an adjacent parish under an order of the district judge, issued under Rev. St. § 2839, where it has, through its authorized agent, given consent to the use, and has acquiesced by that consent in the execution of the order. Caddo Parish v. Bossier Parish, 42 La. In Tennessee, since Shannon Code, § 7370, requires the sheriff, as custodian of the jail, to receive all prisoners committed by authority of law, he is entitled to compensation from the county for the board of prisoners or city, town, or other municipality.[36] In no case can the state be made liable for expenses connected with jails merely by implication.[37] The county is generally liable for the care and maintenance of its own prisons and of prisoners confined therein for offenses committed within the county.[38] The county is also liable, as a rule, to the sheriff for the board of prisoners committed under authority of a statute, in pursuance of a city, village, or town ordinance, although it may be entitled to reimbursement from the city, village, or town.[39] If a city or town has no jail of its own, it is generally liable for the expense of keeping its prisoners in the county jail.[40] If a county refuses to pay for the necessary guard-sentenced by a justice to labor in the workhouse during the time they are kept in the jail from the time of their sentence until removed to the workhouse by the superintendent, commitments having been issued by the justice to the sheriff to take charge of the prisoners during such time, the justice not being required to take them to the workhouse. In Kentucky, under St. (1899) § 1730, fixing the liability of a city for the keep of prisoners confined for a breach of its by-laws or ordinances, and for the violation of a statute where the city gets the benefit of a fine, and section 3155, providing that all fines and penalties collected in a police court shall be for the benefit of the city, a city is liable for the keep of all prisoners convicted in the police court where a fine is imposed and the prisoners are sent to the county jail, although section 3151 forbids prisoners, for whose maintenance the city would be liable, from being confined except in the city workhouse. A county jailer cannot refuse to receive prisoners committed to his custody by a judgment of the police court of a city, where the court had jurisdiction to try the offense of the person charged therewith, although the commitment should have been to the city workhouse. Lexington v. Gentry, 116 Ky. 528, 76 S. W. 404, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 738. Under section 1730 a city is not liable to the sheriff of the county for the keep of prisoners committed to his care either for appearance or under sentence, where a fine constitutes no part of the punishment. Lexington v. Gentry, supra.

In Virginia, Code, § 3532, fixing the fees a jailer is entitled to for receiving and supporting prisoners, applies only to payments out of the state treasury for receiving and supporting prisoners charged with crime, and not to payments out of a city's treasury to the keeper of the city jail for receiving and supporting prisoners charged with violation of its ordinances. In California, under Pen. Code, § 1611, providing that the sheriff must receive all persons committed to jail by competent authority, it is immaterial, to the liability of the city to the county for board of prisoners, that ing of prisoners, the sheriff may pay therefor and recover as for money paid for the benefit of the county.[41] The cost of special guards for prisoners coming from different counties should be shared by the several counties.[42]

2. As Between Counties or Towns. If by reason of a change of venue, or because of the want of a jail or its insufficiency, a prisoner from one county is confined in the jail of another county, the former county is either directly liable to the sheriff for his board and other expenses of his keep and for guarding him, or else the latter county is so liable with the right to recover therefor from the former.[43] The liability as between towns depends upon the statutes in the par-

In Indiana, under the metropolitan police law (Acts (1897), p. 93, c. 59, as amended by Acts (1901), p. 24, c. 18), requiring the council in certain cities to provide, at the expense of the city, necessary accommodations for police station houses, and to provide food for any persons detained in any such station houses when such food is deemed necessary by the officer in charge, it is mandatory, and not merely optional, with a city, to provide a station house, and to provide food for any person detained therein when deemed necessary by the officer in charge. Where a city operating under such law had no station house itself, and committed all prisoners arrested for the violation of city ordinances and penal statutes of the state to the county jail and the care and custody of the sheriff, who furnished them with board and other accommodations during the period intervening between their incarceration and trial, or discharge upon abandonment of the prosecution, it was liable to such sheriff for the board so furnished. Kokomo v. Harness, 35 Ind. App. 384, 74 N. E. 270.

Demand.— Since the metropolitan police law (Acts (1897), p. 93, c. 59, as amended by Acts (1901), p. 23, c. 18), requiring cities to provide food for persons detained in a station house when the same is deemed necessary by the officer in charge, creates an implied contract on the part of the city to reimburse a sheriff who boards prisoners committed by the city to the county jail to await trial, and makes it the legal duty of the city to pay for such board, no demand is necessary on the part of the sheriff as a condition precedent to suing the city for the value of the board furnished by him. Where prisoners were sent by military officers under the Reconstruction Laws from one county to be confined in the jail of another, the jailer having custody could recover for their support from the county from which they were sent, the same as he could have done had the commitment been under civil authority. Gates v. Johnson County, 36 Tex. 144.

Medical attendance on prisoners from another county.— The county from which a prisoner is carried has been held liable for necessary medical attention. Hart v. Howard County, 44 Ark. 560. In Kansas, however, under the criminal code giving discretionary ticular state, the town in which the jail is located being generally liable to the keeper, with the right to recover from the town from which the prisoner was sent, or in which he had his settlement or domicile.[44]

3. Liability of Prisoner.[45] An action cannot be maintained against a prisoner to recover the price of his board, although the prisoner requested it to be furnished, for it is the duty of the prison authorities to furnish such food.[46] So also the expenses of a guard must be paid by the county and not by the prisoners who were guarded.[47]

4. In Bastardy Proceedings. Where defendant in a prosecution or proceeding for bastardy is imprisoned, the expense of keeping him falls upon the county or other municipality, and not upon the complainant or prosecutrix nor upon defendant.[48]

C. Allowance and Payment.[49] The statutes sometimes expressly provide for the allowance of the expense of the care and maintenance of prisons and prisoners by the county board, county court, or some other tribunal, and such provisions must be complied with.[50] Under some statutes the allowance by the board is conclusive.[51] When an allowance has once been made by a duly organized board, power to allow compensation for medical attendance furnished its prisoners, a county in whose jail prisoners of another county are confined is not entitled to recover of the latter county for attention to such prisoners. Smith County v. Osborne County, 29 Kan. 72. In New Hampshire, under Gen. Laws, c. 285, §§ 4, 11, when a prisoner is removed from one county to another, a physician who attended a prisoner at the request of the jailer of the county to which he was removed has a cause of action therefor against the county from which he was removed. Perkins v. Grafton County, 67 N. H. 282, 29 Atl. 541.

Amount of recovery.— Only the amount fixed by law can be recovered from the county liable. Therefore, when the county of W received into its jail for safe-keeping certain prisoners of the county of M, paying its sheriff more than the statutory compensation for dieting, it was held, in an action by the former to recover of the latter the amount so paid, that the recovery should be limited to the amount fixed by law. 50. In Idaho, under Sess. Laws (1899), pp. 405, 406, providing that county officers shall at the end of each quarter file with the clerk of the county commissioners a sworn statement, with proper vouchers of all expenses incurred and fees received to be audited by the board, a sheriff must file such vouchers before his claim for the board and support of prisoners can be allowed. Mombert v. Bannock County, 9 Ida. 470, 75 Pac. 239.

In Kansas, under section 331 of the criminal code, the board of county commissioners may allow a moderate compensation for medical service, fuel, bedding, and menial attendance furnished for prisoners committed to the county jail, which shall be paid out of the county treasury; but the allowance of such claims is wholly discretionary with the county board, and the liability of the county for the same can only arise upon an order made by the county commissioners when duly convened and acting as a board. Hendricks v. Chautauqua County, 35 Kan. 483, 11 Pac. 450. And see Roberts v. Pottawatomie County Com'rs, 10 Kan. 29.

The Wisconsin statutes relating to the compensation of sheriffs for the maintenance of persons confined in jail (Rev. St. §§ 4947, 4950), clearly contemplate that a sheriff shall keep accurate accounts of all charges and expenses therefor and present them to the county board to be audited, and if he fails to do so he can recover from the county only such expenses as he is able to show by clear and satisfactory evidence that he actually incurred, and only such as are reasonable. Deissner v. Waukesha County, 95 Wis. 588, 70 N. W. 668.

51. Cicotte v. Wayne County, 59 Mich. 509, 26 N. W. 686, holding that under Const. art. 10, § 10, and Howell Annot. St. § 9055, the board of supervisors in other counties, and the board of auditors in Wayne county, had exclusive power to fix the amount pyable for it must be taken as a true statement of the facts in the case, and cannot be disturbed arbitrarily.[52] Under other statutes the allowance is to be fixed, and may be changed, by the county court or some other court,[53] and its allowance is generally conclusive.[54] Before compensation or reimbursement can be allowed a sheriff for maintenance and care of prisoners, for articles purchased by him, or for the services of a jailer or guard, the items must be affirmatively shown to be within the terms of the statute.[55] Where there is no statute on the subject reasonable charges may be allowed if it has been an established custom, and such charges will continue to be allowed until the sheriff has notice.[56] By its acts a board may ratify the doings of a sheriff in good faith and become bound to pay therefor, as where the board for a time pays for the guard of prisoners,[57] and it is no reason for disallowing the costs of the guards that the jail was sufficient of itself.[58] Where a sheriff presents bills for boarding prisoners and they are allowed at the precise sum at which he renders them, and are paid, he is estopped from making any other claim, unless he acted under duress; and the fact that he fixed the amount under protest, and accepted the allowances because he was in need of money, does not amount to duress.[59] Ordinarily the sheriff has no preference over other creditors of the county in the payment of claims for boarding prisoners and transporting them to the penitentiary.[60]

D. Actions.[61] A sheriff who is dissatisfied with the amount allowed him for maintaining prisoners may sue the county for what he claims to be a reasonable amount.[62] Where the statute gives the jailer a special action for his fees it must furnishing food to the prisoners in jails; and hence an action could not be maintained to recover more than they had allowed.

In California Penal Code, section 1611, which provides that the sheriff, for maintaining prisoners, shall be allowed a reasonable compensation "to be determined by the board of supervisors," does not make the board's determination conclusive; and, if the sheriff is dissatisfied, he may sue the county for what he claims to be a reasonable amount. Levan v. Carbon County, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 315. And the power of the courts to change the sheriff's allowance for boarding prisoners was not taken away by Const. 8. Wharton Confl. L. § 1.

Private international law embraces those universal principles of right and justice which govern the courts of one state having before them cases involving the operation and effect of the laws of another state or country. Minor Confl. L. § 3. The principles of private international law are now generally grouped under three heads, distinct but at the same time interdependent, (a) rules of nationality, (b) rights and duties of aliens, (c) the choice of the proper law to apply to questions that admit of the application of two or more national laws. Burge Col. & For. L. Introd. p. 2.

Part of our law.— International law in its widest and most comprehensive sense — including not only questions of rights between nations, governed by what has been properly called the law of nations (see INTERNATIONAL LAW, 22 Cyc. 1699); but also questions arising under what is usually called private international law, or the conflict of laws, and concerning the rights of persons within the territory and dominion of one nation, by reason of acts private or public, done within the dominions of another nation — is part of our law and must be ascertained and administered by the courts of justice as often as such questions are presented in litigation between man and man duly submitted to their dominion. Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113, 163, 16 S. Ct. 139, 40 L. ed. 95. The principles of private international law are a part of the private law of the District of Columbia. Snashall v. Metropolitan R. Co., 19 D. C. 399, 408, 10 L. R. A. 746.

"The phrase 'private international law' is liable to be misunderstood.—It is a convenient expression for such rules as, in the jurisprudence of most civilised nations, are applied, ex comitate, to the solution of questions depending upon foreign status, foreign laws, or foreign contracts." Ewing v. Ewing, 10 App. Cas. 453, 513.

Under a statute empowering certain commissioners to make, alter, and keep in repair "public" and "private" paths, the term "private paths" is held to mean "roads free and common to all who might choose to make use of them; that is to say, public ways diverging from and running across the main or principal roads or highways, commonly called 'great roads,' and not private paths exclusively appropriated for private purposes. It would be preposterous to suppose the legislature intended to vest important powers in public commissioners, to open, improve, and keep in repair, private passages or easements for the particular and exclusive benefit of one or a few individuals." The term, as used in a statute authorizing the commissioners of roads to lay out, make, and keep in repair, all such high roads, private paths, bridges, etc., as have been or shall be established by law, or as they shall judge necessary in their several parishes and districts, is synonymous with "private road." I. DEFINITION AND ORIGIN OF TERM.

A private road may be defined as a road established by public authority chiefly for the accommodation of an individual or individuals, and at his or their instance and expense.[1] In accurate legal contemplation, the term involves a contradiction. It is unknown to the common law, having its origin in American legislation, and cannot be regarded as having been employed as a substitute for the word "way" at common law.[2]

II. NATURE.

A. In General. As to the real nature of a private road there is a conflict of authority, one class of cases holding that such a road is in reality what its name implies, a "private road," [3] and another class holding that a private road is but a public road by another name, and is a term invented merely for the purposes of classification.[4]

B. Distinguished From Private Way. A private way is an incorporeal hereditament which may be created or extinguished by the acts of the owners of the servient and dominant tenements as private individuals, while the public authorities alone have the power to create or extinguish a private road.[5] term "private road," as used in Oreg. Laws, c. 50, §§ 16 and 17, authorizing the establishment of private roads over the land of an individual, without his consent, for the private use of another, means such a road as is used for private individuals only, and is not wanted for the public generally. Dec. 577, where it is said that, in accurate legal contemplation, the term "private road," which was unknown to the common law, and has its origin in American legislation, involves a contradiction, and that it was invented to distinguish a class of public roads benefiting private individuals who, instead of the public at large, should bear the expense of their establishment and maintenance.

Quasi-public.— In Cook v. Vickers, 141 N. C. 101, 53 S. E. 740, it is said that while it is true that private roads or cartways are laid out on the application of a particular individual and paid for by him, yet, since they are intended also for the use of the public generally, they are properly regarded as quasi-public and as part of the public road system.

The fact that private roads are open to the use of the public makes them public roads, and their character as public roads is unaffected by the circumstance that, in view of their situation, they are but little used, and are mainly convenient for the use of a few individuals, and such as may have occasion to visit them socially or on matters of business, nor by the circumstance that in view of such conditions the legislature may deem it just to open and maintain them at the cost of those most immediately concerned instead of the public at large. Sherman v. Buick, 32 Cal. 241, 91 Am. Dec. 577.

The name given the way does not determine its character, for if the road be called a private road or a neighborhood road, but is in fact so laid out as to give the public a right to freely use it, upon terms common to all, notwithstanding its name, it is a public one. Cozard v. Kanawha Hardwood Co., 139 N. C. 283, 51 S. E. 932, 1 L. R. A. N. S. 969, 111 Am. St. Rep. 779.

5. Allen v. Stevens, 29 N. J. L. 509.

C. Distinguished From Public Road or Highway. A private road is distinguished from a public highway, in that the expense of laying it out is not borne by the public at large, but by the individual or individuals for whose accommodation chiefly it is laid out,[6] and in that the latter is a way through the state, or from town to town, while the former is a way from public road to public road, or from a public road over a neck of land toward its extremity.[7]

III. What May Be Termini.

When the statute authorizing private roads fixes what may be termini, a road cannot be laid out except between such termini.[8] Generally the terminus a quo, as fixed by the statute, is a dwelling,[9] or farm or plantation,[10] and the other terminus is a highway [11] or some private way leading to a highway.[12]

IV. Establishment.

A. Power to Establish — 1. In General. The power to grant a private road, being an exercise of the right of eminent domain,[13] is entirely dependent upon the local statute governing the subject,[14] and can be exercised only when

Private roads are not to be understood as being synonymous with ways at common law, but as indicating a particular class of highways or public ways over which any one may pass without committing trespass. Hartley v. Vermillion, 141 Cal. 339, 348, 74 Pac. 987; Sherman v. Buick, 32 Cal. 241, 252, 91 Am. Dec. 577.

8. State v. Guilbaud, 47 N. J. L. 277 (holding that under the road act empowering the highway surveyors to lay out a private road from one's land to a mill, market, public landing, or public road, no authority exists to lay out such a road for the sole purpose of communication between two lots of the applicant); In re Sandy Lick Creek Road, 51 Pa. St. 94 (holding further that there is no authority under the statute for a private road starting with a turnpike and ending at a creek).

Not necessary to connect with highway.— Under the Connecticut statute to authorize the laying out of a private road it is not necessary that it should be connected with a highway, so as to accommodate the public as well as the petitioner, but it may be laid out where its only use is to give the petitioner access to one parcel of his land by connecting it with another. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 15 Conn. 83.

Passing over one highway to another.— Under a statute authorizing the establishment of private roads from plantations to public highways, such a road cannot be granted to pass over one public highway to another. Owings v. Worthington, 10 Gill & J. (Md.) 283.

Private road into another county.— The levy court or commissioners of one county cannot grant a private road into another county, under Acts (1824), c. 253, authorizing the granting of private roads from plantation to highways, churches, mills, etc. Owings v. Worthington, 10 Gill & J. (Md.) 283.

it has been clearly conferred by legislative enactment and under the conditions prescribed.[15]

2. Mode of Exercise. The power to establish a private road can be exercised only in the mode prescribed by the statute.[16]

3. Dependent Upon Necessity. It is generally provided by statute [17] or constitution [18] that land can be taken for a private road only in cases of necessity; and the word "necessity," when so used in constitution or statute, is given the most restricted meaning,[19] so that a private road may be granted only where it is absolutely indispensable to the applicant as a means of reaching his land.[20] If there is in existence a practicable way to and from the land[21] whether private[22] or public,[23] a case of necessity does not arise, even though such way may be less convenient than the one proposed.[24] But a statute providing that any person owning any land not having a public or private way thereto may have a private road over the land of another does not contemplate that the owner who claims to have no way to his land shall be compelled, before inviting the aid of the statute, to institute suits to determine whether he has such way,[25] but should be construed to mean that, unless a party has a way, either public or private, which is unobstructed and unquestioned, he may institute proceedings under the statute;[26] and the fact that there is an apprehension that the owners of the land over which the private way in use by the applicant is laid out may abolish the same does not change the rule.[27] The court must affirmatively find that the road proposed is a way of necessity.[28]

Compare Reynolds v. Reynolds, 15 Conn. 83, holding that if it appears from the record that a private road laid out by public authority is necessary, a decree establishing such road will not be deemed erroneous because it also appears that such road is not strictly and absolutely necessary, but convenient only, in order to enable the petitioner to have access to his land.

Under the Missouri statute it is held that no necessity for a private road exists, except where the land is inaccessible. Coberly v. Butler, 63 Mo. App. 556.

Practical necessity.— The necessity contemplated by the statute is a practical necessity, and if the applicant's outlet to the highway on his own ground or the way he now has does not afford him practical access to the highway and cannot be made to do so at a reasonable expense, then he is entitled to the establishment of the road as a necessity. Until the way is actually abolished, so that it cannot be used by an applicant as a means of access to his land, there is no such necessity as would authorize the public authorities to appropriate the private property of another to his use. Chattanooga, etc., R. Co. v. Philpot, 112 Ga. 153, 37 S. E. 181.

It is immaterial at what stage of the proceedings the court finds that the road pro-

4. CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES CONFERRING POWER. Acts conferring the power to grant private roads are in derogation of the common law and common right, and must be strictly construed.[29]

B. Proceedings Therefor — 1. NATURE. The statutory proceeding for the establishment of a private road is one having for its object the taking of the property of one person, on the ground of necessity, for the private use of another, and is therefore in invitum in derogation of the common law and of the common right.[30] It is in the nature of a civil action strictly between the petitioner and the owner or owners through whose land the road is to pass, the public at large having no interest therein.[31]

2. RIGHT TO INSTITUTE — a. In General. The statute authorizing the road determines who may institute proceedings therefor.[32] Some statutes provide that the petitioner must live [33] or be settled [34] on the land over which the private road is desired; while others provide that the petitioner must be either a resident who occupies, or a non-resident who owns, cultivated land which such road will connect with the public highway.[35]

b. Estoppel. The fact that a landowner has already instituted, but abandoned, a proceeding for a road which would have given him the desired access to a parcel of land does not estop him to institute a proceeding for a different road to such parcel, if on the first application no road was actually established.[36] Where one opens a road over his own land to a highway and afterward by deeds, without reservation of the road, conveys the lots nearest the highway to others who close the road, he is not estopped from instituting a statutory proceeding to lay such road out as a private road.[37]

3. TIME FOR INSTITUTING. A party desiring to lay out a private road to his lands, and having already a right of way to the same, is not bound to wait until his right of way expires before bringing proceeding to lay out a private way, but he may move a reasonable time in advance of the expiration of the existing easement.[38]

4. PARTIES. Where a private road is sought to be established over lands parallel to a division fence, which becomes the boundary of the road on one side, the adjoining owner is not a necessary party to the proceedings and cannot be heard to object where no part of his land or interest in the division fence is taken or damaged.[39]

5. PETITION AND BOND — a. Petition — (I) IN GENERAL. The statutes generally provide that the proceeding shall be founded on a written petition.[40]

posed is a way of necessity. Chandler v. Reading, 129 Mo. App. 63, 107 S. W. 1039. And it is held that it is enough if it appears that the court found the fact of necessity affirmatively at some stage of the proceeding, as where the finding of such fact is recited in the final judgment. (II) Notice of Presentation of. Where the statute requires a copy of the petition and a written notice of the time and place of its presentation to be served on the landowner, without prescribing the method of service, personal service thereof is indispensable,[41] and service made in any other manner will not constitute legal service,[42] although in fact it accomplishes the purpose of notifying the landowner.[43] It is held, however, that the giving of the notice is not an act relating to the subject-matter of the proceeding,[44] and that the landowner by a general appearance subjects himself to the jurisdiction of the tribunal to which the petition is presented.[45]

(III) Requisites — (A) In General. The petition which is the foundation of the proceeding must of course contain all the necessary statutory averments to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for;[46] but the petition is not required to be so formal and precise as ordinary pleadings, and will be upheld if it contains enough to show with reasonable certainty the jurisdictional facts.[47]

(B) Averring Necessity. If the statute or constitution requires that the proposed road must be a way of necessity, that fact must of course be alleged in the petition;[48] but the petition is sufficient in this regard if it either follows the language of the statute or constitution, as the case may be,[49] or alleges facts which show the necessity of the proposed road with reasonable certainty.[50]

Petition held good against collateral attack. — Mo. Const. (1875) art. 2, § 20, prohibits the taking of private land for a private way without consent of the owner except for "private ways of necessity." Rev. St. (1889) § 8559, authorizes the taking of private land for a private road on a petition asking for a "private way" over the land to the public road, and showing that "no public road passes through or touches" the land. It was held that an allegation that no "public road passes through or touches" the land will render a petition under the

(c) Naming Person to Be Benefited. The petition should state, in terms and truly, the person for whose benefit the projected road is to be.[51]

(d) Designating Route. The petition must state such a road or way as the tribunal to which it is presented has authority to establish,[52] describing with reasonable certainty the precise route desired.[53]

(iv) Waiver of Objections. Defects in the petition consisting merely of informalities of statement must be deemed waived, when raised for the first time after the jury has been impaneled.[54] So too an objection that the petition was not sworn to is waived by proceeding to trial without objection.[55]

b. Bond. If a bond required by the statute to invest a tribunal with jurisdiction to act on a petition to establish a private road does not substantially comply with such statute, no jurisdiction of the proceedings is acquired.[56] And the defect in the bond cannot, at a late stage in the proceeding, be cured by filing an amended bond.[57] But the validity of the bond is not affected by inaccurate recitals as to the petition, if the petition is sufficiently identified,[58] nor can the validity of the bond be attacked collaterally.[59]

6. Commissioners, Viewers, Jurors, Surveyors, and Like Officers — a. Who May Act — (i) In General. Under a statute providing that one of the viewers appointed shall be a surveyor, it is not necessary that the court should appoint a county surveyor.[60]

(ii) Disqualification — (a) In General. Where the statute provides that a member of a tribunal laying out a private road shall be disinterested, sons or nephews of the petitioner are disqualified to act.[61] But a person is not disqualified to act as juror by having served in previous ineffectual proceedings taken by the same person to obtain another right of way to the same land.[62]

Allegations of petition held to allege sufficient to show sufficient reason for road.— Acts (1901), p. 950, c. 729, § 13, provides that any party, desiring a cartway from his premises over the lands of his neighbor to the public road, may file his petition, etc., and if sufficient reason be shown the same will be laid out. Plaintiffs alleged that the way out from their premises was very rough, and increased the distance of travel by about three miles. As to the termini of the route, it is sufficient if they are designated in the petition with reasonable accuracy. Parmley v. White, 35 N. J. L. 203; Miller's Case, 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 35. See also In re Kyle's Road, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 514, holding that, although no general rule can be laid down as to the definiteness with which the termini must be designated, yet where there is a terminus a quo and a terminus ad quem, both well known, and the distance between them is not much more than a mile, the maxim "that is regarded as certain which can be made certain" is applicable.

(B) Waiver of. Where the owner of land over which a private road is granted is present when the application is made to the commissioner's court, and a jury to assess damages is appointed at his request and without objection to the persons selected, it will be presumed, although not shown by the record, that they were competent jurors.[63]

b. Appointment — (I) In General. It is no objection to the appointment of a committee to lay out a private road that a committee has been previously appointed on the same petition, and has made a report which had been set aside.[64]

(II) Notice of Application — (A) Necessity. It is generally provided by statute or court rule that notice shall be given to the owner of the land over which the proposed road is to be laid out of the time and place when the application for appointment of viewers will be made.[65]

(B) Waiver Regarding. One who participates in the selection of viewers,[66] or delays in making the objection until the report of the viewers is filed,[67] waives any want of notice of the intended application.

(III) Order of Appointment. The order appointing viewers of a proposed private road must recite the jurisdictional facts,[68] and whenever it fails so to do the proceeding should be dismissed without prejudice.[69]

c. Hearing Before Viewers as to Necessity For Road — (I) Notice of. Personal notice must be given to the owner or owners of the land, over which the proposed road is to pass, of the time and place of the meeting of the viewers, or other like officers, to determine the question as to the necessity of such road.[70] But one who, although not legally notified, appeared at the hearing and contested on the merits, will be deemed to have waived the objection of want of sufficient notice.[71]

(II) Issues. The question involved on the hearing is the necessity of the proposed road.[72]

(III) Evidence [73] — (A) As to Another Existing Way. The fact that the petitioner has secured another way for his own use is relevant on the question of the necessity of a proposed private road; [74] and, like other facts, may be established by testimony as to what the applicant himself has said on the subject.[75]

(B) Expert. As to whether expert testimony is admissible on the question of the necessity of a proposed private road, there is a conflict of authority, it being held in one jurisdiction that such testimony is admissible,[76] and in another jurisdiction that as the subject is not one involving a peculiar language, the opinions of witnesses are inadmissible.[77]

d. Report or Return of Viewers — (I) Where to Be Made. The viewers must report to the next term of court after they are appointed to allow time for filing exceptions to the report, if necessary.[78]

(II) Essentials — (A) In General. The report of viewers must substantially conform with the petition and order.[79]

(B) As to Road — (1) Necessity. A statutory requirement that viewers of a private road shall report whether the same is necessary cannot be dispensed with, and their report is fatally defective if it fails to set forth that the road is necessary.[80] But a return for private use,[81] or that there is occasion for the road,[82] is a sufficient compliance with the law as to the necessity of the road.

(2) Location. To lay out a private road partly on a public road is fatal to the report of viewers,[83] although the records of the court do not show that a formal order had issued to open the public road.[84]

(3) Width. The report of viewers or other like officers must show the width of the road which they adopted as a basis for the computation of damages,[85] unless the statute under which the proceeding was instituted itself provides that the road shall be of a given width, and does not expressly require it to be specified in the report.[86]

(4) Termini — (a) In General. The terminal points of the road as contained in the report of viewers must correspond with those stated in the petition and order;[87] but it is sufficient if there be substantial conformity in this particular.[88]

(b) Certainty Regarding. The report of viewers or like officers will be sustained, against the objection that it fails to fix the termini of the road, if the report[89] or a draft which by the statute is made an essential part of the report,[90] locates the termini with reasonable certainty, mathematical precision not being required.

(5) Directing Kind of Fences to Be Erected. It is not necessary for the committee laying out a private road to direct in their report the particular kind of fences the petitioners shall build in the places designated for that purpose, where the law furnishes a sufficient guide on the subject.[91]

(6) Limiting Duration of Road. A declaration in the return, in direct contravention of the statute, that the private road shall remain such so long as the petitioner shall keep it in repair, and no longer, invalidates the whole proceeding.[92]

(c) Showing Notice of View to Landowner. A report of viewers must show personal notice to the owner of the land, over which it is proposed to lay out a road, of the time and place of view.[93]

(d) Certifying Regard Had to Public Convenience. The return of surveyors appointed to lay out a private road must certify that regard was had to the public convenience.[94]

(iii) Waiver of Defects. A petitioner for a private way cannot object to the report of the committee appointed to hear the application on the ground that such report contains irrelevant findings of fact, if he made no objection at the hearing to the admission of the evidence on which such findings are based.[95]

(iv) Amendment — (a) What Is Amendable. A mere clerical error in the report of viewers is always amendable.[96]

(b) Manner of Amending. The court itself has no power to alter the report of viewers,[97] but the proper remedy is an application for the recommitment of the report to the viewers for correction.[98] It has been held, however, that the action of the court in accepting an amended report may be regarded as an equivalent of its having been recommitted to the viewers for correction.[99]

(v) Confirmation — (a) Necessity. It is indispensable that the report of viewers laying out a private road be confirmed by the court.[1]

(b) Order of Confirmation — (1) Sufficiency — (a) In General. Where the width of a private road is fixed during the same term at which the decree of confirmation nisi of a report of viewers laying out a private road is made, it is sufficient, although omitted in the decree itself.[2]

(b) Waiver Regarding. Any defects in the order or confirmation are, so far as the landowner is concerned, waived by his proceeding by petition to recover the damages assessed in the proceeding.[3]

(2) Effect. A confirmation of report is in effect an order that the road be opened;[4] but confirmation of a report nunc pro tunc, followed by a simultaneous final confirmation and issue of the order to open the road, does not cure previous informal and unauthorized proceedings.[5]

7. Order or Decree Laying Out or Opening Road — a. Conditions Precedent. In one jurisdiction at least the order for the opening of a private road cannot issue until the damages are paid, or tendered and brought into court.[6]

b. Negativing Existence of Facts Showing Lack of Jurisdiction. The order or decree of a court establishing a private road need not negative the existence of every fact which would show that the court could not properly exercise its power in the given case.[7]

c. Fixing Matters Pertaining to Road — (I) Location — (A) In General. That the description of the location of the road contained in the order laying out the road does not follow the language of the application is not fatal to the proceeding, provided the description in the application is incorporated in the order by reference and the two descriptions are not irreconcilably repugnant.[8]

(B) Termini. In ordering the laying out of a private road it is the duty of the court, in its judgment, to fix both termini of such way.[9]

(II) Width. Where the statute requires that the order of the court establishing the road shall define and specify its width, an omission so to do is fatal to the proceeding;[10] but the court may, at a subsequent term, correct a mere mistake in fixing the width,[11] allowing another term to pass before confirming the report absolutely.[12]

(III) Opening of — (A) Time. If the statute provides that the court shall direct when the roads shall be laid out and when the damages shall be paid, the court must so direct in the decree establishing the road.[13]

(B) Manner. The order of confirmation need not specify how the road shall be opened, if the law authorizing the proceeding specifies the manner of opening the road in plain and direct terms.[14]

(IV) Manner of Keeping in Repair. It is not necessary for the court, in the order of confirmation, to specify how the road shall be kept in repair when the statute authorizing the proceeding provides that it shall be kept in repair by the persons applying for and using it.[15]

(V) Limiting Duration. Unless the statute expressly so provides a tribunal establishing a private road has no authority to limit in its decree the time for the Long v. Butler County Com'rs' Ct., 18 Ala. 482, holding further that under a statute conferring a power on a court of roads and revenue of each county to establish private roads, but providing that no such road shall pass through any person's plantation, it is not necessary, in an order of the court laying out a road, to direct that it shall be so laid out as not to pass through the plantation of any person, and that the appellate court will not presume that it does so pass, for the purpose of invalidating the proceeding.

use of the road to a given period of the year,[16] or to limit its duration to the necessity which required it.[17]

8. Laying Out Road. A road does not become a legal private road until the public functionaries whose ministerial duty it is so to do have actually laid it out.[18] The public functionaries whose ministerial duty it becomes to lay out a private road have no discretion to change its location,[19] but must lay it out so as to cover ground substantially the same as that described in the application [20] and the order of the court.[21]

9. Expenses and Costs. Statutes authorizing the establishment of private roads generally require that the expenses and costs of proceeding therefor shall be paid by the applicant.[22] But the applicant is not liable for such expenses and costs in case a private road is laid out on a petition for a public road, where the statute requires that the expenses and costs of a proceeding to establish a public road shall be paid by the public.[23]

10. Operation and Effect. If a road is petitioned for and damages assessed as for a private road and the order of the board of commissioners made for a private road, it cannot be sustained on the ground that it is a public highway.[24]

11. Estoppel to Question Validity. If the tribunal had jurisdiction, the one at whose instance and for whose benefit the road was established by it, is, by accepting and using the road, estopped from questioning the validity of the proceedings.[25]

12. Review — a. By Certiorari [26] — (I) In General. Certiorari will not lie to review proceedings to establish a private road where an adequate remedy by appeal exists; [27] nor will it lie to review a determination adverse to the establishment of the road, made by a tribunal in the exercise of its discretionary powers.[28]

(II) Discretion to Grant. It is discretionary with the court, to which application is made, to refuse the writ, where no transcript of the record is presented therewith, so as to enable the court to judge of the propriety of issuing the writ.[29]

(III) Proceedings Therefor — (A) Who May Institute. One who becomes the owner of the land subsequent to the time of the view, but before issue of the final order, and presents a sufficient objection to the establishment of the road, is entitled, on a showing that he has lost his right of appeal, without fault or negligence on his part, to a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings.[30] damages therefor, he cannot, after an adverse award of viewers, sue out a certiorari to reverse the order of confirmation for any defect therein.[31]

(c) Form of Application — (1) ENTITLING. A writ of certiorari in the matter of a private road should be entitled as between the applicant therefor, as plaintiff in certiorari, and the applicant for the road, as defendant.[32]

(2) EXHIBITS. To obtain certiorari, the party aggrieved by the establishment of a private road should present, with his application, a duly certified transcript of the record sought to be reviewed.[33]

(D) Quashing Writ. The writ will be dismissed because improvidently granted, as where it appears that an adequate remedy by appeal exists.[34]

(E) Hearing and Determination — (1) HEARING. On the hearing of the writ nothing is reviewable except the regularity of the proceedings.[35]

(2) DETERMINATION — (a) QUASHING PROCEEDINGS. The entire proceeding will be quashed in certiorari, where the petition failed to allege that the petitioner had no access to his land other than by the proposed road,[36] or where it appears that there was no service of notice, as required by statute, on the owner [37] or occupant [38] of the land, or where the applicant for the road paid the surveyors more than their legal fees.[39]

(b) REMITTING PROCEEDINGS. In one jurisdiction the court may, where it appears that the return of the surveyors exceeds the width of road prescribed by statute, order the proceedings to be remitted, unless an amendment thereof be ordered on motion of the applicant for the road, as authorized by statute.[40]

b. pretation of the law it can be allowed, and the courts will give a liberal construction to the statute in favor of the right.[44]

(II) Persons Entitled. One who does not appear to be affected by the establishment of a private road, and is no party to the proceeding, cannot sustain a writ of error.[45]

(III) Presenting and Reserving Ground of Review. Questions not raised in the court below will not be noticed on appeal, as where the jury to assess the damages was not sworn.[46]

(IV) Hearing and Determination — (A) Hearing. If the tribunal establishing the road and the proceedings are regular on their face, the appellate court can consider nothing beyond the record proper,[47] in which neither the testimony [48] nor the recital of facts in the opinion filed by the court[49] below is a part. And where the language of the statute is that the landowner, if dissatisfied with the assessment made by the viewer, may appeal from the judgment of the tribunal confirming the same, the questions whether there was a necessity for the road and whether the report of the viewers should be set aside are not matters to be reviewed by the appellate tribunal,[50] the sole matter reviewable being the amount of damages to which the landowner may be entitled for that part of his land proposed to be taken.[51]

(B) Determination — (1) Reversal. The proceedings will be reversed where the petition on which it is founded fails to show, either directly or by necessary implication, that the proposed road is a way of necessity; [52] or where the petition [53] or report of the viewers [54] fails to set forth with reasonable certainty the termini of the road; or where the lower tribunal, on confirming the report of the viewers, fails to observe the statutory requirement to fix the width of the road;[55] or where the record shows that the order for the opening of the road was issued before payment or tender into court of the damages assessed,[56] or that the road was laid out on the bridge of another, without making a special order relative to the maintenance and repair of the bridge.[57] So too the proceedings will be reversed on appeal if the act under which they were had is unconstitutional.[58]

(2) Requisites of Judgment of Tribunal For Trial De Novo. If the appeal transfers the entire proceeding to the appellate court for trial de novo, its judgment must fix and determine all the rights of the parties.[59] Accordingly it is held to be essential for the appellate tribunal to provide in its judgment for the establishment of the road,[60] a judgment merely awarding damages and remanding the same to the lower tribunal for further proceedings being insufficient.[61]

c. Collaterally. Except for jurisdictional reasons, rendering void the proceedings to establish a private road,[62] they are not subject to collateral attack.[63] And in reviewing such proceedings collaterally, the records of the tribunal establishing the road should receive a fair and reasonable interpretation,[64] it being enough if such record clearly shows the purport of its judicial acts.[65]

C. Damages to Landowners — 1. Who Must Pay. It is generally provided by the statutes authorizing private roads that the person or persons for whose benefit they are opened shall pay the damages awarded to the landowners.[66] And where the statute plainly provides that the fact of the benefit determines who shall pay the damages, the petitioner for the road is not relieved from liability by alleging in his petition that the road is to be for the benefit of the public, or by failing to allege that it is to be for his own benefit.[67] Nor can he escape liability on the ground that the notice required by statute to be given by the municipal officers, on the filing of the petition for a private road, was defective, if he was not injured thereby.[68]

2. When Payable. Some of the statutes authorizing private roads make the payment of the damages awarded to landholders a condition precedent to the opening thereof,[69] while others provide that damages, when estimated, shall not be paid until the land has been entered upon and possession taken for the purpose of constructing the road.[70]

3. Assessment — a. Mode. In some jurisdictions the inquisition under a writ of ad quod damnum is the proper mode of ascertaining the amount of the damages,[71]

Effect of failure to pay.— Where the statute provides that the applicant for the road shall pay the damages assessed within ten days after the determination of the supervisors to lay it out, in order to obtain the filing and recording of the order for the establishment of the road, a delay in paying the assessment for three months is fatal to the validity of the proceedings. while in others that is the proper mode if the landowners cannot agree with the selectmen of the town upon compensation, or upon a committee to estimate the damages.[72]

b. Who May Apply Therefor. Where the statute authorizing a private road provides no mode for assessing damages, except by referring to the manner provided in cases of public highways, in which case the landowner applies for the assessment after the road is opened, while in private road cases the road cannot be opened until damages are paid, the petitioner for a private road may apply for the appointment of viewers to assess damages.[73]

c. Notice of. Personal notice of the time and place when the jury [74] or viewers [75] will meet for the assessment of damages must be given to the person or persons over whose land the road is to be opened.

d. Elements to Be Considered in Estimating Damage — (I) Benefits Accruing to Landowner. When the statute providing for the assessment of damages for the laying out of both public and private roads declares, as to the latter class of roads, that such assessment shall be deemed the just compensation to be made for the private property taken for public use, and omits the direction contained in the statute as to public roads, that the damages shall be diminished as to the extent of the resulting benefits, this evidences an intention that in assessing the damages for lands taken for private roads, benefits and advantages to the owner are not to be considered.[76]

(II) Additional Fencing. Under some statutes the additional fencing that may become necessary, as well as the use of the land, may, in assessing damages, be taken into consideration.[77]

(III) Existing Right of Way. The fact that the land is also subject to an easement of a private right of way is an element to be considered by the jury in estimating the damages.[78]

(IV) Allowance For Interest. Under a statute providing that the damages, when estimated, shall not be paid until the land has been entered upon and possession taken for the purpose of constructing a road, the jury may, in estimating damages, include an allowance for interest from the time when the land was taken.[79]

e. Competency of Witness on Question of Damages. The fact that one having no vested interest in the land or the damage to be assessed was served with notice of the original application does not of itself make him a party to the subsequent proceedings, so as to render him incompetent as a witness on the question of damages.[80]

f. Report of Viewers. The report of viewers appointed to assess damages must show that the landowner or landowners had notice of the time and place fixed for such assessment,[81] and it is not sufficient to state that application was made to them or him for a release thereof.[82] But the report is not erroneous because he does not designate who shall pay the damages assessed, where the law fixes the obligation upon the persons at whose instance the road is laid out.[83]

4. Reassessment — a. In General. Some of the statutes authorizing private roads expressly provide that any person deeming himself aggrieved by the award of damages, made by the viewers or like officers, may maintain a proceeding for a reassessment of the damages,[84] or may apply for a jury to reassess the same.[85]

b. Proceedings Therefor — (i) Who May Institute. A statutory provision that any person aggrieved by the selectmen's estimate of damages may apply for a jury to reassess damages does not include a person for whose benefit the road is laid out.[86]

(ii) Petition. Notice of the petition for a reassessment of damages, filed by the owner of the lands over which the road is opened or is to be opened, must if the statute provides that the damages are to be paid by the person or persons petitioning for the road, be given to such person or persons.[87]

5. Actions Therefor — a. In General. An award or assessment of a sum to be paid by one to another made in statutory proceedings to establish a private road forms the subject of an action in assumpsit.[88]

b. Defenses. Where damages have been awarded to the owner of land for the opening of a private road, the person for whose benefit it was opened, and who is liable for the damages, cannot defend an action by the owner therefor on the ground that the latter has assigned his claim, particularly where the action is for the benefit of the assignee.[89]

V. Pleading and Evidence of Existence.

A private road laid out by public authority should be pleaded as a highway.[90] If the particular mode in which a private road was laid out is pleaded, it must be proved as pleaded.[91]

VI. Maintenance and Repair.

A. In General. Statutes authorizing private roads generally provide that the person or persons for whose benefit such a road is opened shall keep it in repair.[92] But it has been held that a person at whose instance a road has been opened under such a statute is not bound to keep in repair that part of the road

Private road laid out on bridge.— The order establishing a private road on the bridge of another person should provide that the applicant shall maintain and keep the bridge in repair so long as he alone uses it, which runs through his own land, for the benefit of those who may have acquired a prescriptive right to use it.[93] Sometimes statutes authorizing private roads provide that they shall not become public highways in the sense that they must be kept in repair at the expense of the public,[94] but even where the statute is silent on the subject no obligation rests on the public to keep the road in repair.[95] It has been held, however, that where the statute under which a private road is laid out speaks of it as a public highway, the duty is cast upon the public to keep it in a suitable state of repair.[96]

B. Gates. Statutes authorizing private roads, subject to gates, generally impose the duty of the erection and maintenance of such gates on the person at whose instance and for whose benefit the road is established.[97]

C. Fences. Unless the cost of fencing has been assessed as damages, the duty to fence a private road devolves upon the person for whose accommodation it was laid out.[98]

VII. Obstructions and Use For Travel.

A. Obstructions[99] — 1. In General. If a private road of a given width is ordered to be laid out, the building of his fences, by the owner of the land, so as not to leave the road of the specified width in the clear, constitutes an obstruction.[1] Where a private road leading to defendant's home had been used as such for from eighteen to twenty-one years, the landowners could not close it by the construction of a water trough over it.[2]

2. Right to Remove. An obstruction placed in a private road by the owner of the land over which the road is laid cannot be removed by one having no right to use the road.[3]

3. Actions — a. Right to Maintain. An abutter has a right to reasonably convenient points of connection with a private road, and it is actionable for another abutter to impede his use of such points.[4]

b. Form — (i) Actions at Law. For an encroachment of a private road an action at law is maintainable by the person at whose instance and for whose benefit such road was established.[5]

(ii) In Equity. Whenever an adequate remedy cannot be afforded by an action at law for damages, one whose right to use a private road is impeded by the wrongful acts of another is entitled to injunction to restrain further obstruction.[6] But to authorize injunctive relief, in such case, it must appear that in locating the road the least possible injury, consistent with the end to be attained, was done to the owner of the land.[7]

W. 114, holding further that if successive efforts of plaintiff to obtain access to the road have been obstructed by defendant, the fact that the obstructions have actually been erected does not render it improper to enjoin a defendant from obstructing the road so as to interfere with plaintiff's access thereto.

Injunction generally see Injunctions, 22 Cyc. 724 et seq.

7. Clack v. White, 2 Swan (Tenn.) 540.

c. Defenses. It is no defense to an action for a substantial encroachment on a private road that plaintiff was not thereby interrupted in the use of the road;[8] but it is a good defense that defendant yielded his assent, expressly or impliedly, to the encroachment.[9]

B. Use For Travel. The public have the right to use a private road for travel,[10] and it is immaterial that the road is subject to gates and bars,[11] or that it is merely a cul de sac.[12]

VIII. INJURIES FROM DEFECTS.

A. Liability. A town is liable for any special damage that may be caused by its failure to perform the duty cast upon it by statute to keep a private road in suitable repair.[13] Nor is there any such distinction between private roads with gates or bars, and those without, as to justify a different rule as to the liability for want of repair, where, in both cases, they are termed highways in the statute.[14]

B. Actions. The objection that a portion of a private road was laid out at a greater width than that prayed for in the petition cannot be urged by the town in a suit for injuries caused by its failure to keep the road in repair.[15]

IX. ALTERATION, VACATION, AND EXTINGUISHMENT.

A. Alteration. Under a statute authorizing an application by a person interested to alter a private road, the owner of the land over which the road passes is clearly entitled to petition for such alteration.[16] If the statute authorizing the proceeding requires the petitioner therein to put the new road in as good condition as the old, such provision does not apply where the road, as first located, has never been opened.[17]

B. Vacation — 1. Power to Vacate. The power of the legislature to establish private roads, if the same be necessary, carries with it, as a necessary incident, the power to provide for the vacation of such roads, when they shall have become no longer necessary;[18] and when such legislative provision had been made the road laid out by public authority may be discontinued by it without the consent or against the will of the person upon whose petition it was originally established.[19]

2. Manner of. A private road established by public authority can be vacated only in the manner provided by statute.[20]

3. Proceedings Therefor — a. Grounds. It is good ground for the vacation of a private road, on the petition of the owner of the land over which it passes, that the person at whose instance it was laid out has another convenient way over the land of a third person.[21]

b. Advertisement. The township in which the road proposed to be vacated lies must be named in the advertisement required by statute, that all concerned may know with certainty the location of the road.[22]

c. Petition. In one jurisdiction the statute provides that the petition to vacate a private road must set forth in a clear and distinct manner the situation and circumstances of such road, or of the part thereof, which the applicants may desire to have vacated.[23] But a petition for the vacation of the entire road, presented under such a statute, need not specify the portions of the road to be vacated, nor the particular reasons why the vacation of such portions is desired.[24]

d. Return of Surveyors. An omission of the surveyors to state in their return that the township in which the road proposed to be vacated lies is fatal, where the township controls the appointment of the surveyors.[25]

e. Review. In reviewing by appeal proceedings for the vacation of a private road only the regularity of the proceedings can be considered,[26] but the proceeding will be vacated if it appears that the requirements of the statute necessary to give jurisdiction have not been strictly followed.[27]

C. Extinguishment. There is a conflict of authority as to whether unity in title and possession of all the land occupied by a private road, which was laid out by public authority, operates to discontinue it, the courts of one jurisdiction holding that where petitioner who has procured a private road to be laid out over the lands of another has acquired title to the servient tenement, the right to the road is extinguished not only as to him, but as to all other persons,[28] while in another jurisdiction the view obtains that the right to use the road can be extinguished only by the action of the proper public authority.[29]

X. PENALTIES.[30]

A. In General. In one jurisdiction the person using a private road is subject to a statutory penalty for leaving open a swinging gate placed across it by the owner of the land.[31]

20. In re Hunter's Private Road, 46 Pa. St. 250.

Although bars have been kept up in the place of swinging gates across a private road, for thirty or forty years, by the owner of the land through which the road passes, without complaint on the part of those using the road, no presumption will be thereby created that the right of use of the road has ceased. B. Actions Therefor — 1. Burden of Proof. To maintain an action for a penalty for leaving open a swinging gate across a private road, plaintiff must prove that the way in question is a private road, laid out or made such in the manner prescribed by statute.[32]

2. Defenses. It is no defense to an action for the statutory penalty that defendant had a private way where the private road in question was laid out.[33]

XI. Criminal Offenses.[34]

A. In General. It has been held that the obstruction of a private road cannot be a public nuisance, and hence is not indictable as such.[35]

B. Indictment[36] — 1. Maliciously Injuring Road. Where the statute makes it a criminal offense to maliciously injure a private road laid out by authority of law, an indictment which fails to allege facts showing that such road was so laid out, and which does not even contain a direct allegation to that effect, is fatally defective.[37]

2. Breaking Down Gate on Road. An indictment for breaking down a gate across a private road established according to law is sufficient if it is in the words of the statute.[38]

C. Defenses. Where the crime charged is the breaking down of a gate across a private road located according to law, it is a matter of defense that the road was not located according to law, and is therefore not a private road in law.[39]

For other definitions of the term see ADVERSE POSSESSION, 1 Cyc. 1002; ESTOPPEL, 16 Cyc. 716; EVIDENCE, 16 Cyc. 985 note 76; JUDGMENTS, 23 Cyc. 1253.

There are three kinds of privity, namely: (1) Privity in case of estate only; (2) privity in respect to contract only; (3) privity in respect to estate and contract together. Mygatt v. Coe, 124 N. Y. 212, 219, 26 N. E. 611, 11 L. R. A. 646.

Implies succession.— He who is in privity stands in the shoes or sits in the seat of the owner from whom he derives his title, and thus takes it charged with the burden attending it. Boughton v. Harder, 46 N. Y. App. Div. 352, 355, 61 N. Y. Suppl. 574. Privity exists between two successive holders when the later takes under the earlier, as by descent (for instance, a widow under her husband, or a child under its parent), or by will or grant, or by a voluntary transfer of possession. Sherin v. Brackett, 36 Minn. 152, 154, 30 N. W. 551. Privity only exists because of the relationship between the parties, or because of the derivative character of their title. Hummel v. Central City First Nat. Bank, 2 Colo. App. 571, 32 Pac. 72, 76.

Privity of estate is that which exists between lessor and lessee, tenant for life or remainderman or reversioner, etc., and their respective assignees, and between joint tenants and copartners. Hartley v. Phillips, 198 Pa. St. 9, 13, 47 Atl. 929.

The ground of privity is property and not personal relation. Bailey v. Sundberg, 49 Fed. 583, 586, 1 C. C. A. 387.

PRIVY. As an adjective, admitted to the participation of knowledge with another of a secret transaction;[66] secretly cognizant; privately known.[67] As a noun, one who is a partner,[68] or has any part or interest, in any action, matter or thing.[69] In law, one whose right to the thing in question may be benefited or injured, according as the matter in controversy may happen to be determined.[70] (See PRIVIES; PRIVITY.)

PRIVY TOKEN. A term used to denote a false mark or sign, forged object, counterfeited letter, key, ring, etc., used to deceive persons and thereby fraudulently get possession of property.[71] (See, generally, COUNTERFEITING, 11 Cyc. 1; FALSE PRETENSES, 19 Cyc. 384; FORGERY, 19 Cyc. 1367.)

PRIVY VERDICT.[72] A verdict when the judge hath left or adjourned the court, and the jury being agreed, in order to be delivered from their confinement obtain leave to give their verdict privily to the judge out of court;[73] that which, for the sake of being released from confinement, is given by a jury out of court to a judge;[74] one given out of court, before any of the judges of the court;[75] a verdict given before one of the judges of the court, after the court have risen.[76]

Prize only relates to or is connected with a state or condition of war. A vessel captured for engaging in piratical aggression becomes a prize on account of the state of universal war presumed to have been declared by a pirate against commerce and human kind at large, which requires no reciprocal declaration from any nation. The question of prize or no prize is essentially a question of title. Enemy property, or property found so engaged in an unfinished voyage of illicit traffic with the enemy as to be quasi hostile, is liable to condemnation; property not in that predicament is not. In re Seventy-Eight Bales of Cotton, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,679, 1 Lowell 11.

"Capture" and "prize" are not convertible terms, and that for the subject of capture to be made prize for the benefit of the captors the taking must meet the conditions imposed by the statutes. U. I. DEFINITION.

While the term "prize-fight" has no technical legal meaning at common-law,[1] a prize[2] fight[3] is defined as a contest in which the combatants fight for a reward or wager.[4]

According to the lexicographers it would seem to be left doubtful whether to constitute a prize-fight there must be fighting in public. Sullivan v. State, 67 Miss. 346, 7 So. 275. See infra, III, C.

"Prize-fight" is a phrase of common use, and its employment indicates what is clearly and distinctly meant, as other English terms. State v. Patton, 159 Ind. 248, 251, 64 N. E. 850.

Other lexicographers who define it give it substantially the same definition. Seville v. State, 49 Ohio St. 117, 131, 30 N. E. 621, 15 L. R. A. 516.

Other definitions are: "A pugilistic encounter, or a boxing match for a prize or wager." Century Dict. [quoted in State v. Patton, 159 Ind. 248, 251, 64 N. E. 850; Seville v. State, 49 Ohio St. 117, 131, 30 N. E. 621, 15 L. R. A. 516].

"An exhibition contest, especially one of pugilists, for a stake or wager." Webster Dict. [quoted in State v. Patton, 159 Ind. 248, 251, 64 N. E. 850].

In the Ohio statute the term has been held to be used in its ordinary signification of a fight for a prize or reward, and includes all fights of that character however conducted or

II. NATURE OF OFFENSE.

A. At Common Law. The specific offense of prize-fighting was unknown at common law,[5] the participants being punishable for assault and battery,[6] breach of the peace,[7] or riot,[8] according to the circumstances surrounding the particular case.

B. Under Statute. Prize-fighting is prohibited in many of the states by statutes penalizing the offense.[9]

C. Distinguished From Boxing or Sparring Matches. A mere boxing or sparring match was not illegal at common law,[10] unless carried to such length as to cause serious injury to one of the participants,[11] or so conducted as to amount to a breach of the peace,[12] and statutes prohibiting prize-fighting sometimes except from their provisions a glove contest or sparring exhibition in an athletic club or gymnasium.[13] An exception of this kind in a statute does not legalize prize-fighting, witnessed. Seville v. State, 49 Ohio St. 117, 131, 30 N. E. 621, 15 L. R. A. 516. See infra, III, C, E.

A prize-fighter is "one who fights or boxes publicly for a reward" (Worcester Dict. [quoted in Sullivan v. State, 67 Miss. 346, 352, 7 So. 275]); "one who fights publicly for a reward" (Webster Dict. [quoted in Sullivan v. State, supra].

Priz--fighting is "the act or practice of fighting for a prize" (Worcester Dict. [quoted in Sullivan v. State, 67 Miss. 346, 352, 7 So. 275]); "fighting, especially boxing, in public, for a reward or wager" (Webster Dict. [quoted in Sullivan v. State, supra]).

A. 452 (holding that mere boxing as ordinarily understood is not unlawful, and an interference with it by the legislative power would be a great stretch of authority, bordering upon an infringement of personal liberty, and even boxing without gloves, for a display of skill and for pastime, when there is no breach of the peace, and no intentional injury to the person, cannot be considered as embraced within the statute); People v. Johnson, 22 Misc. (N. Y.) 150, 49 N. Y. Suppl. 382, 12 N. Y. Cr. 546 (holding that the Horton law, prohibiting sparring exhibitions where an admission fee is received except where held by a domestic but merely sanctions legitimate exhibitions of skill in sparring, and a contest which because of the prize offered or the intent of the contestants to injure each other is in fact a prize-fight is unlawful even under such a statute.[14]

III. Elements of Offense.

A. Intent. An intention on the part of the participants to do physical violence to each other is an essential element of a prize-fight.[15] But the mere fact that it is a so-called friendly bout and for scientific points does not change the character of a contest which is in other respects a prize-fight.[16]

B. Prize or Reward. The contest must have been engaged in with an expectation of a prize or reward either to be won from the contestant or otherwise awarded,[17] which may consist of money paid or contributed by the spectators;[18] and it is immaterial that the defeated as well as the successful contestant is rewarded,[19] or that the reward is divided equally between them,[20] or even that the prize was not actually awarded.[21] Under a statute directed merely at fighting, however, a reward is unnecessary.[22]

C. Publicity. Where the statute is aimed at public fighting, the contess must have been a public one to constitute the offense;[23] otherwise this feature it not essential to the commission of the crime.[24]

D. Previous Appointment. Statutes penalizing prize-fighting sometimes provide that to constitute the offense the fight must be by previous appointment or agreement.[25]

E. Manner of Conducting Contest Immaterial. The manner in which the contest is conducted,[26] whether with or without gloves,[27] or ring,[28] whether before few or many spectators,[29] the clothing worn by the contestants,[30] and the rules observed,[31] are not material if the contest embraces the essential elements of a prize-fight. ence of one as a spectator at a prize-fight, who does and says nothing to encourage the fight and takes no actual part in the management thereof, does not subject him to conviction as a principal as a matter of law.[36] Sometimes the statute against prize-fighting as a substantive offense provides for punishment of persons who aid, advise, encourage, or promote, the fight,[37] or who aid or abet therein.[38]

V. INDICTMENT OR INFORMATION.[39]

An indictment for engaging in[40] or aiding or abetting a fight need not set out the particular acts, but may follow the language of the statute when by the use of such language the act in which the offense consists is fully, directly, and expressly alleged without uncertainty or ambiguity.[41] It is not necessary, however, to follow the language of the statute if the acts constituting the offense are clearly described in the indictment.[42] The necessity for an averment that the fight took place in public depends upon whether publicity is an essential element of the crime.[43] Where the offense consists of engaging in a prize-fight, the indictment or information must show that both parties fought;[44] but it is sufficient to allege Assault.— All persons aiding and abetting a prize-fight are guilty of an assault. Reg. v. Coney, 8 Q. B. D. 534, 15 Cox C. C. 46, 46 J. P. 404, 51 L. J. M. C. 66, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 307, 30 Wkly. Rep. 678, holding that consent of the parties actually engaged in fighting to interchange blows does not afford any answer to the criminal charge of assault.

Corroboration as witnesses.— The spectators of a sparring match are not participes criminis so that their evidence, touching what occurred at the match, requires corroboration. Reg. v. Young, 10 Cox C. C. 371. And although all persons present at and sanctioning a prize-fight, where one of the combatants is killed, are guilty of manslaughter, as principals in the second degree, yet they are not such accomplices as require their evidence to be confirmed, if they are called as witnesses against other parties charged with manslaughter. Com. v. Barrett, 108 Mass. 302 (holding that an indictment averring in the words of the statute that certain inhabitants of the state, by a previous appointment made in the state, left the state and on the same day fought with each other without its limits, sufficiently charges that both the leaving the state and the fighting were in pursuance of one appointment made in the state); Com. v. Welsh, 7 Gray (Mass.) 324 (holding that an indictment alleging that defendant at a time and place named, by and in pursuance of a previous appointment and arrangement, met and engaged in a fight with one J S is sufficient without further charging what previous appointment or arrangement was made, or when, or where, or by whom, or further setting out defendant's acts); People v. Taylor, 96 Mich. 576, 56 N. 41. Com. v. Welsh, 7 Gray (Mass.) 324.

But if the statute does not define the offense or declare what acts shall be a violation of its provisions, as a statute which makes it unlawful "for any person to engage in prize-fighting," etc., without more, it is not sufficient to charge the offense in the language of the statute but the facts should be set out which show an unlawful act. VI. EVIDENCE.[47]

On a prosecution for prize-fighting it is not competent to show that such contests are common and harmless amusements in colleges,[48] nor is the opinion of an expert as to whether the contest in question was a glove contest or a prize-fight admissible.[49]

VII. TRIAL.[50]

Whether a contest was a prize-fight or a lawful glove contest,[51] and whether an alleged club was only a sham and pretense,[52] are questions of fact for the jury under proper instructions.

PRO. A Latin preposition meaning for, in respect of; on account of; in behalf of.[7]

PRO AND CON. For and against.[8]

PROBABILITY. The state of being probable;[9] likelihood; appearance of truth; that state of a case or question of fact which results from superior evidence or preponderation of argument on one side, inclining the mind to receive it as the truth, but leaving some room for doubt;[10] likelihood of the occurrence of an event in the doctrine of chances, or the quotient obtained by dividing the number of favorable chances by the whole number of chances;[11] likelihood or appearance — that is, resemblance of truth.[12] The term is sometimes employed as meaning the same thing as presumption.[13] (See PROBABLE.)

PROBABLE. Having more evidence for than against;[14] having more evidence for than the contrary;[15] supported by evidence which inclines the mind to belief, but leaves some room for doubt;[16] likely.[17] (See PROBABILITY;

The term when strictly used relates to the proof of a will before an officer or tribunal having jurisdiction to determine the question of its validity. In common usage, however, it is often used with reference to the proceedings incident to the administration and settlement of the estates of decedents, and it is sometimes used in this sense in the statutes. Reno v. McCully, 65 Iowa 629, 632, 22 N. W. 902.

While the term originally meant merely "relating to proof," and afterward "relating to the proof of wills," yet in the American law it is not a general name or term used to include all matters of which probate courts have jurisdiction. Johnson v. Harrison, 47 Minn. 575, 578, 50 N. W. 923, 28 Am. St. Rep. 382.

The bond given to the judge of probate, by one to whom the whole of the real estate of his ancestor had been assigned, conditioned to pay to the other heirs their respective proportions of such estate, is extra-official, and not a probate bond such as must be given to the judge of probate. Thomas v. White, 12 Mass. 367, 369.

PROBATE FEE. A reward or compensation to a county judge or judge or register of probate, for services rendered or to be rendered.[30]

PROBATE HOMESTEAD. As defined by statute, a homestead set apart by the court for the use of the surviving husband or wife, and the minor children out of the common property, or if there be no common property, then out of the real estate belonging to the deceased.[31] (See HOMESTEADS, 21 Cyc. 562 et seq.)

"Under our constitutional system, that court itself is, for most purposes, at least, a prerogative, and not a judicial, court, and has no jurisdiction over persons or property, except in such proceedings as relate to the estates of deceased persons, or those under disability and liable to wardship." Grand Rapids, etc., R. Co. v. Chesebro, 74 Mich. 466, 472, 42 N. W. 66.

"The origin of our Probate Courts is traced to the Ecclesiastical Courts of England, the jurisdiction of which was practically limited to the probate of wills, the granting of administrations and the suing for legacies. 3 Black 95–98. In every other respect the control of estates, executors and administrators was exclusively in the Common Law and Chancery Courts. As Judge Woerner puts it in his invaluable treatise (The American Law of Administration): 'It should, therefore, be remembered that there is a very great difference between the totality of the powers exercised by the English courts in connection with the administration of estates of deceased persons, sometimes called testamentary or probate jurisdiction, and the testamentary or probate jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts — a distinction which is of the utmost importance in ascertaining the conclusiveness of the judgments and decrees of the several classes of courts in collateral proceedings.' . . . In this country Probate Courts, since their first establishment in Massachusetts in 1784 (R. S. 1784, Chap. 46; Wales v. Willard, 2 Mass. 120), were patterned after the English models. But in the great majority of instances they have outgrown their limited and inferior jurisdiction as mere statutory courts deriving their sole authority from legislative enactment and have developed into courts of record with increased powers (proceeding according to the course of common law) and 'within the field of their jurisdiction they are as much a branch of the judiciary of the State as any court of general or plenary powers. . . . Their orders, judgments and decrees are, therefore, as conclusive upon the parties to the record, until reversed or annulled on appeal, writ of error or direct proceeding in chancery for fraud, as decrees in chancery or judgments at law.' Woerner, § 145 (2d ed.)." Plant v. Harrison, 36 Misc. (N. Y.) 649, 688, 74 N. Y. Suppl. 411.

In designating the character of probate courts under the constitution and laws of Minnesota, it is said, they are, in fact, courts of superior jurisdiction. The constitution and the laws commit to them general, original, and probably exclusive original jurisdiction over "the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship."—(article 6. § 7)—a jurisdiction second to none in practical importance. Though limited to certain specified subjects (and this is the case with all courts), their jurisdiction in respect to the same is general and not inferior. To be sure, they are to some extent under the control of the district and supreme courts, but only in the exercise of an appellate and remedial jurisdiction. As respects the subjects committed to them in the exercise of an original jurisdiction, they have all the power which any court has; consequently they are not inferior to any other court in the exercise of that jurisdiction, and, as they are not inferior courts, they are superior courts. Davis v. Hudson, 29 Minn. 27, 34, 11 N. W. 136.

Under a statute providing for the examination of a judgment debtor before the "probate judge" where the order issued by such judge for the examination of the debtor recites therein "probate court" instead of "probate judge" the order is not fatally defective. The words "probate court" are nearly synonymous with "probate judge." White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Wait, 24 Kan. 136, 139.

"The probate court having jurisdiction," as used in a statute declaring that the executor, administrator, or guardian shall be licensed to make a sale of real estate by such court, means "'the probate court whose jurisdiction it is proper to invoke in the case in hand,'—in other words, the probate court in whose jurisdiction the guardianship is pending." PROBATIONARY TERM. A term implying definite or stated length of duration, especially so when such term or period is to be provided in advance.[32]

PROBATIONES DEBENT ESSE EVIDENTES, ID EST, PERSPICUÆ ET FACILES INTELLIGI. A maxim meaning "Proofs ought to be evident, that is, clear and easily understood." [33]

PROBATIS EXTREMIS, PRÆSUMITUR MEDIA. A maxim meaning "The extremes being proved, the intermediate proceedings are presumed." [34]

PROBATIVE. In the law of evidence, having the effect of proof; tending to prove, or actually proving.[35] (See, generally, EVIDENCE, 16 Cyc. 821 et seq.)

PROBATOR. In old English law, strictly, an accomplice in felony who to save himself confessed the fact, and charged or accused any other as principal or accessary, against whom he was bound to make good his charge. It also signified an approver, or one who undertakes to prove a crime charged upon another.[36] (See CRIMINAL LAW, 12 Cyc. 445.)

PROCEDENDO. A writ commanding an inferior court to proceed to judgment.[37] (Procedendo: On Decision of Cause in Appellate Court — In Civil Action, see APPEAL AND ERROR, 3 Cyc. 478; In Criminal Prosecutions, see CRIMINAL LAW, 12 Cyc. 944. See also JUSTICES OF THE PEACE, 24 Cyc. 784.)

PROCEDURE. A general term including pleading, process, evidence, and practice — in fact, every step that may be taken from the beginning to the end of a case.[38] (See PRACTICE, 31 Cyc. 1153, and Cross-References Thereunder; PROCEEDING and Cross-References Thereunder.)

Under the New York civil service laws giving power to the civil service commission to fix the probationary term of service for those employed under the classified service, the term does not mean "any time" within a fixed length of duration, unmeasured by the rules, and measurable by the pleasure or will of the appointing power. "Probation or probationary implies the purpose of the term or period, but not its length; the rules could fix its length, for so the statute provides, but could not make its length provisional in point of time, for that would be to unfix it or annex an unauthorized item." PROCEED. To commence and carry on a legal process;[39] to conduct, to begin and carry on an action or proceeding.[40] (See PROCEEDING, and Cross-References Thereunder.)

PROCEEDING.[41] In its general acceptation, an act which is done by the authority or direction of the court, express or implied;[42] an act necessary to be done in order to attain a given end; a prescribed mode of action for carrying into effect a legal right; performance of an act, wholly distinct from any consideration of an abstract right;[43] the form and manner of conducting judicial business before a court or judicial officer; regular and orderly progress in form of law; including all possible steps in an action, from its commencement to the execution of judgment;[44] the form in which actions are to be brought and defended, the manner of intervening in suits, of conducting them, the mode of deciding them, of opposing judgments, and executing them;[45] especially a measure or step taken;[46] all the steps or measures, adopted in the prosecution or defense of an action.[47] In a more particular sense, any application, however made, to a court of justice for the purpose of having a matter in dispute judicially determined;[48] any application to a court of justice, however made, for aid in the enforcement of rights, for relief, for redress of injuries, for damages, or for any remedial object.[49] (Proceeding: In Aid of Execution, see of record, shall be used in said city court, as near as may be, except as otherwise provided by this act." the event of the same as party or otherwise" (Calderwood v. Calderwood, 38 Vt. 171, 173); but the term is held not to be a synonym of "civil action" under a statute providing that "a party to the record of any civil action or proceeding, or a person for whose immediate benefit such action or proceeding is prosecuted or defended, or the directors, officers, superintendent or managing agents of any corporation which is a party to the record in such action or proceeding, may be examined upon the trial thereof as if under cross-examination at the instance of the adverse party or parties or any of them, and for that purpose may be compelled in the same manner and subject to the same rules for examination as any other witness to testify, but the party calling for such examination shall not be concluded thereby, but may rebut it by counter testimony" (Strom v. Montana Cent. R. Co., 81 Minn. 346, 348, 84 N. W. 46).

It is more comprehensive than "action" (In re McFarland, 10 Mont. 445, 454, 26 Pac. 185; Mars v. Oro Fin. Min. Co., 7 S. D. 605, 617, 65 N. W. 19); or "judgment," frequently including the latter (Uhe v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 3 S. D. 563, 567, 54 N. W. 601); or "suit" or "implead" and must include an action to vacate letters patent (People v. Clarke, 9 N. Y. 349, 369). In its most comprehensive sense the term includes every step taken in a civil action except the pleadings. Strom v. Montana Cent. R. Co., 81 Minn. 346, 348, 84 N. W. 46. See also Hopewell v. State, 22 Ind. App. 489, 54 N. E. 127, 129; Wilson v. Macklin, 7 Nebr. 50, 52; O'Dea v. Washington County, 3 Nebr. 118, 121; Johnson v. Jones, 2 Nebr. 126, 137; Wilson v. Allen, 3 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 369, 371. But see Martin Cantine Co. v. Warshauer, 7 Misc. (N. Y.) 412, 413, 28 N. Y. Suppl. 139, holding that a pleading is a proceeding of the court.

The term is a technical one, and has acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning in law. Hopewell v. State, 22 Ind. App. 489, 54 N. E. 127, 129; Gordon v. State, 4 Kan. 489, 501.

"Both in its popular use and in its technical application, [it] has a definite meaning which we cannot alter or enlarge. It means, in all cases, the performance of an act, and is wholly distinct from any consideration of an abstract right." Fargo v. Helmer, 43 Hun (N. Y.) 17, 19; Rich v. Husson, 1 Duer (N. Y.) 617, 620, 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 119; Matter of Mace, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 325, 327; Ex p. McGee, 33 Oreg. 165, 168, 54 Pac. 1091.

As ordinarily used, it is generic in meaning, and broad enough to include all methods of invoking the action of courts, whether controversies properly termed "actions" or "special proceedings," as distinguished from them. State v. Lewis County, etc., Dist. Ct., 33 Mont. 138, 142, 82 Pac. 789.

An act, however tortious, of an executive officer of a court, done under the color of its process is to be regarded as a proceeding of that court within the statute inhibiting injunctions by federal courts to stay proceedings in state courts, except in certain cases. American Assoc. v. Hurst, 59 Fed. 1, 5, 7 C. C. A. 598.

Has reference to something done or to be done in a court of justice. Hopewell v. State, 22 Ind. App. 489, 54 N. E. 127, 129.

In the probate code of Montana the term is used as a general designation of the action and procedure whereby the law is administered upon the various subjects within the probate jurisdiction. In re McFarlane, 10 Mont. 444, 454, 26 Pac. 185.

Ordinary proceedings intend the regular and usual mode of carrying on a suit by due course at common law. Bouvier L. Dict. [quoted in Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. 470, 488, 2 L. R. A. 229].

The proceedings in a suit embrace all matters that occur in its progress judicially. Anderson L. Dict. [quoted in Uhe v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 3 S. D. 563, 567, 54 N. W. 601].

The phrase "proceedings and practice" as used in a state constitution providing that all laws relating to courts shall be general and of uniform operation; and the organization, jurisdiction, powers, proceedings, and practice of all courts of the same class or grade, so far as regulated by law, and the force and effect of the process, judgments, and decrees of such courts, severally, shall be uniform, is construed to mean the form in which actions are brought and the manner of conducting and carrying on suits. People v. Raymond, 186 Ill. 407, 414, 57 N. E. 1066.

The phrase "proceedings thereupon" in the federal statute enacting that "writs of execution and other final process, issued on judgments and decrees rendered in any of the courts of the United States, and the proceedings thereupon, shall be the same, except their style, in each state, as are now used in the courts of such state," etc., is construed to include all the laws, which regulate the rights, duties, and conduct of officers, in the service of such process, according to the exigency, upon the person or property of the execution-debtor; and also, all the exemptions from arrest or imprisonment under such process, created by those laws. U. S. v. Knight, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 301, 314, 316, 10 L. ed. 465; Beers v. Haughton, 9 Pet. (U. S.) 362, 9 L. ed. 145. To the same effect see Amis v. Smith, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 303, 313, 10 L. ed. 973.

Under a statute authorizing the transfer of any civil suit or proceeding pending in any circuit court to another, when certain special causes exist, the term includes all matters see EQUITY, 16 Cyc. 118; For Enforcement of Mechanic's Lien, see MECHANICS' LIENS, 27 Cyc. 322; In Admiralty, see ADMIRALTY, 1 Cyc. 809; Judgment in, see JUDGMENTS, 23 Cyc. 1406; Maxims in Equity, see EQUITY, 16 Cyc. 134; Pendency of as Ground For Abatement, see ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL, 1 Cyc. 41. See also PRACTICE, 31 Cyc. 1153, and Cross-References Thereunder; PROCEDURE, and Cross-References Thereunder.)

connected with or attending the exercise of the power conferred upon circuit courts in chancery which are necessary to enable the court to exercise its superintending control and authority conferred by statute. Kittridge v. Kinne, 80 Mich. 200, 204, 44 N. W. 1051.

Under a statute providing that a person interested, who was not a party to the proceeding to probate a will, may, within five years after sentence or order, proceed by bill in equity to impeach or establish the will, on which bill a jury trial shall be ordered, the term "proceeding" refers to the entire proceeding, including the order admitting the will to probate or rejecting it. Dillard v. Dillard, 78 Va. 208, 210.

Used in the recital of the case-made, that it contains all the proceedings, the term includes the evidence. Deere Plow Co. v. Jones, (Kan. 1904) 75 Pac. 1039, 1040, 68 Kan. 650, 76 Pac. 750.

Used in a code providing that all proceedings prescribed for the circuit court shall be pursued in justices' courts, the term does not confer power; it relates to the manner of the exercise of power. The term does not relate to matters pertaining to the powers of the court, but to the form and manner of the exercise of the power. St. Joseph Mfg. Co. v. Harrington, 53 Iowa 380, 382, 5 N. W. 568.

Used in a statute prescribing the manner of petitioning for and holding elections by cities to determine the question of issuing bonds for the purchase of public utilities, and providing that "the passage of this act shall in no way affect any bonds heretofore issued, contract entered into for any public building, pavement, or sewer, tax or special assessment levied, action now pending, or proceeding of any kind commenced and not completed, by or on behalf of any city," the term does not mean a judicial proceeding. State v. Topeka, 68 Kan. 177, 186, 74 Pac. 647.

Used in a statute providing that whenever in a criminal action or proceeding any attorney shall defend the accused by order of the court on the ground that the accused is destitute, the county in which such criminal action or proceeding shall arise shall be liable to pay such attorney such sum as the court may certify to be reasonable, and which shall in no case exceed fifteen dollars per day for each day actually occupied in such trial or proceeding, the word "proceeding" indicates something in the nature of a criminal action, distinguishable therefrom. Green Lake Co. v. Waupaca Co., 113 Wis. 425, 435, 89 N. W. 549.

"Proceedings in error are in the nature of a new action, and are brought by the person against whom final judgment has been rendered, in the court below, whether plaintiff or defendant." Glasser v. Hackett, 37 Fla. 358, 362, 20 So. 532.

Examples.— The following have been held to be proceedings in a legal or judicial sense: "Advertisement for sale of lands" where a statute to prevent unnecessary and vexatious costs provided that where, pursuant to any condition or proviso contained in a mortgage, there has been a demand or notice given requiring payment, or declaring an intention to proceed under a power of sale therein contained, no other proceeding, and no action to enforce such a mortgage shall be taken within a certain time (Smith v. Brown, 20 Ont. 165, 166); an "answer" in a suit (Wilcox, etc., Guano Co. v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 60 Fed. 929, 933); ordering, drawing, summoning, and impaneling of a grand jury (In re Tillery, 43 Kan. 188, 193, 23 Pac. 162); filing an affidavit in an action of replevin (Wilson v. Macklin, 7 Nebr. 50, 52); application for a writ of "mandate" or writ of "ne exeat" (State v. Gordon, 8 Wash. 488, 490, 36 Pac. 498); the findings of fact in a case under a statute providing that "the court must, in every stage of the action, disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party" (Thompson v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 139 Ind. 325, 354, 38 N. E. 796); a hearing before a county board under a statute giving an attorney a lien upon the amount recovered in an action or proceeding (Maloney v. Douglass County, 2 Nebr. (Unoff.) 396, 89 N. W. 248, 249); instructions given to the jury (Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Brassfield, 51 Kan. 167, 174, 32 Pac. 814); levy and sale under an execution within the meaning of the federal statute providing that "the writ of injunction shall not be granted by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a state, except in cases where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy" (Mills v. Provident Life, etc., Co., 100 Fed. 344, 346, 40 C. C. A. 394); a peremptory writ of mandamus under a statute providing for a stay of proceedings on filing a recognizance on appeal (State v. Lewis, 76 Mo. 370, 378); the minutes of a case required to be made by a justice of the peace, under a statute requiring him to keep a book, styled a "docket" in which he shall enter all proceedings before him in any case (Hughston v. Cornish, 59 Miss. 372, 374); notice by counsel for plaintiff in a case that he should make a motion to have the judgment therein vacated where a statute provided that where the supreme court orders a new trial or further proceedings, the record shall be transmitted to the court below, "and proceedings shall be had thereon within one year from the time of entering in the supreme court such an order

PROCEEDS.[50] That which arises from a thing; [51] that which arises from anything,[52] sold, bartered or exchanged, or anything proceeding from or produced by another thing; [53] the amount proceeding or accruing from some possession or transaction, especially the sum derived from the sale of goods; [54] issue, rent, profor a new trial or further proceedings," or in default thereof, such cause shall be considered and treated as discontinued and dismissed, unless the court, for good cause shown, shall order otherwise (Bonesteel v. Orvis, 31 Wis. 117, 119); petition for mechanic's lien under a statute allowing amendments of pleadings or proceedings (Sherry v. Schraage, 48 Wis. 93, 96, 4 N. W. 117; Witte v. Meyer, 11 Wis. 296); certified copies of pleadings under a statute requiring appellant to file with his petition in error a transcript of the proceedings in the lower court (Adams County School Dist. No. 49 v. Cooper, 44 Nebr. 714, 716, 62 N. W. 1084); a preliminary examination of one charged with crime, under a statute providing for the transfer by a justice of the peace, before whom an action or proceeding is pending, to another justice (State v. Bergaman, 37 Minn. 407, 408, 34 N. W. 737); the settlement of a statement of a case on appeal (Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 416, 53 Pac. 935); a "stay bond" under a statute providing that whenever any proceeding is taken it fails to conform to the provisions of the code it may be amended (State v. Russell, 17 Nebr. 201, 204, 22 N. W. 455); steps taken by which the judgment of a court is vacated, and the case taken to, and the appearance of possession effected in another tribunal (O'Dea v. Washington County, 3 Nebr. 118, 121); swearing to a petition in pleading and attaching the jurat to the affidavit (Johnson v. Jones, 2 Nebr. 126, 137); taking the deposition of a witness before a notary public to be used in a pending case (Burns v. San Francisco Super. Ct., 140 Cal. 1, 9, 73 Pac. 597); a writ of assistance, under a statute providing that "no process shall be issued or other proceedings had on any final decree or order until the same shall have been signed and recorded" (Wilmott v. Equitable Bldg., etc., Assoc., 44 Fla. 815, 817, 33 So. 447); a statutory action for the trial of right to property, under a statute providing that the appellate court shall have jurisdiction of all matters of appeal or writs of error from the final judgments of the county courts "in any suit or proceeding at law, or in chancery, other than criminal cases, not misdemeanors, and cases involving a franchise or freehold or the validity of a statute" (Sellers v. Thomas, 185 Ill. 384, 386, 57 N. E. 10).

The following have been held not to be proceedings: Application for costs (Matter of Mace, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 325, 327); arbitration upon voluntary submission (Caughell v. Brower, 17 Ont. Pr. 438, 439); bail-bond given to the sheriff for the appearance of the defendant at the return of a writ of replevin (Meloche v. Reaume, 34 U. C. Q. B. 606, 608); holding of an election for permanently locating a county site, under a statute providing that the repeal of a statute does not affect any proceeding (Gordon v. State, 4 Kan. 489, 501); motion for a new trial (Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 301, 23 L. ed. 898); receiving and examining into complaints against policemen by the mayor of a city under a statute giving him such power as "head of the police" (Payne v. San Francisco, 3 Cal. 122, 127); statutory proceedings to foreclose a mortgage (Dwight v. Phillips, 48 Barb. (N. Y.) 116, 119); taking and certifying an acknowledgment to a deed by a notary public (Helena First Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 9 Mont. 323, 340, 23 Pac. 718).

50. Distinguished from "invoice." Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. National Surety Co., 169 N. Y. 563, 568, 62 N. E. 670.

51. Rees Dict. [quoted in Dow v. Whetten, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 160, 170].

53. Dow v. Whetten, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 160, 172.

"When a sale proper is effected, the money, or thing received in exchange for the specific article sold, constitutes the proceeds of the sale. Such a use of the term 'proceeds' is appropriate and familiar." Where a trust deed conveyed to the trustees a certain certificate of stock and other property real and personal, and directed them immediately after the death of the grantor "to transfer and deliver to" A the certificate of stock, "and convey for the best prices that can be obtained" the other property, real and personal, and, after retaining as compensation for their trouble five per cent. on the proceeds of all such sales, as well as all costs and charges, to distribute the net proceeds between certain persons named, it was held that the trustees were not entitled to commissions on the certificate of stock transferred and delivered by them to A. It was a mere donation, a gratuity, from which no proceeds were received by the trustees. Charleston College v. Willingham, 13 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 195, 207.

When used in connection with sale, the term means a sum of money derived from the sale of property. Hunt v. Williams, 126 Ind. 493, 494, 26 N. E. 177; Wheeler, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Winnett, 3 Nebr. (Unoff.) 22, 91 N. W. 514, 515; Andrews v. Johns, 59 Ohio St. 65, 71, 51 N. E. 880; Finney's Appeal, 113 Pa. St. 11, 18, 4 Atl. 60.

"When we speak of the proceeds of a sale, we mean the sum that is paid for the things sold. When we speak of the proceeds of a note, we ordinarily mean the amount due or collected upon it." Wheeler, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Winnett, 3 Nebr. (Unoff.) 22, 91 N. W. 514, 515.

"Taking the words in their ordinary sense, a general power to dispose of land or real estate and to take in return therefor such proceeds as one thinks best, will include the power of disposing of them in exchange for other lands." Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 380, 25 L. ed. 855.

54. Century Dict. [quoted in Matter of duce, as the proceeds of an estate; the amount or value of goods sold and converted into money;[55] money or other articles of value obtained from the sale of property;[56] the money which arises from the conversion of land or other property;[57] the produce or profits of anything;[58] the sum, amount, value of goods or things sold and converted into money;[59] the sum, amount; money arising from the sale; the purchase price; the bid;[60] the useful or material results of an action or course.[61] It is a word of loose and varying significance[62] and one of equivocal import and of great generality.[63] The word is sometimes construed as meaning "harvest" or "product,"[64] or "produce" or "income,"[65] and as employed in and in connection with the context and subject-matter of various contracts,[66]

Gates, 51 N. Y. App. Div. 350, 352, 64 N. Y. Suppl. 1050].

55. Webster Dict. [quoted in Dow v. Whetten, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 160, 170].

It does not necessarily mean money; its meaning in each case depending very much upon the connection in which it was employed, and the subject-matter to which it is applied. Hunt v. Williams, 126 Ind. 493, 494, 26 N. E. 177; Thomson's Appeal, 89 Pa. St. 36, 46; Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 380, 25 L. ed. 855.

"The word . . . is of such general signification that resort must usually be made to the context, and to the subject matter to which it relates, in order to ascertain its meaning;" and where a stock of goods was transferred to mortgagees at an inventory price, which was credited on the mortgage, and the mortgagees, on the transfer being set aside, were ordered to account "for the proceeds of the property transferred to them" the word included the price agreed to be paid for the goods, and did not refer only to the amounts realized from sales of the property by the mortgagee. Armour Packing Co. v. London, 53 S. C. 539, 543, 31 S. E. 500.

64. Matter of Gates, 51 N. Y. App. Div. 350, 352, 64 N. Y. Suppl. 1050.

65. Birmingham v. Lesan, 77 Me. 494, 497, 1 Atl. 151.

In the ordinary acceptation of the term, it conveys the same idea as produce. It is something proceeding from or produced by another. Dow v. Whetten, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 160, 161.

Strictly speaking, it implies something that arises or leads out of, or from, another thing, and in its ordinary acceptation, when applied to the income to be derived from real estate, it embraces the idea of issues, rents and profits, or produce. Hunt v. Williams, 126 Ind. 493, 494, 26 N. E. 177.

66. See cases cited infra, this note.

As used in an agreement of an assignee and judgment creditors with the sheriff, that the proceeds of a sale of stock of goods were to be paid to the sheriff in satisfaction of an execution held by him, the term meant the amount of money produced, less the cost of sale. Dickson's Estate, 166 Pa. St. 134, 143, 30 Atl. 1032. See also Matter of Mitchell, 61 Hun (N. Y.) 372, 384, 16 N. Y. Suppl. 180.

As used in an agreement with a judgment creditor that certain acts of forbearance on his part "shall not prejudice the lien of his judgment, or his right to payment 'out of the future proceeds of the property,'" the term means the amount of money that would in the future be obtained for the property upon a disposition of it by sale. Belmont v. Ponvert, 35 N. Y. Super. Ct. 208, 212.

As used in a bond given by a mortgagor to a junior mortgagee who had brought suit to foreclose his mortgage, the condition of the bond being that the mortgagor would, within a fixed time after the sale of the premises under foreclosure, pay to such mortgagee the balance due upon the judgment to be rendered in favor of said mortgagee, after applying the proceeds arising from the sale of the mortgaged premises to the payment of the mortgage indebtedness, according to the priorities established by the court, the term means "the sum, amount, money arising from the sale; the purchase price; the bid." Merrimack River Sav. Bank v. Curry, 4 Kan. App. 125, 46 Pac. 204, 205.

In a contract for the sale of goods providing that all of said goods as also all proceeds therefrom are to be held in trust by the purchaser for the payment of his obligations to the buyer, the term is comprehensive enough to include notes taken by such purchaser for the goods sold by him. Mordecai v. Steignious, 53 S. C. 95, 105, 30 S. E. 717.

As used in a contract providing for the payment for certain repairs upon buildings, out of the proceeds of the business conducted at the said premises, the term is equivalent to "receipts" or "gross proceeds." Smith v. Hubert, 83 Hun (N. Y.) 503, 508, 31 N. Y. Suppl. 1076.

As used in a contract whereby plaintiff was to receive all the proceeds of logs delivered statutes,[67] or wills [68] has been frequently before the courts for interpretation. The word has been considered by lexicographers as a mercantile term, and they accordingly distinguish it from the same word, when used in another sense, as to proceed on a journey, or in any other undertaking.[69] (Proceeds: Of Firm Property, as Partnership Assets, see PARTNERSHIP, 30 Cyc. 424. Of Insurance of Property and Right Thereto, see FIRE INSURANCE, 19 Cyc. 883. Of Judicial Sale, see JUDICIAL SALES, 24 Cyc. 73. Of Partition Sale, Disposition of, see PARTITION, 30 Cyc. 291. Of Sales — In Admiralty, see ADMIRALTY, 1 Cyc. 895; Of Homestead, see HOMESTEADS, 21 Cyc. 497; Of Property Subject to Landlord's Lien, see LANDLORD AND TENANT, 24 Cyc. 1280; Under Execution, see EXECUTIONS, 17 Cyc. 1351; Under Foreclosure, see MORTGAGES, 27 Cyc. 1496; CHATTEL MORTGAGES, 7 Cyc. 115; MECHANICS' LIENS, 27 Cyc. 451; Under Judgment in Creditor's Suits or Similar Proceedings, see CREDITORS' SUITS, 12 Cyc. 59; FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES, 20 Cyc. 824.)

by one defendant to another, after deducting the advances made by the other, the term means net proceeds after all charges for delivery, including raftage and boomage, have been paid. Moss Point Lumber Co. v. Thompson, 83 Miss. 499, 504, 35 So. 828.

The phrase "proceeds of the wood and timber" in a contract that defendants might cut, carry away and dispose of all the wood and timber on a certain lot of land, provided they paid over to plaintiff the proceeds of the same as fast as sold and paid for, with plaintiff's approval, is broad enough to include the gross amount of the sales. McMurphy v. Garland, 47 N. H. 316, 319.

Where insurance was effected upon goods to a foreign port, and "upon the 'proceeds' thereof home: the goods valued at the sum insured out; the policy to be 'open' on the proceeds home," and the identical goods shipped to the foreign port were returned in the same vessel to the home port, and damaged upon their return voyage, it was held that they were not protected by the policy during the voyage homeward. "The grammatical sense of the term is the substituted cargo, or property, whatever it may be, which results from, or is acquired, by means of the specified goods. It imports a sale, barter, or other disposition of the outward cargo, or some operation therewith, by which, or by the future investment of the moneys or funds derived therefrom, other goods or insurable property are obtained, on which the policy is to attach for the return voyage. It does not necessarily follow, that the operation is to be effected by a sale or absolute disposition of the goods; the term, by a just and liberal construction, will fairly embrace any insurable interest, which the outward cargo, by any arrangement, enables the assured to procure for the return voyage." Dow v. Hope Ins. Co., 1 Hall (N. Y.) 185, 191. See also Haven v. Gray, 12 Mass. 71.

67. See cases cited infra, this note.

As used in a statute making it an offense punishable by fine to take part in any sport, game, play or public diversion on Sunday, except a sacred concert, music or an entertainment given by a religious or charitable society, the proceeds of which, if any, are to be devoted exclusively to a charitable or religious purpose, the term means, that which finally results or proceeds from the entertainment, taking into account not only that which is received, but that which is incidentally and properly paid out. Com. v. Alexander, 185 Mass. 551, 553, 70 N. E. 1017.

Under a statute providing that the proceeds of all lands that have been or may hereafter be granted to this state, where by the terms and conditions of such grant the same are not otherwise appropriated, are declared to be perpetual funds for common school purposes, the term implies a sale and conversion of the lands into money. McMurtry v. Engelhardt, 5 Nebr. (Unoff.) 271, 98 N. W. 40, 41.

68. See cases cited infra, this note.

As applied to the disposition of property the term must be construed to mean money or other property. Sprecht v. Parsons, 7 Utah 107, 108, 25 Pac. 730.
