where the child does not appear to be in any appreciable danger the railroad company is not responsible for an accident which could not have been guarded against by any reasonable degree of diligence.[35]

(2) RIGHT TO PRESUME CHILD WILL AVOID DANGER. As to a child of tender years, the railroad employees in charge of a train have no right to act on the assumption that it will heed signals of danger given by an approaching train, and will act with the discretion of an adult in remaining in a place of safety or getting out of the way of such trains,[36] unless it is apparently of sufficient age and intelligence to understand the danger of its position;[37] but on the contrary it is held that in such case the railroad employees are bound to assume that the child will remain and are charged with the highest degree of care on its behalf.[38]

(E) As to Infirm or Helpless Persons — (1) IN GENERAL. The degree of care and prudence required of railroad employees operating a train toward a person seen on or near the track as stated above [39] is not ordinarily affected by the physical condition of the party injured, when not involving the question of contributory negligence;[40] and the fact that such person is deaf or laboring under some other physical disability, in the absence of knowledge of that fact by such employees, does not increase their duty toward him; and if after becoming aware that he cannot or will not get out of danger, they use all reasonable efforts to prevent an injury, the railroad company is not liable,[41] although the person injured was deaf,[42]

b. As to Persons at Stations — (i) In General. While railroad employees, knowing of the enhanced danger at depot grounds on account of persons constantly passing and repassing, are required to exercise a greater degree of caution and prudence than at other places where persons have no right to be, and where the employees have no right to expect to find them,[51] they ordinarily owe no duty to a trespasser or mere licensee upon depot premises except not to wantonly or wilfully injure him.[52] Where, however, a person is upon the depot premises or approaches upon the express or implied invitation of the railroad company, as for a business purpose connected with the railroad company or for which the depot is used, the railroad company should use a reasonable degree of care and prudence for his safety.[53] Thus a railroad company owes the duty of exercising reasonable and ordinary care and diligence to avoid injuring one who is on its station premises for the purpose of accompanying or meeting friends who are about to take or alight from its trains,[54] or who goes to the depot premises for delivering freight for shipment,[60] or of a person coming thereon to deliver or carry away freight.[61]

(III) Articles Projecting, Falling, or Thrown From Trains. A railroad company is also liable for injuries, caused by articles negligently projecting, falling, or being thrown from trains on depot premises, to one who is rightfully upon such premises by the express or implied invitation of the company;[62] but not for injuries so caused to one who is there without such invitation.[63] While an agent of the United States postal department, in charge of a mail car, is not a servant of the railroad company carrying mails under contract with the United States government, in such sense that the negligence of the agent in the matter of throwing a mail bag from the train, causing injury to a bystander, is primarily chargeable to the railroad company,[64] yet the railroad company is liable for injuries to persons who are rightfully on its depot premises, regardless of whether they are passengers or not,[65] if it permits the mail agent to pursue a course of conduct with reference to the throwing off of mail bags at stations which is dangerous to bystanders, and if the course of conduct has been continued for a sufficient length of time, so that the railway company is presumed to have had knowledge thereof, its liability will be sufficiently shown.[66]

A railroad company's obligation of care extends to and embraces all the accessories of its business, including stations and depots, which must be constructed and erected with care, properly lighted, and otherwise made convenient and safe for persons lawfully entering thereon for the transaction of business, although the company is bound to use only ordinary care except in favor of passengers. Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Grush, 67 Ill. 262, 16 Am. Rep. 618. Mailing letters.— It is the duty of a railroad company which carries the mail under a contract with the United States and by whose regulations postal clerks on mail trains are required to receive at the cars stamped letters and sell stamps, to furnish a reasonably safe passage to and from its mail trains, while stopping at its regular stations, for the purpose of mailing letters. (IV) OPERATION OF TRAINS. Since the railroad employees have reason to expect that persons will be on the track at depot grounds, it is the duty of those in charge of a train to exercise ordinary care in approaching or running past a depot or station.[67] It is their duty in such case to give the proper or statutory signals,[68] keep a proper lookout,[69] and not to run at a negligent rate of speed.[70] Thus it is negligence to run a train at a high rate of speed past a station where a passenger train is receiving and discharging passengers,[71] or where a passenger train is just pulling into the station,[72] especially where the track on which the speeding train is moving is between the station and the track on which the passenger train is.[73]

Where a passenger train is stopped on a side-track, having other trains between it and the depot platform, it is negligence to allow another train to pass between such train and the depot at a high rate of speed, without any warning, while business is being rightfully transacted with the standing train, and the railroad company is liable to any

c. As to Persons Working On or About Tracks or Cars — (I) ON OR ABOUT TRACKS. It is the duty of a railroad company to use reasonable care and precaution in the operation of its trains or cars, so as to protect persons working on or about its tracks, upon its express or implied invitation, from dangers of which it knows or ought to know,[74] as in the case of one lawfully on or about its tracks in the employ of an independent contractor.[75] But it is not liable for failing to provide against dangers which it does not know of, or could not reasonably have anticipated;[76] nor is it liable for injuries to a workman who is a trespasser or mere licensee, unless such injuries are caused by its failure to exercise reasonable care after he is observed to be in a dangerous position.[77]

(II) ON OR ABOUT CARS — (A) In General. As to persons working on or about a railroad company's cars, upon its express or implied invitation, the company owes the duty of exercising reasonable care and precaution to avoid injuring them.[78] In such cases the railroad company should exercise ordinary care in

A. 559, holding that an employee of a lumber company, engaged about a spur track, built from the line of a railroad on land of the lumber company, is not a trespasser, and the railroad company is bound to use ordinary care in handling its engines and cars on the spur track to avoid injuring him. See also Collier v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 27 Ont. App. 630.

Where persons are lawfully and with defendant's knowledge engaged in grading for a new railway track alongside of and parallel to defendant's original or main track, and the ordinary duties of their work frequently require them to be in such close proximity to defendant's original track as to be liable to be struck by passing trains, and it has been the uniform practice of those operating the railroad to give such warning of their approach, the railroad company owes such persons the duty of active vigilance in giving proper signals of the approach of trains, and they have a right to rely upon the continued performance of such duty. Erickson v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 41 Minn. 500, 43 N. W. 332, 5 L. R. A. 786.

A person on a track simply in the performance of work given to him by a station agent without authority of the company cannot complain of a breach of a duty owed to the public, since his presence on the track is not induced by the fact that it is used for public travel. Where the railroad company has promised that its trains shall not pass a point at which the employees of a firm of contractors are engaged in removing rock and dirt in order to straighten the track, at a speed of more than six miles an hour, a violation of such promise is negligence as to the employees of such contractor. Where work is being prosecuted by a railroad contractor which is not of such a character as to interrupt the ordinary operation of trains, the railroad company is not guilty of negligence in failing to reduce the speed of trains at that point, in the absence of evidence that any one connected with the operation of the road and in authority had knowledge that the work was being done at the time and place in question. Where a railroad employee has apparent authority to authorize another to work on cars the railroad company is liable for negligently injuring him, whether or not the employee had actual authority for that purpose. Santa Fe, etc., R. Co. v. Ford, (Ariz. 1906) 85 Pac. 1072.

Where a person injured was working at the right car, it is immaterial whether any of its servants pointed out such car, or who pointed it out. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Bryant, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 4, 66 S. W. 804.

maintaining the cars [79] and adjoining premises [80] upon which such person has to work or go in a reasonably safe condition; and should likewise use such care in the movement of trains or cars which are likely to injure a workman of whose presence it has or ought to have knowledge,[81] as in setting the brakes or other-

Such care is not restricted to persons working in or about the cars on the track, but also applies as to persons whose work is connected with such cars, and who may be injured by their being disturbed; as in the case of one working in an icehouse, to which ice was being removed from a car by means of slide, and who was injured by the slide being moved. That a car is placed on an inclined track which causes it to careen, instead of being placed at a derrick for the purpose of being loaded, does not show that the track is out of repair, improperly constructed, or otherwise defective, so as to render the railroad company liable to a workman who is injured by slipping while working on the car. That the railroad company used due care to stop the train after discovering that a collision was probable is no defense to its negligence in moving its train on a track to the injury of a workman who was engaged about a car thereon. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 166 Ill. 572, 46 N. E. 1125 [affirming 67 Ill. App. 386].

License to move car.— Where a railroad company leaves its cars securely coupled on a side-track for the use of certain licensees, whose license allowed them to uncouple such cars as were needed for immediate use and removal, the company is not bound to anticipate that such licensees will uncouple any other cars and leave them standing on a side-track. (B) Signals, Warnings, and Lookouts. Where a railroad company knows, or has reason to know, that a person is working on or about a standing car, it is negligent and liable for resulting injuries if it fails to keep a proper lookout for such person,[85] or if it fails to give a reasonable and timely warning or notice to such person of its intention to move or interfere with the car,[86] unless he is Ignorance by railroad servants of the presence in one of its cars of one rightfully working there does not relieve the company from liability for damage done by reason of its negligence. Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. Duffey, 116 Ga. 346, 42 S. E. 510.

That the place of delivery of freight is not a depot or public place, but a place selected by agreement between the consignee and the company for convenience, does not relieve the company from liability for negligently operating its trains to one rightfully on the premises engaged in removing freight. Notice to employer.— It has been held that where notice of such intended movement of trains or cars is given to the employer of a workman engaged on or about the cars it is sufficient, and that a railroad company is not negligent for failing to notify an employee, in the absence of knowledge that he is at work about the cars at the time. McInerney v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 151 N. Y. 411, 45 N. E. 848 [affirming 82 Hun 615, 31 N. Y. Suppl. 1130]. But see Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. Duffey, 116 Ga. 346, 42 S. E. 510.

As to a workman who is aware of the approach of moving cars, a railroad company is not compelled to avoid striking cars upon which such workman is at the time, nor is it compelled to see that he gets off before the moving cars are permitted to strike or bump against the stationary cars. Safety in loading.— A railroad company is not guilty of negligence because a car load of lumber is not so piled on the car in loading that it will not fall over at the sides while being unloaded, on the removal of the stakes and cross ties which hold it securely while being transported. Hulse v. New York, etc., R. Co., 71 Hun (N. Y.) 40, 24 N. Y. Suppl. 512.

The falling of a car door upon a person who is endeavoring to open it to inspect the contents, consigned to his employers, is evidence of a defective condition of the door (Tateman v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 96 Mo. App. 448, 70 S. Co., 193 Mass. 359, 79 N. E. 742).

Defective brakes.— It has been held that a car with defective brakes is not such an eminently defective instrument as to render a railroad company liable for an injury to one working on such car in the employ of a shipper. Snow and ice on a car is not such a defect on the premises of the railroad company as will render it liable for injuries sustained by another's servant while working thereon, under the rule that the owner of the premises inviting others thereon is bound to keep them in a reasonably safe condition; the presence of the ice and snow being an obvious danger which the servant is held to assume. pany he is not an employee, or a passenger, his right of action and recovery against the railroad company shall be such only as would exist if he were an employee.[92] Under such statute if the place of the accident is for general purposes the premises of a railroad company and the person injured is lawfully engaged or employed on or about them, and is not a passenger;[93] or if the place is not exclusively and for general purposes, but only within a limited and statutory sense, the premises of a railroad company, but the person injured is engaged in a business connected with the railroad, in the sense that it is ordinarily the duty of railroad employees,[94] a person injured while so engaged is treated as a quasi-employee and cannot recover for ordinary negligence of a railroad employee;[95] but if the work has no relation to defendant's railroad work as such, and is connected with defendant's railroad only by irrelevant and immaterial circumstances of locality, the case is not within the statute at all, and a person injured while so employed by negligence of the railroad employees may recover therefor.[96]

ity to invite or give him permission to ride thereon, he is entitled to the exercise of ordinary care for his protection.[23]

(B) As to Children. Likewise a railroad company owes no duty to a child which goes upon an engine or car upon the invitation or with the permission of an employee having no authority to grant such right,[24] if the child is able to appreciate its danger;[25] except that defendant shall not wilfully or wantonly injure it.[26] But where the permission or custom of allowing children to ride on a train or car is known and acquiesced in by the officials of the road, and the employee has apparent authority to grant such permission, it is the duty of the railroad company to use due care for the protection of one upon its train or car upon such an invitation or permission.[27] So, where the child is not of sufficient age or intelligence to appreciate the danger of boarding and riding on a car, and the act is such as might be done by a child of his age and intelligence, and the railroad employees invited or permitted him to ride there, the company will be liable, although it had forbidden the employees to permit any one to ride on the car.[28]

c. From Depots. A railroad depot and grounds have a quasi-public character by the license of the company as a common carrier of passengers; but that license extends only to a reasonable use for the accommodation of passengers and necessary privileges connected with the business.[46] A railroad company may therefore make reasonable regulations for the conduct of all persons who come upon its depot premises, and may authorize its servants to remove therefrom any person who violates its regulations, using no greater force than is necessary for the removal.[47] This rule has been applied to innkeepers or their agents upon a depot platform for the purpose of soliciting passengers to patronize their houses,[48] and to persons selling lunches to passengers or soliciting orders therefor.[49]

4. Contributory Negligence[50] — a. Of Persons On or Near Tracks Generally — (i) In General — (A) Care Required. As a general rule it is the duty of a person going on or near a railroad track to use ordinary care and precaution, under the circumstances, to protect himself from the dangers which he knows or has reason to know are incident to the operation of the road and the running of its trains; and if he fails to do so he is guilty of contributory negligence which will prevent a recovery.[51] This rule applies generally whether the person so situated is rightfully there by the express or implied invitation of the railroad company, or otherwise,[52] or whether he is a mere licensee.[53] The degree of care and precaution required depends upon the circumstances at the particular time and place, and on the question of contributory negligence, it is material whether corporation may exclude whom it pleases when they come to transact their own private business with passengers or third persons, and admit whom it pleases when they come to transact such business.

Illustrations.— Thus a person is guilty of contributory negligence where, having business with defendant's freight department, he is struck by a car while standing on a track in the drilling yard of the company with his back toward the only direction of danger (Diebold v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 50 N. J. L. 478, 14 Atl. 576); or, where his duty requires him to stand on a railroad track, he remains there longer than necessary (Goodall v. New York Cent. R. Co., 89 Hun (N. Y.) 559, 35 N. Y. Suppl. 544).

Use of public street.— The public has an equal right with a railroad company to use a street, and the proper use thereof by a pedestrian does not necessarily charge him with contributory negligence, unless the circumstances are such as to indicate to a man of ordinary prudence that the use thereof at the time and place will be attended with danger. the person injured was a trespasser or mere licensee, or whether he was at the place of the injury by the invitation of the company.[54] Thus it is held that a higher degree of care is required of one walking along a track than of one crossing directly over it,[55] at a public crossing,[56] although he may be at or on such a crossing at the time;[57] and while a person, although rightfully on the track, assumes the ordinary risks incident to the operation of the road,[58] he need not generally exercise more than ordinary care,[59] nor provide against unknown or unusual dangers.[60] But it is held that a trespasser who walks upon or along a track is bound to exercise the utmost degree of care and diligence;[61] and it is also held that the fact that he is a trespasser makes him guilty of contributory negligence.[62]

(B) Knowledge of Danger. A railroad track is of itself notice of danger to any one crossing or walking thereon,[63] and a person may be guilty of contributory negligence in wrongfully walking thereon regardless of whether he knew that trains were due at the time.[64] Where a person familiar with the locality and the operation of the road goes upon or near the track and exposes himself to dangers which he knows or has reason to know, he is bound to exercise a degree of care commensurate with the danger to be expected,[65] and if he fails to do so

Where a person familiar with the locality elects to travel upon the railroad tracks instead of taking a safer road, as by paths or roads at the side, he is bound to know that the track or space between them is dangerous and to use a degree of care commensurate

he is guilty of contributory negligence, which will prevent a recovery,[66] in some cases as a matter of law.[67] The mere fact, however, that one has knowledge of the danger does not make him guilty of negligence per se in going on or near the tracks, if he has a right to go there and if he otherwise uses ordinary care;[68] and if he uses the care that a man of ordinary prudence under like circumstances and knowing the danger to be apprehended would have exercised, he is entitled to recover for injuries due to the railroad company's negligence.[69]

(c) Acts in Emergencies. Where a person who, without his own fault, is placed in sudden peril by an approaching train or car, or otherwise, makes a mistake in judgment in endeavoring to avoid injury, he is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, although his act is the direct and immediate cause of his injury, if he otherwise acts in a manner in which a man of ordinary prudence would have acted under similar circumstances;[70] although it is otherwise where his position of peril is caused by some act of negligence on his own part.[71] Thus a person is not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to rescue another from in front of an approaching train,[72] unless his efforts are made injury, notwithstanding such contributory negligence.[83] The mere fact, however, that one goes upon a railroad track is not necessarily negligence, if he does so rightfully,[84] as where the tracks are laid in a public street or highway, and he goes upon the track as one of the public;[85] and if he could not by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the consequence of the company's negligence his right to recover exists,[86] although it is otherwise if he might have avoided the consequence of such negligence, but failed to do so.[87]

(E) Customary Use of Track. The fact that the person injured, or others, have been in the habit of going upon or walking along the railroad tracks with the company's knowledge, does not relieve him from exercising ordinary care,[88] or, as it has been held, the utmost care and vigilance,[89] for his own protection while on the track. If such use amounts to a license, it must be on the condition that the pedestrian shall exercise ordinary care and diligence to avoid injury.[90]

(F) Disregarding Warnings or Signals. It is contributory negligence for a person to cross tracks in disregard of a sign or warning forbidding crossing at that point,[91] although persons were in the habit of crossing there,[92] particularly where a safe point of crossing is readily accessible.[93] So a person is guilty of contributory negligence where he goes or remains on the track in disregard of signals or other warning of an approaching train.[94]

(G) Crossing Trestles or Bridges. It is at least evidence of contributory negligence for a person wrongfully walking on a railroad track to attempt to cross a railroad trestle or bridge,[95] particularly where it is too high to jump therefrom to the ground in safety,[96] or where he goes thereon without looking or listening before entering,[97] or in disregard of a sign-board or other warning not to cross,[98] unless he is sure that he can safely stand thereon while a train passes.[99] If he knows that a train is momentarily expected thereon, it has been held that his going on the bridge or trestle is gross negligence,[1] or negligence as a matter of law.[2] Or if the bridge or trestle is of such height or surroundings that a person thereon could save himself by jumping, it is contributory negligence for him to fail to do so.[3] Even though one has a right to cross a railroad bridge or trestle on spaces provided for that purpose, he must use due care to avoid being injured by passing trains,[4] or by falling through the bridge or trestle.[5]

(H) Standing or Passing Near Standing Trains or Cars. For a person to wrongfully stand in a dangerous place between,[6] or near standing trains or cars,[7] or to attempt to pass over, under, or between such trains or cars which he knows or has reason to know are liable to be moved at any moment is contributory negligence which will prevent a recovery.[8]

(I) Going on Track Near Approaching Trains or Cars. A person is also guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery for injuries sustained, where he heedlessly or carelessly goes or remains upon a railroad track in front of a train, locomotive, or car which he knows or has reason to know is approaching,[9] as where he goes or remains upon the track knowing that a train is due or is likely to pass at any time;[10] or where he goes or remains upon the

One traveling on a dark night on a railroad track knowing that a train is due and who is struck by such train is guilty of negligence which precludes a recovery. State v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 58 Md. 482 (holding that a person who walks on a railroad track for a distance of one and one-half miles on a dark night, knowing that it is about time for an express train to pass and not knowing track in front of a train or car which he sees or hears approaching,[11] or which he must have seen or heard unless he was acting heedlessly,[12] although the railroad company itself is negligent in running the train at an excessive or unlawful rate of speed,[13] or in not giving the proper or required signals,[14] or in not using a proper headlight,[15] unless those in charge of the train or car could, by the use of ordinary diligence or care, have prevented the injury after discovering the injured party's peril.[16]

(J) As Proximate Cause of Injury. Within the meaning of the rule that the injured party cannot recover for injuries of which his negligence was the proximate cause,[17] his negligence is the proximate cause of the injury when by the exercise of ordinary care he might have avoided the consequences of the negligence of the railroad company,[18] that is, where his negligence is concurrent with or subsequent to that of the railroad company and continues up to the time of the injury, and but for which the injury would not have happened.[19] If his act is directly connected so as to be concurrent with that of the railroad company, whether it has in fact passed, assumes the risk of injury); Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Richards, 59 Tex. 375 (without regard as to whether the engine failed to carry a headlight).

Negligence per se.— Where a person walks along a railroad track at a point where he can see an approaching train at a distance of over one half a mile, and where he can with perfect safety and convenience leave the track and walk by the side of it, and with knowledge that it is nearly train time he continues on the track until he is struck by a train coming from behind him, he is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. his negligence is the proximate cause of the injury and will bar his recovery.[20] But where his negligent act is a prior, distinct, and independent transaction from that of the railroad company, it is a remote cause of the injury and will not bar a recovery if the injury could have been prevented by the exercise of reasonable care, and prudence on the part of the railroad company.[21]

(II) FAILURE TO LOOK AND LISTEN[22] — (A) In General. Although a person crossing or traveling along a railroad track is not absolutely bound to see or hear an approaching train,[23] it is his duty to listen and keep a lookout for approaching trains or cars,[24] in both directions,[25] and to continue looking and listening

Illustrations.— Thus it is contributory negligence for a man in vigorous bodily and mental health, with good hearing and sight, with nothing to obstruct his vision, to step on or along a railroad track upon which part of a freight train is backing at a rate of eight miles an hour, whereby he is overtaken and killed (King v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 114 Fed. 855, 52 C. C. A. 489); or for one who goes upon a platform built so close to a track that a passing locomotive projects over it and knowing such fact, to fail to keep a lookout for trains (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Reichert, 69 Ill. App. 91). So where a person sound in body and mind deliberately sits down in the way of a train and goes to sleep or becomes so mentally absorbed as not to keep a proper lookout he is guilty of gross negligence. Teel v. Ohio River R. Co., 49 W. Va. 85, 38 S. E. 518.

Persons walking in the middle of a track on a dark night taking no precaution for their safety cannot throw upon the trainmen the entire duty of securing their safety through unusual vigilance and extraordinary promptness. White v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 114 La. 825, 38 So. 574.

or wantonly inflicted,[29] or unless the trainmen fail to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring him after discovering his peril.[30] Thus a person is guilty of contributory negligence in going near, upon, or along a railroad track without looking or listening when he knows or has reason to know that a train or car is due or is likely to pass at any time.[31] But where a person is lawfully upon or near the tracks, it has been held that he is not bound to look and listen if there is nothing to suggest danger from any source.[32] It has been held that it is not negligence per se for a person going rightfully upon or along a railroad track to fail to look or listen for an approaching train,[33] as where he has reasonable cause to believe that he is in no danger from a passing train;[34] but on the other hand it has been held contributory negligence per se to fail to keep a lookout or to listen at a place where it is obvious that cars and engines are likely to be moving in either direction at any time.[35] It has also been held that one who, upon approaching, crossing, or standing upon a railroad track where cars are being run, fails to look for approaching trains is prima facie guilty of such negligence as will prevent a recovery,[36] and that this presumption can only be rebutted by facts and circumstances, showing that it was not reasonably practicable to make or keep such lookout, or such as would ordinarily induce persons of common prudence to omit that precaution.[37]

(B) Opportunity to See or Hear Train. Where a person, especially one who is familiar with the locality and the running of trains, voluntarily stands upon or walks across or along a railroad track without looking and listening at a point where his view or hearing is unobstructed and where he could see or hear an approaching train in time to avoid being injured,[38] or where, although he looks speed,[41] or without giving the required or proper signals;[42] unless those in charge of the train failed to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring him after discovering his peril,[43] or unless they wilfully, wantonly, or recklessly caused the injury.[44] In the event of an injury in such cases, it will be presumed either that the party injured did not look or listen at all, or if he did so, that he did not heed what he saw or heard.[45] But where he looks and listens, and by reason of an obstruction to his view or hearing he fails to see or hear the train in time to avoid being injured by it, contributory negligence cannot be attributed to him,[46] unless such obstruction is voluntarily caused by himself.[47] It has been held that where such person's view is obstructed by steam and smoke, it is his duty to stop until the steam and smoke have disappeared and rendered approaching trains visible.[48]

(c) Attention Attracted by Other Trains or Cars. It is contributory negligence in one, particularly where he is familiar with the locality and running of trains, to allow his attention to become absorbed by other trains or cars so that he fails to observe the approaching train or car by which he is injured, and which by the exercise of ordinary care might have been discovered in time to avoid the injury.[49]

But it has been held that it is not negligence as a matter of law for a person to permit his attention to be diverted from the place where he is walking to an approaching train by reason of which his foot is caught in the rails and crushed by such train.[50]

(D) Stepping on Track Behind Passing Trains or Cars. To step on a railroad track immediately behind a passing train, engine, or car, without looking in both directions, by reason of which the person so doing is injured by a following train or car, or by the passing train or car immediately backing, is contributory negligence precluding a recovery,[51] where such person's peril is not discovered in time to stop the train or car and prevent the accident.[52]

(III) Reliance Upon Precautions of Railroad Company. It is a fact to be considered, in determining whether a person injured was himself in the exercise of ordinary care, that persons going rightfully upon or along a railroad track have a right to rely upon the presumption that the railroad company will operate its trains with the rightful and proper precautions,[53] as that it will give the usual or statutory signals or warnings,[54] and will not run its trains or cars at an excessive

An employee of a railroad company has the right to act upon the presumption that another company using the track will conform to the rules of his company, as to signals and stops (Roll v. Northern Cent. R. Co., 15 Hun (N. Y. 496 [affirmed in 80 N. Y. 647]); as that it will comply with the rules of his company requiring a brakeman on cars set in motion to be in a position to enable him to perceive danger (Noonan v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 16 N. Y. Suppl. 678 [affirmed in 131 N. Y. 594, 30 N. E. 67], holding therefore that an employee working upon the track and omitting to pay attention to the movements of approaching trains in reliance upon such rules is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law).

That its freight cars will be loaded in the usual mode, and not with timbers projecting beyond the sides, may be presumed. Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Ward, 4 Colo. 30.

54. Sonier v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 141 Mass. 10, 6 N. E. 84 (holding that the mere fact that one having the right to cross the track relied upon such signals and did not look to see if a train was approaching is not conclusive of a want of due care on his part); Goodfellow v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 106 Mass. 461; Mark v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 32 Minn. 208, 20 N. W. 131; Carroll v. Minnesota Valley R. Co., 14 Minn. 57; Stanley v. Durham, etc., R. Co., 120 N. C. 514, 27 S. Co. v. Woodward, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 63 S. W. 1051.

A person rightfully on a track in a public street has a right to presume and act on the belief that the railroad company will not move its locomotives or cars thereon without giving the usual or statutory signals (Illinois Terminal R. Co. v. Mitchell, 214 Ill. 151, 73 N. E. 449; Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Hammett, 115 Ill. App. 268 [reversed on other grounds in 220 Ill. 9, 77 N. E. 72]; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Murowski, 78 Ill. App. 661; McWilliams v. Detroit Cent. Mills Co., 31 Mich. 274; Solen v. Virginia, etc., R. Co., 13 Nev. 106); and where he is injured by the sudden backing of a standing train without warning, there would need to be very positive proof of negligence on his part to defeat his right of recovery (McWilliams v. Detroit Cent. Mills Co., supra).

Persons crossing a track where they have a right to cross, and where their presence should be anticipated, may rely upon the fact that some lookout will be kept or warning given of the approach of trains, and in or unlawful rate of speed;[55] but this rule does not mean that such person may rely entirely upon a proper performance on the part of the railroad company of its duties, and omit the exercise of all ordinary care on his own part,[56] and no inference of due care on the part of such person can be drawn from the mere fact of negligence on the part of the company,[57] unless the company, by its conduct, has misled him and thereby in effect induced him into a position of peril.[58] If such a person fails to exercise ordinary care for his own safety he is not excused by the fact that the railroad company failed to give the proper or statutory signals,[59] or that the train was running at an excessive or unlawful rate of speed.[60] The fact that the person injured knew that the railroad company habitually violated the law in the running of its trains will not make him guilty of contributory negligence in not assuming that the train by which he was injured would be so run.[61]

(IV) Children and Others Under Disability[62] — (A) Children — (1) In General. A child going upon or near a railroad track is not required to exercise the same degree of care as is a person of mature years;[63] but he is bound to exercise such care and precaution as may be reasonably expected of a child of his age and capacity, under like circumstances,[64] and his failure to do so is the absence of a warning signal it is not conclusive evidence of negligence to go upon the track, although by looking or listening an approaching train might have been seen or heard. Davis v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 97 S. W. 1122, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 172, 99 S. W. 930, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 946.

A person on a foothpath near where pedestrians are accustomed to trespass on a railroad track in a city has a right to presume that a train will not be backed along the track without warning, especially when a fair or other cause of unusual congregating is in progress in the vicinity. Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Ward, 4 Colo. 30.

A person walking over a railroad bridge cannot rely on signals which are for the use of the employees of the company in running its train and not for the benefit of the public. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Rodgers, 100 Va. 324, 41 S. E. 732.

55. Kellny v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 101 Mo. 67, 13 S. W. 806, 8 L. R. A. 783.

A person traveling on a railroad track in a public street has a right to assume in the absence of any indication to the contrary that the railroad company will obey an ordinance limiting the speed of trains in the city. Illinois Terminal R. Co. v. Mitchell, 214 Ill. 151, 73 N. E. 449; Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Brafford, (Ind. App. 1896) 43 N. E. 882; Kellny v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 101 Mo. 67, 13 S. W. 806, 8 L. R. A. 783.

58. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Bennett, 9 Ind. App. 92, 35 N. E. 1033.

59. Harty v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co., 42 N. Y. 468, holding that it is gross negligence for a person to step upon a railroad track in front of an approaching train without using the precaution of looking, even though no signal was given as required by law. And see supra, X, E, 4, a, (I), (H); X, E, 4, a, (II), (B).

60. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Bennett, 9 Ind. App. 92, 35 N. E. 1033; Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Haas, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 645, 48 S. W. 540.

That a train is being run at a greater rate of speed than allowed by ordinance does not relieve persons crossing or walking along the tracks from the exercise of ordinary care. Jelinski v. Belt R. Co., 86 Ill. App. 535; Garlich v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 131 Fed. 837, 67 C. C. A. 237, holding that while such violation may be evidence of the company's negligence, it does not affect the right of the company to set up the defense of contributory negligence in an action for the injury.

negligence which will defeat a recovery for any injury sustained thereby.[65] In such cases the question whether there is contributory negligence is to be determined from the age and intelligence of the child, and his ability to understand the dangers of the place where the injury occurred;[66] and it is ordinarily a question for the jury whether in a particular case a child was capable of contributory negligence,[67] and whether in view of his age and intelligence and the surrounding circumstances, he was guilty of such negligence;[66] although it may be declared as a matter of law that he was free from such negligence, where he is of such tender years as to be incapable of contributory negligence.[69]

(2) APPLICATIONS. It is contributory negligence precluding a recovery for a child who is of sufficient age and intelligence to understand the dangers of his position to sit or lie down upon railroad tracks and go to sleep,[70] or to fail to exercise the ordinary care which may be expected of one of his age and intelligence under the circumstances, in looking and listening,[71] or in crossing near approaching trains or cars.[72]

St. Rep. 252 (holding that special findings that a boy seven and one-half years old went to sleep on a railroad track, and that he knew that trains were run thereon, and had capacity sufficient to understand that if he remained on the track he was liable to be run over, show contributory negligence so conclusively as to prevail over a general verdict for plaintiff); St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Shiflet, 94 Tex. 131, 58 S. W. 945 [reversing (Civ. App. 1900) 56 S. W. 697] (holding that the negligence consists in the position he occupies and not in his liability to go asleep); Rudd v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 80 Va. 546.

Where a child is injured by a train while asleep on the track, and the persons in charge of the train, although negligent in proceeding at excessive speed and in failing to ring the bell, did not know of his presence in time to avoid the injury, the company is not liable. Krenzer v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 151 Ind. 587, 43 N. E. 649, 52 N. E. 220, 68 Am. St. Rep. 252.

72. Greshem v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 24 S. W. 869, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 599; Payne v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 129 Mo. 405, 31 S. W. 885; McPhillips v. New York, etc., R. Co., 12 Daly (N. Y.) 365; Philadelphia, etc., R. Co. v. Spearen, 47 Pa. St. 300, 86 Am. Dec. 544.

That a child five years old, while walking on a path twenty-two feet wide between several railroad tracks, suddenly ran on one of the tracks in front of a moving freight car and was injured does not conclusively show contributory negligence. Ficker v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 9 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 804, 6 Ohio N. P. 36, 7 Ohio N. P. 600.

Presumption of speed.—A child on or near the track has no right to presume that the train which causes the injury is running at less than the rate limited by ordinance when by looking he could see that it is moving faster, where he is a bright boy and familiar with the movements and speed of trains at the place where the injury and prudence in proportion to his defect.[73] If his hearing is defective he should exercise greater care and caution in the use of his remaining senses;[74] and if in view of such defect he fails to take proper precautions for his safety,[75] as in failing to use proper care in looking for approaching trains,[76] he is guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery, unless the railroad company was wilfully, grossly, or recklessly negligent,[77] or failed to exercise ordinary care to prevent the injury after discovering his peril.[78] So it is contributory negligence for an epileptic to walk upon railroad tracks, where he falls in a fit and is struck.[79]

(2) INTOXICATED PERSONS. The fact that a person is intoxicated does not excuse him from the consequences of his contributory negligence; and if a person in such condition goes or places himself upon or near a railroad track in such a position as to be in the way of passing trains, and by reason of his condition fails to exercise proper care and precaution for his safety, he cannot recover for injuries sustained,[80] unless those in charge of the train which caused the injury could have

73. See Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Ryon, 80 Tex. 59, 15 S. W. 588.

One of defective eyesight and hearing is guilty of contributory negligence in walking upon a railroad track at a time when a train is known to be due. Maloy v. Wabash, etc., R. Co., 84 Mo. 270.

74. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. McCombs, 54 S. W. 179, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1232; Schexnaydre v. Texas, etc., R. Co., 46 La. Ann. 288, 14 So. 513, 49 Am. St. Rep. 321. See also Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Harvin, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 54 S. W. 629.

75. Laicher v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., 28 La. Ann. 320.

Illustrations.— Thus it is contributory negligence precluding a recovery, for one who is very deaf to voluntarily go on a railroad track at a time when he must know that a train is approaching and without taking any precautions for his safety (McIver v. Georgia, etc., R. Co., 108 Ga. 306, 33 S. E. 901); or to go upon the track in full view of a rapidly approaching train in order to cross it at a private crossing, at which it is not the practice to give signals, although no signal is given (Johnson v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 91 Ky. 651, 25 S. W. 754).

That the place at which the accident occurred was constantly used by the public as a pathway does not excuse a failure of one who is very deaf to exercise reasonable care. McIver v. Georgia, etc., R. Co., 108 Ga. 306, 33 S. E. 901. Thus where a very deaf man voluntarily walks on a track when a regular passenger train is due, and is killed, he is guilty of contributory negligence, although that part of the track is used by the public as a pathway. Mississippi.— Hackney v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., (1903) 33 So. 723 (holding that where deceased, who was quite deaf, was walking against the wind and rain in open daylight, and attempted to cross the track without looking up, he was guilty of such contributory negligence as to bar a recovery, although the railroad company was negligent in not keeping a lookout at that point); Turner v. Yazoo, etc., R. Georgia.— Wilds v. Brunswick, etc., R. Co., 82 Ga. 667, 9 S. E. 595. Under Code, § 2972, if one becomes drunk and in that con-avoided the injury by the exercise of reasonable care after discovering his condition and perilous position,[81] or unless they wilfully or recklessly cause his injury,[82] or are guilty of such gross negligence on their part as in law amounts to a wilful neglect of duty.[83] The mere fact, however, that the party injured had been drinking will not prevent a recovery if he was not under the influence of liquor to a degree that prevented his exercising ordinary care.[84]

(v) Effect of Contributory Negligence Generally — (A) In General. In the absence of statute otherwise, it is well settled that in an action for injuries caused to one going on or near a railroad track, contributory negligence on the part of the party injured will bar a recovery, notwithstanding negligence on the part of the railroad company,[85] as in running at an excessive or unlawful dition places himself on a railroad track, he cannot recover for injuries received whether the railroad company has been negligent or not. Southwestern R. Co. v. Hankerson, 61 Ga. 114.

rate of speed,[86] or without giving the proper or required signal,[87] unless it fails to use due care and diligence to avert the accident after discovering his peril,[88] or unless it wilfully, wantonly, or recklessly causes the injury.[89] While it has been held that the injured party cannot recover within the meaning of the above rule, for injuries to which his own negligence in any way contributes,[90] the weight of authority is to the effect that contributory negligence bars a recovery only where it is concurrent and forms the proximate cause of the injury complained of,[91] for if the negligence of the railroad company is the proximate and that of the party injured merely the remote cause of the injury, an action is maintainable therefor notwithstanding the party injured may not have been entirely free from fault.[92]

(B) Under Statutes Imposing Liability on Railroad Company. Contributory negligence as a defense in actions under the statutes imposing a liability for damages, where a railroad company fails to exercise the statutory precautions depends upon the wording of the statute.[93] Under some statutes it is held that contributory negligence is a good defense as at common law, notwithstanding a violation of such statute by the railroad company.[94] Under other statutes, while contributory negligence is no bar to the action, it is a good defense in mitigation of damages.[95] And under others contributory negligence is no defense unless it consists of a voluntary, deliberate, wilful, and reckless exposure to danger.[96]

(c) Comparative Negligence.[97] The common-law doctrine of comparative negligence either has never been recognized or has been abolished in probably all jurisdictions.[98] In some jurisdictions, however, there is a modification of this doctrine by statute, under which, while the party injured is debarred from recovering for injuries caused entirely by his negligence or by his consent,[99] yet where both parties are in fault and contribute to the injury, the contributory negligence

Applications.— Contributory negligence has been held a good defense under a statute making a railroad company liable for all damages resulting from neglect to keep a constant lookout on its trains for persons or property on the track (Little Rock, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, (Ark. 1898) 43 S. W. 969 [Act of April 8, 1891]; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Dingman, 62 Ark. 245, 35 S. W. 219; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Leathers, 62 Ark. 235, 35 S. W. 216); or under a statute providing that injuries resulting in running trains at a greater speed than is permitted by ordinance shall be presumed "to have been done by the negligence of the said corporation or their agents" (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Gunderson, 65 Ill. App. 638, Rev. St. c. 114, § 87); or under a statute requiring railroad companies to construct at points where the road crosses a public highway, safe crossings and cattle-guards, and making them liable for damages caused by neglect to do so, and providing that the injured party need only prove such neglect to authorize a recovery (Ford v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 91 Iowa 179, 59 N. W. 5, 24 L. R. A. 657, under Code (1873), § 1288).

95. Under Tenn. Code, §§ 1166–1168 (Milliken & V. Code, §§ 1298–1300), making a railroad company liable in case of failure to observe the precautions required, although the party injured was negligent, contributory negligence, however gross, does not operate as an absolute bar to an action against a railroad company for injuries resulting from the non-observance of the statutory precautions; but such negligence goes only in mitigation of damages. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Foster, 88 Tenn. 671, 13 S. W. 694, 14 S. W. 428; and Tennessee cases cited infra, X, E, 4, a, (v), (c) text and note 1. Under such statute the failure of an engineer to sound the alarm whistle the instant he saw a person on the track as required by statute renders the company liable for injury to such person, although he himself was guilty of contributory negligence. Hill v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 823.

96. Pulliam v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 75 Miss. 627, 23 So. 359.

In Mississippi, where the injured party's conduct is a voluntary, deliberate, wilful, and reckless exposure he cannot recover for a violation of Code (1892), § 3549, making railroad companies liable for every injury inflicted by trains or engines backing into a passenger depot when not preceded by a servant of the company to give warning "without regard to mere contributory negligence" of the person injured (Sledge v. Yazoo, etc., R. Co., 87 Miss. 566, 40 So. 13; Yazoo, etc., R. Co. v. Metcalf, 84 Miss. 242, 36 So. 259); nor for a violation of section 3548, declaring that in the case of injury from a flying switch within a municipality, the railroad company shall be liable without regard to "mere contributory negligence" of the person injured (Pulliam v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 75 Miss. 627, 23 So. 359; Alabama, etc., R. Co. v. Jones, 73 Miss. 110, 19 So. 105, 55 Am. St. Rep. 488), although nothing short of such conduct will bar a right of recovery in such cases (Pulliam v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., supra; Alabama, etc., R. Co. v. Jones, supra).

97. Comparative negligence in general see NEGLIGENCE, 29 Cyc. 559.

In Illinois where the doctrine of comparative negligence formerly prevailed, it was applied in the following cases: Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Dickson, 88 Ill. 431; Galena, etc., R. Co. v. Jacobs, 20 Ill. 478; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Des Lauriers, 40 Ill. App. 654; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Andres, 16 Ill. App. 292; Springfield City R. Co. v. De Camp, 11 Ill. App. 475.

99. Florida Cent., etc., R. Co. v. Foxworth, 41 Fla. 1, 25 So. 338, 79 Am. St. Rep. 149.

In Georgia under Code, § 2972, there can be no recovery if the party injured could by ordinary care have avoided the consequences of the railroad company's negligence (Fulcher v. Georgia Cent. R. Co., 110 Ga. 327, 35 S. E. 280; White v. Central R., etc., Co., 83 Ga. 595, 10 S. E. 273; Central R. Co. v. Thompson, 76 Ga. 770); nor under section 3034, if the injury to such person is done by his consent or is caused by his own negligence (White v. Central R., etc., Co., supra). The defenses under these two sections are not identical; of the party injured does not wholly bar a recovery, but merely goes to diminish the amount of his damages in proportion to the fault attributable to him.[1]

b. Of Persons at Stations[2] — (i) In General. Although a person going upon or passing over grounds connected with railroad depots or stations assumes only such risks as are reasonably to be apprehended from the position in which he places himself,[3] he is presumed to know that the place is dangerous and is required to use care and prudence commensurate with the known dangers of the place; and if he fails to exercise such care whereby he is injured, he is guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery,[4] unless the railroad company wantonly, recklessly, or wilfully inflicts the injury,[5] or unless it fails to exercise ordinary care after discovering his peril to avoid injuring him.[6] Although such person goes upon station or depot premises through the inducement or upon the express or implied invitation of a railroad company, he is bound to exercise ordinary care and precaution for his own safety,[7] both from dangers incident to the running of trains,[8] and in respect to the condition of the platform or other prem-

Under a Tennessee statute (Milliken & V. Code, §§ 1298–1300) contributory negligence of the person injured does not bar a recovery, but it must be considered by the jury in mitigation of damages. See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 891.

The platform of a railroad company at its station is not a public highway, but is erected expressly for the accommodation of passengers; and other persons, although usually allowed to walk over it, are not entitled to recover for injuries received if they come upon it in such numbers that it breaks down with their weight. Co. v. Coss, 73 Ill. 394, holding that a person is guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery in attempting to pass between the cars of a freight train to which was attached an engine with steam up and which was liable to start at any moment, without permission or notice to any one in charge of the freight train who had authority over it, in order to reach a passenger train standing on the other side.

14. Iowa.— Mabbott v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 116 Iowa 490, 89 N. W. 1076, holding that a mail carrier who uses a push cart in his work is negligent in placing his push cart so near the train as to be injured by its moving.

Michigan.— Tubbs v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 107 Mich. 108, 64 N. W. 1061, 61 Am. St. Rep. 320, holding that whether the person relying upon the custom not to run trains between a depot and a standing train opposite it is guilty of contributory negligence in going on the intervening track to get mail or express from the train opposite without looking to see if another train is approaching is a question for the jury.

New York.— White v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 68 N. Y. App. Div. 561, 73 N. Y. Suppl. 827 [affirmed in 174 N. Y. 543, 67 N. E. 1091].

other tracks are between it and the depot platform, passengers and other persons rightfully there have a right to presume that they will be protected from danger, and are under no obligation to look and listen in order to guard against the approach of other trains.[15]

(II) Care of Horses and Teams. It is the duty of one riding or driving a horse or team on station grounds to use proper care and precaution to prevent being injured by its becoming frightened; and if he fails to do so he cannot recover for injuries received,[16] unless those in charge of the train fail to exercise ordinary care to prevent the injury.[17] Ordinary care in this respect may require that those in charge of a horse or team should drive it away when it becomes restless instead of trying to control it,[18] and that parties in the vehicle to which the horse is hitched should alight.[19]

c. Of Persons Working On or About Tracks or Cars. Where a person is lawfully engaged on or about the tracks or cars of a railroad company in work which requires his attention, he is required to exercise an ordinary degree of care under the circumstances,[20] as in the care and control of horses or teams being used about Pennsylvania.— Dell v. Phillips Glass Co., 169 Pa. St. 549 32 Atl. 601.

See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 891.

A mail carrier injured while standing at the end of a platform by being struck by a mail bag thrown from a moving train does not assume the risk of such injury, although he knew of the custom of the mail clerk to throw the mail bags from the train while in motion, where such custom was to throw the bags from the train at a different point on the platform. Carver v. Minneapolis, etc., R. Co., 120 Iowa 346, 94 N. W. 862.

Falling off platform.— Where a man employed to deliver the mail at night at a railroad station, knowing that the platform is unguarded by a rail, goes out of the depot in the dark to deliver the mail to the mail car without a lantern and falls off the platform and is injured, he is not entitled to recover from the railroad company. See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 895.

A shipper is bound in going about the premises of a railroad, in looking after his stock, to use ordinary care for his own safety, but need not anticipate danger (Southern R. Co. v. Goddard, 121 Ky. 567, 89 S. W. 675, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 523); and where the railroad company by its own act has put such shipper off his guard and given him good reason to believe that vigilance is not needed, the lack of such vigilance on his part is no bar to his claim for damages (Fowler v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 18 W. Va. 579).

The failure of a railroad employee to use a danger signal on a car which he is repairing, as required by the rules of the company, cannot be set up as contributory negligence in an action by such employee against another railroad company for injury caused by the backing of an engine of defendant against the car which he was repairing, when such engine was wrongfully on the tracks of the company which employed plaintiff. Ft. Worth, etc., R. Co. v. Bell, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 28, 23 S. W. 922.

A railroad brakeman engaged in coupling and uncoupling cars in the yard of the company is not guilty of contributory negligence in riding on a ladder on the side of a freight car, in going from one point to another in pursuance of his work. Martin v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 95 Ky. 612, 26 S. W. 801, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 150.

A railroad fireman is not negligent as a matter of law in going under his engine and cleaning out the ashpan, in the performance of his duty, although while doing so cars are projected against the engine the tracks or cars,[21] and if he fails to do so he is guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery.[22] But in exercising such care and precaution, such workman has a right to rely upon the assumption that the railroad company will exercise proper precautions for his protection,[23] and negligence cannot be imputed to him from the mere fact that he was on the track at the time the train or car which injured him came along;[24] nor, in the absence of special circumstances suggesting danger, is he required to exercise active vigilance for approaching trains,[25] except through the negligence of the employees of another company (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Stephenson, 33 Ind. App. 95, 69 N. E. 270); and the rules of his company requiring car inspectors to place signals when inspecting cars are not applicable to him (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Stephenson, supra).

Where an inspection of brakes is no part of the duty of a certain railroad employee he is not negligent in failing to inspect them. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. White, 80 Tex. 202, 15 S. W. 808.

Illustrations.— Thus a person is guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery, where he is injured while working about a standing freight car, by other cars bumping against it, if such cars were put in motion by his own act in removing the brakes or uncoupling them from other cars (Stevenson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 18 Fed. 493, 5 McCrary 634); or where he voluntarily and unnecessarily places himself in a position of danger near or in front of moving cars (Johnson v. Minneapolis, etc., R. Co., 140 Mich. 292, 103 N. W. 594; Culbertson v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 88 Wis. 567, 60 N. W. 998); or where he removes stakes and cross ties which support piles of lumber upon a car which he is unloading so that it falls and injures or kills him (Hulse v. New York, etc., R. Co., 71 Hun (N. Y.) 40, 24 N. Y. Suppl. 512). So where an employee of a warehouse company, familiar with the warehouse tracks and method of using them, notices cars on a track where there were none a few minutes before, but does not look to see whether they are moving, and steps upon the track and is injured by a car being pushed by a locomotive, he is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, although it was customary for the engineer to ring a bell, upon which custom plaintiff relied, and no bell was rung on this occasion. Stacklie v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 73 Minn. 37, 75 N. W. 734.

Where a workman fails to observe the rules of his employer whereby he is injured, the defense of contributory negligence is available to the railroad company, although no contract relation exists between it and such workman. Smith v. Centennial Eureka Min. Co., 27 Utah 307, 75 Pac. 749.

W. 166, holding that a car inspector engaged in inspecting cars for one company who knew that the yard-master of another company had seen him at his work had the right to assume that the yard-master would not run cars against those he was inspecting.

A shipper injured on account of an accumulation of ice on a stock chute is not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to spread sand or ashes upon the chute, unless it was glaringly dangerous; it being the duty of the railroad company to do so. Kincaid v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 62 Mo. App. 365.

Assumption of risk.—Where such workman stands under no contract relation with the railroad company, he cannot be held to assume the risk of negligence on the part of such company. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Charvat, 94 Md. 569, 51 Atl. 413; Pearlstein v. New York, etc., R. Co., 192 Mass. 20, 77 N. E. 1024.

Where a person is injured by the unsoundness of an apron covering the space between a car which he is unloading and the platform, he is not guilty of contributory negligence in falling from the car on the apron, which he did not know, or could not have discovered by ordinary inspection, to be unsound, unless the fall from the car was the result of a want of care on his part. Cogdell v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 130 N. C. 313, 41 S. E. 541.

24. Hudson v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 142 N. C. 198, 55 S. E. 103; Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Chisholm, 83 Fed. 652, 27 C. C. A. 663; Stevenson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 18 Fed. 493, 5 McCrary 634.

when he is not at work demanding his attention;[26] and he even has the right to become so engrossed in his labor that he may become oblivious to the approach of trains.[27] Nor in cases of unexpected or immediate danger is he negligent if he makes a mistake of judgment in his movements.[28] Thus a person engaged in loading or unloading a car placed on a side-track for that purpose has the right to give his undivided attention to his duties and to act on the assumption that the car will not be molested by the company, or his position rendered hazardous, without some notice or warning;[29] and he is not negligent in failing to keep a constant lookout or otherwise exercise active vigilance to protect himself against trains or cars that may come in contact with the car on which he is working,[30] unless he knows or has reason to know of their approach and likelihood to molest his car.[31] Such a workman has a right to occupy the position for loading or unloading designated by an agent of the company, even if it be hazardous;[32]

Iowa.— McMarshall v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 80 Iowa 757, 45 N. W. 1065, 20 Am. Where workmen engaged in repairing a switch know of the danger of the locality and that engines are frequently passing, and they take no precautions by signal or otherwise, they are guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery. Tumalty v. New York, etc., R. Co., 170 Mass. 164, 49 N. E. 85.

Notice not to move car.— Notice to the conductor of a switching train that a car loaded with corn is leaking and not to move it any further as he wished to fix it does not excuse a person from crawling under the car and attempting to fix it without exercising proper care for his safety, where he is familiar with the method of switching at that point and knows that the conductor might receive orders to do additional switching. but it has been held that he has no right to rely upon the presumption that cars furnished are in safe repair, where he knows that other cars similarly furnished were defective.[33] Where a person is not lawfully working on or about such tracks or cars, he is held to the same degree of care as any other intruder,[34] as where, although lawfully loading or unloading cars, he unauthorizedly goes upon the track to move such cars.[35]

d. Of Persons on Trains — (1) IN GENERAL. Where a person, not a passenger, boards a train, although lawfully there, he is bound to exercise reasonable care and precaution to protect himself from injury; otherwise he is guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery,[36] as where he unnecessarily rides in a dangerous position,[37] such as on the foot-board of the engine,[38] notwithstanding he may have been invited to ride in such position, but by one having no authority to give such invitation.[39] It is contributory negligence precluding a recovery for a person on board a train voluntarily to attempt to alight while it is in motion, without notifying the employees in charge of the train of his presence and requesting them to arrest its progress,[40] unless he jumps upon the invitation or orders

Co. v. McLin, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 423, 64 S. W. 314 (evidence held to sustain a conclusion that the party injured was rightfully on the train and was not guilty of contributory negligence).

Inspection of brakes.— Where the foreman of a work train and his wife, who lived with him on the train, were injured by reason of a defective brake on one of the cars, his continuing to use the car after he might, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have discovered the defect, will not defeat a recovery, unless it was a part of his duty to look after the condition of the brakes. of agents of the railroad company,[41] or to avoid some apparently threatened peril,[42] as where he jumps to avoid a wilful injury threatened by a railroad employee;[43] and this is true, although, where such person boards a train at a station, the railroad company is negligent in failing to give the required signals before and at the time of leaving the station,[44] or in not stopping at the station the required length of time.[45] Likewise it is contributory negligence for one to attempt to board a train while in motion,[46] although he makes the attempt with the knowledge of some of the railroad employees,[47] especially where it is made when the train is running across the country, at a distance from a station or depot, with all the surroundings plainly visible and forbidding in their character.[48] Where a person is injured by being forcibly ejected from a moving train, the fact that he was a trespasser on such train does not constitute contributory negligence which will deprive him of recovery.[49]

(II) CHILDREN. In accordance with the rules heretofore discussed,[50] a child is guilty of contributory negligence which will preclude a recovery for an injury if he fails to exercise the degree of care and prudence that may be expected of a child of his age, intelligence, and experience, in stealing a ride,[51] or in jumping

Excuses.— That the person injured is an experienced train-hand; that he supposed the train would stop; that he is a poor man and not knowing how he would get back if carried further; and that he is excited is no excuse for his jumping. Jarrett v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 83 Ga. 347, 9 S. E. 681.

It is not contributory negligence as a matter of law for a person who is riding on the step of an engine to jump therefrom without first looking for approaching trains. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Enright, 129 Ill. App. 223 [affirmed in 227 Ill. 103, 81 N. E. 374].

41. Jarrett v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 83 Ga. 347, 9 S. E. 681.

The physical infirmity of a trespasser upon a train may be taken into consideration in determining his negligence in alighting while the train is in motion; but his age and experience should not be taken into consideration where there is nothing to indicate that by reason thereof he was less able to exercise care and discretion for his own safety. Doggett v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 134 Iowa 690, 112 N. W. 171.

51. State v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 24 Md. 84, 87 Am. Dec. 600 (holding this to be true, although by the exercise of extraordinary care on the part of the railroad company the accident might have been avoided); Southerland v. Texas, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 40 S. W. 193.

Illustrations.— Thus it is contributory negligence precluding a recovery, where an intelligent boy twelve years of age, familiar with the running of trains, and appreciating the danger of getting on or off a moving train, climbs on a slow moving train and is injured while getting down from one car, and attempting to climb on another (Wilson v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 66 Kan. 183, 71 Pac. 282); or where a boy twelve years of age who steals a ride upon a freight train, with or without the knowledge of the trainmen, gets upon the front of an engine where he is killed by a collision, in which no one else is hurt (Ecliff v. Wabash, etc., R. Co., 64 Mich. 196, 31 N. W. 180); or where a well grown boy of good judgment, sixteen years of age, familiar with the operation of railroad trains and with knowledge that it is against the rule of the railroad company for him to ride on a freight train, does so at the invitation of the conductor and takes a position on a freight car and is killed by the negligence of the train crew in running the same at so high rate of speed that the train is derailed (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Martin, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 186, 79 S. W. 1101).

on,[52] or off moving trains,[53] unless the railroad company after discovering his peril could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence;[54] and where a child is injured solely through his own recklessness, as in attempting to jump upon a moving train from a position outside of the track where he is in no apparent danger, his immaturity of years or discretion has no bearing upon the question of the liability of the railroad company for his injury.[55] But where the child is not of sufficient age or discretion to appreciate the danger of his act, he is not guilty of contributory negligence in going upon a train.[56]

Negligence per se.—A boy over sixteen years of age who has lived at railway stations and has made trips in empty freight cars, and knows the danger of riding on box cars, and who on the occasion of his injury by falling from the top of a freight car takes the precaution to brace his foot against the handhold and hold to the running board, sufficiently apprehends the danger, making him guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Cochrell v. Texas, etc., R. Co., 36 Tex. Civ. App. 559, 82 S. W. 529. So where a child twelve years old who has attended school for three years climbs upon a moving freight car and is injured, he is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, where he does not claim that he did not know that it was wrong and dangerous so to climb upon such car, and where it appears by his own testimony that he was familiar with the railroad tracks and with the running of the cars thereon. Fitzgerald v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 114 Ill. App. 118.

A Missouri statute, Rev. St. § 3927, making it a misdemeanor for any person to climb upon, hold to, or in any manner attach himself to a locomotive or car while the same is in motion, or while running in or from any city or town, precludes a recovery of damages by a child six years of age who is injured while stealing a ride on a railway car which is going through the railway company's freight yard. A boy eight years old whose mother permits him to play upon the street is presumably of sufficient intelligence to know the danger of attempting to jump upon the front of a moving locomotive, and is therefore capable of contributory negligence barring a recovery. Miles v. Receivers, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,544, 4 Hughes 172.

53. Powers v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 57 Minn. 332, 59 N. W. 307 (holding that where a boy of thirteen years, familiar with the moving of trains, and warned not to get off or on while in motion, gets on a freight train and is killed in jumping off when in motion, the railroad company is not liable); Murray v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 93 N. C. 92 (holding that a railroad company is not liable for an injury to a boy of eight years, who, after being warned not to do so, mounts an engine at a time when he is not seen and sustains an injury in jumping off after it begins to move).

It is negligence as a matter of law for a bright, active boy fifteen years old, a trespasser on a train, who knows the attendant danger, to voluntarily attempt to jump from a train which is running twenty miles an hour. Howell v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 75 Miss. 242, 21 So. 746, 36 L. R. A. 545.

Where a child jumps from a moving train at the command of an employee, the question of his contributory negligence depends upon whether a person of ordinary prudence, similarly circumstanced, and of his age and discretion, would have made the attempt. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, 84 Ill. App. 480; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Mother, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 87, 24 S. W. 79.

The doctrine of discovered peril is not applicable so as to destroy the effect of a boy's contributory negligence, by the mere fact that an employee in charge of a freight train discovers a boy about sixteen years old riding on top of a freight car by bracing his foot against the hand hold and holding to the running board, and observes his apparent age and size and knows that his position there is more dangerous than in the caboose, as the danger of falling from the car is not imminent. Boarding train.—A youth eleven or twelve years old and of such immature judgment or discretion as not to appreciate the danger of boarding a train while moving out of a depot, as to which the employees of the company were negligent in failing to use ordinary care to prevent his making the attempt, is not guilty of contributory negligence. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Tonahill, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 54 S. W. 419.

Permission to ride.—If the servants of a railroad company have been in the habit of allowing or encouraging a deaf and dumb boy ten years old to ride on the freight cars, the company cannot, when sued for damages for injuries sustained by him while riding or attempting to ride in like manner, although without a special invitation or permission on the occasion of the injury, avail

5. Proximate Cause of Injury.[57] To render a railroad company liable for injuries sustained by one going upon or near its tracks, it is not sufficient merely that the company was negligent, but its negligence must have proximately caused or contributed to the injury sustained,[58] and it is not liable for injuries to which its negligence only remotely contributes;[59] or in other words there must be a itself by way of defense, of a statute making it a misdemeanor to be upon the car without business or permission. Lammert v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 9 Ill. App. 388.

Negligence of company held proximate cause.— It has been held that the negligence of the railroad company was the proximate cause of the injury where the employees of one company sent a locomotive and cars against an engine under which a fireman of another company was working, resulting in his death (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Stephenson, 33 Ind. App. 95, 69 N. E. 270); or where a person in avoiding a runaway team stepped upon a railroad track and was injured by a hand-car, through the foreman's negligence to seasonably order the brakes to be applied (Moore v. Central R. Co., 47 Iowa 688); or where a trespasser on defendant's train was forcibly ejected by a brakeman while the train was moving rapidly, and in falling struck a clearance post by the side of the track and was thereby thrown under the car wheels and injured (Hayes v. Southern R. Co., 141 N. C. 195, 53 S. E. 847); or where a car escaped from control through negligence, and after running three quarters of a mile injured persons on the track (Adams v. Southern R. Co., 84 Fed. 596, 28 C. C. A. 494).

The accumulation of ice upon a stock chute has been held to be the proximate cause of an injury to a shipper who was driving cattle up the chute on to a car, when one of the animals, owing to the ice, slipped against another and the latter fell upon the shipper injuring him. Kincaid v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 62 Mo. App. 365.

The advice of a foreman of a gravel car to a boy to jump on a moving freight train to return to his home, in which effort he is injured, is the proximate cause of the injury to such boy, but as such advice is outside of such foreman's employment, the company is not liable. Keating v. Michigan Cent., etc., R. Co., 97 Mich. 154, 56 N. W. 346, 37 Am. St. Rep. 328.

That the person injured accidentally fell upon the track does not excuse the railroad company from the result of its negligence. International, etc., R. Co. v. Ormond, 64 Tex. 485. See also Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Cozatt, 39 Ind. App. 682, 79 N. E. 534.

Where an engine and cars which were unlawfully occupying a street injured a person in moving off, the moving of the train, which was a legitimate act, and not the unlawful occupation of the street, was the proximate cause of the injury. Armil v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 70 Iowa 130, 30 N. W. 42.

59. Illinois.— Thompson v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 226 Ill. 542, 80 N. E. 1054, 9 L. R. A. N. S. 672 [affirming 123 Ill. See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 1319.

A railroad company is not liable for insanity of an injured person, where it results from the fact that, subsequent to the accident and before commitment to the hospital, the person saw the bodies of persons killed and injured in other accidents, or where the insanity was a result of the accident and subsequent occurrences combined. Rooney v. New York, etc., R. Co., 173 Mass. 222, 53 N. E. 435.

Negligence of company not proximate cause.— It has been held that the negligence of the railroad company was not the proximate cause of the injury, where the engineer failed to stop or attempt to stop his train after discovering a person on the track, when it was impossible to stop the train in time to avert the accident (Dull v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 21 Ind. App. 571, 52 N. E. 1013 (and he gave danger signals); Sinclair v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 133 Mo. 233, 34 S. W. 76; Davidson v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 41 W. Va. 407, 23 S. E. 593); or where the party injured stepped into a hole in a path along defendant's right of way which he took for the purpose of getting around defendant's cars which improperly obstructed certain street crossings (De la Pena v. International, etc., R. Co., 32 Tex. Civ. App. 241, 74 S. W. 58); or where a boy entered a railroad company's yards upon the invitation of a car-repairer and participated in the movement of the repairer's car, and after the work was done passed on to a highway crossing and was injured by reason of his jumping upon a passing car (Horn v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 124 Iowa 281, 99 N. W. 1068); or where the conductor of a train stated to a trespassing boy that he would take him to a station and turn him over to an officer, whereupon the boy jumped and was killed (Burden v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 104 Mich. 101, 62 N. W. 173).

causal connection between the railroad company's negligence, even though it be negligence per se, and the injury complained of.[60] This rule applies where the railroad company's negligence consists of defects in its road-bed [61] or equipment,[62]

Incompetency of the employees in charge of the engine or train causing the injury is immaterial, if such engine or train is properly handled. Armil v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 70 Iowa 130, 30 N. W. 42.

60. Puckhaber v. Southern Pac. Co., 132 Cal. 363, 64 Pac. 480; Harper v. St. Louis, Merchants' Bridge Terminal Co., 187 Mo. 575, 86 S. W. 99; Norton v. Ittner, 56 Mo. 351.

Actual collision is not necessary to constitute such causal connection in an action for injuries caused by a train (Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Chapman, 80 Ala. 615, 2 So. 738); but such connection may be established by a succession of intervening circumstances, as where the train negligently strikes an animal which thereby bounces or is thrown against the party injured (Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Chapman, supra), or negligently collides with another train whereby a car is thrown against him (Southern R. Co. v. Williams, 143 Ala. 212, 38 So. 1013); or where it negligently causes him to fall from a bridge or trestle (McMillan v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 46 Iowa 231).

61. Anderson v. Union Terminal R. Co., 161 Mo. 411, 61 S. W. 874 (holding that a railroad company's negligence in allowing a pile of cinders to remain on the side of its tracks whereby a boy stumbles over it and falls under a train without negligence on his part is the proximate cause of the injury); Grimmer v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 175 Pa. St. 1, 34 Atl. 210; Kelly v. Manayunk, etc., Incline Plane, etc., Co., 7 Pa. Cas. 624, 12 Atl. 598; McCandless v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 71 Wis. 41, 36 N. W. 620 (failure to restore a street to its former state of usefulness held not to be the proximate cause of the injury).

Failure to maintain a fence along its track, although required by ordinance or statute, is not the proximate cause of injuries sustained by persons running along or jumping on moving trains (Griffin v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 101 Ill. App. 284; Paquin v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 99 Minn. 170, 108 N. W. 882; Fezler v. Willmar, etc., R. Co., 85 Minn. 252, 88 N. W. 746; Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Liidtke, 69 Ohio St. 384, 69 N. E. 653); or where the person injured is pushed on the rails by a straying cow (Schreiner v. Great Northern R. Co., 86 Minn. 245, 90 N. W. 400, 58 L. R. A. 75). So it has been held that the failure of a railroad company to fence its tracks within the limits of a city and near one of its stations cannot be regarded as the proximate cause of the death of one who is struck by a train at a point some distance from the public crossing. Wickham v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 95 Wis. 23, 69 N. W. 982.

62. Patton v. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co., 89 Tenn. 370, 15 S. W. 919, 12 L. R. A. 184; Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Chambers, 73 Tex. 296, 11 S. W. 279.

Defective brakes.— Defective brakes have been held the proximate cause of an injury where the person injured while placing a car furnished by the railroad company discovered that the brake was defective, and in obedience to the conductor's command to block the car he swung from it and placed a block of wood under the wheels whereby the sudden stopping of the car threw a log therefrom and injured him. Sheltrawn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 128 Mich. 669, 87 N. W. 893. But the fact that the train was not equipped with air-brakes is not ground for recovery when it appears that even by the aid of such brakes the train could not have been stopped in time to avoid the accident. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Grablin, 38 Nebr. 90, 56 N. W. 796, 57 N. W. 522; Bookman v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co., 152 Fed. 686, 81 C. C. A. 612. So it has been held that where a child is run over by a train which might have been stopped in time if fitted with air-brakes, the failure to equip with air-brakes is only a remote cause of the accident; the proximate cause being the child's coming upon the road helpless and unattended. Ex p. Stell, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,358, 4 Hughes 157.

Failure to place a headlight on an engine at night as required by ordinance does not render a railroad company liable for the death of one killed from a cause in no way connected with the absence of the light. Puckhaber v. Southern Pac. Co., 132 Cal. 363, 64 Pac. 480; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Bednorz, 57 Ill. App. 309.

or in not giving the proper or required signals,[63] or in not keeping a proper lookout,[64] or in running at an excessive or unlawful rate of speed.[65]

6. Injury Avoidable Notwithstanding Contributory Negligence. Under what is commonly known as "the last clear chance" doctrine,[66] or, as it has been called, the doctrine of "discovered peril,"[67] notwithstanding a person injured upon or near railroad tracks may be guilty of contributory negligence in going into a dangerous position, the railroad company is nevertheless liable for injuries which may be avoided or lessened by the exercise of ordinary care on its part after his peril

App. Div. 176, 101 N. Y. Suppl. 667 (failure to give warning of the approach of an engine held not proximate cause); Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Scarborough, (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 104 S. W. 408 [affirmed in (1908) 108 S. W. 804] (failure to give signal to stop train held proximate cause of decedent's death).

Failure to ring a bell or sound a whistle for a public crossing as required by statute does not render the railroad company liable for an injury to a child of tender age, where the engineer used every effort to avert the accident after discovering the child, and there is nothing to show that the child's mother would have heard the signals or paid any attention to them had they been given. Chrystal v. Troy, etc., R. Co., 124 N. Y. 519, 26 N. E. 1103 [reversing 52 Hun 55, 4 N. Y. Suppl. 793].

Failure to enforce a rule requiring a blue flag to be displayed on certain cars is not the proximate cause of injuries received by an employee of a railway company while inspecting cars on a transfer track which is jointly used by his employer and defendant company, where it appears that such flag would not have been regarded by defendant if it had been displayed. El Paso, etc., R. Co. v. Darr, (Tex. Civ. App. 1906) 93 S. W. 166.

W. 996 (holding defendant's negligence in suddenly cutting a switch engine loose and running it on to a switch track at an excessive rate of speed without warning to be the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury); Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Cardena, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 300, 54 S. W. 312; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Powell, (Civ. App. 1897) 41 S. or in giving the proper signals or warnings.[71] The authorities, however, are conflicting as to what knowledge of the injured person's peril must be had by the railroad company before the doctrine applies. By the weight of authority this doctrine applies only where the railroad company has actual knowledge of the injured party's peril, in time to avert the accident by the exercise of ordinary care.[72] In some jurisdictions, however, the doctrine is held to apply also where the accident occurs at a point where the railroad company has a reason to apprehend that persons may be on or near the track, and therefore where it might have discovered the injured party and by the exercise of ordinary care prevented the injury.[73] In North Carolina the doctrine is held to apply

In Texas it has been held that if the one injured is negligent, the railroad company cannot be held liable unless he was in a place of danger and the operatives saw and realized he was in a dangerous position and that he either could not or would not probably extricate himself (Houston, etc., R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 99 Tex. 636, 92 S. W. 409 [reversing (Civ. App. 1905) 90 S. Co., 94 Va. 449, 27 S. E. 20.

In Missouri, although some decisions have held that in such cases it should appear that the omission of the railroad company, after becoming aware of the danger to which the party injured was exposed, to use a proper degree of care to avoid injuring him (Yarnall v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 75 Mo. 575; Zimmerman v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 71 Mo. 476; Rains v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 71 Mo. 164, 36 Am. Rep. 459; Maher v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 64 Mo. 267 [criticized in Prewitt v. Eddy, 115 Mo. 283, 21 S. W. 742]), the doctrine in this state is generally stated to be, that notwithstanding the injured party may have been guilty of contributory negligence, the railroad company is still liable for the injuries, if they could have been prevented by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the company after discovery of the danger in which the injured party stood; or if the company failed to discover the danger through its own recklessness, when the exercise of ordinary care should have discovered it and avoided the injury (Guenther v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 108 Mo. 18, 18 S. W. 846; Dahlstrom v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 96 Mo. 99, 8 S. W. 777; Kelly v. Union R., etc., Co., 95 Mo. 279, 8 S. W. 420 [affirm-

where the railroad company by taking proper precaution in keeping a proper lookout at any point could have discovered the injured party's peril in time to have averted the injury, and failed to do so.[74] But in any case the railroad company's negligence must have occurred subsequent to the negligence of the injured party before this doctrine applies.[75]

7. Wilful, Wanton, or Unauthorized Acts or Gross Negligence[76]— a. In General. Closely allied to the doctrine of "last clear chance"[77] is the well settled rule that notwithstanding a person injured upon or near railroad tracks is guilty of contributory negligence, even though he be a trespasser,[78] such negligence cannot be relied upon as a defense by the railroad company in any case where the action of the company is wanton, wilful, or reckless and the injury

In view of the fact, however, that the exercise of ordinary care to discover persons in such danger applies only where the railroad company is charged with such duty as in populous districts or other places where persons may be expected to be on or near the track (Chamberlain v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 133 Mo. 587, 33 S. W. 437, 34 S. W. 842; Powell v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 59 Mo. App. 626), the latter part of this rule — or what is in fact an extension of the general rule stated in the text — in respect to the railroad company's negligence after it should have discovered the injured party's peril, is held to apply only to persons or at places where the railroad company may apprehend persons to be on the tracks, as in populous districts (Chamberlain v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., supra; Schlereth v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., (1892) 19 S. W. 1134; Dunkman v. Wabash, etc., R. Co., 95 Mo. 232, 4 S. W. 670; Powell v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 59 Mo. App. 626. And see cases cited, supra), especially where by ordinance precautions or safeguards are required to be observed in the management of trains within city limits (Kelly v. Union Pac. R. Co., 95 Mo. 279, 8 S. W. 420 [affirming 18 Mo. App. 151]; Dunkman v. Wabash, etc., R. Co., 95 Mo. App. 232, 4 S. W. 670).

A. 418. But it is held in this state that in order that there may be a recovery under this doctrine, the party injured must have been on the track in an apparently helpless condition and the railroad company must have discovered, or by keeping a reasonable lookout could have discovered, him in time to have prevented the injury, and that after it had discovered his position or could by a proper watchfulness have reasonable ground to believe that such was his condition it failed to use reasonable means to prevent the injury. In determining what is wanton conduct as to an infant trespasser of tender years, due consideration must be given to the well-known indiscretions and limited ability of young persons to take adequate means to avoid dan-complained of ensues as a result,[79] provided the railroad employees in doing or omitting such acts are acting within the line of their employment.[80] To constitute wilfulness, wantonness, or recklessness within the meaning of this rule, mere negligence is not sufficient,[81] but there must be either a design or purpose to inflict injury,[82] or conduct manifesting a reckless disregard of consequences under circumstances where the act done or omitted would probably or naturally result in injury,[83] or in other words an act done or omitted with the consciousness at the time that injury will naturally or probably result therefrom.[84] But an express intention to injure is not essential; it is sufficient if the employees inflicting the injury exhibit such wantonness and recklessness as to probable consequences as implies a willingness to inflict injury, or an indifference as to whether injury is inflicted.[85] It is held reckless, wilful, or wanton negligence within the meaner. Where wanton and wilful negligence is charged and proved, it makes no difference to what extent the person killed or injured was guilty of want of care. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Bodemer, 139 Ill. 596, 29 N. E. 692, 32 Am. St. Rep. 218 [affirming 33 Ill. App. 479].

Distinction between negligence and wilfulness.— Negligence and wilfulness are incompatible terms. Negligence arises from inattention, thoughtlessness, or heedlessness, while wilfulness cannot exist without a purpose or design, and negligence, it has been said, can never be of such a degree as to become wilfulness. Conduct held not wilful, wanton, or reckless so as to render the company liable notwithstanding the injured party's contributory negligence see Williams v. Georgia Cent. R. Co., (Ala. 1905) 40 So. 143; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Eicher, 202 Ill. 556, 67 N. E. 376 [reversing 100 Ill. App. 599]; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Beard, 49 Ill. App. 232; Pittsburgh, etc., R. It is not wanton or wilful negligence to fail to comply with a statute providing that no railroad company shall permit a train of cars for the transportation of merchandise, etc., to run without a good and sufficient brake attached to the rear car of the train and without a trusty and skilful brakeman stationed on such car. Running past a station at which another train is stopping for passengers in violation of the rules of the company is not evidence of wilfulness. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Wurl, 62 Ill. App. 381.

ing of this rule to fail to exercise reasonable care to prevent the injury after becoming aware of the injured party's perilous position,[86] and in some jurisdictions the rule applies only where the company fails to exercise such care after it has actual knowledge of the injured party's peril,[87] although in other jurisdictions it also gess, 119 Ala. 555, 25 So. 251, 72 Am. St. Rep. 943; East St. Louis Connecting R. Co. v. O'Hara, 150 Ill. 580, 37 N. E. 917 [affirming 49 Ill. App. 282] (holding that it is not necessary in order to raise such an inference to prove that the railroad's servants were actuated by any ill-will directed specifically to the person injured); Palmer v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 112 Ind. 250, 14 N. E. 70; Manlove v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 29 Ind. App. 694, 65 N. E. 212.

What will constitute wanton, wilful, or reckless negligence has also been defined as a conscious failure on the part of the railroad company to use reasonable care to avoid the injury after discovering the danger (Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Burgess, 119 Ala. 555, 25 So. 251, 72 Am. St. Rep. 943 [overruling Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Burgess, 116 Ala. 509, 22 So. 913]); or as an intentional failure to perform a manifest duty in which the public has an interest or which is important to the person injured in either preventing or avoiding the injury (Kentucky Cent. R. Co. v. Gastineau, 83 Ky. 119); or as such gross want of care and regard for the rights of others as to show a disregard of consequences or a willingness to inflict injury (Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Bodemer, 139 Ill. 596, 29 N. E. 692, 32 Am. St. Rep. 218 [affirming 33 Ill. App. 479]; Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Ricker, 116 Ill. App. 428, holding that gross negligence of an engineer is shown where an emergency signal is displayed and he did not stop the train until he had gone four hundred and sixty-five feet after receiving the signal; Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Cline, 111 Ill. App. 417).

Gross negligence is not as a matter of law wilfulness. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Beard, 49 Ill. App. 232; Terre Haute, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, 95 Ind. 286, 48 Am. Rep. 719. But the term "gross negligence" has been held practically synonymous with "wilful negligence," and defined as an intentional failure to perform a manifest duty in reckless disregard of consequences, or a thoughtless disregard of consequences without the exercise of an effort to avoid it. Illustrations.— Where the railroad servants in charge of a train discover a person on or near the tracks and in a dangerous position from which he apparently cannot or will not extricate himself in time to avoid being injured, it has been held wilful, wanton, or reckless negligence to run him down without giving him due warning of the train's approach (Central R., etc., Co. v. Denson, 84 Ga. 774, 11 S. E. 1039); and without using all reasonable means to slacken or stop the train in time to avoid the injury (Central R., etc., Co. v. Vaughan, 93 Ala. 209, 9 So. 468, 30 Am. St. Rep. 50; Central R., etc., Co. v. Denson, 84 Ga. 774, 11 S. E. 1039; Palmer v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 112 Ind. 250, 14 N. E. 70; Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Brafford, (Ind. App. 1896) 43 N. E. 882). But an engineer is not wilfully negligent in failing to stop while there is yet time to examine an object which he supposes to be a dog or something inanimate lying on the track, but which on closer approach is discerned to be a child. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 69 Miss. 631, 12 So. 957.

To warrant a recovery in such a case it must be shown that the person injured was on or so near the track as to be in danger of being struck by the engine; that he was seen by the engineer; that after he was seen his conduct was such that the engineer should have known he either did not hear the approaching engine or did not intend to get out of the way; and that after discovering that such person was not going to get out of the way the engineer made no effort to avert the injury by stopping or slackening the speed of the engine but recklessly and wantonly ran upon and injured him. McLaughlin v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 115 Ill. App. 262.

87. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Didzoneit, 1 App. Cas. (D. C.) 482, 485, where the court said: "Negligence superimposed upon negligence does not amount to wilfulness; nor is the failure, superinduced by negligence, to have knowledge of a dangerous condition the equivalent of actual knowledge of such condition. And it is only when a defendant has actual knowledge of the plaintiff's danger, and could, by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, have avoided the resulting injury, that the plaintiff is relieved from the liability of having his own negligence charged against him, and the defendant's negligence is regarded as the proximate and exclusive cause of the injury. The fact that it may have been negligence in the defendant not to have known the plaintiff's danger, and that the applies where the railroad employees are guilty of recklessness or wantonness in failing to discover such peril and avert the accident, as in failing to discover such person at a point where it has reasonable grounds to believe that he or some other person will be on the track in a situation or condition of peril.[88] A railroad company is liable for injuries caused by acts of its employees while acting within the line of their employment, although the particular acts causing the injury are done in an improper manner or in a mode not contemplated by the railroad company,[89] even though such act be wilful or malicious; [90] but it is not liable if such acts are without the scope of the servant's employment.[91]

b. Signals and Lookouts. Where there is no special duty to keep a lookout, the failure to discover a trespasser or mere licensee upon or near the tracks in time to prevent his injury does not show wanton, wilful, or reckless negligence within the meaning of the above rule,[92] and it has been held that even a violation of a statutory requirement to maintain a lookout under certain circumstances does not show a reckless disregard of consequences so as to amount to wantonness.[93] Likewise the failure to give signals or warnings of an approaching train is not wilful or wanton negligence,[94] unless such failure is under the circumstances manifesting a reckless disregard of consequences.[95] So a mere failure to give signals required by statute or ordinance does not establish wanton or wilful negligence as to a trespasser,[96] even though those operating the train have knowledge that persons have been in the habit of crossing or walking upon the tracks at places other than public places or public crossings.[97] defendant might have ascertained the danger by the exercise of due care, cannot be permitted to have the effect of actual knowledge, so as to charge the defendant with recklessness. To allow such an effect would result in the overthrow of the whole doctrine of contributory negligence. It would be impossible, upon such a theory, ever to hold any one to the consequences of his own misconduct. For if negligence to acquire knowledge were the equivalent of knowledge, in the contemplation of the law of torts, every act of negligence should be construed as an act of wilfulness."

Actual knowledge need not be positively and directly shown; but it may be inferred from such circumstances as that the track was straight and the view unobstructed, and that the engineer was in his seat, looking ahead, and that there was nothing to prevent him from seeing a person on the track ahead of the train. Wilful act without knowledge of object injured.—A railroad company may be liable for the consequences of a wilful act without an actual knowledge of the presence of the object acted upon, but this liability never exists where the act or omission is one from which the injury could not reasonably have been anticipated as the natural and probable consequence of such act or omission. c. Rate of Speed. The fact that the train which caused the injury was running at an excessive or unlawful rate of speed,[98] as that it was running at a rate of speed in violation of an ordinance,[99] does not of itself show wanton, wilful, or reckless negligence; although it is otherwise if the train is going at such rate of speed under circumstances which show a disregard of the rights of others or of consequences, or a willingness to inflict injury.[1]

d. Inviting or Permitting Persons to Ride on Trains or Cars. A railroad company is liable for its negligence in causing injuries to one who is riding upon its train or cars by the invitation or permission of its employee, where such employee has authority to give such invitation or permission by virtue of the scope of his employment,[2] as by virtue of some rule of the company;[3] but it is not liable if such invitation or permission is given without authority,[4] and it does not appear that the invitation or permission is in furtherance of the interests of the company or connected in any manner with the service which the servant is employed to render,[5] particularly where such invitation or permission, and riding, is in violation of the rules of the company; [6] and the fact that such person or others have been in the habit of riding upon the train or cars without the employees in charge thereof taking any measures to prevent them from doing so does not create an obligation of care for their safety on the part of the company.[7]

e. Removal of Trespassers From Trains or Cars. The liability of a railroad company for the improper conduct of its employees in removing a trespasser from its trains or cars is founded on the law of agency,[8] and except where there is a statutory provision otherwise,[9] a railroad company is liable for injuries caused by the acts of its servants,[10] in removing trespassers from its trains or cars, even though such acts be wilful, wanton, or reckless, where such employees are at the time acting within the scope of their employment, and in furtherance of their duties; [11] but the company will not be liable where they are wilfully and maliciously

Where a person is assaulted by a brakeman or flagman by reason of which he jumps from a moving train and is injured, the fact that the conductor is the only one authorized to eject a person from a train does not relieve the company from liability, since if the conductor has sole authority it is his duty to restrain those under him from assaulting even a trespasser. See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," §§ 906, 907.

Where a person bribes an employee to permit him to ride on a train or car, such employee and such person thereby become joint trespassers, and the employee's authority to represent the company in ejecting such person, if he had any, thereby ceases, so that the railroad company is not thereafter liable for his acts, although wilful or wanton, in ejecting such person (Brevig v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 64 Minn. 168, 66 N. W. 401; Williams v. Mobile, etc., R. Co., (Miss. 1895) 19 So. 90; Alabama, etc., R. Co. v. McAfee, 71 Miss. 70, 14 So. 260; Grahn v. International, etc., R. Thus a railroad company is not liable for the act of a brakeman in pushing a trespasser under his train because he will not pay for the privilege of riding, the money not having been demanded for his fare and the brakeman having no authority to collect his fare. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Latham, 72 Miss. 32, 16 So. 757.

Where a trespasser is shot by a railroad employee after he has alighted from a train, the company is not liable. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 232, 29 S. W. 394. And although the shooting took place on the train in an effort to eject the trespasser, if the employee afterward throws the body on the track for the purpose of concealing his crime, the company is not liable for the mutilation of the body. Recklessness or wantonness in dealing with a trespasser is not to be inferred from the mere use of language intended to influence the trespasser's voluntary action, although the language used is not necessary or proper; but only where it is so unreasonable or improper in reference to its probable effect on the safety of the trespasser as to indicate a wanton and reckless disregard of probable dangerous consequences. Although a brakeman may have no authority to use physical force to expel trespassers, yet if he is clothed with authority to order them off, the company is liable for injuries to a trespasser who is compelled to leave the train while in motion by the brakeman's abusive language, threatening gestures, and threats of arrest. See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," §§ 906, 907.

Where a man appears wearing a brakeman's cap and jacket upon a train and assumes to act upon such train with authority, and is called by those who see him a brakeman, it may be presumed that he is in the employ of the railroad company as a brakeman so as to render the company liable for his negligence in removing a trespasser. Hughes v. New York, etc., R. Co., 36 N. Y. Super. Ct. 222.

The rules of the company requiring freight conductors not to permit unauthorized persons to ride on the trains does not overcome the implied authority of a brakeman to eject a trespasser from such a train. West Jersey, etc., R. Co. v. Welsh, 62 N. J. L. 655, 42 Atl. 736, 72 Am. St. Rep. 659.

App. 141, holding that a brakeman has no implied authority to expel trespassers where no such express authority has been given him, and there is a conductor in charge of the train who has such express authority.

f. Acts of Third Persons. A railroad company is not liable for injuries caused by the unauthorized acts of persons other than the railroad employees,[20] unless the company knows or is charged with knowledge of a dangerous practice by such persons and fails to exercise due care to prevent its continuation.[21]

8. Actions For Injuries[22] — a. Pleading — (I) Declaration or Complaint — (A) Form and Sufficiency in General. The pleadings in an action for injuries to one on or near railroad tracks other than at crossings are regulated by the rules governing pleadings in civil actions generally,[23] particularly those respecting negligence.[24] In such an action the declaration or complaint should allege with such clearness and certainty that defendant company may understand the nature of the charge it is called upon to answer,[25] all facts necessary to constitute plain-

Ohio.— Whistler v. Cowan, 26 Ohio Cir. Ct. 511 [affirmed in 70 Ohio St. 514, 72 N. E. 1167].

Pennsylvania.— Towanda Coal Co. v. Heeman, 86 Pa. St. 418.

Texas.— Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Rutherford, 94 Tex. 518, 62 S. W. 1056; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Black, 87 Tex. 160, 27 S. W. 118; International, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 82 Tex. 516, 17 S. W. 1039, 27 Am. St. Rep. 902; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Moody, (Civ. App. 1893) 23 S. W. 41.

A custom of brakemen to eject trespassers, of which the company knows or ought to know, is sufficient to show an implied authority in the brakeman to remove trespassers from the cars so as to render the company liable for the improper exercise of such authority. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Mother, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 87, 24 S. W. 79; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 93 Va. 650, 25 S. E. 947. So, notwithstanding there is a rule of the railroad company forbidding brakemen to eject trespassers, and providing that conductors alone shall have such authority, if such rule is usually and customarily violated to the knowledge of the superior officers of the company, and no attempt is made to enforce it, a jury is authorized in finding that a brakeman who kicked a trespasser from a car was acting within the scope of his authority. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Rutherford, (Civ. App. 1901) 62 S. W. 1069 [affirmed in 94 Tex. 518, 62 S. W. 1056].

Immaterial allegations may be stricken out. Paine v. Columbus, etc., R. Co., 2 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 257, 7 Ohio N. P. 327. Thus in an action for an injury occasioned by the moving of trains in a yard used by defendant railroad company exclusively for the switching of cars and making up trains, allegations of non-compliance with the municipal ordinances regulating the speed of trains and the exhibition of signals should be struck out, such ordinances not being applicable to railroad yards. Grube v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., (Mo. 1888) 10 S. W. 185.

An allegation which no facts are alleged to support is immaterial. Woodruff v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 47 Fed. 689, holding this to be true of an allegation of unlawful speed, where no facts are alleged to support it, and no reference is made to any statute fixing a lawful rate of speed.

Curing defect.—A declaration or complaint bad for the omission of material averments may be cured by the answer or other subsequent pleading of defendant supplying those averments. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Kerr, 74 Nebr. 1, 104 N. W. 49.

Construction.— While in a case of doubt, if the pleadings are ambiguous or where two different meanings present themselves, that construction must be adopted which is most unfavorable to the pleader; still if the expression is capable of two meanings, that one shall be taken which will support the declaration and not the other which will defeat it. Motion to make more specific.— Where the allegations in the complaint are made in such a manner that defendant cannot respond intelligently, a motion to make the complaint more specific will lie. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Berry, 152 Ind. 607, 53 N. E. 415, 46 L. R. A. 33; Pennsylvania Co. v. Dean, 92 Ind. 459; Rathburn v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 16 Nebr. 441, 20 N. W. 390. But where, in an action for an injury maliciously inflicted, the manner and occasion of the injury are specifically set forth, it is not error to overrule a motion to make the complaint more specific by stating by what servant of the company the injury was inflicted, and at what time of day, and on what kind of a train, it occurred. Wabash R. Co. v. Savage, 110 Ind. 156, 9 N. E. 85.

Where the allegations are indefinite but the language shows a liability of defendant in favor of plaintiff, when it is given its ordinary meaning, the complaint is sufficient and a demurrer thereto on the ground that the facts do not constitute a cause of action should be overruled. Rathburn v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 16 Nebr. 441, 20 N. W. 390.

26. Southern R. Co. v. Bunt, 131 Ala. 591, 32 So. 507; Georgia Pac. R. Co. v. Richardson, 80 Ga. 727, 7 S. E. 119; Charleston, etc., R. Co. v. Johnson, 1 Ga. App. 441, 57 S. Complaint held sufficient.— In an action for injuries received by reason of the railroad company's negligence in running an engine or cars against the party injured while on the track (see Bullard v. Southern R. Co., 116 Ga. 644, 43 S. E. 39; Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Enright, 227 Ill. 403, 81 N. E. 374 [affirming 192 Ill. App. 223]; Rider v. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co., 10 Ohio Cir. Ct. 299, 6 Ohio Cir. Dec. 603; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. O'Donnell, (Tex. Civ. App. 1905) 90 S. W. 886 [reversed on other grounds in 99 Tex. 636, 92 S. W. 409]), or against a car on or about which the injured party was working at the time of the accident (State v. Western Maryland R. Co., 98 Md. 125, 56 Atl. 394, 103 Am. St. Rep. 388; Greenman v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 100 Wis. 188, 75 N. W. 998). In an action against two railroad companies, one of which was foreign, for injuries received by being struck by a lump of ice from a passing train. Maysville, etc., R. Co. v. Willis, 104 S. W. 1016, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1249. Thus a declaration or complaint is sufficient where it alleges that plaintiff was on the track of defendant's road and without any warning to him or without any fault on his part defendant's locomotive was negligently run against him thereby causing the injury (Terre Haute, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, 46 Ind. 239); where it alleges that defendant on its railroad did carelessly and negligently and with great force and violence run and drive one of its engines and divers of its cars upon and against plaintiff's intestate thereby greatly wounding him so that he died and that his death was caused by the said wrongful act, neglect, and default of defendant (Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Harman, 83 Va. 553, 8 S. E. 251); where it alleges that defendant's train, starting from a station, negligently ran over deceased sitting on the track three hundred yards from the station, he being in plain view of those in charge of the engine from the time they left the station (Seaboard, etc., R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 23 S. E. 773); where it alleges that deceased, while on the track of defendant, was carelessly and negligently pushed against and struck by a locomotive, engine, or cars belonging to defendant and in the control, custody, and management of its employees, and thereby received injuries from which he died (Bias v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 349, 33 S. E. 240); or where it alleges that plaintiff was on the track by consent of the company, and was injured at night by cars being loaded with timbers projecting seven feet beyond the track (Baston v. Georgia R. Co., 60 Ga. 339).

Complaint held insufficient.— On general demurrer see Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Adair, 12 Ind. App. 569, 39 N. E. 672, 40 N. E. 822; Paine v. Columbus, etc., R. Co., 2 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 135, 7 Ohio N. P. 327; McIntyre v. Galveston, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 632. On special demurrer see Kemp v. Georgia Cent. R. Co., 122 Ga. 559, 50 S. E. 465, under Civ. Code (1895), § 4960. Thus a complaint is insufficient in an action for injuries caused to a boy of ten years of age while attempting to get on the ladder of a moving freight car, where it does not allege that his attempt was known to any of the employees in charge thereof (Underwood v. Western, etc., R. Co., 105 Ga. 48, 31 S. E. 123); or where it states in effect that the engineer in charge of the train did not see deceased in time to stop the train before he was struck, but that he might or ought to have seen him (Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Stroud, 64 Miss. 784, 2 So. 171); where, in an action for injuries caused by defendant's negligence in failing to keep a path between two railroads properly guarded, it fails to allege that the public had any right to use the path between the railroads or that deceased was using the path when he was hurt, or that defendant had erected the safeguard, thereby assuming the duty of maintaining such guard (Dorn v. Georgia, etc., R. Co., 58 S. C. 364, 36 S. E. 654); or where in an action for the death of a bare licensee on the track, it merely alleges that defendant was negligent in pushing its train of cars and engine across the trestle without any lookout on the end of the cars and at a rate of speed forbidden by the city ordinances (Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stegall, 105 Va. 538, 54 S. E. 19).

the tracks, or cars,[27] as that he was on or near the track by invitation;[28] must directly and positively allege what duty was owing by defendant to the party injured, the failure to discharge which caused the injury complained of, or make such averments of facts as will show the existence of such duty;[29] and must allege a failure, or facts showing a failure, to perform such duty, or in other words, must allege negligence on the part of the railroad company,[30] and the injury sustained

A complaint under a statute should allege all facts sufficient to bring plaintiff's case within its provisions. Roundtree v. Stephens, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 433 (holding that in order that an administrator may recover for the loss of decedent's life under Gen. St. c. 57, pt. 1, he must allege that decedent was not in the employment of the railroad company by whose negligence the injury occurred); East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Pratt, 85 Tenn. 9, 1 S. W. 618 (holding the allegations sufficient to bring the case within Code, § 1298).

Where knowledge of the act or omission is of the essence of the liability, such knowledge may be implied from an allegation that the railroad company by its servants made a practice of permitting and allowing the act to be done or omitted in a manner and at a place which subjected the person or persons who might chance to be lawfully upon the premises, to danger. Shaw v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 123 Mich. 629, 82 N. W. 618, 49 L. R. A. 308. So, in an action for injuries caused by the falling of a car door while working on or about the car, an allegation that while plaintiff in a careful manner was opening the door he was injured in consequence of the negligence of defendant in failing to provide safe hinges and appliances for holding the door securely on said car and fastenings is equivalent to an allegation of knowledge or means of knowledge on the part of the railroad company of the defective condition of the door. If a person's right to walk on a railroad track depends upon the fact that such road is a public highway he must allege that fact in his petition, in an action for injuries received from the alleged negligence of the railroad company. Murch v. Concord R. Corp., 29 N. H. 9, 61 Am. Dec. 631.

Relation to railroad.— Where the complaint states a good cause of action in that defendant did not use due care after discovering the party injured in a perilous position, it is not fatally defective because it does not aver whether the injured party's relation to the railroad company was that of a trespasser or servant. Facts from which the court can see that defendant owed the party injured a legal duty must be alleged. Brothers v. Rutland R. Co., 71 Vt. 38, 42 Atl. 980.

In an action for injuries caused by a freight train running against a depot platform, where the declaration explains plaintiff's being in that position and his relations to the company only by the allegation that he was standing on the platform in pursuance of his lawful business and without fault on his part, the allegation is sufficient to show that he was not a trespasser and that he was entitled to such rights and considerations as were due to a licensee. United States.— Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Cox, 145 Fed. 157, 76 C. C. A. 127 (holding that plaintiff need not allege in terms that the negligence was that of an officer, agent, or servant, but it is sufficient that the negligence was that of the company); Anderson v. Hopkins, 91 Fed. 77, 33 C. C. A. 346.

Allegations held sufficient.—A declaration alleging that on a particular day and near a particular place defendant company wrongfully and negligently ran one of its engines and cars upon plaintiff is sufficient, and need not be made more specific by setting forth the hour at which the wrong occurred, the direction in which the train was moving, or which one of defendant's cars caused the injury. Crowley v. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co., 108 Tenn. 74, 65 S. W. 411.

Alternative allegations.—Essential and ma-act stated as causing the injury was negligently or carelessly done or omitted.[36] But if the specific acts relied upon as constituting the alleged negligence are pleaded, such specific averments may overcome the general averments and render the pleading bad.[37] A demurrer should be sustained to the declaration or complaint where the allegations therein would not entitle plaintiff to recover if established;[38] or where they show on their face such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery.[39]

(B) Negativing Contributory Negligence. As a general rule the declaration or complaint in an action for injuries caused by the negligence of a railroad company need not negative contributory negligence on the part of the person injured,[40] and this is expressly provided by statute in some jurisdictions,[41] and no adverse presumption arises from plaintiff's failure to do so.[42] Even where the negation of such negligence is made or required, a general averment of freedom from contributory negligence is sufficient as embracing all specific averments that might be made to that effect.[43]

(C) Wilful, Wanton, or Reckless Injury. Where the pleadings show that the party injured was a trespasser at the time of the injury, plaintiff must aver more than simple negligence in order to authorize a recovery,[44] and must aver that the injury was wilfully, wantonly, or recklessly inflicted.[45] To charge wilful, wanton, terial allegations to recover when stated in the alternative are generally bad, but a general allegation that the act which caused the injury was negligently or carelessly done or omitted is sufficient without setting out the details of the negligence, particularly where the manner of the commission of the negligent act is peculiarly within the knowledge of defendant. General allegations of want of contributory negligence will be controlled by specific averments in respect thereto (Wolfe v. Pierce, 24 Ind. App. 680, 57 N. E. 555; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Downey, 18 Ind. App. 140, 47 N. E. 494, holding general and specific averments not inconsistent); and if the specific averments overcome the general averments and show contributory negligence, the complaint is defective and a demurrer should be sustained (Wolfe v. Pierce, supra).

Complaint held insufficient as charging simple negligence only in an action for wilful or wanton negligence see Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Burgess, 116 Ala. 509, 22 So. 913; Dull v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 21 Ind. App. 571, 52 N. E. 1013.

Complaint held sufficient to authorize a recovery by a trespasser for wilful, wanton, or reckless injury (see Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Bodemer, 139 Ill. 596, 29 N. E. 692, 32 Am. St. Rep. 218 [affirming 33 Ill. App. 479]), in alleging that plaintiff was wantonly and recklessly or intentionally injured by defend-or reckless injury the declaration or complaint must aver an injury caused under circumstances showing that the railroad company had knowledge of the injured party's perilous position at the time,[46] and that it did, or omitted to do, the acts constituting the alleged negligence under circumstances showing a reckless disregard of consequences, and a probability that they would result in injury.[47] Unless such facts are alleged, the mere fact that the words "wilful," "careless," "wanton," or "unlawful" are made use of in the complaint is not sufficient,[48] nor does the use of the term "wilful" show that the act complained of was beyond the scope of the servant's employment;[49] and on the other hand, if the pleading does, in sufficiently apt terms, describe the act or omission as wilful or wanton, the word "wilful" need not be used,[50] and, although the act may in fact be ant through its servant or agent (Highland Ave., etc., R. Co. v. Robinson, 125 Ala. 483, 28 So. 28. See Maysville, etc., R. Co. v. Willis, 104 S. W. 1016, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1249, holding a petition not objectionable as failing to charge that the servant was acting within the scope of his authority).

The word "recklessly" used conjunctively with "wantonly" means something more than "negligently," and assignments of demurrer on the idea that the word "recklessly" so used in a complaint means "negligently" are without merit. Highland Ave., etc., R. Co. v. Robinson, 125 Ala. 483, 28 So. 28.

As against an exception of no cause of action filed by defendant, which admits the truth of plaintiff's allegations, allegations that deceased (a trespasser) was wholly without fault in the premises and his killing was due to the reckless and wanton negligence of defendant are sufficient. Davis v. Arkansas Southern R. Co., 117 La. 320, 41 So. 587.

46. Sherfey v. Evansville, etc., R. Co., 121 Ind. 427, 23 N. E. 273; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Eaden, 122 Ky. 818, 93 S. W. 7, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 365, 6 L. R. A. N. S. 581.

An averment that a brakeman saw plaintiff's peril and immediately signaled the engineer to stop the train is not a sufficient allegation that the engineer knew of plaintiff's peril to render the railroad company liable on the ground of wanton negligence in failing to stop its train. Evans v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 142 Ind. 264, 41 N. E. 537.

Complaint held insufficient in not showing that the engineer had actual knowledge of the injured party's peril (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Mitchell, 134 Ala. 261, 32 So. 735), or in not showing that the party injured was in a perilous condition when seen by the trainmen, or at what point the peril became manifest, or that at such perilous point the engineer failed to make every possible effort to stop the train (Ullrich v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 151 Ind. 358, 51 N. E. 95).

47. Haley v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 113 Ala. 640, 21 So. 357; Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Kinnare, 203 Ill. 388, 67 N. E. 826 [affirming 105 Ill. App. 566]; Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Boettcher, 131 Ind. 82, 28 N. E. 551; Sherfey v. Evansville, etc., R. Co., 121 Ind. 427, 23 N. E. 273; Terre Haute, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, 46 Ind. 239; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Eaden, 122 Ky. 818, 93 S. W. 7, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 365, 6 L. R. A. N. S. 581.

Complaint held sufficient.—A complaint alleging that the engineer recklessly and wilfully, with knowledge of decedent's unconsciousness of danger, and without regard for consequences, ran his engine over decedent, states a cause of action whether decedent was a trespasser or not. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Judd, 10 Ind. App. 213, 36 N. E. 775.

Failure to stop.— Where one placed in peril by a moving train by his own negligence seeks to recover for such injury as for wanton recklessness, in that the engineer knowing of plaintiff's peril failed to stop the train, he must allege that the train could have been stopped in time to avoid the injury. Evans v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 142 Ind. 264, 41 N. E. 537.

Authority to eject trespasser.— In an action for injuries caused by wanton negligence in ejecting a trespasser from a train, a petition stating that at the time plaintiff was injured by the locomotive it was in charge of and under the management and control of defendant's servants who were respectively fireman and engineer thereon, by implication alleges that the fireman had authority to eject trespassers therefrom. Chicago Great Western R. Co. v. Troup, 71 Kan. 843, 80 Pac. 30.

Pertinent and material averments should not be stricken out. Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Guest, 136 Ala. 348, 34 So. 968, holding that after alleging facts showing a wilful or wanton injury, a further averment that at the hour of the occurrence from thirty to fifty people walked along defendant's track at the place of the injury, and that such fact was well known to defendant's servants and agents was pertinent and material and should not have been stricken from the complaint.

An intention on the part of the railroad employees to inflict the injury, it has been held, must be directly and explicitly alleged, and an allegation of wilful negligence is not sufficient. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Tartt, 99 Fed. 369, 39 C. C. A. 568, 49 L. R. A. 98.

48. Southern R. Co. v. Bush, 122 Ala. 470, 26 So. 168; Sherfey v. Evansville, etc., R. Co., 121 Ind. 427, 23 N. E. 273.

wilful, it need not necessarily be so designated but it may also properly be alleged as negligent.[51]

(II) Answer and Subsequent Pleadings. A plea in abatement is proper where the action is for a greater amount than is allowed by statute to be recovered.[52] A replication should be made to affirmative averments in the answer,[53] but more general averments are allowed in a replication than in a declaration.[54]

b. Issues, Proof, and Variance — (I) Issues Raised and Matters to Be Proved. Such matters only as are material and are properly put in issue by the pleadings and proof need be considered.[55] Plaintiff is entitled to recover only upon such cause of action as is properly alleged by him,[56] and upon proof

52. Slattery v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 21 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 556, holding this to be true where an action for twenty-five thousand dollars is brought under the act of April 4, 1868, limiting the liability of railroad companies to five thousand dollars in such cases.

53. Smith v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 95 Ky. 11, 23 S. W. 652, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 390, 22 L. R. A. 72, holding, however, that an allegation that plaintiff voluntarily swung himself off the train from which he alleges he was kicked is not such an affirmative averment as requires a reply.

A want of a reply is not material, where a special defense is set up with a general denial, and the facts of the special defense are admissible under the general issue. Valley R. Co. v. Roos, 9 Ohio Cir. Ct. 201, 6 Ohio Cir. Dec. 33.

Questions relating to defects in a platform held material on the issue of the company's negligence in respect thereto see Banderob v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 133 Wis. 249, 113 N. W. 738.

Pleading charging the specific act of negligence as the running of a train in excess of the rate of speed prescribed by ordinance see Colorado Midland R. Co. v. Robbins, 30 Colo. 449, 71 Pac. 371.

That a defective brake was the proximate cause of the injury is the theory of a declaration setting out defendant's duty to provide a car equipped with a safe brake, the breach of such duty, and, in orderly sequence, the events which followed. Sheltrawn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 128 Mich. 669, 87 N. W. 893.

An allegation that the railroad company negligently maintained a pile of cinders which made the highway unsafe and caused the injury will authorize a recovery at common law for defendant's negligence, although the petition also alleges that the act was in violation of an ordinance. Anderson v. Union Terminal R. Co., 161 Mo. 411, 61 S. W. 874.

The issue whether a government inspector of customs was in the discharge of his official duties is raised by evidence showing that decedent was such an inspector charged with the duty of counting and inspecting railroad irons loaded on cars for shipment; that some of the cars had been loaded and inspected and a manifest given by decedent; that there was one car which had not been inspected and that decedent started to cross the track in the open space between the cars for the purpose of inspecting the latter and the cars were pushed together for the purpose of switching them. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Levy, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 107, 79 S. W. 879.

The proper issues in an action for the death of a trespasser on a train by the wrongful act of defendant's servants are whether plaintiff's intestate was killed by defendant's negligence, whether he contributed to his death by his own negligence, and whether defendant by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence could have avoided the accident notwithstanding intestate's contributory negligence. Pierce v. North Carolina R. Co., 124 N. C. 83, 32 S. E. 399, 34 L. R. A. 316.

An issue as to the last clear chance need not be considered by the jury, where it has found that deceased was killed by defendant's negligence, and was not guilty of contributory negligence. Harris v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 132 N. C. 160, 43 S. E. 589.

The issue of an unusually high rate of speed is properly submitted under an allegation that plaintiff was unlawfully and recklessly run down by defendant's engine, which approached from behind, and that the engine was being run backward at a fast rate of speed, in violation of a city ordinance. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Harvin, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 54 S. W. 629.

Illustrations.— Thus where plaintiff bases his right of recovery on the ground that he was upon its cars by invitation and with the consent of defendant, he cannot recover if he was an intruder. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Crum, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 702, 25 S. W. 1126. So where a complaint merely alleges negligence on defendant's part and not wilful and wanton negligence, plaintiff of all material matters therein;[57] and he cannot recover upon a cause of action materially different from that alleged in his complaint,[58] unless he amends his complaint to state such cause of action.[59] A count relying on the wilful acts of defendant's servants as distinguished from the acts of the company itself is in case;[60] but a count upon the wanton and wilful acts of defendant company and not upon the wrongs committed by its servants is in trespass,[61] and since it involves the affirmative participation of the railroad company and not merely its responsibility for the acts of its servants, proof to sustain it must show actual participation on the part of the company in the wrongful act,[62] and it is not supported by evidence that the injury was inflicted by defendant's servants.[63] Likewise defendant can rely only upon such matters of defense as are properly put in issue by his pleadings.[64] It cannot rely upon a defense which might have been put in issue only by special pleading, but was not so pleaded.[65]

(II) EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE. Such evidence only is admissible on behalf of plaintiff as tends to prove matters put in issue by his pleadings;[66] and evidence as to matters not alleged or on which there is no issue is inadmis-

cannot recover on the ground that defendant's employees saw the injured party's dangerous position and failed to stop the train. Esrey v. Southern Pac. Co., 88 Cal. 399, 26 Pac. 211. But under allegations that plaintiff was knocked and kicked from defendant's train by its conductor, he may recover on proof that the conductor alarmed him to such an extent that he jumped off the train since the gravamen of the complaint is in forcing him off in an unlawful manner. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 62 Fed. 440, 10 C. C. A. 463.

57. Brown v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 52 Ark. 120, 12 S. W. 203, holding that, where a complaint alleges that deceased was thrown from a freight train by defendant's servants, he must prove that deceased was thrown from defendant's train.

Immaterial allegations need not be proved. East St. Louis Connecting R. Co. v. Altgen, 210 Ill. 213, 71 N. E. 377 [affirming 112 Ill. App. 471], holding that where plaintiff was injured while lawfully upon a locomotive, he need not prove an immaterial allegation that he was on the locomotive in the performance of his duties as servant.

In an action for injuries by being struck by a mail pouch thrown from a moving train, where the complaint alleges that for more than two years it had been the custom of the company to knowingly permit large bags of mail to be thrown from the trains by mail clerks while the trains were in rapid motion, it is essential to a recovery to show that it was the custom to throw the mail where it was liable to do injury to some person, but it is not essential that the evidence should show that it was thrown off customarily at the exact spot where plaintiff was struck. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Warrum, (Ind. App. 1907) 82 N. E. 934, (App. 1908) 84 N. E. 356.

Defenses eliminated.— Where a count basing plaintiff's right to recover on the theory that he was a passenger on a freight train is dismissed, and the case is submitted on instructions asked by both parties, which declare that plaintiff was a trespasser, a defense that defendant is not liable, because of plaintiff's fraud in representing himself to be the owner of a mileage ticket issued to another which he induced the conductor to accept in payment of his fare, is thereby eliminated from the case (Mirrielees v. Wabash R. Co., 163 Mo. 470, 63 S. W. 718); nor can defendant contend that it is not liable because of a release contained in such mileage ticket, exempting it from liability for injuries sustained to the holder while riding on a freight train (Mirrielees v. Wabash R. Co., supra).

65. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Black, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 119, 57 S. 66. Seaboard Air Line R. sible,[67] subject, however, to this qualification, that evidence of matters, although not alleged, may be introduced, not for the purpose of proving such matter, but for the purpose of showing the situation and surrounding circumstances at the time

Under a general averment of negligence evidence is admissible of any neglect or misconduct on the part of defendant tending to produce the injury complained of. Oldfield v. New York, etc., R. Co., 14 N. Y. 310 [affirming 3 E. D. Smith 103].

Evidence is admissible under an averment that servants of defendant caused an engine to be run at a greater rate of speed than ten miles an hour in violation of a city ordinance and that such violation contributed to the injury complained of, that such ordinance was then in force (St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Eggman, 161 Ill. 155, 43 N. E. 620 [affirming 60 Ill. App. 291]); or under an allegation that defendant negligently managed the train, that it was negligent in not stopping after the employees saw plaintiff on the track (Hanlon v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 104 Mo. 381, 16 S. W. 233); or under an allegation of negligence in propelling a train "with great force," that the train was propelled with sufficient force to cause the injuries complained of (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Aland, 192 Ill. 37, 61 N. E. 450 [affirming 94 Ill. App. 428]); or under an allegation that the brakeman of the train was authorized to eject trespassers, and acted within the scope of his authority in attempting to expel plaintiff, that rules of the company forbidding brakemen to eject trespassers were mere pretexts, and that in practice brakemen were empowered to exercise such authority (Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Rutherford, 94 Tex. 518, 62 S. W. 1056 [affirming (Civ. App. 1901) 62 S. W. 1069]); or under an allegation that for more than two years it had been the custom of the company to permit bags of mail to be thrown from trains while in motion, that mail bags had been thrown off by mail clerks at other points than the particular spot where plaintiff was struck (Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Warrum, (Ind. App. 1907) 82 N. E. 934, (App. 1908) 84 N. E. 356); or under an allegation that plaintiff was injured while in one of defendant's freight cars unloading his machinery under defendant's direction, and while so engaged defendant so negligently propelled certain cars that they ran against the car in which plaintiff was working, and thereby knocked him against the machinery and injured him, that just prior to the accident defendant's station agent called plaintiff's attention to an insecure grain door tacked above his head, and that plaintiff was injured before he got another seat (St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Holmes, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 49 S. W. 658). Where a person is injured in the night-time while on a lawn adjacent to a depot platform, by being tripped by wires stretched across the lawn, the failure of the railroad to sufficiently light the place is material on the issue of its negligence. Banderob v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 133 Wis. 249, 113 N. W. 738. Evidence of any act of negligence in conducting, managing, and propelling cars at the time and place of the accident is admissible under an allegation that defendant "so carelessly and negligently conducted, managed, and propelled said car that by such carelessness and negligence said car ran against, knocked down, and ran over [deceased] without any fault or neglect on his part." St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Taylor, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 668, 24 S. W. 975.

Evidence is inadmissible under an allegation that deceased was killed while walking on the track belonging exclusively to the railroad company by the wilful wrong of the servants of the company, that the place where the accident occurred was one which the company had licensed the public to use (Palmer v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 112 Ind. 250, 14 N. E. 70); or under an allegation that for more than ten years defendant's track where the accident occurred had been used by the public as a thoroughfare with the knowledge of defendant and its employees, that such use of the track was by license from defendant (Burg v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 90 Iowa 106, 57 N. W. 680, 48 Am. St. Rep. 419); or in an action for injuries caused by negligence in running cars, that the accident was caused by a defective brake (De Bolt v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 123 Mo. 496, 27 S. W. 575); or under an allegation that persons were carried on freight trains with full knowledge of defendant, that persons were in the habit of riding, without objection, on freight trains, regardless of defendant's rules (Feeback v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 167 Mo. 206, 66 S. W. 965); or under an allegation of negligence in failing to blow a whistle, that the whistle was defective (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Scott, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 27 S. W. 827). So in an action for injuries caused by striking plaintiff's intestate while he was on a trestle, evidence that there was a good deal of travel over a plank walk over the trestle is inadmissible in the absence of an allegation that the company had negli-

and place of the accident, and therefore as tending to prove other matters alleged.[68] On behalf of defendant any evidence is admissible under a general denial which tends to disprove the matters put in issue by plaintiff's allegations;[69] but evidence as to matters of affirmative defense is admissible only where such matters are specially pleaded.[70]

gently allowed the public to use the walk. Smalley v. Southern R. Co., 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 489. So, in an action by a trespasser for injuries received in jumping from a moving train, evidence as to whether the accident would have happened if the train had remained standing at the station the usual time is inadmissible since such a statutory regulation is for the benefit of passengers only. Carter v. Charleston, etc., R. Co., 64 S. C. 316, 42 S. E. 161. So under allegations of defendant's failure to fence its track, the neglect of those in charge of the engine to signal its approach by bell or whistle, that the train was not on schedule time, or that it was run at a high rate of speed, and that it was not equipped with air brakes, evidence that the engineer had he been exercising a careful lookout could have seen the party injured in time to have stopped the train is inadmissible. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Grablin, 38 Nebr. 90, 56 N. W. 796, 57 N. W. 522. So in an action for the death of a person while unloading goods from a car, due to the unsoundness of an apron covering the space between the car and platform, evidence that the apron, if sound, would have held the weight of the deceased is incompetent where there is no evidence tending to show that deceased stood on the apron at the time of the accident. Cogdell v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 130 N. C. 313, 41 S. E. 541.

A city ordinance regulating the giving of signals or the rate of speed at which a train should be run is inadmissible in the absence of any averment in the declaration of the existence of such ordinance. Blanchard v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 126 Ill. 416, 18 N. E. 799, 9 Am. St. Rep. 630; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Godfrey, 71 Ill. 500, 22 Am. Rep. 112.

Where deceased was a trespasser on a freight train when killed, and was hiding between the cars, evidence that passengers were habitually allowed to ride on freight trains with the knowledge of defendant's employees is inadmissible. Feehack v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 167 Mo. 206, 66 S. W. 965.

68. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Aland, 192 Ill. 37, 61 N. E. 450 [affirming 94 Ill. App. 428] (holding that under an allegation that defendant negligently propelled a train of cars against a motionless freight car which plaintiff was unloading, evidence that no warning of the approach of the train was given by ringing the bell or blowing the whistle does not tend to prove a distinct act of negligence not alleged, but is a circumstance proving that the train was negligently propelled); Helbig v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 85 Mich. 359, 48 N. W. 589 (holding that in an action for injuries by being run over by a car, although the declaration does not allege negligence in not having a man stationed on top of the car, evidence that a man if on the car could have seen plaintiff is admissible to show the situation and surroundings at the time of the accident, where the court in its charge confines plaintiff to the negligence alleged in the declaration); Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Craft, 69 Fed. 124, 16 C. C. A. 175 (holding that it is proper to admit evidence that the person in charge of the engine which ran over decedent was intoxicated, although his intoxication is not pleaded as a specific act of negligence).

Rules adopted by a railroad company for the conduct of its business are admissible in evidence in actions for negligence, although not pleaded, since they bear on the conduct of the managers. White v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 84 Mo. App. 411. But see Fink v. Ash, 99 Ga. 106, 24 S. E. 976.

Evidence in rebuttal.—Although the alleged negligence is the failure of defendant to ring the engine bell, it is proper to admit testimony that the engineer was not on the engine when the accident happened, after the engineer has testified that he was on the engine and that the bell was rung. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Calvert, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 297, 32 S. W. 246.

69. Werges v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 35 La. Ann. 641 (holding that where a petition charges defendant with running its cars through the street of a city "without any warrant of law or color of authority" defendant can, without specially pleading them, put in evidence private acts of the legislature and city ordinances purporting to authorize the acts complained of); Valley R. Co. v. Roos, 9 Ohio Cir. Ct. 201, 6 Ohio Cir. Dec. 33.

In an action for ejection of plaintiff by the company's agent, from a depot room, defendant may show under a general denial that the agent had provided two rooms, one for white and the other for colored persons, and had established a rule requiring them to purchase tickets in their respective rooms, and that plaintiff was ejected from the room not intended for her race. Smith v. Chamberlain, 38 S. C. 529, 17 S. E. 371, 19 L. R. A. 710.

70. Bluedorn v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 121 Mo. 258, 25 S. W. 943, (1893) 24 S. W. 57, holding that in an action for injuries from a train on the ground that it was running at a rate of speed in excess of that fixed by is fatal to a recovery.[71] An immaterial variance, however, which in no wise prejudices defendant's case, will not affect plaintiff's recovery.[72] ordinance, defendant cannot show that the ordinance is unreasonable and invalid unless such defense is specially pleaded.

Variance has been held material between an allegation that the accident occurred within the city limits and proof that it happened beyond the limits (Highland Ave., etc., R. Co. v. Maddox, 100 Ala. 618, 13 So. 615); between allegations that plaintiff was a licensee upon defendant's railroad, and proof showing the relationship of master and servant (Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Burks, 148 Ala. 113, 41 So. 638); between an allegation that while intestate was ascending the side of a car he came in contact with a tank which had been erected too near the track to permit his body to pass between the same and the side of the car, and proof that he was standing on a platform between two cars with his back toward the tank and extending out but a little beyond the sides of the car (Hood v. Pioneer Min., etc., Co., 95 Ala. 461, 11 So. 10); between an allegation that plaintiff was upon defendant's track "at the instance and request of the defendant," and proof that plaintiff was on the track while in the discharge of his duty as a brakeman (Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. George, 94 Ala. 199, 10 So. 145); between an allegation that deceased was killed in a specified way by the negligent running of a particular train or engine, and proof that he was killed by another engine of the company and in a manner different from that alleged (Central R. Co. v. Hubbard, 86 Ga. 623, 12 S. E. 1020); between a charge of negligence as to the employment of an incompetent engineer, and proof of failure to furnish the engineer with assistance to maintain the necessary lookout to prevent accidents (Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Shockman, 59 Kan. 774, 52 Pac. 446); between an allegation that as plaintiff was making a coupling he stepped between the cars and was injured by reason of defendant's neglect to ballast the track, and proof that he was standing with his arm against the stationary car where it was caught by the moving car (Mueller v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 105 Mich. 487, 63 N. W. 416); between an allegation that the train of cars on which deceased was at work was moving down an incline track under control, and proof that the train was moving in the opposite direction by order of the conductor (Pennington v. Detroit, etc., R. Co., 90 Mich. 505, 51 N. W. 634); between a complaint claiming damages for a tortious expulsion in the night-time from a train, and proof of injury from exposure caused by an unreasonable detention, and the deprivation of proper facilities for care and shelter (Harding v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 56 Mich. 628, 23 N. W. 445); between an allegation that the specific negligence which caused the injury was a failure to stop the train at the station long enough for plaintiff to alight, and proof that the injury was occasioned by a failure to keep the platform of the station lighted (Price v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 72 Mo. 414); between an allegation that the negligence consisted in having or using defective machinery and in running and managing its road and cars, and proof that the injury was caused by a broken frog (Waldhier v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 71 Mo. 514); between an allegation that the injuries were caused by defendant's negligently driving and managing its train, and proof that they were caused by the negligent building of the depot platform so close to the track that the car step struck plaintiff while standing on the platform (Murray v. Silver City, etc., R. Co., 3 N. M. 337, 9 Pac. 369); and between an allegation that "the conductor of said train, acting for defendant in directing the movements thereof, by giving signals to defendant's engineer, under whose control and management defendant had placed the aforesaid locomotive and construction train," and proof that a second foreman or "straw boss" of defendant's crew had the control and management of the movements of the train (Forge v. Houston, etc., R. Co., 41 Tex. Civ. App. 81, 90 S. W. 1118).

72. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Cozatt, 39 Ind. App. 682, 79 N. E. 534; Tubbs v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 107 Mich. 108, 64 N. W. 1061, 61 Am. St. Rep. 320; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Ollis, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 231, 83 S. W. 850.

Variance has been held immaterial between an allegation that defendant was engaged in transporting mail and that it was customary for it to deliver the mail to plaintiff, and proof that the mail was thrown from the train by the United States mail agent (Tubbs v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 107 Mich. 108, 64 N. W. 1061, 61 Am. St. Rep. 320); between an allegation that "there was no light on the rear part of said engine to indicate its approach" and proof that there was a light but it was questionable whether it was sufficient to give a proper warning (Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Cumberland, 12 App. Cas. (D. C.) 598); between an allegation that plaintiff was injured while in a freight car unloading freight into a wagon, and proof that he was injured while standing in a freight car with one foot out on the wagon, engaged in an effort to remove a piece of machinery from the car into the wagon (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Varner, 129 Ga. 844, 60 S. E. 162); between an allegation that plaintiff was employed as a switchman and was discharging his duty as such when injured, and proof that he was foreman of a switching crew and had control of the engine (Ashman v. Flint, etc., R. Co., 90 Mich. 567, 51 N. W. 645); between an allegation

c. Evidence — (I) PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF — (A) In General. In an action for injuries caused by a railroad company, the burden is on plaintiff in the first instance to prove all facts necessary to establish his alleged cause of action.[73] As a general rule there is no presumption of law in such cases that either party was guilty of negligence;[74] but on the other hand if there is any presumption at all, it is that all parties act with ordinary care, and such presumption continues until overthrown by evidence.[75] In the absence of statute or evidence to the contrary, the mere fact of an accident resulting in the injury complained of does not raise a presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company;[76] and the burden of proof is on plaintiff to establish by a pre-that plaintiff was thrown from the car, and proof that while in the act of falling he jumped in order to save himself from more serious anticipated injury (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Johnson, 83 Tex. 628, 19 S. W. 851); between allegations that the accident occurred "on or about September 20, 1887," and at a place on said railroad about seventy-five or one hundred yards distant from a certain station, and proof that it occurred on or about September 18, or between the sixteenth and twentieth of September, within one hundred and fifty yards of the station (Western R. Co. v. Sistrunk, 85 Ala. 352, 5 So. 79); between allegations that by defendant's regulations its trains were not allowed to run faster than six miles an hour in a city where plaintiff's decedent was injured and that there was such sign-board at the corporate limits, and proof that the sign-board was over a mile within the corporate limits (International, etc., R. Co. v. Knehn, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 21 S. W. 58); between an allegation that the injury was caused by plaintiff's foot catching in the angle formed by a switch rail and the main rail, "which angle is called a frog," and proof that the accident occurred at a rail angle which was not a "frog" (San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Gillum, (Tex. Civ. App. 1895) 30 S. W. 697 [affirmed in (1895) 31 S. W. 356]); and between allegations that plaintiff's intestate while on a railroad train was violently ejected and thrown down from the cars by defendant and its agents and servants in the course of their employment, and in being thus forcibly ejected was thrown under the cars and run over and killed thereby, and proof that deceased was injured by this train and that about an hour afterward another train ran over his body (South Carolina R. Co. v. Nix, 68 Ga. 572).

Where defendant is negligent in running its train faster than allowed by ordinance and by reason thereof plaintiff is injured without fault on his part, he is entitled to recover, whether the injury occurred in the particular street named in the petition or elsewhere on defendant's road within the city. The fact that a person is on a railroad train does not necessarily raise the presumption that he is there rightfully (Pennsylvania Co. v. Coyer, 163 Ind. 631, 72 N. E. 875); but on the other hand it has been held that if the complaint does not allege whether he was a passenger, an employee, or a mere trespasser, it will be presumed that he was a trespasser as to whom defendant owed no duty except not to wantonly injure him (White v. Nashville, etc., R. Co., 108 Tenn. 739, 70 S. W. 1030); and in order for a person to recover for injuries received while traveling on a work train, it must be shown that he was lawfully there and that the railroad company owed him the duty of carrying him safely (Pennsylvania Co. v. Coyer, supra).

A trespasser suing for injuries caused by his expulsion by a brakeman has the burden of showing that the brakeman had power to expel him. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Brackman, 78 Ill. App. 141.

Where a boy is injured while attempting to board a moving freight train at the invitation of defendant's employees, who under the evidence had no authority to invite any one to ride on the train, if the boy had such a degree of intelligence that he could or should have appreciated the danger of his act, the burden is on him to show that the person who invited him to go on the train had authority to do so. That a person is found dead on a railroad right of way raises no presumption that he came to his death through the negligence of the railroad company (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Terry, 47 S. That a moving car bumps into a stationary car about which a person is lawfully working is not presumptive evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company, but the burden of proof is on the injured person to show that such car was set in motion by the negligence of the company. A Florida statute (Acts (1887), c. 3744, § 1), relating to the recovery of damages against railroads, and providing that if plaintiff and the agents of the company are both at fault the damages shall be diminished in proportion to the amount of fault attributable to plaintiff, does not relieve plaintiff from the necessity of establishing defendant's negligence. Wilkinson v. Pensacola, etc., R. Co., 35 Fla. 82, 17 So. 71.

Where the person injured was a trespasser and could have seen the train for some distance, and was struck thereby, he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, casting on him the burden of showing that the employee in charge of the train saw him in time to have avoided the injury and negligently failed to use proper means to do so (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Bunch, 82 Ark. 522, 102 S. W. 369); or where the injury occurred on a trestle, the burden is on plaintiff to show that the trainmen discovered him in time to avoid injuring him, and wilfully and recklessly injured him (Adams v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 83 Ark. 300, 103 S. W. 725).

Where an intoxicated person on defendant's track falls down and is run over by a train, the burden is on him of proving his discovery by defendant's employees in time to avoid the injury. Luna v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 73 S. W. 1061.

lish matters of affirmative defense;[81] and while defendant cannot be called upon to produce any evidence until plaintiff has brought sufficient proof to prima facie sustain his cause of action,[82] yet where a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the railroad company is made out, it then devolves upon it to exculpate itself by showing such matters as will avoid liability,[83] unless plaintiff's own proof shows contributory negligence on his part.[84] Plaintiff or defendant may be aided in establishing his or its part of the case by presumptions arising from the facts and the circumstances.[85] Thus in the absence of proof to the contrary, it will be presumed on behalf of plaintiff in an action for injuries caused by being ejected from a locomotive that the engineer was acting within the scope of his employment in putting a trespasser off his locomotive;[86] or it will be presumed in favor of defendant where the injured party could have seen or heard the approaching train which caused his injury in time to avoid the accident, that he did not look and listen, or that he did not heed what he saw or heard;[87] or in case of an injury to a trespasser that the company did not anticipate his being on the track.[88]

(B) Under Statutory Provisions. Under the statutes in some jurisdictions, proof of injury inflicted by the operation of a railroad raises a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the railroad company in reference thereto, and imposes upon it the burden of showing that it was not so negligent.[89] But this presumption may be rebutted by evidence either of plaintiff or defendant;[90] and the railroad company may rebut such presumption and relieve itself of liability by showing that its employees exercised all reasonable care to avoid the injury,[91] or that a compliance with the statutory regulations would not have availed to prevent the injury,[92] as that the injury was caused by the injured party's own lack of care.[93] Even under such statutes proof of contributory negligence establishes a sufficient defense unless other facts are shown, and defendant then being under no duty

v. Nashville, etc., R. Co., 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 589.

Under an Arkansas statute (Sandels & H. Dig. § 6349) making railroad companies "responsible for all damages to persons and property done or caused by the running of trains in this state," the fact that a person was injured or killed along a railroad right of way is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company and the burden rests upon it to show the exercise of proper care as a defense (St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Townsend, 69 Ark. 380, 63 S. W. 994; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Neely, 63 Ark. 636, 40 S. W. 130, 37 L. R. A. 616); but it is held under this statute that the burden of proof is on the railroad company only where the injuries are the result of the actual running of the trains (St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Cooksey, 70 Ark. 481, 69 S. W. 259, holding that the presumption arising in such cases does not apply where a person is scalded by a trainman engaged in wetting coal on the tender while the train is standing still). Thus it has been held that the fact that a person was killed by a train in the company's yards gives rise to a presumption of negligence against the railroad company, casting upon it the burden of establishing that a constant lookout was kept. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Graham, 83 Ark. 61, 102 S. W. 700.

Under Florida Laws (1891), c. 4071, the burden of proving personal injuries is on plaintiff, and when this is shown the burden of showing absence of negligence is on defendant. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Smith, 53 Fla. 375, 43 So. 235.

In Georgia, where plaintiff shows that he was injured by the running of defendant's cars, the burden is then upon the railroad company to make out its defense, as there will then arise a presumption of law that the company was negligent as charged in plaintiff's petition (Gainesville, etc., Electric R. Co. v. Austin, 127 Ga. 120, 56 S. E. 254; Kemp v. Georgia Cent. R. Co., 122 Ga. 559, 50 S. E. 465); and this is true, although plaintiff may allege in different counts that the injury occurred in either one of two ways because of various acts of negligence on the part of the company (Gainesville, etc., Electric R. Co. v. Austin, supra). Code, §§ 2083, 3033, 3036, providing that the presumption in all cases is against the railroad company (Central R. Co. v. Brinson, 64 Ga. 475), is held not to apply in favor of an employee of a receiver (Robinson v. Huidekoper, 98 Ga. 306, 24 S. E. 440).

In Illinois, under 2 Starr & C. Annot. St. c. 114, § 187, an injury resulting from the running of a train in a city at a speed greater than that allowed by ordinance is presumed to have been caused by the negligence of the railroad company. Under a Mississippi statute (Rev. Code, (1880), § 1059), which provides that proof of injury inflicted by cars or locomotives while in motion shall be prima facie evidence of the want of reasonable skill and care on the part of the railroad company's servants in reference thereto, it is for the jury to decide the question of care or skill in reference to the particular injury. Vicksburg, etc., R. Co. v. Phillips, 64 Miss. 693, 2 So. 537. Although this statute was enacted primarily to meet cases where the manner of the injury inflicted is known only to the railroad servants, it is equally applicable where the injury is witnessed by many. Vicksburg, etc., R. Co. v. Phillips, supra. Under Annot. Code (1892), § 1808, where the evidence shows that a person was killed by the running of cars, the statute imposes a liability, unless the company exonerates itself by showing the facts connected with the injury. Yazoo, etc., R. Co. v. Landrum, 89 Miss. 399, 42 So. 675.

Under Tenn. Code, §§ 1167–1169, the fact of injury or death of a person on a railroad right of way is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company, and imposes upon it the burden of showing that it was not guilty of negligence; in other words that it observed the precautions prescribed by such statutes. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Connor, 9 Heisk. 19; Smith v. Nashville, etc., R. Co., 6 Coldw. 589. But it has been held that this need not be shown "by satisfactory affirmative evidence." to prove additional facts to exonerate itself from liability until the effect of the contributory negligence is overcome, the burden is shifted to plaintiff to prove that defendant by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the injury notwithstanding his contributory negligence, but failed to do so,[94] unless such fact is already shown by evidence adduced by defendant.[95]

(c) Contributory Negligence. In some jurisdictions, where the question of contributory negligence is raised,[96] the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show that the party injured was free from contributory negligence.[97] In other jurisdictions, however, except where plaintiff's own case discloses a presumption of contributory negligence,[98] or where a prima facie case of such negligence is established by all the facts and circumstances in the case,[99] if plaintiff shows negligence on the part of the railroad company,[1] he need not further prove freedom from contributory negligence,[2] but the burden of proof is then upon defendant to show contributory negligence as a matter of defense.[3]

(II) ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE[4] — (A) In General. Subject to the general rules regulating the competency, relevancy, and materiality of evidence in civil cases generally,[5] any evidence is admissible in an action for injuries to persons on or near railroad tracks which tends to prove or disprove plaintiff's

Under Ga. Code, § 3033, where the company shows itself without fault by proof that reasonable and ordinary care and diligence has been exercised by its employees, the burden of proving want of contributory negligence is on the party injured. Central R. Co. v. Moore, 61 Ga. 151.

Sufficiency of evidence.— Where it is shown that the accident occurred at night and no witnesses are produced who saw it, the mere fact that the company did not cause a bell to be rung or a light to be put up as required by law is not sufficient to relieve the deceased from the imputation of negligence where it is shown that the train made a noise which could be heard at some distance, that the switchman had lanterns which could easily be seen, and that the deceased was familiar with the track and its surroundings. Evidence held admissible: In an action for injuries from the explosion of a signal torpedo negligently left on a railroad track, a witness may identify the person who placed it there as "one of the train crew," although he did not know such person and did not describe him (Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Marsh, 17 Ohio Cir. Ct. 1, 9 Ohio Cir. Dec. 48); and in such case a witness may testify that an employee of the company got a torpedo from the station agent, although witness at the time did not know what the object was, but afterward learned it was a torpedo, having distinctly seen it at the time (Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Marsh, supra).

Evidence of rules and regulations of roads other than defendant is admissible when at the place where the injury occurred there are tracks used in common by defendant and such other roads. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. O'Sullivan, 40 Ill. App. 369 [affirmed in 143 Ill. 48, 32 N. E. 398].

Evidence of the violation of a city ordinance regulating the operation of trains within city limits, at the time and place of the accident, is admissible as tending to show negligence. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Mathias, 50 Ind. 65; Kelly v. Union R., etc., Co., 95 Mo. 279, 8 S. W. 420; Meek v. Pennsylvania Co., 38 Ohio St. 632.

Wilful or wanton injury.— Evidence of the conduct of railroad employees in the management of the train which caused the injury is admissible as tending to show that the injury was wilful and purposely inflicted. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. McClaren, 62 Ind. 566.

Authority to remove trespasser.— Testimony of a railroad company's brakemen that if they found a trespasser on a car they would put him off, and that it was the custom of brakemen to put off trespassers, is admissible to prove a custom of the company's employees, although the company has a rule prohibiting any employee except the conductor to eject trespassers. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Buch, (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 102 S. W. 124 [reversed on other grounds in (1907) 105 S. W. 987].

Evidence is admissible in an action for injuries caused by being struck by a train, that the engineer in charge of the train was competent (Hasie v. Alabama, etc., R. Co., 78 Miss. 413, 28 So. 941, 84 Am. St. Rep. 632), or upon the issue whether a person run over by a railroad train was standing or walking on the track or lying on it when he was struck, that a train striking a man standing on the track would throw him off and would not run over him unless he was lying down (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Matthews, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 92, 66 S. W. 588, 67 S. W. 788).

Rebuttal.— Testimony that a trainman got from the station agent a torpedo which exploded and injured plaintiff may be rebutted by evidence that in the receptacle from which it was said to be taken there were car seals and car locks similar in appearance to torpedoes. For the purpose of showing the circumstances existing at the time and place of the accident, evidence is admissible in an action for injuries received in the night-time at the junction of two tracks that the company had no platform or station lights at that point, and that there were no lights at the junction (Ensley R. Co. v. Chewning, 93 Ala. 24, 9 So. 458); or in an action for injuries caused by being run over by defendant's cars that the engineer and fireman were in charge of the cars (Reardon v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 114 Mo. 384, 21 S. W. 731); or that there were visitors in the cab of the engine at the time, contrary to a rule of the company (Marcott v. Marquette, etc., R. Co., 47 Mich. 1, 10 N. W. 53); or that no flagman was stationed at the highway crossing at the time of the accident, although, as a matter of law, it was not the duty of defendant to keep a flagman there (Reid v. New York, etc., R. Co., 17 N. Y. Suppl. 801). So in an action for injuries received by the unloading of a gravel train, evidence is admissible as to the manner of starting the engine which unloaded the train, and the character of the rope used for such purpose. Klugherz v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 90 Minn. 17, 95 N. W. 586, 101 Am. St. Rep. 384. So in an action for injuries received at a station by being struck by an incoming train, behalf of plaintiff,[9] or defendant.[10] Statements of a witness which are mere opinions and conclusions, and not statements of facts, upon matters directly in issue and which are for the jury to determine from the facts proved, are ordinarily inadmissible.[11] Declarations or statements not connected with the accident, made by a railroad employee, are inadmissible,[12] except for the purpose of impeaching his testimony.[13]

(B) Other Accidents or Acts of Negligence. As a general rule evidence of where plaintiff claims that he was led to cross the track by information that the train was late, when as a matter of fact it was not late but on time, it is competent to prove that at the time of the accident the crossing was thronged with people. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Herrick, 49 Ohio St. 25, 29 N. E. 1052.

In an action for the injury or death of a transfer mail clerk who was run over by defendant's train while crossing a track at the station where he was employed, the rules of defendant regulating the movements of trains at stations, and a rule of the government regulating the conduct of clerks in the transfer of mail are admissible in evidence. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Kelly, 75 Ill. App. 490, 80 Ill. App. 675.

Evidence held inadmissible.— In an action for the death of plaintiff's decedent caused by his being run over while riding horseback on the track, it is inadmissible to prove "that there was danger to employees on the train in running over stock." Tanner v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 60 Ala. 621. So in an action for the death of a railroad contractor who was struck by a train, evidence of conversations between such contractor and defendant's train despatcher and telegraph operator with reference to requiring all trains to slow down as they approached a bridge where the contractor was working is inadmissible in the absence of evidence that such servants had authority to bind defendant in the premises. Carpenter v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 126 Iowa 94, 101 N. W. 758. In determining the question as to what effect a current of air from a running train produced upon a boy standing near by, evidence of the effect of the air upon mail sacks thrown from running trains is immaterial. Graney v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 140 Mo. 89, 41 S. W. 246, 38 L. R. A. 633.

Where a person is injured while walking along, and not across, defendant's tracks, evidence that the track crossed an old public highway near where plaintiff was injured and that the company had failed to construct a suitable crossing over it is immaterial. Candelaria v. Atkinson, etc., R. Co., 6 N. M. 266, 27 Pac. 497.

Under a Massachusetts statute, Pub. St. c. 112, § 208, providing that all railroad corporations shall give notice to the board of railroad commissioners of certain classes of accidents on their roads, and section 18, providing for investigations by the board, evidence that defendant failed to report the accident is inadmissible in an action for personal injuries to one wrongfully on its train. Devoy v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 156 Mass. 161, 30 N. E. 557.

An ordinance regulating the running of locomotives at street crossings is irrelevant in an action for injuries to persons on the track in a switch-yard. Blankenship v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 94 Va. 449, 27 S. E. 20.

Evidence held inadmissible.— Evidence as to the custom and habits of other people, or as to what defendant's employees thought and believed concerning plaintiff or as to what they intended or did not intend to do, is not admissible in an action for injuries caused in ejecting a trespasser from a train. Johnson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 123 Iowa 224, 98 N. W. 642.

Evidence of plaintiff's purpose in boarding a train, except as indicated by his conduct or declarations at the time, is immaterial in an action for injuries to a trespasser caused by his ejection from a moving train. Johnson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 123 Iowa 224, 98 N. W. 642.

In an action for injuries to a child, evidence is inadmissible that he had been warned not to go upon defendant's track (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Chism, 47 S. W. 251, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 584), or as to what was said to witness by the child's parents when he told them that they must keep their child from jumping on trains (Over v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 73 S. W. 535).

accidents or acts of negligence at other places or on other occasions, previous or subsequent, is inadmissible to show negligence on the part of defendant at the time and place of the accident,[14] unless they are shown to be closely connected with the acts complained of in point of time, place, and circumstances,[15] even though, it has been held, such acts amount to a usage or practice.[16] But it is held that in an action for injuries caused by the negligent ejection of a mail pouch from a train, evidence of a mail agent's previous negligent acts in throwing out the pouch is admissible where the previous acts were such that in common prudence defendant should have anticipated that such an accident was liable to happen;[17] and it has been held that evidence that a person had been struck by such a pouch on a former occasion is admissible.[18]

(c) Precautions Against Recurrence of Injury. By the weight of authority evidence that precautions were taken by the railroad company after the accident complained of to prevent its recurrence, as in making repairs, or otherwise, is inadmissible as an admission of previous negligence in order to show negligence on its part at the time and place of the accident,[19] although it may be admitted

That it is the general custom of railroads to make flying switches is irrelevant in an action for injuries caused by a flying switch, unless a custom of making them under the same conditions is shown. Weatherford, etc., R. Co. v. Duncan, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 479, 35 S. W. 562.

St. 315, holding that, in an action for injuries caused by reason of a railroad company allowing a passenger platform to be improperly placed, evidence is admissible to show that the company's agent immediately after the accident telephoned to the superintendent the situation of the platform and that it ought to be removed, and that it was removed the next day.

Evidence that a defective platform was repaired after the accident is not admissible in an action for injuries caused by such platform to show previous negligence. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Wylie, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 85.

In an action for injuries received by slipping on ice on defendant's platform, evidence that after the accident, sand, ashes, etc., were sprinkled on the ice is inadmissible. Timpson v. Manhattan R. Co., 1 N. Y. Suppl. 673.

Negligence in running a train at an undue speed at a certain point cannot be shown by for some other purpose, as for the purpose of rebutting or explaining some other fact put in evidence.[20]

(D) Right to Go On or Near Track. For the purpose of showing the measure of care required of a railroad company, and the ultimate fact of negligence, evidence is admissible which tends to show whether or not the injured party was a trespasser or mere licensee, or in other words whether or not he was rightfully on or near the track at the time of the accident.[21] For this purpose evidence is admissible as to whether the public generally were in the habit of going upon or along the track with the company's knowledge.[22] In an action for injuries sustained by a person while walking along a railroad track laid in a public street or highway, a city ordinance is admissible to show that the railroad company had no right to the exclusive use of the street or highway,[23] as is also evidence of the fact that the company's officers and agents had made no claim to an exclusive right to that part of the highway, in conversations or negotiations in relation to the matter.[24]

(E) Customary Use of Track. For the purpose of showing the circumstances and conditions existing at the time and place of the accident complained of, and of charging the railroad company with notice thereof, and therefore as tending to show negligence on the part of the railroad company, by the weight of authority evidence is admissible as to the habit or custom of people in the neighborhood to go upon or along the tracks at that place.[25] But evidence as to a cus-

A local custom to the effect that a railroad company required shippers to repair leaks in its cars before they would be accepted for shipment is competent for the purpose of showing that one injured while engaged in such work was not a mere trespasser or licensee. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Pettit, 111 Ill. App. 172.

Where the party injured was a licensee on defendant's right of way at the time he was injured, evidence as to the place where he entered such right of way and how far he traveled thereon before he was injured is admissible as tending to prove that he was rightfully on the track. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. O'Donnell, (Tex. Civ. App. 1905) 90 S. W. 886 [reversed on other grounds in 99 Tex. 636, 92 S. W. 409].

A declaration or statement made by defendant's station agent in response to an inquiry by a person working in loading a car that there was no train coming and that he and his fellow workmen could go ahead and load the car is relevant as evidence of a license or permission to go upon the tracks to do the work. Where defendant had knowingly permitted the public to use its road-bed at the place of the accident for a number of years as a pathway, evidence of defendant's general manager that defendant had never consented to such use by persons other than those having business with the company is inadmissible. tomary use of tracks at other places remote from the place of the accident is inadmissible.[26]

(F) Defects in Road-Bed or Track. Evidence tending to show the unsafe condition of the road-bed or track at the place where the accident occurred is admissible in an action for injuries caused by a train as tending to prove negligence on the part of those in charge of the train,[27] unless it appears that the particular defect referred to had no causal connection with the accident.[28] For the purpose of showing such defects, any evidence, subject to the general rules of evidence, is admissible which tends to show whether or not the road-bed or track was properly constructed and maintained.[29]

(G) Signals and Lookouts. As tending to show negligence, evidence is admissible in an action for injury caused by a train or cars, which tends to show that the train or cars in question did not give proper signals or warnings or display proper

In an action for injuries sustained by being struck by a train while the injured party's foot is fastened in the track, evidence is admissible to show how the track was constructed at the place of the accident and how other tracks are constructed, so that the jury may determine whether the track at the place of the accident was constructed properly (McKinney v. Long Island R. Co., 2 Silv. Sup. (N. Y.) 543, 6 N. Y. Suppl. 168); and for this purpose evidence that a certain device fastened between the rails at the frogs or switches had been in use on other railroads for four or five years, and that it prevented the danger of catching the foot in the switch, and that without some similar contrivance switches were not safe, is admissible (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Walker, 70 Tex. 126, 7 S. W. 831, 8 Am. St. Rep. 582).

lights at the time and place of the accident.[30] Thus a witness may testify that, although he could have seen or heard such signal or warning if it had been given or displayed, he did not hear it,[31] or see such lights displayed.[32] Where there is a duty on the part of the railroad company to keep a lookout,[33] evidence which tends to show a failure to do so is admissible.[34] Where, however, there is no such duty on the part of the railroad company, evidence that its employees in charge of a train could have seen the injured party in time to prevent the accident and failed to do so is inadmissible.[35]

Co., 29 Utah 392, 82 Pac. 29 (holding that testimony of the failure to give signals or warnings when an engine was started and put in motion toward plaintiff's team is competent on the issue of an alleged act of negligence consisting of such failure to give signals).

Proof that lights were customarily placed on approaching engines at the place of the accident is admissible in an action for injuries caused by the party injured being struck in the night-time by a tender of a locomotive alleged to have approached without lights or a sign of warning, where no substituted warning was employed. Caffi v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 49 Misc. (N. Y.) 620, 96 N. Y. Suppl. 835.

Evidence held inadmissible.— In an action for injuries to one while walking by the side of defendant's track at a point between the whistling post and a crossing, where it is claimed that the statutory signals were not given, evidence that the view of the crossing was obstructed and that one approaching the same from the north could not see an approaching train until within a few yards of it, and that the train by which plaintiff was struck approached the crossing at a high and dangerous rate of speed without giving proper signals is inadmissible. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 99 Tex. 636, 92 S. W. 409 [reversing (Civ. App. 1905) 90 S. W. 886].

Custom of other company.— Where a railroad company at a certain junction is accustomed to use a side-track of another company, evidence that such other company was in the habit of ringing its bell when running its trains over the side-track is inadmissible in an action against the former company to recover damages for injury received while its cars were moving on such side-track. Detroit, etc., R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 99.

A rule of the company in respect to lights on cars is not admissible in an action by a person who does not know or who cannot be presumed to have knowledge of such rules. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Downey, 96 Ill. App. 398, holding this rule to apply where the party injured was neither directly nor indirectly in the service of the railroad company.

A city ordinance providing for danger signals within the city limits is admissible as tending to show negligence in failing to give such signals. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Mathias, 50 Ind. 65; Kelly v. Union R., etc., Co., 95 Mo. 279, 8 S. W. 420. A city ordinance requiring a train backing in the night-time to have a conspicuous light on the rear car or engine is competent evidence where the party was injured by defendant's car kicked down the track at night without a light. Co., 80 Iowa 757, 45 N. W. 1065, 20 Am. St. Rep. 445 (holding that evidence that persons not specially charged with watching the track saw decedent before he was struck tends to show that the employees in charge of the locomotive did not "look out"); Bias v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 349, 33 S. E. 240 (holding that evidence as to the distance at which it was possible to see a child of the size of decedent along or near the railroad track in the direction in which the train was coming is admissible).

Testimony of an experienced railroad man that if a fireman was looking out of the engine window on the inside of a curve he would have a better view of the track ahead than would the engineer on the opposite side is competent, although the witness was not acquainted with the track at that point, there being evidence that there were no obstructions to the view at that point. causing the injury was running, and the control which it was under, at the time and place of the accident.[36] For such purpose evidence is admissible as to how far the train ran after causing the injury,[37] or as to the brakes with which it was equipped.[38] Evidence of defendant's running time over the whole road is admissible to show the rate of speed at any given point.[39] The testimony of witnesses living near the railroad and habitually observing the passing of trains is competent evidence upon the velocity of a particular train;[40] and testimony is admissible as to the distance in which a train could be stopped when running at the same speed as the train which caused the injury,[41] except that evidence cannot be introduced as to the distance within which an engine or train of a different type could be stopped.[42]

(I) Precautions as to Persons Seen On or Near Tracks. On the question of negligence of an engineer or other employee in charge of a train or cars in failing to use proper precautions to avoid injuring a person seen on or near tracks, evidence is admissible which tends to show whether such employees saw the party injured in time to avoid the accident,[43] and whether, after seeing him, they employed

36. Pennsylvania Co. v. Conlan, 101 Ill. 93; Mann v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 123 Mo. App. 486, 100 S. W. 566, evidence that the train was past due and running thirty-five miles an hour held admissible.

Ordinances.—An ordinance regulating the speed of trains in the city may be shown in evidence, together with the violation, in deciding the question of negligence. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Mathias, 50 Ind. 165; Kelly v. Union R., etc., Co., 95 Mo. 279, 8 S. W. 420. Evidence of a failure to observe the requirements of an ordinance regulating the speed of trains across streets is admissible upon the question as to whether the railroad company was negligent in running its trains at a point not on the street. Jones v. Charleston etc., R. Co., 65 S. C. 410, 43 S. E. 884. But it has been held that such ordinances are inadmissible without first showing that they were accepted by the company. Anderson v. Union Terminal R. Co., 161 Mo. 411, 61 S. W. 874.

Evidence as to the distance within which a train might have been stopped after causing the injury is admissible, not only with respect to the duties owing from the engineer after he had knowledge of the injured party's peril, but also with respect to the duties owing to him from the train operatives continuing or intervening after the commission of the injured person's negligence, which had they been performed with reasonable care would have disclosed to the engineer the perilous situation in time to have avoided the fatality. W. 442, holding that in an action for the death of a person killed by a train, evidence that the train was not equipped with a high-power emergency brake is properly admitted as bearing upon the question as to how far the train would run after the application of the brake it having a bearing upon the inquiry as to when the engineer applied the brake.

In favor of a mere trespasser, evidence tending to show that the accident might have been prevented had the company used certain improved air-brakes in general use on railways is not admissible. McKenna v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 8 Daly (N. Y.) 304.

39. Nutter v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 60 N. H. 483.

Usual rate.—Where the evidence is conflicting as to the rate of speed at which a train was running, and one witness testified that it was running at the usual rate, evidence as to such usual rate is admissible. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Goulding, 52 Fla. 327, 42 So. 854.

40. Nutter v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 60 N. H. 483.

The admissibility of evidence as to the rate of speed of defendant's train at other places and times than the time and place in question as tending to show the rate of speed there is a question of fact depending upon the remoteness of time and place and is to be determined by the court at the trial. Nutter v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 60 N. H. 483.

41. Vanarsdall v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 65 S. W. 858, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1666.

The physical and topographical facts surrounding an injury and the place of the injury are admissible for the purpose of showing whether the injured party could have been seen in time to avoid the injury. Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Burgess, 114 Ala. 587, 22 So. 169; Mann v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 123 Mo. App. 486, 100 S. W. 566; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Syfan, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 43 S. W. 551; Bias v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 349, 33 S. E. 240. Thus where the engineer testifies as to when he became aware of the injured party's presence, evidence is admissible that his view of the track was unobstructed for a considerable distance, in connection with his testimony that he was keeping a lookout, and the fact that alarm signals were given before the all proper precautions to avoid causing him injury.[44] Thus in such case the fireman or other employee may testify as to whether the party injured had time to get off the track after the engineer had given the alarm signals, before he was struck.[45] So evidence is admissible which tends to show whether the engineer gave a signal of alarm after the injured party was seen,[46] or as to the distance in which a train, such as the one causing the injury, could be stopped.[47]

(J) Contributory Negligence. On the issue of contributory negligence, evidence of any material or relevant facts which tends to establish or disprove contributory negligence on the part of the person injured is admissible,[48] such as evidence of his knowledge of the customary mode of operating trains and cars at the place of the accident,[49] or of his right to go upon or near the railroad time when according to his testimony he saw the injured party, as tending to show that he did see such party before the time testified to by him. Gregory v. Wabash R. Co., 126 Iowa 230, 101 N. W. 761.

That the engineer had had his eyes operated on shortly after the accident is admissible on cross-examination, where he testified that he saw an object on the track which he thought was a coat and did not identify it as a man, although his defective vision was not alleged in the petition. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Holzheuser, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 45 S. W. 188.

That other persons had occasionally trespassed on the track at the place of the accident is inadmissible in determining whether an injured trespasser was seen by the engineer in charge of the train. Thomas v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 93 Iowa 248, 61 N. W. 967.

44. Choate v. Southern R. Co., 119 Ala. 611, 24 So. 373.

Expert testimony.— The testimony of an engineer or conductor as experts that they did all that could be done to avert the injury is admissible. Choate v. Southern R. Co., 119 Ala. 611, 24 So. 373. So the fireman on the train causing the injury may state that the engineer did all within his power to stop the train after plaintiff was seen on the track, except to sand the track, and if that had been done the injury could not have been prevented. Hasie v. Alabama, etc., R. Co., 78 Miss. 413, 28 So. 941, 84 Am. St. Rep. 632. Likewise an expert engineer may testify as to the effect of shutting off steam when the injured party was first discovered, such evidence being followed by an instruction that if defendant's engineer, as soon as he had reason to believe that the injured party was in a place of danger, took all means in his power to prevent the accident, that would be a discharge of his duty. Remer v. Long Island R. Co., 48 Hun (N. Y.) 352, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 124 [affirmed in 113 N. Y. 669, 21 N. E. 1116].

Evidence as to whether there were means at hand other than those resorted to, which could have been used in order to expedite the stopping of the engine or train, is admissible. Carver v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 104 Ill. App. 644.

Evidence is admissible where deceased was a railroad watchman stationed at the intersection of two roads, to show the rules of the company in charge of the switch, and which employed deceased, as to the duty of turning the switch at such intersection, and what was the customary mode of running trains at that point (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. O'Sullivan, 143 Ill. 48, 32 N. E. 398 [affirming 40 Ill. App. 369)]; or where it is claimed that plaintiff should have used a narrow sidewalk instead of walking on the street on which the track was laid, plaintiff may show that the walk was dangerous because of its proximity to the track (Goodrich v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 103 Iowa 412, 72 N. W. 653).

An ordinance which defendant was violating at the time of the injury is admissible as bearing upon the question of contributory negligence. Meek v. Pennsylvania Co., 38 Ohio St. 632.

49. Minot v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 74 N. H. 230, 66 Atl. 825 (holding that where the injured party's knowledge of the movement of trains at the place at which he was injured is material, evidence that the train's movements for four or five years prior to the accident had been the same as at that time is admissible); International, etc., R. Co. v. Brooks, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 54 S. W. 1056.

That it was the usual custom to signal for the station and for two road crossings between it and the place where plaintiff was struck is admissible as evidence on the issue as to whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in relying on the known custom of defendant without looking back for the approach of a train. International, etc., R. Co. v. Woodward, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 63 S. W. 1051.

track.[50] It is inadmissible, however, to introduce evidence of facts which are immaterial or irrelevant.[51] Evidence as to the habits of the injured party in regard to trains, whether careful or careless, is generally inadmissible.[52]

(III) WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE[53] — (A) In General. To warrant a recovery for injuries received by a person on or near railroad tracks, the evidence on plaintiff's behalf must be of such weight and sufficiency as will reasonably justify the jury in finding the existence of all facts necessary to constitute his cause of action.[54] The evidence should be sufficient to establish by what right, if any, the party injured was upon or near the tracks at the time and place of the accident and the consequent duty of defendant to protect him from injury;[55] the failure to discharge such duty, or in other words negligence on the part

That the injured party had never seen a car moved by "staking" is admissible in an action for injuries by being run over by a car moved by staking, as bearing upon his exercise of care. Helbig v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 85 Mich. 359, 48 N. W. 589.

Evidence of a custom in operating double-track roads to run trains on the right-hand track is inadmissible in an action for injuries to a person on the track, where defendant has for two years before the accident run its train on the left-hand track. complained of.[59] The absence of proof of any of these facts is fatal to a recovery.[60] In the absence of eye-witnesses, defendant's negligence need not be shown by direct and positive proof, but may be inferred from the proof of such facts and circumstances as will sustain a finding of negligence;[61] but these circumstances must themselves be shown by direct testimony, and cannot be inferred from other circumstances.[62] Testimony of witnesses who were not paying attention to the engine which caused the injury at the time, and were not necessarily in a position to have heard any bell ring or whistle sound before the accident, that they heard neither bell nor whistle is insufficient to constitute a substantial conflict as against testimony that the bell was constantly rung, and will not warrant a finding that defendant was negligent in failing to ring the bell or sound the whistle.[63]

(B) Existence of Defect or Happening of Injury. In the absence of statute otherwise mere proof of the existence of a defect or of the happening of an accident or injury to a person upon railroad tracks or premises is not sufficient to establish actionable negligence on the part of the railroad company,[64] unless the Circumstances may impeach direct evidence. — Thus where an engineer and fireman directly deny any negligence in keeping a lookout, if the circumstances attending the accident indicate such negligence it is error to direct a verdict for defendant and the question should be submitted to the jury for them to determine the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence. Louisiana.—Lloyd v. East Louisiana R. Co., 109 La. 446, 33 So. 556; Bryant v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., (1897) 22 So. 799, holding that the fact that a dead body was found on the track between a tender and a switch engine with the indication that two of the wheels accident is of such a character that ordinarily it could not have happened but for negligence, in which case proof of an accident and injury is sufficient in the absence of explanatory proof on the part of defendant to raise a prima facie case of negligence on the part of defendant.[65] Under some statutes, however, mere proof of an injury by the operation of a railroad is sufficient to raise a presumption of negligence;[66] but this statutory presumption ceases to be controlling upon the introduction of testimony showing all the facts of the case,[67] and it is immaterial that one or more of the witnesses by whom the facts are shown are impeached if others who testify to all of the facts remain unimpeached.[68]

(c) Precautions as to Persons Seen On or Near Tracks. To warrant a recovery on the ground that defendant's engineer or other employee in charge of the engine or cars causing the injury failed to use proper precautions after discovering the injured party's peril, the evidence must be such as to reasonably justify the jury in finding that such engineer or employee saw or knew of the injured party's danger in time to avoid the accident,[69] and that thereafter such employee failed had passed over the man does not authorize an inference of negligence on the part of the railroad employees.

Where the particular thing causing the injury is shown to be under the management of defendant or its servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of events does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation, that the accident arose from want of care and the question should be submitted to the jury. (D) Contributory Negligence. The fact of contributory negligence,[71] or due care, or in other words, freedom from contributory negligence on the part of the person injured on or near railroad tracks, may be shown either by direct evidence plaintiff was at any time on or so close to the track that the engineer in the exercise of ordinary care could have seen him in peril in time to have checked the train and avoided the injury. Koegel v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 181 Mo. 379, 80 S. W. 905.

That defendant's engineer saw the party injured or killed and made no effort to avoid striking him may be inferred in the absence of evidence to the contrary when the accident was in daylight, the track straight, and the view unobstructed and nothing was done to give warning or to stop the train until after the accident. White v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 20 N. Y. Suppl. 6.

Testimony that someone in the engine cah shouted to plaintiff to get out of the way, when the engine was on top of him, does not tend to prove that he was seen from the engine in time for its crew in the exercise of reasonable care to have prevented the injury, but rather tends to prove that he was seen too late for that purpose. Evidence that a train was running on an up grade at from twelve to fifteen miles an hour when plaintiff's danger was discovered is insufficient to show that the train could have been stopped without any evidence as to the state of the track, the weight of the train, the appliances, and other facts tending to show such possibility. Thornton v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 70 S. W. 53, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 854.

Where a trespasser was walking on the tracks within the limits of a city in full view of the engineer of an approaching train for several hundred feet, it is not an unreasonable inference for the jury to find that the engineer actually saw him and failed to take proper measures to prevent injuring him. or by showing facts and circumstances from which it may be fairly inferred.[72] If from an examination of all the circumstances under which the accident took place, and which are put in evidence, nothing is found in the conduct of plaintiff to which negligence can fairly be imputed, the mere absence of fault may justify the jury in finding due care on his part;[73] but if there is only a partial disclosure of the facts and no evidence is offered showing the conduct of the party injured, with regard to the matters specially requiring care on his part, the data for such an inference is not sufficient,[74] as it can only be warranted when circumstances are shown which fairly indicate care, or exclude the idea of negligence on his part.[75]

(E) Wilful, Wanton, Reckless, or Unauthorized Acts. The weight and sufficiency of evidence in regard to wilful, wanton, reckless, or unauthorized acts of railroad employees, whereby injury is caused to persons on or near the tracks, is governed by the rules of evidence which apply in civil cases generally.[76]

d. Damages. In an action for personal injuries caused by the negligence of a railroad company, ordinarily actual or compensatory damages only can be recovered;[77] and no punitive or exemplary damages can be recovered,[78] except where the injury was inflicted by reason of wanton, wilful, or reckless acts on the part of the company's servants,[79] and such acts were either authorized or ratified by the company.[80] Under statutes providing that contributory negligence will operate only in mitigation of damages, it has been held that,

v. Flagg, 156 Fed. 359, 84 C. C. A. 263), or in evicting (Johnson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 116 Iowa 639, 88 N. W. 811), or causing a trespasser to jump from a rapidly moving train (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Brown, (Miss. 1905) 39 So. 531). To justify a finding that defendant was grossly negligent in sending a car down the track without light or flagman on a dark evening and with a swinging door open whereby the injury was caused. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. O'Neil, 172 Ill. 527, 50 N. E. 216 [affirming 64 Ill. App. 623]. Evidence held insufficient: To show a wilful, wanton, or reckless injury generally (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Eicher, 202 Ill. 556, 67 N. E. 376 [reversing 100 Ill. App. 599]; Rhodes v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 8 Misc. (N. Y.) 366, 28 N. Y. Suppl. 691 [affirmed in 149 N. Y. 586, 44 N. E. 1128]; Dotta v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 36 Wash. 506, 79 Pac. 32); by sending a moving car against a standing car on which the party injured was rightfully at the time (Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 146 Ala. 312, 40 So. 763; Williams v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 96 Mo. 275, 9 S. W. 573); or to a trespasser on the track (Bartlett v. Wabash R. Co., 220 Ill. 163, 77 N. E. 96). To authorize a finding that the conductor kicked the injured boy off the train or so threatened him that he jumped off (Georgia R., etc., Co. v. Frazier, 119 Ga. 331, 46 S. E. 451); or that he acted maliciously in so doing (Hoffman v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 44 N. Y. Super. Ct. 1); or that a brakeman acted within the general scope of his authority in ejecting the injured party (Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Moody, (Tex. Civ. App. 1893) 23 S. W. 41).

In an action for injuries caused to one while driving on defendant's track, by a passing train, evidence that the persons in charge of the train discovered the wagon box and seat which had fallen from the injured party's wagon near the track shortly before reaching such party and his team does not show gross negligence on their part in continuing at the usual rate of speed, so as to render the company liable. See Murphy v. New York, etc., R. Co., 29 Conn. 496.

Exemplary damages have been awarded where defendant railroad's servant wantonly and violently ejected a trespasser from the train while the train was rapidly moving, whereby such trespasser was injured (Hayes v. Southern R. Co., 141 N. C. 195, 53 S. E. 847); but such damages must not be excessive (Alabama, etc., R. Co. v. Livingston, 84 Miss. 1, 36 So. 256, holding that a judgment for two thousand dollars in favor of plaintiff who was expelled from a freight train between stations on a stormy night after he had offered to pay his fare is excessive).

Retaining in employment.— The fact that a conductor who wilfully and wantonly ejected a trespasser from a moving train at a dangerous place was not discharged prior to the trial is not sufficient to constitute a ratification. Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Gordon, 143 Fed. 95, 74 C. C. A. 289.

although in case of such negligence the jury may mitigate the damages to nominal damages only, it need not do so, but may fix them in accordance with the estimate of the relative negligence of the parties, where both are negligent.[81]

e. Questions For Court and For Jury — (I) Injuries to Persons On or Near Tracks in General — (A) General Rule. Questions of law are ordinarily to be determined by the court, and it is error to submit them to the jury.[82] Issues of fact or of mixed law and fact on the other hand, are ordinarily to be determined by the jury under proper instructions from the court.[83]

(B) As Determined by the Evidence. If there is any evidence from which the jury might justifiably find the existence or non-existence of the fact in issue,[84] and the evidence is conflicting,[85] or is such that reasonable men might arrive at different conclusions therefrom,[86] the issue should be submitted to the jury for determination; and in such a case it is error for the court to take the question from them by nonsuit, dismissal, direction of a verdict, or instruction.[87] If, however, there is no evidence on an issue of fact, or if the evidence of its existence or its non-existence, as the case may be, is so slight that a finding of its existence or non-existence would not be sustained, or if the evidence is conclusive of its existence or non-existence, then the question becomes one of law for the court and should not be submitted to the jury; [88] but the court may dispose of the case

Applicability of rule of railroad company left to jury.— Whether, in an action for personal injuries by one not a servant, a rule of a railroad company relating to running freight trains within ten minutes of the time of passenger trains applies to through freights or to switching cars in yards, and the applicability of a rule requiring a signal flag when cars are being inspected or repaired are properly left to the jury, as the construction of all writings is not for the court. The weight of testimony, although largely hearsay, that the men who were in control of and operating an engine at the time of an accident were servants and employees of defendant, which was admitted without objection and without any motion being made to strike it out, is for the jury. Where the course of the legal evidence is such as tends to support the averments of plaintiff's petition, it is the duty of the court to submit the issues of fact to the jury even though he should feel constrained to set aside any verdict for plaintiff, should such be returned and a motion for a new trial thereupon made. (c) Care Required of Railroad Company in General.[92] The question of negligence in injuries inflicted by railroad companies upon individuals depends upon such a variety of circumstances that it can rarely be absolutely defined as a matter of law.[93] Thus in accordance with the above rules,[94] although a mere scintilla of evidence of defendant's negligence is not sufficient,[95] yet where there is sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and it is conflicting or such that reasonable minds might arrive at different conclusions therefrom, it is a question for the jury whether or not the commission or omission of particular acts on the part of the railroad company was negligence as to the party injured,[96] and whether such negligence

Where the evidence authorizes a finding that the injury was caused by the running of defendant's train, this evidence, together with the legal presumption of negligence against defendant, imposed by Ga. Code, § 3033, is sufficient to take the case to the jury where there is no evidence to rebut such presumption or to show that defendant could have avoided the injury, and it is erroneous to grant a nonsuit. giving a peremptory instruction directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of defendant company.[5]

(D) Right to Go On or Near Tracks. On the issue of defendant's duty and consequent negligence it is ordinarily a question for the jury under all the evidence whether or not the injured party was rightfully on defendant's tracks or right of way at the time and place of the accident,[6] as whether or not the use of tracks or right of way at that place had been such as to import a license or invitation from the company.[7] Where, however, the evidence is undisputed the court may determine whether or not the injured party was at the place of the accident, upon the company's express or implied invitation.[8]

(E) Failure to Fence Railroad. It is ordinarily a question for the jury whether the place of the accident was one which the statute required to be fenced,[9] whether the fence maintained was a sufficient fence within the meaning of the statute,[10] or whether the absence of the required fence was the cause of the injury complained of.[11]

(F) Defects in Road-Bed, Tracks, and Cars. It is also ordinarily a question for the jury, under all the circumstances, whether or not the railroad company was negligent in permitting defects in its road-bed, tracks, or cars,[12] as whether it was negligent in failing to put up a bunter or other obstruction at the end of a spur track,[13] in leaving a "frog" unblocked,[14] or in constructing and maintaining an unguarded ditch in close proximity to a highway,[15] or in the inspection of the car which caused the injury,[16] and whether its negligence in that respect was the proximate cause of the injury.[17]

(G) Articles Projecting, Falling, or Thrown From Trains. Whether, under all the circumstances, the railroad company was negligent in permitting the articles which caused the injury to project,[18] fall, or be thrown[19] from its train or car, and whether the employee kicking or throwing such articles was acting within the scope of his employment,[20] are ordinarily questions for the jury.

(H) Signals and Lookouts. So where there is sufficient evidence to go to the jury and it is conflicting or is such that reasonable minds might arrive at different conclusions therefrom, it is a question for the jury whether the place where the accident occurred was one at which the employees in charge of the engine or cars had reason to know or anticipate that persons might be on or near the tracks, and therefore at which they were required to keep a proper lookout and give proper warnings of the train's approach;[21] and whether or not such employees exercised the proper degree of care under the circumstances at the time and place of the accident in giving signals or warnings,[22] in displaying proper lights it is a question for the jury whether the absence of a fence, required under a city ordinance, was the cause of the injury).

United States.— Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Craft, 69 Fed. 124, 16 C. C. A. 175.

Illustrations.— It is a question for the jury where, during a strike of the employees of a railroad company, a militiaman was, at the company's request, placed on guard in its yard, and the cars in the yard were not moved for twenty-seven hours after he arrived at the yard, whether defendant, in moving its cars without warning to him, so that he was struck by them, used ordinary care (O'Harra v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 92 Hun (N. Y.) 56, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 567 [affirmed in 153 N. Y. 690, 48 N. E. 1106]); whether an engineer was negligent in running his train in the night across a bridge ordinarily used in part by foot passengers, so as to run alongside of a pedestrian without any warning, causing such pedestrian, in his fright, to collide with the train (Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Watkins, 88 Tex. 20, 29 S. W. 232); whether it was negligence to run without warning along an open way along a railway track upon which children are permitted to stroll (Ficker v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 9 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 804, 6 Ohio N. P. 36, 7 Ohio N. P. 600); or whether the failure of the engineer to ring the bell loud enough to give reasonable warning constituted negligence (Wabash R. Co. v. Fox, 20 Ohio Cir. Ct. 440, 11 Ohio Cir. Dec. 148).

While a railroad company is only required by statute to ring a bell or sound a whistle at a public highway, yet it is within the province of the jury to determine whether under the circumstances of the case it is not negligence not to give such a signal at another point. Winslow v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 11 N. Y. St. 831.

Whether in fact any signals were given at all or not is a question for the jury where the evidence is conflicting. McMarshall v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 80 Iowa 757, 45 N. W. 1065, 20 Am. St. Rep. 445; Burke v. Brooklyn Wharf, etc., Co., 86 N. Y. App. Div. 296, 83 N. Y. Suppl. 795.

Crossing signals.— Whether the failure to give the statutory signals required for crossings is negligence as to persons on or near the tracks a short distance beyond the crossing has been held a question for the jury. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Saunders, (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 103 S. W. 457 [reversed on other grounds in (1908) 106 S. W. 321]; Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Levy, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 107, 79 S. W. 879; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Short, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 58 S. W. 56.

Under a Tennessee statute, Shannon Code, § 1574, subd. 3, requiring the bell or whistle to be sounded on the approach of a railroad train to a "city or town," etc., which has been held to mean an "incorporated town," the fact of incorporation is a question for the jury, where the evidence is sufficient merely to raise a presumption of incorporation; and an instruction is erroneous which makes defendant liable if it fails to give the required signals, without requiring the jury to first find the fact of incorporation. Felton v. Newport, 92 Fed. 470, 34 C. C. A. 470.

23. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Cumberland, 12 App. Cas. (D. C.) 598 (holding that whether a light displayed on the advancing end of defendant's train of cars was such a light as was required by a municipal ordinance is a question for the jury); Pennsylvania Co. v. Conlan, 101 Ill. 93 (holding that what is a "brilliant and conspicuous light," within the meaning of an ordinance, requiring such a light to be placed on locomotives, is a question for the jury).

24. Missouri.— Morgan v. Wabash R. Co., 159 Mo. 262, 60 S. W. 195; Chamberlain v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 133 Mo. 587, 33 S. W. 437, 34 S. W. 842; Frick v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 75 Mo. 595, holding that a demurrer to evidence would not be sustained, but that the jury might find for plaintiff if they believed that the trainmen could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have seen plaintiff in time to have avoided injuring her.

New York.— Doll v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 52 N. Y. App. Div. 575, 65 N. Y. Suppl. 454, nonsuit held erroneously granted.

United States.— Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Craft, 69 Fed. 124, 16 C. C. A. 175; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. McArthur, 53 Fed. 464, 3 C. C. A. 594, verdict for defendant held properly refused.

See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 1373.

That a person was killed by a railway train, although the track was straight and clear, does not show a case of negligence sufficient to be submitted to a jury, where there is nothing to show how long he was on the track before being struck. Ward v. Southern Pac. Co., 25 Oreg. 433, 36 Pac. 166, 23 L. R. A. 715.

Under a Tennessee statute, Shannon Code, § 1574, subd. 4, requiring railroad companies to keep a lookout on all locomotives, and that "when any person . . . appears upon the road," etc., it is a question for the jury, where the evidence is such that reasonable minds might arrive at different conclusions, whether the party injured or killed had "appeared upon the road," and whether the railroad company discharged its duty of maintaining a proper lookout, and took the other prescribed whether or not the train or cars causing the injury were running at an excessive or unlawful rate of speed at the time and place of the accident,[25] or whether, under the circumstances, the rate of speed at which it was running was negligent,[26] and whether such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury,[27] or whether the train or car was under proper control.[28] The question, however, as to whether a statute regulating speed applies to a particular place is for the court.[29]

(J) Precautions as to Persons Seen On or Near Tracks. Where the evidence is conflicting or is such that reasonable minds might draw different conclusions therefrom, it is a question for the jury whether the railroad company's servants in charge of the train or cars which caused the injury were notified or discovered,[30]

S. 352 (holding that the question as to whether the speed of a train running through a populous community, where the track is commonly known to be used as a footway, is so great as to amount to negligence in any particular case, as against a trespasser, is for the jury); Rader v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 104 S. W. 774, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1105.

Louisiana.— Sundmaker v. Yazoo, etc., R. Co., 106 La. 111, 30 So. 285, holding that it is a question of fact, to be determined from the evidence, whether a railway train, moving within municipal limits, was being run at a speed unsafe and dangerous to the general public, so much so as to amount in law to an omission to use reasonable care to avoid accidents.

Missouri.— Haley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 197 Mo. 15, 93 S. W. 1120, 114 Am. St. Rep. 743; Frick v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 75 Mo. 595.

Texas.— Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Wagley, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 308, 40 S. W. 538.

See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 1374.

In the absence of a statute or ordinance on the subject the question whether or not a given rate of speed of a train running through a populous city is negligent is ordinarily one of fact depending upon the conditions surrounding the act. 29. Savannah, etc., R. Co. v. Daniels, 90 Ga. 608, 17 S. E. 647, 20 L. R. A. 416, holding that the question whether Code, § 1689*p*, requiring railroad trains to "slow down to a speed of not more than four miles an hour before running on or crossing any drawbridge over a stream which is regularly navigated by vessels," so as to affect the liability of the railroad company for running over a boy on a trestle leading up to a drawbridge, applies to such trestles and approaches, is a question for the court, and not for the jury.

such questions should not be submitted to the jury;[35] but in such cases the court should dispose of such questions without its intervention, as by nonsuit,[36] or by directing a verdict for defendant.[37]

(K) Contributory Negligence — (1) IN GENERAL. The question of contributory negligence or due care should be submitted to the jury, with proper instructions, where the evidence is sufficient to justify the jury in finding for or against such negligence, but is conflicting or is such that reasonable minds might arrive at different conclusions therefrom,[38] and in such a case it is error to withdraw it

Co. v. Johnson, (Tex. Civ. App. 1902) 67 S. W. 1040, holding that the question whether employees of defendant railroad company managing and operating the engine when it struck plaintiff saw him, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen him, in time to avoid the accident, as alleged in the complaint, is improperly left to the jury on testimony merely that an employee who was not an officer or manager, and had no control over or anything to do with the engine, saw plaintiff near the place of the accident a short time before it occurred.

W. 1166, holding that where there is an entire absence of evidence that defendant's engineer discovered plaintiff's peril in time to avoid his injury, and it is conclusively shown that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, which was the direct cause of his injury, a peremptory instruction for defendant is proper.

A verdict in favor of the railroad company, in an action against it by an administrator, is properly directed where the evidence shows that deceased was a trespasser walking on the track, that defendant's servants gave warning of the approach of the train as soon as they saw him, and did all they could to stop the train when they saw that instead of stepping from the track, as he might have done, he merely increased his speed and ran ahead of the train until it overtook him. Bartlett v. Wabash R. Co., 220 Ill. 163, 77 N. E. 96.

Where it is uncontradicted that the engineer and fireman did all within their power to stop the train on discovering the injured person's peril, and there is nothing from which the contrary could be inferred, an affirmative charge should be given for the company. from the jury,[39] as by granting or directing a nonsuit.[40] But on the other hand if the evidence is undisputed and is such that but one inference can be drawn from it by reasonable minds, the question whether or not the injured party was guilty of contributory negligence becomes one of law for the determination of the court,[41] and it is error to submit it to the jury; but the court should dispose of it, as by directing or granting a verdict for defendant.[42] In determining whether or not plaintiff, because of his own negligence, has a case upon which to go to the jury, defendant's testimony, where controverted, cannot be considered.[43] In such case plaintiff is entitled to the full force of all uncontroverted facts and to all his controverted evidence, and is to be allowed every reasonable and favorable inference of fact deducible from all the evidence.[44]

tion for the jury whether or not a person hard of hearing,[46] or otherwise physically disabled, exercised proper care and precaution at the time and place of the injury.[47] Whether or not the injured party was intoxicated and unable to care for himself at the time is ordinarily a question of fact.[48]

(3) Looking or Listening. Where the evidence is conflicting or is such that different inferences might be drawn therefrom, whether or not the party injured exercised due care in looking or listening for the approaching train or car at the time of the accident is a question for the jury;[49] and it is error for the court to withdraw the question from their consideration.[50] Where, however, the evidence is undisputed and is such that but one conclusion can be reasonably drawn therefrom, it becomes a question of law for the court,[51] and it may be justified in directing a verdict for defendant.[52]

(4) Acts in Emergencies. Whether or not the injured party exercised due care and prudence to extricate himself from a position of sudden and unexpected peril is usually a question for the jury under all the circumstances.[53]

Mississippi.— Christian v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., (1893) 12 So. 710, holding it to be a question for the jury whether a party injured on a trestle was negligent after seeing the train and realizing his danger.

Missouri.— Neier v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., (1888) 6 S. W. 695.

New York.— Remer v. Long Island R. Co., 36 Hun 253.

If it is not necessary for plaintiff to decide suddenly and unexpectedly between different ways of escaping from danger but he has time and opportunity to observe his surroundings, and the exercise of what may be termed "common sense" would have been sufficient to have assured him of safety or warned him of danger and he deliberately adopts or adopts without deliberation the course that is obviously dangerous, the question of his negligence is one of law for the court, and not one of fact for the jury. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Lilley, 4 Nebr. (Unoff.) 286, 93 N. W. 1012.

(II) Injuries to Persons at Stations. Where in an action for injury to a person at a station, the evidence is conflicting or is such that different inferences might be drawn therefrom, the question whether defendant was negligent,[54] as in permitting a hole to remain in the platform,[55] or whether or not the party injured was guilty of contributory negligenee,[56] should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court.[57] Where, however, the evidence is undisputed and is such that but one inference can reasonably be drawn therefrom, such questions should be determined and disposed of by the court.[58] The limit of time under all conditions under which a person may lawfully visit a station is a question of fact.[59]

(III) Injuries to Persons Working On or Near Cars or Tracks. In an action for injuries received by one who at the time was lawfully engaged in work upon or about a railroad company's tracks or cars, it is ordinarily a question for the jury under all the evidence, whether or not the company was negligent,[60]

An error of judgment, in stepping upon a railroad track, in an emergency, if the proof is not clear as to the elements of time and space on which such judgment was based, should not be held negligence as matter of law, but the question should be left to the jury. Co. v. Martin, 41 Mich. 607, 3 N. W. 173; Corcoran v. New York El. R. Co., 19 Hun (N. Y.) 368.

The questions, what grounds are reasonably near to the depot platform, and whether persons will naturally be likely to go thereon, requiring the railroad to keep the same in a safe condition, are generally for the jury. Banderob v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 133 Wis. 249, 113 N. W. 738.

55. Janes v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 107 Mo. 480, 18 S. W. 31.

56. Alabama.—Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Arnold, 84 Ala. 159, 4 So. 359, 5 Am. St. Rep. 354, holding that where there is evidence that plaintiff in leaving a ticket office was cautioned to "look out for the steps," and that he crossed the platform obliquely and fell to the right of them, the question of contributory negligence is for the jury.

Kansas.— Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Parkinson, 56 Kan. 652, 44 Pac. 615, refusal to direct a verdict for defendant held proper.

Massachusetts.— Wheelock v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 105 Mass. 203.

United States.— Jones v. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co., 128 U. S. 443, 9 S. Ct. 118, 32 L. ed. 478, directing verdict for defendant held error.

See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 917.

57. Archer v. New York, etc., R. Co., 19 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 10, holding that, in an action for injuries sustained by one who was standing on a depot platform and was struck by defendant's train, it is error to charge that the jury may determine for themselves what precaution defendant was bound to take, as what such precautions might be supposed to be should be defined by the court.

58. Martyn v. New York, etc., R. Co., 176 Mass. 401, 57 N. E. 671; Dell v. Phillips Glass Co., 169 Pa. St. 549, 32 Atl. 601 (contributory negligence); Chattanooga, etc., R. Co v. Downs, 106 Fed. 641, 45 C. C. A. 511 (contributory negligence).

59. Klugherz v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 90 Minn. 17, 95 N. W. 586, 101 Am. St. Rep. 384, holding that it is error to instruct that a railroad company owes a duty of ordinary care to a person on its station grounds for a lawful purpose near the time when a train is about to arrive or depart, for the purpose of seeing a person whom he supposes is going away on the train, since it is for the jury to determine whether the length of time a person is at the station before train time is reasonable.

Utah.— Hickey v. Rio Grande Western R. Co., 29 Utah 392, 82 Pac. 29, holding that in an action for injuries to a teamster engaged in loading his dray from a freight car, such injuries being caused by his horses taking fright at a sudden escape of steam as in starting or sending cars against the car on or about which the injured party was working,[61] or in not maintaining safe premises or appliances for loading or unloading cars,[62] or whether or not the injured party was guilty of contributory negligence at the time,[63] as whether or not he exercised due care and precaution for his safety while loading or unloading a car.[64]

(IV) REMOVAL OF TRESPASSER. In an action for injuries received by a trespasser in being removed from a train or car, it is ordinarily a question for the jury under all the evidence, whether such trespasser was in fact forcibly ejected from a locomotive, whether the engineer was in the exercise of ordinary care or whether he heedlessly or negligently permitted the steam to escape is a question for the jury under the evidence.

United States.— Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. O'Brien, 153 Fed. 511, 82 C. C. A. 461 (whether a speed of seventy or seventy-five miles per hour, on a down grade and curve, whereby the train is derailed, and an express messenger killed, is negligence); Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Connolly, 149 Fed. 398, 79 C. C. A. 218 (whether backing car into a switch without notice to the superintendent of a milling company, working near the track, is negligence).

Co., 65 Kan. 352, 69 Pac. 353 (holding that it is a question for the jury whether a brakeman who forcibly ejected a trespasser from a car did so in the discharge of the duty he owed to the company to remove such persons, or for the purpose of extorting money from such trespasser, or out of resentment for his failure to pay on a demand for money made by the brakeman); Lang v. New York, etc., R. Question for court.— Where the brakeman who ejected a trespasser and other brakemen testify that it was the brakeman's duty to put trespassers off, it is error to leave it to the jury to determine whether such ejection was a part of the duty of the brakeman. Farber v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 130 Mo. 272, 40 S. W. 932.

Where there is evidence that the company's brakeman habitually violated a rule expressly denying brakemen authority to eject trespassers from trains, the question of the brakeman's authority to eject the person injured is for the jury. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Buch, (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 102 S. W. 124 [reversed on other grounds in (1907) 105 S. W. 987].

67. Iowa.— Johnson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 123 Iowa 224, 98 N. Georgia.— Forrest v. Georgia R., etc., Co., 128 Ga. 77, 57 S. E. 98, holding that where plaintiff was a trespasser on defendant's engine and was ordered by the engineer to alight therefrom, and the latter suddenly started the train and threw plaintiff to the ground, the question whether the engineer's conduct was wanton is for the jury.

Illinois.— Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Leiner, 202 Ill. 624, 67 N. E. 398, 95 Am. St. Rep. 266 [affirming 103 Ill. App. 438]; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Murowski, 179 Ill. 77, 53 N. E. 572 [affirming 78 Ill. App. 661], holding that it cannot be said as a matter of law in an action for injuries to one struck by a train that the engineer's omission to give warning by ringing the bell or sounding the whistle as required by Hurd Rev. St. (1897) p. 1250, c. 114, § 70, is not evidence of wilful or wanton misconduct.

Indiana.— Evansville, etc., R. Co. v. Wolf, 59 Ind. 89, holding that what does or does not "necessarily involve or evince a willingness to inflict injury" cannot be stated as a proposition of law and is wholly a question for the jury.

negligence,[72] of a railroad company in causing the injury complained of is ordinarily a question for the jury, unless the evidence is undisputed and is insufficient to support an inference of wilful, wanton, or reckless misconduct, in which case the question should not be submitted to the jury,[73] but may be disposed of by the court without the intervention of the jury, as by directing a finding or verdict for defendant,[74] or by granting or directing a nonsuit.[75] Where plaintiff's own evidence shows contributory negligence and fails to establish prima facie wantonness, the question should not be submitted to the jury but a judgment of nonsuit should be entered.[76]

f. Instructions — (i) Form and Sufficiency in General. The general rules applicable to instructions in civil actions,[77] and particularly in actions for negligence,[78] apply in actions for injuries to persons on or near railroad tracks. In charging the jury in such an action, the court should correctly state the law of the case, applicable to defendant's negligence,[79] in definite and explicit terms,[80]

United States.— McGhee v. Campbell, 101 Fed. 936, 42 C. C. A. 94, holding that upon an issue as to wanton and reckless negligence in the running of a railroad train which ran down a hand-car in the night and killed plaintiff's intestate, it is not error to refuse to direct a verdict for defendant after the testimony of several witnesses that the train was being run at a speed of twenty-five miles an hour with no headlight burning on the engine.

Instructions authorizing a recovery for negligence which was not the proximate cause of the injury are erroneous. Cogdell v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 130 N. C. 313, 41 S. E. 541; Rio Grande, etc., R. Co. v. Martinez, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 460, 87 S. W. 853.

In Georgia, in an action for injuries caused by being struck by defendant's engine while on its tracks, it is not error to give in the charge Code, § 3033, providing that for injuries inflicted in the operation of their roads, railroad companies shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in such cases being against the company. Western, etc., R. Co. v. Abbott, 74 Ga. 851.

In an action for injury from a train while plaintiff was trespassing on a trestle, the only instruction that should be given is to tell the jury that plaintiff was a trespasser and that defendant owed him no lookout duty but was bound only to exercise reasonable diligence after his peril was actually discovered to avoid injuring him. Instructions held proper or erroneously refused as being applicable to the facts of the case in respect to defendant's negligence and consequent liability, under Ga. Civ. Code, § 2321 (Atlanta, etc., R. Co. v. Roberts, 116 Ga. 505, 42 S. E. 753); in backing a train upon a side-track while cars are being loaded thereon without reasonable notice or warning to persons engaged in such loading (Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Thomas, (Tex. Civ. App. 1909) 107 S. W. 868; Copley v. Union Pac. R. Co., 26 Utah 361, 73 Pac. 517); in removing a trespasser from a train (Lewis v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 132 N. C. 382, 43 S. Instructions held erroneous or properly refused: As not being applicable to the evidence in respect to defendant's negligence generally (Woodruff v. Georgia Pac. R. Co., 86 Ga. 318, 12 S. E. 749; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Deck, 102 Md. 669, 62 Atl. 958); in not discovering the injured party's peril in time to prevent the injury (St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Jordan, 65 Ark. 429, 47 S. W. 115; Southern R. Co. v. Hill, 125 Ga. 354, 54 S. Co., 188 Mo. 229, 86 S. W. 1082; Shetter v. Ft. Worth, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 58 S. W. 179, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 536, 71 S. W. 31; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 57, 69 S. W. 1010; International, etc., R. Co. v. Eason, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 35 S. W. 308; Tyler v. Sites, 88 Va. 470, 13 S. E. 978). As restricting the rights of the parties to immaterial facts. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Cozatt, 39 Ind. App. 682, 79 N. E. 534. Thus an instruction to find for plaintiff, if from the evidence the jury believe the accident was caused by the improper construction of a car, is properly refused where there is evidence showing that it was caused by the rate of speed and there is no evidence tending to show a faulty construction. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Lyons, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 53 S. W. 96. So where there is no evidence that defendant saw or knew of the injured party's danger, an instruction that, although there was contributory negligence, yet if the injury could have been prevented by reasonable care on the part of the defendant's employees after discovering the danger, defendant is liable, is erroneous. Williams v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 96 Mo. 275, 9 S. W. 573. So where there is evidence warranting a finding that plaintiff was a trespasser, a request assuming that plaintiff owed defendant the duty of exercising ordinary care is properly refused. Hern v. Southern Pac. Co., 29 Utah 127, 81 Pac. 902.

Where the admitted facts require proof of wilful or wanton injury to authorize a recovery, and the declaration charges mere negligence, it is error to give an instruction authorizing a recovery upon proof of the negligence charged in the declaration (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Eicher, 202 Ill. 556, 67 N. E. 376 [reversing 100 Ill. App. 599]); and such error is not cured by an instruction given at defendant's request requiring proof of wilful or wanton injury (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Eicher, supra).

Unavoidable accident.— The failure of defendant to plead unavoidable accident does not defeat his right to an instruction thereon where there is evidence tending to show that the injury was a result of such accident. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Washington, 94 Tex. 510, 63 S. W. 534 [affirming 25 Tex. Civ. App. 600, 63 S. W. 538].

The issue as to whether defendant, by the exercise of reasonable care, after plaintiff's negligence could have avoided the injuries should be submitted, after submitting the issues as to the negligence of plaintiff and defendant, where there is evidence on which to base it. Baker v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 118 N. C. 1015, 24 S. E. 415.

An instruction based upon a hypothetical case not supported by the evidence or omitting material portions thereof, and which tends to mislead the jury, should not be given. Seaboard, etc., R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 23 S. E. 773.

and should not be confusing or misleading,[85] argumentative,[86] or conflicting, inconsistent, or contradictory.[87] To be sufficient, the instruction should be complete in itself, but instructions are to be considered as a whole and the fact that one portion considered separately might be open to objection does not constitute error, if the charge is correct in its entirety:[88] An instruction which covers the case generally is ordinarily sufficient in the absence of a request for further instructions in detail.[89] Although it is error to refuse a proper request not sufficiently covered by other charges as given,[90] such request need not ordinarily be given in

In Georgia it is error to charge, in immediate connection with each other, Code, §§ 2322 and 3830, without explanation of their different meanings; the former providing that no person shall recover when the injury is caused by his own negligence, and the latter that if plaintiff could have by ordinary care avoided the consequences of defendant's negligence he cannot recover. A charge on contributory negligence does not embrace the defenses that the accident was the result of unavoidable accident or occurred in a manner different from that alleged in the petition. Galveston, etc., R.

its exact language, but it is sufficient if it is covered in substance by the instructions as given;[91] and it is not error to refuse a requested instruction on matters already sufficiently covered by the charge as given,[92] or on immaterial or unessential matters,[93] or on matters not in issue.[94] Mere errors of form or phraseology in instructions, such as are not calculated to mislead the jury or to prejudice the rights of other parties, are immaterial.[95]

(II) INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY. Issues of fact must be submitted to the jury,[96] by instructions which clearly and fully state and define them;[97] and an instruction is erroneous which invades the province of the jury in commenting on the evidence,[98] as where it singles out and gives undue prominence to certain parts of the testimony,[99] or withdraws or excludes an issue of fact from the jury by charging on the weight of the evidence,[1] as by assuming as a matter of law the existence or non-existence of facts in issue,[2] or by assuming or charging that certain facts in evidence do or do not constitute negligence on the part of defendant.[3] But an instruction which defines negligence and leaves the facts

(III) CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS AND ISSUES. The instructions must also conform and be confined to the issues made by the pleadings and evidence, and on which the case has been tried.[7] An instruction is erroneous which is not pertinent to the issues,[8] as where it charges upon a theory not in

6. Ostertag v. Pacific R. 7. McMarshall v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 80 Iowa 757, 45 N. W. 1065, 20 Am. St. Rep. 445 (holding that an allegation that defendant's employees "failed to see the intestate in time to give any alarm signal" authorizes a submission to the jury of the question as to whether such employees were on the lookout for persons on the track); Benton v. Chicago, etc., R. Instructions held proper see Thomas v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 114 Iowa 169, 86 N. W. 259; International, etc., R. Co. v. Quinones, (Tex. Civ. App. 1904) 81 S. W. 757. Thus where in an action against a railroad company for death by striking deceased on a bridge, the court submits the issue of discovered peril alone, withdraws other issues, and expressly restricts the right to recover to that issue, the contention that the jury were misled and the verdict was based on the withdrawn issues is without merit. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 269, 76 S. W. 794. So where plaintiff alleges and proves that at the time he was injured he was lawfully on defendant's track near a public crossing and that defendant failed to give statutory signals, which failure was the proximate cause of his injury, it is proper for the court to charge as to defendant's statutory duty to sound a whistle or ring the bell. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. O'Donnell, (Tex. Civ. App. 1905) 90 S. W. 886 [reversed on other grounds in 99 Tex. 636, 92 S. W. 409].

Where the general issue is pleaded in an action of trespass for running over plaintiff, it is proper to instruct that, as the train had unquestionably run against plaintiff, plaintiff was entitled to recover unless defendant had shown that the requirements of law and common prudence were complied with, and that the injury could not thereby have been prevented. Clark v. Canadian Pac. R. Co., 69 Fed. 543.

Where the action is for carelessness in running, conducting, and directing a train and not for the failure to properly equip the road, it is error to instruct the jury that they may consider the condition of the brakes. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Magee, 60 Ill. 529.

issue,[9] or ignores or omits to charge upon a material matter in issue,[10] or where it unduly emphasizes a particular fact in issue.[11] But an instruction is not erroneous because it does not conform to an alleged theory of one of the parties, when such theory under the evidence submitted is itself erroneous.[12]

(iv) CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE. The above rules also apply to instructions on the question of contributory negligence and its effect.[13] The court in its instructions to the jury on such question should correctly and explicitly define

International, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 51, 90 S. W. 918; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Mills, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 245, 65 S. W. 74; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Stone, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 106, 56 S. W. 933. Thus an instruction submitting the issue of negligence in failing to have lights or other signals of danger at the place of the injury is erroneous where the allegations only charge negligence in failing to have lights on the train. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Eitel, (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 72 S. W. 205. So where the engineer admits that he saw plaintiff on the track when several bundred yards away, it is error to charge that it is the duty of trainmen to keep a lookout. Newport News, etc., R. Co. v. Deuser, 97 Ky. 92, 29 S. W. 973, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 113. So a charge as to the duties of railroad companies in operating trains over public crossings is inapplicable when the place where plaintiff was injured was not a public crossing. Ashworth v. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co., 94 Ga. 715, 20 S. E. 424. So where the declaration is based on the hypothesis that plaintiff was a passenger and the defense fairly raised the question whether he was such, an instruction allowing a recovery, although plaintiff was not a passenger, is error. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Mehlsack, 44 Ill. App. 124. So it is error to submit to the jury the issue whether the employees in charge of the train might have discovered deceased in time to have avoided the accident and failed to use care to do so, or having discovered him failed to use care in avoiding the accident, where such specific acts of negligence were not pleaded in the petition. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Powell, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 41 S. W. 695. So where there is no evidence that the engineer saw plaintiff in time to avoid the injury, an instruction that if the engineer made no effort to stop the engine and gave no warning, defendant is liable is error. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. York, 74 Tex. 364, 12 S. W. 68.

Gross negligence.— Where plaintiff does not charge gross negligence on the part of defendant and the testimony merely shows want of ordinary care, it is error to submit the question of defendant's gross negligence to the jury. Bertelson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 5 Dak. 313, 40 N. W. 531.

Co. v. Kelton, 112 Ala. 533, 21 So. 819.

Wilful injury.—An instruction in an action against a railroad company for injuries sustained in being ejected by a brakeman from a moving train to find for plaintiff if the injury was wilfully inflicted as charged in the declaration is erroneous if it omits the requirement of proof that the brakeman was acting within the scope of his employment (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. King, 179 Ill. 91, 53 N. E. 552, 70 Am. St. Rep. 93 [affirming 77 Ill. contributory negligence and point out its application to the facts of the case,[14] and should also charge as to the standard of care required of the injured party.[15] The instructions should charge as to the injured party's right to rely upon the exercise of due care on the part of the railroad company,[16] as to his knowledge of the danger,[17] and as to any other important fact or element on the question of such negligence.[18] Such instructions should conform to the evidence,[19] and to the

Knowledge of rules of company.— It is not permissible in instructing as to the rules of the railroad company for the government of hand-cars, to say more than that if there was proof of such rules, and it was shown that plaintiff knew, or by ordinary diligence might have known thereof, that fact might be considered in determining whether he had been guilty of negligence contributing to his injury. Thus in an action for the death of a person who had gone on a track in front of an approaching train to save the life of a child, a charge that no recovery can be had if the child was of such mental and physical vigor as to be able to avoid the danger without assistance is abstract, where the child was of tender years and there is no evidence that it was of sufficient mental and physical development to avoid the danger to which it was exposed. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Orr, 121 Ala. 489, 26 So. 35. So in an action for the death of one crossing a track near a station, an instruction that if the movements of a train at that point at that time of day were variable and uncertain, decedent was not justified in stepping upon the track without looking to see whether the train was in motion, is proppleadings and issues,[20] and should not be argumentative,[21] or calculated to mislead the jury,[22] or invade the province of the jury by assuming certain facts as established,[23] or by charging that certain facts in evidence do or do not constitute contributory negligence.[24] The instructions are to be construed as a whole, and although one portion considered separately might be open to objection, it may be aided by other and more explicit instructions, and does not constitute error if the charge is correct in its entirety;[25] and it is not error to omit in one part of the instructions to charge upon a matter which is fully covered in another part.[26] A requested instruction covered by other instructions given may be properly refused;[27] but it is error to refuse to charge upon a theory of the case not sufficiently covered by other charges given.[28] An instruction which covers the case generally is ordinarily sufficient in the absence of a request for special instructions.[29]

g. Verdict and Findings. The rules applicable in civil actions generally [30] govern general [31] and special [32] verdicts or findings, and findings by the court,[33] in actions for injuries to persons on or near railroad tracks. Every reasonable presumption will be made in aid of a general verdict,[34] and if the special findings can be reconciled therewith on any reasonable hypothesis,[35] or under any supposable state of facts provable under the issues,[36] the general verdict will control and judgment must be entered accordingly; but if the special findings are irreconcilable with the general verdict, they will control such verdict and judgment must be entered upon them notwithstanding the general verdict.[37] Special 31 N. Y. App. Div. 634, 54 N. Y. Suppl. 1104], holding that where there is no conflict in the evidence as to the purpose for which plaintiff's decedent was in defendant's railroad station when he was killed by the collapse of the building, and the court submits the question of his injury to the jury, and defendant makes no request to have any special question submitted, there is no error in a failure to submit the question as to defendant's purpose in being in the building.

31. Georgia Southern, etc., R. Co. v. George, 92 Ga. 760, 19 S. E. 813 (holding that in an action for the death of a person on the track, where the evidence shows that decedent was not on the track when the train approached him but must have been killed by attempting to board a car as the train was passing, a verdict for plaintiff is without support); Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Daniel, 91 S. W. 691, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 1146, 3 L. R. A. N. S. 1190 (holding a verdict in favor of plaintiff to be ground for a new trial as palpably against the weight of the evidence); Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 93 Va. 650, 25 S. E. 947 (verdict held contrary to law and evidence).

Although a boy testified on cross-examination that he fell and was injured while trying to get on to a car, the jury is not precluded from basing a verdict on his direct examination, corroborated by other evidence, that a brakeman forced him to leave a car while the train was in motion and caused him to fall and sustain the injuries complained of. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Buch, (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 102 S. W. 124 [reversed on other grounds in (1907) 105 S. W. 987].

App. 95, 69 N. E. 270 (holding that in an action for the death of a fireman killed while beneath his engine in the discharge of his duties, by certain cars being projected against it by employees of another company, a finding that there is no evidence that decedent took any precaution to warn or notify the employees of his position is not equivalent to a finding that he did not take any such precaution the burden of establishing contributory negligence being upon the master of such employees); Smetanka v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 123 N. Y. App. Div. 323, 107 N. Y. Suppl. 973 (finding that decedent was not guilty of contributory negligence held against the weight of evidence).

Where several theories arise out of the evidence, any of them may be adopted by the jury, and they are not bound to find that the whole testimony is true. Clark v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 109 N. C. 430, 14 S. E. 43, 14 L. R. A. 749.

A question of a special verdict whether plaintiff sustained his injuries on depot grounds sufficiently submits the question whether a lawn, adjacent to the depot platform, was a part of the depot grounds, within the rule requiring a railroad company to keep in a safe condition its depot platform and approaches thereto and other portions of its depot grounds reasonably near. Banderob v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 133 Wis. 249, 113 N. W. 738.

33. See Sullivan v. New York, etc., R. Co., 73 Conn. 203, 47 Atl. 131, holding that under a finding by the court that a trainman's lantern, without a reflector, hung on the back of the tender of a backing engine, is a proper light if the locomotive is properly managed and a proper lookout kept, the inference is that when no lookout is placed on the tender such light is not a sufficient one, and the finding is not an unqualified one that the light is a proper light.

A motion for a judgment on special findings notwithstanding the general verdict must be overruled where such findings are not in irreconcilable conflict with the general verdict. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Berry, 152 Ind. 607, 53 N. E. 415, 46 L. R. A. 33; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Stephenson, 33 Ind. App. 95, 69 N. E. 270.

36. Shoner v. Pennsylvania Co., 130 Ind. 170, 28 N. E. 616, 29 N. E. 775.

The finding of a fact which it was probably necessary for the jury to find before they could find a verdict must be deemed by intendment to be included in a general verdict for plaintiff, as in regard to the train which caused the injury, and an answer by the jury to an interrogatory that they do not know what train it was does not necessarily contravene or overcome such presumption. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Neubaucher, 16 Ind. App. 21, 44 N. E. 669.

findings, in order to support a judgment thereon, should contain all the facts upon which the judgment is to rest, nothing being taken by implication or intendment, and whatever is not found in them being supposed not to exist.[38] A judgment cannot be entered upon inconsistent findings,[39] except where one of such findings is a mere conclusion of law, in which case it must yield to special findings of fact inconsistent therewith.[40]

h. Appeal and Error. The same rules that apply to appeals in civil cases generally [41] govern questions of appeal and error in actions for injuries to persons on or near railroad tracks.[42] If there is any evidence to support a verdict or finding it will not be disturbed on appeal;[43] and a judgment will not be reversed for harmless error,[44] as in respect to the admission or exclusion of evidence,[45] or

St. 250 (holding that it is not sufficient that the special verdict finds that there was negligence on the part of the railroad company, unless it is found that plaintiff was lawfully on the road, and not guilty of negligence).

A special verdict or finding that plaintiff was injured by the failure of defendant to exercise ordinary care in respect to some duty which it owed to plaintiff is insufficient to support a judgment against defendant, without a further finding, or unless it appears conclusively from the evidence that such injury was a natural and probable result of defendant's negligence, and one which in the light of attending circumstances a person of ordinary intelligence ought reasonably to have foreseen. Sheridan v. Bigelow, 93 Wis. 426, 67 N. W. 732.

Where wilfulness is necessary to a recovery and a special verdict fails to find that plaintiff's conduct was wilful, a judgment thereon is properly entered for defendant. Barr v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 10 Ind. App. 433, 37 N. E. 814.

A failure to answer immaterial interrogatories is not fatal to a verdict. Whitlock v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 11 S. W. 208, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 966, holding that where the jury find specially that deceased was a trespasser, that the death was caused wholly by his negligence and through no fault of the servants of the company, and judgment is rendered for defendant, it is immaterial that they fail to agree upon the question whether it was defendant's duty to have a brakeman at the end of the train where deceased was killed and whether such brakeman would have prevented the accident.

Nothing will be presumed in favor of special findings as against the general verdict on appeal. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Neubaucher, 16 Ind. App. 21, 43 N. E. 576, 44 N. E. 669.

F. Accidents at Crossings*[48]—1. Character of Crossings — a. In General. Railroad crossings within the meaning of the rules of law hereinafter considered, imposing a liability upon a railroad company for injuries caused thereat either by its trains or by the condition of the crossing itself, mean public crossings, or points at which public streets or highways cross the railroad tracks,[49] and former ordinance was violated by defendant, and the latter ordinance is not read in the hearing of the jury.

E. 448, holding that in an action for injuries received by stepping off at a station in the night-time on the side of the track on which there was no platform and falling several feet, it is harmless error to admit evidence that after the accident defendant greatly extended its platform at that point on the south side of the track, since the injury was caused by plaintiff stepping off the north side and the rule excluding evidence of repairs made after the injury does not apply.

Kentucky.— Beiser v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 92 S. W. 928, 29 Ky. L. R. Co. v. Ure, 56 Kan. 473, 43 Pac. 776 (holding that where the facts uphold a verdict against the railroad company, it is immaterial whether the court erred in its instructions in making a distinction as to the point of time when the duty of the company arises toward a conscious or unconscious trespasser upon its track); McAdoo v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 105 N. C. 140, 11 S. b. Crossings by License or Custom. The duty to keep the crossing in repair is absolute under some statutes. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Smith, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 107 S. W. 638, construing Rev. St. (1895) art. 4426.

Liability depends upon the care taken to avoid accident and a railroad company is not ordinarily liable for injuries sustained at a crossing on proof merely that it knowingly used a track "so constructed and maintained as to be dangerous to the public," it appear-safe and convenient for the usual and ordinary purposes of the public; and its failure to do so renders it liable to one who is injured by reason thereof while making a proper, reasonable, and necessary use of the crossing; [72] and the railroad company is not relieved of this liability by the fact that the party injured also has a remedy therefor against certain county or municipal authorities; [73] nor is a railroad company relieved from such duty by the fact that a certain crossing was put in under

the mandate of a municipal ordinance.[74] Some statutes expressly prescribe the manner in which such crossings shall be constructed and maintained,[75] in which case the railroad company can be relieved from liability for an injury caused at such crossing only by showing that the crossing was constructed and maintained in strict compliance with the statute.[76]

b. Character of Crossing. The crossings to which the above rule applies are generally such only as are at the intersection of legally established public streets and highways,[77] whether established before or after the railroad was built.[78] It does not apply where the way intersected is not legally established in accordance with law,[79] unless it has become as a public highway by invitation or custom,[80] as where the railroad company has assumed the duty of constructing and maintaining a proper crossing thereat, although it was not obliged to do so.[81] Thus

Where a railroad company voluntarily constructs a bridge over ditches along its right of way as a private way for the use and convenience of the occupants of the land abutting on its right of way, it is liable to one of the parties for whose use it was built, for injuries caused by its failure to keep the bridge in proper repair. Cas. 290, 3 Atl. 26, holding that where a man is thrown from a buggy, and injured by reason of his horse's hoof catching between the rail and wooden guard of a railroad street crossing, he must show negligence on the part of the company before he is entitled to recover for bodily pain and suffering, and pecuniary loss.

Under Wis. Rev. St. § 1836, requiring every railway company to restore the highway to its former state or to such condition that its usefulness as such shall not be materially impaired, a railroad cannot be charged by showing the presence of a ditch in a highway at a crossing, causing an accident, but it must be shown that the ditch was constructed or caused by the building of the railroad. d. Bridges.[91] Where a railroad company is bound to construct and maintain a bridge either over its tracks or over a highway which it crosses, it will be liable if it fails to construct and maintain such bridge in a condition reasonably safe for persons using it for the purpose of crossing in the ordinary way,[92] as in constructing and maintaining it at the proper height,[93] and this rule applies where Negligent construction means such an improper construction of the crossing, whether arising from negligence, indifference, or motives of economy, as unnecessarily increases the danger of using the public highway. Edwards v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 129 N. C. 78, 39 S. E. 730.

Failure to provide suitable crossings for harvesting machines, whereby injuries result, is negligence, as railroad companies must know the requirements of harvesting machines in general use throughout the state, as to the width of crossings necessary to enable persons to drive them safely across. The mere fact that a crossing is dangerous does not necessarily impute negligence to the railroad company. Edwards v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 129 N. C. 78, 39 S. E. 730. If a railroad crossing is so constructed as to be safe to one crossing the railroad, this is enough, although it may be dangerous to one walking along the railroad. Raper v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 126 N. C. 563, 36 S. E. 115.

That the railroad track is laid across a highway does not necessarily render it defective and unsafe, and it is not the intention of the statute (Conn. Gen. St. 232, § 10) to make the railroad company liable for every injury from the track without reference to the condition of the highway. Allen v. New Haven, etc., R. Co., 50 Conn. 215.

That a railroad track is so constructed as to cross a public street at grade is not such negligence as will render the company liable for personal injuries sustained at the crossing. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. White, 46 Ill. App. 446.

That the plank which forms the approach is raised above the surface of the ground about the thickness of the plank does not make the crossing defective. Taylor v. Long Island R. Co., 16 N. Y. App. Div. 1, 44 N. Y. Suppl. 820.

Failure to remove a bank of earth on the right of way, consisting almost entirely of a natural hill through the base of which the track is laid in a cut, and which obstructs the view of an approaching train from travelers on the highway, is not a failure to restore the highway to its former state of usefulness, as required by Rev. St. § 1836. Leitch v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 93 Wis. 79, 67 N. W. 21.

The railroad company should exercise watchful diligence to keep the bridge in repair, and it is chargeable with knowledge of every defect which such diligence would have discovered. South, etc., R. Co. v. McLendon, 63 Ala. 266.

Where the railroad company performs its duty to keep a foot-bridge in a state ordinarily safe for persons using it for the purpose of crossing over it in the ordinary way, it is not responsible to one who does not use it in such manner and is injured. e. Changing Location of Highway. When a railroad company, authorized to change the location of a highway, does so in a negligent manner it will be liable for resulting injuries.[95] But where the change is made by the county authorities, without proper notice to the railroad company, the latter is not responsible.[96]

f. Obstructions at Crossings.[97] The fact that a railroad company obstructs a street or highway at a public crossing, as by letting a train or cars stand thereon for a reasonable or lawful length of time, and for proper purposes, is not negligence, and the company is not responsible for injuries caused thereby.[98] But a railroad company is liable for injuries caused by reason of such obstruction, where it amounts to negligence,[99] as where it allows its train or cars to remain passageway of twenty feet, or two passageways of fourteen feet each, does not authorize a recovery by one injured under a street bridge in a passageway more than fourteen feet wide, on the ground that the other passageways were less than fourteen feet wide); Fairbanks v. Yarmouth, 24 Ont. App. 273.

Defect in height by raising street.— In the absence of statute, a railroad company is not negligent in failing to maintain the height of one of its bridges above a highway as it was when the bridge was built, where the vertical space between the road-bed and the bridge has been diminished by raising the street. Gray v. Danbury, 54 Conn. 574, 10 Atl. 198; Carson v. Weston, 1 Ont. L. Rep. 15.

Sufficiency of height.— It cannot be said, as a conclusion of law, that a railroad company is negligent in the construction of a bridge over a highway at a height of only ten and a half feet from the road-bed, where the company, the railroad commissioners, and the borough where the bridge was being built, considered the height sufficient, and where an injury complained of resulted from raising the street after the construction of the bridge. Where railroad employees honestly believe that they cannot move an obstructing car without help and they exercise ordinary care and prudence in that judgment, they are not negligent. Paine v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 58 N. H. 611.

That a railroad train is standing across a public street and obstructing the same so that a driver of a runaway horse is obliged to turn him out into an alley, before reaching the train, in doing which his vehicle is overturned and the driver is injured, does not of itself constitute negligence. Where dirt on a railroad crossing is piled upon the street by the railroad company under a license from the city, until the city shall remove it, and is left there at night without a light having been placed thereon, in violation of a city ordinance, the railroad company is liable for injuries suffered in consequence of the absence of a light. Lyon v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 6 Mo. App. 516.

Delay to fire apparatus.—An ordinance prohibiting the obstruction of a street so as to delay any company carrying its apparatus to or from any fire does not make a railroad company liable for injuries received by a person in going to a fire in the performance of his duties while crossing a street which the railroad company has obstructed, unless the obstruction is such as to delay a fire company in carrying its apparatus to or from

on the crossing unnecessarily, or for an unreasonable or unlawful length of time, by reason of which injuries are received by one who attempts, with due care, to cross or go around the obstruction;[1] and it has been held to make no difference in such cases whether the injuries were received upon the tracks of the railroad company or upon the property of an adjacent landowner.[2] But even though the obstruction is a lawful one, a traveler is not obliged to wait until the train is removed, and if he is obliged to cross at points other than the public crossing on account of such obstruction, the railroad company should use ordinary care and diligence to prevent injury to him.[3] As to what care should be exercised by a railroad company toward a traveler who attempts to cross over or through a train or cars causing such an obstruction, the authorities are conflicting. Some authorities hold that the railroad company is liable for resulting injuries to one who attempts to cross such train or cars, if it fails to use ordinary care and diligence to look out for such travelers and to give proper warnings before moving the train or cars.[4] Other cases, however, hold that a person attempting to cross the fire. Southern R. Co. v. Pratber, 119 Ala. 588, 24 So. 836, 72 Am. St. Rep. 949.

Statement of rule.— In Littlejohn v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 49 S. C. 12, 18, 26 S. E. 967, the court by Mr. Justice Gary, said: "If a railroad company obstructs a highway for an unreasonable length of time, or for a longer time than the law permits, unless it is without fault, the railroad company thereupon becomes a trespasser; and if a person makes a reasonable use of its cars, without injury to them, at a crossing, for the sole purpose of crossing the railroad track, the railroad company is estopped from saying that he is a trespasser. Having brought about the necessity, it can not take advantage of its own wrong." And this rule is not changed or affected by Code (1902), § 1375, providing for a penalty in case of an unlawful obstruction of a crossing. Walker v. Southern R. Co., 77 S. C. 161, 57 S. E. 764.

Under a Pennsylvania statute (Act March 20, 1845), declaring the blocking of a public crossing with cars to be illegal, and prohibiting it under a penalty, the obstruction of a crossing with a train, in attempting to get over which a pedestrain is injured, is prima facie negligence. Duty to give warning.— Where trainmen in charge of a train obstructing a crossing, in the exercise of ordinary care ought to anticipate that persons might be in the act of crossing, or be on or between or about the cars, and that not to give warning before moving the train would result in injury, it is their duty to give such warning and a failure to do so is negligence. it has been held that where the obstruction is reasonable the railroad company owes no duty to a traveler attempting to pass over or between the cars until his peril is discovered;[10] but that where the obstruction is negligent, the negligence of the company in moving the train or cars without warning does not depend upon notice to the trainmen that the particular person injured is between or on the cars or that his position will be one of peril when the train is moved.[11]

g. Obstruction of View or Hearing. It is negligence for a railroad company to permit unnecessary obstructions upon its right of way at or near a railroad crossing so as to obstruct the view or hearing thereat either of its servants approaching on a train or of persons upon the highway,[12] as where it allows the right of way to become overgrown with bushes, weeds, grass, etc., so as to obstruct such view;[13] but this rule does not apply at a private crossing as to persons who have no right to the crossing.[14] It is not negligence per se, however, for a railroad company to maintain telegraph poles on its right of way,[15] or to allow cars to remain on a side-track,[16] or to have at a railroad crossing other structures or obstructions reasonably necessary to the conduct of its business,[17] although they

Where a railroad company habitually obstructs a street and travelers, to its knowledge, are accustomed to climb over, crawl through, and go around the trains at such times, it is the duty of the employees in charge of the train to move it with reference to such persons and to take due precautions to avoid injury to persons who may be attempting to cross. obstruct the view or hearing. The existence of such obstructions merely devolves upon both the railroad company and a person on the highway a degree of care in approaching the crossing, in proportion to the increased danger, if any;[18] and is to be considered by the jury in determining whether or not there was negligence under all the circumstances, in permitting such obstruction,[19] or in operating the train which caused the accident,[20] or whether or not there was contributory negligence.[21]

h. Knowledge by Railroad Company of Defect or Obstruction. In order to charge a railroad company with negligence for defects or obstructions at a crossing which it is bound to keep in proper condition and repair, it must appear that the railroad company had notice of the defect or obstruction,[22] or should, under the circumstances, have had notice thereof,[23] especially where the defect or obstruc-

Obstructing a highway at a crossing for the length of time allowed by law under circumstances of practical necessity is not negligence, although such obstruction hides the view of approaching trains that persons traveling on the highway would otherwise have. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Body, 85 Ill. App. 133.

A railroad company may use its right of way in any lawful manner, although the view of travelers is thereby obstructed, but is required to adopt all precautions necessary to prevent such obstructions from becoming dangerous. Nashville, etc., R. Co. v. Witherspoon, 112 Tenn. 128, 78 S. W. 1052.

4. Frightening Animals[26] — a. Liability in General. A railroad company's authority to operate a railroad includes the right to make any noise necessarily incident to the operation of its road and the movement and working of its engines;[27] and it is not liable therefore for injuries occasioned by horses taking fright at the ordinary movements, noise, or appearance of trains or cars,[28] or at other

A. 539 (holding that a railroad company which has erected a bridge over a farm crossing must exercise ordinary care to see or ascertain the condition of the bridge, and is not entitled to notice of its condition as a prerequisite to its liability to one who is injured owing to the fact that the bridge is out of repair).

If by careful management the defect could have been discovered, the railroad company is liable, whether it had actual knowledge or not (Retan v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 94 Mich. 146, 53 N. W. 1094); as where the defect existed for such a length of time that it might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have known of its existence (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 44 S. W. 385, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1693; Mann v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 86 Mo. 347). Where a plank is torn up from a farm crossing on a railroad by the wreck of a passenger train, and the crossing remains in such condition for more than six months, the company will be charged with knowledge that the spikes which secured the plank were left in a dangerous condition. If the defect could not have been discovered by ordinary care the railroad company is not responsible. Retan v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 94 Mich. 146, 53 N. W. 1094.

Under Mo. Rev. St. (1889) § 2609, in terms imposing an absolute and continuing duty on railroad companies in respect to maintaining crossings, no liability for injury occasioned by defects therein arises unless the company has had actual or constructive notice of the defects, and has failed, within a reasonable time thereafter, to repair them. Nixon v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 141 Mo. 425, 42 S. W. 942.

In Illinois, under Hurd Rev. St. (1897) c. 114, §§ 62, 65, 66, requiring railroad companies to construct and maintain private crossings, and providing that if they fail so to do after notice has been given in writing by the occupant of adjoining lands, such occupant may build or repair such crossing and recover double the expense from the company, the fact that the company has not received notice of the defective condition of a crossing does not relieve it from liability for an injury occasioned thereby. It is negligence to make the customary noises incident to the movement of a train where the servants in charge have reason to apprehend injury therefrom to the driver of a team near the track whose perilous position they have discovered, unless it is reasonably necessary to do so for the protection of the property and lives in their charge. Escaping steam.— Where the proper signals are not given and the horse is frightened by escaping steam from the passing engine the railroad company is responsible for the resulting injury (Presby v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 66 N. H. 615, 22 Atl. 554); and the fact that the steam escaped through an automatic valve, such as is generally used by railroad companies, not under the control of the railroad companies' employees in charge of the locomotive, is not an answer to the charge of negligence as a matter of law (Presby v. Grand Trunk R. Co., supra).

(II) By Signals Required by Statute. As a general rule the blowing of whistles and giving of other signals required by statute at a crossing whereby horses are frightened and injury is caused is not negligence for which the railroad company is responsible,[39] unless they are given negligently or wantonly.[40] But, in the absence of facts tending to show that injury to others at the crossing might result from the failure to give such signals,[41] even the giving of the statutory signals may constitute negligence if the railroad employee sees that a horse will be frightened and he can desist from giving them consistently with his duties.[42]

e. By Obstructions On or Near Tracks. A railroad company is also responsible for negligently allowing obstructions reasonably calculated to frighten ordinarily gentle horses,[43] to remain on its right of way at or near a crossing whereby horses are frightened and injury is caused without any fault on the part of the injured person.[44] But obstructions that are usual and necessary in the proper

Under a statute (S. C. Gen. A "traveled place" within the meaning of Mass. St. (1849) c. 222, § 2, requiring a railroad company to maintain a sign-board where its railroad crosses such places, includes an open and traveled street in a city, although not so laid out and established by the municipal authorities as to make the city responsible for damages occasioned by defects therein. Whittaker v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 7 Gray (Mass.) 98. But it does not include a foot-bridge built outside the limits of the highway for the use of the public, where the railroad company was lowering its grade so that a highway could pass overhead and had closed up the highway. requirement, it may be negligence not to place such a sign-board if the crossing is of an unusually dangerous character.[58] But since the object of such a sign-board is to warn travelers of the existence of the railroad crossing, the absence thereof does not make the company liable to a party familiar with the crossing and knowing of the existence of the railroad at the time of the accident.[59] Under a statute requiring the highway authorities to put up sign-boards at crossings and requiring the railroad company to give signals at all crossings so designated, such a sign-board is sufficient if it is in plain view of passing trains, although there is no lettering on the side toward the railroad.[60]

c. Gates, Lights, and Flagmen — (i) IN GENERAL. Unless required by statute[61] a railroad company is ordinarily under no duty to maintain a flagman, lights, or gates at a crossing, and negligence cannot be predicated upon a mere failure to do so,[62] particularly as to one who is familiar with the cross-

R. Co., 14 Fed. 332, 4 McCrary 573, holding that under the Iowa statute, Code, § 1288, the failure to provide such sign-boards is conclusive evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company.

The universal use of a particular sign-board throughout the state but which is not in compliance with the statute does not absolve a railroad company from responsibility for the direct consequences resulting from an accident due to such violation. Henn v. Long Island R. Co., 51 N. Y. App. Div. 292, 65 N. Y. Suppl. 21. But in the absence of testimony showing that such violation was the proximate cause of the accident, such universal use of a sign-board renders a lack of compliance with the statute of no probative force on the question of negligence. Lewis v. Long Island R. Co., 31 Misc. (N. Y.) 546, 65 N. Y. Suppl. 595.

A slight variation of the sign from the statutory requirements, but which in no degree prevents a person from receiving warning at such crossing, is not such negligence as to render the railroad company liable for the injury. A watchman at a crossing should be physically capable of reasonably discharging his duties, and if by reason of his age or any physical disability he is incapacitated to reasonably discharge his duties, and if by reason thereof he fails to warn a person in time to prevent a collision whereby such person is injured, the railroad company is liable therefor provided such person was free from contributory negligence. Where a flagman discovers that his signal to a traveler is unobserved or unheeded by such traveler it is his duty to flag the approaching train, when this can be done before the danger is imminent. Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Anderson, 109 Ala. 299, 19 So. 516.

It is the duty of a flagman to give the driver of a team such warning of the approach of a train as will enable him to stop his team at a point where an ordinarily well broken and gentle team would not become dangerously frightened, or where, if his horses were not ordinarily well broken and gentle, he would have time to turn around and drive to a point of safety. gence for a gatekeeper or flagman to leave his post, knowing that an engine is approaching, without giving some signal of danger.[81] If the flagman or watchman neglects to give any warning,[82] or does not give a warning until the traveler is in great danger,[83] especially where the view of the approaching train is obstructed,[84] and no signals are given by it,[85] the railroad company is responsible. Where gates are established, although there is no statute requiring their maintenance,[86] it is negligence if they are not constructed, attended, and maintained, with ordinary care and prudence, so as to give the proper warning of an approaching train,[87] or so as not to injure a passer-by by the manner in which they are maintained or closed.[88] Likewise it is negligence to leave them open when trains

Where it is apparent that the train or engine is not going to run over the crossing, a railroad company is not liable to one whose horses are frightened by the sight and sound of an engine, for a failure of a flagman at the crossing to notify him, when he was about to cross the tracks, that there was an engine switching in the vicinity. Failure to have a gateman or flagman on the ground, instead of operating the gates by an attendant in a tower, who at the same time, by the same movement, operates another gate at another crossing, is not a negligent act, so as to render the company liable for the death of a person at the crossing, whose team, frightened at an automobile, runs away, dashing into and breaking the gate, which is down, and dropping deceased on the railroad track immediately in front of an approaching express train. Brooks v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 188 Mass. 416, 74 N. E. 670.

Assurance of safety.— Open gates tended by a gate-keeper at a public crossing are an affirmative assurance to a traveler that his safety will not be imperiled in crossing by the descent of a gate arm. Sager v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 70 Kan. 504, 79 Pac. 132. And the fact that the track crosses a public or cars are passing,[89] except as to one who sees the train going in front of him,[90] and the mere fact that the flagman signaled the person injured not to cross does not free the railroad company from negligence,[91] unless such signal is given in time for such person by the exercise of reasonable care to avoid the injury.[92]

(III) Persons Entitled to Protection. The protection of the rule requiring a flagman or gates at a crossing extends only to persons crossing the railroad tracks at such crossing, by way of the highway,[93] or to persons lawfully on the right of way and approaching the crossing,[94] and not to persons approaching the crossing by wrongfully walking along the railroad track,[95] or to persons crossing street is not a warning of danger from the negligence of the gate-keeper in allowing an arm of the gate to descend. Sager v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., supra.

Ordinary care requires the gateman to keep the gates under control at all times and to keep his eyes on the street while lowering them. O'Keefe v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 108 Mo. App. 177, 83 S. W. 308. He cannot presume that a pedestrian will not walk under a gate while it is being lowered. O'Keefe v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., supra. Merely glancing at the street or highway as he begins to operate the machinery by which the gate is closed is not a sufficient performance of this duty. O'Keefe v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 108 Mo. App. 177, 83 S. W. 308.

Where a railroad company constructs a gate safe and ample for all ordinary purposes, it is not chargeable with negligence because the ground below the lower board of the gate has been worn down by the passage of stock and teams so as to leave a space of fifteen inches, through which a child can crawl when the gate is closed. Friend v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 104 Wis. 663, 80 N. W. 934.

Strength of gate.— While under particular circumstances great strength in the gate may be required, a railroad company is not negligent in failing to maintain gates at an ordinary crossing of sufficient strength to successfully sustain the shock of a runaway team hitched to a vehicle on coming into contact therewith. Brooks v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 188 Mass. 416, 74 N. E. 670.

Light on gates.—Where a railroad company maintains gates over a grade crossing, it is not required to have a light on the arm extending over the sidewalk, if it otherwise provides a sufficient light to enable a person exercising ordinary care to see the arm of the gate. McDonald v. Covington, etc., El. R. Transfer, etc., Co., 107 S. W. 726, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 992.

Acts of stranger.— Where gates at a railroad crossing are raised by one not an employee of the railroad company without authority from the gate-keeper and without his knowledge while his back was turned for a moment, the railroad company is not liable for injuries caused to one crossing the tracks by the lowering of the gates by such stranger. d. Effect of Statute or Ordinance. Where precautions for safety at public crossings are prescribed by statute or ordinance it is negligence not to use such precautions,[1] as where the railroad company fails to comply with a statute or ordinance in regard to having a flagman,[2] or gates,[3] and it has been held that such failure is evidence of negligence, although the person injured might have seen the train had he been looking.[4]

Under a Maryland statute, Code, art. 23, § 194, providing that county commissioners may notify a railroad company to place a flagman at a crossing outside of the corporate limits of a city, if the commissioners believe such crossing to be dangerous, the failure of the company to voluntarily place a flagman at a crossing does not constitute negligence. In Michigan, under Howell Annot. St. § 3365, providing that the railroad commissioners shall direct when a gate is to be maintained or a flagman stationed at a highway crossing, the absence of a flagman is no evidence of negligence on the part of the company, unless the necessity for stationing and maintaining such flagman at the particular crossing has been determined upon and required by the railroad commissioners. Under a municipal ordinance which requires the person in charge of gates at a street crossing to lower the gates on the approach to the crossing of engines or cars, a person in charge of the gates who fails to lower the gates on the approach of an engine is guilty of negligence, although he saw no person approaching the tracks. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Wise, 206 Ill. 453, 69 N. E. 500 [affirming 106 Ill. App. 174].

In New York a violation of a city ordinance requiring a railroad company to close all gates at grade crossings one minute before a locomotive passes does not establish a cause of action against the railroad company for killing a person at such a crossing, although it is evidence bearing on the question of negligence. The power to determine whether gates shall be placed at a highway crossing, under the Dominion Railway Act (1888), §§ 197, 259, as amended by 55 & 56 Vict. c. 26, §§ 6, 8, rests with the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and not with a jury. Running trains in such a manner as to make statutory signals unavailing is negligence. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Boggs, 101 Ind. 522, 51 Am. As a general rule it is not negligence per se on the part of the railroad company to "kick" cars or to make "running" or "flying switches" over a highway crossing, when proper precautions are taken for the safety of travelers using the crossing.[21] But since such a practice is peculiarly dangerous, it creates a duty of unusual care on the part of the company; and there should be not only the usual signals of bell and whistle, but there should also be a flagman near the track or a watchman on the nearest approaching car as well as other reasonably necessary precautions;[22] and unless contributory negligence of a character to defeat a recovery intervenes,[23] such acts when performed without taking reasonable precautions to avoid injuries

A "running" or "flying switch" is performed by attaching the cars designed to be thrown upon the side-track to the engine, after which the train is put in motion running toward the switch and before it is reached and when sufficient momentum to answer the purpose has been acquired the engine is detached and run ahead of the train, and after it passes the switch is changed and the cars thus detached are by the momentum thus acquired carried along the side-track to the point intended. Degree of care.— It is the duty of a railroad company in such cases to use such precautions as are reasonably necessary to avoid striking a person crossing its track in the vicinity of the public crossing. Florida Cent., etc., R. Co. v. Foxworth, 41 Fla. 1, 25 So. 338, 79 Am. St. Rep. 149. The railroad company is only required, however, to provide signals and safeguards so timely and abundant that they may reasonably be expected to prove effectual in warning travelers who are themselves in the exercise of due care and vigilance; and is not bound to adopt such extraordinary measures as may be needful to warn travelers who are thoughtless and inattentive or reckless and venturesome. Smith v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 87 Me. 339, 32 Atl. 967. On the other hand, plaintiff in such cases is not bound to prove that defendant's employees in moving and operating a car by a flying switch did not care whether or not they killed a person in moving the same. c. Backing or Running Unattended Cars Over Crossing. Backing engines or trains or running unattended cars over a crossing is not negligence if performed with proper precautions.[28] But since such acts are especially dangerous a railroad company is bound to exercise special precautions to avoid injuries to persons lawfully on or approaching the track,[29] and it is negligent if it backs its engines or trains or runs unattended cars without proper lookouts,[30] or without proper

In Tennessee, Shannon's Code, §§ 1574–1576, does not render a railroad company absolutely liable for a collision in the daytime, while an engine is being operated backward with the tender in front, and it is error for the court to refuse to charge that if the engineer is actually on the lookout ahead of his engine, and sees plaintiff's vehicle as soon as it can be seen as it enters on the crossing and the engineer immediately blows the alarm whistle, puts down the brakes, and uses every possible means to stop the train and prevent an accident, plaintiff cannot recover, although the engine is being operated backward. W. 860, where it was held that the railroad company's liability under such sections was absolute and could not be avoided by showing that it was impossible to observe such precautions or that the injury would have occurred even if they had been observed].

In Mississippi, Code (1892), § 1849, making a railroad company violating its provisions liable to a party injured within prescribed limits of a passenger depot by a backing train, was designed to afford protection to all persons within such limits, and therefore applies to a person injured by such a train while driving a team across the track. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. McCalip, 76 Miss. 360, 25 So. 166.

An ordinary lantern in the hand of a brakeman on the top of a car does not meet the requirement of an ordinance requiring every train backing in the night-time to have a "conspicuous light" on the rear car so as to show in what direction the car is moving. of which the railroad company is responsible, when approaching a public crossing to give notice of their approach by all reasonable warnings, such as by blowing a whistle, ringing a bell, signal lights, or by such other devices as may be sufficient to give timely warning to travelers of their approach, so as to afford time for all approaching to stop in a place of safety or if on the track to get out of danger.[36] Beside ringing the bell and blowing the whistle they are bound, if necessary, to use all the usual and well-known means for preventing collisions with persons using the crossing.[37] This duty of giving timely warning exists notwithstanding there is no statute or ordinance requiring signals to be given at the crossing,[38] or in the particular case,[39] and independently of statutes or ordinances requiring certain signals to be given or to be given at certain places.[40]

Precautions as to bell.— It is the duty of a railroad company to supply an engine with a bell which is adequate for the purpose and its duty in this regard is not discharged if the bell is cracked or otherwise defective and does not sound loud enough to warn persons under ordinary circumstances. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Krohne, 86 Fed. 230, 29 C. C. A. 674.

particularly where such signals or warnings are required by statute,[46] and the circumstances may be such that a failure to sound the whistle will be at least evidence of negligence notwithstanding the sounding of it is prohibited by statute or ordinance.[47] A bell should be rung not only before crossing a street but so long as there is danger of encountering passers-by;[48] but in the absence of statute it is not necessary to sound both bell and whistle,[49] or to sound them continuously while passing a public crossing.[50] In most jurisdictions the giving of signals is now regulated by statute or ordinance,[51] under which it is variously required that a bell shall be rung or a whistle sounded,[52] either being sufficient under some

The mere fact that the bell was rung does not show that sufficient warning was given, since it may have been rung in some manner and yet not have constituted a warning, under all the surroundings. Stewart v. Long Island R. Co., 54 N. Y. App. Div. 623, 66 N. Y. Suppl. 436 [affirmed in 166 N. Y. 604, 59 N. E. 1130].

Where a gate and flagman are maintained at the crossing there is no obligation upon the railroad company to ring a bell or sound a whistle if the gates are up and the engineer does not know it; but if he does know the fact or if from his position he ought to have known it, it is for the jury to determine whether his failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle is negligence. Edgerley v. Long Island R. Co., 46 N. Y. App. Div. 284, 61 N. Y. Suppl. 677, 44 N. Y. App. Div. 476, 60 N. Y. Suppl. 1062.

Failure to sound a bell or whistle is not negligence per se in the absence of statute; it is merely evidence of negligence to be considered by the jury in connection with other circumstances of the case. A failure to keep the whistle "constantly" sounding between the whistle post and the crossing does not, under ordinary circumstances, constitute negligence, under a statute (Conn. Gen. St. § 3554), requiring the bell or whistle to be sounded occasionally within such distance, although the crossing is dangerous by reason of obstructions to view or hearing. A municipal ordinance which prohibits a railroad company from sounding any whistles, but expressly provides that it shall not be prohibited from giving signals necessary for the protection of life and property, in no way affects the statutory duty on the part of the company to give signals of the approach of trains to a crossing. d. Lookouts.[62] In addition to sounding the bell or whistle or giving other signals, it is also the duty of employees in charge of an engine or train to use ordinary care in keeping a proper lookout at a public crossing to prevent injury, and if they fail to do so, whereby an injury is caused, it is negligence for which the railroad company is liable,[63] and if they see or might by due care and precaution see an obstruction on the track, it is their duty to use every means in their power to prevent a collision.[64] This duty ordinarily devolves upon the engineer,[65] but it may also devolve upon the fireman,[66] and under some circumstances it

Where a whistle post has been erected at a proper distance from a crossing by the railroad company in order to notify the engineer where to give warning and the public are led to believe that a signal will be given at the post it is negligence on the part of an engineer passing it to fail to sound the whistle at such post. A crossing provided by a railroad company across its own ground for ingress or egress from its depot is not a "traveled public road" within the meaning of Wagner St. p. 310, § 338, requiring a bell or whistle to be sounded at such crossing. Hodges v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 71 Mo. 50; Bauer v. Kansas Pac. R. Co., 69 Mo. 219.

That the crossing has been discontinued by the commissioners of highways on condi-

"A traveled place" under South Carolina Gen. St. § 1483, is not a mere crossing by sufferance, but a place where the public have a legal right to cross, if not by express grant, by adverse user (Hankinson v. Charlotte, etc., R. Co., 41 S. C. 1, 19 S. E. 206; Barber v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 34 S. C. 444, 13 S. E. 630); and the mere fact that the company has left the crossing open when cars have remained there any length of time is not of itself proof of such acquisition (Hankinson v. Charlotte, etc., R. Co., supra). Nor is a bridge, which the public has been accustomed to pass over, but at the end of which there is a notice to keep off, and on which the president of the railroad has refused to allow a plank to be laid, a "traveled place" within the meaning of such statute. Ringstaff v. Lancaster, etc., R. Co., 64 S. C. 546, 43 S. E. 22.

In Massachusetts a road is not a "traveled place" within the meaning of Pub. on the approach of its trains,[81] its failure to give signals thereat, whereby a traveler is injured without any fault on his part, is negligence. It has been held that a person using a private crossing in the vicinity of a public one has a right to rely upon the giving of proper signals at the public crossing, and that if the railroad company fails to give such signals thereat, it is negligence as to such person.[82]

f. Persons Entitled to Benefit of Signals.[83] The duty of giving signals and maintaining lookouts exists not only as to persons who, rightfully approaching the crossing, are on or near the track and in danger of collision,[84] but also as to persons approaching the crossing who may be in danger of their horses becoming statute regulating the time and manner of giving signals, the failure of an engineer to ring a bell or sound a whistle at a point where the public have been habitually permitted to cross is evidence of negligence.

That the person was not standing on the intersection between the railroad and the highway but had diverged from the line of the highway and was therefore a trespasser on the company's grounds does not excuse the railroad company from failure to ring a bell or sound a whistle on approaching the highway crossing as required by statute. Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Furgusson, 42 Ill. 449; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Taff, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 657, 74 S. W. 89, holding that where plaintiff was rightfully on defendant's track, within several hundred feet of a crossing, and near enough to the crossing to have had the benefit of signals prescribed by statute, had they been given, the fact that he was not directly upon the crossing will not preclude a recovery.

Persons traveling on another road or street within the limits of a city or village are not entitled to the signals required by a statute providing that where a railroad company fails to sound the whistle of one of its engines at least eighty rods distant from the place where the engine is to cross a public road or street outside of a city or village, it is negligence as to persons who may be traveling upon that road or street. Clark v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 35 Kan. 350, 11 Pac. 134; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Pierce, 33 Kan. 61, 5 Pac. 378.

That one reaches a public crossing by walking on the right of way between the tracks does not deprive him of the safeguards of signals demanded of the company for a person crossing the railroad on such public crossing. Bowles v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 61 W. Va. 272, 57 S. E. 131.

frightened.[85] But since the purpose of signals is to give notice of the approach of trains to the crossing a failure to give the usual or statutory signals is not negligence as to one who is warned of,[86] or hears or sees, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence might hear or see,[87] the approaching train and by the exercise of reasonable care avoid the injury.

g. To What Trains or Cars Applicable. The above rules or statutes requiring signals, lights, etc., at crossings apply to all trains, engines, or cars, except handcars,[88] moving at or toward a public crossing, especially where the train is running behind time,[89] or is an irregular one.[90] Such rules or statutes apply to backing trains or running unattended cars,[91] and to "kicking" cars and making "flying switches" [92] over crossings, to starting up trains or cars which have been standing on or near a crossing,[93] and to shunting or switching in a railroad yard.[94] The statutes requiring the whistle or bell to be sounded at least eighty rods from a crossing apply to trains which start from a point less than that distance from the crossing,[95] as in shunting or other temporary movements.[96]

h. Obstructions of View or Hearing.[97] The duty of those in charge of an approaching train or locomotive to give a signal or warning of its approach to a public crossing, and the failure to give which constitutes negligence, exists particularly where the view or hearing of those in charge of the engine or of persons approaching along the highway is obstructed by obstructions at or near the crossing,[98]

especially where such obstructions are caused or permitted by the railroad company itself.[99] A failure to give a signal or warning under such circumstances may constitute negligence although such signals are not required by statute or ordinance,[1] or the crossing is a private one,[2] and although those in charge of the engine use all possible efforts to stop the train.[3] If the obstruction is such that the sound of the bell and the whistle is obstructed, the railroad company is bound to employ some more efficient means of warning.[4]

Where obstructions to the view are permitted on the right of way, it is the duty of the railroad company to operate its trains with reference to such obstructions and in such manner that travelers crossing the track from the highway from which the view is so obstructed may by the exercise of ordinary care avoid injury from such trains. Co. v. Lee, 68 Ill. 576); but it must appear by just inference from the evidence that the injury was caused by such negligence (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Lee, supra). If such failure results in the injury complained of it is negligence per se (Terre Haute, etc., R. Co. v. Voelker, 129 Ill. 540, 22 N. E. 20 [affirming 31 Ill. App. 314]). That the signal was not given in the manner required by statute is to be considered in connection with the peculiar mode in which the train was made up, the high rate of speed at which it was running, the dangerous character of the crossing, and the fact that the engineer saw the vehicle in which the person injured was riding approaching on the highway at the time the signal should have been given. kind of signals required depending upon the character of the crossing, the speed of the train, and the surrounding circumstances, and being a question for the jury.[15] Under ordinary circumstances, in the open country, it will ordinarily be sufficient to give the signals required by statute.[16] Where, however, the crossing is a dangerous one, and where the road is constructed in such a way and place as to make it more than usually difficult to see the train and hear the signals which are given, additional signals may be required.[17]

8. Rate of Speed and Control of Trains — a. Rate of Speed in General. In the absence of statutory or municipal regulations a railroad company has the right to use its discretion in establishing the speed of its trains,[30] and generally no rate of speed consistent with the safety of passengers and freight is negligence per se.[31] But under the rule of the common law that a railroad company is required to exercise its franchise with due regard to the safety of its passengers and such persons as may travel on a highway crossing railroad tracks, it is the duty of a railroad company in establishing the rate of speed at which its trains may be run, to exercise due regard not only to the safety of passengers, but also to all persons in the exercise of ordinary care traveling on the highway across its tracks,[32]

on the track in the street or at crossings must be anticipated, the speed of the train should be moderated to a reasonable degree, so as to have it under reasonable control.[34] In many jurisdictions, however, the rate of speed of trains at public crossings is regulated by statute or ordinance,[35] under which it is provided that the engineer on reaching a whistle post shall give the required signals and check the train so that he may be able to stop at the crossing,[36] or that the train shall not go faster than a specified rate until the crossing or street is passed.[37]

b. Nature and Locality of Crossings. The above rules usually apply to cities and towns where the population is dense and the presence of persons may be anticipated on the track at crossings,[38] and in the absence of statute, and under ordiout a warning signal, while at the same time a long train of freight cars is running on a parallel track in the opposite direction, obstructing the view and drowning the noise of the locomotive (Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Miles, 162 Ind. 646, 70 N. E. 985); to run an extra freight train at an unusual time at night, through a thickly settled part of a town, at an unlawful rate of speed, and over frequented street crossings without giving any signal (New Orleans, etc., R. Co. v. Brooks, 85 Miss. 269, 38 So. 40); to run over a graded street crossing at a rate of speed prohibited by a city ordinance with the headlight of the engine extinguished and without giving any warning (Southern R. Co. v. Aldridge, 101 Va. 142, 43 S. E. 333); or to run at a speed four times that permitted under an ordinance of the city with no signals of its approach being given (Washington Southern R. Co. v. Lacey, 94 Va. 460, 26 S. E. 834). But where a railroad track is straight for a long distance before reaching a crossing and a train could easily be seen along the way for several hundred feet from the crossing, and the extent of the use of the crossing does not appear, a speed of eighteen miles an hour in the night-time cannot be said to be unreasonable. nary circumstances, a railroad company is not guilty of negligence per se for running at a high rate of speed at crossings in the country outside of cities and villages,[39] or, although within the corporate limits, outside of the settled portion of the town,[40] especially where the proper signals for such crossings have been given and the view is unobstructed.[41] But when considered together with other circumstances existing at the time, such as the lack of proper signals, obstruction of view, or other like circumstances, it may be negligent for the railroad company to run at a high rate of speed even at such a crossing.[42] Likewise in the absence of statute or ordinance it is not negligence per se to run at a high rate of speed over crossings in a city or village,[43] although a rate of speed which would not be negligence at a crossing in the country may constitute negligence under the conditions existing at a crossing in a populous town or city, the question whether or not it is negligence depending upon the circumstances at the particular time and crossing and being for the jury to determine.[44] Where gates have been

c. Where View or Hearing Is Obstructed. Except where required by statute,[47] the fact that the view of the highway or of the train at a crossing is obstructed by intervening objects does not make it negligence not to slacken speed at such crossing, where the required danger signals have been given,[48] unless the conditions at the time and crossing are otherwise such as to require the railroad company, in the exercise of ordinary care, to slacken speed,[49] as where the crossing so obstructed is a much used one in a populous town or city,[50] the question whether the railroad company should slacken speed at a particular crossing so obstructed depending upon the circumstances thereat, and being a question for the jury.[51]

d. Effect of Statutes or Ordinances. Statutes or ordinances regulating the speed of trains do not change the general law on the subject, nor change the rights and duties of the parties growing out of obedience or disobedience to such a statute or ordinance.[52] Trains must conform their rate of speed to the safety of the public, according to the circumstances of each case, and irrespective of statute or ordi-miles an hour, knowing that persons will probably be endangered thereby, although it does not become aware of the peril of deceased in time to stop the train); Memphis, etc., R. Co. v. Martin, 117 Ala. 367, 23 So. 231 (holding that a railroad company is not authorized to run its trains at a wanton and dangerous rate of speed over a public crossing in an incorporated town where people frequently cross).

Illinois.— Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Miller, 76 Ill. 278; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Ohlsson, 70 Ill. App. 487.

Indiana.— Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Spilker, 134 Ind. 380, 33 N. E. 280, 34 N. E. 218.

Iowa.— Golinvaux v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 125 Iowa 652, 101 N. W. 465, holding that the running of a train at the rate of from sixty to sixty-five miles an hour in the suburbs of a city is not of itself negligence but is an element to be considered with other circumstances in determining the question of negligence.

Missouri.— Gruefel v. Wabash R. Co., 108 Mo. App. 548, 84 S. W. 170, holding that the running of a train over a street crossing, at the rate of twenty-five or thirty miles an hour, without warning signals, is gross negligence.

New York.— Zwack v. New York, etc., R. Co., 160 N. Y. 362, 54 N. E. 785 [affirming 8 N. Y. App. Div. 483, 40 N. Y. Suppl. 821]; De Loge v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 92 Hun 149, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 697 [affirmed in 157 N. Y. 688, 51 N. E. 1090].

Ohio.— Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Johnston, 25 Ohio Cir. Ct. 41; Ludden v. Columbus, etc., R. Co., 9 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 793, 7 Ohio N. P. 196, holding that it is the duty of those in charge of a train approaching a public street crossing to so far reduce the speed of the train that it can be controlled and stopped in a reasonably short time and within a reasonable distance.

Pennsylvania.— Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Brandtmaier, 113 Pa. St. 610, 6 Atl. 238; Delaware, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 3 Leg. Gaz. 102, 28 Leg. Int. 101, holding that it is the duty of an engineer on approaching a public crossing in a populous neighborhood to moderate the speed of the train so that, by the application of the brakes or reversing the engine, he may stop it in time to avoid collision with persons at the crossing.

See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 1007. And see infra, X, F, 14, g, (IX).

47. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Deaver, 79 Ala. 216, holding, however, that Code, § 1699, requiring the engineer to reduce speed before entering a curve crossed by a public road in a cut where he cannot see at least one quarter of a mile ahead does not require him to reduce speed on approaching crossings not falling within such description.

nance;[53] and where the circumstances at a particular time and crossing are such that ordinary care and prudence require trains to be run at a less rate of speed than that limited by the statute or ordinance, the railroad company is bound to exercise such care and prudence,[54] it being a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances if the speed fixed by such statute or ordinance is consistent with due caution.[55]

e. Violation of Statutes or Ordinances. Where a train is run at a crossing at a rate of speed in excess of that limited by statute or ordinance, it is in most jurisdictions negligence per se,[56] for which the railroad company is liable if such speed is the proximate cause of the injury,[57] and there is no contributory negligence on the part of the person injured;[58] and notwithstanding such statute or ordinance has never been enforced,[59] or the engineer or other person in charge of the train did all in his power to stop the train after discovering the danger of the person injured.[60] In some jurisdictions, however, an unlawful rate of speed at a crossing is held to be merely evidence of negligence to be considered by the jury together with other circumstances on the question of negligence,[61] although under some circumstances it may become negligence per se.[62]

f. Means of Controlling Trains. It is the duty of a railroad company to adopt well tested brakes or other appliances for the control of its trains; and it is liable for injuries caused, without any fault on the part of the person injured, by reason of its failure to supply or keep in repair such brakes or appliances,[63] and to have an employee on hand to apply them[64] at the proper time.[65]

Evidence.— That a city ordinance forbids trains to be run at any higher than a given rate of speed may be considered in ascertaining whether or not the train was negligently run but such an ordinance is not of itself evidence of negligence Bracken v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 22.

E. 181 (holding that a railroad company is negligent in kicking a train over a crossing without having an engine attached to it and without having proper means to apply the brake and stop the train); Johnson v. Gulf, etc., R. Co., 2 Tex. Civ. App. 139, 21 S. W. 274 (holding that if decedent's death was caused by ordinary negligence of the company in permitting the use of a hand-car not supplied with the most efficient brakes, the company is liable for his death if such negligence was the proximate cause of his death, and he was not guilty of contributory negligence).

In Tennessee, under Shannon's Code, §§ 1574, 1575, a railroad company is absolutely liable for injuries sustained by reason of its brakes or other appliances being defective, or if it fails to observe any other statutory requirement, although plaintiff may not be able to show that the accident was caused by the specific defect or default. Chattanooga Rapid Transit Co. v. Walton, 105 Tenn. 415, 58 S. W. 737.

64. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Baches, 55 Ill. 379, holding that it is gross negligence on the part of a brakeman not to be at the brakes when making a running switch in a populous part of a city crossing, a traveled street so as to be able to respond to a signal for brakes given by the engineer.

65. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Baches, 55 Ill. 379; Great Western R. Co. v. Brown, 3 Can. Sup. Ct. 159, holding a railroad company to be negligent in not applying the air-brakes at a sufficient distance from the crossing to enable the train to be stopped by hand brakes in case of the air-brakes giving way.

in a position of eminent peril on or near a crossing, it is his duty to use all reasonable precautions and efforts to prevent a collision or otherwise to avert an accident; and if he fails to do so the railroad company is liable for the resulting injuries,[67] although such person is not actually on the track.[68] A railroad company, however, is not guilty of negligence because such employee fails to exercise the best judgment possible when confronted with a sudden contingency,[69] or fails to provide against unusual or unexpected contingencies;[70] and if upon discovering a person in peril at a crossing the engineer or other employee uses all reasonable precautions and efforts to avert an accident, such as by blowing the alarm whistle and applying the brakes, he performs his whole duty, and although such efforts are unavailing, there is no liability on the part of the railroad company.[71]

The failure of a brakeman standing at a crossing to warn the person injured of the approach of an engine is not negligence for which the railroad company is responsible where it is not shown that he was stationed there to warn travelers. Young v. New York, etc., R. Co., 107 N. Y. 500, 14 N. E. 434.

Signals to engineer.—A brakeman seeing a person approaching the track is not bound to signal the engineer immediately on the appearance of danger, where he attempts to warn the approaching traveler to keep off the track. Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Coerver, 112 Fed. 489, 50 C. C. A. 360.

A brakeman stationed at a crossing where a freight train has been cut in two is under the duty to exercise reasonable care to prevent injuring persons who may be in the act of passing over the track between the parts of the train. Boyce v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 120 Mo. App. 168, 96 S. W. 670.

68. Highland Ave., etc., R. Co. v. Sampson, 91 Ala. 560, 8 So. 778, holding that the duty of using due care to avoid an accident after seeing the person's peril may arise before he is atually on the track.

Runaway team.— Where a person in charge of an engine sees or by the exercise of ordinary care could see that a team on a highway is unmanageahle and running off in the direction of the railroad crossing and the situation is such as to induce a person of ordinary prudence to believe that there is danger of a collision at the crossing, it is his duty to exercise ordinary care to prevent such a collision. 70. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Schmidt, 134 Ind. 16, 33 N. E. 774, holding that a statement by train hands to the driver of a vehicle that the train would not pull out for some time to come is not an assurance against any contingency except the movement of the train; and in an action for personal injury sustained by being thrown from a wagon while driving over a railroad crossing owing to the fact that plaintiff's horse was frightened by the sudden escape of steam from the safety valve, the company cannot be held liable on the theory that it was negligence to invite the driver to cross the track, where there was evidence that the train bands were aware that the steam pressure was at the point of escaping through the safety valve.

b. Duty to Stop or Reduce Speed. Except where there is a statutory provision to the contrary,[72] an engineer or other employee in charge of a train ordinarily has the right to presume that a person on or approaching a crossing is in possession of his natural faculties,[73] and will take the precautions which the law requires him to take to insure his own safety, and that he is aware of the situation and will move to or remain in a place of safety; and the engineer or other employee seeing such person is generally under no obligation to stop or check the train,[74] unless the conduct of those in charge of the train induces one approaching the crossing to believe that the train will not proceed to the crossing or that those in charge of the train will yield the right of way.[75] Where, however, such railroad employee knows or has reason to apprehend that a person on or approaching the crossing is not in possession of ordinary ability to care for himself,[76] as that he is infirm

A child nine years old or over is not presumed to be non sui juris, and where an employee in charge of a train sees such a child standing in a place of safety near the track he is not negligent in not stopping or slackening the speed of the train, where other proper warnings and signals have been given (Theobald v. Chicago, etc., R. Where a child seven years of age goes on a track at a railroad crossing in full view of the flagman while the gates are lowered, it is the duty of the railroad company to use care according to the circumstances to prevent injury to the child, its full duty not being done as to such child by merely lowering the gates; whether it uses the proper care in such case being a question for the jury. 10. Contributory Negligence [80] — a. In General — (i) Care Required in Going on Tracks in General. As a general rule it is the duty of a person approaching or going on a railroad crossing to exercise ordinary care to learn of the approach of trains and keep out of the way, or otherwise to avoid being injured; that is, such care and prudence as would be exercised by a man of ordinary prudence under like circumstances,[81] and if he fails to do so, as the proximate

The non-performance of impossible things does not constitute negligence; and negligence therefore on the part of plaintiff cannot be conclusively presumed as a matter of law from his inability to control his horses or to prevent their running away when they become frightened by a train approaching a crossing toward which he is driving. Faber v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 29 Minn. 465, 13 N. E. 902.

A mere error of judgment on the part of the person passing over a railroad crossing is not of itself contributory negligence which will bar him from recovering. Hoyt v. New York, etc., R. Co., 6 N. Y. St. 7.

Limiting liability by signs.—A railroad company by posting signs forbidding the use of its depot and approaches as a thoroughfare cannot make a person injured on a public crossing, through the negligence of the company, guilty of contributory negligence when such person was in the exercise of ordinary care, as it cannot forbid such use of a public crossing. of consideration for the jury,[90] and when taken together with carelessness of the traveler or other circumstances may constitute such negligence, barring his right of recovery.[91]

(III) Wrongful and Unlawful Acts or Conduct.[92] That a person injured at a railroad crossing is at the time of the accident engaged in some wrongful or unlawful act or conduct is not such negligence as will bar his right to recover,[93] unless such act or conduct contributes directly to the accident.[94]

(IV) Care in Respect to Horses or Teams. A person riding or driving near or over a railroad crossing is also bound to exercise ordinary care in respect to his horse or team to prevent it becoming frightened and causing injury;[95] and in determining whether he exercised proper care or not the character of the horse or team and the injured person's knowledge thereof should be considered.[96] But it is not contributory negligence that such person merely knows of the danger and knows that his horse or team may become frightened,[97] although the fact of such knowledge may have an important bearing upon the question,[98] and may constitute contributory negligence, where by reason of such knowledge the danger might have been easily avoided.[99]

That one drives within fifty feet of a crossing and the horse, frightened by the noise of a train, runs away and causes injury is not conclusive, as a matter of law, of a want of due care on the part of the driver. Herrick v. Sullivan, 120 Mass. 576.

An attempt to drive a horse near a box car negligently permitted to remain at a street crossing, after the driver sees that the horse has become frightened, is not such contributory negligence as to preclude him from recovering for injuries caused thereby, if it does not appear that he knew that it was dangerous to do so. (v) Knowledge of Danger. Although a traveler on a public highway is bound to know that there is peril in attempting to cross over a railroad track, as such track is itself an admonition of danger on which he must act with at least ordinary prudence,[1] mere knowledge of danger on his part is not of itself conclusive evidence of contributory negligence;[2] but it is a circumstance to be considered, and, when taken together with other facts in the case, such as lack of ordinary care in other respects, may bar the injured person's right of recovery,[3] notwithstanding the railroad company itself is guilty of negligence.[4] Thus where a person knows or ought to know of the danger at a crossing in time to enable him to avoid it and fails to do so, he cannot recover for his injuries from the railroad company, although the latter fails to ring the bell or sound the whistle,[5] to maintain a sign-board at the crossing as required by law,[6] to have a flagman or

Descending gates.— A person who, while driving a gentle horse, over which he has full control, along a highway toward a railroad crossing, sees the gates thereto descending, knows he is likely to collide with them and makes no effort to avoid the danger or stop his horse, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. (VI) Acts in Emergencies. Where a traveler without any fault on his part is placed in a position of eminent peril at a crossing the law makes allowance for such a person and will not hold him guilty of such negligence as to defeat his recovery if he does not select the very wisest course, and an honest mistake of judgment in such a sudden emergency will not of itself constitute contributory negligence, although another course might have been better and safer;[10] and this rule is especially applicable where the person is placed in such a perilous position by reason of the railroad company's negligence, as in failing to give the proper signals.[11] All that is required of a person in such an emergency is that he act with ordinary care under the circumstances, it being for the jury to determine whether such an emergency existed and whether the traveler acted with due care.[12] The above rule, however, does not apply where the injured person's perilous position is due

See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 1085; and infra, X, F, 13.

But see Pennsylvania R. Co. v. McGirr, 61 Md. 108, holding that, notwithstanding the most culpable negligence on the part of the railroad company, the injured party cannot recover if the infliction of the injury would have been impossible had he observed due care and caution.

Mere inadvertence or inattention on the part of the railroad company does not constitute such wilful intention of inflicting injury as will entitle the person injured to damages although he is guilty of contributory negligence, where the circumstances are not the negligent act of the injured party is concurrent in point of time with the negligent act of the railroad company so that the latter has no opportunity to act with reference to the act of the injured person,[23] and where the railroad company is not chargeable with negligence after the position of the injured party is discovered or by the exercise of reasonable care could have been discovered.[24] It has no application where the injured party's negligence is prior in point of time,[25] and where the railroad company by the exercise of reasonable care might have avoided the consequences of his negligence.[26] In some jurisdictions there has arisen by statute what is known as the modern doctrine of comparative negligence, by which the contributory negligence of the person injured does not wholly relieve the railroad company from liability but entitles it to a credit only in reduction of the amount of its liability.[27] Under these statutes where both the railroad company and the injured party are at fault in producing the injury, the injured party may recover, but the amount of such recovery is diminished in proportion to the amount of his fault;[28] but he can recover nothing if, notwith-such that the railroad company ought to know that such inattention will almost necessarily produce the injury. Georgia Pac. R. Co. v. Lee, 92 Ala. 262, 9 So. 230.

The want of such care as very prudent men take of their own concerns does not constitute such gross negligence as will render the railroad company liable, if the person injured, by his own negligence contributes to his injury. Evansville, etc., R. Co. v. Lowdermilk, 15 Ind. 120.

In Kentucky "wilful neglect" applies only to actions for loss of life involving punitive damages; and in an action for injuries to a horse and wagon sustained by the negligent operation of a train at a crossing, contributory negligence of the driver is a good defense, although gross negligence on the part of the train employees in failing to give signals is shown. Co., 66 S. C. 246, 44 S. Where ordinary care is exercised in an endeavor to escape the consequences of the company's negligence after it is apparent that the railroad company is negligent, the in-standing the company's negligence, the injury was caused entirely by his own negligence or by his consent,[29] or if he could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the injury;[30] or if the railroad company itself was in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care.[31]

(B) Effect of Statutory Provisions. The rule of contributory negligence is ordinarily not changed or abrogated by reason of a statute or ordinance imposing a liability on account of the violation thereof, by which an injury results.[32] Thus where a person receives an injury at a crossing by reason of his own contributory negligence, he cannot recover therefor notwithstanding there is a statute or ordinance imposing a liability upon the railroad company for damages sustained by reason of its failure to give the statutory signals,[33] or to keep a proper lookout on its trains or cars,[34] or to maintain sign-boards at crossings,[35] or to maintain safe crossings,[36] unless the statute or ordinance imposes an absolute liability for the damages so caused.[37]

(c) Comparative Negligence.[38] Under the doctrine of comparative negligence, which in most jurisdictions is either abolished or no longer recognized,[39] a person injured at a railroad crossing can recover, although negligent, if his negligence is slight and that of the railroad company is gross as compared therewith;[40] but if the injured party's negligence contributes to his injury he cannot recover unless he can prove a greater degree of negligence on the part of the railroad company.[41]

b. Children and Others Under Disability — (i) In General — (a) Children. Where a child incapable of knowing and avoiding danger is injured at a railroad crossing, by the negligence of the railroad company, the incapacity of the child shields it from responsibility for contributory negligence.[42] But where the child is shown to have sufficient mental capacity to appreciate danger, while ordinarily he is not bound to exercise the same degree of care and caution that an adult is bound to exercise in like circumstances,[43] he is at least bound to exercise such care and diligence as can be reasonably expected, under all the circumstances, from one of his age and intelligence,[44] or which he is shown to pos-failure to comply with such sections, contributory negligence is no defense.

Evidence.—A remark by the child, a boy of nine years old, that he climbed over the drawhead instead of passing through the open space because he would get mashed if he passed between the cars, does not conclusively show that he appreciated the danger of his act, where his testimony, taken as a whole, renders the inference permissible that this remark was made in the light of subsequent events, and not because he anticipated what happened. (B) Old, Infirm, or Afflicted Persons. A person who is aged and feeble,[55] or deaf,[56] has defective eyesight,[57] or is otherwise afflicted,[58] is bound to exercise ordinary care in approaching or going over a railroad crossing, taking into consideration his condition and the surrounding circumstances at the time. If some of his senses are defective he must be more vigilant in the use of his remaining senses,[59] and it has been held that his infirmity does not excuse him from exercising the same degree of care that an ordinarily prudent person in the possession of his natural faculties would have exercised under the circumstances.[60]

(C) Intoxicated Persons. That a person injured at a railroad crossing is intoxicated at the time does not absolve him from his contributory negligence in failing to exercise ordinary care in crossing the track,[61] and the fact that he is intoxicated may be a circumstance for the consideration of the jury in determining whether or not he used due care.[62]

(II) USE OF DEFECTIVE OR OBSTRUCTED CROSSING. In accordance with the above rule a child, if of sufficient age and intelligence, may be guilty of contributory negligence in going over a defective or obstructed crossing, whether or not he is so negligent depending upon his age and intelligence and the circumstances at the particular time and crossing,[63] and ordinarily being a question for the jury.[64]

(III) DUTY TO STOP, LOOK, AND LISTEN. Likewise it is the duty of a child of sufficient age and intelligence to appreciate danger to use proper care in looking and listening before attempting to cross a railroad crossing, and a failure to do so, whereby injury results, is contributory negligence,[65] especially where there is an obstruction to the view or hearing at the particular time and crossing.[66]

65. Shirk v. Wabash R. Co., 14 Ind. App. 126, 42 N. E. 656 (holding that a child twelve years old is guilty of contributory negligence in crossing, although it appears that the train was being run at a negligent rate of speed, but that the bell was rung and whistle sounded as it approached the crossing, and that the child when within five feet of the track could have seen the train approaching); Studley v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 48 Minn. 249, 51 N. W. 115 (holding that a girl of seventeen and of good faculties, who attempts to cross a crossing at a public highway, is negligent where the train could have been seen for some distance before it reached the crossing, and she lived near the crossing and knew of the passage of trains); Walker v. Wabash R. Co., 193 Mo. 453, 92 S. W. 83 (person injured held to be guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law); Tucker v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 124 N. Y. 308, 26 N. E. 916, 21 Am. St. Rep. 670 [reversing 11 N. Y. Suppl. 692] (holding that a boy twelve years old who undertakes to cross a railroad track at a point where a number of tracks constantly in use cross a street is guilty of contributory negligence, where it appears that the engine by which he was killed could have been seen two blocks away, eleven feet before reaching the track, and for a mile when standing just at the side of it, and that the boy was not seen to turn his head in the direction of the approaching train after he got within eleven feet of the track); Serano v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 114 N. Y. App. Div. 684, 99 N. Y. Suppl. 1103 [reversed on the facts in 188 N. Y. 156, 80 N. E. 1025, 17 Am. St. Rep. 833]; Cox v. New York Cent. R. Co., 69 N. Y. App. Div. 451, 74 N. Y. A boy twelve years old may have sufficient mental capacity to know that he ought to stop, look, and listen before going upon the tracks, and may be guilty of such contributory negligence as to bar a recovery for his death. Bracken v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 22.

66. Little Rock, etc., R. Co. v. Cullen, 54 Ark. 431, 16 S. W. 169; Martin v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 176 Pa. St. 444, 35 Atl. 183; Wilson v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 132 Pa. St. 37, 18 Atl. 1087 (holding, however, that plaintiff is not guilty of contributory negligence where, before going on the track, he looked both ways and listened, and neither saw nor heard a train approaching on that track, although there was another train passing over the crossing on another track between which and the place where he stood three other tracks intervened); Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stone, 88 Va. 310, 13 S. E. 432 (holding that where a boy of thirteen years, familiar with the railroad crossing at which, on account of a deep cut, a train could not be seen until one was on the track, drives upon it with his ears covered up, although he had just been told that the train was late and would probably reach the crossing at about the same time he did, is

It is also contributory negligence on the part of a deaf person to attempt to cross without looking.[67]

(iv) Effect of Directions of Railroad Employees. Although a child has the capacity to appreciate the danger at a railroad crossing, yet where he attempts to cross in response to an invitation or direction of a railroad employee stationed by the railroad company to guard the crossing and to tell the public when to cross and when not, and is injured, he is not guilty of contributory negligence.[68]

c. Use of Defective or Obstructed Crossings[69] — (i) In General. One passing over a railroad crossing obstructed by cars or otherwise is bound to observe such care as a reasonably prudent man would exercise under the peculiar circumstances of the case; otherwise he will be guilty of contributory negligence.[70] guilty of contributory negligence, although the train was running at a high rate of speed and the whistle was not sounded). Compare Elkins v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 115 Mass. 190, holding that the fact that a boy ten years old had the lappets of his cap tied over his ears, and had previous knowledge that the railroad crossed the highway at the place of the accident, but did not tell his companion of it, who was driving, nor look out for the train, is not conclusive against him on the issue of ordinary care, there being evidence that they did not know that they were at the crossing and had no warning by a sign-board, bell, or whistle.

67. Alabama.— Birmingham, R., etc., Co. v. Bowers, 110 Ala. 328, 20 So. 345.

Illinois.— Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Buckner, 28 Ill. 299, 81 Am. Dec. 282, holding that it is negligence for a deaf person to drive an unmanageable horse across a railroad track when a train is approaching, it being his duty to keep a good lookout and avoid the danger; and that it is no excuse that the horse rushed upon the track near a crossing, or was driven there to avoid an engine.

Michigan.— Phillips v. Detroit, etc., R. Co., 111 Mich. 274, 69 N. W. 496, 66 Am. St. Rep. 392, holding that a deaf person, before driving across a railroad track, must look in both directions, although it is necessary to stand up in the vehicle to see over obstructions to the view of the tracks, and although another person has recently passed over the tracks in safety.

Deafness is not an excuse for the negligence of a person who, when about to cross a track, sees the smoke of a locomotive, but without stopping to find in what direction it is coming drives on and is injured. E. 406, holding that it is not negligence for a boy eleven years old to pass between uncoupled cars, he having seen the engineer leave his engine and being directed to pass through such opening by the flagman in charge of the crossing. Compare Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Hare, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 18, 23 S. W. 42, holding that the fact that a boy on a railroad track at a crossing became confused at the shouts and signals of a brakeman on a train trying to direct his attention to the engine following it, and that he stopped and stood on the track trying to understand him until too late, does not render the railroad company liable for the injury from the engine.

New York.— Collins v. New York, etc., R. Co., 92 Hun 563, 26 N. Y. Suppl. 942 [affirmed in 154 N. Y. 740, 49 N. E. 1095].

Pennsylvania.— Rusterholtz v. New York, etc., R. Co., 191 Pa. St. 390, 43 Atl. 208 (holding that if plaintiff knew of another way, which was safe, he was bound to take it); Schmidt v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 149 Pa. St. 357, 24 Atl. 218; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. McTighe, 46 Pa. St. 316.

Texas.—International, etc., R. Co. v. Locke, (Civ. App. 1902) 67 S. W. 1082, holding that an attempt to pass around a hand-car left standing on a railroad crossing, whereby the driver's team became frightened and he was thrown out and injured, does not show contributory negligence.

Wisconsin.— White v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 102 Wis. 489, 78 N. W. 585.

(II) USE OF DEFECTIVE CROSSING. While the mere fact that a person uses a railroad crossing which he knows to be defective does not necessarily render him guilty of negligence,[71] one with such knowledge, in using a crossing, is bound to exercise ordinary care and prudence to avoid injury, and cannot recover for injuries which he could have avoided by the exercise of such care and prudence,[72]

See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 1037.

A person having urgent reasons to cross may depart from the street or highway and go around a blockade which is left on the crossing for an unreasonable time upon the private grounds of the company without thereby becoming a trespasser; nor does his continuing straight across the tracks instead of returning to the crossing make him such. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Mayer, 112 Ill. App. 149, holding also that the extreme coldness of the weather would furnish such an urgency.

A person about to cross has a right to assume that the entire width of the road is in proper condition, and where it does not appear that such person knows the condition of the crossing or that in the darkness he can see the defect which causes the accident, his deflection within the road from its usually traveled part is not negligence. Southern R. Co. v. Posey, 124 Ala. 486, 26 So. 914.

71. Indiana.— Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Leachman, 161 Ind. 512, 69 N. E. 253.

Michigan.— Thayer v. Flint, etc., R. Co., 93 Mich. 150, 53 N. W. 216 (holding that the fact that a person knows of the defect does not relieve the railroad company from liability for an injury caused by his horse taking fright at the whistling of an engine and turning over the buggy owing to such defect); Maltby v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 52 Mich. 108, 17 N. W. 717.

Minnesota.— Kelly v. Southern Minn. R. Co., 28 Minn. 98, 9 N. W. 588.

Missouri.— Nixon v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 141 Mo. 425, 42 S. W. 942; Harper v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 70 Mo. App. 604, holding that, although a rider of a horse knows of the defective condition of a railroad crossing, he is not bound to abandon it unless its use is necessarily dangerous to an ordinarily careful man.

North Dakota.— Johnson v. Great Northern R. Co., 7 N. D. 284, 75 N. W. 250, holding that one who drives a loaded wagon over a defective crossing, and has his wagon broken down by such condition of the crossing, is not necessarily negligent.

Texas.— St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Smith, (Civ. App. 1908) 107 S. W. 638 (holding that an attempt to cross a bridge at a crossing in the night-time, with knowledge of a hole therein, is not conclusive evidence of contributory negligence); Cowans v. Ft. Worth, etc., R. Co., 40 Tex. Civ. App. 539, 89 S. W. 116 (holding that a drayman using a crossing at the implied invitation of a railroad company may recover for injuries received by reason of a defect therein, where he exercised ordinary care under the circumstances, although he knew that there was danger attending the use thereof); Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Neill, (Civ. App. 1895) 30 S. W. 369; International, etc., R. Co. v. Robinson, (Civ. App. 1894) 27 S. W. 564 (holding that the jury should consider, in determining whether plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence, not only whether he exercised sufficient care in driving over the crossing, but also whether under the circumstances an ordinarily prudent man would have attempted to cross there). Compare Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Evans, (Civ. App. 1906) 92 S. W. 1077, holding that one using a private crossing with knowledge that it is defective is guilty of contributory negligence barring a recovery.

See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," §§ 1038, 1041.

72. Alabama.— McAdory v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 109 Ala. 636, 19 So. 905, holding that, although an excavation at a crossing is left unguarded, if the person injured knows of its location and that it is unguarded and without lights and signals of warning, and he could have avoided the injury by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, he is chargeable with contributory negligence.

Georgia.— Evans v. Charleston, etc., R. Co., 108 Ga. 270, 33 S. E. 901, holding that where a person, notwithstanding his knowledge of the defect, undertakes to cross when there is no emergency or necessity for incurring the risk, he cannot recover.

Kansas.—Reynolds v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 70 Kan. 340, 78 Pac. 801; Artman v. Kansas Cent. R. Co., 22 Kan. 296.

Missouri.— Schonhoff v. Jackson Branch R. Co., 97 Mo. 151, 10 S. W. 618 (holding that where one negligently drives into an excavation he cannot recover for injuries thereby sustained, although such excavation was left unguarded); Harper v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 70 Mo. App. 604; Madison v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 60 Mo. App. 599.

New Jersey.— Sonn v. Erie, etc., R. Co., 66 N. J. L. 428, 49 Atl. 458 [affirmed in 67 N. J. L. 350, 51 Atl. 1109].

Pennsylvania.— Gates v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 4; Gramlich v. Germantown Branch R. Co., 9 Phila. 78, holding that driving a loaded cart across a track where the ground is soft and without planking is negligence precluding a recovery.

Texas.— Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Montgomery, 85 Tex. 64, 19 S. W. 1015; Dallas, etc., R. Co. v. Able, 72 Tex. 150, 9 S. W. 871 (holding that where a track-laying machine had passed a crossing for such a distance that plaintiff might reasonably have inferred that the track had been laid for a time more than sufficient to permit the crossing to be put in order, he is not negligent in going upon the especially where the danger of crossing is exceedingly great and obvious.[73] A person is not guilty of contributory negligence for failing to discover and avoid a defect in the crossing of which he is ignorant, and which he would not be likely to see in an ordinary use of the crossing.[74]

(III) Passing Over, Between, or Under Standing Trains or Cars. As a general rule one attempting to pass over, between, or under trains or cars standing on a railroad crossing shows such lack of ordinary care and prudence as renders him guilty of contributory negligence and prevents him from recovering for injuries received thereby, although the railroad company itself is negligent in obstructing the crossing or in moving such trains or cars,[75] unless the railroad track without stopping to inspect it); International, etc., R. Co. v. Lewis, (Civ. App. 1901) 63 S. W. 1091, (Civ. App. 1901) 64 S. W. 1011; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Neill, (Civ. App. 1895) 30 S. W. 369.

Where a vehicle becomes fastened or stalled on a crossing, by reason of a defect in the crossing, it is the duty of one in charge of such vehicle to look out and watch for a train, and use all of his efforts to warn one coming of his position and to extricate himself as soon as possible, and if he fails in any one of these requirements and such failure contributes to an injury resulting from such collision, he cannot recover. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Dunn, 56 Pa. St. 280. But the fact that such person did not inspect the crossing to see whether defendant had discharged its duty to keep it repaired, and did not look at his watch to see if it was about train time, would not make him guilty of contributory negligence where it appears that the vehicle would not have been stalled had the crossing been in good condition. Bullock v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 105 N. C. 180, 10 S. E. 980.

That a person does not cross along that part of the street which is planked between the rails of the railroad does not render him guilty of contributory negligence, it not being obviously unsafe to cross at such point, that portion of the street being commonly used by the public, and the cause of his injury being a projecting spike of a railroad tie buried in the sand. Dillingham v. Fields, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 29 S. W. 214.

That a horse not shown to be of bad character balked in attempting to draw a heavy load over a railroad crossing left in a very improper condition by the railroad company is not such negligence as to prevent plaintiff from recovering for an injury occasioned by a collision with the train. Stucke v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 9 Wis. 202.

75. Alabama.— Pannell v. Nashville, etc., R. Co., 97 Ala. 298, 12 So. 236. But see Southern R. Co. v. Prather, 119 Ala. 588, 24 So. 836, 72 Am. St. Rep. 949, holding that it is not negligence per se to attempt to drive across a street which a railroad company has obstructed by pushing cars into it from opposite sides on different tracks, leaving a space so that by passing in front of a car on one track making a short turn and then passing the cars on the other side the street may be crossed without leaving it.

District of Columbia.— Spencer v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 4 Mackey 138, 54 Am. Rep. 269. But see Grant v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 2 MacArthur 277, holding that a pedestrian is neither a trespasser nor guilty of contributory negligence in climbing between the cars of a train which is obstructing the crossing where it would be necessary for him to walk two blocks in order to get around the obstruction.

Georgia.— Southern R. Co. v. Mouchet, 3 Ga. App. 266, 59 S. E. 927.

Kentucky.— Jones v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 104 S. W. 258, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 825, 13 L. R. A. N. S. 1066; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Broughton, 78 S. W. 876, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1752.

Michigan.— Bird v. Flint, etc., R. Co., 86 Mich. 79, 48 N. W. 691, holding that a woman twenty-seven years old who endeavors to climb over the couplings of two cars of a freight train, with engine attached, and is killed by the sudden starting thereof is guilty of gross contributory negligence.

Missouri.— Wilkins v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 101 Mo. 93, 13 S. W. 893; Hudson v. Wabash Western R. Co, 101 Mo. 13, 14 S. W. 15 [reversing 32 Mo. App. 667], 123 Mo. 445, 27 S. W. 717; Stillson v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 67 Mo. 671, holding that the fact that a street is obstructed does not justify a pedestrian's attempt to pass between two trains of cars standing rear to rear on the same track.

New Jersey.— Kriwinski v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 65 N. J. L. 392. 47 Atl. 447, holding that a traveler in attempting to continue on his way by crossing over the cars without the knowledge of the trainmen assumes the risk of danger from the starting of the train and hence cannot recover for an injury caused thereby.

New York.— O'Mara v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 18 Hun 192.

company after seeing the danger could have avoided the consequences;[76] and this is true even though the obstruction is in violation of a statute or ordinance,[77] or is unnecessarily left on the crossing for a long time,[78] or no engine is attached to the train or cars.[79] In some cases such acts of a traveler are held to be contributory negligence as a matter of law.[80] But it is not contributory negligence for one to climb through a freight train after an assurance by the brakemen that he has plenty of time,[81] or to cross between cars in going to a fire.[82]

(IV) Crossing While Gates Are Closed. Where the gates across a highway at a railroad crossing are closed, a person attempting to cross generally has sufficient warning that the crossing is for the time being to be used for the passage of trains and if he is injured in such attempt he is ordinarily guilty of contributory negligence barring a recovery,[83] unless the circumstances at the particular time and crossing are such that the fact that the gates are closed is not a warning of danger.[84]

Cutting a train of cars on a side-track leaving some on one side and some on the other of a highway, whereby the track is partially obscured, is not an invitation to the public to cross, without using ordinary precautions. Passman v. West Jersey, etc., R. Co., 68 N. J. L. 719, 54 Atl. 869, 96 Am. St. Rep. 573, 61 L. R. A. 609.

80. Kansas.— Howard v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 41 Kan. 403, 21 Pac. 267, holding a woman's attempt to climb over a freight train obstructing the crossing to be under the circumstances contributory negligence as a matter of law.

Maryland.— Lewis v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 38 Md. 588, 17 Am. Rep. 521, holding that one who attempts to pass between cars which block a public crossing in a large city without looking or inquiring whether an engine is attached to the train, when he could have crossed without risk by going one block further, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

Minnesota.— Wherry v. Duluth, etc., R. Co., 64 Minn. 415, 67 N. W. 223, attempting to climb between cars of a train which it is apparent is liable to start at any moment.

Missouri.— Corcoran v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 105 Mo. 399, 16 S. W. 411, 24 Am. St. Rep. 394.

South Carolina.— Weaver v. Southern R. Co., 76 S. C. 49, 56 S. E. 657, 121 Am. St. Rep. 934, failure to heed such warning tends to show gross negligence.

Texas.— See Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Walker, (Civ. App. 1907) 106 S. W. 705, holding that such an attempt is not negligence as a matter of law; but whether it is negligence depends upon the attendant circumstances.

C.) 135], holding that where the gates are generally kept down at night without regard to the presence or absence of passing trains and a pedestrian has knowledge of that fact, the circumstance that the gates are down when he is run over in attempting to cross the tracks at night is not of itself a warning to him of the presence of danger, and contributory negligence

d. Duty to Stop, Look, and Listen [85] — (i) In General — (a) General Rule. As a general rule a traveler on a highway approaching a railroad crossing is bound to exercise ordinary care and prudence, that is, such care and prudence as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise under like circumstances, in looking,[86] or listening,[87] or looking and listening,[88] for approaching trains before going on cannot therefore be imputed to him from that fact alone.

85. As affected by directions of railroad employees see infra, X, F, 10, f.

nor is it of universal application, but has exceptions under exceptional circumstances which may excuse the traveler for his failure,[1] as where he is misled or deceived without his fault by appearances likely to deceive or mislead an ordinarily prudent person,[2] where his efforts would have been unavailing and the injury would not have been avoided by the use of such precautions on his part,[3] where the surroundings otherwise excuse such failure,[4] or where the injury could have been avoided notwithstanding the contributory negligence.[5]

(B) Opportunity to See or Hear Trains. The above general rule is especially applicable where the conditions at the particular time and crossing are such that a traveler approaching the crossing has an opportunity to see or hear an approaching train in time to stop in a place of safety or to safely retreat. It is his duty under such circumstances, particularly where he is familiar with the crossing, to look and listen when such opportunity presents itself and if he fails to do so, or if he looks or listens but fails to see or hear the approaching train, he is guilty of contributory negligence barring a recovery.[6] The fact that the similar circumstances it would not be contributory negligence in a person who was a stranger to the crossing to do so.[15]

(D) Duty of Pedestrians. A pedestrian on the highway has the duty of looking and listening before going on a railroad crossing as well as other travelers; and if he fails to do so he is guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery,[16] especially where there is an opportunity to see or hear the approaching train before going on the track.[17] A pedestrian, however, is not usually bound to stop as well as to look and listen before going on a railroad crossing.[18]

(E) Duty to Both Look and Listen. Under the rule that it is contributory negligence for a traveler to fail to look and listen before going on a railroad crossing, it is not sufficient that the traveler either looks or listens before going on the track, but he must make use of all his faculties to discover the approaching train, that is, he must both look and listen;[19] and where the use of either of these facul-with crossing and having knowledge that trains are about due.

ties would have given sufficient warning to enable him to avoid the danger, injury is conclusive proof of contributory negligence.[20]

(F) Duty to Look in Both Directions. As a general rule it is not sufficient that the traveler looks in one direction only, but he is guilty of negligence if he goes upon the track without looking and listening in both directions; and if by reason of such failure he receives an injury which he might have avoided had he looked prudently, he cannot recover damages even though the railroad company failed to give the proper signals or was otherwise negligent.[21] Such a failure, however, is not necessarily contributory negligence per se, as it may be excused by the particular circumstances of the case,[22] and where the danger is more to be apprehended from one direction, he may, to that extent, relax his vigilance in the opposite direction.[23]

(G) Time of Running of Trains. While a traveler approaching a railroad crossing is not bound to inquire as to the schedules or the time when trains are expected to pass,[24] he is guilty of contributory negligence if he goes upon the track without looking and listening when he knows a train is about due or is about to pass.[25] He is bound to exercise ordinary care and prudence in looking and listening for approaching trains, whether or not he might reasonably expect one to pass at the time,[26] although if he knows or has reason to suppose that a train is not due or has just passed he is not bound to use the same degree of care as though the train were just due,[27] especially where there are obstructions interfering with sight and sound.[28] This rule applies, although the train is running behind time,[29] or is an irregular or extra one,[30] particularly when from all the circumstances the traveler must have known the fact.[31]

Although ordinary care does not usually require a traveler to look and listen constantly at all points in his passage,[41] it does require that he should look just before going upon the track or so near thereto as to enable him to go across before a train within the range of his view going at the usual rate of speed would reach the crossing,[42] or in case he is riding or driving at such a distance that he can check his horse or team in the event of its becoming frightened.[43] Likewise ordinary care may require a traveler not only to look and listen once but where the circumstances at the particular time and crossing reasonably require it, to look and listen again before crossing,[44] or even a number of times,[45] as where his first looking and listening is at such a distance that a train which could not then be seen or heard would have time to advance before he reached the crossing so as to endanger him;[46] the question of negligence in failing to look and listen again depending upon the circumstances of the particular case and ordinarily being a question for the jury,[47] although under some circumstances it may be negligence as a matter of law.[48]

One knowing that he is approaching a track cannot assume that the driver will be careful, but must look out for himself; and if he does not know such fact he must use such care as one with his knowledge would ordinarily exercise. Crawford v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 56 N. Y. Super. Ct. 607, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 339 [affirmed in 121 N. Y. 652, 24 N. E. 1092].

An occupant of a motor vehicle who is in such a position therein as to be able to see and hear an approaching train before going on a crossing, and who is able to appreciate the danger, is under a duty to look and listen to ascertain whether a train is approaching before crossing the track, and his failure to do so is contributory negligence precluding a recovery for his injury or death. Read v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 123 N. Y. App. Div. 228, 107 N. Y. Suppl. 1068 (holding this rule to apply to an occupant of an automobile who had he looked at any time while the train was covering two thousand feet from the point at which it was visible from the crossing must have seen the train and an exclamation from him would have sufficed to cause the chauffeur to stop in time to avoid the accident); Noakes v. New York Cent., etc., R. A woman riding with her husband is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in failing to look around her husband to observe the approach of a train from his side of a buggy. Heater v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 90 N. Y. App. Div. 495, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 524.

An occupant unfamiliar with the highway and crossing has a right to assume that dangerous places will be pointed out and in the absence of warning that he is approaching a railroad crossing cannot be regarded as negligent as a matter of law if he exercises that degree of prudence which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under the circumstances, although it is his duty to warn the driver of approaching obvious danger. Henn v. Long Island R. Co., 51 N. Y. App. Div. 292, 65 N. Y. Suppl. 21. Nor is such a person necessarily guilty of contributory negligence in failing to request the driver to stop, look, and listen for approaching trains. Wilson v. New York, etc., R. Co., 18 R. (II) Where View or Hearing Is Obstructed [75] — (A) In General. Where the view or hearing of a traveler approaching a railroad crossing is obstructed, he is under the duty of using greater care and prudence in looking and listening for approaching trains than where there is no obstruction.[76] The degree of care which he must exercise in such cases, particularly where he is familiar with the crossing, must be in proportion to the increase of danger and must be such care and prudence in looking and listening as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise under like circumstances of obstructions to view or hearing; [77] and if he fails to use such care, whereby he is injured, he is guilty of contributory negligence barring a recovery,[78] although the obstructions to sight or hearing are caused or permitted by the railroad company itself.[79] Under such circumstances it is the traveler's duty not only to look and listen but to resort to other means to ascertain whether a train is approaching,[80] and to so dispose himself as to make those powers of observation more effective,[81] and perhaps to stop.[82] If, however, the traveler exercises such care, he is not guilty of contributory negligence,[83] and has a right to assume that the railroad company will use proper precautions on its part,[84] such as giving the proper signals.[85] The question whether or not a traveler exercises proper care and prudence in looking and listening where there is an obstruction depends upon the circumstances at the particular time and crossing and is usually for the jury,[86] although the circumstances may be such as to make his acts contributory negligence as a matter of law.[87]

(B) Duty to Stop Before Reaching Crossing. Where the view or hearing of a traveler approaching a railroad crossing is so obstructed that he cannot otherwise satisfy himself whether it is prudent to cross, it is his duty, where he is familiar with the crossing or aware of such facts, to stop and look or listen before going upon the tracks,[88] particularly where the obstruction to sight or hearing is caused to be rung, the presumption being that it was rung.

wise avoid the injury his failure to do so is contributory negligence as a matter of law.[92]

(c) Duty to Go Ahead to Look and Listen. Ordinary precaution may also require that a driver of a vehicle should not only stop to look and listen where his view or hearing is obstructed, but that he should get out of his vehicle and approach the track and look along it in both directions for approaching trains.[93] This precaution, however, is not required as a matter of law; but whether or not it should be taken is usually a question for the jury dependent upon the circumstances at the particular time and crossing;[94] and ordinarily, if a driver exercises due care in other respects, as in looking or listening, he is not bound to go ahead of his vehicle for that purpose,[95] although it has been held that if by the exercise of such precaution the approaching train could have been seen, a failure to do so is contributory negligence as a matter of law.[96]

(d) Time and Place For Looking and Listening. It is the duty of a traveler approaching a railroad crossing to look and listen for approaching trains wherever an opportunity of seeing or hearing such trains presents itself;[97] and although he looks and listens or stops, looks, and listens at a point where there are obstructions to the sight or hearing, if he subsequently reaches a point where an approaching train can be seen or heard, it is his duty to look and listen again, and his failure to do so is such negligence as will bar him from recovering for his injury.[98] But

(E) Speed of Person Injured in Approaching Crossing. It is especially negligent in one whose view or hearing is obstructed to ride or drive on a railroad crossing, without exercising proper care in looking or listening for an approaching train, at a speed which not only interferes with his hearing an approaching train, but also makes it difficult or impossible for him to stop after discovery of his peril,[1] although the railroad company itself is negligent in running the train at an unlawful rate of speed,[2] or in failing to give the proper signals of its approach.[3] Under such circumstances the traveler should approach the crossing so slowly and carefully as to give him an opportunity to look or listen for an approaching train, or to give him complete control of his team or vehicle and enable him to stop instantly if the occasion should require.[4]

(F) Crossing Behind Passing Train. An attempt to cross a railroad track immediately behind a passing train, where the traveler's view or hearing is obstructed by such train or otherwise, without exercising due care in looking and listening for approaching trains or cars, is contributory negligence barring a recovery,[5] especially where the traveler is familiar with the crossing and knows

(H) Darkness or Stormy Weather. That the weather is dark or stormy does not excuse a traveler approaching a railroad crossing from looking or listening for approaching trains; and if he fails to exercise ordinary care in this respect, whereby he is injured,[16] as where, notwithstanding the weather is dark and stormy, he fails to look for or see an approaching train or cars which are plainly visible at some distance by reason of a headlight, or other lights or signals thereon,[17] he cannot recover damages, although the railroad company is itself guilty of negligence,[18] as in failing to give the proper signals,[19] or in running at an unlawful rate of speed.[20] Whether or not the traveler is guilty of contributory negligence in such cases is usually a question for the jury depending upon the circumstances of the particular case.[21]

(I) Smoke, Dust, or Steam. Where a traveler's view at a railroad crossing is obstructed by dust, smoke, or steam from a passing train or otherwise, it is his duty to wait until his view becomes unobstructed before going upon the tracks; and it is contributory negligence for him to attempt to cross without waiting for the smoke or dust to clear away,[22] or without stopping to listen for approaching trains,[23] particularly where the traveler is familiar with the crossing and knows that trains frequently pass and are likely to pass at any moment.[24] It has been held, however, that a failure to wait until the smoke and dust have cleared away is not negligence as a matter of law.[25]

(J) Standing Cars. Where the view of a traveler is obstructed by standing cars, he is negligent if he attempts to cross without exercising proper care in looking and listening, or if necessary, in stopping to look and listen for an approaching train as soon as it can be seen,[26] as immediately after passing the standing cars which obstruct his view,[27] although the question whether or not he is so negligent depends upon the circumstances of the particular case and is usually for the jury.[28]

(L) Riding in Covered Vehicle. That one is traveling in a covered vehicle which interferes with his sight or hearing does not excuse him from looking or listening for approaching trains, but rather increases his duty in this respect; and if in such a case he fails to exercise ordinary care in the use of his senses to ascertain an approaching train, he is guilty of contributory negligence,[33] as where he drives on the crossing at a rapid rate of speed without looking or listening for approaching trains.[34] This rule is especially applicable where the traveler in such vehicle is familiar with the crossing and with the running of trains thereat,[35] and there is an opportunity to see or hear an approaching train in time to stop in a place of safety.[36]

e. Reliance Upon Precautions of Railroad Company — (I) In General. As a general rule a traveler approaching a railroad crossing in the exercise of ordinary care is not bound to anticipate negligence on the part of the railroad company;[37] but on the other hand he has a right to assume that the company will operate its road or trains with the care and vigilance required by law or custom,[38] unless the circumstances indicate that it will not do so.[39] This right, however, is not an unqualified one; and if the traveler goes upon the crossing without taking proper precautions under ordinary circumstances, the fact that he relies upon the usual or proper precautions on the part of the railroad company will not excuse him,[40] as where he fails to exercise ordinary care and prudence in looking and listening for an approaching train in reliance upon a custom of the company to side-track its trains at that point,[41] or in reliance upon the usual custom of the company as to the order of running its trains.[42]

(II) SIGNALS, FLAGMEN, AND GATES AT CROSSINGS. Where a railroad company maintains a flagman, gates, or other signals or warnings at a railroad crossing whether voluntarily,[43] or by law or custom, the public generally has a right to presume that these safeguards will be reasonably maintained and attended,[44] and in the absence of knowledge to the contrary,[45] the fact that the gates are open,[46] or automatic bells not ringing,[47] or that the flagmen is absent from his post or if present is not giving a warning of danger,[48] is an assurance of safety and an implied invitation to cross upon which a traveler familiar with the crossing may rely and act within reasonable limits, on the presumption that it is safe for him to go on the crossing. degree of care required in attempting to cross. Thus it has been held that the presence of a flagman, gates, or other signals at a crossing and their indication of safety does not relieve a traveler from looking and listening,[55] or stopping, looking, and listening,[56] before crossing, although in some jurisdictions it is held otherwise.[57] Nor will such circumstances excuse a traveler for not avoiding a danger of which he is conscious or which he has an opportunity of avoiding,[58] as where he hears or sees the approaching train and attempts to cross without taking the proper precautions,[59] or where he has notice that the gates are not being operated,[60] or he has only seen a flagman at the crossing occasionally,[61] or where he misinterprets signals given by a flagman stationed at the crossing.[62]

trains.[71] The question whether or not the traveler exercised such care under the circumstances is usually a question for the jury.[72] It has been held that a person using a private crossing over a railroad in the vicinity of a public crossing has the right to rely upon a giving of proper signals at the public crossing.[73]

(IV) RATE OF SPEED OF TRAIN. A person approaching the tracks at a public crossing also has a right to presume, until the contrary is made apparent,[74] that a train approaching the crossing will comply with a statute or ordinance limiting its rate of speed thereat, and that it will not run at a greater rate of speed.[75] neglect of a railroad company to give warning of the approach of its trains even when so gross as to amount to a declaration that the way is safe for travelers upon the highway does not absolve a person about to cross from the duty of making an independent observation for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a train is coming to the crossing; and a failure in that regard is ordinarily a failure to exercise that reasonable degree of prudence which the law requires of all persons when approaching these places of known danger.

But the existence of such an ordinance or statute does not relieve a traveler approaching the crossing from exercising ordinary care,[76] nor does the fact that a train is run at an unlawful speed have this effect but is merely to be considered in determining the question of his negligence,[77] the question whether or not the traveler is negligent under such circumstances being a question for the jury.[78]

W. 911, holding that where a brakeman standing at a crossing which was blocked by a standing freight train told plaintiffs who were waiting to drive over the crossing that it would soon be clear and when the train cleared the crossing the brakeman was standing near by and in a position where ance or direction will not excuse a traveler who attempts to cross when the danger in crossing is obvious,[81] as where he knows or might know by using his natural faculties that the train is liable to start at any moment.[82]

(II) Employees in Charge of Signals and Gates at Crossings. Likewise where a person approaching a railroad crossing is signaled by a flagman or watchman that it is safe to cross, he has a right to rely upon such assurance and the same degree of care is not required of him as if there had been no such direction or invitation,[83] especially where such signal is by statute or ordinance an assurance of safety; [84] and it is usually at most a question of fact whether or not one who attempts to cross in reliance upon such signal or direction is guilty of contributory negligence.[85] But he cannot implicitly rely upon the judgment

he could better see the tracks than plaintiffs could, plaintiffs could take into consideration that the brakeman was in a favorable position to see any danger and would doubtless give them warning thereof.

of the flagman or watchman as to his safety in crossing, but aside from such assurance he must use the prudence and caution that a reasonably prudent man would use in like circumstances, and if he fails to do so he is guilty of contributory negligence,[86] as where he fails to look and listen when by so doing the approaching train could have been discovered.[87] That the flagman at the crossing is a third person acting in place of the regular flagman who is absent and is not an employee of the railroad company is immaterial in determining whether a traveler is guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross in reliance on the assurance of safety given by such person.[88]

(III) Disregarding Warnings, Signals, and Directions. An attempt to cross a railroad track at a crossing in disregard of warnings, signals, or directions given by a flagman, watchman, or other employee of the railroad company that it is unsafe to do so is contributory negligence barring a recovery,[89] provided the person injured hears and understands the signals.[90]

g. Crossing Near Standing or Approaching Trains or Cars [91] — (I) Crossing Near Standing Trains or Cars. Where there are trains or cars standing on or near a crossing, a person approaching the crossing has a right to assume that they will not be moved without proper warnings or signals, and if he attempts to cross with reasonable care and prudence, he is not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence, the question whether or not he is so negligent usually being one of fact.[92] It is contributory negligence for a person to attempt to cross near 90. Union R. Co. v. State, 72 Md. 153, 19 Atl. 449, holding that it is proper to refuse to instruct that if defendant's watchman at the crossing waved his light and hallooed to deceased to stop plaintiff cannot recover, as it must further appear that deceased heard and understood such signals, in order to defeat a recovery.

91. Where obstructing crossing see supra, X, F, 10, c, (III).

92. California.— Robinson v. Western Pac. R. Co., 48 Cal. 409, holding that one is not guilty of contributory negligence in crossing such trains or cars without using reasonable care and prudence in doing so,[93] as where he attempts to cross when he knows or has reason to know that the trains or cars are liable to be moved at any moment,[94] or where he does not know for certain that the trains or cars are stationary, although he believes them to be so.[95] A driver of a team who starts across a railroad track near standing trains or cars as a general rule assumes the risk of his horse becoming frightened at noises made in the ordinary handling of trains,[96] although it is not necessarily negligent to make such attempt where the horse or team is used to the cars and is reasonably steady and gentle,[97] and it becomes frightened at unexpected and unnecessary over back of a train which has just passed the crossing and stopped and who is injured by the sudden backing of the train without notice.

St. 133, 23 Atl. 898, holding that a person is guilty of contributory negligence in going upon a siding without stopping, looking, and listening, where he knows that the siding is across his path, that two cars are upon it, and that they are to be moved at some time during that day.

95. Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Maisch, 29 Ill. App. 640, holding that where plaintiff admits that he saw the headlight of the engine which struck him when twenty-five feet from the track, but believing it to be stationary did not stop to ascertain with certainty and continued to drive across, he is guilty of gross negligence.

New York.— Eaton v. Erie R. Co., 51 N. Y. 544.

Texas.— Texas Midland R. Co. v. Cardwell, (Civ. App. 1901) 67 S. W. 157, holding that where a horse is frightened by the blowing off of steam, in the absence of anything to show that plaintiff knew that noises.[98] But a driver is under no greater obligation to use care to prevent injury by fright of his horse at a hand-car standing on or near the crossing than he would be under while passing any other object at any other point on the road.[99]

(II) Crossing Near Approaching Trains or Cars [1] — (A) In General. Where a person approaching a railroad crossing sees or knows of an approaching train or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could see or know of its approach in time to prevent an accident, it is his duty to stop until the train has passed,[2] or if he is already on the track when he discovers the approaching train, it is his duty to exercise reasonable care to leave it;[3] and if he fails to do so but voluntarily and unnecessarily attempts to cross in front of the approaching train, he assumes the risk of so doing, and if injured thereby is guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery,[4] unless he is compelled by an imperious the engine was liable to blow off steam, he cannot be held to have assumed that risk.

Wisconsin.— Kalbus v. Abbot, 77 Wis. 621, 46 N. W. 810, holding that the fact that the team had once before run away and was easily frightened did not make it contributory negligence on plaintiff's part to cross a track on which an engine was standing, unless the disposition of the team was such that a person of ordinary prudence would not have attempted to drive it across the track at that time.

in running at an excessive or unlawful rate of speed,[11] or although it is negligent in obscuring the view by cars on parallel tracks,[12] or in failing to have a flagman at the crossing,[13] or although the flagman is not properly attending to his duties.[14] It is not necessarily contributory negligence, however, for a traveler to attempt to cross, although he knows of the approaching train, if it reasonably appears that he will have time to do so;[15] and ordinarily it is a question of fact whether an attempt to cross before an approaching train is contributory negligence,[16] although the circumstances may be such as to make it negligence as a matter of law,[17] as where it appears that the approaching train is so near and running at such a rate of speed that it is reasonably apparent that the train will reach the crossing before the person can get across.[18]

(B) Intervening Incidents Causing Delay. Where a person approaching a crossing knows that the slightest delay or mishap in crossing will put him in extreme peril, his attempt to cross is contributory negligence, although his failure to get across in safety is caused by some intervening incident causing the delay,[19]

as where he stumbles or falls,[20] or where his horse balks when on the track.[21] It has been held, however, that where under ordinary circumstances there is time to cross in safety, the traveler is not chargeable with contributory negligence for failure to anticipate an unusual occurrence, such as a horse pulling back, or his falling upon the track, unless there is reason to anticipate such an occurrence from the circumstances.[22]

11. Proximate Cause of Injury[23] — a. In General. A railroad company is not responsible for an injury which is the result of accident alone without negligence or fault on the part of it or its servants;[24] and even where a railroad company is negligent, in order to hold it responsible for an accident at a railroad crossing on that ground, it must appear that such negligence is the natural and proximate cause of the injury.[25] The company's negligence, however, need not be the sole or immediate cause of the injury, or the nearest in point of time or sequence of events.[26] If the negligence of the railroad company is the last negligent act contributing to the injury without which it would not have occurred, its negligence is the proximate cause of the injury, although some other incidental

Concurrent acts.— Where two acts of negligence, on the part of a railroad company, combined with one lawful act on its part, are shown to be the proximate cause of an injury sustained by one who is without fault on his part, and the result of the wrongful acts, independent of the rightful act, cannot be separated and determined, the railroad is liable for the damages resulting from such combined wrongful and rightful acts. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Davis, 7 Ind. App. 222, 33 N. E. 451. Likewise where there are two proximate causes of the injury, one the negligence of the railroad company, and the other an occurrence happening without fault on the part of the person injured, the railroad company is liable. cause ensues, without contributory negligence on the part of the person injured, which may in some degree aid in inflicting the injury.[27] In addition to other kinds of negligence, the above rule applies where the railroad company is negligent in violating a statute or ordinance requiring the maintenance of gates,[28] or a flagman,[29] at certain crossings.

b. Defects or Obstructions at Crossings. In accordance with the above rule a railroad company is liable for an injury, because of its negligently causing or permitting defects or obstructions at a crossing, only where such defects or obstructions are the proximate cause of the injury,[30] and not where they are not the proximate cause thereof.[31]

App. Civ. Cas. § 64; Morey v. Lake Superior Terminal, etc., R. Co., 125 Wis. 148, 103 N. W. 271, holding that where, by reason of a train's approach at an unlawful speed and without warning, a traveler who had approached within two or three feet of the track became overcome with fear, producing unconsciousness and loss of control over his actions, which caused him to fall forward and partly on the track where the train struck him, the railroad company's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

Where plaintiff is injured in jumping from a street car to escape a threatened collision with a railroad train, and the railroad company fails to ring the bell as the train is approaching the crossing as required by statute (Sayles Annot. Civ. St. (1897) art. 4507) such company is not relieved from liability because the train is actually stopped before collision after causing the injury. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Vollrath, 40 Tex. e. Unlawful Rate of Speed. Negligence in running a train at a rate of speed in violation of a statute or ordinance does not make the railroad company liable for injuries caused by the train, unless the unlawful speed is the proximate cause of the injury.[37] It is not liable on that ground where such negligence is not the proximate cause of the injury for which recovery is sought.[38]

12. Injury Avoidable Notwithstanding Contributory Negligence. Although a person injured at a railroad crossing may be guilty of negligence which to some extent contributes to his injury, yet the railroad company is liable, if notwithstanding such contributory negligence it could by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence have avoided the injury, but fails to do so,[39] after it sees or back toward the rear of the train, stumbles, and falls under the cars); Bosko v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 91 Hun (N. Y.) 320, 36 N. Y. where the railroad employees had reason to know of the injured person's perilous position in time to prevent the injury.[42] It has no application where the injured person's perilous position was not discoverable until it was too late,[43] and in some jurisdictions is held not to apply where the injured party's presence or peril is unknown to those in charge of the train,[44] or merely because the railroad company fails to discover his peril.[45] Nor does it apply where the contributory negligence of the person injured is later in time than the negligence of the railroad company;[46] or where the railroad company is unable, after the discovery of such peril, by the exercise of ordinary care, to avoid the injury,[47] unless its inability to avoid the injury is caused by its own negligence, as in running its train at an unlawful rate of speed.[48] Mere knowledge of the presence of a person on or near a crossing, without knowledge of his actual peril does not make a railroad company responsible for its failure to avoid injuring him,[49] since the railroad company has a right to presume, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, that a person seen on or near a crossing is sui juris and will exercise ordinary care in stopping or in retiring to a place of safety in time to avoid being injured.[50]

person injured,[53] unless, as it has been held, such contributory negligence continues up to the time of the injury and is a contributing and efficient cause thereof.[54] Whether or not a railroad company's servants or employees are guilty of wantonness or wilfulness in inflicting an injury is usually a question for the jury, to be determined from the circumstances of the particular case.[55] Thus the injury may be wantonly or wilfully inflicted by running a train at a high or unlawful rate of speed and without giving the proper signals, when approaching a crossing over a much traveled street or highway, and where the view is obstructed,[56] and the engineer saw or might have seen the person injured, and prevented the injury;[57] or by sending cars across a public crossing, under no control, and without precautions or warnings;[58] or by unnecessarily blowing the whistle, when it is apparent

Where a rapidly moving train is in plain sight of a path used by the public as a convenience at a crossing, the engineer is justified in thinking that a person whom he sees on the path near and approaching the track will not attempt to cross in front of the train, so that his failure to attempt to stop the train until it is too late will not constitute wilful negligence. Wanton negligence distinguished from wilful injury.— Where a person, from his knowledge of existing circumstances and conditions, is conscious that his conduct will probably result in injury, and yet, with reckless indifference, or in disregard of the natural or probable consequences, but without having the intent to injure, does the act, or fails to act, he is guilty of wanton negligence. A purpose or intent to injure is not an ingredient of wanton negligence, and if either of these exists, and damage ensues, the injury is wilful. to those in charge of the engine that horses at the crossing will become frightened thereat.[59] But an injury is not wantonly or wilfully inflicted by the mere fact that the train which inflicts it is being run in violation of a statute or ordinance,[60] as at an unlawful rate of speed,[61] or without giving the proper signals;[62] nor is the starting of a standing train while a person is attempting to climb between the cars such wantonness or wilfulness,[63] unless the railroad company has notice at the time that he is in a position where such movement of the cars will be very dangerous.[64]

b. Unauthorized Acts.[65] Where an act or omission of a railroad employee which causes an injury at a railroad crossing is within the general scope of his employment the railroad company is responsible therefor notwithstanding the particular act or omission is unauthorized,[66] as where a flagman who has been stationed at a crossing neglects to warn travelers or absents himself from his post;[67] and notwithstanding it is done wantonly or maliciously.[68] But unless the railroad company expressly or impliedly assents thereto,[69] it is not responsible for unauthorized acts or omissions not within the general scope of a servant's employment.[70]

14. Actions For Injuries — a. In General — (i) Jurisdiction and Venue. In the absence of statute otherwise, an action for injuries to a person at a railroad crossing is transitory in its nature and may be brought in a state other than that in which the cause of action arose in which defendant operates its road,[71] and in any county through which the road runs.[72] Under some statutes an action for injuries caused by an act of omission, such as a defective crossing, must be brought at the domicile of the company,[73] although if the injury is caused by an act of commission the action may be brought in the parish or county where the injury was received.[74]

(ii) Form of Action. In the absence of statute prescribing a particular form, the proper form of action for injuries at a crossing caused by the unskilfulness or negligence of railroad employees is an action on the case,[75] and not trespass, unless the acts causing the injury are done by the command or with the assent of the company.[76]

(iii) Conditions Precedent. In some jurisdictions the statutes provide that a prescribed notice of the injury must be given to the railroad company before bringing the action,[77] as where the injury is received by reason of a defect in the track at the crossing.[78]

(iv) Limitations.[79] In some jurisdictions there are special statutory provisions regulating limitations of actions for personal injuries against railroad companies,[80] and these provisions generally apply to actions for injuries at crossings.[81]

b. Parties. Where an injury at a railroad crossing is occasioned by the combined negligence of a railroad company and another, plaintiff may sue either or both of them.[82]

c. Pleading — (i) Complaint, Declaration, or Petition — (A) Form and Sufficiency — (1) In General. The rules of pleading in an action for injuries at a railroad crossing are generally regulated by the general rules of pleading in civil actions,[83] particularly those relating to actions for negligence.[84] The complaint, declaration, or petition should allege facts showing plaintiff's peril or danger from being on or near the tracks;[85] and should allege a legal duty and negligence on the part of the railroad company;[86] that the acts or omissions constituting negligence were in the line of the agent's or employee's employment;[87] and that the negligence complained of was the proximate cause of injury for which a recovery is sought.[88] But it need not allege unnecessary or immaterial

W. 1069, holding that it need not be further alleged that the engineer, in charge of the train causing the injury, was warned in sufficient time to stop the train and avoid the injury, or, by the exercise of reasonable care, could have done so.

See 41 Cent. Dig. tit. "Railroads," § 1107.

But compare Wilson v. New York, etc., R. Co., 18 R. I. 491, 29 Atl. 258, holding that a complaint charging negligence whereby a traveler on a highway was killed at the crossing, but which fails to state any particular act or omission of defendant constituting negligence, is demurrable.

Allegations of negligence held sufficient see Southern R. Co. v. Douglass, 144 Ala. 351, 39 So. 268 (that the company, through its servants, "negligently and carelessly ran" a train against plaintiff injuring him); Cahill v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 74 Fed. 285, 20 C. C. A. 184 (holding that an averment that defendant company did "negligently, wilfully, recklessly, wantonly and carelessly" run its engine and cars upon plaintiff at a crossing, etc., is a good charge of negligent injury).

In an action for negligently and unlawfully leaving a car standing on a highway at which plaintiff's horse became frightened and caused her personal injuries, it is unnecessary to explain in the complaint how the horse became frightened or to allege that there was anything unusual about the car calculated to produce such a fright. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Kitley, 118 Ind. 152, 20 N. E. 727. And where it is alleged that the animal was "well broken and not fractious or balky," it need not be alleged that it was of ordinary gentleness. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Slaughter, 167 Ind. 330, 79 N. E. 186, 7 L. R. A. N. S. 597.

92. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Reynolds, 33 Ind. App. 219, 71 N. E. 250.

A motion to make more specific is the proper remedy where the complaint is merely uncertain, and not demurrer. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Wynant, 119 Ind. 539, 20 N. E. 730.

93. Davis v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 75 S. W. 275, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 342 [opinion in 70 S. W. 857, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1125 withdrawn], holding that an allegation in a petition that plaintiff's intestate was "at or near" the private crossing should be construed to mean that she was killed at a place on the track other than the crossing and hence was a trespasser.

94. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Schneider, 40 Ind. App. 38, 80 N. E. 985 (complaint held not to be demurrable as showing contributory negligence); Van Winkle v. New York, etc., R. Co., 34 Ind. App. 476, 73 N. E. 157 (complaint disclosing that defendant was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and therefore demurrable); Rich v. Evansville, etc., R. Co., 31 Ind. App. 10, 66 N. E. 1028 (holding that where the complaint shows contributory negligence, it is insufficient, notwithstanding Acts (1899), p. 58, c. 41, providing that plaintiff shall not be required to allege or prove freedom from contributory negligence); Gividen v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 32 S. W. 612, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 789; International, etc., R. Co. v. Kuehn, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 21 S. W. 58 (allegations not showing contributory negligence); Southern R. Co. v. Stockdon, 106 Va. 693, 56 S. E. 713 (holding that allegations that plaintiff drove upon the track without looking, when he might have done so do not show affirmatively that he was guilty of contributory negligence, and are not bad on demurrer). See also Southern R. Co. v. Crenshaw, 136 Ala. 573, 34 So. 913.

Where other inferences may be deduced from all the facts alleged than that the injury was caused by plaintiff's negligence, a might have avoided the injury notwithstanding plaintiff's negligence.[95] It is also bad if it contains allegations in the alternative,[96] or avers merely conclusions of law,[97] or if one count in the complaint or petition embraces two distinct and independent acts of negligence.[98] In an action for a wanton or wilful injury, a general averment that defendant's servants by certain acts or omissions wantonly or wilfully caused the injury is usually sufficient; [99] but it is not sufficient to allege facts which merely show negligence on the part of the railroad company.[1]

(2) CHARACTER AND DESCRIPTION OF CROSSING. The declaration or complaint should also describe the crossing with certainty, as by name, location, or demurrer on the ground that the complaint shows contributory negligence is properly overruled. Burns v. Southern R. Co., 65 S. C. 229, 43 S. E. 679.

96. Tyler v. Kelley, 89 Va. 282, 15 S. E. 509, holding, however, that a declaration is not bad on this ground in alleging the place of the accident in an alternative form as that the deceased was struck "at, near or upon the crossing."

97. Clark v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 28 Minn. 69, 9 N. W. 75 (holding, however, that in this case the complaint was not objectionable as stating merely conclusions of law); Matz v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 88 Fed. 770.

98. Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. Freeman, 134 Ala. 354, 32 So. 778; New York, etc., R. Co. v. Robbins, 38 Ind. App. 172, 76 N. E. 804 (holding the particular complaint not to be demurrable on that ground); Matz v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 88 Fed. 770.

Election.—A motion to compel plaintiff to elect on which cause of action he will rely may be made in such a case. Matz v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 88 Fed. 770.

Where the several charges of negligence are not separable in the sense that one only would be the proximate cause of the injury, the complaint or petition is sufficient on general demurrer. Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Mackey, 53 Ohio St. 370, 41 N. E. 980, 53 Am. St. Rep. 641, 29 L. R. A. 757. Where the petition alleges that defendant negligently and unlawfully stopped a freight train across a public street, and that while plaintiff was attempting to cross such street between two cars of such train defendant without warning backed the train thereby causing plaintiff's injury, the two alleged causes of injury are not separable or independent causes of action in the sense that one only would be a proximate cause of such injury. Burger v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 112 Mo. 238, 20 S. W. 439, 34 Am. St. Rep. 379.

99. Southern R. Co. v. Crenshaw, 136 Ala. 573, 34 So. 913; Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. Forshee, 125 Ala. 199, 27 So. 1006; Memphis, etc., R. Co. v. Martin, 117 Ala. 367, 23 So. 231, holding that a complaint alleging that defendant "in the management, conduct and running of one of its freight trains . . . with reckless, unwarranted and dangerous rate of speed, did wantonly and recklessly strike and run over plaintiff's intestate at a public crossing" sufficiently avers that the injury was wantonly inflicted.

Necessity of alleging knowledge.— Where plaintiff undertakes to recite the facts constituting such wantonness or wilfulness, and adds to the general statement an allegation that defendant's employees while approaching a crossing where it was probable that people would be passing recklessly and wantonly ran a train at such a speed that it could not be stopped before reaching the crossing, after they had attained a point from which they could see persons at the crossing, the count is rendered bad as to wantonness or wilfulness or even negligence unless it alleges that the trainmen knew of such crossing. Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. Forshee, 125 Ala. 199, 27 So. 1006. So where a paragraph of the complaint alleges that the engine and cars could have been stopped within the space of a foot and that those in charge of the engine could have seen plaintiff had they been on the lookout, it is insufficient to charge a wilful injury unless it alleges that defendant's employees did see plaintiff or that they knew he was on the track at the time. Van Winkle v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 34 Ind. App. 476, 73 N. E. 157.

Special averments giving the conditions and circumstances under which the act of wantonness or wilfulness was committed, and emphasizing the general allegation, do not make the general allegation of wantonness or wilfulness bad. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Reynolds, 33 Ind. App. 219, 71 N. E. 250.

1. Duncan v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 152 Ala. 118, 44 So. 418; Southern R. Co. v. Haywood, (Ala. 1906) 41 So. 949; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Orr, 121 Ala. 489, 26 So. 35; Southern R. Co. v. Prather, 119 Ala. 588, 24 So. 836, 72 Am. St. Rep. 949 (holding that an averment that the injury was caused by the wantonness, recklessness, or wilfulness of defendant's agents or servants in failing or refusing to perform an alleged duty, the nonperformance of which as alleged is simple negligence, does not show wanton negligence); Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Young, 153 Ind. 163, 54 N. E. 791; Pennsylvania Co. v. Sinclair, 62 Ind. 301, 30 Am. Rep. 185 (holding that an allegation that defendant was running the train "at a reckless and grossly negligent rate of speed" in violation of an ordinance does not sufficiently charge wilful injury to exclude conceded contributory negligence as a defense); Hancock v. Erie, etc., R. Co., 21 Ind. App. 10, 51 N. E. 369; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Davis, 7 Ind. App. 222, its termini, so that the railroad company will be apprised of the place where the alleged offense was committed.[2] In an action for injuries while crossing defendant's track on a way customarily used, the complaint should aver knowledge on the part of the railroad company of the existence of such way,[3] although it need not aver definitely the length of time that the use of such way had been acquiesced in by the railroad company, where it alleges such acquiescence for a long time prior to the accident.[4]

(3) DEFECTS AND OBSTRUCTIONS AT CROSSINGS. In an action for injuries caused by defects or obstructions at a railroad crossing, the declaration or complaint should allege facts showing with certainty a breach on the part of the railroad company of its duty to maintain the crossing in a reasonable and convenient condition for use by those traveling on the public highway,[5] and that plaintiff's injury was in consequence of such negligent construction and main-

Allegations held sufficient see Southern R. Co. v. Posey, 124 Ala. 486, 26 So. 914 (that a plank between the rails at a crossing did not extend clear across the crossing, but left an open space thereon which was not flush and level with the main rail, but was lower than the other part of the crossing, causing plaintiff's wheel to be deflected into the space between the main and guard rails and that while he was exercising reasonable efforts to extricate the wagon it was struck by defendant's train); Baltimore etc., R. Co. v. Faith, 71 Ill. App. 59 (holding that an allegation that the company negligently placed and left one of its freight cars upon and nearly across a public highway, and that said car was an object highly calculated to frighten teams passing over said highway at said crossing, is substantially an averment of an obstruction of the highway); Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Wynant, 119 Ind. 539, 20 N. E. 730; Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Stout, 53 Ind. 143; Wabash R. Co. v. De Hart, 32 Ind. App. 62, 65 N. E. 192; Cincinnati, etc., R. St. (1881) § 3903); Pennsylvania Co. v. Frund, 4 Ind. App. 469, 30 N. Allegations held insufficient see Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Gee, 104 Va. 806, 52 S. E. 572, 3 L. R. A. N. S. 111, holding that a declaration against a railroad company for personal injuries sustained at a crossing, alleging as negligence defendant's failure to keep its right of way at the crossing sufficiently smooth and level to admit of safe and speedy travel over the crossing as required by Va. Code (1904), p. 669, § 1294*d*, is demurrable where it fails to state the nature of the defects complained of.

Petition held insufficient to show negligence on the part of the railroad company in an action for injuries caused by a team becoming frightened at a carcass lying on defendant's right of way near a crossing see Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Armstrong, 105 S. W. 473, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 252.

Duration of obstruction.— Where plaintiff, to avoid the obstruction of a street crossing by a standing train, has gone upon private property and been injured by an obstruction there, a petition to recover therefor should aver the length of time the cars had been on the crossing, or that defendant did not have the right to stop its trains on the crossing for such length of time as it required to transact its legitimate business. Eads v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 42 S. W. 1135, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1138.

tenance.[6] If such breach of duty is in violation of a statute or ordinance, it has been held that so much of the statute or ordinance should be set out as is relied upon to support the cause of action.[7] The declaration or complaint, however, need not allege notice on the part of the railroad company of the condition of the crossing;[8] nor need it allege the name of the servant or employee whose negligence permitted the obstruction,[9] or the exercise of ordinary care on plaintiff's part.[10] In an action for injuries caused by a train which was standing on a crossing starting up without warning and injuring plaintiff who was attempting to cross at the time, the declaration should allege that some person in control of the train knew of plaintiff's attempt to cross or had notice of his exposure to danger.[11]

(4) MODE OF RUNNING TRAINS. In an action for injury caused by the negligent running of a train or cars approaching a crossing, the declaration or petition must allege the acts or omissions constituting such negligence with sufficient certainty to inform defendant of the negligence charged,[12] as that the train caus-

E. 476 (holding that an allegation "that by reason of the unlawful, negligent and wrongful acts and omissions of the defendant, as herein set out, the said decedent was run over and upon by said train at said crossing" sufficiently alleges that the injuries were in consequence of defendant's negligent construction and maintenance of the crossing); Indianapolis, etc., R. 7. Southern R. Co. v. Prather, 119 Ala. 588, 24 So. 836, 72 S. W. 949, holding that an allegation that an ordinance of the city prohibited railroad companies from allowing cars to stand in the street longer than five minutes at a time does not sufficiently set forth the ordinance. But see Denver, etc., R. Co. v. Robbins, 2 Colo. App. 313, 30 Pac. 261 (holding that a complaint is sufficient which alleges that defendant railroad company was unlawfully and negligently occupying a street crossing in violation of a city ordinance and that by reason of that fact and without any negligence on plaintiff's part the injury resulted); Eakins v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 126 Iowa 324, 102 N. E. 218 (holding that an allegation that defendant's servants when approaching the crossing with the train did not attempt to check it but negligently ran it at a dangerous speed sufficiently informs defendant of the facts charged as constituting negligence); Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Conn, 104 Ind. 64, 3 N. E. 636; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Reynolds, 33 Ind. App. 219, 71 N. E. 250; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Dick, 78 S. W. 914, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1831 (holding that a general charge of negligence, carelessness, and recklessness in the management and operation of the train, whereby plaintiff was run over and injured, gives defendant sufficient notice that the method and manner of operating the train will be brought into question on the trial, without specifying the particular acts of negligence on the part of those in charge of the train); White v. Wabash Western R. Co., 34 Mo. App. 57. Compare Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. McPeek, 16 Ohio Cir. Ct. 87, 8 Ohio Cir. Dec. 742, holding that a petition alleging that the injury was caused by an irregular train running at a great speed, and that it failed to give proper warning of its approach to the crossing, but failing to specifically allege negligence, fails to state a cause of action.

Sufficient allegations of negligence as to mode of running trains see Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. Forshee, 125 Ala. 199, 27 So. 1006 (holding that an allegation that defendants so negligently and carelessly conducted themselves that the said engine was caused to run against plaintiff's intestate at a street crossing, although very general, yet when taken with the averment as to the place where the collision occurred, sufficiently shows that defendant was under duty to keep a lookout and the complaint is sufficient on demurrer); Atlantic Coast Line R. ing the accident was negligently run at a dangerous and unusual rate of speed,[13] without giving any warning of its approach;[14] and must show with reasonable certainty that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.[15] But it is not necessary to allege what were defendant's rules for the management of its trains.[16]

(5) VIOLATION OF STATUTES OR ORDINANCES. In an action for injuries at a railroad crossing caused by some act or omission of the company which is in violation of a statute or ordinance, the declaration or complaint is sufficient if it alleges with certainty the facts showing such violation,[17] and that it caused the

Co. v. Musgrave, 24 Ind. App. 295, 55 N. E. 496 (that defendant was running its train through the city at the time the accident occurred at a speed beyond the limits fixed by ordinance, that the statutory signals on approaching the crossing were not given, that the accident occurred by reason of such negli-injury.[18] While it usually must be alleged that the statute or ordinance is in force and that the particular acts or omissions are in violation thereof,[19] it is sufficient to state the existence of the statute or ordinance without setting out a copy thereof as a part of the complaint;[20] and if the complaint sets up a good cause of action both at common law and under the statute, the statute need not be referred to.[21] Where the violation of the statute or ordinance constitutes negligence per se, it is not necessary to expressly describe such failure as negligence.[22] Where the statute or ordinance is satisfied by either ringing a bell or blowing a whistle, an allegation of a failure to do either is sufficient.[23] gence on the part of defendant, and that plaintiff was exercising due care); Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Miller, 46 Mich. 532, 9 N. W. 841 (holding that an allegation that defendant negligently drove a locomotive upon the railroad up to, upon, and across a certain public highway at the crossing of the same and the said railroad, without giving the necessary statutory signals, is a sufficiently specific averment of defendant's negligence when taken in connection with the averment of consequential injury).

Statements concerning the ordinance and its violation are material allegations where the theory of the complaint is that the company was negligent in running its train through a city in violation of an ordinance. Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Mikesell, 23 Ind. App. 395, 55 N. E. 488.

A declaration under Mass. Pub. St. c. 112, § 212, holding a railroad liable for injuries to passengers through its negligence and to one not a passenger while such person is in the exercise of due diligence, is not sufficient to bring the case within section 213 of the same chapter, holding a railroad liable for injuries to persons at grade crossings caused by its cars or engines by reason of its failure to ring a bell or blow a whistle, where it is nowhere alleged that the accident occurred at a highway crossing or was caused by a collision with cars or engines. Allerton v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 146 Mass. 241, 15 N. E. 621. That the accident occurred upon the crossing of a highway at grade, that the signals required by statute were neglected, and that the neglect contributed to the injury, must be alleged under Mass. St. (1874) c. 372, § 160. Wright v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 129 Mass. 440.

18. Wilson v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 146 Ala. 285, 40 So. 941, 8 L. R. A. N. S. 987 (complaint held demurrable as not showing any causal connection between the violation of an ordinance forbidding the blockading of any public street, and the injuries); Birmingham Belt R. Co. v. Gerganous, 142 Ala. 238, 37 So. 929; Southern R. Co. v. Posey, 124 Ala. 486, 26 So. 914; Denver, etc., R. Co. v. Robbins, 2 Colo. App. 313, 30 Pac. 261. Compare Southern R. Co. v. Stockdon, 106 Va. 693, 56 S. E. 713.

Sufficient allegations of violation of statute or ordinance as being proximate cause of injury see Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Young, 146 Ind. 374, 45 N. E. 479, 153 Ind. 163, 54 N. E. 791; Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Corps, 37 Ind. App. 586, 76 N. E. 902; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Reynolds, 33 Ind. App. 219, 71 N. E. 250 (holding that an allegation that the injuries were caused by defendant's violation of a city ordinance requiring it to keep a watchman on the rear car of a train being operated backward, to ring the bell and not to run at more than a stated rate of speed, is sufficient without stating plaintiff's conduct at the time); Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Pence, 24 Ind. App. 12, 55 N. E. 1036 (holding that a complaint alleging that plaintiff was injured at a crossing by reason of the negligence of defendant in operating its trains at a speed greater than that allowed by ordinance and without any fault or negligence on his part is not demurrable for the reason that it does not allege that if said train had not been operated at such prohibited rate of speed plaintiff would not have been injured).

Where the violation of a statute or ordinance is merely one of several elements charged as negligence, the failure to show that such violation was a proximate cause of plaintiff's injury does not make the complaint demurrable. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Klee, 154 Ind. 430, 56 N. E. 234.

21. Southern R. Co. v. Stockton, 106 Va. 693, 56 S. E. 713 (holding that where the complaint states a good cause of action independently of a statute or ordinance, it is immaterial that the ordinance or statute is unconstitutional, or that the complaint fails to allege that its violation was the proximate cause of the injury); Southern R. Co. v. Simpson, 131 Fed. 705, 65 C. C. A. 563.

Tenn. St. Shannon Code, § 1574, subs. 4, providing that every railroad shall keep the engineer on the lookout ahead and when any obstruction appears on the road the whistle shall be sounded, brakes put down to stop the train, etc., is declaratory of the common law so far as it goes, and a declaration in an action against a railroad company for injuries caused by a collision, framed under the statute, which goes further and includes averments of additional common-law negligence, will be treated as one wholly under the common law. (6) NEGATIVING CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE. By the weight of authority contributory negligence is a matter of defense, and it is not necessary for plaintiff in an action for injuries at a railroad crossing to allege that he was in the exercise of due care, or without fault, or to otherwise negative contributory negligence,[24] unless he alleges facts showing contributory negligence,[25] although it has been held otherwise,[26] except where plaintiff is non sui juris.[27] But even where it is necessary to negative contributory negligence, a general averment that plaintiff was without fault on his part, or an allegation of facts showing freedom from fault, is generally sufficient,[28] unless facts specially pleaded clearly show that he was guilty of contributory negligence;[29] and if defendant desires a more particular statement of facts his remedy, if any, is by motion to make the complaint more specific.[30]

(B) Amendment. The complaint, declaration, or petition may be amended during the progress of the trial so as to conform the pleadings to the evidence.[31] The allowance of such amendment, however, is within the discretion of the court, and it does not abuse such discretion in refusing to allow the amendment where it contains a material change or departure in the issues,[32] as where it states a new cause of action.[33]

Ala. 642, 20 So. 1003, holding that an allegation that those operating a train were negligent in failing to blow the whistle and ring the bell at short intervals is demurrable since the statute (Code, § 1144) is satisfied by either warning. But compare Terry v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 89 Mo. 586, 1 S. W. 746.

E. 580 (holding that since under the code negligence of a railroad company is presumed when injury is shown, it is not necessary for plaintiff to allege that he was in the exercise of due care); Bamberg v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 72 S. C. 389, 51 S. E. 988 (holding that plaintiff need not allege that he did not hear or see the approaching train); Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Shieder, 88 Tex. 152, 30 S. W. 902, 28 L. R. A. 538; Blankenship v. Galveston, etc., R. Co., 15 Tex. Civ. App. 82, 38 S. W. 216.

In Indiana under Acts (1899), p. 59, c. 41 (Burns Annot. St. (1901) § 359*a*) the complaint need not allege want of contributory negligence. New York, etc., R. Co. v. Robbins, 38 Ind. App. 172, 76 N. E. 804; Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Corps, 37 Ind. App. 586, 76 N. E. 902; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. La Porte, 33 Ind. App. 691, 71 N. E. 166; Wabash R. Co. v. De Hart, 32 Ind. App. 62, 65 N. E. 192, holding this statute to apply to a case commenced after the statute took effect, although the cause of action accrued prior thereto. It was otherwise in this state prior to the statute. See cases cited infra, notes 26–30.

27. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Klee, 154 Ind. 430, 56 N. E. 234, holding that a complaint alleging that plaintiff, a boy nine years old, was of such immature age and experience that he did not appreciate the danger of being struck by defendant's engine and was incapable of negligence is not demurrable for a failure to allege that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence.

28. Pennsylvania Co. v. Horton, 132 Ind. 189, 31 N. E. 45; Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Walker, 113 Ind. 196, 15 N. E. 234, 3 Am. St. Rep. 638; Peirce v. Ray, 24 Ind. App. 302, 56 N. E. 776. See Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Corps, 37 Ind. App. 586, 76 N. E. 902.

(II) Answer and Subsequent Pleadings. The answer and subsequent pleadings, in an action for injuries at a railroad crossing, are also regulated by the rules of pleading governing civil actions generally,[34] and particularly those relating to actions for negligence.[35] Thus special pleas in such an action which amount to general issues are bad;[36] but a special plea containing matter of avoidance is good,[37] and its disallowance is not a matter of discretion.[38] A replication in such an action should reply to the material allegations of the plea or answer,[39] and must not depart from the cause of action averred in the complaint,[40] or repeat matters already alleged.[41] A replication to a plea of contributory negligence should aver facts negativing such negligence.[42] A surrejoinder should not allege matters which amount to a departure from the complaint.[43]

d. Issues, Proof, and Variance — (I) Issues Raised in General. Only such matters are in issue, in an action for injuries at a railroad crossing, as are properly put in issue by the pleadings and proof in the case.[44] Thus only such matters of negligence as are properly put in issue by the pleadings and proof can be relied upon by plaintiff as grounds of recovery,[45] and the same rule

44. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Slaughter, 167 Ind. 330, 79 N. E. 186, 7 L. R. A. N. S. 597 (holding that whether the act of placing a hand-car within the limits of a crossing is so calculated to frighten passing teams as to render it negligent to do such an act is presented by the issue formed on the allegation that the act was negligently done); Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Clark, 105 Ky. 571, 49 S. W. 323, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1375 (holding that it is error to instruct the jury as to the duty of defendant to erect sign-boards as required by statute, where there is no averment in the petition that defendant failed to perform this duty or that the injury was caused by such failure); Lewis v. New York, etc., R. Co., 1 Silv. Sup. (N. Y.) 393, 5 N. Y. Suppl. 313 (holding that an allegation that the crossing was "extensively and notoriously used by the public at the time of said accident, and for many years prior to the knowledge of the defendant" is sufficient to raise the issue whether the crossing is a public highway within the statute requiring signals); Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Matherly, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 604, 81 S. W. 589; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Knox, (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 75 S. W. 543 (holding that where the pleadings do not raise the issue of discovered peril, the submission of such issue to the jury is reversible error).

In an action for injuries at a private crossing, near a public crossing, where there is no averment that signals usually given on the approach of trains to the public crossing could be heard at the private crossing, and the distance between the crossings is not given, but the bare statement that they were "near" together, the question of defendant's negligence in failing to give signals at the public crossing on which plaintiff could rely is not raised. Davis v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 75 S. W. 275, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 342 [opinion in 70 S. W. 857, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1125 withdrawn].

Kansas.— Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Griffith, 69 Kan. 130, 76 Pac. 436, holding that where plaintiff alleges as grounds of recovery, specified acts of negligence by a railroad company in failing to give proper signals and the running at a reckless rate of speed, the court is not warranted in submitting as an addiapplies to matters which can be relied upon by defendant company as grounds of defense.[46]

(II) MATTERS TO BE PROVED. Negligence, or other matters material to sustain the cause of action or defense, must be proved in the manner alleged in the declaration or other pleading.[47] Every allegation which is descriptive of the cause of action,[48] or of what is material,[49] even though unnecessary,[50] must be proved as alleged. But matters not in issue need not be proved;[51] nor is proof of averments which are not material essential.[52]

tional ground of recovery negligence of defendant in permitting obstructions to the view to remain on its right of way.

Kentucky.— Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Clark, 105 Ky. 571, 49 S. W. 323, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1375; McCain v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 18 S. W. 537, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 809.

Massachusetts.— Legge v. New York, etc., R. Co., 197 Mass. 88, 83 N. E. 367, holding that where one was killed by a locomotive before he reached a highway crossing there can be no recovery under a count alleging that he was killed on a highway crossing.

Michigan.— Thomas v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 86 Mich. 496, 49 N. W. 547.

Texas.—San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Stolleis, (Civ. App. 1899) 49 S. W. 679, holding that where the petition alleges negligence only in failing to blow the whistle and ring the bell as required by statute, there can be no recovery because of the engineer's failure to keep a lookout.

United States.— Southern R. Co. v. Elder, 81 Fed. 791, 26 C. C. A. 615, holding that where plaintiff alleges in her declaration that the road where the accident occurred was "a public road" she cannot without amending her declaration be heard to claim that the road was a private one even if it should be conceded that that is material.

Failure to maintain the statutory warning post at a crossing must be averred in order to insist upon it as a substantive cause of action. New York, etc., R. Co. v. Kistler, 16 Ohio Cir. Ct. 316, 9 Ohio Cir. Dec. 277.

Where the complaint charges wantonness in failing to use preventive means on discovery of plaintiff's peril, a recovery cannot be had on proof of wantonness consisting in running a train, without proper appliances for stopping it, at a high rate of speed. Burke v. Alabama Midland R. Co., 124 Ala. 604, 26 So. 947.

46. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Matherly, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 604, 81 S. W. 589 (holding that, where the railroad company desires to raise the question as to whether a city ordinance constitutes an unreasonable restriction on railroads, the issue must be presented by proper pleadings and proof); Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Byrd, (Tex. Civ. App. 1901) 61 S. W. 147 (holding that in an action for injuries sustained by plaintiff being thrown from his carriage at a crossing in attempting to avoid a collision with an approaching train, whether or not there was contributory negligence in not stopping the horse after the train was seen cannot be determined where it is not alleged in the answer).

47. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Neubaucher, 16 Ind. App. 21, 43 N. E. 576, 44 N. E. 669; Thomas v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 86 Mich. 496, 49 N. W. 547.

In trespass.— Where a count for personal injuries avers that defendant railroad company wantonly and intentionally caused or allowed a railroad train to run against plaintiff's vehicle, since it involves the actual participation of defendant in the act of running the train and not merely defendant's responsibility for the act of a servant, it is in trespass, and not in case, and to sustain it proof of such actual participation in the tort on the part of defendant is essential. Birmingham Belt R. Co. v. Gerganous, 142 Ala. 238, 37 So. 929.

App. 623 (holding that, in an action against a railroad company for negligently causing the death of a person at a public highway crossing, the averment that the place in question is a public highway crossed by the company's right of way and tracks is a material averment and proof of it is necessary to a recovery); Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Neubaucher, 16 Ind. App. 21, 43 N. E. 576, 44 N. E. 669 (holding that where the gist of the negligence alleged is that defendant did or omitted to do acts which induced plaintiff to go upon a railroad crossing when it was unsafe by reason of an approaching train, and violated the city ordinances as to maintaining gates, and concerning the rate of speed at which trains should run, a general verdict for plaintiff is supported by evidence that defendant did not maintain gates at the crossing and that its failure so to do was negligent); Beyel v. Newport News, etc., R. Co., 34 W. Va. 538, 12 S. E. 532 (holding that where the gist of the action is the negligent frightening of plaintiff's horse, it is not necessary to prove actual physical contact between the engine and the wagon).

50. Wabash R. Co. v. Billings, 212 Ill. 37, 72 N. E. 2 [reversing 105 Ill. App. 111]; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Morkenstein, 24 Ill. App. 128.

(III) EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE. Any legal evidence, in an action for injuries at a railroad crossing, which corresponds with the allegations, and is restricted to the issues, is admissible;[53] but evidence not conforming thereto is generally inadmissible.[54] Where the allegations of negligence are specific, the proof must 42 So. 19 (holding that the failure of plaintiff, in an action for injuries from defendant's omission to keep in repair an approach to its tracks at a public crossing, to prove the averment of the complaint that defendant constructed the approach is immaterial, since it is defendant's duty to keep it in repair without regard to who constructed it); Illinois Steel Co. v. Szutenbach, 64 Ill. App. 642 (holding that where plaintiff alleges that it was necessary for him to cross the track it is not incumbent upon him to prove such necessity); Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Neubaucher, 16 Ind. App. 21, 43 N. E. 576, 44 N. E. 669; Hopkins v. Grand Rapids, etc., R. Co., 147 Mich. 339, 110 N. W. 1064.

In a common-law action plaintiff is not required to prove matters necessary only to statutory relief, although the declaration contains allegations which might be rejected as surplusage, from which it might be inferred that plaintiff relied upon the statutory relief. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Dillon, 123 Ill. 570, 15 N. E. 181, 5 Am. St. Rep. 559.

53. Overtoom v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 80 Ill. App. 515 (holding that where it is alleged that a crossing is in a populous neighborhood and much used, evidence to support such allegation is admissible); Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Hennessey, 75 Tex. 155, 12 S. W. 608.

Evidence is admissible respecting the brakes on a locomotive as compared with those of other locomotives belonging to the same company, under an allegation that the locomotive was not supplied with proper brakes (Savannah, etc., R. Co. v. Flannagan, 82 Ga. 579, 9 S. E. 471, 14 Am. St. Rep. 183); or to show the speed at which the train was running, where one of the acts of negligence alleged is that the train was running at a high and dangerous rate of speed (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Slater, 129 Ill. 91, 21 N. E. 575, 16 Am. St. Rep. 242, 6 L. R. A. 418 [affirming 28 Ill. App. 73]); or to show that the crossing was used by footmen, where the petition alleges that "it was a public crossing or footway for footmen" (Clampit v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 84 Iowa 71, 50 N. W. 673); or under an allegation that the view of the road approaching the track was greatly obstructed by an embankment, it is admissible to show that there was a fence on the embankment (San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Stolleis, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 49 S. W. 679).

Collision with street car.— Where a petition for injuries sustained by a passenger on a street car as the result of a collision between the street car and a railroad car alleges that defendants failed to keep a reasonable and necessary lookout and observe the approach of the railroad car, it is admissible to show the negligence of a watchman employed to warn street cars of the approach of railroad cars, as well as that of servants in charge of the street cars in failing to take proper precautions to apprise themselves of danger before sending the car across the railroad tracks. Hamilton v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 114 Mo. App. 504, 89 S. W. 893.

An ordinance regulating the speed of a train is admissible under a pleading reciting the substance of such an ordinance and charging a railroad company with negligence in its violation. International, etc., R. Co. v. Dalwigh, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 48 S. W. 527.

In a common-law action for injuries at a crossing, an ordinance making it the duty of the company to station a man on the rear of trains while backing, although not pleaded, is admissible to show negligence. Mulderig v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 116 Mo. App. 655, 94 S. W. 801.

54. California.— Matteson v. Southern Pac. Co., 6 Cal. App. 318, 92 Pac. 101, holding that where the issue relates only to the existence of lights on the rear car and a witness testifies in regard to lights on that car, it is proper to refuse to permit him to testify as to whether he saw any lights on any other cars

Georgia.— Snowball v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co., 130 Ga. 83, 60 S. E. 189, holding that where the allegation is that plaintiff's husband was killed on the public road crossing, evidence that the railroad company had impliedly licensed the general public in using a path on its right of way is properly excluded.

Illinois.— Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Jones, 76 Ill. 311, holding that evidence of the condition of a crossing is inadmissible, where the gravamen of the action is the neglect to give the statutory signal of warning before reaching the crossing, and neglect in not slackening the speed of a train.

Michigan.— Britton v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 122 Mich. 359, 81 N. W. 253, holding that, where plaintiff avers that as he approached the crossing he looked and listened and slowed his horse down to a very slow walk and continued to look and listen for an approaching train, it is inadmissible for him to show that he stopped his horse, and leaned forward, and looked aut at the side of his carriage.

Pennsylvania.— Penusylvania R. Co. v. Weber, 72 Pa. St. 27, holding that in an action for killing a man by the negligent management of an engine at a crossing, evidence that the highway had been made by defendant is inadmissible.

Evidence that an electric alarm bell was not in operation on the day of the accident is inadmissible where no count in the declaration refers to sueh bell. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Pearson, 71 Ill. App. 622.

also be specific as to the facts alleged;[55] but where the negligence on the part of defendant is averred in general terms plaintiff is not confined in his evidence to any one particular act of negligence,[56] and evidence of any fact which is a circumstance tending to show the negligence alleged is admissible, although no mention of such fact is made in the pleading.[57] Thus a general allegation of negligence as to the mode of running or operating trains or cars is sufficient to admit proof of negligence in running a train,[58] and under such allegation it is admissible to show that the brakes on defendant's train were defective,[59] that

In determining whether an employee did all in his power to avoid the accident, after he discovered plaintiff's peril, the jury cannot consider facts tending to show negligence on his part before discovering such peril. Alabama, etc., R. Co. v. Phillips, 70 Miss. 14, 11 So. 602.

Under an allegation of negligence in failing to keep a proper lookout, evidence of a failure to give crossing signals should not be considered. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Nesbit, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 209, 88 S. W. 891.

55. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Hennessey, 75 Tex. 155, 12 S. W. 608, holding that where the facts alleged as constituting negligence are a failure to ring the bell, sound the whistle, give signals to stop the train, and running too fast, a failure of defendant to have a light at the place of the accident when it occurred cannot be proven to show the company's negligence.

57. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Davis, 106 S. W. 304, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 580; Rogers v. West Jersey, etc., R. Co., (N. J. 1907) 68 Atl. 148; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Whittaker, 24 Ohio St. 642 (that no sign-board was up as required by law); Spires v. South Bound R. Co., 47 S. C. 28, 24 S. E. 992; Kaminitsky v. Northeastern R. Co., 25 S. C. 53 (holding that the provisions of the act of 1878 (16 St. at L. p. 363), requiring a guard to be kept at a certain railroad crossing, and of Gen. St. §§ 1483, 1529, relating to signals to be given by an engine on approaching a crossing, did not supersede other proper signals, or give a new cause of action under the statutes; and that therefore in an ordinary action for damages alleging negligence the omission of the statutory signals may be given in evidence, although not alleged in the complaint).

Evidence is admissible in an action for injuries resulting from a collision at a street crossing, to show the number of residences near the crossing, although there is no allegation in the petition that by reason of the peculiar surroundings defendant company was required to operate its trains, at the point where the accident occurred, with greater care than usual (Nosler v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 73 Iowa 268, 34 N. W. 850); and where it appears that plaintiff was struck by a locomotive on a crossing, evidence is admissible to show that he was thrown into a ditch in which the water was deep enough to drown a man, although there is no specific averment in regard either to the ditch or the water (International, etc., R. Co. v. Brett, 61 Tex. 483).

The absence of a flagman and safety gates at a crossing may be shown, as tending to show negligence in running a locomotive or train at that particular time and place, although such fact is not alleged. Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Richardson, 25 Kan. 391; Lesan v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 77 Me. 85 (holding this to be true in the absence of state or city regulation requiring a flagman at a railroad crossing); Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Reiger, 95 Va. 418, 28 S. E. 590.

Evidence of a flagman's intoxication is admissible to show the condition of his mind, and the facilities he had for knowing what happened. International, etc., R. Co. v Dyer, 76 Tex. 156, 13 S. W. 377.

Ordinance as evidence.— Under a general allegation of negligence the violation of a city ordinance may be shown (Warren v. Southern Cal. R. Co., (Cal. 1901) 67 Pac. 1); such as an ordinance limiting the speed of trains within the city limits (Faber v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 29 Minn. 465, 13 N. W. 902; Oldenburg v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 9 N. Y. Suppl. 419, 11 N. Y. Suppl. 689 [affirmed in 124 N. Y. 414, 26 N. E. 1021]); or requiring the stationing of a watchman at a certain crossing and prescribing his duties (Fusili v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 45 Mo. App. 535). Where there are two ordinances, one regulating the rate of speed allowed for railroad trains within city limits, and the other regulating the lowering of gates at street crossings, but one only of such ordinances is pleaded in the petition, both ordinances may be admitted in evidence. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Ehlert, 19 Ohio Cir. Ct. 177, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 443.

A Tennessee statute, Shannon's Code, § 1574, subs. 2, 3, requiring every railroad company on approaching a crossing to sound the whistle or ring the bell and that on approaching a city the bell or whistle shall be sounded when at a distance of one mile and at short intervals until it reaches its depot, is not declaratory of the common-law obligation of a railroad company but prescribes statutory precautions; and therefore under a count declaring under the statute it is proper to prove a non-compliance with the precautions while such evidence is inadmissible under a count charging negligence at common law. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., v. Crews, 118 Tenn. 52, 99 S. W. 368.

the train failed to give the proper signals,[60] that the company's servants in charge of the engine or train discovered plaintiff's peril in time to have avoided the injury,[61] and failed to take all means in their command to stop the train or lessen its speed after discovering such peril;[62] but not that crossing gates were not properly maintained or attended.[63] So under a general allegation of negligence as to a defective crossing it is admissible to show that it is defective by reason of the planks being laid too far apart.[64] On a general allegation of contributory negligence, any evidence is admissible on behalf of defendant to show the existence of such negligence;[65] and on behalf of plaintiff any evidence negativing its existence is admissible, although not pleaded.[66]

(IV) VARIANCE. The allegations and proof in an action for injuries at a railroad crossing must correspond,[67] and any material variance between the proof and allegations is fatal to a recovery,[68] unless waived by a failure to call the

63. Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Shaw, 56 Kan. 519, 43 Pac. 1129, holding that where the only negligence charged is in the management of the engines and cars by the employees of the company, it is not proper to admit testimony showing that the company was required by a city ordinance to maintain automatic gates at the crossing and that it failed to do so. But see Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Redmond, 70 Ill. App. 119 [affirmed in 171 Ill. 347, 49 N. E. 541].

W. 303 (holding that where plaintiff alleges that her injury was caused by the lack of a signal from defendant's train and the jury finds that the whistle was sounded, and that such signal by frightening her horse was one of the causes of plaintiff's injury, she cannot recover, there being no finding or proof that the whistle was negligently sounded).

The variance is material between an allegation that noises caused by steam escaping from the engine, etc., were made while the engine was approaching the crossing and testimony that the noises were made after the engine had passed the crossing and was returning after being reversed in the direction of the crossing (Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Fulton, 150 Ala. 300, 43 So. 832); an allegation that while plaintiff was driving over defendant's crossing, an engine struck plaintiff's vehicle whereby he was thrown out and injured, and proof that a car struck the vehicle, but that he was not then thrown out, but the horse ran away and plaintiff was thrown out and injured (Wabash R. Co. v. Billings, 212 Ill. 37, 72 N. E. 2 [reversing 105 Ill. App. 111]); an allegation that the injuries were received at a crossing and proof that they were received not while passing over the crossing but while alighting from a freight train (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Wilson, 124 Ky. 836, 100 S. W. 302, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1048); an allegation that the engineer of the train which struck plaintiff discovered plaintiff's peril in time to prevent the injury, and proof that the fireman and not the engineer saw plaintiff's danger (Chun v. Kentucky, etc., Bridge Co., 64 S. W. 649, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1092); an allegation that defendant's servant then and there in charge of the engine caused the discharge of steam, and proof that the engineer was not in the engine, and that the fireman did not turn on the cylinder cocks (Riley v. New York, etc., R. Co., 90 Md. 53, 44 Atl. 994); and an allegation that the injury was caused by a certain freight train with locomotive attached, etc., and proof that the cars were not handled by the engine, but detached and shoved backward (Schindler v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 77 Mich. 136, 43 N. W. 911).

Place of accident.— Where the accident is laid at one crossing and plaintiff shows it to have happened at another, the variance is fatal. Klanowski v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 64 Mich. 279, 31 N. W. 275. Thus where the accident is alleged to have happened at a public highway and the evidence shows that plaintiff was a trespasser in defendant's freight yard when he was injured, the variance is fatal. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Morkenstein, 24 Ill. App. 128. So where the accident is alleged to have happened at the crossing attention of the court thereto,[69] or cured by an amendment of the pleading.[70] But where the proof substantially supports the pleading, the fact that it varies therefrom on some immaterial matter is not a fatal variance,[71] if defendant is not misled thereby.[72]

e. Evidence — (I) PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF — (A) In General. As a general rule the law does not presume negligence and the burden is on a person who charges a breach of duty or negligence to prove it.[73] The burden of proof, in an action for injuries at a railroad crossing, is in the first instance on plaintiff to show by a preponderance of evidence the alleged negligence on the part of the railroad company or its employees,[74] the fact of the

of a public road, proof that it occurred at a private crossing on the company's land is insufficient, although the actual place may be known to both parties. Schindler v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 77 Mich. 136, 43 N. W. 911.

69. Wabash R. Co. v. Billings, 212 Ill. 37, 72 N. E. 2 [reversing 105 Ill. App. 111]; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 76 Tex. 244, 13 S. W. 196, holding that, although the petition alleges that the accident occurred on a street crossing, proof that it occurred on a trestle at some distance from the crossing will not defeat plaintiff's recovery, where the answer alleges that it occurred at the latter place. And see, generally, TRIAL.

United States.— Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Cumberland, 176 U. S. 232, 20 S. Ct. 380, 44 L. ed. 447, holding that an averment that there was no light on the rear part of an engine is satisfied by proof that there was no such light as the law required.

Variance held immaterial.— Where it appears that all the trains at the crossing in question were operated by defendant, and that it was just as responsible for one as the other, it is not a material variance where the proof shows that a train other than the one described in the complaint committed the wrongful act. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Neubaucher, 16 Ind. App. 21, 43 N. E. 576, 44 N. E. 669. Where the gist of the complaint is that the injury was caused by the negligence of defendant in propelling unguarded cars against other detached cars, forcing them over the crossing, it is not a material variance where the proof shows that the injury was not caused by a "flying switch" as alleged, especially where the description following such allegation shows that a "flying switch" was not meant. International, etc., R. Co. v. Dyer, 76 Tex. 156, 13 S. W. 377. So also there is no material variance between an allegation that the engineer reversed his engine and started in the direction of the crossing at a rapid rate of speed, and proof that after reversing his engine he caused it to move slowly over the track to the point where the accident occurred (Leavitt v. Terre Haute, etc., R. Co., 5 Ind. App. 513, 31 N. E. 860, 32 N. E. 866); between an allegation that plaintiff was injured at a crossing at a public highway over defendant's railroad track, and proof that the highway was not legally laid out for defendant's right of way but that defendant by its acts and acquiescence in the public use of the crossing as a public highway had made such crossing a highway as to the public (Coulter v. Great Northern R. Co., 5 N. D. 568, 67 N. W. 1046); between an allegation that a hand-car by which plaintiff's team became frightened was negligently left on a farm crossing and proof that the car was not within the traveled way of the crossing (Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Slaughter, 167 Ind. 330, 79 N. E. 186, 7 L. R. A. N. S. 597).

Time of accident.— It is not a fatal variance that the injury is proved to have been sustained on a day different from that alleged. Augusta, etc., R. Co. v. McElmurry, 24 Ga. 75.

72. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Kief, 111 Ill. App. 354, holding that notwithstanding a variance as to the place of an accident appears, and the point has been properly and duly raised, yet such variance is immaterial where defendant is not misled thereby and the place of the accident is not a material issue in the case.

injuries,[75] and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries;[76] and in some jurisdictions that the person injured was free from contributory negligence.[77] But where plaintiff, by his evidence, makes out a prima facie case,[78] the burden is then on defendant to show that it was not negligent,[79] or that the accident was attributable to some other and excusing cause;[80] and if defendant overcomes plaintiff's prima facie case it is then incumbent upon plaintiff to give further evidence.[81] There is a presumption in such actions that a flagman stationed at the crossing by the company knew of a fact which it was his duty to know and by which fact his conduct as narrated by him was prompted;[82] but the fact that the train is behind the usual time raises no presumption of negligence in the event of an accident at a crossing.[83]

(B) Existence of Defect or Happening of Accident or Injury. In the absence of statute or evidence to the contrary, proof of the mere fact of an accident at a railroad crossing whereby plaintiff is injured does not raise a presumption of negligence on defendant's part so as to warrant a recovery by plaintiff, but the burden is upon plaintiff to show further that the accident was due to some negligence on the part of defendant,[84] and so it is not sufficient where it is merely shown that plaintiff was injured by a train at a crossing without proof of negligence in running the train;[85] although under some statutes proof that plaintiff was injured by the operation of a train is sufficient to make out a prima facie case and impose upon defendant the burden of showing that the injuries were not the result of negligence on its part,[86] unless the presumption of negligence arising from the fact of the injury is rebutted by plaintiff's own evidence.[87] But where the evidence which shows the injury discloses in itself that defendant in relation to the causal act or omission did not exercise that degree of care which the law requires, plaintiff has discharged the burden of proving negligence,[88] as where it is shown that the accident was due to a defective crossing, which it is the company's duty to maintain.[89]

violation of the statute or ordinance, as that the statutory signals were not given, is upon plaintiff.[92] But where the fact of the inquiry and the violation of the statute or ordinance is shown, the presumption arises in some jurisdictions that such negligence was the cause of the injury,[93] and the burden of proof is then upon defendant to show the contrary, as that it was not caused by the failure to give the statutory signals,[94] or by its running at an unlawful speed;[95] or to otherwise relieve itself from liability for the neglect of duty,[96] as by showing contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff;[97] and it is not incumbent upon plaintiff to prove that defendant's speed was reckless or unlawful,[98] or that the train

In Tennessee under Milliken & V. Code, § 1298, the burden of proof is on plaintiff to prove that a public crossing has been designated by danger signals as one, on approaching which, the bell or whistle be sounded; but where plaintiff has proved this fact the statute requires a railroad company to show that the bell and whistle were sounded as prescribed. Ordinarily plaintiff makes out a prima facie case when he shows that the statutory signal was not given and that the accident occurred, and, having done that, the burden is then shifted to defendant to show that the failure to give the signal was not the cause of the accident. Proof of public highway.— Where the evidence shows that a road intersected by a railroad was traveled by the public and had been worked and repaired by the authority having charge of public highways this is prima facie evidence that it was a public highway legally established and is sufficient to require a railroad company when sued for an injury caused by a neglect to ring a bell or sound a whistle when approaching the same to show that it was not legally established in order to excuse itself from liability for the neglect of this duty. Illinois R. Co. v. Benton, 69 Ill. 174.

In an action for injuries caused by a defect in the construction of a road at a highway crossing, the burden of proving that the railroad company is exempt from the provisions of the statute imposing the duty of constructing safe crossings is on the company. could have been stopped before reaching the crossing.[99] But where plaintiff in proving the accident also proves that it was not caused by a failure to give the signal or other violation of a statute, or that the person injured was guilty of negligence that directly contributed to the accident, there is nothing for defendant to prove.[1]

(D) Contributory Negligence — (1) IN GENERAL. In some jurisdictions there is a presumption that one injured at a railroad crossing was not in the exercise of due care at the time, and to warrant a recovery for such injuries it is incumbent upon plaintiff to prove, by a preponderance of evidence, a want of contributory negligence on the part of the person injured,[2] although the railroad company was,

In this state it is held that, although in the absence of evidence to the contrary there is a presumption of due care on the part of the person injured arising from the instinct of self-preservation, it is not a conclusive presumption, but must be taken in connection with the rule that plaintiff must show the exercise of reasonable care on his part (Reitveld v. Wabash R. Degree of proof.— It is incumbent upon plaintiff to produce evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion that he was in the exercise of due care in respect to the occurrence from which his injury arose; and he is at the time of the accident, violating a statute or ordinance regulating the giving of signals, or the speed of the train causing the injury.[3] In other jurisdictions, however, except where contributory negligence is at least prima facie established by plaintiff's complaint or petition,[4] or by his evidence alone,[5] or by undisputed evidence adduced on the trial,[6] or where the attendant facts explained by any hypothesis that they will admit of show that such was not the case,[7] contributory negligence is a matter of defense, and the law presumes that the person injured exercised due care in approaching the crossing, and plaintiff is not required to prove it as a part of his case; but on the other hand if defendant relies upon contributory negligence as a defense, the burden of proof is upon defendant to show it by a preponderance of the evidence.[8] A default by a railroad company in an action against it for injuries at a crossing operates as a prima facie admission not entitled to have his case submitted to the jury unless his freedom from fault is proved directly and affirmatively or is established by inference clearly deducible from the circumstances. Gahagan v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 70 N. H. 441, 50 Atl. 146, 55 L. R. A. 426.

Although the natural disposition of a man to avoid injuries under such circumstances is evidence tending to show that the person injured was not negligent, yet, when the direct evidence shows what he did or omitted to do for his protection, the evidence derived from such disposition cannot be used to prove that he was not negligent but only furnishes a test for the reasonableness of his conduct. (2) Duty to Stop, Look, and Listen. In accordance with the above rule, in some jurisdictions, the burden of proof, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is upon plaintiff to show that he looked and listened, or if necessary stopped, looked, and listened, before attempting to cross;[10] and the presumption of negligence arising from the fact that the injured party neglected to look and listen can be rebutted only by facts and circumstances showing that it was not reasonably practicable to take such precautions, or that the circumstances were such as would ordinarily induce persons of common prudence to omit such precautions.[11] In other jurisdictions, however, in the absence of direct evidence that the person injured did not stop, look, and listen before crossing, the presumption under ordinary circumstances is that he observed such precautions, and the burden of proving otherwise is on defendant.[12] This presumption, however, may are shown by direct or undisputed evidence the presumption will be conclusive.[17] This presumption, however, does not arise from the mere fact that a railroad crossing is a place of danger.[18]

(II) ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE — (A) In General. The admissibility of evidence in actions for injuries at railroad crossings is controlled by the general rules of evidence governing the competency, relevancy, and materiality of evidence in civil actions.[19] Subject to these rules any evidence showing the situation of the parties and the circumstances immediately attending the accident,[20]

Evidence is admissible, where a person is injured or killed by a backing train, that a hack and the body of a companion of deceased were pushed back by the train, as showing that the train was detached and kicked back, and was only stopped by such obstructions (Bradley v. Ohio River, etc., R. Co., 126 N. C. 735, 36 S. E. 181); or where the injury is caused by a team becoming frightened at a hand-car, to show the nearness of the hand-car to the team as it passed in front of them (Henze v. International, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 75 S. W. 822); or where the injuries are caused by moving a train standing at a crossing, while the person injured is passing between the cars, evidence is admissible that other persons were also crossing at the time to the knowledge of defendant's servants, who knew that persons were in danger when they moved the train (San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Green, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 5, 49 S. W. 670).

Evidence showing how long the company had been running trains after the erection of a mill near the track from the platform of which plaintiff ran across the track at the time of the accident is competent to show the locality of the accident, the conditions making the crossing dangerous, and a knowledge of these conditions on the part of the company. Southern R. Co. v. Douglass, 144 Ala. 351, 39 So. 268.

Evidence of the appearance of the injuries after the accident is admissible as a statement in part of the accident, and also as a means of determining from the character of the wounds the injured person's position when he was struck. Oldenburg v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 9 N. Y. Suppl. 419, 11 N. Y. Suppl. 689 [affirmed in 124 N. Y. 414, 26 N. E. 1021].

A diagram or plat proved to be correct and purporting to show the location and surroundings and the place where the accident occurred is admissible. Pennsylvania Co. v. Reidy, 72 Ill. App. 343, holding, however, that a plat which is not drawn to scale, on which the distances are not marked, and which is inaccurate in several important particulars is inadmissible. And see 17 Cyc. 413 note 93.

Identification of train.— Testimony that plaintiff heard a train whistle before leaving his home is admissible where there is testimony tending to show that several trains passed about that time, as it might serve to identify the train which struck his team. Southern R. Co. v. Hobbs, 151 Ala. 335, 43 So. 844.

such as the fact that the track was not fenced,[21] or that the accident occurred at a time when there was usually the greatest amount of travel on the crossing,[22] is competent. Entries from telegraphic train report sheets,[23] and rules of the company,[24] are admissible as bearing upon the company's negligence. But evidence that is irrelevant, immaterial, or incompetent is inadmissible.[25] The declarations of an engineer[26] or station agent[27] as to facts attending the accident are inadmissible, except in rebuttal of other testimony given by such agent or engineer on the trial.[28]

(B) Customary Methods and Acts. Where the negligence of a railroad company is in issue, evidence as to what is usually done by it under the same circumstances is admissible to show whether or not the particular acts in question are negligent,[29] but not for the purpose of showing whether or not such acts occurred.[30] Thus as bearing upon the negligence of defendant evidence is admissible which tends to show that defendant was in the habit of running its trains past a crossing at an excessive or unlawful rate of speed,[31] or without sounding

Secondary evidence.— Where, on cross-examination of the fireman on the engine causing the accident, plaintiff has called out the fact that several persons were allowed to get on the engine shortly before the accident, plaintiff, in order to ascertain whether the fireman's attention was not diverted from his duties, may further ask whether this was not forbidden by defendant's rules, although the rules themselves are the best evidence. Evidence of the company's custom to keep a flagman at the crossing is competent in an accident for injuries at the crossing at which there was no flagman at the time of the accident. Casey v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 78 N. Y. 518 [affirming 6 Abb. N. Cas. 104].

Evidence that it is customary to post a flagman at crossings similar to the one at which the injury was sustained is not admissible. Bailey v. New Haven, etc., R. Co., 107 Mass. 496.

34. Bradley v. Ohio River, etc., R. Co., 126 N. C. 735, 36 S. E. 181, holding that, where plaintiff's intestate was killed on a crossing by being struck by a backing train after it stopped and discharged its passengers, plaintiff may show defendant's custom as to where it stopped its trains for the discharge of passengers, and the custom of defendant and the public in using the crossing as bearing on defendant's negligence in backing its trains, as to the notice to be given, and whether intestate was negligent.

Evidence that it was the custom of defendant to habitually block the crossing, and that it had long been the custom of people generally to climb between or to pass around cars so obstructing the crossing, is admissible on the issue of negligence on the part of the company. Leary v. Fitchburg R. Co., 53 N. Y. App. Div. 52, 65 N. Y. Suppl. 699; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Grisom, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 630, 82 S. W. 671.

Evidence of the manner in which the cars were usually operated at that point is admissible on the question of whether defendant's cars obstructed the highway. Hall v. Brown, 58 N. H. 93.

Evidence as to how lights were maintained at the other street crossings is inadmissible in an action for injuries resulting from a collision on a street crossing. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Matherly, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 604, 81 S. W. 589.

Evidence that gates were not maintained at other crossings than the one where an accident occurred does not tend to establish negligence at the place of the accident. Bracken v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 22.

40. Phelps v. Winona, etc., R. Co., 37 Minn. 485, 35 N. W. 273, 5 Am. St. Rep. 867, holding that, in an action for damages resulting from the negligence of defendant in obstructing a highway crossing with snow thrown from a railroad track, evidence of the difficulties experienced by other travelers in attempting to pass the crossing prior to the accident and while the highway was in substantially the same condition is admissible.

are continuous in their nature and are near in point of time.[41] As bearing on defendant's negligence in running at an excessive or unlawful rate of speed at the time of the accident, evidence is admissible as to the speed at which the same train is habitually run at the same crossing,[42] or at which defendant habitually runs its engines under like circumstances,[43] but not as to the speed at which the train was run on a particular occasion.[44] Or, as bearing on defendant's negligence in respect to giving signals, evidence is admissible that defendant's train habitually neglected to sound the bell or whistle at the crossing,[45] or that it failed to give such signals at a similar crossing near the place of the accident,[46] but not that the signals were not given on other particular occasions at the crossing,[47] or by other trains,[48] or that other accidents had happened at the crossing.[49] Where the fright of horses at certain objects or noises, such as escaping steam or the blowing of the whistle, is in issue, evidence is admissible as to what effect such objects or noises produced upon other horses at the same time and place,[50] or under similar circumstances,[51] or what was their effect at that place upon ordinary horses,[52] but not as to what effect other objects or noises at other times had upon horses at the crossing.[53]

(D) Conditions and Precautions After Accident. Where it appears that the condition of a railroad crossing has not been materially changed since the accident, evidence of its condition immediately after the accident is admissible for the purpose of showing its condition at the time of the accident.[54] Where it is charged that the crossing or its approaches were defective or unsafe at the time

Opportunity and conditions must be shown to be similar.— Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Payne, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 35 S. W. 297.

41. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Carrington, 3 App. Cas. (D. C.) 101.

Evidence that a watchman was asleep two and one-half hours prior to the accident is admissible on the issue that he was asleep at the time of the accident, and for that reason failed to close the gate when the train approached. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Carrington, 3 App. Cas. (D. C.) 101.

Witnesses familiar with the locality may tell of narrow escapes they have had to show the nature of the crossing and the danger to travelers. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Netolicky, 67 Fed. 665, 14 C. C. A. 615.

Evidence as to management and speed three quarters of a mile away is admissible as tending to show the train's management and speed at the place of the accident. Lyman v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 66 N. H. 200, 20 Atl. 976, 11 L. R. A. 364.

of the accident, in some jurisdictions evidence of repairs made at the crossing soon after the accident is admissible as tending to show antecedent negligence,[55] although in other jurisdictions it is held otherwise.[56] Likewise it is admissible in some jurisdictions, as tending to show antecedent negligence, to introduce proof that after an accident had occurred at a certain crossing defendant took certain precautions in respect to the operation of its trains at such crossing;[57] but by the weight of authority subsequent precautions are regarded merely as improvements in the mode of operating the railroad, and not as evidence of antecedent negligence,[58] as where defendant after the accident puts a light,[59] or places a watchman,[60] or an automatic bell,[61] at the place of the accident. Evidence that after striking plaintiff at the crossing the train ran on to the next station without stopping is immaterial on the question of negligence before the accident.[62]

St. Rep. 617, holding such evidence to be admissible where witness for defendant had testified that no other accident had ever happended at the crossing. See also Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Doerr, 41 Ill. App. 530.

Where there is evidence that an electric bell at the crossing was out of order and failed to give notice of the train's approach and that before the accident it rang so slightly that a person within fifteen feet of it could not hear it, it is admissible to show that defendant repaired such bell a day or two after the accident. Link v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 165 Pa. St. 75, 30 Atl. 820, 822.

Where it is contended that the accident was not on the approach to the crossing but on the highway, evidence as to how the crossing and approaches were originally built, and their condition at various times before the accident, and repairs on the approach after the accident, is relevant. Removal of building.— Where one of the negligent acts alleged was in permitting a building to remain on a right of way which obstructed the vision and hearing of persons crossing the track, and the evidence showed that there was no negligence in such act, it is error to allow plaintiff to show that the building has been removed since the accident. Evidence that the road or street had been abandoned by the public when plaintiff was hurt, and was not then being commonly used by the public at a crossing, is admissible; but testimony that the railroad company was not prosecuted for obstructing the street in question, that the city council had closed up the street and granted the company the exclusive use of it, and testimony as to acts after plaintiff was injured tending to show that the road after the accident was abandoned is inadmissible; where the city council has no authority to close a street and grant the railroad company the exclusive use of it, an ordinance closing the street is inadmissible. Co. v. Frugia, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 48, 95 S. W. 563; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Hellenthal, 88 Fed. 116, 31 C. C. A. 414 (holding that testimony of a witness acquainted with the situation that a railroad track is straight at a certain point, and a crossing in plain view for a certain distance is competent).

Invalid ordinance.— In an action against a railroad company to recover for injuries at a railroad crossing, where the railroad is a dividing line between a city and a township, an invalid ordinance of the city requiring the railroad company to erect a safety gate on the township side of the crossing is inadmissible even to show the dangerous character of the crossing. Burns v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 210 Pa. St. 90, 59 Atl. 687.

The number of persons killed at a crossing is not admissible as tending to establish its dangerous character. Tiffin v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 78 Ark. 55, 93 S. W. 564.

A deed of the land at the place of the accident to the railroad company, reciting that the grantor's warranty is not to extend to any right of way the public may have acquired in streets, ways, or roads over the premises is not admissible in an action for injuries sustained while crossing defendant's tracks to show that plaintiff had a right to cross the tracks, since the limitation of the warranty was not to give notice that the public had acquired a right of way over the land, but merely to limit the grantor's liability in case such a right should afterward be asserted. Central R., etc., Co. v. Rylee, 87 Ga. 491, 13 S. E. 584, 13 L. R. A. 634.

To show that the crossing is at a public way, the public records of the county commissioners dealing with it as a highway, under the jurisdiction given them by statute (Mass. Pub. St. c. 112, § 123), is admissible. Nickerson v. New York, etc., R. Co., 178 Mass. 195, 59 N. E. 636.

Farm crossing.—As to whether or not defendant recognized a farm crossing as such, and whether its appearance was such as to invite its use for that purpose, evidence of instructions given by defendant to its trackmen as to keeping farm crossings in repair, and acts done by the trackmen in pursuance of such instructions with respect to the particular crossing in question, is admissible. 68. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Chinsky, 92 Ill. App. 50, holding that evidence that there were no gates at the crossing is admissible for the purpose of showing the physical condition and surroundings at the place where the accident occurred. And see infra, X, F, 14, e, (II), (G).

That there were no gates at the next crossing when the accident occurred may be shown by plaintiff, as bearing on the character of the crossing at which the accident occurred, where defendant develops on cross-examination that there were safety gates at the next crossing. crossing,[70] or that the highway is crossed by the tracks of several companies is admissible.[71] Such circumstances may be shown by any witness familiar with the crossing,[72] but such witness may state only the facts disclosing the location and surroundings[73] and cannot give his opinion as to the dangerous character of the crossing.[74]

(F) Defects and Obstructions at Crossings. As a circumstance indicating the degree of care which the railroad company is required to exercise in approaching the crossing in question, and as showing whether or not it was negligent in that respect in the particular case, evidence is admissible which tends to show that the injured person's view was obstructed at such crossing,[75] or that the condition of the crossing was defective and unsafe,[76] and that the railroad company had knowledge thereof.[77] Where negligence in the construction and maintenance of a crossing is in question, evidence of any circumstances tending to show negligence in this respect is admissible;[78] but that no similar accident had ever before occurred

E. 855 (evidence that the company's right of way at or near the crossing had on it undergrowth which obstructed the view).

Where the view is obstructed by standing cars, evidence is admissible to show how long the cars had been allowed to stand at the crossing prior to the occurrence of the accident. Thomas v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 8 Fed. 729, 19 Blatchf. 533.

Evidence that a natural hill existed on a railroad right of way which interfered with the view of approaching trains is admissible as bearing on the alleged failure of the company to give proper signals, but is not an independent ground of negligence. Leitch v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 93 Wis. 79, 67 N. W. 21.

A town ordinance prohibiting the blocking of street crossings by railroad companies beyond a specified time is admissible in evidence where it is claimed that a violation of such ordinance in connection with other acts of negligence was the cause of the accident. Southern R. Co. v. Mouchet, 3 Ga. App. 266, 59 S. E. 927.

Opportunity for observation.— Where one of defendant's witnesses who had gone to the point where the accident occurred on a switch engine and taken observations from the engine testifies as to the conditions and surroundings, and that the engine could be seen from the road, it is proper upon cross-examination to show that the opportunity for observation was as good for the engineer as for the person injured. Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. Hyatt, 151 Ala. 355, 43 So. 867.

Evidence that the railroad company should have erected certain buildings on the opposite side from where they were located, thereby removing them as obstructions and rendering the crossing more safe, is incompetent. W. 299, holding that, in an action for injuries sustained by a traveler's horse stepping into a hole in a bridge, evidence to the effect that the bridge appeared to be constructed of good material and that witnesses when traveling over it saw nothing which rendered it unsafe is admissible.

Where the injured person's foot was caught between the main rail and the guard rail it is competent to show the defective and dangerous construction resulting in the accident; but it is incompetent for that purpose to show that at another crossing a different construction is in use, although it is competent to show that at another crossing a similar construction is in use and that people have got their feet caught in it between the main rail and guard rail. Raper v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 126 N. C. 563, 36 S. E. 115.

Evidence that another person's horse caught its hoof at the same place shortly before is admissible in an action for injuries sustained at a railroad crossing by reason of plaintiff's pony getting its hoof caught between the rail and the board next to it. The absence of a flagman may be shown, as bearing upon the question of care in running trains, in connection with the amount of travel (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Johnson, 61 Ill. App. 464), or in connection with evidence that a flagman had always been kept at the crossing (McGrath v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 63 N. Y. 522).

Where an injury is caused by a backing train on a public street of a city on a dark night and no flagman is present at the crossing, that fact is competent to be submitted to the jury, where it is also shown that no one was on the rear end of the train and no signal or warning was given before backing the train. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Henry, 36 Kan. 565, 14 Pac. 1.

That a flagman was maintained at a crossing twelve years before the accident in compliance with an application of the selectmen of a town in which the crossing is situated is no proof that due care required that a flagman should have been stationed there at the time of the accident. Tyler v. Old Colony R. Co., 157 Mass. 336, 32 N. E. 227.

The record of county commissioners stating that in their opinion no flagman at the crossing was necessary is not competent evidence of due care on the part of the railroad company in an action for injuries occasioned by its locomotive at a place where the county commissioners had authorized the company upon certain conditions to cross upon a level. Shaw v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 8 Gray (Mass.) 45.

Testimony showing the danger of the crossing and its locality and use in a populous locality is proper to be submitted to the jury under a guarded instruction as bearing upon the question of negligence of the company in not providing flagman or gates at such crossing to protect travelers. train failed to keep a proper lookout.[90] For the purpose of showing that proper signals were not given the testimony of a person who at the time of the accident was in close proximity to the train and crossing, to the effect that he heard no signals, is evidence tending to prove that fact,[91] although the witness cannot say positively that they were not given,[92] as where he testifies that at the time of the accident he was near the crossing but did not hear any bell or whistle and that in his opinion if the signals had been given they could have been heard by him.[93] Evidence as to defendant's custom or habit in giving signals at that crossing is inadmissible on the question whether the signals were in fact given at the time,[94] although it is admissible for the purpose of showing that by giving them it has recognized the crossing as public, and that it was its duty to give signals at that crossing.[95] As tending to show that the proper signals were given at the time of the accident, or to excuse a failure to give the same, defendant may introduce any competent evidence,[96] as that the engine was constructed with an automatic bell-ringing device which was in operation, so that the bell rang for such distance before reaching the crossing as to be within plaintiff's hearing if he had been listening;[97] or it may introduce in evidence an ordinance prohibiting the use of a bell or whistle at the crossing in question,[98] or a rule of the company requiring the engine bell to be rung at certain times and places;[99] but testimony of the engineer and fireman that it was their habit or custom to ring the bell and blow the whistle at the place where the accident occurred is inadmissible.[1]

(I) Rate of Speed.[2] While the high or unusual speed of a railroad train does not of itself constitute negligence, evidence of such fact is admissible as a circumstance in determining whether or not the railroad company was negligent in the particular instance.[3] As a circumstance tending to show whether or not a train was run at a negligent rate of speed at the time of the accident, evidence is admissible that the crossing was in a populous neighborhood and that a large number of people continually used it,[4] or that it was little used by the public to the knowledge of the railroad company,[5] or to show the grade of the track at or near the crossing,[6] or what the speed was on the company's property just before reaching the crossing.[7] In connection with other testimony evidence is also admissible of ordinances regulating the rate of speed at which trains shall pass a crossing,[8] as is also a contract of the railroad company with a city under which it obtains the grant of its right of way, and which regulates the speed at which trains shall run through the city.[9]

(J) Contributory Negligence — (1) IN GENERAL. Upon the question of contributory negligence on the part of one who is injured at a railroad crossing, it is competent to show, in addition to the difficulty of perceiving danger,[10] all the Evidence held admissible see Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Howard, 124 Ind. 280, 24 N. E. 892, 19 Am. St. Rep. 96, 8 L. R. A. 593 (that no whistle was sounded when the train passed the crossing a mile distant from the one on which the accident occurred; that the person driving plaintiff's buggy was "a safe hand"; and that they were on their way to church when the accident occurred); Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Russell, 72 Nebr. 114, 100 N. W. 156 (that plaintiff saw others crossing through an opening between the cars, and that it was the custom of the company to leave openings of similar character); Thomasson v. Southern R. Co., 72 S. C. 1, 51 S. E. 443 (that plaintiff and others were laborers who had gone home for dinner and had only a few minutes to return to their work and that plaintiff's foot was crushed while attempting to pass between standing cars); International, etc., R. Co. v. Ives, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 272, 71 S. W. 772.

Evidence held inadmissible see Williams v. Southern R. Co., 68 S. C. 369, 47 S. E. 706, holding that evidence as to other boys playing on the crossing is incompetent in an action for killing a minor.

Evidence that the person injured was in the habit of jumping on moving trains in that vicinity is admissible in an action defended on the theory that the person was contributorily negligent in jumping on a moving train, and where the evidence as to how the accident occurred is conflicting. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. McNeil, (Ind. App. 1903) 66 N. E. 777.

That the person injured was not driving at the time is proper to be considered in determining whether she was negligent in not alighting from the wagon and going forward to see if a train was approaching. Kansas City, etc., R. Co. v. Weeks, 135 Ala. 614, 34 So. 16.

Defective crossing.— Evidence that other crossings in the town were also in a bad condition on the day of the accident is admissible in an action for injuries caused by a defective crossing to show why plaintiff who knew of the condition of the crossing before he attempted to cross did not cross the track at some other place. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Matula, (Tex. 1892) 19 S. W. 376. Likewise evidence of the existence of another crossing near at hand, which is reasonably accessible to plaintiff, is admissible to show contributory negligence in using a defective crossing. Harper v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 70 Mo. App. 604.

Rules of the company relating to the rate of speed permitted at the place where the accident occurred, and as to the duty of brakemen being ready to act instantly, are competent on the question of plaintiff's care in attempting to cross the tracks. Davis v. Concord, etc., R. Co., 68 N. H. 247, 44 Atl. 388.

Experiments.— Evidence of experiments carefully made to ascertain how long it will take a team of horses to walk from a certain fixed and well-known point to the crossing is admissible where the main controversy is as to the contributory negligence of plaintiff's employee in approaching a crossing with a team; the point being well known and permanent and the experiments made by timing an approaching train with a stop watch, and a team of horses walking from the point to the place where the accident occurred. Nosler v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 73 Iowa 268, 34 N. W. 850 [distinguishing Klanowski v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 64 Mich. 279, 31 N. W. 275]. Experiments as evidence generally see EVIDENCE, 17 Cyc. 283.

Evidence to show at what points the train could have been seen if plaintiff had looked so as to determine whether or not he might have avoided the collision is admissible. Southern R. Co. v. Hobbs, 151 Ala. 335, 43 So. 844.

there a short time before the accident,[16] or whether or not there were gates at the crossing;[17] or to show the custom and habits of the flagman at the crossing in giving signals to those about to cross,[18] to show the rate of speed of the train,[19] or that the proper signals were not given,[20] and that other trains passing the crossing at or about the same time had all given the required signals,[21] except where plaintiff's own evidence discloses contributory negligence.[22] But it is not competent to show a custom of people to crawl under cars blockading the crossing,[23] or to show a custom of the company, subsequent to the collision, to blow the whistle at such crossing.[24] As tending to repel any inference of contributory negligence arising from the fact that the person injured was on the track and was struck, it is competent to show that such person was of careful and sober habits,[25] and that he had previously been in the habit of exercising due care in passing over the crossing,[26] except where there is an eye-witness of the occurrence, and there is direct evidence of the conduct of the person injured at the time of the accident.[27]

(2) KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER OR METHODS OF OPERATION. Evidence tending to show that the person injured had knowledge of the danger in crossing,[28] such Ill. 323, 54 N. E. 898 [reversing 80 Ill. App. 515], holding that a witness who had crossed shortly ahead of deceased may testify whether the gates were up or down when he crossed.

20. Covell v. Wabash R. Co., 82 Mo. App. 180, holding that where an injury occurred at a crossing in the heart of a city evidence that no whistle was sounded is admissible, although there was no city ordinance or statute requiring the whistle to be sounded.

21. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Garteiser, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 456, 29 S. W. 939.

22. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co. v. Holden, 93 Md. 417, 49 Atl. 625, holding that where it is shown that the person injured knew the regular hours for running the trains, and went on the track at a private crossing, the view of which was obstructed, without looking and listening, the failure to give the required signals at a public crossing which might have been heard at the private crossing is not admissible upon the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence. Evidence that when deceased was picked up his breath smelled of liquor, that he had drunk beer shortly before the injury, and was drunk between eleven and twelve o'clock of the day on which he was injured is admissible (Wabash R. Co. v. Prast, 101 Ill. App. 167), but not that he drank after the accident (Crowder v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 39 Tex. Civ. App. 314, 87 S. W. 166).

H. 206, 55 Atl. 359 (that in passing the crossing on previous occasions deceased had remarked upon its dangerous character and taken precautions against collision); Smith v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 70 N. H. 53, 47 Atl. 290, 85 Am. St. Rep. 596 (habit for many years of checking his horse and looking and listening for trains at that crossing). Compare Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Taylor, 104 S. W. 776, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1142, holding that evidence that deceased was by custom reckless in driving across the railroad is not admissible.

Evidence to show contributory negligence. — On the other hand it has been held that evidence is not admissible to show that plaintiff had been guilty of a similar act of negligence or habitually negligent upon similar occasions. Wheeling, etc., R. Co. v. Parker, 29 Ohio Cir. Ct. 1; International, etc., R. Co. v. Ives, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 272, 71 S. W. 772; Delaware, etc., R. Co. v. Converse, 139 U. S. 469, 11 S. Ct. 569, 35 L. ed. 213.

as that he was in the habit of crossing over the track at that place frequently,[29] and had knowledge of the maintenance of gates and the presence of a flagman at the time,[30] or of the customary manner of operating trains,[31] or of an ordinance regulating the running of trains [32] at that place is admissible upon the question of contributory negligence. But it has been held that evidence to show general knowledge on the part of the public as to the danger in crossing where plaintiff was injured is inadmissible.[33]

(3) PERSONS UNDER DISABILITY. It is also competent to show as one of the circumstances bearing on the question of contributory negligence, that at the time of the accident the person injured was under some disability, as that he was partially deaf,[34] or was drunk,[35] but not that he was given to the habit of intoxication.[36]

(III) WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE [37]— (A) In General. The weight and sufficiency of evidence in actions for injuries at railroad crossings is controlled by the rules of evidence governing in civil actions generally; [38] and Ohio Cir. Ct. 1; Carraway v. Houston, etc., R. Co., 31 Tex. Civ. App. 184, 71 S. W. 769, holding that testimony of plaintiff whose team, which he was driving, was struck at a railroad crossing in a town by a rapidly moving train, that he was frequently in the town and was familiar with the usual speed of trains therein is admissible in connection with an ordinance regulating the running of trains, on the question of contributory negligence.

Defective crossing.— Evidence of proceedings of the county commissioners relative to the construction of a retaining wall near the highway which were taken at plaintiff's instance is admissible to show his knowledge of the condition of the highway. Seybold v. Terre Haute, etc., R. Co., 18 Ind. App. 367, 46 N. E. 1054.

Evidence too vague and indefinite to show that plaintiff had notice of the location of the crossing see Stewart v. Long Island R. Co., 54 N. Y. App. Div. 623, 66 N. Y. Suppl. 436 [affirmed in 166 N. Y. 604, 59 N. E. 1130].

Contradictory testimony.— Evidence that the person injured was not familiar with the danger incident to crossing between cars is inadmissible where he testifies that he would not have attempted to cross if the brakeman had not assured him that he had plenty of time. Scott v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 112 Iowa 54, 83 N. W. 818.

29. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Notzki, 66 Ill. 455.

30. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Bartle, 94 Ill. App. 57.

Custom.— Where it is pertinent to determine how far plaintiff might have been influenced in his conduct by the fact that crossing gates were frequently permitted to remain closed at a time when trains were not passing or about to pass, it is competent to show such occasions when the gates were so left down which came to the knowledge of plaintiff either by personal observation or by information received from others; but it is not competent to show any occasion when such gates were so left down of which plaintiff had no knowledge either personal or by hearsay prior to the injury to him. Retan v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 94 Mich. 146, 53 N. W. 1094, where the defect had existed for several months; many persons had noticed it; and several persons before the accident had been caught in the same way as plaintiff and in the same defect. To support a finding that plaintiff was impliedly invited by the company to use the tracks at that point imposing on the company the duty of exercising ordinary care in keeping the crossing in repair. Cowans v. Ft. Worth, etc., R. Co., 40 Tex. Civ. App. 539, 89 S. W. 1116.

Existence of highway.— Testimony of witnesses that they were acquainted with the highway at the crossing before the railroad was built and that it was traveled then is at least prima facie evidence that the railroad was constructed over the highway so as to impose upon the company the statutory duty of restoring it to its former condition; an introduction of the record of the laying out of the highway not being necessary in the absence of testimony to the contrary. Sutton v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 98 Wis. 157, 73 N. W. 993.

That others had passed over the crossing does not show that it was in a safe condition. Sasnofski v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 134 Mich. 72, 95 N. W. 1077.

40. Evidence held sufficient: To support gates, or flagmen [41] at the crossing. Defendant's negligence may be proved like any other fact by circumstantial evidence, and direct, positive evidence is not necessary.[42] To fix liability upon defendant, however, upon the ground of negligence there must be proof of the essential facts constituting such negligence,[43] and this proof must consist of some reasonable evidence of well-defined acts of negligence.[44] A mere probability or possibility that someone was wanting in care is not sufficient to justify a finding of negligence,[45] unless such probability or possibility is based upon rational grounds and is supported by the facts proved.[46] It is not sufficient if such probability or inference is based upon any inference a verdict for plaintiff for injury caused by a train running at an unlawful speed. Piper v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 77 Wis. 247, 46 N. W. 165. To show that the train in running at a rate of speed of thirty-five miles an hour at the place in question was negligently operated. Bilton v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 148 Cal. 443, 83 Pac. 440.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain a complaint for running at a dangerous rate of speed without giving proper notice see McCain v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 18 S. W. 537, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 809.

That the train did not stop until it was three hundred yards past the crossing at which it caused the injury complained of is not by itself sufficient evidence that the train passed the crossing at an unreasonable rate of speed. Tully v. Fitchburg R. Co., 134 Mass. 499.

Where the view is obstructed, evidence that the train causing the injuries ran three hundred feet past the crossing before it stopped is sufficient to justify a finding that forty miles per hour was an unreasonable rate of speed at that crossing. Hicks v. New York, etc., R. Co., 164 Mass. 424, 41 N. E. 721, 49 Am. St. Rep. 471.

Testimony that the train could be stopped within a given distance after the brakes were applied is of no weight as a basis for showing negligence in running at a certain rate of speed at the crossing, when such testimony is based upon the supposition that the train was running at a specified rate at a distance of five hundred and seventy feet from the crossing, and the only testimony as to the speed of the train is that it was running at such specified rate when it reached the crossing after every possible effort had been made to check its speed while running the intervening distance. Jones v. Lehigh, etc., R. Co., 202 Pa. St. 81, 51 Atl. 590.

That an engine was traveling twenty or thirty miles an hour across a public grade road in a city where the lawful speed was six miles an hour is a circumstance from which the railroad's negligence might reasonably be inferred, especially where, in consequence of obstructions to a view of the train, a person was prevented from seeing a locomotive at any great distance until he came within about fifty feet of the crossing. Kunz v. Oregon R. Co., (Oreg. 1907) 93 Pac. 141, 94 Pac. 504.

41. Evidence held insufficient: To sustain a finding that there was no flagman at the crossing at the time of the accident. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Gretzner, 46 Ill. 74; Taylor v. Long Island R. Co., 16 N. Y. App. Div. 1, 44 N. Y. Suppl. 820, where six witnesses testified that they saw the flagman on the crossing giving the signal, while two other witnesses testified that they did not see him at the time, and another witness testified that the flagman was not there. To show negligence on the part of defendant in not providing a gate and gateman at the crossing. Vallance v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 55 Fed. 364. To show that plaintiff was injured while upon the street at the crossing at which the flagman was stationed. Strickland v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 88 N. Y. App. Div. 367, 84 N. Y. Suppl. 655.

Admission of unsafety.— The erection of gates by a railroad company shortly after an order passed by the mayor and aldermen of a city requesting it to erect such gates is communicated to the company may be treated as an admission, unless explained, that the gates were reasonably necessary for public safety. Merrigan v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 154 Mass. 189, 28 N. E. 149.

That the stationing of flagmen by defendant was sufficient to warn persons of approaching danger is not conclusively shown by the fact that it did not appear that at any time previous to the accident in question an accident had occurred at that place. Where gates across a public crossing are not used after a certain hour in the evening and no flagman was stationed after that hour, the inference, if any, to be drawn therefrom is that after that time such precautions were unnecessary. (B) Place and Cause of Injury. Circumstantial evidence is sufficient to show that the injury happened at a railroad crossing,[48] over a public highway.[49] That defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury may also be shown by circumstantial evidence,[50] which must be of such strength and char-

49. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Faith, 175 Ill. 58, 51 N. E. 807 [affirming 71 Ill. Evidence held insufficient: To show that the injury was caused by the railroad company's negligence generally (Custer v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 365); in failing to give the proper signals (Bryant v. Southern R. Co., 137 Ala. 488, 34 So. 562); or in failing to stop its engine sooner than it did (Kearns v. Southern R. Co., 139 N. (c) Lights, Signals, or Lookouts From Trains. The fact that defendant's engine or train was not operated with proper lights, signals, or lookouts on approaching a crossing need not be proved by direct and positive testimony, but may be sufficiently shown by the circumstances existing at the time.[54] The failure of defendant's trains to give the proper signals on approaching a crossing may be sufficiently shown by circumstantial evidence.[55] All other things being equal the positive testimony of witnesses that the proper signals were given at the time of the accident is, as a general rule, entitled to greater weight and cannot be overcome by the negative testimony of witnesses that they did not hear such signals,[56] especially where a greater number of credible witnesses testify to the fact that the signals were given.[57] This rule, however, is not a conclusive one but may be greatly modified in a given case by the character and interest of the witnesses, their means of knowledge, manner of testifying, and other circumstances.[58] If the attention of the negative witnesses is specially directed to the fact, or it can be legitimately inferred that they were alert and were in a position to have heard the signals had they been given, their testimony that the signals were not given is not necessarily weaker than the opposing positive testimony that they were given, but generally is of as much value as the testimony of those that they were sounded,[59] and may indeed be entitled to more weight than the latter.[60] Where there is no evidence that proper signals were given the testimony of a single witness may be sufficient to show that they were not given.[61]

(D) Contributory Negligence — (1) IN GENERAL. Except where there were eye-witnesses to the accident, and direct and positive testimony on the subject is possible,[62] it is not required that the question of contributory negligence should be proved by direct testimony; but it is sufficient if facts and circumstances are shown from which there might be a reasonable inference of due care,[63] or want 434, holding that testimony of a fireman whose duty it is to ring the bell when the engine is in motion "that, although he had no independent recollection of ringing it on a certain occasion, yet it was his uniform and invariable habit to ring it, so that it had become second nature with him to do so, and that from these facts he was able to state positively that he did ring it on the occasion referred to," is sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the bell was rung notwithstanding the testimony of other witnesses that they were in position to have heard it if it had been rung, and that it was not rung.

Evidence held sufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff, based on the negligence of a railroad company in not causing the proper signals to be given, as shown by positive and negative testimony see Maricopa, etc., R. Suppl. 827 (holding that where defendant introduced no evidence of any signal of the approach of a train to a crossing, and two witnesses having no relation to either party who were sufficiently close to the train to have heard a whistle or bell if it had been sounded testified that they heard neither whistle nor bell, the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding of negligence on the part of defendant); McGrath v. New York Cent., etc., R. App. 1898) 48 S. W. 527.

Testimony of witnesses who do not show that they would likely have heard the signals if sounded that they did not hear them is not sufficient to show that the signals were not given. Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Reed, 40 Ill. App. 47; Hubbard v. Austin, etc., R. Co., 159 Mass. 320, 39 N. E. 459; Clark v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 17 Misc. (N. Y.) 113, 40 N. Y. Suppl. 730.

The rule of comparative value does not apply where witnesses testify positively to the fact that the signals were given and other witnesses testify positively to the fact that they were not given, and the only question is as to which side, under all the circumstances, the greater credit is due. Racine v. Erie R. Co., 69 N. Y. App. Div. 437, 74 N. Y. Suppl. 977, holding that where plaintiff's witnesses, for the most part disinterested, testify positively that no whistle was sounded or bell rung and defendant's witnesses equally entitled to be believed testify positively to the contrary, a judgment for plaintiff will not be disturbed.

E. 1140] (holding that, although the engineer and fireman on the locomotive which caused the injury testified that its bell was rung and its whistle sounded as it approached the crossing, there is sufficient evidence for the jury to find that such signals were not given in the testimony of one who was one hundred and fifty feet away and saw the accident and observed and detailed all the circumstances and testified that he did not hear the bell rung or the whistle blown, although stating that he was not paying any attention to the bell); Smith v. Rio Grande, etc., R. of due care,[64] on the part of the person injured. It has been held, however, that it is only where the accident results in death and where there are no eye-witnesses of the occurrence,[65] or where the danger is so remote that if seen it nevertheless may be disregarded in the exercise of proper care,[66] that freedom from contributory negligence may be established by circumstantial evidence. Where plaintiff could have seen the approaching train, and he testifies that he actually looked for it, and concededly heard its noise, it is incumbent on him to testify expressly as to whether or not he saw the train, and his freedom from contributory negligence as dependent upon that fact cannot be established by circumstantial evidence. Seidman v. Long Island R. Co., 104 N. Y. App. Div. 4, 93 N. Y. Suppl. 209.

Contradictory testimony.— Where upon all the testimony plaintiff is entitled to recover, the mere fact that his own testimony is contradictory as to whether he stopped just before he attempted to cross should not bar a recovery, as the most that can be said is that such way of testifying may be due to his confusion which existed at the time of the accident. dence that he was familiar with the crossing and that it was his habit and custom to stop, look, and listen for trains when approaching the crossing where the accident occurred.[76] Testimony that the person injured looked and listened before crossing is legally insufficient to establish freedom from contributory negligence where it appears that it was physically impossible not to see or hear if he had looked or listened,[77] since such testimony is incredible as a matter of law,[78] although uncontradicted by the direct testimony of other witnesses,[79] and does not even create a conflict of evidence.[80] That the person injured was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to stop, look, or listen should also be established by direct testimony where possible,[81] although in its absence circumstantial evidence may be sufficient.[82] But it is only where it appears from the evidence that he might have seen if he had looked or might have heard if he had listened that the jury is authorized to find that the person injured did not look and listen.[83]

f. Damages. While in some jurisdictions the measure of damages for injuries received in an accident at a railroad crossing is regulated by statute,[84] in the absence of statute the rules governing damages in civil cases generally control the question of damages in such actions.[85] As a general rule the damages should be merely compensatory for the injuries received,[86] taking into consideration the injured person's expenses, his loss of time, his diminished capacity for labor, and his suffering,[87] and deducting for proper matters of mitigation.[88] Exemplary or punitive damages may be recovered where the railroad employees were guilty of wilful or wanton negligence or malice,[89] and where such acts were authorized by the company or were subsequently ratified by it with full knowledge of all the facts;[90] but not where the company is guilty of mere ordinary negligence.[91] railroad crossing as in other civil cases, the evidence has a two-fold sufficiency, a sufficiency in law and a sufficiency in fact. Of the former the court is the exclusive judge, and of the latter the jury is.[94] The measure and quantity of proof is a question for the court, but when submitted to the jury its weight and sufficiency to establish the fact is for them.[95] If there is any evidence, although doubtful or confusing, from which the jury might reasonably find the existence of the fact in issue, the issue as to whether or not the railroad company was guilty of negligence,[96] or the person injured of contributory negligence,[97] should be submitted to the jury for determination. Accordingly if the evidence is conflicting or not conclusive the issue as to whether the railroad company was guilty of

Thus there is sufficient evidence of negligence to be submitted to the jury where it is sworn that the person injured was seen approaching the railroad track in a vehicle just before the passing of a train; that immediately after the train passed he and the horses were found dead at the crossing; and that the statutory signals were not given. Where there is doubt as to the inference to be drawn from the facts or where the measure of duty is ordinary and reasonable care and the degree of care required varies with the circumstances, the question of the negligence is necessarily for the jury. Where a statute provides that contributory negligence shall not preclude a recovery but shall be taken in mitigation of damages and the jury may find under the evidence that defendant railroad company in such case is at fault, it is not error for the court to refuse to direct a general verdict for defendant. negligence or the person injured of contributory negligence is for the jury to determine.[98] Nor can the court declare a fact established as a matter of law where the evidence is such that reasonable men might come to a different conclusion as to the existence of the fact.[99] If, however, there is no conflict or the evidence is legally insufficient to justify the jury in finding that a fact exists the issue should not be submitted to them; but the court may dismiss or nonsuit, or direct a verdict or judgment, or otherwise dispose of the case without the intervention of the jury.[1]

(III) Character of Crossing. In accordance with the above rule where there is sufficient evidence tending to establish such fact, it is a question for the jury whether or not the railroad crossing at which the accident occurred is a public crossing,[2] as whether it is a public crossing by dedication [3] or prescription,[4]

If the evidence fails to establish all the essential facts, either directly or by rational deduction, as where there is a failure of evidence in respect to any material fact involved in the issue, the evidence is not legally sufficient to justify a finding upon the issue that it is offered to sustain, and it becomes the plain duty of the judge to instruct accordingly, for in such case the jury has no duty to perform. Whether the crossing was on a public traveled road is a question for the jury where the evidence tends to show such a user of the crossing by the public for more than twenty years as would have justified a record of the road as a highway by the proper authorities, if they had performed their duty. 4. McCarthy v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 76 N. Y. 592.

Whether the crossing is a highway by prescription should be submitted to the jury where there is evidence that at the place there is planking between the tracks, that for more than twenty years it has been in or by the acquiescence and consent of the railroad company;[5] and whether an inducement has been held out by the railroad company to the public to use the crossing.[6] It is also a question for the jury to determine the width of the crossing or traveled place, when in issue,[7] or to determine whether or not the crossing is a dangerous one,[8] or whether or not the place at which the accident occurred is a part of the crossing.[9]

(IV) DEFECTS AND OBSTRUCTIONS AT CROSSINGS. Except where the evidence is clear and undisputed,[10] it is likewise a question for the jury as to whether or not the railroad company was negligent in the construction and maintenance of the crossing,[11] or in allowing standing engines or cars,[12] or other obstruc-the same condition, and that it had been used continuously by the public, together with the offer of evidence that from three thousand to five thousand persons pass there daily. Johanson v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 153 Mass. 57, 26 N. E. 426.

Whether or not a "trodden path" across a railroad has been so continuously and notoriously used by the public as to constitute an acquiescence on the part of the railroad company in such use so as to affect the degree of care which it must exercise as to persons using such path is a question for the jury. (v) FRIGHTENING ANIMALS. Where in an action for injuries resulting from the frightening of a horse or team at a railroad crossing the evidence as to such fact is conflicting, or there is some doubt as to the inferences to be drawn, it is a question for the jury as to whether or not the railroad company was negligent in respect to the particular act or omission in the management of its trains or road which caused the fright,[16] such as whether it was negligent in suddenly driving its engines or trains over the crossing without giving the proper signals,[17] or in sounding the whistle,[18] or permitting steam to escape,[19] or in permitting cars [20]

(VI) Sign-Boards, Signals, Flagmen, and Gates at Crossings. Whether or not the railroad company used proper care in the maintenance of sign-boards,[22] signals, or warnings,[23] or flagmen and gates at the crossing at the time of the accident, is ordinarily a question for the jury.[24] Thus, except in an extreme case, it is ordinarily a question for the jury, in the absence of statute, whether, under all the circumstances of the particular case, such as the amount of travel over the crossing, obstructions, etc., the railroad company was negligent in not having a flagman or gates at the crossing at the time of the accident,[25] even where the facts respecting the situation are undisputed;[26] although the construction of a statute or ordinance requiring a railroad company to keep a flagman or gates at the crossing is for the court alone.[27] Likewise it is a question for the jury whether or not a flagman or gateman stationed at the crossing exercised the proper degree of care in the performance of his duties at the time of the accident.[28]

(VII) MODE OF RUNNING AT CROSSINGS IN GENERAL. Whether or not the railroad company used proper care and precautions in the management or operation of its train or cars in approaching or passing over a crossing at the time of the accident is generally a question for the jury to determine from all the circumstances of the particular case.[29] Thus it is a question for the jury whether under all the circumstances the railroad company was negligent in approaching a crossing at a rapid or unlawful rate of speed without giving the proper signals;[30] or whether, in addition to giving the customary or statutory signals, it should have, in the exercise of reasonable care, taken other precautions to avoid injuries to travelers.[31]

conflicting or there is some doubt as to the inferences to be drawn from the facts proven, it is a question of fact for the jury whether or not the train which caused the injury gave the proper or statutory signals as it approached the crossing at the time of the accident.[32] Thus where some witnesses testify that the proper signals were given and plaintiff or others testify that they were not given or that they did not hear them, although they were listening or were in a position to hear them had they been given, the question whether or not the bell was rung or the whistle sounded is one of fact and should be submitted to the jury.[33] So it is a

To warrant the submission of the question to the jury, where positive evidence is adduced to the fact that the signals were given, there must be something more than the testimony of witnesses that they did not hear the signals, and it must appear that their attention was attracted to the fact so that their evidence would tend to negative that of defendant. Stewart v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 119 Mich. 91, 77 N. W. 643 (evidence held insufficient); Glennon v. Erie R. Co., 86 N. Y. App. Div. 397, 83 N. Y. Suppl. 875 [affirmed in 180 N. Y. 562, 73 N. St. 417, 26 Atl. 105, 19 L. R. A. 563. The testimony of a passenger that no whistle was blown or bell rung at the regular distance from the crossing — that he did not hear any — is not enough to go to the jury on the question as against the testimony of engineer, fireman, conductor, and brakemen. Knox v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 202 Pa. St. 504, 52 Atl. 90.

Where the evidence is contradictory as to whether the approaching train gave a signal, the case should be submitted to the jury with proper explanations as to the relative value of the testimony of those who said positively that they had heard the signal and the negative testimony of those who simply testified that they had not heard it. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Moffatt, 56 Kan. 667, 44 Pac. 607; Salathe v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 28 Pa. Super. Ct. 1. Although as a matter of law, where witnesses are of equal credit, positive evidence that a signal was given is entitled to more weight than that of witnesses who say that they did not hear the signals, yet the position and situation of the witnesses, the attention they were giving and their credibility are questions for the jury and it is within their province to weigh the evidence and determine its value. ordinance,[37] or in failing to display proper lights,[38] or to keep a proper lookout from its train or cars;[39] although it has been held that a failure to give the statutory signals is negligence per se and the court may so charge,[40] and even in the absence of statute, the court may charge that it was negligence to fail to give signals, under the circumstances of the particular case, as where the undisputed facts show that it was clearly dangerous for the particular train to approach without signals, and no excuse is shown for the omission.[41] So it is a question for the jury as to what signals ordinary care would require under the circumstances of the particular case,[42] or whether or not the signals which were given,[43] or the lights which were displayed,[44] were sufficient.

Whether or not the failure to give a signal at an overhead crossing is negligence is for the jury. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Ogles, 73 S. W. 751, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 2160; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Shearer, 59 S. W. 330, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 929.

Whether a light on a train is a conspicuous light within the meaning of a city ordinance requiring a conspicuous light on all moving trains at night is a question of fact for the jury. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Condon, 108 Ill. App. 639.

(B) Method of Moving Trains or Cars. It is also a question of fact for the jury where the evidence is conflicting or doubtful whether defendant company exercised due care in moving a train or cars which had been standing at the crossing,[45] as whether there were proper lights on the cars at the time,[46] or proper signals were given before starting; [47] or whether or not it was negligence to move the train or cars without a previous signal or warning.[48] Likewise it is a question for the jury whether a backing train gave the proper signals,[49] or had a proper lookout on the car furthest from the engine; [50] or whether under the circumstances the railroad company was negligent in backing an engine or cars,[51] or in kicking or running unattended cars,[52] or in making a flying switch,[53] over the crossing without the proper lights, signals, or lookouts.

Where the mode of running cars by "kicking" is explained to the jury, with the situation of the tracks where cars were so run across a street at night, and the character of the night as to darkness, and of the street as to the extent to which it was traveled, the question whether that mode of running the cars was more dangerous or any more convenient than running them with the engine is a proper question to be submitted to the jury. injured person's view or hearing at the crossing at which the accident occurred was obstructed, and that the train which caused the accident approached the crossing at a rapid or unlawful rate of speed without giving any or the proper signals, the question of defendant's negligence is for the jury,[54] including the question whether or not the view or hearing was in fact obstructed,[55] and the question whether or not any signal was given.[56]

(IX) RATE OF SPEED. Where the evidence is conflicting or doubtful it is a question for the jury to determine at what rate of speed the train was running at the time of the accident,[57] and whether or not, under the circumstances existing at the particular time and crossing, such rate of speed, although not in violation of a statute or ordinance,[58] was negligent,[59] as whether or not it was negligent to Texas.— In the absence of a statute or ordinance prescribing the rate of speed at which a train may run, it is a question for the jury to determine whether or not under any circumstances the speed of the train was negligence. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Melugin, (Civ. App. 1901) 63 S. W. 338.

United States.— Shatto v. Erie R. Co., 121 Fed. 678, 59 C. C. A. 1, speed in violation of ordinance.

It is not in every case where a fault in respect to speed is alleged that the question must be submitted to the jury; but if it be clearly shown that on the occasion in question the rate of speed was not greater than that which had been usually practised before, with the tacit consent of the community and without accident, it should not be considered an open question whether running at that rate was negligence. Wilds v. Hudson River R. Co., 29 N. Y. 315.

Evidence held insufficient to take the case to the jury.— There is no evidence to go to the jury that a train was running at too high a speed at the crossing of a country road where the only testimony as to excessive speed is that of a passenger who, after saying that he could not tell how many miles an hour it was running, as he had no way of measuring it, said that it was running sixty miles an hour, and this is opposed to the schedule of the train, and the positive testimony of the engineer. Knox v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 202 Pa. St. 504, 52 Atl. 90. So proof of a high rate of speed at a crossing when accompanied by an exhibition of facts showing proper safeguards for the customary and ordinary use of the crossing is insufficient to take the case to the jury. Custer v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 365 [affirmed in 206 Pa. St. 529, 55 Atl. 1130].

The court cannot instruct the jury that a given rate of speed does or does not constitute negligence on the part of the railroad company. Kirby v. Southern R. Co., 63 S. C. 494, 41 S. E. 765.

Illustrations.— Thus it is a question for the jury whether or not the railroad company was negligent in running an engine and tender through a town at a high rate of speed (Risinger v. Southern R. Co., 59 S. C. 429, 38 S. E. 1); or in running through a small village at the rate of thirty-five miles an hour (Wabash, etc., R. Co. v. Hicks, 13 Ill. App. 407); or in running over a much traveled street at the rate of forty (Waldele v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 4 N. Y. App. Div. 549, 38 N. Y. Suppl. 1009); or twenty-five miles an hour (De Lode v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 92 Hun (N. Y.) 149, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 697 [affirmed in 157 N. Y. 688, 51 N. E. 1090]; or in running at forty miles an hour over a graded crossing without maintaining a flagman (Huntress v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 66 N. H. 185, 34 Atl. 154, 49 Am. St. Rep. 600); and such question cannot be decided by the court on a motion for a nonsuit (Risinger v. Southern R. Co., 59 S. C. 429, 38 S. E. 1).

W. 402; Noble v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 20 N. Y. App. Div. 40, 46 N. Y. Suppl. 645 [affirmed in 161 N. Y. 620, 55 N. E. 1098]; Bleyle v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 11 N. Y. St. 585 [affirmed in 113 N. Y. 626, 20 N. E. 877].

Illustrations.— It is a question for the jury whether it was negligent for the railroad company to run through a fog at a crossing at the rate of eighteen miles an hour (Denton v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 75 N. Y. App. Div. 619, 78 N. Y. Suppl. 157), or to run a train over a public crossing in a town at twenty miles an hour, when the view of the track was obstructed for a considerable distance (International, etc., R. Co. v. Starling, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 365, 41 S. W. 181).

61. Zeigler v. Northeastern R. Co., 5 S. C 221.

(x) Precautions as to Persons Seen At or Near Crossing. Except where there is no evidence, or it is legally insufficient, as where it is too speculative or uncertain, to justify its submission to the jury,[62] it is a question for the jury whether or not defendant's engineer and other employees in charge of the engine or train causing the accident were negligent in not discovering plaintiff's peril in time to avoid injuring him,[63] or whether or not after discovering plaintiff's peril they used all reasonable means within their power to avoid injuring him,[64] as whether they used all reasonable endeavors to slacken the speed,[65] or to stop the train,[66] in time to avoid the injury. But where the evidence conclusively shows that it was impossible for the engineer or other employee to avoid the collision, after he discovered plaintiff's peril, by the exercise of the utmost degree of care, it is error for the court to submit the issue of defendant's negligence to the jury.[67]

Where there is no evidence that those in charge of the locomotive saw plaintiff in time to avoid the accident, in an action for injury sustained by one guilty of contributory negligence, the question as to defendant's negligence cannot be submitted to the jury. Where there is evidence that defendant's trainmen could have slackened the speed of the train if they had acted when they knew or ought to have known of the injured person's attempt to cross in front of the train, but did not do so, whether they could or ought to have done so is for the jury. A failure to reverse the engine is sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that defendant might have reduced the speed of the train so as to avoid the collision. Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. Forshee, 125 Ala. 199, 27 So. 1006.

Evidence held insufficient to go to the jury see Sites v. Knott, 197 Mo. 684, 96 S. W. 206; Walker v. Wabash R. Co., 193 Mo. 453, 92 S. W. 83.

Error of judgment.— Where the evidence shows that the engineer was unable to avoid a collision after discovering plaintiff's peril, and that he had the alternative of putting on full steam and striking the horses or applying the brakes and striking the vehicle and he does the latter, the question as to whether or not he was negligent should not be submitted to the jury as the facts show that his doing so was a mere error of judgment on which negligence cannot be imputed. (xi) Contributory Negligence — (a) In General. The rule is well established that where the evidence upon such issue is conflicting,[68] or where the case is not free from doubt, and candid and intelligent men might reach different conclusions upon the facts,[69] it is not for the court to lay down as a matter of law what precautions a person injured at a railroad crossing should have taken, or to direct a verdict for defendant or grant a nonsuit; but whether or not under all the circumstances such person was guilty of contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury.[70] In like manner where the evidence is conflicting or Illustrations.— It has been held a question for the jury whether the injured person was guilty of contributory negligence in crossing the track at a different angle from that at which it was usually crossed (Whelan v. Arcata, etc., R. Co., 92 Cal. 669, 28 Pac. 833); in driving up to the crossing at a slow trot (Totten v. New York, etc., R. Co., 10 N. Y. Suppl. 572); in not descending from his vehicle and leading his horses across the tracks, where he starts to drive a team over eleven tracks at a grade crossing (Newton v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 18 Pa. Super. Ct. 18); or in driving his automobile toward the crossing at about fifteen miles an hour at the time of the collision (Record v. Pennsylvania R. Co., (N. J. Sup. 1907) 67 Atl. 1040).

constituting such negligence is for the jury.[71] Where, however, the fact that the person injured did not use the proper degree of care so clearly appears from the circumstances and undisputed evidence as to leave no inference or fact in doubt,[72] as where such fact appears from plaintiff's own unrebutted testimony or evidence,[73] and there is no evidence of wilfulness or wantonness on the part

Whether a parent's negligence contributed to the death of his child whom he allowed to go visiting unattended, without having been specially cautioned, when he knew such child would have to pass the railroad tracks, where it was injured, is a question for the jury. Gross negligence.— Where in an action under Mass. Rev. Laws, c. 111, § 268, the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that the person injured or killed was guilty of gross negligence or was engaged in committing an unlawful act, the court should order a verdict for defendant. McDonald v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 186 Mass. 474, 72 N. E. 55.

Whether the presumption of due care on the part of a person killed at a railroad crossing has been rebutted is for the jury, unless the evidence to the contrary is so clear as to justify the court in holding that a verdict against defendant must be set aside as a matter of law. of defendant,[74] the question of contributory negligence is one of law for the court and it may grant a nonsuit, direct a verdict for defendant, or otherwise dispose of the case. injured at a railroad crossing, is ordinarily a question for the jury, unless the undisputed evidence clearly shows that such person failed to exercise ordinary care,[78] or that he exercised such care.[79] Thus it is ordinarily a question for the jury whether under the circumstances the injured child used such care as a child of his age and intelligence should have used,[80] whether he was of sufficient maturity to be adjudged guilty of negligence,[81] or whether the particular child was chargeable with the same degree of care as an adult.[82]

(c) Use of Defective or Obstructed Crossing. It is also a question for the jury whether under all the circumstances the person injured was justified in using a defective crossing;[83] and whether he used due care in passing over such a crossing,[84] notwithstanding he knew of its defective condition,[85] provided it was not necessarily dangerous.[86] Likewise whether or not the injured person used due care in crossing an obstructed crossing,[87] as in passing between, over, or around standing Frightening animals.— Thus it has been held a question for the jury whether or not the person injured used due care in riding or driving over a crossing whereby he was injured by his horse becoming frightened at cinders piled in the highway (Illinois Cent., etc., R. Co. v. Griffin, 184 Ill. 9, 56 N. E. 337 [affirming 84 Ill. App. 152]), or at cars standing on the crossing (Young v. Detroit, etc., R. Co., 56 Mich. 430, 23 N. W. 67; Welborne v. Gulf, etc., R. Co., 35 Tex. Civ. App. 401, 80 S. W. 653; International, etc., R. Co. v. Mercer, (Tex. Civ. App. 1904) 78 S. W. 562; Locke v. International, etc., R.

cars,[88] is usually a question for the jury, unless the whole evidence upon which plaintiff rests his case shows that the injured person did not use due care in such attempt.[89]

(D) Duty to Stop, Look, and Listen — (1) IN GENERAL. Where the evidence is conflicting, or the question is not free from doubt from the facts proved, it is a question for the jury whether under all the circumstances the person injured used due care in looking and listening for an approaching train before going on the crossing,[90] or whether or not his failure to look and listen before crossing was Co., 25 Tex. Civ. App. 145, 60 S. W. 314); or whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in returning by a public crossing obstructed by defendant's cars where he was injured by his horse shying, where there is evidence that when he crossed it a short time before the horse had also shied (Rusterholtz v. New York, etc., R. Co., 191 Pa. St. 390, 43 Atl. 208).

Whether it is gross negligence to attempt to pass between the cars of a train occupying a public crossing, in an emergency, and in reliance on the duty of the company to give the statutory signals before moving the train, is a question for the jury. Walker v. Southern R. Co., 77 S. C. 161, 57 S. E. 764.

Trespasser.— Whether one making a reasonable use of cars at a crossing for the sole purpose of crossing the tracks is a trespasser, where the cars have obstructed the highway for a longer time than the law allows, is a question for the jury. Littlejohn v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 49 S. C. 12, 26 S. E. 967. Likewise whether one who in passing around standing cars continues straight across the right of way instead of returning to the crossing is a trespasser is a question for the jury. Mayer v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 63 Ill. App. 309.

89. Gahagan v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 1 Allen (Mass.) 187, 79 Am. Dec. 724, holding that an attempt to pass between cars in motion propelled by an engine, if no reason appears to justify the attempt, shows such want of care as to justify the court in instructing the jury as a matter of law that the action cannot be maintained.

An attempt at night to cross over a freight train, to which an engine is attached while the train is blocking the way, whereby his heel becomes caught between the bumpers is negligence as a matter of law. Southern R. Co. v. Clark, 105 S. W. 384, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 69, 13 L. R. A. N. S. 1071.

Whether or not the injured person ought to have discovered the approaching train and avoided the collision is a question for the jury where the evidence shows that he looked in both directions on approaching the crossing. Keese v. New York, etc., R. Co., 67 Barb. (N. Y.) 205.

contributory negligence.[91] But where the evidence clearly shows that the injured person could by the exercise of ordinary care in looking and listening have avoided the injury, the question of his contributory negligence is one of law for the court, and it may direct a verdict for defendant, grant a nonsuit, dismiss, or otherwise dispose of the case.[92]

(2) Opportunity to See or Hear Train. Where the evidence clearly shows that the injured person's opportunity for seeing or hearing the approaching train at the time of the accident was such that he could not fail to have seen or heard it in time to avert the accident if he had used due care in looking and listening, his contributory negligence in this respect should not be submitted to the jury but is a question for the court and it may direct a verdict for defendant, grant a nonsuit, dismiss, or otherwise dispose of the case without the intervention of the jury,[93] even though plaintiff testifies that he stopped, looked, and listened,

St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Knowles, 6 Kan. App. 790, 51 Pac. 230.

the injured person to fail to stop and look and listen before going on the crossing,[1] or whether he exercised due care in stopping and looking and listening at the proper place and time.[2] Whether or not such person did in fact stop and look and listen is a question for the jury where the evidence is conflicting.[3] So whether the presumption that the person injured stopped, looked, and listened before crossing is rebutted is for the jury,[4] unless the evidence to the contrary is either uncontradicted or is so undisputable that a verdict against it would be set aside as a matter of law.[5]

(4) TIME, PLACE, AND DIRECTION FOR LOOKING AND LISTENING.[6] Where the undisputed facts establish that the person injured did not look and listen, or stop, look, and listen, at a proper time and place for ascertaining the approach of trains his contributory negligence is a question of law for the court.[7] But where the evidence is conflicting, or the facts are left in doubt, it is a question for the jury whether under the circumstances he used due care in looking and listening,[8]

7. Wojochoski v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co., 10 Pa. Super. Ct. 469.

Where the evidence most favorable to plaintiff establishes that he stopped at a place where he could not see and then drove on passing a point with which he was familiar, from which he could have seen the track for a considerable distance, and where reasonable prudence dictated that he should have stopped, looked, and listened, the question of contributory negligence is one of law and the court should take the case from the jury. Whether the omission to look at the instant of stepping on the track was negligence is a question for the jury. Plummer v. Eastern R. Co., 73 Me. 591.

That from a certain point on the road the person injured could see an approaching train at a distance of one-half a mile is not ground for taking the case from the jury, when there is evidence tending to show that at the respective rates of speed of such person and the train he must have passed that point before the train came within view therefrom. Hendrickson v. Great Northern R. Co., 52 Minn. 340, 54 N. W. 189.

or in stopping, looking, and listening,[9] at a proper time and place. Likewise where such person has looked and listened at one place, whether he was negligent in not looking and listening, or in not stopping, looking, and listening again, is a question for the jury.[10] Whether he used due care in looking in both directions is also a question for the jury,[11] unless the evidence shows that he looked only in one direction, when the approaching train could have been discovered if he had looked also in the opposite direction.[12]

(5) Crossing After Passing Trains.[13] Whether a person is negligent in crossing immediately after a passing train without looking or listening for a following train or cars,[14] or whether in such case he used due care in stopping, looking, and listening for approaching trains before crossing,[15] is ordinarily a question for the jury.

(6) ATTENTION ATTRACTED BY OTHER TRAIN.[16] Whether a person is negligent in failing to observe the approaching train or cars which injured him while his attention was attracted to other trains or cars is a question for the jury, where the evidence is conflicting or the facts are in doubt.[17]

(7) OCCUPANT OF VEHICLE DRIVEN BY ANOTHER. Whether or not an occupant of a vehicle driven by another used due care in looking or listening or in taking other proper precautions at the time of the accident is ordinarily a question for the jury.[18]

(8) WHERE VIEW OR HEARING IS OBSTRUCTED — (a) IN GENERAL. Whether a person who was injured at a crossing at which his view or hearing of approaching trains was obstructed exercised proper care and precaution in going on the track,[19]

(c) Duty of Driver to Go Ahead and Look and Listen. Whether a driver of a vehicle on approaching a crossing at which his view or hearing is obstructed should get out of his vehicle and go ahead to a more favorable point for the purpose of ascertaining whether a train is approaching is a question for the jury under all the circumstances.[29]

(d) Time and Place For Looking and Listening. Likewise it is a question for the jury whether under the circumstances the person injured looked and listened at the proper time and place,[30] or whether he stopped and looked and listened at a proper place,[31] or whether having looked and listened at one point he should have again exercised such precautions at another point.[32]

(e) Crossing Behind Passing Train. Whether a person whose view or hearing was obstructed at the time used due care in stopping, looking, or listening for approaching trains before going on the crossing behind a passing train,[33] as whether

Whether an attempt to cross while the nearer gates are open, although the opposite gates are closed, is negligence is a question for the jury. Haywood v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 13 N. Y. Suppl. 177 (holding that it is for the jury to determine whether the person injured might not prudently have regarded the fact that the gate was open as an assurance that while it was in that position no train would pass; and whether he had reasonable grounds for supposing that the opposite gate would be open when reached by him); Startz v. Pennsylvania, etc., Canal, etc., Co., 16 N. or about to pass, his contributory negligence in attempting to cross while the gates are closed is a question for the jury.[56]

(F) Effect of Directions of Railroad Employees. Where the evidence is conflicting or the inferences to be drawn therefrom are in doubt, it is a question for the jury whether the person injured exercised proper care in attempting to cross upon the signal, invitation, or direction of a railroad employee,[57] as upon a signal of safety by the watchman or gateman;[58] or whether he exercised proper care in attempting to cross in spite of a warning of danger, but which he misunderstood.[59]

(G) Crossing Near Standing or Approaching Trains or Cars. Except where the evidence is undisputed, or the only inference that can be drawn therefrom is that the person injured did not exercise ordinary care,[60] it is a question for the jury whether under the circumstances, such person exercised due care in attempting to cross near standing cars which were suddenly moved,[61] or in front of approaching trains or cars.[62]

An attempt to cross in front of an engine standing near a crossing is not so inherently dangerous as to prevent a recovery for damages if the engine is unexpectedly started forward, but the question whether the person injured was guilty of negligence where such an engine is moved without giving any signal is for the jury. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Dawson, 64 Kan. 99, 67 Pac. 521.

An attempt to cross between cars which were moving but which fact plaintiff did not discover, although he looked before he attempted to cross, does not sufficiently show contributory negligence to warrant withdrawing the case from the jury. Where the testimony indicates that plaintiff might have been negligent in several ways in going on the crossing, and yet that such negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury, and the question as to what was the proximate cause is directly at issue, it is properly submitted to the jury. San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Votaw, (Tex. Civ. App. 1904) 81 S. W. 130.

that it was possible that defendant's negligence caused the injury,[65] or merely raises a conjecture that it was so,[66] or where no inference can be drawn from the evidence that defendant's negligence contributed to the injury,[67] it should not be submitted to the jury.

(XIII) INJURY AVOIDABLE NOTWITHSTANDING CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE. Whether, notwithstanding negligence or imprudence on the part of the person injured, the railroad company could have avoided the injury by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence is ordinarily a question for the jury.[68]

(XIV) WILFUL, WANTON, OR GROSS NEGLIGENCE. It is also a question for the jury whether negligence on the part of the railroad company's employees is such as to make it guilty of wanton, wilful,[69] or gross [70] negligence, unless the evidence in respect thereto is undisputed.[71]

h. Instructions [72] — (I) FORM AND SUFFICIENCY IN GENERAL. Instructions in an action for injuries at a railroad crossing are governed by the rules applying in civil cases generally.[73] In accordance with such rules the instructions must be in conformity with the evidence,[74] and with the pleadings and

defect in an instruction is one of form it can be reached only by specific objection,[87] or by a requested instruction correcting the defect.[88]

(II) Province of Court and Jury. It is the province of the court, in an action for injuries received at a railroad crossing, to accurately charge the law governing the facts in the case,[89] as by charging as to the care and precaution that should be taken at a railroad crossing by defendant,[90] or by the person injured;[91] but in the absence of statute or other provision to the contrary it is ordinarily erroneous for the court to invade the province of the jury by charging on the weight of the evidence,[92] as by assuming a given state of facts to exist, or not to exist, and charging that they do or do not constitute negligence on the part of defendant,[93] or do or do not constitute contributory negligence on the part of the

89. Pennsylvania Co. v. Frana, 112 Ill. 398 (holding that it is proper to give an instruction merely informing the jury that it is a question of fact for their determination from the evidence what a person approaching a railroad crossing should do in order to constitute care for his safety and what the train operators should do to constitute ordinary care for the safety of others); Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Elmore, 67 Ill. 176. Thus an instruction that the law makes a railroad company liable per se where that is the inevitable result is not an erroneous charge, although the statute does not use those words. Smith v. Southern R. Co., 53 S. C. 121, 30 S. E. 697.

An instruction which restricts the inquiry to the instant when the accident occurred is erroneous. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Kief, 111 Ill. App. 354.

All the essential elements of the negligence charged upon should be stated in the instructions. Peoria, etc., R. Co. v. Clayberg, 107 Ill. 644; Landon v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 92 Ill. App. 216. An instruction which omits no fundamental principle or indispensable condition to a recovery, or which omits matters merely suppletory in their character, which might properly be presented in a separate instruction, is not erroneous. Peoria, etc., R. Co. v. Clayberg, supra. An instruction which merely gives the rule as to the measure of damages is not erroneous because it omits the necessary elements of plaintiff's case, since the instruction does not purport to state hypothetically the elements necessary to constitute a cause of action. person injured,[94] unless the measure of duty is fixed by law and is the same under all circumstances,[95] or the evidence is undisputed,[96] or unless there is such an obvious disregard of duty and safety as amounts to misconduct.[97]

(III) CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS AND ISSUES. The instructions must conform to the pleadings and issues in the case.[98] Thus an instruction is erroneous if it ignores some of the grounds of recovery relied on,[99] or if it submits to the Instructions held not erroneous as being on the weight of the evidence see St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Odum, 156 Ill. 78, 40 N. E. 559 [affirming 52 Ill. App. 519]; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Lankford, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 593, 29 S. W. 933; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Carr, 106 Va. 508, 56 S. E. 276.

Where it is alleged and proved that the injury occurred by stepping into a hole in a bridge built by defendant railroad, over a ditch on its right of way along the side of the track at a highway crossing, the court may assume that the bridge was a part of the crossing and so treat it in giving instructions. 98. See San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Bergsland, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 97, 34 S. W. 155.

Instructions held proper under the pleadings and issues see Annaker v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 81 Iowa 267, 47 N. W. 68 (as to speed at which train was running); McKerley v. Red River, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1905) 85 S. W. 499, 99 Tex. 16, 86 S. W. 921; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Spradling, 72 Fed. 152, 18 C. C. A. 496. Thus where it is alleged that plaintiff's intestate was killed at or near a street crossing, it is not error to instruct the jury that it is not necessary that it should appear that deceased when killed was exactly and technically on the crossing provided he was substantially using it and it was his purpose to cross there in the ordinary and usual way. Cowen v. Merriman, 17 App. Cas. (D. C.) 186. So an instruction setting forth the negligence of a railroad company in backing a train and then stopping and backing further is not inapplicable by reason of the fact that nothing is said in the declaration about the stoppage, and the backing is charged merely as one act. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Larson, 42 Ill. App. 264.

Instructions held improper as not conforming to the pleadings and issues see Cowen v. Merriman, 17 App. Cas. (D. C.) 186; Southern R. Co. v. Reynolds, 126 Ga. 657, 55 S. E. 1039; Southern R. Co., 114 Mo. App. 504, 89 S. W. 893; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Peay, (Tex. 1892) 20 S. W. 57. Thus where the issue is whether bushes on the right of way obstructed the view, an instruction that the law does not require a railroad company to prevent bushes from growing on its right of way so as to obstruct the view of persons using the crossing is erroneous. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Sanders, 154 Ill. 531, 39 N. E. 481 [affirming 55 Ill. App. 87]. So where it is alleged that no headlight was burning, that no whistle was sounded or bell rung, the question of speed may be material and a charge that it is immaterial is properly refused. Thomas v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 86 Mich. 496, 49 N. W. 547.

Wilful or wanton negligence.— Under an allegation that defendant "wilfully, wantonly, and recklessly" did the acts complained of, an instruction authorizing a recovery for negligence alone is erroneous. Proctor v. Southern R. Co., 61 S. C. 170, 39 S. E. 351. An instruction on the theory of wilful or wanton negligence is erroneous where it is not alleged or proved that defendant was wilfully or wantonly negligent. Wabash R. Co. v. Larrick, 84 Ill. App. 520; Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Baker, (Indian Terr. 1907) 104 S. W. 1182 [reversed on other grounds in (Okla. 1908) 95 Pac. 433].

Error cured.—An instruction defining what the statute requires of railroad companies as to the weight and use of bells is not prejudicial error, although the weight of the bell was not in issue, where all the clauses of the charge submitting the issues authorize a verdict for plaintiff only in case of the negligence of defendant's employees. Texas Cent., etc., R. Co. v. Bush, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 291, 24 S. W. 133.

An instruction which ignores the negligence of defendant is erroneous. Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Combs, 25 Kan. 729; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Dillard, (Tex. Civ. App. 1906) 94 S. W. 426 (postulating plaintiff's right to recover on his freedom from contributory negligence, without reference to negligence on the part of defendant); Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Welch, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 25 S. W. 166.

jury questions of negligence not raised by the pleadings and evidence,[1] or not relied upon as a ground of recovery or defense.[2] Where the court substantially charges the law covering the case an omission to charge on some matters in issue is not reversible error in the absence of a properly prepared requested instruction.[3]

(IV) APPLICATIONS OF RULES — (A) In General. The above rules apply to instructions in actions for injuries caused by horses or teams becoming frightened at a crossing through defendant's negligence;[4] or for injuries caused by defendant's negligence in respect to sign-boards,[5] signals,[6] flagmen or watch-

Illustrations.— Thus an instruction that if defendant's cars were left at the crossing so as to be apt to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness, the jury would be warranted in finding defendant negligent is erroneous in the absence of an allegation or proof that the cars were likely to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness. Fisk v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 74 Iowa 424, 38 N. W. 132. So where the only negligence charged in the pleadings is a failure to ring a bell or blow a whistle as the train approached the crossing, plaintiff is not entitled to have the question whether defendant was bound to use extra precautions for the safety of travelers on the crossing because of its unusually dangerous character, submitted to the jury. Holmes v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 74 N. J. L. 469, 69 Atl. 412. So where it is alleged that defendant's negligence consisted in running its train at a rate of speed greater than that fixed by ordinance and permitting the crossing to be in an unsafe condition, and in failing to give the usual signals, it is error to submit to the jury the issue of defendant's negligence in not discovering the presence of deceased on the track in time to avoid striking him. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Harris, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 36 S. W. 776.

Defective instructions cured by subsequent ones see Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Blan, (Tex. Civ. App. 1901) 62 S. W. 552.

The refusal of an instruction the substance of which is embraced in other instructions given is not error. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., v. Wynant, 134 Ind. 681, 34 N. E. 560.

5. See Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Hamilton, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 76, 42 S. W. 358, holding that it is erroneous to charge that it was defendant's duty to provide a sign-board at the crossing and discover the danger of plaintiff if it could be done by the exercise of ordinary diligence, if such grounds of recovery were not stated in the petition.

Conformity to issues.— It is error to instruct as to the duty of defendant to erect sign-boards at the crossing as required by statute where there is no averment that defendant failed to perform this duty or that the injury was caused by such failure. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Clark, 105 Ky. 571, 49 S. W. 323, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1375.

men,[7] or gates,[8] at crossings; or by negligence in running its trains,[9] as by negligence in respect to lights, signals, and lookouts, from approaching trains,[10] or in running at an excessive or unlawful rate of speed,[11] or by reason of employees

7. See Schmidt v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 75 Iowa 606, 39 N. W. 916 (holding that allegations that the injury was caused by defendant not giving a proper warning or signal of the approach of its train, and by its not keeping a flagman at the crossing to give such warning, are broad enough to warrant a submission of the question whether ordinary care did not require a flagman to be kept at the crossing, irrespective of any municipal regulation); Shaw v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 8 Gray (Mass.) 45 (holding that it is erroneous for the judge in his instructions to omit to distinguish between circumstances which could be reasonably anticipated and those in their nature extraordinary but which would make unusual precautions proper if they could have been foreseen); Buchanan v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 107 S. W. 552 (failure of flagman to give warning).

Requested instructions on issues presented by the petition and evidence held erroneously refused see Crowder v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co., 39 Tex. Civ. App. 314, 87 S. W. 166.

Misleading.— The omission of the words "carelessly" and "negligently" in an instruction which began with the words, "If the jury believe from the evidence that a flagman of defendant improperly and inopportunely signaled the plaintiff's team," etc., is not a misleading inaccuracy. Pennsylvania Co. v. Sloan, 125 Ill. 72, 17 N. E. 37, 8 Am. St. Rep. 337.

The applicability of an ordinance requiring a flagman at certain crossings to the circumstances of the particular case should be charged by the court. Pennsylvania Co. v. Frana, 112 Ill. 398, instruction held not erroneous.

Where the evidence shows that the railroad crossing was in a populous neighborhood and was much used by the general public and the railway company in the operation of its trains, a charge predicating negligence on the failure to keep a watchman at the crossing is proper, although there is no evidence showing the duties of a watchman at such place, or the purpose for which he is kept. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Moore, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 107 S. W. 658.

Misleading instructions: See Bracken v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 22. An instruction that it is the railroad company's duty to erect and maintain gates on both sides of its "track" at a street crossing is misleading where there are many tracks at such crossing and the city ordinance only requires "gates on both sides of its tracks" at the crossing. Jennings v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 99 Mo. 394, 11 S. W. 999.

Conformity with pleading.—An instruction that the jury may base a verdict for plaintiff on the failure of defendant to maintain gates or keep a flagman at a crossing, where a failure to do so is not charged in the petition and has not been relied upon at the trial as a ground of recovery, is erroneous. Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Powers, 58 Kan. 544, 50 Pac. 452.

E. 19; Barnum v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co., 148 Mich. 370, 111 N. W. 1036; Montgomery v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 181 Mo. 477, 79 S. W. 930, backing train. As conforming to the pleadings. Davidson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 98 Mo. App. 142, 71 S. W. 1069. As not being misleading. Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Buck, 130 Ind. 300, 30 N. E. 19; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Stonecypher, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 569, 63 S. W. 946; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Letsch, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 55 S. W. 584 [affirmed in (1900) 56 S. W. 1134].

Instructions held erroneous: As requiring too high a degree of care of defendant. Western, etc., R. Co. v. King, 70 Ga. 261; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Brenig, 25 Md. 378, 90 Am. Dec. 49; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 87 Tex. 348, 28 S. W. 520. As not conforming to the evidence. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Crews, 118 Tenn. 52, 99 S. W. 368. As being too indefinite or misleading. Central Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Bush, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 291, 34 S. W. 133.

Statutory precautions.—A statutory provision requiring trains to be checked on approaching public crossings may be given in a charge to the jury. Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. Hall, 109 Ga. 367, 34 S. E. 605. And a refusal to charge that the company's failure to take the statutory precautions in running a train constitutes negligence is error. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Martin, 113 Tenn. 266, 87 S. W. 418. A failure to charge as to what particular acts in addition to the statutory signals might be required of defendant is erroneous, as it might mislead the jury. Jones v. Utica, etc., R. Co., 36 Hun (N. Y.) 115.

Where the cause of action is on the theory of non-compliance with statutory precautions, the better practice is to give a charge based on the statute without undertaking to instruct as to the common-law duties of the company. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Crews, 118 Tenn. 52, 99 S. W. 368.

10. See infra, X, F, 14, h, (IV), (D).

11. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Appell, 103 Ill. App. 185; Annacker v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 81 Iowa 267, 47 N. W. 68; Riley v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 36 Mont. 545, 93 Pac. 948.

Instructions must conform to evidence.— An instruction as to a railroad company's liability for running its train at a dangerous rate of speed is improper where there is no evidence that the speed of the train was dangerous. Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Hague, 54 Kan. 284, 38 Pac. 257, 45 Am. St. Rep. 278.

on its trains not taking the proper precautions as to persons seen at or near a crossing.[12]

(B) Character of Crossing and Rights and Duties of Parties Therein. Where such matters are in issue, an instruction should inform the jury of the rights of the railroad company and the persons using the crossing as to priority in going on the crossing,[13] distinguishing between the degree of care required at public and at private crossings.[14] It is also proper to distinguish between the degree of care which a railroad company is bound to exercise toward a mere traveler on its tracks and those who have occasion to cross them at a place commonly used and resorted to for that purpose.[15] Whether there is a public highway is a mixed

Instructions must conform to issues.— It is proper to refuse an instruction that the evidence fails to show an unlawful or reckless rate of speed where there is no issue as to whether the train was running at an unlawful rate of speed. Cooper v. Los Angeles Terminal R. Co., 137 Cal. 229, 70 Pac. 11. So where a case is tried on the theory that no whistle was blown, it is error to charge that the jury may find for plaintiff simply because the train was running at a high rate of speed. Schwarz v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 218 Pa. St. 187, 67 Atl. 213. So where there is no averment or proof that the speed of the train which killed deceased was unlawful or negligent, the trial court is not justified in enlarging the issues and submitting to the jury the question of whether the company was guilty of negligence in running the train at a high rate of speed. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Moffatt, 56 Kan. 667, 44 Pac. 607.

An instruction withdrawing from the jury the question whether the speed was dangerously negligent is erroneous. Cooper v. Los Angeles Terminal R. Co., 137 Cal. 229, 70 Pac. 11; International, etc., R. Co. v. Starling, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 365, 41 S. W. 181.

Co. v. Mathis, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 48 S. W. 625. As ignoring a material question. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Eyer, (Tex. Civ. App. 1902) 69 S. W. 453. As omitting the element of defendant's duty to take reasonable care to avoid the accident, notwithstanding the injured party's contributory negligence. Riley v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 36 Mont. 545, 93 Pac. 948. As ignoring plaintiff's duty to look and listen. Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Baker, (Indian Terr. 1907) 104 S. W. 1182 [reversed on other grounds in (Okla. 1908) 95 Pac. 433]. As invading the province of the jury. Pennsylvania Co. v. Frana, 112 Ill. 398; Stewart v. Long Island R. Co., 54 N. Y. App. Div. 623, 66 N. Y. Suppl. 436 [affirmed in 166 N. Y. 604, 59 N. E. 1130]. As assuming that plaintiff did not keep a reasonable lookout and as announcing as a matter of law that the engineer might presume certain facts. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Sanders, 154 Ill. 531, 39 N. E. 481 [affirming 55 Ill. App. 87].

An instruction covered by other instructions may be properly refused. See Fletcher v. South Carolina, etc., R. Co., 57 S. C. 205, 35 S. E. 513; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Roberts, 91 Tex. 535, 45 S. W. 309 [affirming (Civ. App. 1897) 45 S. W. 218].

13. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Spilker, 134 Ind. 380, 33 N. E. 280, 34 N. E. 218 (instruction held sufficient); Washington Southern R. Co. v. Lacey, 94 Va. 460, 26 S. E. 834.

Misleading.— An instruction is defective and misleading which charges that the rights of the railroad company and the public are not equal, but that the right of the company is superior to the right of the traveling public on all parts of its track, even at crossings. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Cody, 67 Fed. 71, 14 C. C. A. 310.

Conformity to issues.— Where there is no controversy as to whether the person injured by the train was entitled to cross first, it is not error to refuse an instruction as to the rights of priority in going on the crossing. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Patchen, 167 Ill. 204, 47 N. E. 368.

14. Lewis v. New York, etc., R. Co., 1 Silv. Sup. (N. Y.) 393, 5 N. Y. Suppl. 313 [affirmed in 123 N. Y. 496, 26 N. E. 357].

Conformity to evidence.—An instruction implying that the highway at the crossing was a city street and not a country road and not governed by the same rules of law as the latter is erroneous, where the evidence indisputably shows that the crossing was outside of the city limits and was a country road although called an avenue. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Sivey, 27 Ohio Cir. Ct. 248.

15. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Golway, 6 App. Cas. (D. C.) 143.

question of fact and law, and it is error to submit such question to the jury without instructing them as to how a public highway may be constituted.[16]

(c) Defects and Obstructions at Crossings. Where the question of defects and obstructions at crossings is in issue the instruction should accurately state the railroad company's duties as to constructing and keeping the crossing in a safe condition,[17] and as to keeping it free from obstructions to the view or hearing of employees in charge of an approaching train or of travelers on the highway approaching the crossing,[18] or as to permitting other obstructions at or near the crossing.[19]

16. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Faith, 175 Ill. 58, 51 N. E. 807 [affirming 71 Ill. App. 59]; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Chicago Title, etc., Co., 79 Ill. App. 623.

The instructions may assume that a certain city street exists and crosses defendant's track, where the uncontradicted evidence shows such facts and the instruction submits to the jury as to whether the point of intersection was used by the public as a crossing. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Kief, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 58 S. W. 625.

17. Instructions held proper see Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Townsend, 71 Kan. 524, 81 Pac. 205 (held not misleading); Edwards v. Carolina, etc., R. Co., 140 N. C. 49, 52 S. E. 234; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Smith, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 107 S. W. 638; Denison, etc., R. Co. v. Foster, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 578, 68 S. W. 299; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Weaver, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 41 S. W. 846; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Connelly, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 529, 39 S. W. 145 (not misleading). Thus an instruction that "it is not sufficient that the crossing is so constructed that it is possible to safely pass over it, but it should be so constructed and maintained in such condition as to be reasonably safe and convenient for public travel by persons exercising ordinary care" is correct and not argumentative. Brown v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 99 Mo. 310, 12 S. W. 655. So where there is some evidence that the crossing was defective an instruction which submits as an element of negligence the improper construction of the crossing as well as a failure to maintain it in repair is not error. Taylor, etc., R. Co. v. Warner, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 60 S. W. 442.

Instructions held erroneous see San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Belt, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 281, 59 S. W. 607, failing to recognize defendant's right to repair its tracks.

Instruction held misleading in using the word "unnecessarily" in place of the word "materially" in regard to impairing the usefulness of the public road, etc., see Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Hubbard, 148 Ala. 45, 41 So. 814.

Conformity to pleadings and issues.—An instruction that it is defendant's duty to maintain a crossing which is "reasonably safe and convenient" is not erroneous or a departure from a petition alleging a failure to maintain "a good and sufficient crossing." Brown v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 99 Mo. 310, 12 S. W. 655. It is erroneous to instruct the jury as to the duty of protecting crossings at public county roads in an action for injuries at a private crossing. Taylor, etc., R. Co. v. Warner, 88 Tex. 642, 32 S. W. 868 [reversing (Civ. App. 1895) 31 S. W. 66].

Inconsistency.—An instruction that the crossing should be "reasonably safe and convenient" is not inconsistent with one that it should be "reasonably safe." Brown v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 99 Mo. 310, 12 S. W. 655.

Under a statute requiring railroad companies to keep highway crossings in repair, it is not necessary in an action for injuries resulting from a defective crossing to instruct as to what would constitute a keeping of the crossing in repair. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Smith, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 107 S. W. 638, under Rev. St. 1895, art. 4426.

18. Instructions held proper see Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Tilton, 26 Ill. App. 362 (not misleading); Pence v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 79 Iowa 389, 44 N. W. 686 (instructions as to obstructions upon the right of way held without prejudice, although there was no evidence that they were upon the right of way); Calhoun v. Gulf, etc., R. Co., 84 Tex. 226, 19 S. W. 341 (instruction held not to prevent the jury from considering the presence of cars on a side-track, in determining the degree of care required by the operatives of the train); Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Michalke, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 495, 37 S. W. 480.

Instructions held erroneous: As not conforming to the evidence. International, etc., R. Co. v. Knight, 91 Tex. 660, 45 S. W. 556 [reversing (Civ. App. 1898) 45 S. W. 167]; International, etc., R. Co. v. Kuehn, 70 Tex. 582, 8 S. W. 484. As not conforming to the pleading. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Assman, 72 Kan. 378, 83 Pac. 1091. As invading the province of the jury. Dillingham v. Parker, 80 Tex. 572, 16 S. W. 335.

Where the undisputed evidence shows that a view of the track was partially obstructed, it is not error for the court to assume in its charge that there were obstructions to sight and hearing of an approaching train. Pratt v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 107 Iowa 287, 77 N. W. 1064.

19. See Paine v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 58 N. H. 611 (instruction held sufficiently favorable to defendant); Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Simon, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 54 S. W. 309 (holding an instruction which withdrew from the jury the issue as to whether or not defendant was guilty of negligence in permitting a car to stand in the street, and if negligent whether such negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, properly refused).

(D) Lights, Signals, and Lookouts From Trains. Likewise the principles announced in the preceding sections [20] apply to instructions in respect to lights,[21] lookouts,[22] and signals [23] from approaching trains. Thus the instructions in regard to such precautions must not be misleading,[24] must be in conformity with the Misleading.—Although it is not negligence per se to leave cars on the tracks close to the crossing if they are not on the highway, it would be misleading to so instruct the jury in a case where the negligence complained of was in leaving the cars upon the tracks close to the crossing and starting a locomotive from behind them without warning. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Richerson, 19 Ohio Cir. Ct. 385, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 326.

22. See St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Spearman, 64 Ark. 332, 42 S. W. 406 (held ambiguous and contradictory); Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Coley, 121 Ky. 385, 89 S. W. 234, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 336, 1 L. R. A. N. S. 370; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Sisson, (Tex. Civ. App. 1905) 88 S. W. 371.

Where the cause of action is based on a failure to comply with the statutory duty with respect to keeping a lookout, sounding the whistle, etc., it is error to charge anything on the common-law liability of the company except in so far as the statute is concurrent with the common law. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Crews, 118 Tenn. 52, 99 S. W. 368.

Conformity to evidence.—An instruction that if by the use of ordinary care the employees of defendant company could have seen plaintiff in time to have prevented the injury complained of and failed through carelessness, their failure to do so was negligence, is erroneous if there is no evidence that the employees could have discovered plaintiff in time to prevent the injury. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Johnson, 91 Tex. 569, 44 S. W. 1067.

23. Instructions held proper as to the duty of defendant in regard to giving signals upon the approach of its train to a crossing see Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Dillon, 123 Ill. 570, 15 N. Instructions held erroneous: Generally. Bowen v. Southern R. Co., 58 S. C. 222, 36 S. E. 590 (under Rev. St. §§ 1685, 1692). As laying too much emphasis on particular circumstances. Co., 77 N. Y. App. Div. 43, 79 N. Y. Suppl. 106. As omitting a material element of the statutory duty relative to giving signals. Kahl v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 125 Ill. App. 294.

A defective instruction held cured when read in connection with the whole charge of which it is a part see Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Pearson, 184 Ill. 386, 56 N. E. 633 [affirming 82 Ill. App. 605]; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Price, 76 S. W. 836, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1033; Van Auken v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 96 Mich. 307, 55 N. W. 971, 22 L. R. A. 33; Esler v. Wabash R. Co., 109 Mo. The refusal of an instruction embraced in another instruction given is not erroneous. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Rogers, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 680, 39 S. W. 1112.

Statutory signals.— Where a statute requires that a railroad company shall give the usual signals "at least" at a certain distance from crossings, the company has the right to have the words "at least" inserted in an instruction as to the requirements of such statute. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Harris, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 36 S. W. 776.

As to what signals should have been given to absolve a railway company from the charge of negligence should be charged by the court and a general submission of that question to the jury without qualification or limitation is error. Dyer v. Erie R. Co., 71 N. Y. 228; Hollender v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 14 Daly (N. Y.) 219, 6 N. Y. St. 352, 19 Abb. N. Cas. 18; Semel v. New York, etc., R. Co., 9 Daly (N. Y.) 321 [affirmed in 91 N. Y. 657].

A failure to include the element that the jury must find that the failure of the train operatives to give signals was the cause of the injury is not erroneous, where the instruction is not given with a view to specifying all the elements which plaintiff must prove to entitle him to recover, but is designed to inform the jury that if plaintiff found himself in a perilous position by reason of the failure of defendant to give the statutory signals, and while endeavoring to extricate himself from his perilous position he acted as a reasonably prudent man would act, he may recover. Illinois Southern R. Co. v. Hamill, 226 Ill. 88, 80 N. E. 745 [affirming 128 Ill. App. 152].

evidence,[25] and with the pleadings and issues,[26] and should not invade the province of the jury in charging on the facts.[27]

(E) Contributory Negligence — (1) IN GENERAL. Where contributory negligence is in issue the court should instruct specifically as to the duties of the injured person in regard to exercising reasonable care in approaching and attempting to cross the tracks.[28] Such instructions must be in accordance with the principles

Civ. App. 1899) 49 S. W. 649. An instruction that a failure of defendant either to ring the bell or blow the whistle at a distance of at least eighty rods from the crossing renders it criminally liable is misleading and reversible error where the statute merely imposes a penalty. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Geist, 49 Nebr. 489, 68 N. W. 640.

Instruction held not misleading as to signals see Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Pollock, 195 Ill. 156, 62 N. E. 831 [affirming 93 Ill. App. 483]; Louisville, etc., R. App. 1894) 27 S. W. 166. Where the evidence shows that the engine was within eighty yards of the crossing, it is error to instruct that defendant was negligent unless a whistle was sounded at least eighty yards from the crossing. Ft. Worth, etc., R. Co. v. Neely, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 60 S. W. 282.

Instructions held not erroneous under the evidence.—As to signals. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 77 Ill. App. 492; O'Dair v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 14 Tex. Civ. App. 539, 38 S. W. 242. Testimony of a witness that he heard a bell rung very low is a sufficient basis for an instruction as to the adequacy of the bell when ringing to give notice of the approach of the train. Weller v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 164 Mo. 180, 64 S. W. 141, 86 Am. St. Rep. 592.

26. Instructions held not in conformity with the pleadings and issues see Wabash R. Co. v. Stewart, 87 Ill. App. 446; Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Reynolds, 21 Ohio Cir. Ct. 402, 11 Ohio Cir. Dec. 701; International, etc., R. Co. v. Sein, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 386, 33 S. W. 558.

Where the only issue is as to whether the whistle was blown at all or not, the jury should not be charged upon the question of the proximity to the crossing at which the whistle should have been blown. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Melugin, (Tex. Civ. App. 1901) 63 S. W. 338.

Instructions held in conformity with pleadings and issues see Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, (Tex. Civ. App. 1905) 88 S. W. 406, error to refuse. A charge that plaintiff claims and defendant denies that the injury was caused by defendant's failure to sound the whistle or ring the bell when nearing a crossing is not erroneous where there is no evidence authorizing a charge on any other issue of negligence, although the petition alleges other grounds of negligence. O'Dair v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 14 Tex. Civ. App. 539, 38 S. W. 242.

Although the pleadings do not specifically raise the question whether defendant kept a proper lookout for travelers at the crossing, or gave due warning signals of danger, a charge requiring such care by defendant is not erroneous where it is responsive to the testimony. Harbert v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 78 S. C. 537, 59 S. E. 644.

An instruction which is a mere statement of a general principle that might properly be charged in all cases arising under a statute requiring signals at highway crossings is not erroneous, although no such issue is particularly raised by the pleadings. Harbert v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 78 S. C. 537, 59 S. E. 644.

27. Instructions held erroneous as charging on the facts see Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Cline, 135 Ill. 41, 25 N. E. 846; Profit v. Chicago Great Western R. Co., 91 Mo. Instructions held erroneous: Generally. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Fitzpatrick, 112 Ill. App. 152. For not defining the injured person's duty in approaching the crossing.

heretofore announced,[29] as that they must conform to the evidence,[30] and to the pleadings and issues,[31] and must not be misleading,[32] ignore or omit material

Southern R. Co. v. Winchester, 105 S. W. 167, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 19. Thus it is error to charge on defendant's negligence without charging as to the injured party's duty to exercise due care (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Harwood, 80 Ill. 88), and this error will not be cured by other instructions which do contain such requirement (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Harwood, supra).

Instructions held not erroneous see Petrie v. Columbia, etc., R. Co., 29 S. C. 303, 7 S. E. 515, under Gen. St. § 1529. An instruction that if the jury find that the train of defendant was not running on schedule time, they may consider that circumstance in determining whether the deceased had reason to apprehend danger at such time is not erroneous. Wrightsville, etc., R. Co. v. Gornto, 129 Ga. 204, 58 S. E. 769.

A refusal to charge on contributory negligence is error where there is evidence tending to show such negligence. Lennon v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 65 Hun (N. Y.) 578, 20 N. Y. An instruction that gross negligence is the absence of slight care, and if, at the time of a collision, deceased did not exercise slight care to avoid a collision and such negligence contributed to his injury, plaintiff cannot recover, covers the proposition that wilful negligence on the part of deceased will be a defense in an action for wilful failure to give statutory signals at crossings. Osteen v. Southern R. Co., 76 S. C. 368, 57 S. E. 196.

Missouri.— Kenney v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 105 Mo. 270, 15 S. W. 983, 16 S. W. 837, holding that it is not error to refuse an instruction calling for a finding as to plaintiff's mental condition when he approached the crossing, where there is no evidence of such mental condition.

Montana.— Riley v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 36 Mont. 545, 93 Pac. 948.

Where there is evidence that a watchman invited deceased to cross, and it is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that he was acting upon such invitation when killed, a requested charge that it is wholly immaterial as bearing on defendant's negligence whether the watchman invited him to cross is properly refused. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Walker, (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 106 S. W. 705.

Thus where it is not alleged that the driver was unskilful and the accident resulted therefrom, but only that he was negligent in not driving the horse away from the engine, an instruction for defendant on the ground of unskilfulness is properly refused. (2) Duty to Stop, Look, and Listen. titled to have the facts relied on specifically referred to); New York, etc., R. Co. v. Swartout, 14 Ohio Cir. Ct. 582, 6 Ohio Cir. Dec. 768; Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cobleigh, 78 Fed. 784, 24 C. C. A. 342 (holding that defendant is entitled to have the jury specifically instructed as to the duty of plaintiff under the circumstances to look and listen for a train before attempting to cross the track, especially when plaintiff's own testimony suggests that he may have been negligent in this respect; and that a general charge that plaintiff was bound to act as a prudent man would do under the circumstances, leaving it for the jury to fix the standard of prudence is not sufficient). But see Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Howard, 79 Ga. 44, 3 S. E. 426, holding that it is not incumbent upon the court to instruct the jury that it is the duty of one who attempts or intends to cross to use his senses of hearing and seeing before stepping on the track.

Instruction held erroneous: As acquitting plaintiff of negligence in failing to look and listen until the danger is past, instead of charging him with such negligence and leaving it for the jury to determine whether there were sufficient facts and circumstances to relieve a reasonably prudent person of such a sense of precaution. Omission as to direction.—An instruction which states that it is the duty of a person at a railroad crossing to look and listen for approaching trains is not erroneous because of the omission to state the direction in which such person is required to look, especially where a more specific instruction is not asked by the complaining party. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Connolly, 77 Nebr. 254, 109 N. W. 368.

Where the question of contributory negligence depends upon a variety of circumstances from which different minds may arrive at different conclusions, an instruction should have special reference to all the circumstances of the case, and the charge should distinctly point out what failure of the injured person in the duty of looking out for the train would render him prima facie guilty of such negligence as would prevent a recovery for an injury occasioned by the mere negligence or unskilfulness of the railroad employees, not amounting to wilfulness on their part. proved, thereby withdrawing such question from the jury.[45] A defective instruction may be cured by other instructions given,[46] and it is not error for the court to refuse to charge further on a question that is fully covered by other instructions given.[47] But it is error to refuse an instruction properly stating the law applicable to the facts in the case and not covered by instructions given,[48] or to improperly qualify such a requested instruction.[49]

(F) Proximate Cause of Injury. The principles announced above[50] also apply to instructions on the issue of the proximate cause of the injury.[51]

i. Verdict, Findings, and Judgment. Questions as to the verdict, findings, and judgment in an action for injuries at railroad crossings are governed by the rules applicable in civil cases generally.[52] Thus the verdict or findings in such

As not being sufficiently clear, as not showing that defendant's negligence must have been the proximate cause of the injury. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Scrivener, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 49 S. W. 649. As being misleading. Elgin, etc., R. Co. v. Duffy, 191 Ill. 489, 61 N. E. 432 [affirming 93 Ill. App. 463]. As ignoring certain conditions, and proceeding on the wrong theory of inevitable accident. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Anthony, 12 Ill. App. 126, 38 N. E. 831. As invading the province of the jury. Carraher v. San Francisco Bridge Co., 81 Cal. 98, 22 Pac. 480. As being without any facts to which it is applicable. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Howard, 90 Tenn. 144, 19 S. W. 116.

Instructions held not erroneous: Generally. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Bethea, 88 Miss. 119, 40 So. 813; Murray v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 101 Mo. 236, 13 S. W. 817, 20 Am. St. Rep. 601. Error cured.—A failure to instruct as to defendant's negligence being the proximate cause of the injury is cured by instructing that to entitle him to recover the jury must find that defendant was negligent; that such negligence caused plaintiff's injury; and that plaintiff was not negligent. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Carlson, 24 Ind. App. 559, 56 N. E. 251.

Where there is evidence of negligence on both sides, it is not error to instruct the jury to consider whether the failure to give the statutory signals was the cause of the accident, although the person injured saw the approaching train. Osteen v. Southern R. Co., 76 S. C. 368, 57 S. E. 196.

52. Judgments generally see JUDGMENTS, 23 Cyc. 623.

an action must be specific and certain,[53] must find facts and not conclusions,[54] must be pertinent to the issues,[55] and must find all the facts essential to a recovery or as grounds of defense.[56] Where the special findings are inconsistent and in irreconcilable conflict with the general verdict, the former control, and judgment should be entered on the special findings notwithstanding the general verdict.[57] A judgment cannot be entered upon special findings inconsistent with each other.[58]

j. Appeal and Error. Questions of appeal and error in actions for injuries at crossings are governed by the rules applicable in other civil cases.[59] If Verdict and findings generally see TRIAL.

Special interrogatories.— In an action for the death of a traveler while crossing an electric railroad in which plaintiff pleaded gross negligence see Wilson v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co., (Wis. 1908) 114 N. W. 462, 115 N. W. 330. It is not error to refuse to submit interrogatories substantially included in other interrogatories already submitted. Schroeder v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 117 Wis. 33, 93 N. W. 837. Nor is it error to refuse to submit an interrogatory which presents no issue. Schroeder v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., supra.

Answers to interrogatories in an action against a railroad company and a street railroad company for injuries caused by their concurrent negligence held not to show that the negligence of each defendant in approaching the crossing was not a proximate cause of the injury see Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Waddington, 169 Ind. 448, 82 N. E. 1030.

53. See Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Pointer, 14 Kan. 37, holding, however, that where the jury find that defendant was guilty of gross negligence immediately causing the injury, and that plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributing to the injury but without specifying what degree of negligence or whether proximately or remotely contributory, and it is apparent from the other findings and the instructions of the court that the jury intended to find that plaintiff was guilty of only such slight negligence as would not defeat his right to recover, a verdict in favor of plaintiff will not be set aside.

54. See Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Bussey, 66 Kan. 735, 71 Pac. 261.

55. See Evansville, etc., R. Co. v. Taft, 2 Ind. App. 237, 38 N. E. 443.

56. See Slaats v. Chicago Great Western R. Co., 110 Iowa 202, 81 N. W. 457; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Bussey, 66 Kan. 735, 71 Pac. 261; Nettersheim v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 58 Minn. 10, 59 N. W. 632; Hughes v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 122 Wis. 258, 99 N. W. 897.

A general verdict in favor of a person injured in a collision with a train at a street crossing is a finding that such person exercised ordinary care. Lowden v. Pennsylvania Co., 41 Ind. App. 614, 82 N. E. 941.

57. Special findings held to be inconsistent with the general verdict see Morford v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 158 Ind. 494, 63 N. E. 857 (under Burns Rev. St. (1901) § 556); Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Hedges, 118 Ind. 5, 20 N. E. 530; Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Graver, 23 Ind. App. 678, 55 N. E. 968; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Bussey, 66 Kan. 735, 71 Pac. 261.

Special findings held not inconsistent with the general verdict see Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Johnsen, 135 Ill. 641, 26 N. E. 510; Dimick v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 80 Ill. 338; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Thomas, (Ind. 1900) 55 N. E. 861; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Schmidt, 134 Ind. 16, 33 N. E. 774; Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Adams, 131 Ind. 38, 30 N. E. 794; Lowden v. Pennsylvania Co., 41 Ind. App. 614, 82 N. E. 941; Wendel v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 41 Ind. App. 460, 82 N. E. 469; Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Graver, 23 Ind. App. 678, 55 N. E. 968; Schulte v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 114 Iowa 89, 86 N. W. 63; Mercer v. Walker, (Kan. App. 1899) 58 Pac. 27. A general verdict finding that plaintiff exercised due care is not overcome by answers to interrogatories showing that he could have discovered the danger in time to avoid it had he looked in a certain direction at a certain time, since the facts specially returned do not exclude the existence of circumstances warranting the conclusion that he exercised due care. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Rosborough, 40 Ind. App. 14, 80 N. E. 869. So a general verdict for injuries caused by a failure to give the statutory signals is not overcome by special findings that plaintiff did not look or listen before reaching an opening in a hedge extending alongside of the highway, and that before reaching such opening there was a point where plaintiff could have known of the train if she had looked and listened. Case v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 100 Iowa 487, 69 N. W. 538.

Where the answers to interrogatories are merely contradictory or not conclusive the general verdict will stand. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Spilker, 134 Ind. 380, 33 N. E. 280, 34 N. E. 218.

58. See Haas v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 41 Wis. 44. Compare Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Moore, 10 Kan. App. 510, 63 Pac. 458.

Findings held not inconsistent with each other see Hahn v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 78 Wis. 396, 47 N. W. 620.

59. See Swift v. Staten Island Rapid Transit Co., 17 N. Y. Suppl. 654 [affirmed in 135 N. Y. 650, 32 N. E. 647]. And see, generally, APPEAL AND ERROR, 2 Cyc. 474.

Where the record presents no error of law, findings of fact will not be reviewed on appeal. Dundon v. New York, etc., R. Co., 67 Conn. 266, 34 Atl. 1041; Pomponio v. New York, etc., R. Co., 66 Conn. 528, 34 Atl. 491, 50 Am. St. Rep. 124, 32 L. R. A. 530. And see, generally, APPEAL AND ERROR, 3 Cyc. 345 et seq.

Objections not raised in the lower court cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

there is sufficient evidence to support a verdict or finding, although the evidence is conflicting, the verdict or finding will not be disturbed on appeal,[60] although it is otherwise where the verdict or finding is clearly contrary to the weight of evidence,[61] and is manifestly against right and justice.[62] Nor will a verdict or judgment be reversed or set aside for a harmless error.[63]

Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Patchen, 167 Ill. 204, 613, 47 N. W. 368, 167 Ill. 613, 48 N. E. 828; Steel v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 107 Mich. 516, 65 N. W. 573.

Parties are concluded by their own instructions whether abstractly correct or not. Jenning v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 99 Mo. 394, 11 S. W. 999.

Where two causes of action have been set up in the petition, a verdict and judgment for plaintiff will be set aside where one of such causes of action is not within the application of the statute under which the action is brought and the record on appeal fails to state on which ground the finding is based. Crumpley v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 98 Mo. 34, 11 S. W. 244.

Sufficiency of evidence.— The expression that "the verdict on appeal cannot be disturbed . when the evidence tends to support it" was never intended to hold that less than sufficient legal evidence to establish the issues, or the truth of the verdict or finding, would suffice, excluding from consideration all evidence conflicting therewith. If the evidence, besides merely tending to support the verdict, be such that if every fact proved, and every fact which could be logically and reasonably deduced therefrom, were admitted to be true and these facts embraced every fact essential to the existence and truth of the verdict, then and not until then is the evidence sufficient to support the verdict no matter how great the contradictions of evidence. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Wynant, 134 Ind. 681, 34 N. E. 569.

Proof that a child ten years old failed to stop and look when between two tracks is not sufficient to overthrow a general verdict for plaintiff suing for his death. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Hickman, 40 Ind. App. 315, 81 N. E. 1086.

61. See Green v. Los Angeles Terminal R. Co., (Cal. 1902) 69 Pac. 694, holding that to set aside a finding that there was no contributory negligence such negligence must affirmatively appear as a conclusion of law from the undisputed facts.

Verdicts or findings set aside as being contrary to the weight of the evidence see Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Gretzner, 46 Ill. 74; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Daniel, 104 S. W. 344, 31 Ky. L. G. Injuries to Persons on Highways or Private Premises Near Tracks*—1. In General.[84] The mere fact that a railroad is constructed and operated on or in close proximity to a street or highway, although it may render the use of the highway less safe, does not of itself constitute negligence on the part of the company;[65] and if the railroad company operates its road in a lawful manner without negligence or malice, it is not responsible for resulting injuries.[66] Where the railroad is situated upon or along a public street or highway, the public has the right to use the street as well as the railroad company, and the rights of each therein must be exercised with due regard to the rights of the other.[67] A person upon such a street or highway is not a trespasser or mere licensee;[68] and it is the duty of the railroad company in such a case to exercise reasonable care Errors in admission of evidence held harmless: Generally. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Thomas, (Ind. 1900) 55 N. E. 861; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Bethea, 88 Miss. 119, 40 So. 813. As to the custom of persons to cross the tracks at the place of the accident. International, etc., R. Co. v. Tabor, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 283, 33 S. W. 894. As to who traveled the crossing, its character, the character of other crossings on the same road, and as to the company working the crossing. Mack v. South Bound R. Co., 52 S. C. 323, 29 S. E. 905, 68 Am. St. Rep. 913, 40 L. R. A. 679. As to the construction and maintenance of the crossing. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Ashline, 171 Ill. 313, 49 N. E. 521; Hinkle v. Richmond, etc., R. Thus it has been held that defendant was not prejudiced by evidence that there was no flagman at the crossing, where the jury was not instructed in regard thereto, and the crossing was one which in fact required a flagman. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Dixon, 104 Ky. 608, 47 S. W. 615, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 792, 50 S. W. 252, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1883. So it has been held that in an action for death at a crossing error in admitting evidence that deceased was a man of careful habits will not warrant a reversal. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Ashline, 171 Ill. 313, 49 N. E. 521.

Error in striking out evidence held harmless see Woodward Iron Co. v. Andrews, 114 Ala. 243, 21 So. 440 (as to signals from trains); Slaats v. Chicago Great Western R. Co., 110 Iowa 202, 81 N. W. 457.

Error held prejudicial see Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Riddle, 72 S. W. 22, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1687, holding that, where a railroad track at the place of the accident was used by two different companies, the admission of evidence that after the accident witness crossed the track at that place and listened for a whistle or bell and heard none and did not perceive or hear the train until it was within twenty feet of the crossing is prejudicial error.

Fences.— The provisions of a railroad act imposing upon railroad companies the duty of erecting and maintaining fences on the sides of railroads do not apply to fences for the protection of persons traveling on a highway. Ditchett v. Spuyten Duyvil, etc., R. Co., 67 N. Y. 425; Ryan v. Rochester, etc., R. Co., 9 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 453. But where a railroad company voluntarily constructs a fence, it is under the duty of maintaining the fence strong and safe enough to resist such forces and conditions as could reasonably have been foreseen; although it is not bound to construct and maintain a fence sufficiently strong to provide against a contingency arising by reason of a crowd of trespassers coming on the property inclosed and pushing the fence over. Grogan v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 213 Pa. St. 340, 62 Atl. 924, holding that in such a case a railroad company is not liable to a person walking on the street on whom the fence is pushed, although some of the trespassers were employees of the railroad.

Illustrations.— Thus a person on a street or highway near a railroad track has been held to be entitled to recover for injuries caused by being struck by a piece of ice kicked by a brakeman from the platform of a passing caboose (Willis v. Maysville, etc., R. Co., 119 Ky. 949, 85 S. W. 716, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 459); for an injury resulting from the negligence of the company's servants in knocking off nuts and bolts from the rails of its track (Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Bercaw, 65 S. W. 434, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1509); or for an injury caused by the explosion by a train of a torpedo placed on the track contrary to the rules of the company (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Schultz, 87 Miss. 321, 39 So. 1005).

Where the right of way is parallel with and adjoining a public street the company is not bound to use the same care in running trains over such right of way as if the track lay in the street itself, although the track is used by the public habitually as a footway. McVey v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 111, 32 S. E. 1012.

Unloading cars.—A railroad company whose line occupies a public street is liable for its failure to use reasonable means and exercise reasonable care in the unloading of its cars to avoid injuring a person passing along the street. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Underwood, 74 Ark. 610, 86 S. W. 804.

The construction of a barbed wire fence on its own land near a road is not unlawful, and hence the railroad company is not liable for injuries sustained by one accidentally riding into it. Bishop v. Gulf, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 75 S. W. 1086.

Knowledge of company.— Where articles are thrown from a train by railroad employees, it is not necessary, in an action against the company for injuries, to show that the railroad company knew of such fact or that it was done by its direction; but it is sufficient to show by reasonable inference that the servant was acting within the scope of his authority. Willis v. Maysville, etc., R. Co., 119 Ky. 949, 85 S. W. 716, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 459. That the officers or agents of a railroad company have knowledge of the existence of a custom of its employees on returning at night from their work, to throw off into the highway pieces of wood and timber to be carried to their homes, while not of itself sufficient to charge the company with negligence as a matter of law, is yet such proof of negligence as to make it a question for the jury. The emission from a locomotive of a cinder larger than could escape from an engine in proper condition is prima facie evidence of negligence rendering the company liable to a person in a neighboring house whose eye is struck and destroyed by the cinder. Texarkana, etc., R. Co. v. O'Kelleher, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 96, 51 S. W. 54.

Under Nev. Comp. prevent injuring persons on adjacent highways or premises ordinarily arises only after it has become aware of the person's presence and peril;[72] and the company ordinarily is under no duty to keep a lookout for persons on adjacent premises,[73] or for travelers on an adjacent highway,[74] particularly where the highway is not a public thoroughfare.[75] Where a railroad company's charter requires the location of its road with respect to a certain turnpike to be approved by commissioners, the company is liable for injuries received by a traveler on the turnpike by the construction of the road, if such approval was procured by fraud.[76]

2. By Derailment of Trains. Where the trains or cars of a railroad company are derailed through its negligence, and run on to adjacent premises causing injuries to persons thereon, the company is liable therefor,[77] unless the injured party was guilty of contributory negligence;[78] but not where the injury was caused by unavoidable accident.[79]

Pennsylvania.— See Ewing v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 147 Pa. St. 40, 23 Atl. 340, 30 Am. St. Rep. 709, 14 L. R. A. 666, holding, however, that the injured party in such case is not entitled to recover for fright alone not resulting from or accompanied by some physical injury to the person.

The failure of a railroad company to keep its cars on its right of way is itself negligence and one injured need not show that there had been antecedent negligence producing the ultimate negligent act. West Virginia Cent., etc., R. Co. v. State, 96 Md. 652, 54 Atl. 669, 61 L. R. A. 574.

The absence of a watchman from a crossing is immaterial in an action for the negligent death of one standing near a railroad right of way caused by the derailment of a train where deceased was not on a crossing and the absence of the watchman had nothing to do with his injury. Excessive speed.— Where the injury to deceased was caused by cars jumping from the track and demolishing the house in which he was sleeping, and it appears that the train was running in violation of the city ordinance, at a speed of fifteen or twenty miles an hour, the jury is warranted in finding that the injury was due to the excessive speed of the train. are parallel and near together, a traveler on the highway and the railroad's servants should each regard the probabilities of the other using their respective places of travel near the same place at the same time, and should each use reasonable care according to the situation in managing their respective vehicles.[81] Ordinarily it is not incumbent upon the servants of the railroad company to keep a lookout for teams near the track and to operate the train so as not to frighten them,[82] although the circumstances may be such as to require such employees to keep a lookout; [83] nor are they obliged to keep the trains so under control that they can be stopped if a team is found at a point of danger on such highway.[84] But on the other hand the company has a right to expect that persons in control of a team will exercise care in approaching the railroad tracks and will not unnecessarily stop near them, and therefore is not required to take steps to provide against the failure to do so.[85] A railroad company is not liable therefore for injuries caused by horses upon a street, highway, or other premises near a railroad track becoming frightened at the ordinary appearance and movements of a train or cars under prudent and careful management.[86] But it is liable where the fright

W. 206, holding that where, in an action for injuries to a traveler in consequence of her horse becoming frightened by an approaching train, the evidence shows that the passenger did not make any attempt to discover whether any train was in sight before going on a crossing and passing on to a road parallel to the track and near it, the fact that a clump of trees had been allowed to grow upon the right of way near the crossing which might have obstructed the view of the track is immaterial as the presence of the trees did not operate as a contributing cause to the accident.

W. 206 (holding that if the circumstances required the engineer in the exercise of ordinary care to keep a lookout for danger to persons traveling on the highway and he failed to do so and the accident was the proximate cause thereof, the railroad is liable unless the traveler was guilty of contributory negligence); Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Belew, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 8, 62 S. W. 99 (holding that where the road had been used by the public for ten years and was so situated that the engineer could have seen plaintiff in time to have lessened the speed and noise of the train and probably prevented the accident, it was negligence on the part of defendant not to see plaintiff and check its train in time to prevent the accident.

On streets.— It cannot be said as a matter of law that persons operating a locomotive are under no duty to keep a lookout for teams on a street close to and parallel with the railroad so as not to frighten them by excessive speed and unnecessary whistling. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Sanders, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 545, 94 S. W. 149. Thus it has been held that where a railroad has its tracks in a street, it is the duty of the trainmen in charge of an engine thereon getting up steam by the use of a blower to be on the lookout for danger to travelers and to stop the noise when it becomes obvious that control of horses is being lost by reason of fright caused thereby. and consequent injury is caused by some negligent or unnecessary act or omission on the part of the company,[87] as where it fails to use all reasonable means at hand, such as abating noise, or stopping engines, if practicable to do so, which a man of ordinary prudence would use to allay the fright of the animal after seeing it and knowing or having reason to believe that it would become frightened or unmanageable and cause the injury,[88] or where the acts of the servants causing the fright are wanton or malicious.[89]

Utah.— Fares v. Rio Grande Western R. Co., 28 Utah 132, 77 Pac. 230, holding that a railroad company is not liable to travelers whose horses become frightened by the appearance of its engines or trains if the same are operated prudently and without unnecessary noise or wilful disregard for the traveler's perilous position, after it has been discovered by the servants of the company.

Degree of care.—An engineer is not required to stop his engine merely because he sees a person driving up a street parallel with the track; and if the horse appears to be gentle and there is nothing to indicate that it will get frightened and collide with the cars, and the engineer manages the train with such care and prudence as a reasonably prudent man would observe under the circumstances, the railroad company is not liable. Relative to travelers on adjacent highways when the crossing law is not applicable, railroad companies are under no duty to travelers to regulate the speed of trains to prevent horses from becoming frightened at the sight of moving trains and noise produced thereby and are not liable for injuries resulting from horses becoming frightened at their trains and the noises usual and incident to the running of the same. Southern R. Co. v. Flynt, 2 Ga. App. 162, 58 S. E. 374.

The moving of a freight car by gravity on a track running along a street in charge of a brakeman at a slow rate of speed is not negligence so as to give a cause of action in favor of a person riding along a street parallel with the moving car, whose horses are frightened and run away. Where a bridge company operates trains on one side of its bridge and the other is used by it as a toll highway for persons on foot and in vehicles, it is the duty of its servants in charge of trains to keep a lookout for teams on the bridge and, in the event that they are discovered to have become so frightened as to become unmanageable, to cause no more noise than is necessary under the circumstances; greater care being required in such a case than is required as to persons driving on an ordinary highway parallel with the railroad. Permitting steam to escape from an automatic safety valve attached to a locomotive, frightening a horse, is not negligence rendering the company liable for injuries received by one thrown from the vehicle, where it appears that the use of the safety valve is necessary for the safety of the locomotive and that there is no practicable method of reducing the pressure on the valve. or cause other unusual and unnecessary noises reasonably calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness;[95] or where such employees needlessly and negligently make such noises as are usually incident to the operation of the train,[96] providing the party injured was himself free from contributory negligence.[97] It is also liable where the noise or escaping steam is recklessly or wantonly caused by the employees.[98]

c. By Signals From Trains. The mere sounding of a whistle, bell, or other signal in close proximity to horses, whereby they become frightened and cause the injury complained of, is not of itself negligence,[99] even though they are given unnecessarily.[1] Thus a railroad company ordinarily is not liable for injuries caused by teams on adjacent highways or premises becoming frightened at the usual or statutory signals given in an ordinarily careful and proper manner,[2]

United States.— Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Scoville, 62 Fed. 730, 10 C. C. A. 479, 27 L. R. A. 179, holding that the wanton and malicious use of a steam whistle by servants of a railroad company in charge of a locomotive while signals or warning is not negligence,[10] except where the company has reasonable grounds to apprehend that teams on a highway near the track will become frightened by the passing train and cause injury if the party in charge of such team is not warned in time to get his team under control or to a place of safety.[11] In some jurisdictions it is held that the omission to give a statutory signal for a crossing is not negligence as to travelers with teams on adjacent highways or premises not intending to use the crossing, although their horses are frightened and cause injury by reason of such omission.[12] In other jurisdictions, however, such statutory signals are held to be for the benefit of all persons who may be exposed to danger by an approaching engine, and their omission is negligence if thereby teams are frightened by the passing train and cause injury.[13]

d. By Standing Cars, Engines, or Other Obstacles. A railroad company may also be liable for resulting injuries where it negligently permits cars or engines,[14] or other objects or obstacles reasonably calculated to frighten horses, to stand or remain on its right of way in an exposed position near a highway for an unreasonable length of time,[15] whereby horses are frightened and the injuries complained it is in use is an act within the scope of their employment so as to charge the company with liability for an injury caused thereby.

4. Contributory Negligence.[18] To warrant a recovery for injuries received by a person on an adjacent street, highway, or other premises through the negligence of a railroad company, the injured party himself must have been exercising ordinary care and prudence at the time for his own safety.[19] Thus if a traveler on a street or highway who is injured by his team becoming frightened at the operation of a train or cars fails to exercise such care and prudence as would have been exercised by men of ordinary prudence under the circumstances, whereby his injuries result, he is guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery.[20] It is the duty of such a traveler to exercise reasonable care and prudence in keeping his team in hand so as to control it on the approach of a train,[21] and in looking and listening for approaching trains before taking his team in close proximity to the track.[22] If he unnecessarily drives or stops his team in a position of danger, knowing that trains are likely to pass and that his horses are afraid of the cars,[23] or leaves his team unhitched in close proximity to the railroad track at a time when trains are likely to pass,[24] and afterward, when they become frightened, attempts to rescue or control them,[25] he is guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery, except where the fright is caused by some wanton or wilful act on the part of the railroad company.[26]

5. Proximate Cause of Injury. To render a railroad company liable for injuries to a person on an adjacent highway or other premises, it is also essential that the proximate cause of the injuries must have been the company's negligence in the derailment of the train or car which caused the injury,[27] or in case of injuries by frightening teams, the negligence complained of in causing the horse or team to become frightened;[28] and conversely to preclude a recovery on the ground of the injured party's negligence, such negligence must have been the proximate cause of the injury.[29]

6. Actions — a. Pleading. The general rules governing pleading in civil actions,[30] particularly in actions for negligence,[31] apply in actions for injuries to persons on adjacent highways or other premises by a railroad company's negligence in the derailment of its train or cars,[32] or in frightening horses or teams.[33] Thus in an action for injuries caused by horses becoming frightened at the operation of a railroad, the complaint should allege facts sufficient to show negligence on the part of defendant by reason of which the horses became frightened,[34] and to show a direct connection between such negligence and the injury complained of.[35]

Escape of steam.— Where a horse is frightened by steam negligently permitted to escape and runs on a pile of sewer pipes lying near by in the street and thereby injures plaintiff, the negligence in permitting the escape of the steam is the proximate cause of the injury and not the pile of sewer pipes. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Bailey, 66 Kan. 115, 71 Pac. 246.

So an allegation that defendant "negligently, wrongfully and unlawfully" blew off steam from its engine whereby plaintiff's horses were frightened and ran away causing the injury complained of implies that steam was blown off needlessly and unnecessarily and where no objection is made to the petition by demurrer will be sufficient after verdict. Thus a declaration which avers that defendant "carelessly, improperly, and recklessly" operated its hand-car with a noisy, disorderly, and boisterous crew, whereby plaintiff's horse was frightened and she was injured, is insufficient, if the various acts complained of are stated and these do not separately or as a whole show negligence. b. Evidence. The rules of evidence governing in civil cases generally [36] apply to the presumptions and burden of proof,[37] and to the admissibility,[38] and weight and sufficiency [39] of evidence in an action for injuries to persons on adjacent highways or other premises.

Minn. 544, 42 N. W. 538, complaint held sufficient to show on its face that the wrongful act of defendant in negligently, wantonly, and recklessly causing the whistle of its locomotive to be blown off near a team of horses, etc., was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

L. 245, 65 Atl. 872 (holding that where the complaint alleges that defendant negligently permitted a certain locomotive engine and tender to stand upon a public highway, which locomotive and tender were of great size and unusual color and shape, such as was naturally calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness, plaintiff is required to prove that the engine and tender were of great and unusual size, and of unusual color and shape, so as to be naturally calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness); Fares v. Rio Grande Western R. Co., 28 Utah 132, 77 Pac. 230 (holding that where plaintiff, suing for personal injuries, alleges that the railroad company was negligent in the construction and operation of its railroad so close to a highway that a team could not pass in safety but offers no proof to sustain the allegations, it will be assumed that the railroad was lawfully constructed at such point).

Under an Arkansas statute, Sandels & H. Dig. § 6349, making railroads "responsible for all damages to persons and property done or caused by the running of trains in this state" the fact that a person in a street is injured by the falling upon him of a door from a car in a moving train is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company. For the purpose of showing the gentleness of the horse which had become frightened at escaping steam and caused the injury, it is admissible to show that the horse had been used since the accident and had acted properly. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Boettcher, 131 Ind. 82, 28 N. E. 551.

Evidence that other horses were frightened by the noise of escaping steam from a locomotive is admissible on the question as to whether such noise is liable to frighten horses. Gordon v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 58 N. H. 396.

An ordinance forbidding the letting off of steam unnecessarily from an engine within the city limits is admissible in an action for injuries received by a horse taking fright from escaping steam from an engine. Chicago Great Western R. Co. v. Bailey, 66 Kan. 115, 71 Pac. 246.

A statute requiring signals to be given by a railroad train approaching a crossing is not admissible for defendant in an action against the company for damages caused by frightening a team on an adjacent highway, it being the duty of the court to instruct the jury as to the law. Temperament of horse.— Where in an action against a railroad company for injuries to a traveler on a highway running parallel to the track and near thereto in consequence of her horse becoming frightened by an approaching train, there is evidence that the horse shortly before had been frightened by another train, testimony of a witness as to the temperament of the horse and that he was afraid of trains is admissible as corroborative evidence. c. Questions For Court and For Jury. The general rules governing in civil cases that questions of law are for the court,[40] and questions of fact for the jury,[41] apply in actions against railroad companies for injuries to persons on a street, highway, or private premises near the track.[42] Thus, where in an action for injuries caused by frightened horses, the evidence is sufficient to go to the jury, but is disputed or is such that reasonable minds might arrive at different conclusions therefrom, it is a question for the jury whether the fright was in fact caused by an act or omission on the part of the railroad company,[43] and whether or not such act or omission was negligence,[44] such as whether or not, under the circumstances, the sounding of the whistle,[45] allowing steam to escape,[46] permitting engines, cars, or other obstacles to stand an unreasonable length of time in a position where they might naturally frighten horses on streets or highways,[47] or failing to give warning of the train's approach,[48] whereby a horse or team was frightened, was negligence; and whether or not due care was used by the party injured to avoid the injury.[49] So in accordance with the above rule it is ordinarily a quesing around of a derailed car. Harper v. St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Terminal Co., 187 Mo. 575, 86 S. W. 99.

A violation of a city ordinance limiting the speed of trains passing through the city is evidence of negligence in an action for injuries by a derailment of a train and its collision with a building near the track. Mahan v. Union Depot, etc., Co., 34 Minn. 29, 24 N. W. 293.

d. Instructions. The instructions in an action against a railroad company for injuries to persons on highways or on private premises near the railroad company's tracks are governed by the rules applicable to instructions in civil cases generally.[51] In accordance with such rules, the instructions should clearly and accurately state the law of the case with respect to defendant's negligence,[52] or the injured party's contributory negligence.[53] Such instructions must be applicable to the pleadings and issues,[54] and to the evidence;[55] and should not be confusing or

See also Akridge v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 90 Ga. 232, 16 S. App. 4 (holding that, in an action for injuries occasioned by plaintiff's team taking fright by a passing train, it is error to instruct the jury to determine whether the engineer saw plaintiff or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen him and his team on the highway and within a short distance of the track, without explanation as to the engineer's duty under the circumstances); Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Scranton, 78 Ill. App. 230 (holding that in an action for death caused by the fright of deceased's team when it approached a cow killed by defendant's train, it is error to charge that giving notice to defendant of the killing of the cow was unnecessary if its agents in exercising ordinary care should have known that the cow was killed, as the instruction failed to state the element of time to justify an implication of notice).

53. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Scranton, 78 Ill. An instruction that if decedent knew that a train was approaching in time to have taken such action to avoid injury as a person of ordinary prudence would have done and failed to do so and such failure contributed to the injury the company is not liable is a sufficient charge on contributory negligence in the absence of other correct charges asked by defendant. H. Injuries to Animals On or Near Tracks* — 1. Care Required and Liability as to Animals — a. In General. In the absence of statute, the liability of railroad companies for injuries to animals depends upon the same principles as that of private persons.[61] Although entitled to the exclusive and unobstructed use of their roads, they are subject to the general rule that every person must so use his own property as not unnecessarily to injure another;[62] but as the running of trains is in itself a lawful act, they are not liable for injuries resulting therefrom unless the right is exercised in an improper or unlawful manner,[63] and they will not, in the absence of statute, be liable for injuries to animals unless due to the negligence or misconduct of their employees.[64] With regard to injuries to animals railroad companies are not held to the highest degree of care,[65] but only

A failure to answer special interrogatories is not ground for setting aside a verdict in a suit for injuries received by a team taking fright by the sudden escape of steam where such interrogatories do not call for facts without which the verdict cannot be sustained. to the exercise of ordinary care.[66] But on the other hand, except in the case of trespassing animals,[67] it is not necessary in order to render them liable that there should be gross negligence or wanton or wilful injury.[68] Railroad companies must procure and use good and safe machinery and appliances,[69] employ skilful and competent servants,[70] and in operating their trains must exercise ordinary or reasonable care,[71] such as an ordinarily prudent man would use under the circumstances,[72] considering the dangerous character of the agency employed,[73] and having a proper regard both for the safety of the train and its passengers, and that of the animal,[74] the duty as to the train and passengers being paramount to that of avoiding injury to animals.[75] What will constitute ordinary or reasonable care varies according to the circumstances of the particular case,[76] and may under different conditions be made by varying degrees of diligence and precaution.[77] The care required in avoiding such injuries also varies materially according to whether the animal was at the time of the injury rightfully or wrongfully upon the track.[78] Railroad companies are not required to provide places where stock wandering upon the track might leave it if overtaken by trains,[79] or to keep their rights of way clear of obstructions so that animals can pass over and across the tracks freely,[80] or to keep the necessary ditches or excavations along the sides of its track free from accumulations of water or ice,[81] or at a public crossing to cover such ditches for the full width of the highway,[82] or to keep flagmen at crossings,[83] or to construct fences or barriers to prevent stock from falling down embankments;[84] but a railroad company will be liable for injury to stock occasioned by its maintaining a barbed wire fence on or along its right of way if it is so negligently constructed as to be a source of danger to stock.[85]

b. Statutes Imposing Liability. The common-law duties and liabilities of railroad companies with regard to injuries to animals have in many jurisdictions been greatly modified by statutes requiring railroad companies to fence their tracks and construct cattle-guards,[86] to maintain gates or bars at private or farm crossings,[87] to exercise certain precautions as to the giving of signals and maintaining a lookout for stock on the track,[88] regulating the speed of trains in certain localities,[89] and making proof of injury prima facie evidence of negligence, and placing the burden of proof on the company to show the absence of negligence.[90] The company will be liable for injuries due to a failure to comply with the requirements of the statutes, although not otherwise negligent,[91] or if negligent, although the statutory requirements were complied with,[92] and plaintiff may elect to sue upon either ground;[93] but the company cannot be held liable where there has been neither negligence or misconduct on the part of its employees, nor a failure to comply with any duty imposed by statute,[94] and statutes imposing an absolute liability for injuries to stock under such circumstances have uniformly been held to be unconstitutional.[95] Statutory provisions in the jurisdiction where the action is instituted have no application to cases where the cause of action occurred in another jurisdiction.[96]

c. Trespassing Animals.[97] There are statements in some of the cases to the effect that a railroad company must exercise ordinary or reasonable care even as to animals wrongfully upon the track,[98] and on the other hand that the company will not be liable for injuries to trespassing animals even in case of gross negligence, but only for wilful and intentional injury,[99] both of which have been expressly disapproved.[1] What is apprehended to be the sounder rule and supported by the weight of authority is that a railroad company is not obliged to exercise even ordinary care as to trespassing animals,[2] and will not be liable for injuries to such animals in the absence of gross negligence or wanton or wilful injury,[3] or failure to exercise due care to prevent the injury after the animals are discovered upon the track;[4] but that even a trespassing animal cannot be wantonly injured,[5] and that the company will be liable for gross negligence, although the injury was not intentional,[6] and that after an animal, although a trespasser, is discovered upon the track reasonable care must be exercised to avoid injury.[7]

the other hand, it has been held that a railroad company must exercise ordinary care to prevent injuries to dogs and that it will be liable for an injury due to negligence as well as where the injury was wilful,[11] and that, although the dog was a trespasser, the company will be liable if the injury could by the exercise of ordinary care have been avoided,[12] but not where the dog was a trespasser, if the proper signals were given and due care was exercised after it was discovered to avoid the injury.[13] Dogs are not "stock" within the application of statutes making railroad companies liable without proof of negligence for injuries to stock where their roads are not fenced,[14] or within the application of statutes making proof of the injury by a railroad train to "any cattle or other live stock" prima facie evidence of negligence,[15] but are within the application of statutes requiring that the whistle shall be sounded when animals are seen upon the track.[16]

e. Effect of Stock Laws or Fence Laws — (I) PERMITTING ANIMALS TO RUN AT LARGE.[17] It has been held that where there is a municipal ordinance permitting stock to run at large, trains must be operated with reference to the right of the owner to do so and that the company must exercise at least ordinary care to avoid injuries;[18] but on the other hand it has been held that where the common-law rule as to stock running at large prevails, the local regulations of a town or county cannot authorize a trespass upon a railroad right of way,[19] or impose any additional obligations upon the company,[20] and that, although stock were at large pursuant to such a regulation, the company will not be liable in the absence of gross negligence or wilful misconduct.[21]

(II) PROHIBITING ANIMALS FROM RUNNING AT LARGE. In localities where there are statutes or ordinances prohibiting stock from running at large, railroad companies have a right to presume that such animals will not be upon the track,[22] and are not required to exercise the same degree of care as in localities where it is lawful for stock to run at large.[23] Stock running at large in violation
