2. To What Contracts. The legislation generally refers only to contracts which are legally binding.[76]

3. Authority Must Be Strictly Pursued. The authority conferred on the probate court is special and limited, and must be strictly pursued.[77]

4. Effect on Equity Jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of equity courts to specifically enforce the contracts of deceased persons is not in most states taken away by this legislation.[78]

In some states the jurisdiction is limited to contracts of a particular form: "Bond or obligation to make title" (Wilkerson v. Vinson, 20 Ala. 131; Lacy v. Simpson, Minor (Ala.) 33; Ky. Rev. St. c. 57, § 7; Grubbs v. Steele, 15 B. Mon. (Ky.) 570); "bond or written agreement," meaning an agreement which complies with the statute of frauds (Peters v. Phillips, 19 Tex. 70, 70 Am. Testamentary Capacity of Spendthrift, see Wills.

I. DEFINITION.

A spendthrift is a person who, by excessive drinking, gambling, idleness, or debauchery of any kind shall so spend, waste, or lessen his estate as to expose himself or his family to want or suffering, or expose the town to charge or expense for the support of himself or family.[1]

II. POWER TO REGULATE.

A. In General. Statutes providing for the guardianship of spendthrifts are based upon the right of the government to protect the property of citizens for the benefit of themselves and their families, and of the community.[2]

B. Exercise of Power. The power conferred by a statute providing for the guardianship of a spendthrift's property is an extraordinary one, founded upon considerations of public policy, and should be exercised with great caution.[3]

III. WHO MAY BE ADJUDGED SPENDTHRIFTS.

A married woman who has the exclusive control of her property may be placed under guardianship as a spendthrift.[4]

IV. GUARDIANSHIP OF SPENDTHRIFTS.

A. Appointment of Guardian[5] — 1. Proceedings to Appoint — a. Venue. Under statutes conferring authority upon officers of the town to which a person belongs to institute proceedings for the appointment of a guardian for a spendthrift, the civil authorities of the town where the alleged spendthrift resides or has his domicile at the time of the appointment have jurisdiction,[6] although the legal settlement of such spendthrift is in another county[7] or state.[8]

1. Vt. Rev. St. c. 65, § 9 [cited in Black L. Dict.; Bouvier L. Dict.]. See also Young v. Young, 87 Me. 44, 32 Atl. 782; Morey's Appeal, 57 N. H. 54.

2. Bond v. Bond, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 382, holding that the exercise of statutory authority in appointing a guardian for a spendthrift is not a taking of the spendthrift's property in violation of his constitutional rights, but is a preservation of it for his own use.

The statute is primarily for the benefit of the spendthrift and his family, and secondarily for the benefit of the town. So far as the first object is to be obtained the proceeding is a police regulation to place a person who wantonly neglects himself and family under the control of those who will do what he himself ought to do. Cushing v. Hale, 8 Vt. 38. See also Norton v. Leonard, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 152, holding that the chief purpose of the statute is to restrain wasteful and vicious habits and to prevent the spendthrift from bringing misery and distress upon himself and family, the saving of expense to the town being subordinate to such purpose.

Denial of right of trial by jury.—A statute authorizing the judge of an inferior court to appoint a guardian does not deprive the spendthrift of the benefit of a trial by jury, where he has the right of appeal to a higher court, where a trial by jury may be ordered. Bond v. Bond, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 382.

3. Norton v. Leonard, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 152; Hamilton v. North Providence Prob. Ct., 9 R. I. 204.

Strict construction.—As such statutes are in derogation of common right, they will receive a strict construction and their provisions must be closely followed. Strong v. Birchard, 5 Conn. 357; Chalker v. Chalker, 1 Conn. 79, 6 Am. Dec. 206; Knapp v. Lockwood, 3 Day (Conn.) 131; Johnson v. Stanley, 1 Root (Conn.) 245; Ellis v. Cramton, 50 Vt. 608.

4. Tillinghast v. Holbrook, 7 R. I. 230, holding that the fact that the supreme court may appoint a trustee for a married woman's property is no objection to proceedings in a probate court looking to her guardianship as a spendthrift.

5. Evidence of appointment.— One original duplicate of the appointment of an overseer for a spendthrift is competent evidence of such appointment and supersedes the necessity of a sworn copy. Mix v. Peck, 13 Conn. 244. So the letter of guardianship is evidence that the guardian was duly appointed, where it appears that jurisdiction to make the appointment regularly attached. Raymond v. Wyman, 18 Me. 385.

6. Mix v. Peck, 13 Conn. 244; Stacey v. Benson, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 496; Cushing v. Hale, 8 Vt. 38.

A spendthrift in custody of an officer in a certain town and about to be committed to prison in another town at the time of the appointment of an overseer is within the jurisdiction of the selectment of the town in which he was in custody. Mix v. Peck, 13 Conn. 244.

7. Stacey v. Benson, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 496.

8. Cushing v. Hale, 8 Vt. 38.

Change of domicile.—Where an overseer in the first stage was duly appointed for a spendthrift and shortly thereafter the spendthrift was committed to an institution in another state, and while there the appointee was made overseer in the second stage, it was held that such removal did not change the ward's domicile, and hence the second appointment was not objectionable on the ground that the ward was not then an inhabitant of the town

b. Complaint or Petition — (I) Who May Make. Residents of the town in which an alleged spendthrift has his legal settlement cannot petition for the appointment of a guardian on the ground that such person may become a charge upon the town, where the statute does not give them such right.[9]

(II) Sufficiency. The petition must allege facts which show that the person complained of is subject to guardianship as a spendthrift within the statutory meaning of the term.[10]

c. Notice — (I) To Whom Given. If the spendthrift is of full age, notice to him is sufficient.[11]

(II) Service. Service by petitioner is improper where the statute requires that service be made by a disinterested person.[12]

d. Evidence. To authorize the appointment of a guardian for one as a spendthrift there must be proof of such wasteful or vicious habits on his part as will bring him within the statutory meaning of the term.[13]

e. Defenses. That a husband is able to support his wife will not prevent her being placed under guardianship as a spendthrift, but the court may consider such fact as bearing on the probability of her becoming unprovided for.[14]

f. Decree — (I) Time For Which Guardianship May Be Decreed. The appointment of a guardian for a spendthrift without limitation in point of time is void.[15] where the appointment was made. Clark v. Whitaker, 18 Conn. 543, 46 Am. Dec. 337.

9. McKenna v. McKenna, (R. I. 1908) 69 Atl. 844. Compare Baker v. Searle, 2 R. I. 115, holding, under an earlier statute, that any inhabitant of the town might prefer such a petition, and the signature of the overseer of the poor was not required.

A complaint purporting to be made by a majority of the selectmen and civil authority of a town is prima facie evidence that it was so made, and one contending that it was not made by a majority has the burden of proof. Cushing v. Hale, 8 Vt. 38.

10. Johnson v. Stanley, 1 Root (Conn.) 245. See also Young v. Young, 87 Me. 44, 32 Atl. 782, holding that under a statute providing for the appointment of a guardian for those who have become incapable of managing their affairs by "excessive drinking, gambling, idleness or debauchery of any kind," and also for those "who so spend or waste their estate as to expose themselves or families to want or suffering, or their towns to expense," a petition alleging that a person "is an indolent and intemperate man, and who spends and wastes his estate so much that he exposes himself and family to want and suffering, and his said town to expense by reason of said indolence and intemperate habits, he is incompetent to manage his own estate or to protect his rights," contains all the allegations required by the statute to authorize the appointment of a guardian to a person falling within the description of the second class mentioned in the statute.

A petition for the appointment of a guardian for a married woman as a spendthrift need not allege that the husband is unable to support his wife. Tillinghast v. Holbrook, 7 R. I. 230.

11. Hamilton v. North Providence Prob. Ct., 9 R. I. 204, holding, however, that it may be advisable in some cases to notify the spendthrift's family.

Where the petition is by the party himself, service of notice upon him is not necessary. Pratt v. Pawtucket Prob. Ct., 22 R. I. 596, 48 Atl. 943.

Failure of defendant to appear after due notice has once been given will authorize the appointment of a guardian in his absence, the giving of further notice being within the discretion of the court. Young v. Young, 87 Me. 44, 32 Atl. 782.

12. Baker v. Searle, 2 R. I. 115.

Service on prisoner.—Where the statute requires service of the summons upon the alleged spendthrift by leaving a copy at his usual place of abode, service upon him at the jail where he was imprisoned on a criminal charge was sufficient, it appearing that he had no other place of residence at the time. Dunn's Appeal, 35 Conn. 82.

13. Morey's Appeal, 57 N. H. 54, holding that proof of foolish and weak-minded habits in money matters was insufficient.

It rests largely within the discretion of the court to determine what evidence tending to show the manner of life of the alleged spendthrift is too remote. Hopkins v. Howard, 20 R. I. 394, 39 Atl. 519, holding that evidence of spendthrift's financial condition ten years prior to the filing of the petition was properly excluded.

14. Tillinghast v. Holbrook, 7 R. I. 230.

15. Chalker v. Chalker, 1 Conn. 79, 6 Am. Dec. 206; Waters v. Waterman, 2 Root (Conn.) 214. See also Washband v. Washband, 24 Conn. 500, holding that, where an overseer in the second stage was appointed without limitation as to time, before the expiration of the definite term for which an overseer in the first stage had been appointed, such second appointment would continue only until the expiration of the first overseer's term.

The appointment must be for a reasonable time. Chalker v. Chalker, 1 Conn. 79, 6 Am. Dec. 206.

(II) RECITALS. The findings of fact in proceedings for the appointment of an overseer or guardian for a spendthrift need not follow the exact language of the statute as to the causes assigned for the appointment.[16]

g. Appeal — (I) RIGHT OF APPEAL. Petitioner cannot appeal from an order dismissing his petition.[17]

(II) EFFECT OF APPEAL. The taking of an appeal by a spendthrift from the action of town officers in appointing a guardian does not affect the operation of the appointment.[18]

2. FILING NOTICE OF APPOINTMENT, INVENTORIES, ETC. In order that the guardian of a spendthrift may become entitled to the custody of his ward's property, it is essential that he comply strictly with the statutory requirements as to giving notice of his appointment,[19] filing inventories of the property taken, etc.[20]

3. BOND OF GUARDIAN. The giving of a bond with sureties is not a condition precedent to the authority of a spendthrift's guardian to act.[21]

4. WRONGFUL APPOINTMENT. Officers who appoint an overseer or guardian for a person in an illegal or oppressive manner are liable in damages to the party injured.[22]

B. Control and Custody of Spendthrift's Person and Estate — 1. GUARDIAN'S AUTHORITY WITH RESPECT OF SPENDTHRIFT'S PERSON. In general guardians of spendthrifts have no control of the persons of their wards.[23]

16. Mix v. Peck, 13 Conn. 244, where it was held that a finding that the alleged spendthrift was "spending his estate and likely to be reduced to want, and himself and family become chargeable to said town," was sufficient and proper without reciting in terms that he was "wasting or likely to waste his estate."

A decree based upon facts not assigned by the statute as grounds for the appointment is invalid. Johnson v. Stanley, 1 Root (Conn.) 245, holding that a decree reciting that the estate is likely to be reduced by lawsuits and mismanagement does not show sufficient grounds for the appointment of a guardian. And a decree which fails to recite that, by reason of the facts found, the spendthrift is likely to bring himself and family to want, or to render them chargeable upon the town, does not respond to the material allegations of the petition, and will not support the appointment. Pratt v. Pawtucket Prob. Ct., 22 R. I. 596, 48 Atl. 943; Hopkins v. Howard, 20 R. I. 394, 39 Atl. 519.

A decree appointing a guardian for a married woman as a spendthrift is not objectionable because guardianship of the property is coupled with guardianship of the person. Tillinghast v. Holbrook, 7 R. I. 230.

Recitals in probate records that a majority of the selectmen of a town made a representation and complaint to the judge of probate for the county; that a certain inhabitant of that town was a spendthrift and wasting his estate; and that thereupon notice issued to the alleged spendthrift to show cause why he should not be put under guardianship were sufficient to show that the judge of probate had jurisdiction. Raymond v. Wyman, 18 Me. 385.

Presumption as to recitals.— If the decree of the lower court recites all the elements required by statute as a basis for the appointment, it will be presumed by an appellate court that it was based upon a hearing and satisfactory proof of the material allegation of the petition. Young v. Young, 87 Me. 44, 32 Atl. 782.

17. McKenna v. McKenna, (R. I. 1908) 69 Atl. 844, holding that the petitioner was not a "person aggrieved" within the meaning of a statute giving the right of appeal to any person aggrieved by an order of the probate court, although he was a brother of the alleged spendthrift and had an annuity charged on her real estate.

18. Mix v. Peck, 13 Conn. 244.

19. Knapp v. Lockwood, 3 Day (Conn.) 131; Ellis v. Cramton, 50 Vt. 608.

20. Knapp v. Lockwood, 3 Day (Conn.) 131.

If he fails to do this, his ward may recover the property in an action of trover (Knapp v. Lockwood, 3 Day (Conn.) 131), and the guardian will be precluded from asserting the invalidity of a contract made between the spendthrift and one having no notice of his disability (Ellis v. Cramton, 50 Vt. 608).

Failure to sign and attest the inventory is, it seems, immaterial if it is otherwise perfect. Clark v. Whitaker, 18 Conn. 543, 46 Am. Dec. 337.

21. Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 143.

Bond for sale.—A bond given to a judge of probate by several guardians and their sureties to obtain permission to sell the whole of the spendthrift's real estate is a probate bond upon which the liability is both joint and several. Wood v. Hayward, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 269.

22. Johnson v. Stanley, 1 Root (Conn.) 245, where it appeared that selectmen had appointed an overseer for one as a spendthrift upon grounds not authorized by the statute.

If a valid appointment is made maliciously and without probable cause, the law will imply damage. Parmalee v. Baldwin, 1 Conn. 313. But if such appointment is a nullity, the claimant cannot maintain an action unless he alleges and proves special injury. Parmalee v. Baldwin, 1 Conn. 313.

23. Boyden v. Boyden, 5 Mass. 427, hold-

2. Guardian's Authority With Respect of Spendthrift's Estate. The general rules applicable to the representation of persons under disability by their guardians in matters relating to the custody and care of their estates apply to the guardianship of spendthrifts.[24]

C. Release From Guardianship. Where a court is vested with discretionary power to grant relief to one under guardianship as a spendthrift, its authority to release him from guardianship is practically unlimited, and only a gross abuse of discretion will warrant a revision of its action on appeal.[25]

V. DISABILITIES OF SPENDTHRIFTS.

A. With Respect of Contracts — 1. In General. There is no incapacity of spendthrifts at common law;[26] nor do the statutes so far liken them to insane ing that the spendthrift could not be restrained of his liberty or bound out to service by his guardian. Compare Lynch v. Dodge, 130 Mass. 458.

It is the duty of the guardian to see that the spendthrift does not suffer, and if the latter's estate has become exhausted he may obtain support for him at the expense of the town. Fiske v. Lincoln, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 473.

Where guardianship of the person is coupled with guardianship of the estate, such personal guardianship must be exercised in subordination to the rights of the spendthrift's wife. In re Chace, 26 R. I. 351, 58 Atl. 978, 69 L. R. A. 493.

24. See Guardian and Ward, 21 Cyc. 62.

Illustrations.— The guardian may maintain a suit for the benefit of the spendthrift, appoint an appraiser of land levied on under a judgment in his favor, and receive seizin in behalf of his ward. Bond v. Bond, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 382. He may obtain the dismissal of a suit pending against his ward prior to his appointment, when the ward's estate is decreed to be administered as an insolvent estate. Hawkins v. Learned, 54 N. H. 333. He may have a pension, to which his ward is entitled, transferred to himself. Cushing v. Hale, 8 Vt. 38. Where there are two guardians, one of them is competent to receive payment of a debt due to their ward. Raymond v. Wyman, 18 Me. 385. The guardian of an adult spendthrift may avoid any voidable contract made by his ward during minority. Chandler v. Simmons, 97 Mass. 508, 93 Am. Dec. 117. Where the spendthrift is a mortgagee of property and enters for condition broken, prior to being adjudged a spendthrift, the guardian may thereafter restore possession to the mortgagor and prevent foreclosure. Botham v. McIntier, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 346. The guardian must exercise reasonable prudence in making investments, and will be responsible for all losses arising in consequence of his failure to do so. Harding v. Larned, 4 Allen (Mass.) 426. The assent of the spendthrift will not exonerate him from responsibility for unauthorized acts or mismanagement. Hicks v. Chapman, 10 Allen (Mass.) 463; Harding v. Larned, 4 Allen (Mass.) 426. In making sales of the spendthrift's real estate under license of a judge of probate, the guardian will be held responsible for all losses arising in consequence of his disregard of the terms of the license, both in respect to the manner of making sale and the disposition of the proceeds. Harding v. Larned, 4 Allen (Mass.) 426. If the guardian of a spendthrift has assets and refuses to pay a debt of his ward, he is guilty of a breach of duty, the remedy for which is an action on the guardianship bond. Pendexter v. Cole, 66 N. H. 556, 22 Atl. 560.

No legal title to spendthrift's estate.— Simmons v. Almy, 100 Mass. 239; Hicks v. Chapman, 10 Allen (Mass.) 463, holding that an oral lease of the spendthrift's real estate by the guardian will not be construed as the latter's personal contract so as to vest the rents in him, where there is nothing in the terms of the contract to show that it was so intended.

Authority not coupled with interest.— Simmons v. Almy, 100 Mass. 239; Hicks v. Chapman, 10 Allen (Mass.) 463; Harding v. Larned, 4 Allen (Mass.) 426. Contra, Thompson v. Boardman, 1 Vt. 367, 18 Am. Dec. 684, holding, under the statute, that the power of the guardian was coupled with an interest and that he had the right to cut standing timber on the ward's land and that a note taken for such timber by the guardian, payable to himself, could not be discharged by the ward after he was released from guardianship.

The guardian may sell the homestead of the spendthrift for his maintenance and payment of his debts, under license of the court, although the homestead is exempt from levy on execution. Wilbur v. Hickey, 8 Gray (Mass.) 432.

25. Williston v. White, 11 Vt. 40.

The revocation of the guardian's appointment does not give validity to a contract, made while the appointment was in force, as against an intervening attachment. Mix v. Peck, 13 Conn. 244.

26. O'Donnell v. Smith, 142 Mass. 505, 8 N. E. 350; 1 Blackstone Comm. 305, 306.

Alimony.— In an action for divorce brought against a spendthrift, he may be ordered to pay alimony and suit money, since his liability therefor does not arise upon contract. Sturgis v. Sturgis, 51 Oreg. 10, 93 Pac. 696, holding that an order for payment of suit money and alimony directed to both the spendthrift and his guardian was erroneous as to the guardian, since the ward's debts are enforceable only against his estate.

persons as to create an incapacity apart from guardianship.[27] The disability of one who is adjudged a spendthrift is general; and no necessity of which the guardian is legally competent to judge will make a contract valid without his assent.[28]

2. Necessaries. A statute avoiding contracts of a spendthrift made after the filing of the complaint against him does not extend to implied contracts for necessaries.[29]

3. Time to Which Disability Relates. Where the statute provides that contracts entered into by the spendthrift after the filing of the complaint against him shall be void, an adjudication that defendant is a spendthrift relates back to the time of filing the complaint.[30] But the appointment cannot affect contracts entered into by the spendthrift for the purchase of goods prior to the commencement of the proceedings, but delivered after the appointment.[31]

B. Transfers and Conveyances of Property. Transfers and conveyances of property by one under guardianship as a spendthrift are void and will be set aside.[32] But a deed by one adjudged a spendthrift, and for whom a guardian has been named, is valid if the guardian has never qualified.[33]

VI. Actions By and Against Guardian or Spendthrift.

The general rules governing actions by or against persons under disability and their guardians apply to the guardian of a spendthrift and his ward.[34] A statute 27. O'Donnell v. Smith, 142 Mass. 505, 8 N. E. 350; Manson v. Felton, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 206.

Guardian's failure to qualify.—Where a decree was made appointing a guardian for a spendthrift, but the appointee never accepted or qualified, it was held that the decree, although unrevoked at the time of an assignment nine years later, would not affect the validity of such assignment, the incapacity of the spendthrift depending upon the fact of guardianship and not upon his habits. O'Donnell v. Smith, 142 Mass. 505, 8 N. E. 350.

28. Mix v. Peck, 13 Conn. 244, holding that a transfer of personal property by the spendthrift as security to one giving bail for his release under a criminal charge was invalid, not having been assented to by the guardian.

He cannot make a valid contract for the payment of money. Chandler v. Simmons, 97 Mass. 508, 93 Am. Dec. 117; Manson v. Felton, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 206.

29. McCrillis v. Bartlett, 8 N. H. 569, holding that expenses incurred in contesting the appointment may be regarded as necessary expenditures.

Articles of household furniture purchased by a spendthrift may be necessaries, and whether they are so is a question of fact. Leonard v. Stott, 108 Mass. 46.

30. Chandler v. Simmons, 97 Mass. 508, 93 Am. Dec. 117; McCrillis v. Bartlett, 8 N. H. 569, holding that the indorsement of a note by a spendthrift after filing the complaint was void where a guardian was afterward appointed on that complaint.

Ratification of contract pending appeal.—A spendthrift cannot ratify a contract executed by him while a minor, after the filing of a complaint in proceedings for the appointment of a guardian, and pending an appeal which results in the confirmation of the appointment. Chandler v. Simmons, 97 Mass. 508, 93 Am. Dec. 117.

A statute providing that "every gift, bargain, sale or transfer of any real or personal estate," made by the spendthrift after filing of the complaint and order of notice, shall be void, was held not to apply to promissory notes. Smith v. Spooner, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 239. Compare Manson v. Felton, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 206.

31. Myer v. Tighe, 151 Mass. 354, 24 N. E. 49.

32. Mix v. Peck, 13 Conn. 244; Ure v. Ure, 223 Ill. 454, 79 N. E. 153, 114 Am. St. Rep. 336 (holding that reimbursement of the purchaser for taxes paid by him is not a condition to setting aside the conveyance); McCrillis v. Bartlett, 8 N. H. 569.

Indorsement of note.—Where the payee of a note indorsed it, while under guardianship as a spendthrift, it was held that no title passed to the indorsee, although a copy of the complaint for the appointment was not filed as required by statute. Lynch v. Dodge, 130 Mass. 458. See also McCrillis v. Bartlett, 8 N. H. 569.

The subsequent assent of the guardian to an unauthorized transfer of personalty by a spendthrift will not give validity to such transfer as against an intervening attaching creditor. Mix v. Peck, 13 Conn. 244.

A spendthrift may appoint appraisers of land levied on under execution against him. Strong v. Birchard, 5 Conn. 357, holding that such appointment is not an act or contract within the meaning of the statute making acts and contracts of the spendthrift void.

33. O'Donnell v. Smith, 142 Mass. 505, 8 N. E. 350.

Deed to obtain release from guardianship.—A deed given by a spendthrift, under order of the court, to obtain his release from guardianship is not void for lack of, or illegality of consideration. Williston v. White, 11 Vt. 40.

34. See Guardian and Ward, 21 Cyc. 186.

barring claims against guardians, unless they are presented within a certain time after notice, does not bar the recovery of a personal judgment against an adult spendthrift.[35]

SPENDTHRIFT TRUST. The term commonly applied to a trust which is created with a view of providing a fund for the maintenance of another, and at the same time securing it against his improvidence or incapacity for his protection.[1] (See, generally, TRUSTS.)

SPENT BILL. Applied to a negotiable bill of lading, one which has not been produced, surrendered, or cancelled, although the goods represented thereby have been delivered to the consignee by the carrier.[2]

SPES EST VIGILANTIS SOMNIUM. A maxim meaning "Hope is the dream of the vigilant."[3]

SPES IMPUNITATIS CONTINUUM AFFECTUM TRIBUIT DELINQUENDI. A maxim meaning "The hope of impunity holds out a continual temptation to crime."[4]

SPINNING PLANT. A term which in its proper sense does not apply to silk machinery which does not elongate the fibre by drawing it out, as is done in the case of wool and cotton, but simply reels and twists it.[5]

SPINSTER. A woman who has never been married.[6]

SPIRIT or SPIRITS. An inflammable liquid produced by distillation, either pure or mixed only with ingredients which do not convert it into some article of commerce not known in common parlance under the general appellation of "spirits";[7] distilled liquor;[8] liquor manufactured by distillation;[9] the name of Illustrations.—The spendthrift cannot maintain civil suits in his own name. Mason v. Mason, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 506. No action is maintainable against the guardian personally for a debt of the spendthrift. Pendexter v. Cole, 66 N. H. 556, 22 Atl. 560; Sturgis v. Sturgis, 51 Oreg. 10, 93 Pac. 696. The remedy of a creditor of a spendthrift whose guardian refuses to pay his debt is by an action on the guardianship bond, and not against the guardian in person. Pendexter v. Cole, 66 N. H. 556, 22 Atl. 560. Creditors are not restricted to a suit on the guardian's bond, but may attach the ward's property by mesne process in all the usual modes, including trustee process. Simmons v. Almy, 100 Mass. 239; Hicks v. Chapman, 10 Allen (Mass.) 463. After revocation of the appointment and setting aside of sales made by the guardian under license of the court, the guardian may maintain an action against the administratrix of the spendthrift, to recover money which he has expended out of the proceeds of such sales in payment of the spendthrift's debts, and which he has been obliged to refund. Shearman v. Akins, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 283. The guardian of a spendthrift, whose estate has become exhausted, may notify the overseers of the poor that his ward is in need, and thereafter recover expenses incurred by him for the ward's support. Fiske v. Lincoln, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 473.

Service of a writ of entry on both the guardian and spendthrift and a general appearance of counsel for the defense will support a judgment for the demandant, although no formal summons was issued to the guardian. Whitcomb v. Jacobs, 9 Gray (Mass.) 255.

35. Wakefield Trust Co. v. Whaley, 17 R. I. 760, 24 Atl. 780.

The promise of a spendthrift under guardianship to pay a debt contracted before the appointment of his guardian will not take the debt out of the operation of the statute of limitations. Chandler v. Simmons, 97 Mass. 508, 93 Am. Dec. 117; Manson v. Felton, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 206. But such a promise by the guardian will have that effect and will hind the spendthrift. Manson v. Felton, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 206.

1. Bennett v. Bennett, 66 Ill. App. 28, 37.

A provision in a will which gave the rents and profits of the realty to the husband during his life, and the remainder in the property to his sisters, and exempted the interest of the husband in the property, or, rather, its rents and profits, from liability for the husband's debts, created such a trust. I. DEFINITION.

A state in its broadest sense is a political community, organized under a distinct government, recognized and conformed to by the people as supreme; a commonwealth; a nation.[1] The word is used variously to describe a people or community

1. Standard Dict. [quoted in O'Connor v. State, (Tex. Civ. App. 1902) 71 S. W. 409, 419].
Other definitions are: "Nations or States are bodies politic, societies of men united together for the promotion of their mutual safety and advantage by the joint efforts of their combined strength." Vattel L. Nat. § 1 [quoted in Thomas v. Taylor, 42 Miss. 651, 706, 2 Am. Rep. 625; Keith v. Clark, 97 U. S. 454, 459, 24 L. ed. 1071]. "Such a society has her affairs and her interests. She deliberof individuals united more or less closely in political relations, inhabiting temporarily or permanently the same country; the country or territorial region inhabited by such a community; the government under which the people live; or the combined idea of people, territory, and government;[2] but the primary and leading sense in which the term is used in the federal constitution is as meaning the body politic inhabiting the territory;[3] that is to say, a political community of free ates and takes resolutions in common, thus becoming a moral person who possesses an understanding and a will peculiar to herself, and is susceptible of obligations and rights." Vattel L. Nat. § 1 [quoted in Republic of Mexico v. De Arangoiz, 5 Duer (N. Y.) 634, 637; Keith v. Clark, supra].

"A political society organized by the common consent of the inhabitants of a certain territory for purposes of mutual protection and defense, and exercising whatever powers are necessary to that end." People v. Martin, 38 Misc. (N. Y.) 67, 69, 76 N. Y. Suppl. 953 [citing Cooley Const. Lim. 1].

"A complete body of free persons united together for their common benefit, to enjoy peaceably what is their own, and to do justice to others." Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 419, 455, 1 L. ed. 440.

The state is a body politic and not an association, society, or corporation within the meaning of a statute making property of any association, society, or corporation the subject of embezzlement. State v. Taylor, 7 S. D. 533, 534, 64 N. W. 548.

It is an artificial person having its affairs and its interests, its rules, its rights, and its obligations. It may acquire property distinct from that of its member; it may incur debts to be discharged out of public stock not out of the private fortunes of individuals; and it may be bound by contracts and for damages arising from the breach of those contracts. Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 419, 455, 1 L. ed. 440.

As used in cases relating to the home port of a vessel the word "state" refers to the jurisdiction and not merely to a sovereignty, and cannot have greater significance than the word "jurisdiction," "county," or "territory." Rees v. Steam-boat Gen. Terry, 3 Dak. 155, 13 N. W. 533, 537.

Used in reference to the subject of taxation it is employed in contradistinction to the term "local," and hence an act which is expressly described as being intended to raise a revenue for the state cannot be construed as covering the subject of the support for a local object, such as lighting the streets in a city by its municipal officers. People v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 574, 591.

As used in the sense of the whole state.— When a constitution speaks of the "state," the whole state in her political capacity and not merely a subdivision is intended. Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St. 607. But counties, cities, and the like are political subdivisions of the state and are included in the term "state," which is the concrete whole. State v. Levy Ct., 1 Pennew. (Del.) 597, 43 Atl. 522.

As including foreign states and countries.— The word "state" as used in the inheritance tax law imposed by the law or revenue act upon property passing either by will or by the intestate law of any state or territory is not construed in a sense broad enough to include a foreign state or territory but is limited to the states of the United States. Eidman v. Martinez, 184 U. S. 578, 22 S. Ct. 515, 46 L. ed. 697. Similarly where a statute requires insurance companies as a condition of doing business within a state to make a certain deposit with a state treasurer or other officer of the state where the company is organized, the word "state" is confined to the communities of the United States and will not include a foreign country (Employers' Liability Ins. Co. v. Insurance Com'rs, 64 Mich. 614, 31 N. W. 542); and the same applies to a statute providing that the jurisdiction of a criminal action for stealing in another state or receiving stolen property knowing it to have been stolen and bringing the same into the state is in any county into or through which such stolen property has been brought, and such a statute does not apply to property stolen in Canada (People v. Black, 122 Cal. 73, 54 Pac. 385, under Cal. Pen. Code, § 789). But under a statute exempting from taxation shares of stock in a corporation situated in another state, where all its stock is taxed in such state, it is held that the word "state" applies to the foreign state as well as to one of the United States. Foster v. Stevens, 63 Vt. 175, 22 Atl. 78, 13 L. R. A. 166.

2. Wabash, etc., R. Co. v. People, 105 Ill. 236, 240; Silver Bow County v. Davis, 6 Mont. 306, 12 Pac. 688; Union Bank v. Hill, 3 Coldw. (Tenn.) 325, 330; Texas v. White, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 700, 19 L. ed. 227, 25 Tex. 465, 595, holding, however, that in all these senses the primary conception is that of a people or community.

3. State v. Wilmington City, 3 Harr. (Del.) 294.

As used in U. S. Const. art. 2, § 1, providing for the appointment of presidential electors, and requiring that each state shall appoint a number of electors equal to the whole number of senators and representatives, "state" means the body politic and corporate. McPherson v. State Secretary, 92 Mich. 377, 52 N. W. 469, 31 Am. St. Rep. 587, 16 L. R. A. 475.

The word has a definite, fixed legal meaning in this country, and under our form of government it has acquired this meaning when the constitution was adopted, and this is held to be the one which must be attached to it when used in that instrument or in laws of congress. It means one of the commonwealths or political bodies of the American Union which under the constitution stand in certain specified relations to the national government and are invested as commonwealths with full power in their several spheres over all matters not expressly inhibited. It is a political citizens occupying a territory of defined boundaries, and organized under a government sanctioned and limited by a written constitution, and established by the consent of the governed,[4] specifically one of the several members of the Union.[5] In the latter sense it is used throughout this article. When a state sprang into existence as such is a mixed question of law and fact.[6]

II. POLITICAL STATUS AND RELATIONS.

A. Sovereignty of States. Prior to the formation of the federal constitution the states were sovereign in the full, absolute sense of the term;[7] but under the constitution their sovereignty stops short of nationality and their political status at home and abroad is that of states of the United States;[8] and thus they are not sovereign within the meaning of that term in international law,[9] being prohibited by the federal constitution from dealing directly with foreign nations;[10] but the states are sovereign within their separate spheres as to all powers not delegated to the United States or prohibited to the states,[11] and subject to these restrictions each state is supreme and possesses the exclusive right of regulating organization having a chief executive who can make a requisition for extradition, and whose duty under the law is to obey one when made by one having authority under the constitution and laws of the United States. Ex p. Morgan, 20 Fed. 298, 304.

There is a distinction between the government of a state and the state itself. In common speech and apprehension they are usually regarded as identical and as ordinarily the acts of the government are the acts of the state, and because within the limits of its delegation of power the government of the state is generally confounded with the state itself. The state itself, however, is an ideal person, intangible, invisible, immutable. The government is an agent and within the sphere of its agency a personal representative. This distinction is to be observed in determining the effect of the acts of a governor as binding the state. Grunert v. Spalding, (Wis. 1899) 78 N. its own internal affairs,[12] and in all matters relating to the life, liberty, and property of citizens the state is sovereign so long as it does not conflict with the federal constitution.[13] Thus, except as restrained by the federal constitution, states may make or change their constitutions or laws at will;[14] or confer or withhold the right of state citizenship;[15] or exercise the taxing power;[16] or regulate the acquisition, tenure, transfer, and succession of real property within the state;[17] or, in general, may exercise any power possessed by them prior to the adoption of the constitution unless the exercise of such power is expressly or by necessary implication prohibited by the constitution, or interferes with the exercise of some power delegated to the United States;[18] and where by the constitution power is given to congress over a subject not exclusive in its terms or inconsistent with state action, the states may legislate on that subject until congress exercises the power conferred on it.[19]

B. Jurisdiction[20] — 1. In General. In general the jurisdiction of a state is coextensive with its sovereignty,[21] and subject to the restrictions imposed by the federal constitution, the sovereignty of each state extends throughout its entire territory and to all persons and property within its territorial limits.[22] Conversely,

The state is a sovereign having no derivative powers, exercising its sovereignty by divine right. It gets none of its powers from the general government. It has bound itself by compact with the other sovereign states not to exercise certain of its sovereign rights, and has conceded these to the Union, but in every other respect it retains all its sovereignty which existed anterior to and independent of the Union. Lowenstein v. Evans, 69 Fed. 908.

The power of the states to prescribe the qualifications of their own officers, the tenure of their offices, the manner of their election, and the grounds on which, the tribunals before which, and the mode in which such elections may be contested, is exclusive and free from external interference, except so far as plainly provided by the federal constitution. no state can exercise jurisdiction by judicial process or otherwise over persons or property outside of its territorial limits,[23] unless such power has been acquired by compact with other states,[24] except in case of a vessel upon the high seas, where the state to which the vessel belongs has jurisdiction in respect to matters not committed exclusively to the federal government.[25]

The jurisdiction of a state bordering on the sea over the waters thereof is that of an independent nation, except so far as it would conflict with that of the United States, and extends for a marine league from the shore, and over the bays and arms of the sea within the limits defined by international law.[26] This principle has been applied to the laws relating to fisheries,[27] to the criminal laws,[28] and to statutes giving a right of action for death by wrongful act.[29] Ordinarily the jurisdiction of states separated by a river,[30] or other body of water,[31] extends to the interstate boundary, but in a number of instances, by compact, constitution, or statute, two states have concurrent jurisdiction over rivers, etc., forming the boundary between them.[32]

that a state can have no existence, politically, outside and independently of the constitution of the United States,[34] and that under the provision of the constitution that the United States shall guarantee to every state a republican form of government, it rests with congress to determine what government to establish in a state and whether such government is republican;[35] nevertheless the states are not in any true and complete sense inferior to or dependent upon the United States. As to the United States and the thirteen original states, the historical fact, substantially, is that the states did not owe their existence to the United States,[36] any more than the United States was the creature of the states, but that the same fact, the success of the Revolution, established at once the governments of the states and of the United States. Historically, the states afterward admitted into the Union were in fact the political creatures of congress. Whatever, however, may be the facts of history or the proper interpretation thereof, under the existing dual system of government, the powers of sovereignty are distributed between the governments of the states and that of the United States, and each government as to the powers committed to it is supreme and independent.[37] Within the limits of state sovereignty the United States cannot interfere with the states,[38] nor can the states interfere with the government of the United States in the exercise of its constitutional powers,[39] the supremacy of the United States within its proper sphere being expressly recognized in the constitutional provision that the constitution and laws and treaties of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land.[40] Although in a measure independent, the United States is not as to one of the states a foreign nation,[41] and the state courts are required to give to the stat-lature of the state in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings see UNITED STATES.

"A republican form of government," within the meaning of U. S. Const. art. 4, § 4, guaranteeing to the states a republican form of government, is a government by the people, through the representatives appointed by them to the various departments, executive, legislative, and judicial, as provided either by direct vote or through some intervening officer or body by them selected and appointed by direct vote, for the purpose. Eckerson v. Des Moines, 137 Iowa 452, 115 N. W. 177. Enjoining enforcement of state law which violates federal constitution.—The action of a federal court, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it, and the performance of the duties imposed upon it by the constitution of the United States, established as the supreme law of the land by the voluntary act of the people of all the states, in enjoining officers of a state from enforcing a state law which violates rights secured by such constitution, involves no question of state rights or of the right to hold self-government. Under the confederate constitution it was held that the right of the confederate congress to exercise its various grants of power in imposing duties upon a citizen of a state, and its exaction of his services, must yield to the paramount right of the state to the services of such person in the administration of the state government, since to abridge this right would be destructive to the republican form of government as guaranteed by the constitution. Ct. 995, 29 L. ed. 264, holding that, in their relation to the general government, the states of the Union stand in a very different position from that which they hold to foreign governments, and that, although the jurisdiction and authority of the general gov-

utes of the United States the same recognition, force, and effect accorded the laws of the states;[42] and the intimate and necessary relation of the United States to the states is clearly shown by such constitutional provisions as those relating to the election of the president and members of congress, the organization, etc., of the militia, the guaranty of a republican form of government to the states, etc.[43]

2. Admission Into the Union — a. In General. The constitution provides that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress,"[44] and under this provision a number of states have been admitted.[45] The admission of a territory as a state requires the action of both the people of the territory and of congress.[46]

b. Conditions of Admission. The constitution has left it to the discretion of congress to determine the circumstances under which a state shall be admitted and the steps to be taken by the people of the prospective state to obtain admission;[47] but while congress may refuse to admit a state, a state once admitted is not bound by any condition subsequent annexed by congress to her admission,[48] and it seems that congress has no power to impose upon a state any condition precedent which would impair her equality with other states;[49] but congress may impose conditions authorized by the federal constitution and which bind all the states alike.[50]

c. Effect of Admission[51] — (i) In General. Upon the admission of a territory into the Union as a state the state government succeeds to all the powers of sovereignty previously enjoyed by congress and which belong to the original states, and only such powers in respect to the people of the new state remain in the federal government as, under the constitution, it may exercise over the original states.[52]

All treaties [53] and acts of congress affecting the rights, liberties, and privileges of the people in matters within the reserved powers of the states cease to have any effect, upon the admission of the new state, and such matters are regulated solely by the constitution and law of the state.[54] When, however, it is so provided by the state constitution, the laws of the territory remain in force,[55] and the officers of the territorial government may continue in the exercise of their duties,[56] until changed or superseded under authority of the state constitution. So also the constitutions sometimes provide for the preservation or continuance of actions, judgments, private rights, or claims, etc., after admission.[57] In general the new state succeeds to the rights [58] and liabilities [59] of the territory. The state government has no control over matters solely within federal cognizance, for example, over the records and proceedings of the late territorial courts.[60]

(II) EQUALITY OF NEW STATES. New states admitted into the Union are on an equal footing with the older states in respect to rank, the exercise of sovereign powers, and the restrictions placed upon all alike by the federal constitution; [61] and this doctrine does not rest upon any express provision of the constitution, but upon what is considered and held to be the general character and purpose of the Union of the states as established by the constitution, that is, a union of political equals; [62] but this equality does not require that the new states should be admitted to any right in the soil thereof considered as property;[63] nor does it preclude a difference between the states among themselves in respect to the restrictions which, in the exercise of their sovereign powers, they have voluntarily imposed upon themselves in their own constitutions;[64] and moreover, the true constitutional equality extends only to the right of each state, under the constitution, to have and enjoy the same measure of local or self-government, and to be admitted to an equal participation in the maintenance, administration, and conduct of the common or national government.[65] The new state is not bound by any act of the United States before its admission, in derogation of its sovereignty as an equal member of the Union.[66]

3. Annexation. One state, Texas, has been added to the Union by annexation.[67] The former system of government so far as it conflicted with the federal authority was abrogated, and the constitution and laws of the United States were in force in Texas immediately upon her admission as a state;[68] and by such annexation and admission all the citizens of the former republic became, without any express declaration, citizens of the United States.[69]

4. Secession — a. In General. After having been for nearly three quarters of a century the subject of debate,[70] it was finally decided by the result of the Civil war that a state cannot secede from the Union. The failure of the attempt to secede of course established only that secession was impossible, leaving still open the question of constitutional right. The courts, however, soon after the war established the constitutional principle that no state has a legal right to secede without the consent of the other states. It was held that the ordinances of secession and all acts intended to give effect thereto or dependent thereon were null and void, and that the seceding states constituting the Confederacy remained during the war states of the Union notwithstanding their attempted secession.[71]

b. Status of Seceding States. It has been held by the supreme court of the United States that the southern confederacy was a treasonable and illegal confederation within the provision of the constitution prohibiting any treaty, alliance,

The constitution, in all of its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union, composed of or confederation by one state with another, and that the confederate government never had any legal existence even as a de facto government, and hence that its legislative and other public acts were without any validity whatever,[72] except in so far as they were adopted and put in force by a state.[73] In this connection a distinction is made between the acts of the confederate states and those of an individual state belonging to the confederacy,[74] in several early cases it being held that the government of the seceding states had no legal existence even as de facto governments, and that all their acts were wholly null and void;[75] but it is now well settled, however, by repeated decisions of the federal supreme court and of the state courts, that the existing state governments were practically unaffected by the acts of secession and the organization of the confederacy, and that the same general form of government and the same general law for the administration of justice and the protection of private rights which had previously existed in the states remained in existence during the period of secession, and that all public acts of the states not in conflict with the federal authority and laws were valid;[76] and furthermore it has also been recognized that for certain purposes, particularly as to consummated transactions between its own citizens, the confederate government constituted a de facto government which ceased to exist upon its overthrow in 1865;[77] and it has been held that during the war neither the law of the United poses,[83] or providing for the issue of bonds, notes, etc., in support of the confederate government,[84] or authorizing the investment of fiduciary funds in confederate securities,[85] were void. In some instances the acts of the secession governments were ratified and made valid by the restored state governments,[86] while in others they were declared null and void.[87] It has been held that the restored state governments were not liable on the obligations of the secession governments;[88] nor did payment to the secession government of a debt due the former state government bind the restored government.[89]

(II) Transactions and Acts of Individuals. Transactions between or acts done by individuals in the seceded states in accordance with the laws thereof, which would have been lawful in ordinary circumstances, and which had no tendency to aid or promote the prosecution of the war against the United States, were valid;[90] but all such transactions or acts tending to give aid or support to the war were void.[91] It has been held, however, that individuals could not be held liable for acts done at the instance of the military authorities of the secession government.[92]

d. Reconstruction and Readmission. The acts of congress of 1867–1870, known as the Reconstruction Acts, which placed the southern states under military government, and provided for their restoration to the rights of states upon compliance with certain terms, have not been much considered by the courts.[93] These acts contemplated not the readmission of the reconstructed states into the Union as having ever been out of it, but merely their restoration to the full status of states by readmitting them to representation in congress.[94] While the constitutional provision guaranteeing to the states a republican form of government has been supposed to afford authority for reconstruction,[95] the constitutionality of the acts providing for military government is at least doubtful, but has not been decided by the United States supreme court.[96] The question would probably have been decided in the McCardle case [97] had not congress deprived the supreme court of jurisdiction while the case was pending.

D. Relation of States to Each Other — 1. In General. Except to the limited extent to which the federal constitution has provided otherwise, the states are entirely independent, and sustain toward each other the relation of foreign states.[98] Special duties or restrictions are imposed by the constitution upon the states in interstate relations in connection with extradition,[99] the proof and effect of judgments,[1] the privileges and immunities of citizens,[2] and similar matters as to which the particular titles to which the matters relate must be consulted.[3] The principles of international comity apply as between the states, but comity between states so far as concerns rights, privileges, and immunities of each other's citizens not guaranteed by the federal constitution must yield to the laws and policy of the state in which it is invoked.[4] All the states of the Union, both old and new, stand upon a footing of equality of constitutional right and power.[5]

2. Compacts and Agreements Between States. States may enter into compacts or agreements with each other, and a number of such agreements relating to boundaries,[6] to the jurisdiction of offenses committed on boundary waters,[7] to the right of fishing in such waters,[8] or to other matters of public interest [9] have been upheld by the courts. Contracts between states are made by the acts of their respective legislatures; [10] and under the provision of the federal constitution that "no state shall, without the consent of congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another state or with a foreign power," [11] such contracts generally require the consent of congress. This provision, however, does not apply to every possible agreement or compact between two states, but only to such as might tend to increase the political power of the states affected, and thus encroach upon or interfere with the supremacy of the United States; agreements which can in no respect concern the United States may be made by the states without the consent of congress.[12] The consent of congress to an agreement between states may be given after as well as before the making of the agreement,[13] and need not be expressed in any particular form; it is sufficient that congress, by some positive act in relation to the agreement, has signified its consent thereto.[14] Thus an act of congress admitting into the Union a state formed by the division of an existing state is an implied consent to the agreement of the two states on the subject.[15] A compact made by two states with the consent of congress is binding upon the citizens of both states,[16] and is a contract within the constitutional prohibition of the impairment of the obligation of contracts.[17]

E. Relation of States to Foreign Countries. Since the states have no independent political existence in an international sense, they can sustain no public relation whatever to foreign countries;[18] and participation by the states in international affairs, such as making treaties or alliances, taxing imports and exports, engaging in war, etc., is expressly prohibited by the federal constitution.[19] The constitutional prohibitions do not, however, preclude a state from making aliens capable of inheriting or taking and holding property within the state, in the absence of treaty.[20]

F. Territorial Extent and Boundaries — 1. Compacts, Treaties, and Agreements as to Boundaries. In a number of instances questions relating to boundaries have been settled and the boundaries established by compacts or agreements between the states, made with the consent of congress, as between Florida and Georgia in 1859,[21] New Jersey and New York in 1833,[22] Kentucky and Tennessee in 1820,[23] Tennessee and Virginia in 1803,[24] and Virginia and Pennsylvania in 1780,[25] and on several occasions both prior to and since the adoption of the federal constitution particular states have ceded portions of their territory to the United States, the terms of cession being set forth in the acts or deeds of cession.[26] In like manner state boundaries forming also international boundaries

Missouri river as eastern boundary of Washington county, Nebraska.— In a suit to quiet in some cases to mean to the middle of the main channel used in navigation, and not the middle of the river bed measured from bank to bank,[30] while other cases take an opposite view and hold the boundary to be the midway line of the two banks.[31] Where, however, one state is the original proprietor of the territory through which the river flows, and grants territory on one side of the river only, it retains the river within its own domain, and the state created out of the ceded territory extends to the river bank only.[32] Where the course of a river forming Laws (1887), p. 348, c. 25, defines the eastern boundary of Washington county, Nebraska, as the middle of the channel of the Missouri river, the courts cannot look beyond that act for proof of the location of the boundary, cannot be sustained, for, although the legislature is vested with comprehensive powers in this department of government it cannot, by mere enactment, without the coöperation of an adjoining state, extend the territory of this state at the expense of that state, or thereby invest its courts with extraterritorial jurisdiction. Columbia river as boundary between Oregon and Washington.— The middle of the north ship channel of the Columbia river, described as the boundary between Oregon and Washington in Act Feb. 14, 1859, c. 33 (11 U. S. St. at L. 383), admitting Oregon into the Union, remains the boundary, subject to the changes in it which come by accretion and is not moved to the other channel because the latter, in the course of years, becomes the more important and is properly called the main channel of the river. The western boundary of Tennessee declared and fixed by treaties and legislative enactments to be the middle of the Mississippi river means a line along the river bed equally distant from the visibly defined and substantially established banks confining the waters on either side, and does not mean the center of that part of the river which is deepest and constitutes the channel of commerce, and the concurrence of Tennessee and Arkansas by judicial decisions, legislation, and other official actions and long acquiescence, and the exercise of jurisdiction unchallenged as to their common boundary is effective between them and controlling, irrespective of the construction of treaties and legislation defining that boundary. The boundary between Alabama and Georgia is held to depend upon the words in the contract of cession between the United States and Georgia describing the boundary of the latter "west of a line beginning on the western bank of the Chattahoochee River, where the same crosses the boundary between the United States and Spain, running up the said river and along the western bank thereof," and under this grant it is held that there is ownership of soil and jurisdiction in Georgia in the bed of the river Chattahoochee, the bed of the river being held to be that portion of its soil alternately covered and left bare by an increase or diminution in the supply of water, and the western bank of the cession of the Chattahoochee river must be traced on the water line of the acclivity on a boundary is suddenly changed by avulsion or similar process, the boundary remains fixed by the original channel, although the stream may no longer flow therein;[33] but where the course of the river is gradually changed by accretion or degradation of its banks, the boundary is determined by the river as it runs, and gradual accessions of territory by accretion belong to the state owning the bank affected.[34]

3. Change of Boundaries. Congress has no power to take from one state any portion of its territory and give it to another state upon the admission of the latter into the Union,[35] nor can congress change the boundaries of a state as fixed by it when the state was admitted;[36] nor can a change in the boundaries of a

June 16, 1836; by Ark. Const. (1836), and subsequent constitutions; by an act passed by the congress of Texas in 1836 (Laws of the Republic (1836), 133), recognizing the same boundary; and by the act of congress passed in 1845 (Act March 1, 1845, 5 U. The new channel at Devil's Elbow, Tennessee.— The Mississippi river in 1876 cut for itself a new channel across Devil's Elbow, Tennessee. The change of channel was sudden and violent, occurring in less than two days, and the course of the river was shortened nearly twenty miles, nearly two thousand acres of cultivated land being occupied by the new bed and the old channel entirely abandoned, and the new channel called "Centennial Cut-Off," was of the usual width of the river. This was held to be an avulsion, and hence it did not change the boundary line between the state of Tennessee and Arkansas which remains where it was originally fixed, in the middle of the abandoned channel. The western boundary of Missouri, extended by Act Cong. June 7, 1836, c. 86 (5 U. S. St. at L. 34) to the Missouri river, remains the center of that stream, even if by erosion the result may be to take from Missouri territory which lies east of the original boundary defined as a meridian running due north from the mouth of the Kansas river. 36. State v. Muncie Pulp Co., 119 Tenn. 47, 104 S. W. 437, holding that the western state, even if made with the assent of congress, affect titles legally acquired under the preëxisting conditions.[37] On the other hand state boundary lines cannot be changed by prescription without the consent of congress, if thereby the political power and influence of the state enlarged would be increased; but where there would be no such effect boundary lines may be so established, although variant from the original lines.[38] Long acquiescence by one state in the possession of territory and the exercise of dominion and sovereignty over it by another state is conclusive of the latter state's title and rightful authority.[39]

4. Judicial Establishment of Boundaries; Jurisdiction and Procedure. The determination of the boundary of a state is ordinarily a political question with which the state courts will not intermeddle, and the action of the state legislature in the matter is conclusive on the courts;[40] and it is incompetent for any court in a suit between private persons to change the boundary line between two states for any purpose.[41] This principle, however, does not apply to a question of boundary arising between the United States and one of the states, or between two states. Such a question is not of a political nature and is susceptible of judicial determination.[42] The United States supreme court has original jurisdiction of suits in equity between two states,[43] or between the United States and a state,[44] to determine a state boundary. Such suits are brought by bill in equity and conducted according to the rules of pleading and practice of the court of chancery.[45] By reason, however, of the dignity of the parties and the importance of the interests involved, such controversies are not to be decided upon mere technicalities, but the chancery rules should be so molded and applied as to boundary of Tennessee at the time of its admission as a state, in 1786 (1 U. S. St. at L. 491, c. 47), being the middle of the Mississippi river, the designation of the eastern boundary of Arkansas as the middle of the main channel at the time of its admission as a state, in 1836 (5 U. S. at L. 50, c. 100) could not have been intended to designate a different boundary line than that of Tennessee as it then existed, since under U. S. Const. art. 4, § 3, providing that new states may be admitted but no new state shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state or any state formed by the junction of two or more states or parts of such states without their consent, congress was without power to change the boundaries of Tennessee as fixed by it when that state was admitted.

bring the cause to a hearing on its real merits,[46] and thus the court will not apply the same rules as to the time of answering,[47] or the effect of laches or the lapse of time,[48] as in suits between individuals. In general, however, the court acts in the same manner as in determining boundary disputes between private individuals; an issue at law may be directed, or a commission awarded, or, if the court is satisfied without either, it may itself determine the boundary.[49] In several cases the court has appointed commissioners to determine, run, or mark the boundary.[50] The costs of the suit will be equally divided between the two states where the matter involved is a governmental question in which each party has a real and vital yet not a litigious interest.[51]

5. DIVISION OF STATES. Although the constitutional provision that "no new state shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state," [52] taken literally, would seem to forbid the division of a state, this provision has not been so interpreted, and in one instance, the case of Virginia, a state has been divided into two states.[53] Upon the division of the state, each of the resulting states became liable for the total indebtedness of the original state,[54] and provision was made for the apportionment and adjustment of such liability between them.[55]

III. GOVERNMENT AND OFFICERS.

A. Government in General. The state, in general, possesses all governmental powers not prohibited to it by the federal or state constitution,[56] this power being distributed between the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, the appropriate functions of each department being for the most part exercised exclusively by that department.[57] The state legislature is not, however, restricted to such powers as are expressed in the constitution of the state, but it may exercise any legislative authority that is not withheld by the language of the constitution.[58] The state can, however, properly exercise only such powers as are of a governmental nature, it being held that even in the absence of an express prohibition, the state has no power to embark in any trade which involves the purchase and sale of an article of commerce for profit;[59] although it seems that a state may properly conduct a business even though yielding a profit, where this is done merely as an exercise of the police power, as where a state conducts the sale of intoxicating liquors in the state,[60] or engages in the manufacture of goods by convict labor.[61] But where a state engages in ordinary business, pursuing it like an individual, it throws off for the purpose its sovereignty and becomes subject to the rules governing the conduct of private individuals.[62] In the state there are two classes of political corporations, one of which is the state, and the other municipal corporations, and the state and municipal officers are but agencies and agents of the state to enable it as a corporation the better to discharge its duties and perform its functions;[63] but there cannot be at the same time and in the same state two valid state governments with two sets of officers.[64] Conditions involving this question have rarely arisen, but during the Civil war the courts had frequent occasion to pass upon the validity of the governments of the seceding states, and it was held that such governments were at least valid de facto governments, and their acts not in contravention of the federal authority were valid,[65] a de facto government being construed to be completely, although only temporarily, established in the place of the lawful government, occupying its capital and exercising its powers, and which is ultimately overthrown and the authority of the government de jure reëstablished.[66]

An act creating a new county of a portion of an existing county is not an apportionment act and does not affect legislative representation or change the boundaries of existing election districts. lation or that the districts shall contain an equal number of inhabitants;[79] and generally the apportionment act must provide for at least substantial equality of representation to the people of the several districts, based either upon the voting of the entire population or upon some other fair basis, and an act not providing for such equality is void.[80] Although exact equality in apportionment cannot be attained the legislature is required to approximate as nearly thereto as may be;[81] and an apportionment act which fails to provide representation for the voters of a portion of the territory to be apportioned is unconstitutional where there is no previous law in force providing representation for the omitted territory;[82] but the mere omission to provide complete representation will not invalidate the whole act where there is in force a former act under which the omitted portion may be allowed representation.[83] Where the provisions of an act apportioning the state into districts are dependent upon each other, the unconstitutionality of the apportionment of some of the districts will invalidate the entire act.[84]

c. Reapportionment and Change or Alteration of District. Except as restrained by the state constitution, the legislature has power to change the boundaries of election districts.[85] But the constitutions commonly prohibit the legislature, after having made a valid apportionment, from making a new apportionment during the apportionment period, the apportionment once made being required to remain unaltered until another enumeration,[86] and this prohibition may be implied as well as express.[87] Such a prohibition does not prevent the change of boundaries of counties or towns;[88] but the legislature cannot by the incorporation or enlargement of towns affect the boundaries of the districts as apportioned.[89]

d. Judicial Review and Control. An apportionment act which contravenes the constitutional requirements is void,[90] and the courts have jurisdiction to pass upon the validity of apportionment acts and may set aside an unconstitutional act as an abuse of legislative discretion;[91] and in determining whether the legislature has abused its discretion will take into account all the circumstances of the case.[92] But the legislature is vested with considerable discretion in making apportionments, and its action is not subject to control or review by the courts unless such discretion is plainly and grossly abused,[93] and an apportionment will not be declared invalid except for serious defects therein.[94]

2. Election, Eligibility, and Qualification of Members. The election of members of the legislature is generally regulated by the constitutions of the states,[95] which usually prescribe the maximum and minimum number of members of the legislature, leaving the precise number, within the prescribed limits, to be fixed by the legislature,[96] and which also provide the term of office of members,[97] and their qualifications, as that they shall not at the same time hold certain other offices,[98] or that they shall have been for a designated period citizens or inhabitants of the districts for which they are elected;[99] and which usually provide that each house shall have power to judge of the qualifications and election of its members, each house under this provision being the sole judge and the courts having no jurisdiction of the matter;[1] and each branch of the legislature has power for cause to expel a member.[2] Before entering upon their office members are required to take the oath of office.[3]

In general the two houses of the legislature are organized and governed in accordance with the recognized principles of parliamentary law, subject to any special provisions of the state constitution,[4] each house being vested with the power of making rules for its own government.[5] As between two bodies claiming to be the lawfully constituted senate or house of representatives, the courts have jurisdiction to decide which is the constitutionally organized body.[6]

both houses.[9] For certain purposes the two branches of the legislature sit in joint session,[10] and in the absence of a constitutional inhibition, one branch of the legislature may sit when the other is not in session.[11] The legislature usually sits at the seat of government, but provision is sometimes made for assembling elsewhere, where, on account of extraordinary conditions, it is not practicable to assemble at the seat of government.[12]

b. Extraordinary. Extraordinary sessions may be called by the governor under constitutional authority, and where the constitution authorizes the calling of such sessions by him, he is the sole judge as to whether or not an occasion for such session exists,[13] the power of the legislature to legislate when convened in extra session being subject to any limitation imposed thereon by the state constitution.[14]

c. Adjournments. Adjournments, except for brief periods, usually require the concurrent action of both houses, or, in case of a disagreement, the governor may order an adjournment;[15] but where the legislature has adjourned at the expiration of its term it cannot again be lawfully called together except by the governor to sit in extra session.[16]

d. Quorum. Generally a majority of the members of a legislative body will constitute a quorum, in the absence of a constitutional provision fixing the number.[17]

5. Officers, Committees, and Clerks Thereof. Each house has the power to choose its own officers and to remove them from office,[18] and to appoint committees which, in general, have those powers and only those which are conferred upon them by the legislature,[19] and which in the absence of special authority can act only while the legislature is in session.[20] But where the legislature is required to act as a unit, a single branch cannot legally appoint a special investigating committee.[21] Each house may also employ clerks for its own committees.[22]

6. Journal of Proceedings. The constitutions provide for the keeping and publishing by the legislature of a journal of its proceedings,[23] and ordinarily these legislative journals constitute conclusive proof of their contents and import absolute verity, and cannot be impeached or disputed;[24] but erroneous recitals of facts in the journal may be corrected by the legislature by amendment at the same or a subsequent session.[25] It is not the duty of the secretary of state as the custodian of the legislative journals to expunge false entries therefrom, and he cannot be compelled to do so.[26]

7. Investigations and Inquiries; Compelling Attendance of Witnesses and Punishment For Contempt. The legislature, or either branch thereof, has power to institute investigations or inquiries in respect to matters properly coming before it, and in this connection may require witnesses to attend and testify before it or one of its committees,[27] and it has power to punish for contempt witnesses summoned by it who refuse to appear, or to testify, or to produce documents which they have been lawfully required to produce.[28]

2. Executive Officers and Boards — a. In General. The constitutions or statutes frequently provide for the establishment of executive officers, departments, boards, or commissions, their character, powers, duties, and functions being determined by law.[62] The enumeration by the constitution of certain officers as constituting the executive department of the state does not necessarily deprive the legislature of the power to create other executive offices, although it cannot abolish any of those created by the constitution;[63] and the legislature cannot deprive an officer of the duties imposed upon him by the constitution by the creation of another officer to perform the same duties;[64] and furthermore the creation of other executive offices is sometimes expressly prohibited by the constitutions;[65] but the establishment of executive boards of existing executive officers by imposing upon them additional duties to be performed is not the creation of new executive offices.[66] In several states the constitutions provide for the appointment of an executive council to advise and assist the governor in the discharge of his duties.[67]

b. Governor. The governor is the chief executive officer of the state, and is clothed with the powers and charged with the duties appertaining to the office of such executive, his powers and duties being largely prescribed by constitution or statute.[68] As a rule these duties involve the exercise of official discretion, and his action is therefore not ordinarily subject to judicial review or control.[69] The constitutions provide that in case of the death,[70] resignation,[71] absence,[72] disability,[73] or impeachment [74] of the governor, his office or duties shall devolve upon some other officer, such as the lieutenant-governor,[75] president of the senate,[76] or secretary of state.[77] Where the governor voluntarily undertakes to perform duties not in the line of his official duty, such duties do not devolve upon his successor in office unless also accepted by him.[78]

governor, to succeed to the office or duties of the latter.[79] The succession to the powers and duties of the lieutenant-governor upon his succeeding to the office of governor is determined by law, these powers and duties usually devolving upon the president of the senate.[80]

d. Secretary of State. The constitutions provide for a secretary of state, the duties of the office being largely defined by statute.[81] Ordinarily the secretary of state is the keeper of the public records in his office,[82] and he is required to countersign and affix the state seal to commissions issued by the governor.[83] It is also his duty to prepare the copies of the laws and journals for the printer.[84] The secretary cannot certify to the genuineness of an officer's signature unless so authorized by statute.[85] The duties of the secretary of state must be performed personally except when otherwise provided;[86] but they may be performed by an assistant secretary when the law so provides.[87]

e. Treasurer. The treasurer has by law the custody and control of the moneys of the state,[88] and where his power is derived from the constitution, he cannot be deprived of such control by the legislature.[89] The duties and powers of the treasurer in connection with the state funds are, however, frequently prescribed by statute.[90] Upon the expiration of his term of office it is not necessary for the treasurer to withdraw public funds on deposit in a state depository and physically deliver their possession to his successor.[91]

3. Eligibility. The qualifications of state officers may be prescribed by law,[92] and where the constitution prescribes such qualifications the legislature

cannot add thereto.[93] A common negative provision is that persons holding certain offices shall be ineligible to hold certain other offices at the same time,[94] which provision is not, however, violated by a law simply annexing to such offices new powers and duties appropriate thereto.[95] On the other hand, making a person an ex officio officer by virtue of his holding another office does not merge the two offices into one.[96] In some states the constitution provides that members of the legislature shall be ineligible to state offices during the term for which they were elected to the legislature,[97] and in such case a member cannot render himself eligible by resigning his seat in the legislature.[98]

4. Appointment or Election.[99] The election or appointment of state officers, such as the governor [1] or other officers,[2] is provided for by constitution or statute.[3] Except in cases provided for by the constitution, the legislature may by law direct the manner in which officers shall be elected or appointed or vacancies filled,[4] and when the mode of filling an office is prescribed by law, the election or appointment of the officer in any other mode is void.[5] Some officers are elected or appointed by the legislature,[6] others are appointed by the gover-

The governor ratifies an appointment by the legislature by approving the act making the appointment, even though he might have prevented the appointment, as interfering with his prerogative, by vetoing the act. Thomas v. State, 17 S. D. 579, 97 N. W. 1011.

Effect of ineligibility of candidate receiving majority of votes.—Where in an election by the legislature the candidate who receives a majority of the votes is ineligible, the elinor,[7] or by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate.[8] In the case of an officer appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, the issuance of his commission is a part of the act of appointment and completes it;[9] and generally a commission is not completed until it has been signed, countersigned, and sealed as the constitution prescribes; nor is a copy of an uncompleted commission, or the record thereof, evidence of any appointment to office;[10] but where the governor properly appoints an officer and issues a proper commission, the refusal of the secretary of state to countersign it and seal it with the great seal does not affect the validity of the appointment.[11] Mandamus lies to compel the governor to issue,[12] and the secretary of state to seal and countersign,[13] the commission of an officer entitled thereto. Where in an election by the legislature the candidate who receives a majority of the votes is ineligible, the eligible candidate receiving the largest number, although not a majority of the votes, is elected.[14] The mode of deciding contested elections is determined by law.[15]

5. Qualification. State officers are generally required to qualify before assuming the duties of their office, the formalities of qualification being prescribed by law.[16] The usual formalities are taking the oath of office[17] and giving bond,[18] and no other formalities of qualification are necessary than those prescribed by law;[19] and where the constitution prescribes the formalities of qualification, the legislature cannot add thereto.[20] The failure of an officer to qualify does not ordinarily create a vacancy in the office, but the former incumbent holds over until a new officer is elected or appointed and qualifies;[21] but where the statute so provides, the failure to qualify within the time limited constitutes a refusal to accept the office, and a new election or appointment is required.[22] The mere qualification of a person as a state officer by taking the oath before his title to the office has been perfected by the observance of all the prescribed formalities of the election will not entitle him to assume the office.[23] An officer who fails to qualify is not entitled to the salary of the office.[24]

6. De Facto Officers.[25] The official acts of a de facto state officer have generally the same force and effect as if he had been an officer de jure.[26] Thus a regularly appointed or elected officer who has not taken the oath of office may act officially,[27] and his sureties are liable on his official bond for his defaults.[28]

7. Deputies and Assistants. Official duties involving such discretion and trust that they must be performed by an officer personally cannot be delegated to a deputy;[29] but ministerial duties may be delegated,[30] and officers are frequently authorized to appoint deputies to perform their regular duties;[31] and provision is also sometimes made for the appointment of assistant officers.[32] Deputies so appointed are state officers and not mere employees.[33] In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, the tenure of a deputy officer continues only during the term of the officer appointing him.[34]

8. Term of Office and Holding Over. The term of office, and time of commencement thereof, of state officers is generally prescribed by constitution or statute;[35] but where the constitution creates an office and leaves the term undefined and unlimited, the officer holds during good behavior, subject to the power of the legislature to limit the term or authorize removal.[36] A state officer elected or appointed for a definite term will generally hold over after the expiration of his term until his successor is appointed or elected and qualifies,[37] and this without any express provision to that effect,[38] and although the constitution provides that the duration of office shall not exceed the prescribed term.[39] But an officer who vacated his office by resignation does not continue to hold over until the appointment or election of his successor.[40]

9. Vacancies. The mode of filling vacancies in state offices is prescribed by law. provided by law.[46] What constitutes such a vacancy as may be filled by the governor will depend considerably upon the terms of the law authorizing the governor to act.[47] Plainly no such vacancy is created by the failure to elect,[48] or of the officer elected to qualify,[49] where the former incumbent holds over. The resignation of an officer creates a vacancy.[50] A statute providing for appointment to fill a vacancy upon resignation does not authorize a filling of one caused by death or some other cause.[51]

10. Resignation, Removal, or Suspension. The resignation[52] or removal or suspension[53] of state officers is to a considerable extent regulated by constitution or statute. Officers are in some cases removable by impeachment;[54] but ex-officers[55] and persons who are not state officers within the provisions relating to impeachment[56] are not subject to impeachment. Officers are sometimes removable by an address of the legislature,[57] and in some cases the governor is empowered to suspend an officer;[58] but the governor has, by virtue of his office, no general power of removal;[59] but this power is in some cases expressly conferred upon him,[60] and in the absence of a constitutional restriction the legislature may authorize the executive to remove incompetent or unfaithful officers.[61] Neither the governor alone nor the governor and senate has any power of removal as incidental to the power of appointment.[62] Where an officer is removable only for cause he cannot ordinarily be removed without notice and hearing;[63] but it is otherwise where the officer is removable at pleasure.[64] An officer who has been commissioned and inducted into office is in by color of title, and cannot be ousted by the governor, as by appointing another in his place, but the rival claimant must resort to quo warranto.[65]

11. Appointment, Employment, and Removal of Agents and Employees. State officers or boards have power to appoint or discharge agents or other employees whenever such power is expressly conferred by law or implied from the nature of the duties to be performed, but not otherwise;[66] and the state is not liable for the compensation of agents or employees employed by state officers without authority.[67] A state in employing an agent has the same power to revoke the appointment as an individual, and the repeal of the statute authorizing the agent's appointment operates as a revocation.[68]

12. Privileges of Officers. State officers while transacting official business are sometimes privileged from being sued in a civil action.[69] In some states public officers are prohibited by law from asking or receiving free passes on railways, but this prohibition does not apply to railroad commissioners traveling in the discharge of their official duties.[70]

13. Compensation and Fees — a. In General. The compensation of state officers,[71] and employees,[72] including the amount, and the time and mode of payment, is ordinarily provided for and prescribed by law, and a public officer or agent is not entitled to compensation for his services unless so provided;[73] but where the law indicates that some compensation is to be paid, but does not fix the amount thereof, a reasonable compensation may be awarded.[74] The compensation of officers is usually in the form of salaries or fees or both,[75] by fees in this connection being meant compensation given by law to public officers for official services rendered to individuals,[76] and where there is no law authorizing it, a state officer cannot charge fees.[77] In many instances fees have been abolished, a fixed salary being substituted in their place.[78] Whether fees collected for services shall belong to the officer or to the state is determined by law.[79] The salary annexed to a public office is incident to the title to the office, and not to its occupation and exercise, and only a person having a right to the office can recover the salary thereof;[80] and where the title to the office is in dispute, the salary cannot be recovered until the question of title is settled by a competent tribunal.[81] Where an officer dies during a fiscal unit of time and a successor is appointed to fill out the time, the compensation for the period should be pro rated.[82]

b. Increase or Reduction. A common constitutional provision is that the compensation of public officers shall not be increased or diminished during their term of office;[83] but under a constitutional provision that the compensation of senators and representatives shall be a certain sum and that no increase shall be prescribed to take effect during the term for which the members of the existing legislature may have been elected, the legislature may increase the compensation of its members, to take effect at the next ensuing term.[84] In the absence of such restriction, the compensation and duties of officers may be increased or diminished at the will of the legislature.[85]

c. Double or Extra Compensation. Where the law so provides, an officer is entitled only to the compensation fixed by law;[86] but such a provision does not prevent his receiving compensation as the incumbent of another office which he may lawfully hold,[87] and an officer is entitled to extra compensation for extra services not incompatible with the duties of the office.[88] Where the constitution provides that an officer shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by law an officer who is required to perform additional duties to those already prescribed is not entitled to additional compensation therefor unless so provided by law;[89] and no additional compensation can be allowed by law where this would be an increase within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition.[90]

d. Payment, Allowance, and Recovery. Sometimes the salary of state officers is made by law a preferred claim against the state;[91] and a state officer may retain in his possession property in respect to which he has rendered services until his compensation is paid;[92] and an agent or attorney who has collected funds for the state may apply so much thereof as may be necessary in payment of his claim for compensation and expense,[93] unless the law provides otherwise;[94]

but if, without retaining his compensation, the officer or agent pays the money into the state treasury, the state becomes his debtor, and he can recover his claim only by a legislative appropriation.[95] Where money payable to one officer has been improperly paid to another, the former cannot recover from the latter, but his claim is against the state, which may recover back the money improperly paid.[96]

e. Recovery by State of Excessive or Illegal Compensation or Fees Paid to Officer or Agent. The state may recover the amount of excessive or illegal compensation or fees paid to an officer or agent in an action brought against him,[97] even though paid under a mistake of law.[98]

14. Authority and Powers of Officers and Agents. The authority and powers of particular state officers and agents are determined by law, and the power conferred on a state officer by statute cannot be varied or enlarged by usage or by the construction placed on the statute by the state officer.[99] The powers of the general executive officers of the state are not usually conferred in detail, and such officers may exercise powers naturally falling within the scope of their general authority, although not expressly conferred.[1] A state is bound as a natural person by the acts of its authorized agents within the scope of their authority;[2] but a state officer or agent can act only within the powers conferred upon him, and the state is not bound by his unauthorized acts,[3] and individuals as well as courts must take notice of the nature and extent of the authority conferred by law on state officers and agents.[4]

15. Duties of Officers and Agents and Performance Thereof — a. In General. The authority of a public corporation created as agent of the state may be very extensive in the direction in which it is intended to be used, but it not only has less authority in other directions than ordinary citizens, but has none whatever, and the authority conferred upon it can be sustained only in so far as not divested or controlled by authority emanating from the same or a higher source. law.[7] In the absence of constitutional restrictions, the duties of a state officer may be increased or diminished at the will of the legislature;[8] but the legislature cannot take from an officer the powers and duties given him by the constitution.[9] A state officer will be presumed to have done his duty, and his acts will be presumed to be regular, until the contrary is shown;[10] but this rule does not apply to mere agents appointed by the legislature for a special service.[11] The official acts of state officers must be performed personally except when otherwise allowed by law.[12]

b. Accounting and Settlement. It is the duty of officers receiving and disbursing moneys of the state to keep accounts and make reports as provided by law,[13] the settlement of accounts between a state and its officers being governed in general by the rules affecting accounts between individuals,[14] subject to any statutory provisions on the subject.[15] Records of accounts of state officers have ordinarily no judicial character, but are mere books of entries of one party to an account, and open to correction;[16] but a settlement of accounts by the state through its authorized officers is binding on the state in the absence of fraud or mistake.[17] An account may be corrected in equity at the suit of the state for mistake.[18]

16. Liability of Officers[19] — a. In General. A state officer or agent who contracts for and in the name of the state is not personally liable on the contract;[20] and an officer who acts within his official duty is not liable to individuals for his acts.[21] While state officers are not ordinarily liable to individuals for mere nonfeasance in office, they are liable for misfeasance or positive wrong to third persons in the discharge of their official functions,[22] and an officer is liable for acts done without authority of law or under authority of a void law.[23] State officers are not personally liable for the wrongful acts of agents, servants, or other persons acting under them when they have themselves been guilty of no personal neglect, misfeasance, or wrong;[24] but an officer who has power to require a bond of a state employee and who fails to take such bond is responsible for the employee's default.[25] An officer cannot be held responsible for the derelictions of his predecessor with which he was not connected.[26]

b. To State. A state officer cannot be held liable to the state for the manner in which he has exercised his official discretion, although the state has thereby suffered loss;[27] and an incumbent of a state office, of which the duration and salary are definitely fixed by law, is not accountable to the state auditor for the manner in which he has discharged the duties of his office,[28] nor is a state officer responsible for the loss of state property unless due to his negligence;[29] and an officer who under an honest mistake as to the extent of his powers acts without authority of law is not liable to the state where no damage results thereto from his unauthorized act.[30] But a state officer may be held liable for money embezzled by himself or by a subordinate for whom he is responsible.[31]

officer,[33] and his sureties are liable on his official bond for his defaults in office as contemplated by the bond. But no action can be maintained against the sureties on an officer's bond for defaults of the officer in connection with duties not belonging to his office and not contemplated by the bond; such default not constituting a breach of the bond,[34] although the officer may himself be held liable on his bond for such defaults.[35] The sureties on the bond given for one term are not liable for the officer's defaults during another term, the bond given for one term not covering official acts during another term.[36] The fact that the officer acted in good faith is in itself no defense to an action on his bond for a breach thereof;[37] but it is a good defense that the bond was invalid because not properly executed,[38] or on account of fraudulent representations to the sureties.[39] The release of sureties is sometimes provided for by statute;[40] but the mere fact that new duties have been imposed upon the principal by law,[41] or that the negligence of other officers made the principal's default possible,[42] will not relieve the sureties. Where a bond is made payable to an officer, suit thereon should ordinarily be brought in the name of the officer and not in the name of the state;[43] and where by law the bond is required to be given to the state, and there is no provision for its transfer to individuals aggrieved by the wrongful acts of the officer, the obligation of the bond cannot be extended so as to inure to their benefit.[44] The statute of limitations does not operate than nominal damages against the treasurer, where there is no allegation that the warrant at the time of the sale was worth more than the amount paid for it, and the lack of such allegation is not supplied by an averment that some time after sale the warrant was paid in full by the municipality, with interest to the date of payment. State v. Kelly, 78 Kan. 42, 96 Pac. 40, holding also that where the state treasurer having custody of a municipal warrant sells it without authority before funds have been raised by the municipality for its redemption, and thereby becomes liable for its conversion, the measure of damages to the state does not necessarily include interest up to the time of payment.

against the state in an action on an officer's bond,[45] except where expressly so provided;[46] but the rule that limitations do not run against the state does not apply to suits on official bonds taken in the name of the state for the use of individuals.[47]

d. Criminal Liability. State officers are liable to criminal prosecution for offenses committed by them as officers;[48] but ordinarily an officer is not liable criminally for his official action except where he acts wilfully, maliciously, or corruptly.[49]

D. State Institutions, Corporations, and Public Works — 1. In General. The establishment, support, management, and control of state institutions, such as asylums, educational institutions, reformatories, prisons, and the like, are provided for and regulated by law.[50] These institutions are frequently, if not usually, corporations owned and controlled by the state;[51] and the state, in the absence of a constitutional prohibition, may be the sole stock-holder in a corporation of a public character such as a state bank.[52] But in several states the state is prohibited by the constitution from becoming joint owner or stock-holder in any company, association, or corporation.[53]

2. Public Improvements and Works. The construction, maintenance, or operation of public improvements or works is provided for by law, and is usually committed to boards, commissioners, or other officers;[54] and in the absence of any constitutional prohibition, the legislature may authorize the construction by state officers of works of internal improvement.[55] But in some of the states the constitution expressly prohibits the state from engaging in any work of internal improvement.[56]

IV. PROPERTY.

A. Acquisition and Tenure — 1. In General. A state has in general the same rights and powers in respect to property as an individual. It may acquire property, real or personal, by conveyance, will, or otherwise, and hold or dispose of the same or apply it to any purpose, public or private, as it sees fit.[57] The power of the state in respect to its property rights is vested in the legislature, and the legislature alone can exercise the power necessary to the enjoyment and protection of those rights, by the enactment of statutes for that purpose.[58] The legislature may, however, ratify the unauthorized act of a state officer in dealing with its property.[59] The possession of state property by the authorized agents and officers of the state is the possession of the state.[60]

2. LAND SITUATED IN ANOTHER STATE. A state cannot hold land in another state if the latter state objects thereto;[61] but it may do so with the consent of such other state;[62] and where a state has acquired land in another state with the tacit consent of the latter, its title can be divested only by some proceeding by that state in the nature of office found; it cannot be impeached by a private individual in the absence of any action by the state.[63] When a state purchases land in another state from a private person it holds such land as a subject and not as a sovereign.[64] So also where a state grants land within its territory to a sister state, reserving the right and title of government, sovereignty, and jurisdiction, the grantee state assumes merely the position of a private proprietor, and holds its estate subject to all the incidents of ordinary ownership.[65]

B. Public Buildings. The legislature has power to provide for the acquisition of public buildings for the use of the state. Thus it may authorize the construction of a state house or other public building, subject to any limitation placed by the constitution on this power,[66] or it may buy or rent buildings for the use of the state.[67]

C. Results of Labor of State Employees. The results of the labor of a state employee, while working in the service of the state and with its materials, belong to the state, and the employee has no title thereto.[68]

D. Sales and Conveyances. The power to dispose of state property is vested in the legislature which may make provision therefor by statute,[69] and the statutory provisions must be complied with or the sale will be void.[70] The legislature may, however, ratify an unauthorized sale.[71] A deed executed by a state officer in behalf of the state, under authority of the legislature, is a sufficient conveyance of land belonging to the state;[72] and a conveyance executed by the duly authorized officers passes the state's title, although executed in the names of the officers and not in the name of the state;[73] but a conveyance of land to a state officer as such and his successors in office is not sufficient to vest title in the state, in the absence of evidence that the land was bought for the state, or that the officer was authorized to take title for the state in his own name.[74] A sale of state property by authorized officers is binding on the state, although the officers refuse to execute the contract, and the law authorizing the sale is afterward repealed, and the officers can be compelled to complete the sale.[75] A state does not warrant the title to land which it grants,[76] but a grantee from the state is not estopped to deny what the state could assert.[77] A statute authorizing state officers to sell or dispose of state property vests no title to such property in the officers.[78]

E. Indebtedness to State — 1. Interest. In general debts due a state bear interest upon the same principles as debts due a private creditor.[79]

2. Priority of State as Creditor. In some states it is held that by the common law the state, as sovereign, is entitled to preference as creditor;[80] but in other states it is held that no such priority exists unless secured by constitution or statute;[81] and where such priority is recognized, it is defeated by a general assignment for the benefit of creditors.[82] The state through its legislature may waive its liens in favor of other creditors.[83] A surety of a deceased debtor to the state, who has paid the debt to the state, is entitled to be subrogated to the state's prior claim in the distribution of the debtor's assets.[84]

3. Settlement or Release. Except so far as restrained by her constitution, a state has power through her agents to make an amicable settlement or adjustment with her debtors,[85] and the legislature may release a debt due to the state,[86] unless such release is prohibited by the constitution.[87] Such a provision, however, is not intended to embrace a release of claims doubtful or hazardous which the state might hold against a corporation or individual.[88]

V. CONTRACTS.

A. Power to Contract — 1. In General. The state has, in general, the same power to contract as a corporation or an individual.[89] Thus a state may contract with an individual or with another state by an act of the legislature.[90]

But the power of a state to contract may be limited by provisions of its constitution, and contracts in contravention of such limitations are void;[91] and the state's power to contract is subject to the further limitation that a state cannot by contract divest itself of the essential attributes of sovereignty, such as the police power, or the power of eminent domain, and the like.[92]

2. Contracts Made by Officers or Agents — a. In General. The contracts of a state are usually made by duly authorized officers or agents. The state is bound by contracts executed in its behalf by its authorized officers or agents;[93] and a contract made by state officers under statutory authority binds the state notwithstanding the subsequent repeal of the statute authorizing it.[94] But it is sometimes provided that officers must not be interested in any contract made by them in their official capacity, and a contract made by an interested officer does not bind the state.[95] The authority to bind the state by contract need not be express, but may be implied;[96] but it must be an actual as distinguished from an apparent authority,[97] and cannot be varied or enlarged by mere usage.[98] Where an agent is appointed by law to contract for the state, the law under which he acts is as much a part of the contract made by him as if it were formally embodied in the contract; [99] and when the statute prescribes the terms upon which the state is to be bound by a contract executed by a public officer in its behalf, and declares that a failure to comply with such terms will result in no contract, such statute is mandatory, and constitutes a limitation upon the power of the officer to bind the state by such contract.[1] The governor of a state has no general authority to contract in its behalf and can bind the state only within the power specially conferred upon him by law.[2]

b. Unauthorized Contracts. Public officers have and can exercise only such powers as are conferred upon them by law, and a state is not bound by contracts made in its behalf by its officers or agents without previous authority conferred by statute or the constitution,[3] unless such authorized contracts have been afterward ratified by the legislature;[4] and a state cannot by estoppel become bound by the unauthorized contracts of its officers; [5] nor is a state bound by an implied contract made by a state officer where such officer had no authority to make an express one.[6]

c. Notice of Extent of Officers' Powers. The powers of state officers being fixed by law, all persons dealing with such officers are charged with knowledge of the extent of their authority or power to bind the state, and are bound, at their peril, to ascertain whether the contemplated contract is within the power conferred,[7]

the burden being upon the one seeking to enforce a contract purporting to be with the state to show that such contract was within the authority of the officer making it.[8]

B. Form and Requisites — 1. In General. Contracts made by state officers on behalf of the state should be made in the name of the state and not in the individual names of the officers;[9] but a contract purporting to be the act of the state, signed with the individual names of the officers with their official designation affixed, is sufficient, and is the contract of the state and not of the officers personally.[10] Unless the statute so requires, the contract need not be in writing in order to be binding;[11] but where the contract is required to be in writing, the state is not bound by a contract not reduced to writing, although all the terms thereof may be agreed upon.[12]

2. Official Approval. Sometimes contracts are required to be approved by designated officers,[13] in which case a contract is not binding on the state until so approved,[14] unless the requirement as to approval is merely directory.[15] The approval need not be in any particular form, unless so required,[16] and may be implied as well as express.[17]

C. Letting of Contracts — 1. In General. The manner of letting contracts for public work is frequently prescribed by statute,[18] and when so prescribed the officers charged with the duty of letting such contracts must proceed according to the prescribed mode. A contract not let in the manner required by law is not binding on the state.[19] The officers are usually invested, however, with a large amount of discretion in making the awards, and the exercise of this discretion, unless abused, cannot be controlled by the courts;[20] and they cannot be compelled by mandamus to let the contract to any person when, in the proper exercise of their discretion, they have awarded it to another;[21] but the awarding of a contract may be compelled in a proper case not involving the exercise of discretion.[22]

2. By Public Bid — a. Advertising; Acceptance and Rejection of Bids. The officers are frequently required to advertise for bids.[23] The officers may prescribe any reasonable formality to be observed by bidders,[24] and the advertisements must be sufficiently specific to enable contractors to make intelligent bids and proposals for the performance of the proposed contract,[25] and must be published as the law requires,[26] and a contract let upon less notice than that required by the statute is voidable by the state;[27] but a bidder who participates in the bidding without objecting to the manner of advertising for and receiving bids cannot, after the contract has been let to another, contest the validity of the proceedings previous to the actual letting.[28] The bids must conform at least substantially with the advertisement or proposal for bids,[29] and must also comply with the law governing the letting of the contract;[30] and after the bids have been filed and opened, the officers cannot permit corrections except for mistakes apparent on the face of the bids.[31] The fact that the bid was not deposited in the designated office within the time prescribed will not necessarily invalidate the bid where the requirement is merely directory.[32] The officers may reject bids which do not comply with the advertisement or proposal,[33] which on their face are palpably calculated and intended to cheat the state,[34] which result from a combination to prevent bidding,[35] or which are not accompanied by a proper bond.[36] Where the statute so provides, the officers may reject all bids and issue a new call for bids.[37]

Purpose and sufficiency of the bond.— It is sometimes provided that every bidder shall accompany his bid with a bond conditioned upon his undertaking and performing the contract if awarded to him. work,[39] or for supplies for the use of the state,[40] shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, and a contract not so let does not bind the state.[41] The term "responsible" in this connection means something more than mere pecuniary ability; it includes also judgment, skill, ability, capacity, and integrity;[42] and hence the officers in awarding the contract must exercise official discretion in determining who is the lowest responsible bidder upon the consideration of all of these elements of responsibility,[43] and their decision, in the proper exercise of their discretion, in determining who was the lowest bidder, will not be reviewed;[44] but a letting to persons who have conspired to prevent bidding may be set aside.[45] The state, however, may waive its right to repudiate the contract because of the illegal combination, upon discovery of the fraud, and may affirm the contract and thus become bound thereby.[46]

D. Contractors' Bonds. Persons contracting to erect buildings or perform other public work for the state are frequently required to give bonds with sureties for the faithful performance of their contracts,[47] in which case the state is not bound unless such bond is given and approved.[48] In the absence of a provision in the statute or contract or bond extending the benefit of the bond to persons furnishing labor or material to the contractor, such persons cannot maintain an action on the bond;[49] but they may do so when expressly included in its benefits.[50]

E. Particular Contracts — 1. For Construction and Maintenance of Buildings and Other Public Works. The construction of public buildings and other public works by the state is authorized and regulated by statutes which prescribe the character of such buildings, etc., their cost and location, the persons who shall construct them and their powers, and other details of construction;[51] and so also the statutes generally provide for the care and maintenance of public buildings.[52] Statutes authorizing the construction of public works frequently fix the cost and make appropriation therefor and prescribe the mode of expenditure;[53] and where a statute authorizes the construction of a building at a cost not to exceed a certain amount, the officers in charge have no power to provide for the expenditure of more than that amount;[54] nor can money raised by the issue of bonds for the erection of a public building be used even temporarily for the general expenses of the state, such fund being analogous to a trust fund.[55] Where a commission appointed to erect a public building is invested with discretion in the discharge of its duties, such discretion cannot be delegated by them,[56] or controlled or reviewed by the courts;[57] but the commissioners may be held personally liable for wrongs and breaches of contract committed by them.[58]

2. For Employment of Servants or Agents. A state officer or board cannot bind the state by a contract employing an agent, assistant, or servant, unless the making of such contract was clearly within the authority conferred by law;[59] but in general state officers charged with the performance of certain duties have the letting of contracts for public printing to the lowest responsible bidder.[68] State officers can bind the state for contracts for public printing only where authorized by law to make such contracts;[69] and where the manner of letting such contracts is prescribed, the officers in charge must proceed according to the prescribed mode, the contracts being governed by the statutes.[70] The rights of the contractor are fixed by the contract and by the law in force at the time of its execution.[71]

F. Ratification of Unauthorized Contract. The legislature may ratify an unauthorized contract made by a state officer,[72] unless in contravention of the constitution,[73] and a portion of a contract may be so ratified without ratifying it all.[74] The ratification can be only by the legislature,[75] and only by a law duly passed by both branches of the legislature;[76] and the act of ratification or adoption must be so explicit and definite as to show an intention to recognize and adopt the unauthorized contract.[77] It is not necessary, however, that the ratification should be in direct terms; it may be effected by legislation recognizing the contract as valid.[78] Thus bringing suit on the contract may amount to a ratification,[79] and an appropriation of money for the payment of a claim arising under the contract may be so made as to constitute a ratification,[80] and the state may also ratify a contract by taking advantage of it;[81] but the mere fact that the state has received the benefit of an unauthorized contract does not necessarily constitute a ratification;[82] nor is the mere silence of the legislature for a short time respecting an unauthorized contract a ratification thereof;[83] nor the enactment of a statute authorizing certain contracts a ratification of similar contracts previously made without authority.[84] An officer or agent cannot ratify his own unauthorized contract.[85]

G. Construction and Operation. The contracts of a state with individuals are to be construed in the same manner and have the same binding effect upon the parties thereto as the contracts of private parties.[86] In construing such a contract, however, due regard must be had to the provisions and purposes of the statute authorizing it;[87] and where the contract is ambiguous, the statute may be resorted to for aid in its construction.[88]

H. Modification and Rescission. A state has no more right than an individual to modify or rescind a contract entered into by it, unless such right has been reserved,[89] particularly where the state is itself in default and the other party cannot be placed in statu quo.[90] But the state may modify its contract with the consent of the other party thereto,[91] and the state may repudiate a contract not let in accordance with the statute,[92] or which was fraudulently procured;[93] and while the state is liable on its contracts, it may defeat the enforcement thereof by reason of its immunity from suit except with its own consent, or by failing to make the necessary appropriation.[94] The state is not liable for the unauthorized action of a state officer in attempting to cancel a contract.[95] Where the making of a contract for public work is intrusted to a board, an individual member of the board has no power, without authority of the board, to modify a contract made by the board.[96]

I. Performance and Breach. A state, like an individual, is liable for its breach of contracts, although, in the absence of a statute authorizing suits against the state, the contractor cannot enforce performance or recover damages, and his only remedy is an appeal to the legislature for relief.[97] When authorized by statute an action for damages may be brought against the state for breach of contract,[98] or a suit for specific performance may be maintained;[99] but there can be no recovery against the state on a contract not performed according to its terms.[1] A state breaking its contract is liable for prospective profits.[2] The passing of a law impairing the obligation of a contract made by the state may be taken by the other party to the contract as a breach, relieving him from performance;[3] but the mere refusal of a state to perform its contract does not impair its obligation, although it gives rise to a claim for damages.[4] All contracts made with the state are subject to the provisions of existing law, and the state is not liable for loss to contractors growing out of an alleged improper administration of that law by the executive officers;[5] nor is the state liable for loss to the contractor due to the misconduct of the officers of the state.[6]

VI. LIABILITIES.

A. In General. A state is liable on its contracts,[7] and for the expenses of the state government,[8] whenever the incurring of such liability is authorized by law; and in some cases the state is by constitution or statute made liable for certain expenses incurred by counties;[9] but the state is not so liable in the absence of statute.[10] The fact that the state is not subject to an action in behalf of a citizen does not establish that he has no claim against the state or that the state is not liable to him, but only that he has no remedy;[11] and a duty which cannot be enforced by action because owed by the state becomes a subject of action when transferred to private persons, as where a corporation purchases from the state certain public works subject to all the obligations of the state in respect thereto.[12]

B. Torts. A state is not liable for the torts of its officers or agents in the discharge of their official duties unless it has voluntarily assumed such liability and consented to be so liable,[13] the only relief the aggrieved person has in such

The administration of the funds in the public treasury belongs to the executive department of the government, and the judicial deand its power as to the creation of indebtedness or the expenditure of state funds,[19] or making appropriations,[20] is plenary, and the exercise of this power cannot be controlled or reviewed by the courts. The legislature is, however, bound by all constitutional limitations,[21] although in determining whether the conditions or contingencies specified in the constitution as justifying the contraction of a debt or the making of an appropriation exist, the legislature has large discretion, and its action is not subject to judicial control unless such discretion has been plainly abused.[22]

B. Indebtedness and Expenditures — 1. Limitations Upon Power to Incur Indebtedness — a. Purpose of Indebtedness. In some states the constitution prohibits the legislature to contract any debt,[23] or to contract any debt in a particular manner, as by a loan,[24] except for certain purposes, such as to meet casual deficits in the revenue,[25] or to provide for defraying extraordinary expenses.[26]

b. Amount. In many of the states the amount of indebtedness which may be contracted or expenditure which may be authorized by the legislature, except for specified purposes, is expressly limited by the constitution; and where this is the case, a legislative appropriation or expenditure in excess of the constitutional limit is void and creates no indebtedness against the state.[27] Such a conpartment has no jurisdiction to seize such funds and distribute them under its orders. Fairfield County Com'rs v. Winnsboro Nat. Bank, 7 S. C. 78.

There is no absolute criterion by which it can be known at the date of the act appropriating or authorizing the expenditure of money, whether such appropriation or expenditure will be in excess of the prescribed constitutional limits; but the general assembly must exercise its own judgment in the stitutional limitation is mandatory and not merely directory,[28] and cannot be set aside by the judiciary;[29] nor can the state executive officers in any way legally approve or recognize legislative acts making appropriations in excess of the constitutional limits,[30] and it is the duty of the officers administering the state finances to treat as void every such excessive appropriation.[31] Debts contracted for certain purposes, such as to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, etc., are usually excepted from the constitutional limitation. The power of the legislature to contract debts for the excepted purposes is therefore unlimited.[32]

c. Provision For Payment. Acts creating indebtedness are sometimes required to make provision for the payment thereof.[33]

2. What Constitutes the Creation of a Debt. Whether an appropriation creates a debt within the meaning of a constitutional prohibition against contracting a debt depends on the character of the appropriation and the manner of its payment.[34] In general any act or transaction by which the state becomes bound to pay money creates a debt;[35] but making appropriations already provided for by the revenue laws is not creating a debt in the sense of the present discussion,[36] even though in anticipation of such revenue.[37] But an appropriation for which the revenue laws are inadequate,[38] and for which no provision is made by the appropriation act itself,[39] creates a debt. If, however, the appropriation law makes such provision, no debt is created.[40] The funding of an existing debt by the issue of bonds or other securities therefor merely in substitution and not in payment thereof is not creating a debt;[41] but the issue of bonds to be first instance, and are clothed with ample powers for securing the most accurate and reliable information concerning the public revenue; but while the general assembly must exercise its own judgment in the first instance, yet if for any reason it exceeds the constitutional limits, such excessive acts are mere nullities. In re Appropriations by Gen. sold for the purpose of raising funds to discharge an existing debt creates a new debt.[42] A mere transfer from one fund to another of money already in the treasury does not create a debt,[43] nor does a statute appropriating a stated sum annually as a mere gratuity alterable both as to amount and manner of application at the pleasure of the legislature.[44] A state debt may be considered extinguished when there is money enough in the treasury, not subject to other claims, to pay it, even though it has not matured and has not been actually paid.[45]

3. Limitation on Use of Funds or Credit. The state constitutions frequently place certain restrictions upon the use of public credit or funds. Thus in some states the constitution prohibits the loaning of the credit of the state,[46] or the making of loans or gifts of public money or property or of state aid to private individuals or corporations;[47] or forbid appropriations for any sectarian or denom-

State funds are to be collected by the officers and in the manner provided by law,[55] and should generally be paid into the state treasury, where they are under the custody and control of the state treasurer,[56] who is sometimes authorized to deposit state funds in banks or other depositories.[57] Revenues of the state assessed and in process of collection are to be considered as constructively in the treasury, and may be appropriated and treated as though actually there.[58] The state treasurer may be held liable for interest on funds improperly loaned,[59] or deposited by him.[60]

2. Disbursements. The disbursement of state funds is regulated by law.[61] Generally the state treasurer has no power and cannot be required to pay out money from the state treasury except in pursuance of specific appropriations made by law,[62] and upon a warrant or order from the state auditor or other proper officer.[63] Where the constitution provides that no money shall be paid out of the treasury except on a warrant drawn therefor by the proper officer in pursuance of an appropriation made by law, mandamus will lie to compel the auditor or controller to draw a warrant for the payment of a valid claim for which the legislature has made an appropriation,[64] but not where no appropriation has been made,[65] nor where the appropriation made has been exhausted;[66] and where such warrant is required, a statute providing for the payment of money without a warrant is void,[67] and the inhibition applies to funds belonging to the state which have not yet reached the treasury as well as to money actually in the treasury.[68] The treasurer is not ordinarily required to pay out the identical money received by him for a special purpose, but only money of the same value and essential qualities;[69] but warrants drawn on a particular fund are payable only out of that fund,[70] and warrants required by law to be discharged in a certain medium must be paid in that medium.[71] The treasurer may be held liable for loss to the state resulting from a payment irregularly made by him;[72] but a private citizen and taxpayer cannot sue to enjoin a state officer from misappropriating the public funds, where by law this duty is cast upon the attorney-general;[73] and where state funds have already been misapplied, the state, but not an individual taxpayer, may sue to recover them.[74]

3. Loan of Funds — a. In General. Officers charged with the collection, custody, and disbursement of funds belonging to the state cannot lawfully loan such funds in the absence of statutory authority therefor.[75] Such loans are, however, sometimes authorized by statute, in which case they will be governed as to their terms and conditions by the statutes authorizing them,[76] and must be made in accordance with the statute,[77] and an officer who loans money in an unauthorized manner may be charged with interest.[78] An unauthorized loan may be ratified by the legislature.[79]

b. On Mortgage Security. Mortgages taken by the state to secure its loans are subject to the general law of mortgages[80] as to the effect of default, etc., except so far as modified by particular statutes;[81] and foreclosure proceedings must conform at least substantially with all the statutory requirements as to parties, notice of sale, and similar matters, or they will be void;[82] but mere irreguraised,[88] or unless authorized by statute;[89] and the legislature cannot authorize the diversion of a special fund where such diversion would conflict with a provision of the constitution controlling such fund,[90] or would impair the obligation of a contract,[91] or constitute a breach of trust.[92] Individuals interested in a fund created for a particular purpose may enjoin the state officers having charge of the fund from diverting or applying it to any other purpose;[93] but the mere refusal of the disbursing officer to apply a particular fund to the purpose for which it was appropriated does not constitute a misappropriation of the fund.[94]

5. Apportionment of Funds. Ordinarily appropriations of the same rank share ratably if the fund out of which they are to be paid is inadequate to satisfy all.[95] But in some states the constitutions provide that in the event of a deficiency of funds to meet all of the appropriations made by the legislature, appropriations for certain purposes, such as for the support of the state, or its institutions, or to defray the necessary expenses of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, or to pay the interest on the state debt, shall be entitled to preference over any other appropriations, without reference to the date of the appropriations.[96] After preferred appropriations are satisfied, other appropriations are to be paid according to priority of date;[97] and where several appropriations of the same grade are made by separate bills of the same date, and there are funds to pay only part, priority will be determined by the time of day at which the several acts take effect;[98] but where an appropriation to pay an indefinite number of claims of the same kind to arise in the future proves insufficient to pay all the claims filed, such claims should be paid in full in the order of filing until the appropriation is exhausted.[99] An appropriation out of a fund "not otherwise appropriated" must be postponed to appropriations previously made out of that fund.[1]

6. Appropriations — a. Necessity For. The state constitutions or statutes generally provide that no money shall be paid or drawn from the state treasury or warrant drawn therefor except in pursuance of specific appropriations made by law.[2] The object of such a provision is to prevent the expenditure of the

of both branches of the legislature, neither branch acting alone can make an appropriation by law. Thus a senate resolution is not a law within the constitutional requirement,[10] nor is a joint resolution not signed and approved by the governor nor otherwise adopted as a law;[11] but where a fund is provided by law for the contingent expenses of either branch, the disbursement of that fund for such purpose is subject to the control of such branch.[12] The state constitution is a law, and an appropriation made thereby is sufficient.[13]

c. What Constitutes a Valid Appropriation — (i) In General. A specific appropriation is an act by which a named sum of money is set apart in the treasury and devoted to the payment of particular claims or demands.[14] The appropriation must be specific as to the amount or fund appropriated [15] and as to the object for which the appropriation is made,[16] it being sufficient, however, if the amount is capable of being determined,[17] and it is not essential that the amount be certainly ascertained prior to the appropriation,[18] nor need the statute designate the fund out of which the money is to be drawn.[19] The appropriation need not be made in any particular form of words, nor need it necessarily be express. It is sufficient if the legislative intent to make an appropriation clearly appears, expressly or by implication, from the terms of the statute;[20] but such language must be used as will show the intention of the legislature to make an appropriation;[21] and such intention will not be inferred from doubtful or ambiguous language.[22]

(II) For Salaries of Officers. It is not necessary in order to authorize the drawing of a warrant for the salary of a public officer that there should be a special annual appropriation therefor where there is a general law fixing the amount of the salary and prescribing payment thereof at particular periods.[23] Where, however, the act fixing the salary of an officer contemplates a further act of appropriation by the legislature, there is no appropriation without such further legislation.[24]

d. Prospective Appropriations. An appropriation may be prospective, that is, of revenues to accrue in future;[25] but a mere promise by the state to pay money is not such an appropriation.[26] Under a provision that no appropriation shall be made whereby the expenditure of the state during any fiscal year shall exceed the tax, every appropriation act, where the money appropriated is not actually in the treasury, should specify the revenue of the particular fiscal year out of which the appropriation is to be paid;[27] but an act is not void which does not definitely specify such revenue, provided it can be ascertained with reasonable certainty from the language and purpose of the act.[28]

the legislature may make continuing appropriations, that is, those the payment of which is to be continued beyond the term or session of the legislature by which they are made.[29] But in several states the constitutions provide that no appropriations shall continue in force longer than for a designated period.[30] Even under such a provision, however, unless expressly so provided, it is not necessary that the money appropriated should be actually drawn from the treasury during the time limited, although the expense must be incurred or the claim arise during such period.[31]

f. Purposes For Which Appropriations May Be Made. In making appropriations of public funds the legislature is bound by any restrictions placed by the state constitution upon the purposes for which appropriations may be made;[32] and, in general, appropriations should be made only for some public purpose.[33] In this connection, an appropriation for the payment of the debt of the state,[34] for the encouragement of patriotism,[35] in recognition of military,[36] or civil service,[37] for the benefit of destitute children of the state,[38] in the aid of expositions and fairs,[39]

g. Operation and Effect. Appropriation acts specify the purposes for which the appropriations made shall be used, and appropriations made for one purpose cannot be used for any other purpose.[43]

D. Warrants, Scrip, and Certificates of Indebtedness[44] — 1. Power and Duty to Issue. State warrants, scrip, or certificates of indebtedness may be issued when,[45] and only when,[46] authorized by law. The power and duty of state auditors and similar officers to draw or issue such instruments are largely determined by constitutional and statutory provisions.[47] A common provision is that no warrant shall be drawn on the treasury except in pursuance of a specific appropriation made by law.[48] Where an appropriation has been made for the payment of a claim, the auditor may draw his warrant therefor;[49] and unless, as is sometimes the case, a statute provides otherwise,[50] the fact that there is no money in the treasury to make payment does not impair the duty of the auditor to issue a warrant for a proper claim, although it will delay the obligation of the treasurer to pay it.[51] It has been held that the auditor has the right to question the validity of an appropriation act under which he is called upon to issue a warrant,[52] and that he may lawfully refuse to issue the warrant where such act is unconstitutional;[53] and under some of the statutes the issuance of warrants is not authorized or required unless the claims have been audited and allowed by the proper officers;[54]

but when a claim has been duly allowed and ordered to be paid, the officer is bound to draw his warrant therefor,[55] and he has authority to do so.[56] The auditor cannot issue warrants for claims not matured;[57] nor, where the statute forbids, in favor of defaulting state officers[58] or of persons indebted to the state;[59] and the auditor, in his discretion, may refuse to issue a warrant for a claim, although certified to by another officer, where the law does not make such certificates conclusive on the auditor.[60] Such certificates are, however, prima facie correct.[61]

2. Requisites and Validity. Where a warrant is required it must be in proper form;[62] and the omission of a material recital is fatal,[63] and a warrant issued by an unauthorized officer is invalid;[64] but mere clerical errors or omissions in a warrant do not invalidate it where it substantially complies with the law.[65] Where vouchers[66] or requisitions[67] are required as a basis for issuing warrants, these must be presented to the auditor and must be in proper form.

3. Revocation. A warrant on the state treasurer authorizing the payment of money in pursuance of an appropriation is not a contract, but is only a license, and is revocable so long as it has not been paid;[68] and a resolution of both houses of the legislature instructing the treasurer not to pay the warrant operates as a revocation.[69]

4. Negotiability and Transfer. A warrant drawn by the proper officer on the state treasurer is assignable so as to authorize the assignee to demand payment and bring suit thereon.[70] It is not, however, a negotiable instrument in the sense of the law merchant so as to shut out as against a bona fide purchaser inquiries as to its validity or preclude defenses or set-offs which could be asserted as against the original payee;[71] and the assignee acquires no greater rights than the party to whom the warrant was originally issued;[72] but he succeeds to all the rights of his assignor.[73]

5. Interest. State warrants bear interest when the statute so provides.[74]

6. Payment. It is the duty of the state treasurer to pay all warrants drawn on him in legal form by the proper officer, if there are funds in the treasury appropriated by law for the purpose specified in the warrant.[75] He may, however, lawfully question the legality of the warrant;[76] and if the warrant is drawn for too great an amount, a new warrant must be issued; the proper amount cannot be paid on the original warrant.[77] Payment must be made out of the fund,[78] and in the medium,[79] if any, provided or prescribed by law. Where the legislature has made an appropriation within its power to make to pay a claim, the disbursing officer must apply the money for the purpose of the appropriation, without inquiry into the reasons therefor.[80]

E. Bills of Credit or Other Securities Intended to Circulate as Money.[81] The federal constitution provides that "no state shall emit Bills of Credit."[82] Any bill, warrant, certificate of indebtedness, or similar instrument, issued by the state, on the faith of the state, and designed to circulate as money, is a bill of credit within the meaning of the prohibition;[83] but bills not issued on the general credit of the state but made payable out of a special fund pledged therefor are not bills of credit,[84] nor are state obligations not intended to circulate as money, such as auditor's warrants[85] or coupons for interest on state bonds.[86] The prohibition does not extend to bills issued by corporations incorporated by the state, although intended to circulate as money; such bills are not emitted by the state,[87] and it is immaterial that the state is the sole stock-holder of the corporation.[88] The constitutional provision does not prohibit a state from paying bills of credit[89] or making a loan thereof.[90]

statute are valid obligations of the state.[91] In the exercise of this power state bonds have been issued in aid of banks,[92] or railroads,[93] or public works and improvements.[94] But, as has been indicated, the power of the legislature is subject to constitutional limitations, and bonds issued under authority of an unconstitutional act are void;[95] and such limitation need not be express; where the constitution prescribes the subjects and occasions for and on which the legislature may issue bonds, the legislature may issue bonds only as prescribed,[96] and bonds not issued in accordance with the provisions of the statute authorizing them are void.[97] The legislature may authorize the issuance of bonds on which the state is to become liable only in a certain event, and the liability of the state will depend upon the happening of the prescribed condition.[98]

2. Form, Execution, and Validity. Where by constitution or statute state bonds are required to be executed in any particular form, bonds not so executed are void.[99] Where the state engages to give its bonds it must have them made by the proper officers at its own expense,[1] and in some states bonds are required to be registered.[2] Where a state authorizes an issue of bonds and all the preliminary conditions have been satisfied, the duty of the governor to issue the bonds is ministerial.[3] State bonds issued illegally may sometimes be made valid by subsequent legislation;[4] but a state officer cannot ratify an unauthorized, irregular, or fraudulent issue of state securities.[5]

A sale of state bonds or other securities by an agent is binding on the state only when made within the scope of the agent's authority,[6] a purchaser of state bonds from an agent selling under statutory authority being presumed to know the extent of the agent's authority, purchasing at his peril where such authority is not pursued.[7] Thus an agent authorized to sell for cash cannot bind the state by a sale on credit,[8] nor when authorized to sell at par can

4. Liability of State to Bondholders[11] — a. In General. A purchaser of state bonds issued under statutory authority is charged with knowledge of the provisions of the authorizing statute as well as of the terms of the bonds, and takes the bonds subject thereto;[12] and the state is not liable on bonds issued in non-conformity with the authorizing law,[13] or issued fraudulently,[14] although bonds fraudulently issued have in some circumstances been held valid in the hands of bona fide purchasers.[15]

b. For Interest. A state is liable for interest on its bonds where it has agreed to pay interest.[16] It is not, however, liable for interest on instalments of interest on default in payment thereof, in the absence of an agreement therefor;[17] nor, in the absence of statute or a valid contract, is it liable for interest on the principal after maturity.[18] But it is liable for such interest when so provided.[19]

5. Sinking Fund and Redemption. Provision is sometimes made by constitution or statute for the creation of sinking funds for the payment of principal or interest of state obligations,[20] which funds cannot, under constitutional provisions, be used otherwise than for the redemption of the obligations for the payment of which the funds were created.[21]

6. Funding, Reissue, and Exchange. In the absence of a constitutional prohibition, the legislature may provide for the funding of state obligations;[22] and provision for the funding, retirement, reissue, or exchange of state bonds is sometimes made by statutes which prescribe the terms and conditions of their operation.[23] But any legislative attempt to settle or compromise the bonded indebtedness of the state in violation of the state constitution is void.[24]

7. Payment. The time, place, and manner of paying state bonds or the interest thereon must be determined by the statutes under which the bonds are issued and by the terms of the instruments themselves.[25] Where the treasurer is prohibited from paying out funds in the treasury without a warrant, he cannot pay out such funds in exchange for coupons of state bonds without a warrant;[26] and if the treasurer pays an instalment of interest to the wrong person on a forged order, the state is liable to the real bondholder.[27] On the other hand one who collects from the state interest on coupons clipped from a bond which he knows to be void must make restitution to the state.[28]

VIII. Claims Against States.

A. Presentment and Allowance — 1. In General. The constitutions or statutes of many, if not most, of the states provide for the presentation to designated officers or boards of claims against the state for allowance or rejection, and prescribe the duties and powers of such officers or boards, the mode of presenting and passing upon such claims, and the course to be pursued upon their allowance or rejection. These provisions vary considerably in the several states. In general claims must be presented within the time and in the manner prescribed before they can be paid, if allowed, or before other steps can be taken for their

the legislature is of course bound by any limitations imposed by the state constitution;[32] but in the absence of such limitation, it may authorize the hearing and determination not only of claims constituting legal demands, but also of claims founded merely in right and justice, although they might not have been enforceable in the courts against individuals.[33] The statute may require the presentation of claims which arose before its passage,[34] but claims which are already certain and specific need not be audited.[35] A statute authorizing the presentation of a particular claim for the determination of its validity is not a concession of the state's liability thereon.[36] In any event, claims against the state cannot arise by implication, and he who demands money from the treasury must show that his claim is warranted by law.[37]

3. Audit and Allowance in General — a. In General. The auditing officers or boards in passing upon claims presented to them act to some extent in a judicial capacity and are invested with a certain measure of judicial discretion,[38] and thus the fact that the legislature has made an appropriation for the payment of specific claims is not conclusive on the auditing officers and they may nevertheless determine the legality and constitutionality of the appropriation.[39] But the decisions of the auditors in favor of claims are not judgments against the state,[40] and the state is not concluded thereby, but may sue to recover money erroneously paid under the award;[41] nor will their rejection of a claim bar an action by the claimant against the state to enforce the claim,[42] and in some states the statute specifically provides that a claimant whose claim has been rejected may bring a suit thereon against the state;[43] and it has been held that the allowance of a

In Idaho the state board of examiners is given power, under Const. art. 4, § 18, to examine all claims against the state, except salaries or compensation of officers fixed by law, and such power cannot be exercised by a district court in entering judgment against the state, and thereby control the action of the state board. certain officer or board the power to audit claims, the legislature cannot deprive such officer or board of such power and confer it upon another;[52] and so also where the legislature has by statute made it the duty of a certain officer to audit claims that duty cannot be devolved upon another by joint resolution.[53] In the absence of a constitutional prohibition, the legislature may take upon itself the adjustment and settlement of claims;[54] but in several states the constitutions provide that the legislature shall not itself audit or allow any private claims against the state.[55] It has been held that the office of auditor is one of personal trust and that its duties cannot be delegated to a deputy;[56] and where a board is required to approve a claim as a board, approval by a single member, even with the authority of the other members, is not sufficient, for such power cannot be delegated.[57] But a mere change in the personnel of a board after the approval of the claim and before the institution of proceedings to enforce payment does not make necessary a new approval by the board as changed.[58] The powers and duties of the auditing officers or boards are largely defined by statute. They are generally invested with adequate powers for the proper investigation of claims, such as power to require proof of claims, examine witnesses, and compel their attendance, and the like.[59]

4. Judicial Control and Review. When and in so far as the duties of the auditing officers are merely ministerial, their action may be reviewed and controlled by the courts,[60] which, however, will not compel the auditing officers to audit claims which they are not required by law to audit,[61] or which have been properly disallowed,[62] and in so far as the auditors' duties are judicial in their nature,[63] they cannot be compelled by the courts to allow a claim unless their refusal to do so has been a plain abuse of discretion.[64] In some states an appeal is allowed to the courts from the action of the auditing officers in disallowing a claim,[65] and the statutes sometimes authorize a rehearing or new trial before the auditing board,[66] and the claimant may sue the state on such claim where the state has consented to be sued;[67] but it is held that there is no appeal when not allowed by law,[68] and a finding of the auditing officers as to the amount of a claim will not ordinarily be disturbed where it appears that they acted in good faith and the amount is not clearly erroneous.[69]

B. Statute of Limitations. A claim against a state may be barred by lapse of time, as by the failure to file the claim within the prescribed period;[70] but the legislature may authorize the payment of a claim notwithstanding the lapse of time,[71] not, however, where the limitation is created by the constitution.[72] The presentation of a claim to the state board of claims is equivalent to the commencement of an action between individuals, and suspends the operation of the statute of limitations.[73] Where the statute of limitations is the only defense to a just claim, such defense should be established with reasonable certainty.[74]

In Idaho the remedy of a claimant whose demand against the state has been disallowed by the state board of examiners is, under Const. art. 5, § 10, providing that the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction to hear claims against the state, but that its decision shall be merely recommendatory, and that the same shall be reported to the next session of the legislature for its action. Bragaw v. Gooding, 14 Ida. 288, 94 Pac. 438.

Recognition by statute of a claim is not necessary to give the court of claims jurisdiction under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 264, giving the court of claims jurisdiction to hear and determine a private claim against the state which shall have accrued within two years before it is filed. Quayle v. State, 192 N. Y. 47, 84 N. E. 583.

When a claim against the state is allowed in part by the auditor, and the claimant accepts a warrant drawn for the part allowed, he thereby waives his right of appeal. Weston v. Falk, 66 Nebr. 198, 92 N. W. 204, 93 N. W. 131. And where a right of appeal is given to a claimant whose claim has been disallowed by the auditing officers, mandamus will not lie to compel the officer to issue a warrant for such claim, the remedy at law being adequate. Under Nebr. Const. art. 9, § 9, a creditor of the state is not required to file his claim for adjustment within two years after its accrual, where the law makes no provision for its payment, and his failure to do so will not bar an action against the state. C. Interest.[75] A state is not liable for interest in the absence of a statute or express contract providing for the payment thereof;[76] but the state is liable for interest wherever a statute so provides,[77] or if it has expressly contracted to pay it.[78] The time from which interest is chargeable against the state is determined by the general law of interest, and as a rule interest does not begin to run until a liquidated claim becomes due from the state,[79] and the running of interest will be stopped only by payment or its equivalent.[80]

D. Compromise and Adjustment. The state, through its legislature, has the same power as an individual debtor to adjust its liabilities with the consent of its creditors, although it cannot by its own act alone impair the obligation of its contracts;[81] and the legislatures sometimes provide for the compromise and adjustment of claims against the state,[82] or for the submission of such claims to arbitration;[83] and in such cases the general rules applicable between individuals apply.[84]

E. Payment.[85] The payment of claims against the state is sometimes specially regulated or provided for by law, and the payment of claims is of course subject to such restrictions as the law may impose;[86] and thus where a statute so provides, payment cannot be made to claimants indebted to the state, without deducting the amount of their indebtedness.[87] Claims not properly chargeable to the state do not become legal demands simply because audited and approved by the auditing officers, and the payment of such claims cannot be enforced,[88] and money wrongfully paid on an award by the auditing officers may be recovered back by the state.[89] Where a fund appropriated for the payment of an indefinite number of claims of the same kind to arise in the future proves insufficient to pay all the claims filed, such claims should be paid in full in the order of filing until the appropriation is exhausted.[90] A claimant's right to the payment of a just claim against the state is not defeated by the wrongful acts of the state officers in failing to discharge their duties in connection with such payment.[91]

IX. ACTIONS.

A. By State — 1. Capacity of State to Sue — a. In General. A state, as plaintiff, may sue in its own courts,[92] and this right, although sometimes expressly conferred by statute,[93] exists independently of statute as an incident of sovereignty;[94] and a state may sue in its own courts both in its sovereign capacity and by virtue of its corporate rights.[95] A state may also sue in the courts of another state,[96] or in the federal courts.[97]

b. To Recover Realty. Since the state, on account of its supposed legal ubiquity, cannot be disseized or dispossessed, it has been held that it cannot maintain a direct action of ejectment or trespass to try title,[98] and an action to recover land is therefore brought in the form of an information by the attorney-general on behalf of the state;[99] but the state may maintain ejectment where by statute disseizin is not essential to maintain that action.[1]

2. General Rules Governing Suits by States. As a general rule subject to certain exceptions in matters touching the sovereignty of the state,[2] when a state, as plaintiff, voluntarily comes into court and invokes its aid, she is bound by all the rules established for the administration of justice between individuals and the suit is governed by the same rules as private suits;[3] and an equitable action by the state opens the door to any defense or cross complaint germane to the matter in controversy that defendant may see fit to interpose;[4] but all claims and demands arising out of independent transactions are in effect suits against the state, and cannot, without its consent, be asserted;[5] and the general rule requiring plaintiff in an action for the cancellation of a contract to repay to the other party any sum received thereunder does not apply where the state is plaintiff, where its officers have no power to draw money for the purpose.[6]

3. Interest in Subject-Matter of Suit. A state, like any other party, cannot maintain a suit unless it appears that it has such an interest in the subject-matter thereof as to authorize the bringing of the suit by it.[7] In this connection, however, a distinction should be noted between actions by the people or by the state in a sovereign capacity, and suits founded on some pecuniary interest or proprietary right. In its sovereign capacity the state, by its proper law officers and by appropriate proceedings, may establish and enforce the execution of trusts by public corporations, prevent the misappropriation or misapplication of public funds or property, and the abuse of power by public officers, and in general protect the interests of the people at large in matters in which they cannot act for themselves;[8] and a suit by the state in its sovereign capacity, as the guardian of the rights of the people, may be maintained without any special injury to the state;[9] and where a state claims property as sovereign, its bare assertion of title and averment thereof in general terms is sufficient;[10] but suits by the state as an ordinary proprietor for the recovery or protection of money or property are governed by the ordinary rules applicable to suits between individuals, and cannot be maintained without proper averment and proof of title or ownership.[11]

4. Venue. Unless specially provided for by statute, the venue of suits brought by the state is governed by the general law relating to the venue of other suits.[12]

5. Parties. Ordinarily any suit in which the state is the real party in interest should be brought in the name of the state or of the people, and not in the name of a state officer or agent.[13] Sometimes suits should be brought in the name of the state upon the relation of the proper officer,[14] but no relator need be named where the suit immediately concerns the state.[15] The state may prescribe by statute the cases in which its officers or agents may sue in their own or their official names.[16] Sometimes the governor,[17] attorney-general,[18] or state treasurer[19] may sue in his official capacity on behalf of the state; and where suit on a contract is required to be brought by a party thereto, it has been held that a suit on a contract by a state officer for the state in his own name must be brought by the officer and not by the state;[20] but as a general rule it seems that, in the absence of express authority, state officers may sue in their own names only where they are clothed with a corporate or quasi-corporate character.[21] In matters of public concern, private individuals may sometimes use the name of the state in an action to obtain relief;[22] but private persons have no right to carry on litigation in the name of the state in regard to matters in which the state is not interested and which may be settled in ordinary suits.[23] The fact that a suit brought in the name of the state is brought or conducted by the attorney-general or other law officer is ordinarily sufficient to show that the suit is authorized by the state.[24] The state may be made a party plaintiff with individuals in a suit in which the state is interested.[25]

6. Pleading.[26] The pleadings in an action by the state are in general governed by the ordinary rules of pleading.[27] Thus the declaration or complaint must set forth such facts as constitute a cause of action or it will be demurrable;[28] and in an action in regard to property it must appear that the state has an interest therein;[29] but the corporate character of the state need not be alleged.[30] Sur-

plusage may be rejected.[31] A demurrer on the ground that the state is without legal capacity to sue will not lie unless such want of capacity appears affirmatively from the complaint.[32] A plea in abatement on the ground that an action in the name of the state is not brought by the state's attorney, as required by statute, should negative all the exceptions in the statute requiring such suits to be so brought.[33]

7. Defenses and Offsets — a. In General. As a rule defendant in a suit brought by the state may set up any defense directly touching the merits of the state's claim which he could have urged against a private individual.[34]

b. Statute of Limitations. The statute of limitations does not apply to actions brought by the state,[35] except when expressly so provided.[36] This rule applies to actions in which the state, although not a party to the record, is the real party in interest;[37] but not to cases in which the state is merely the nominal party and sues in the interest of some private person.[38]

c. Laches. The doctrine of laches does not apply to suits brought by the state in its governmental capacity.[39]

d. Recoupment, Set-Off, and Counter-Claim; Cross Action. As a part of his defense defendant may maintain against the state a cross bill or cross complaint, provided it relates only to the subject-matter of plaintiff's suit and does not pray for original and independent relief;[40] but he cannot maintain such cross action for independent affirmative relief;[41] nor can he, without clear statutory authority therefor, claim the benefit of a set-off or counter-claim against the state constituting an independent cause of action, for this would contravene the rule that a state cannot be sued without its consent,[42] although there is some authority states have also consented to be sued in their own courts. This consent may be expressed either in the state constitution,[55] or in an act,[56] or joint resolution,[57] of the legislature, and the legislature may authorize suits against the state independently of any constitutional authority,[58] unless prohibited by the constitution.[59] In some states the constitution authorizes or requires the legislature to direct by law in what courts and in what manner suits shall be brought against the state.[60] Such provisions are not self-executing, and no suit can be maintained against the state until the legislature has made provision therefor;[61] but where a statute gives a court jurisdiction to hear and determine claims against the state, a special act is not necessary to give the consent of the state to be sued.[62] The consent of the state to be sued must be given in express terms, or at least in terms so clear and unambiguous as necessarily to imply consent;[63] and it has been held that statutes authorizing suits against a state, being in derogation of its sovereignty, should be construed strictly,[64] although not so strictly as to exclude a case clearly coming within their terms,[65] for the construction should be such as to carry out the legislative intent.[66]

c. Operation and Effect of Consent. The consent of the state to be sued is entirely voluntary on its part, and it may therefore prescribe the cases in which and the terms and conditions upon which it may be sued, and how the suit

Wash. Const. art. 2, § 26, provides that "the legislature shall direct by law in what manner and in what courts suits may be brought against the state." By such provision it was intended that the state might be permitted to be sued in like manner as an individual, and it was left to the legislature to determine in what court such suit should be brought, and to prescribe the method of procedure. case it is the duty of the court to look carefully into the terms of the submission, and render judgment accordingly.[77] By consenting to be sued a state simply waives its immunity from suit. It does not thereby concede its liability to plaintiff, or create any cause of action in his favor, or extend its liability to any cause not previously recognized. It merely gives a remedy to enforce a preëxisting liability and submits itself to the jurisdiction of the court, subject to its right to interpose any lawful defense.[78]

d. Withdrawal or Modification of Consent. The consent of a state to be sued, being voluntary, may be withdrawn or modified by the state whenever it sees fit,[79] even though pending suits may be thereby defeated;[80] and upon the repeal of the statute authorizing the suit, the court in which the suit is pending can proceed no further therein.[81]

2. What Constitutes a Suit Against a State — a. In General. The question as to whether a particular suit is a suit against a state is not always to be determined by reference to the nominal parties to the record, and, although the contrary was once held,[82] the fact that the state is not named as a party defendant is not conclusive that the suit is not a suit against the state, and a suit in form against a state officer may be in fact a suit against the state, although the state is not a party to the record.[83] On the other hand, in an action against a state officer for trespass, a mere averment that his act was committed on behalf of the state does not make the suit one against the state.[84]

b. Suits Against State Officers — (i) Where the State Is the Real Party in Interest. Suits against officers of a state as representing the state in action and liability, and in which the state, although not a party to the record, is the real party against which relief is sought and in which a judgment for plaintiff, although nominally against defendant as an individual, could operate to control the action of the state or subject it to liability, are suits against the state.[85] A broad line of demarcation separates such suits, in which it is sought to compel the performance, by affirmative official action on the part of defendants, of an obligation which belongs to the state in its political capacity, from suits against defendants personally on account of wrongs done or threatened to the personal or property rights of plaintiffs without authority or under color of authority unconstitutional and void.[86] It seems that the rule which forbids a suit against state officers because in effect a suit against the state applies only where the interest of the state is through some contract or property right, and it is not enough that the state should have a mere interest in the vindication of its laws, or in their enforcement as affecting the public at large or the rights of individuals or corporations; it must be an interest of value in a material sense to the state as a distinct entity.[87] Thus a suit against the governor of a state, not by name but solely in his official character, is a suit against the state,[88] so also is a suit against state officers for the purpose of enforcing through them the performance of the contracts of the state,[89] or to compel them to do acts which would impose contractual liabilities upon the state; [90] and likewise a suit to enjoin the attorney-

threatens to act, is unconstitutional, the court will inquire into the validity of the statute, and if it is found that the statute is constitutional, and hence that defendant's acts are under lawful authority, the suit will be dismissed for want of equity or cause of action;[96] but if the statute is found to be unconstitutional, the relief prayed for will be granted.[97] A contempt proceeding against a state officer for violation of a mandate of a federal court under color of state law is not a suit against the state, where there was no valid state law authorizing defendant's act.[98]

(III) To Compel the Performance of Official Duty. A suit against a state officer to compel him by mandamus or similar process to perform duties of his office of a purely ministerial nature, involving the exercise of no discretion or political or governmental power, is not a suit against the state, and may be maintained without its consent.[99] But where the duties involve the exercise of official discretion or of political or governmental power, such a suit is a suit against the state and cannot be so maintained.[1] Moreover it seems that a state officer will never be compelled to perform acts forbidden by the law of his state, even though such law be unconstitutional.[2]

c. Suits Affecting Property in Which State Has Interest. The mere fact that the state has or claims an interest in the property which is the subject of a suit does not necessarily make the suit a suit against the state.[3] Thus an action against state officers to recover possession of real property which they hold on behalf of the state, and in which they claim no personal interest, is not a suit against the state;[4] but a judgment for plaintiff in such action will not conclude the state, where it has not become a party to the suit;[5] and a suit which affects the state's own title or right of possession, and in which no effective decree can

d. Suits Against Departments of Government of Public Corporations. A suit against a department of the state government or a board or corporation created by the state for governmental purposes is a suit against the state, and cannot be maintained without its consent;[7] but such suit may be maintained when authorized by statute, as where the statute creating the corporation provides that it may sue and be sued.[8] A suit against a corporation created by the state for certain public purposes not of a governmental character is not a suit against the state,[9] although the state may own the stock or property of such corporation;[10] and by engaging in business operations through a corporation the state divests itself so far of its sovereign character, and by implication consents to suits against the corporation.[11] A suit against state officers composing a board or commission endowed by statute with administrative powers may be maintained in some cases.[12] Thus a suit against a state railroad commission or board of transportation for relief against the enforcement of illegal rates or regulations prescribed by them or by a statute is not a suit against the state,[13] which has no pecuniary interest in the result of such a suit, the only parties so interested being the shippers and the carriers.[14] Such boards or commissioners may be enjoined from instituting suits in the name of the state to recover the statutory penalties for violations of the prescribed rates.[15]

3. Process. In a suit against a state, or to which a state is a party, process should be served upon the governor and attorney-general of the state,[16] and, in the absence of special statutory provisions, it seems that service upon either one of these officers alone is sufficient.[17] Where the state is not a party to the record, process should be served upon the officer defending in behalf of the state.[18]

4. Jurisdiction and Venue — a. In General. Where the statute authorizes suits against the state in a particular court or county, the suit must be brought in the court,[19] or county,[20] designated.

b. Federal Jurisdiction. The federal constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall extend "to Controversies between two or more States; (and) between a State and Citizens of another State," and that "in all Cases . . . in which a State shall be a Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction." [21] Under this provision a suit may be brought in the supreme court by the United States against a state,[22] or by one state against another;[23] and in an early case it was held that the federal judicial power extended also to a suit by a private citizen of one state against another state.[24] This decision gave great dissatisfaction and led to the adoption in 1798 of the eleventh amendment, which provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens and subjects of any foreign State." [25] By the force of this amendment no action can now be maintained in any federal court by a citizen of one state against another state without its consent, even though a federal question be involved;[26] and although the eleventh amendment does not in terms so declare, this same immunity from suits extends to suits against a state by one of its own citizens.[27]

5. Parties — a. In General. Whenever the state is interested in the subject-matter of a suit in equity, it should be made a party defendant, if, by virtue of the state's consent, this can be done;[28] and if, as in a suit against a state officer, the state is so interested as to be an indispensable party within the rules of equity pleading, and cannot be made a party because it has not consented to be sued, the suit must be dismissed.[29] But the fact that the state cannot be sued because it has not consented is a sufficient excuse for not making it a party where its interest is not such as to make it an indispensable party.[30] A state may be made a party defendant to a suit in equity for the purpose of enabling it to appear and protect its rights if it desires to do so, even though it could not, without its consent, be bound by the decree.[31] The objection that the state is not made a party when an indispensable party, being jurisdictional, may be interposed at any time,[32] and may be raised by the court of its own motion.[33] In a suit to which the state is not nominally a party, the jurisdiction of the court is not ousted by a mere suggestion that the state is the real party defendant, so as to prevent the court from examining into and determining the truth of the suggestion.[34]

b. Intervention by State. The state may intervene in an action against one of its officers or agents, in which it is interested;[35] and where the state so intervenes it thereby waives its immunity from suit and submits to the jurisdiction of the court;[36] but the state cannot intervene unless it has a property interest in the subject-matter of the suit; its general interest in the enforcement of its laws is not sufficient.[37]

6. DEFENSES — a. Limitations and Laches. A right of action against a state may be barred by the statute of limitations;[38] but the limitation does not begin to run until the passage of the statute giving the right to sue the state.[39] Moreover the state is not affected by the laches of its officers, and may interpose a defense, although it is not tendered within the time fixed by statute.[40]

b. Set-Off. A state being sued may set off a claim against plaintiff.[41]

7. JUDGMENT AND EXECUTION. Upon the failure of a state to appear in a suit against it in the supreme court of the United States, judgment by default may be entered against it.[42] But it seems that no such judgment could be entered in a state court;[43] and, as in ordinary cases, a judgment rendered against a state on a petition which fails to state a cause of action is a nullity, and is not aided by the assent of the attorney-general thereto.[44] Even where a state has consented to be sued, a judgment against it has moral force only; such consent does not authorize the enforcement of the judgment by judicial process;[45] and it seems that the legislature has no power to pass an act authorizing the courts to enforce a judgment against the state.[46] On the decision of the court in favor of plaintiff on a claim against the state, the proper course is for the clerk to transmit the proceedings and judgment to the governor to be communicated by him to the legislature,[47] and provision for the payment of the judgment must be made by the legislature.[48] In a suit in which the state is the real party in interest a judgment in its favor should be so rendered, and not in favor of the officers who were the nominal parties and who appeared in the state's behalf.[49]

C. Appearance and Representation by Attorney. A state can become a party to legal proceedings only through agents or representatives appointed by law,[50] and the appearance in its behalf of one having no authority so to appear is no appearance for the state.[51] Ordinarily the court will not pass upon the interests of the state unless it is duly represented;[52] but in the United States supreme court if a state duly served with process fails to appear, the cause may be heard and decided ex parte.[53] The question as to who may appear for the state is largely regulated by statute. Ordinarily the attorney-general is the proper person to appear in all suits in which the state is interested,[54] and he may appear in a suit brought in the name of the state on the relation of a private individual in which the state is only a nominal party.[55]

D. Appeal and Error.[56] The right of appeal is largely regulated by statute, but in general the state, when a party to a suit,[57] has the same right of appeal as any other party.[58] The appeal may be taken by the attorney-general,[59] or in some instances by the governor [60] or other officers.[61] But an officer who is neither a necessary nor a proper party to a suit in the name of the state cannot take an appeal therein.[62] Where the state is the only party defendant an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff should be in its name.[63]

E. Costs. Costs are not recoverable against the state in a suit in its own courts to which it is a party, whether as plaintiff [64] or defendant,[65] and whether

I. DEFINITION AND NATURE.

A. Definition — 1. STATUTES. It is usual to describe a statute as a written law, lex scripta, to distinguish it from the unwritten, or the common law, lex non scripta.[1] This description is to an extent unsatisfactory, since the common law is not necessarily unwritten, and in certain of the states has been declared by specific constitutional provision to include statutes.[2] And then too there are written laws, such as constitutions,[3] treatises, and municipal ordinances, which are not within the ordinary meaning of statutes. A statute may be defined as the written will of the legislature, rendered authentic by certain prescribed forms and solemnities, prescribing rules of action or civil conducts,[4] in respect to either persons or things, or both. The meaning of the term varies according to the connection in which it is used. For certain purposes an enactment to which a state gives the force of law, is a statute, although not originating in the legislature.[5] Under certain circumstances a municipal ordinance may be deemed to be a stat-

1. See COMMON LAW, 8 Cyc. 367.
Statutes, state and national, are equally the expressions in writing of the sovereign or legislative will, known in ancient and elementary law books, as leges scripta, or written laws, as distinguished from the leges non scripta, the unwritten or common law. The latter owe their binding force to the principles of justice as declared by the courts and to long usage and consent of the nation or people. The former, to the positive command or declaration of the supreme power. Dwarris St. (Potter ed.) 35.
2. See COMMON LAW, 8 Cyc. 373.
3. The organic law is the constitution of the United States and of the state, and is altogether written. Other written laws are denominated "statutes." Oreg. Annot. Codes & Sts. § 734.

ute,[6] although usually not included within the meaning of such term.[7] Under the civil law "statutes" is a term applied to all sorts of laws and regulations; to every provision of law which permits, ordains, or prohibits anything.[8]

2. Statutes of England. "Statutes of England," as used in a statute providing that none of such statutes shall be considered as laws of the state, mean acts of parliament,[9] enacted by the king, by the assent of the lords, spiritual and temporal, and of the commons and parliament assembled.[10]

3. Statute Law. "Statute law" is frequently used interchangeably with statute;[11] but the term is broader in its meaning, and includes not only statutes as already defined, but also the judicial interpretation and application of such statutes.[12]

B. Nature of Statutes. A statute is the written expression of the legislative will. It is the positive declaration of what the law shall be by that branch of the government possessing legislative functions, as distinguished from the executive and judicial functions of coördinate branches.[13] It either makes positive what is already recognized as law, modifies that law, or declares to be unlawful that which hitherto had been lawful.[14] When duly enacted it becomes controlling in respect to the matter to which it properly relates, and unless transcribing certain fixed constitutional limitations, its effect is absolute until again changed by like legislative authority.[15]

II. ENACTMENT, REQUISITES, AND VALIDITY IN GENERAL.

A. In General — 1. Source of Statute Law — a. In General. A statute ordinarily owes its existence to the act of that branch of government whose functions are legislative, as distinguished from the executive and judicial functions of the coördinate branches. The power to enact statutes is variously conferred by fundamental authority upon legislative bodies, or upon the sovereign himself in accordance with the form of government established in the particular jurisdiction.[16]

b. Federal Statutes. In the United States the constitution has vested the power of making laws in congress consisting of the senate and the house of representatives.[17] Other federal authorities may be clothed with the power of making rules and regulations with the force of statutes, or performing other duties more or less legislative in their character, but when so enacted they are not deemed statutory and are not within the scope of this article.[18]

c. State Statutes — (I) In General. In the several states legislative bodies are created by constitutional provision, bearing a similarity to that of congress, and having such legislative authority as may be conferred upon them by the constitution.[19]

(II) Initiative and Referendum. Unless the state constitution so provides, no legislative act is dependent for its validity on the assent of the people whom it affects.[20] In a number of the states, however, constitutional provisions have been adopted whereby the people have reserved the power to propose laws, and to enact or reject the same at the polls, independent of the legislative assembly.[21] This is what is known as legislation by the initiative. The federal constitution guarantees to every state a republican form of government,[22] and it has been insisted that direct legislation by the people does not conform to that provision. Cases decided in those states which have adopted the initiative sustain the validity of the system.[23] The referendum, when authorized by constitutional provision, may be applied to any law enacted by the legislature, under the restrictions imposed by the constitution. When ordered by the legislature or petitioned for by a certain percentage of the voters of the state, the measure to which it related does not become a law until approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon. Statutes thus enacted are valid,[24] and are not subject to the same criticism as legislation by the initiative.

21. The following states have adopted by constitutional amendment the initiative system of legislation, in one form or another: Illinois, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, South Dakota, and Utah. Constitutional amendments to this effect have been proposed and will be submitted to the people in Maine, Missouri, North Dakota, and Washington.

The initiative and referendum amendment does not abolish or destroy the republican form of government, or substitute another in its place. The representative character of the government still remains. The people have simply reserved to themselves a larger share of legislative power, but they have not overthrown the republican form of government or substituted another in its place. The government is still divided into legislative, executive, and judicial departments, the duties of which are discharged by representatives selected by the people. Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Oreg. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222.

24. See Constitutional Law, 8 Cyc. 840.

Where neither the form nor the manner of submitting the act are prescribed by the constitution, the court will declare the act invalid only when the question submitted is so framed as to be palpably evasive and misleading. d. Territorial Statutes. The territories of the United States are subject to the legislative authority of congress, and statutes in force therein are enacted either by congress itself, or by representative bodies upon which congress has conferred legislative authority.[25]

e. Transfer of Territory. Where territory is transferred from one jurisdiction to another, the statutes in force at that time remain so until changed by subsequent statutory enactment by the legislative body of the latter jurisdiction,[26] except so far as they may be in direct conflict with the constitution and laws thereof.[27] It is a well recognized principle of international law that the statutes of a ceded country remain in force until changed by the conquering or acquiring power.[28]

2. Existence and Status of Legislative Body[29] — a. In General. If legislative bodies are not created and established according to the constitution they may not rightfully exercise their powers.[30] Where the validity of the acts of a legislature has been acquiesced in by the people for a long time, and rights have vested pursuant thereto, the legality of such legislature will be presumed.[31]

31. Anderson v. Fisk, 36 Cal. 625, holding that under such circumstances only imperative rules of law will induce courts to hold that such legislature was without authority to legislate.

b. Competing Legislative Bodies. Where two competing bodies claim to be the legal legislature, that body which consists of the greater number of members duly certified by the proper officers as having been elected is the legal legislature and should be recognized.[32]

c. Effect of Unconstitutional Apportionment. A legislature whose members were elected under an unconstitutional apportionment is a de facto legislature, and its acts are valid.[33]

3. Powers and Duties of Legislative Body — a. In General. A legislative body, existing by virtue of a constitutional provision, will find its powers prescribed and its duties fixed by the terms of the constitution.[34] A state legislature has such powers as are not expressly, or by fair implication, prohibited by the state or federal constitutions,[35] while congress may only legislate in respect to those matters which are within the terms of the federal constitution.[36] The authority conferred is legislative, and the acts passed must fall within the scope thereof.[37] The fact that a power is broad and, to an extent, dangerous, is immaterial,[38] so long as it is legislative in its character. So far as matters of legislation are concerned one legislature cannot bind a succeeding legislature, except as to valid contracts entered into by it,[39] and as to rights which have actually vested under its acts.[40]

b. Special or Extra Sessions. Extra or special sessions of a legislative body are usually provided for in the constitution, to convene upon the call of the executive. The call is usually required to state the subjects to be legislated upon, in which case only such acts are valid as fall properly within the terms thereof.[41]

The call or proclamation should be reasonably construed so as to bring the act within its meaning if possible.[42] Where a general object is described, the legislature is free to determine in what manner such object shall be carried into effect.[43] In determining whether a given act is germane to the objects stated, the entire proclamation should be considered.[44] Under a provision requiring the subject for legislation to be presented to the legislature, such presentation must be in writing.[45] Where there is no constitutional restriction upon the authority of a legislative body in special session, it may enact any law at such session that it might at a regular session.[46] An additional proclamation, designating other subjects for consideration, may be issued;[47] and a proclamation by an executive may be revoked by him or by his successor, and having been revoked, the legislature is without authority to act.[48] Whether or not an extra session should be called is a question solely for the executive.[49]

tive body is sometimes clothed with powers not conferred upon the other.[51] Under the constitution of the United States,[52] and of many of the states, all bills for the raising of revenue must originate in the house of representatives, or the lower house as it is called.[53] Bills of revenue are those which draw money from the people to the state, without giving direct equivalent in return therefor.[54] They do not include bills permitting the taxation of real property mortgages as land [55] in the county where recorded;[56] bills seeking a local object for the accomplishment of which it is necessary to raise money by tax upon the locality affected;[57] bills permitting municipalities to impose license taxes for municipal purposes;[58] bills providing for the collection of fees by certain officers, out of which their salaries are to be paid,[59] or bills licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors.[60] The precise meaning of the clause "to raise revenue" is to levy a tax as a means of collecting revenue,[61] and should not be extended to include bills the incidental result of which may be to create revenue.[62] An appropriation bill is not a bill for raising revenue, although it may necessitate a levy of taxes.[63]

notice of the intention to apply therefor shall have been published as prescribed.[64] In the absence of a clause prohibiting the enactment of such legislation without notice the provision is directory and not mandatory.[65] Where it is provided that no such act shall be passed unless such a notice be given, the requirement is absolute.[66] Requirements as to the things necessary to be stated in a petition are held to be directory only.[67]

b. Necessity of Notice. In general, the question whether an act is a local or special one,[68] so as to require notice of intention to apply therefor, is a legislative and not a judicial one.[69] It has been held that notice of intention is not required in case of an act to transfer money from a state to a local fund;[70] of an act relating to a district court in a certain county, where the jurisdiction thereof is not limited to such county,[71] or to a jury commissioner in such a court;[72] of an act relating to cities having more than a certain population according to the last federal census;[73] or of an act providing for the erection of a court house at the joint expense of the state and a county.[74] An act repealing local acts relating to schools in a city is within the requirement,[75] and so is an act excepting certain cities from the provisions of an act permitting cities and towns to issue bonds for specified purposes.[76]

c. Sufficiency of Notice. It is usually sufficient to include in the notice the substance of the proposed law.[77] Proof of publication should be made by affidavit

d. Notice Required by Statute. Where notice is required by a statute only, it will not be binding upon subsequent legislatures,[80] and may be entirely disregarded by them.[81]

5. Mode of Enactment. A statute is valid, so far as its enactment is concerned, if all the mandatory requirements prescribed by the constitution regulating legislative proceedings have been complied with, even though provisions which are directory have not been observed.[82] Where the constitution provides that legislation on specified subjects shall be enacted by bill, the legislature cannot by joint resolution legislate in respect to such subjects.[83]

B. Introduction of Bills and Proceedings Before Passage — 1. Time For Introduction. Where the time for the introduction of new bills is limited to a certain number of days after the session of the legislature has commenced,[84]

Fitzpatrick, 143 Ala. 162, 39 So. 384 (holding notice to be sufficient, although it fails to refer to procedure contained in act providing for removal of causes from one local court to another in the same county); Law v. State, 142 Ala. 62, 38 So. 798; Stubbs v. Galveston, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 143.

Notice held insufficient see Larkin v. Simmons, 155 Ala. 273, 46 So. 451; Hudgins v. State, 145 Ala. 499, 39 So. 717; State v. Speake, 144 Ala. 509, 39 So. 224; Norwell v. State, 143 Ala. 561, 39 So. 357 (holding that a notice stating that an application would be made for the repeal of the act creating the Walker county law and equity court was insufficient where such act also contained provisions in addition to such repeal); Green v. State, 143 Ala. 2, 39 So. 362 (holding that insufficiency of notice in respect to one amendment will not affect sufficiency of such notice as to other amendments); Brame v. State, (Ala. 1905) 38 So. 1031; Elba v. Rhodes, 142 Ala. 689, 38 So. 807; Tillman v. Porter, 142 Ala. 372, 38 So. 647; Alford v. Hicks, 142 Ala. 355, 38 So. 752 (holding that where the act specified in the notice would be unconstitutional, the legislature cannot enact a constitutional law on the same subject); Hooton v. Mellon, 142 Ala. 245, 37 So. 937; Wallace v. Jefferson County Bd. of Revenue, 140 Ala. 491, 37 So. 321 (holding that it is not enough to state in the notice the title or subject of the act, which gives but a faint conception of its substance); Lancaster v. Gafford, 139 Ala. 372, 37 So. 108.

Signature unnecessary.— The published notice of intention to apply for the enactment of a local law need not be signed. Ex p. Kelly, 153 Ala. 668, 45 So. 290; Dudley v. Fitzpatrick, 143 Ala. 162, 39 So. 384.

78. Dudley v. Fitzpatrick, 143 Ala. 162, 39 So. 384, holding that the omission of the jurat of the affidavit of publication from the printed copy of the journal is immaterial.

Proof by affidavit that notice was published "regularly in four weekly issues" of a designated weekly newspaper is sufficient. Ex p. Black, 144 Ala. 1, 40 So. 133.

Proof of publication.— An affidavit of the publisher of a newspaper, which stated that the notice of the intention to apply for the passage of a local act, contained a copy of the bill proposed, and which was otherwise sufficient, sufficiently proved the giving of the notice of intention. Jacobs v. State, 144 Ala. 98, 40 So. 572. Pasting of notice as published, with typewritten copy of notice, on legislative journal constituted sufficient spreading of notice and proof of journal. Childers v. Shepherd, 142 Ala. 385, 39 So. 235.

As the Florida constitution does not specifically require that the journals show that notice has been given, the courts are precluded from inquiring into the question. Rushton v. State, (Fla. 1909) 50 So. 486.

83. Henderson v. Collier, etc., Lith. Co., 2 Colo. App. 251, 30 Pac. 40; May v. Rice, 91 Ind. 546 (holding that money cannot be appropriated by joint resolution); Boyers v. Crane, 1 W. Va. 176.

Joint resolution is a proper means for ordering the secretary of state to publish certain statutes previous to the general publication of all the statutes. State v. Bailey, 16 Ind. 46, 79 Am. Dec. 405.

The repeal of a law by a joint resolution of two houses of the general assembly, without such resolution having undergone the three several readings prescribed by the constitution, and having received the approval of the council of revision, is invalid. People v. Campbell, 8 Ill. 466.

The object of the constitution in providing the limitation cannot be evaded by ingrafting on the original bill foreign and disconnected amendments.[85] A substitute that is germane to the subject of the original bill is not a new bill within the meaning of this limitation;[86] and any amendment not departing from the general purposes of the bill,[87] and which is germane to the subject-matter, may be admitted at any time.[88]

2. Proceedings Before Passage — a. Reference to Committees. Legislative rules usually provide for the reference of bills upon introduction to the proper committee, and occasionally it is provided by constitution that such a reference be had and a report made thereon. Such a provision is sufficiently complied with where a bill is referred to and reported by a committee of one house and is passed by the other without reference.[89]

b. Printing Bills. A constitutional requirement that a bill be printed before it shall be considered or become a law does not necessitate printing the bill before it is read.[90]

c. Reading of Bills[91] — (I) Reasons For Requirement. The requirement that each bill have three separate readings, prescribed either by constitution or legislative rule, is one of the many restrictions imposed upon the passage of bills to prevent hasty and inconsiderate legislation, surprise, and fraud,[92] by that no new bill shall be introduced after the first fifty days of the session is to prevent hasty and improvident legislation, and to compel, so far as any previous law can accomplish that result, the careful examination of proposed laws, or at least the affording of opportunity for that purpose. Hale v. McGettigan, 114 Cal. 112, 45 Pac. 1049 (holding that a substitute bill may be introduced in place of several bills amending the whole or parts of an existing act); Atty.-Gen. v. Stryker, 141 Mich. 437, 104 N. W. 737; Toll v. Jerome, 101 Mich. 468, 59 N. W. 816; Caldwell v. Ward, 83 Mich. 13, 46 N. W. 1024; Atty.-Gen. v. Amos, 60 Mich. 372, 27 N. W. 571.

Substitute for amendment of city charter. —A bill amending certain sections of a city charter may be substituted for a bill amending other sections thereof, although the subject-matter of the sections amended by the two bills materially differed, since the title of the original bill was sufficient to indicate that an amendment of the charter was in contemplation. Detroit v. Schmid, 128 Mich. 379, 87 N. W. 383, 92 Am. St. Rep. 468.

Even though amendments are extensive, they will not render the act of the legislature invalid, if they indicated no purpose to isolate the constitution, or to exceed the proper limits of legislative discretion. Powell v. Jackson, 51 Mich. 129, 16 N. W. 369.

89. Day Land, etc., Co. v. State, 68 Tex. 526, 4 S. W. 865.

A bill is acted on by a committee when it is reported to the house without recommendation. Walker v. Montgomery, 139 Ala. 468, 36 So. 23.

A report by a different committee than the one to which the bill was referred is not a sufficient compliance with the constitutional provision. State v. Smith, (Ala. 1909) 50 So. 364.

Where reference is made to a joint conference committee consisting of members of both houses, the committee may report an amended bill germane to the subject-matter embraced in the original bill, notwithstanding a constitutional requirement that bills must originate in either house. Printing amendments.— Where it is provided that all substantial amendments shall be printed for the use of the members before a final vote is taken on the bill, such provision must be complied with, or the act is void (In re House Bill No. 250, 26 Colo. 234, 57 Pac. 49), although it is inapplicable to amendments recommended by a conference committee of the two houses (Pueblo County v. Strait, 36 Colo. 137, 85 Pac. 178), and will not prevent the correction of manifest errors in titles at any time before the final passage of the bills (State v. Cronin, 72 Nebr. 636, 642, 101 N. W. 325, 327).

The provision that no bill shall be passed unless it shall have been printed and on the desks of the members in its final form at least three legislative days before its final passage is complied with by placing the bill, as printed in the house in which it originated, with all amendments, on the desks of the members of both houses. (II) What Constitutes Reading. A substantial compliance with a constitutional requirement as to the reading of bills is sufficient.[94] To read by title is by universal parliamentary usage considered a reading of a bill,[95] unless it be required by the constitution that a bill be read at length.[96] The requirement that bills be read on different days in each house will not prevent the reading of a bill in one house on the day that it was passed by the other.[97] Unless expressly so stated the journal is not required to show that a bill was read at the times and in the manner prescribed by the constitution.[98]

(III) Enactment by Reference. Notwithstanding such a constitutional requirement, it is permissible to pass an act adopting a revised code,[99] incorporating a corporation by reference to its constitution and by-laws, without embodying them in the act,[1] or declaring valid and binding certain rules of the common law,[2] without reading the matter referred to and adopted.

(IV) SUSPENSION OF RULES. It is occasionally provided by the constitution that the rule as to reading bills may be suspended by a vote of the house in case of urgency; the house itself being the judge of what constitutes urgency.[3]

d. Amendment of Bills — (I) IN GENERAL. In the absence of a special constitutional requirement it is not essential that the journal of the house should show the adoption of amendments,[4] although it is the usual practice to note such fact. If the journals show that certain amendments were stricken out and the bill as approved contained such amendments it is invalid.[5]

(II) CONSTITUTIONAL REQUIREMENTS. A constitutional requirement that a bill shall not be so altered or amended, in the course of its enactment, as to change its original purpose, is not to be so construed as to prevent the introduction of matter extending the scope and operation of the bill, providing such matter is germane to the object sought to be accomplished.[6]

Although the provision be mandatory, it should not receive so rigid or narrow a construction as to embarrass or hamper the two houses in amending and perfecting their bills, and drive them to accomplish by a number of bills that which might be accomplished by amending a bill without adding foreign or incongruous matters, or perverting its original purpose. Cooley Const. Lim. 142.

Any alteration of the form of a bill, as by increasing or decreasing the number of sections (In re Amendments of Legislative Bills, 19 Colo. 356, 35 Pac. 917; Nelson v. Haywood County, 91 Tenn. 596, 20 S. W. 1), or changing its title to conform to its substance (State v. Doherty, 3 Ida. 384, 29 Pac. 855; State v. Field, 119 Mo. 593, 24 S. W. 752) does not affect its validity within the purview of the constitutional inhibition.

The striking out of the word "written" by amendment is not a material change and does not affect the validity of the act. State v. Semmes, (Ala. 1909) 50 So. 120.

A material change in the title of a bill after it has passed both houses of the legislature, and before its presentation to the governor for his approval or rejection, renders the act unconstitutional and void. Weis v. Ashley, 59 Nebr. 494, 81 N. W. 318, 80 Am. St. Rep. 704. Under the constitution of Nebraska the title is an essential part of the bill. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Smyth, 103 Fed. 376.

(III) READING OF AMENDMENTS. The constitutional requirement that bills be read in course of their passage [7] does not apply to amendments so as to compel bills to be read the required number of times in their amended forms.[8]

C. Passage of Bills — 1. IN GENERAL. Certain prerequisites to the final passage of bills are prescribed by constitutional provisions specially applicable to those embracing or relative to certain subjects or affecting local or special interests,[9] and a compliance therewith is essential to their validity.[10] The fact that persons not members were permitted to sit upon the floor of both houses and consult and advise with members of the legislature will not invalidate the legislation enacted.[11]

2. TIME OF PASSAGE.[12] A requirement as to the time when certain bills shall be passed is prescribed in some constitutions.[13]

3. VOTING UPON BILLS [14] — a. Mode of Voting. State constitutions usually provide that on the final passage of a bill the vote shall be by yeas and nays. This provision is imperative and must be strictly followed.[15] The limitation as to yeas Whether or not an amendment to a bill is a substantial one, effecting a change in its general purposes, is a judicial rather than a legislative question. In re House Bill No. 250, 26 Colo. 234, 57 Pac. 49.

It is not sufficient to merely enter the number voting in the affirmative or the and nays is sometimes restricted to bills of a specified character, in which case the question involved is whether or not a bill comes within the class.[16]

b. Number of Votes Required[17] — (i) In General. Unless restricted by constitutional provision,[18] when a quorum of a legislative body is present, the votes of a majority of the quorum will be sufficient to pass a bill.[19] It is frequently provided that bills of a specified character be passed by a greater vote than a majority, usually three fourths or two thirds.[20] number voting in the negative. Smithee v. Garth, 33 Ark. 17.

If there is no constitutional requirement as to the entry of a vote by yea and nay it is sufficient if it appear upon the record that the bill was passed by a majority vote. This practice, however, may be governed by the rules of the house. Lincoln v. Haugan, 45 Minn. 451, 48 N. W. 196.

Concurrence after final passage by one house, in amendments made by the other, does not require voting by yea and nay. State v. Corbett, 61 Ark. 226, 32 S. W. 686; Browning v. Powers, (Mo. 1897) 38 S. W. 943; New Hanover County v. Armour Packing Co., 135 N. C. 62, 47 S. E. 411; Callison v. Brake, 129 Fed. 196, 63 C. C. A. 354. In Tennessee a "bill of a general character" requires the calling of the ayes and nays on its final passage. A bill creating a private banking corporation is not such a bill. Ferguson v. Miners, etc., Bank, 3 Sneed 609. Nor is a bill changing two counties from one judicial circuit to another. State v. Algood, 87 Tenn. 163, 10 S. W. 310.

In Wisconsin, where a bill "imposes, continues or renews a tax, or creates a debt or charge, or makes, continues, or renews an appropriation" or "releases, discharges, or commutes a claim or demand of the state," the question must be taken by yeas and nays. Const. art. 8, § 8. A law creating a judicial district is not within this provision. In re Ryan, 80 Wis. 414, 50 N. W. 187; McDonald v. State, 80 Wis. 407, 50 N. W. 185.

17. As to number of votes required in act creating corporation see CORPORATIONS, 10 Cyc. 189.

18. In many of the states it is specially provided by constitution that a majority of all the members elected to either house shall be necessary for the passage of any bill. Such provision is mandatory, and a law is not valid unless the required number of votes be cast therefor. Kelley v. Secretary of State, 149 Mich. 343, 112 N. W. 978 (holding that the vote of the presiding officer, in case of a division, does not render the bill or joint resolution a law, under a constitutional provision restricting his right to vote to cases of division in committee of the whole); Ramsey County v. Heenan, 2 Minn. 330; State v. Davis, 66 Nebr. 333, 92 N. W. 740; Young v. Montgomery, etc., R. Co., 30 Fed. Cas. No. 18,166, 2 Woods 606.

A concurrent resolution comes within the meaning of a constitutional provision that a bill or joint resolution, to become a law, must receive the concurrence of a majority of all the members elected to each house. Kelley v. Secretary of State, 149 Mich. 343, 112 N. W. 978.

The emergency clause to a legislative act, to be effective under the constitution of Colorado, must be adopted by a vote of two thirds of all the members elected to each house. If not so adopted, it should be struck out before enrolment, even though the bill be otherwise constitutionally passed. In re Emergency Clause, 18 Colo. 291, 32 Pac. 647.

A reference in an act to another act, whereby the act referred to is applied to a specified condition, is not necessarily an attempt to reënact such act in violation of a provision requiring the votes of a majority of the members in favor of a bill. Temmick v. Owings, 70 Md. 246, 16 Atl. 719.

Where such a provision is made it means a vote of two thirds of all of the members of each house. State v. Gould, 31 Minn. 189, 17 N. W. 276. Contra, State v. Skeggs, 154 Ala. 249, 46 So. 268; Walker v. State, 12 S. C. 200; Morton v. Comptroller-Gen., 4 S. C. 430.

The question which arises under such a provision usually pertains to the character of the bill. Georgia Penitentiary Co. v. Nelms, 65 Ga. 499, 38 Am. Rep. 793 (holding that an act providing for the transfer of prisoners to the care of a certain corporation, without charge, was not a donation or gratuity within the meaning of the provision requiring bills of such a character to be passed by a two-thirds vote); Mills County v. Brown County, 87 Tex. 475, 29 S. W. 650 (holding that a two-thirds vote is not necessary to pass an act prescribing the manner of enforcing the liability of a new county for its proportionate part of the debt of a county out of which it was created, under a provision of the constitution requiring a two-thirds vote to pass an act creating a new county, etc.).

Final enactment intended.— A constitutional requirement of a two-thirds vote on legislation at a special session on subjects

(II) Acts Imposing a Tax. A constitutional regulation as to the number of votes required to pass a law imposing a tax means a state tax, and not a local tax.[21]

(III) Acts Appropriating Public Moneys — (A) In General. A requirement that the legislature shall not authorize the expenditure or disposition of state money, property, or credit without the concurrence of two thirds of the members of each house [22] does not apply to the release of a claim against the state;[23] nor does it apply to a law regulating the manner in which moneys shall be paid out of the state treasury.[24] Where there is an exception in favor of laws appropriating money for the state's necessary expenses, the legislature has the implied power of determining what is a necessary expense.[25]

(B) For Local or Private Purposes. The constitutional requirement of a two-thirds vote of the members of the legislative body in favor of a bill appropriating public money or property for a private or local purpose does not apply to a bill providing for the payment of services rendered in a public capacity.[26] Nor is a other than those designated in the proclamation contemplates such a vote on the final enactment of a law, and not during the process of enactment. State v. Skeggs, 154 Ala. 249, 46 So. 268.

Such a regulation is applicable to a law imposing a tax upon a collateral inheritance (Matter of Stickney, 110 N. Y. App. Div. 294, 97 N. Y. Suppl. 336 [affirmed in 185 N. Y. 107, 77 N. E. 993]. See In re Weeks, 185 N. Y. 541, 77 N. E. 1197 [affirming 109 N. Y. App. Div. 859, 96 N. Y. Suppl. 876], but not to one imposing a commutation tax on militiamen in lieu of services (People v. Chenango County, 8 N. Y. 317), nor to one compelling a municipality to compensate the owners of property for damages caused by a riot or mob (Darlington v. New York, 31 N. Y. 164, 28 How. Pr. 352, 88 Am. Dec. 248).

The fact that a law will doubtless lead to the necessity of taxation does not make it a law imposing a tax. Darlington v. New York, 31 N. Y. 164, 28 How. Pr. 352, 88 Am. Dec. 248; New York v. Gorman, 26 N. Y. App. Div. 191, 49 N. Y. Suppl. 1026.

22. The provision only applies to an appropriation of money or property. An act authorizing a corporation to use and occupy lands under water for the purpose of a bridge is not an appropriation of property. New York, etc., Bridge Co. v. Skelly, 90 Hun (N. Y.) 312, 35 N. Y. Suppl. 920 [affirmed in 148 N. Y. 540, 42 N. E. 1088]. An act regulating the distribution of money collected on account of the liquor traffic between the state and municipalities is not an appropriation of money. People v. Murray, 149 N. Y. 367, 44 N. E. 146, 32 L. R. A. 344. A law disposing of money collected by a tax before it is paid into the state treasury is not within this constitutional requirement. Alcorn v. Hamer, 38 Miss. 652; People v. Ronner, 185 N. Y. 285, 77 N. E. 1061; Seneca County v. Allen, 99 N. Y. 532, 2 N. E. 459; Darlington v. New York, 31 N. Y. 164, 28 How. Pr. 352, 88 Am. Dec. 248.

An act appointing a commission to adjust and settle by arbitration a liability on contracts between the state and a private person is not an act attempting to make an "appropriation of any money, or the creation of any debt," which under Ky. Const. art. 2, § 40, can only be passed by a majority vote of all the members of each house. Hewitt v. Craig, 86 Ky. 23, 5 S. W. 280, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 232.

23. State v. Mills, 52 Ala. 484.

Claims against state.— It is sometimes provided that certain claims against the state shall not be paid by appropriation except by a two-thirds vote. Fordyce v. Godman, 20 Ohio St. 1.

Support of state institution.— An act, the sole object of which is to provide for the support of a state institution, does not come within such a provision. State v. Oglevee, 36 Ohio St. 211.

Institution under state control.— Where it is provided that no appropriation shall be made to an educational institution not "under the absolute control of the State," unless by a vote of two thirds of all the members elected to each house, an act appropriating money to a medical college managed by a board of trustees who are not public officers, authorized to prescribe courses of study and to appoint instructors, is invalid without such vote, since the institution is not under the absolute control of the state. State v. Sowell, 143 Ala. 494, 39 So. 246.

24. People v. Beveridge, 38 Ill. 307.

An appropriation to pay the debt of the state is not an appropriation for a private bill for the release of lands which have escheated to the state within the meaning of the constitution a bill which requires a two-thirds vote.[27]

4. Transmission From One House to Other and Concurrence in Amendments — a. Transmission of Bill. Parliamentary practice requires the passage of a bill in its final form by both houses of a legislative body, and transmission from one house to the other of a bill and all its amendments should appear on the record. The bill as acted upon by both houses should be the same, but the omission of a word from the title by clerical error in its passage from one house to the other will not affect the validity of the act, if such error was of such a character as not to deceive or mislead any one.[28]

b. Concurrence in Amendment After Transmission. A bill is not duly enacted unless it is voted on affirmatively by both houses in its final form.[29] It follows purpose. People v. Densmore, 1 Thomps. & C. (N. Y.) 280.

The purpose is local when the money is to be expended in a particular locality, even though the public be remotely benefited thereby. People v. Allen, 42 N. Y. 378 [reversing 1 Lans. 248], holding that an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of a designated river is for a local purpose, requiring a two-thirds vote.

The appropriation must be of the money or property of the state. A bill authorizing the expenditure of money by a municipality is not within the restriction. People v. Havemeyer, 3 Hun (N. Y.) 97. So an act providing for the compensation of a sheriff of a county, with appropriate machinery to provide the means, does not appropriate public moneys, either state or local, for a local purpose, and does not therefore require a two-thirds vote. New York v. Gorman, 26 N. Y. App. Div. 191, 49 N. Y. Suppl. 1026. And a relief act making it the duty of a state auditor to determine the amount of tax due from a private corporation is not in any sense an appropriation of money from the public treasury requiring a two-thirds vote for its enactment. Tallassee Mfg. Co. v. Glenn, 50 Ala. 489. To bring a bill appropriating property rights within the requirement, it must appear that the rights disposed of are the property of the state. Sweet v. Syracuse, 129 N. Y. 316, 27 N. E. 1081, 29 N. E. 289, holding that a bill authorizing a city to take water not required by the state for canal purposes is not a bill appropriating public property for a local purpose, since the water not required for the canal did not belong to the state. The appropriation is not within the restriction if it be for a public purpose, as in the case of an appropriation of state lands for the construction of a state road. McRae v. State Land Office Com'rs, 89 Mich. 463, 50 N. W. 1091. If the state in carrying out a policy of justice appropriates, through its legislature, money to repair an injury inflicted either upon an individual or a locality, it is but a part of its legitimate functions and duties as a sovereign, and the purpose is public. Waterloo Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Shanahan, 128 N. Y. 345, 28 N. E. 358, 14 L. R. A. 481 (in which case it was held that an act appropriating money for dredging the channel of a river and of a mill-race owned by a private person, so as to remedy an injury caused by the taking of the water from such river and mill-race for canal purposes, was not a private or local bill); Morris v. People, 3 Den. (N. Y.) 381.

Municipal indebtedness.— An act authorizing municipal corporations to bond in aid of railroads does not appropriate public money and property within the meaning of the provision of the constitution requiring a two-thirds vote for its passage. In re Kingston Tax-payers, 40 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 444.

Jurisdiction of claim against state.— The requirement of a two-thirds vote does not apply to an act which confers on a named court jurisdiction to pass upon the claim of a purchaser of public land, whose title has failed by reason of an error of a state officer. Wheeler v. State, 190 N. Y. 406, 83 N. E. 54, 123 Am. St. Rep. 555.

27. Englishbe v. Helmuth, 3 N. Y. 294.

28. Walnut v. Wade, 103 U. S. 683, 26 L. ed. 526.

The fact that a mistake was made in the number of a bill in transmitting it from one house to the other will not vitiate it, it appearing that the bill was the same. Williams v. State, 6 Lea (Tenn.) 549.

Retention of title.— There is no rule of parliamentary law requiring that an act shall retain the same title through all its stages in both houses. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. People, 143 Ill. 434, 33 N. E. 173, 19 L. R. A. 119; Binz v. Weber, 81 Ill. 288; Larrison v. Peoria, etc., R. Immaterial clerical errors in the title made in one house will not invalidate the act, if not concurred in by the other. Plummer v. People, 74 Ill. 361.

Where a section of the Revised Statutes has two numbers and the reference to it in a bill passed by one house is to one number and the section is given the other number in the other house, a concurrence in the amendment is not essential. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. People, 143 Ill. 434, 33 N. E. 173, 19 L. R. A. 119.

that after amendments have been made in the house to which it was transmitted, they must be concurred in by the house in which it originated.[30] Where the house making the amendment votes by a constitutional majority to recede therefrom, the bill is duly passed,[31] although the better parliamentary practice would be to again place the bill upon its final passage.[32]

5. Journals — a. In General. It is required either by constitutional provision or by statute that legislative assemblies shall keep journals in which the records of the proceedings shall be entered. Wyoming.— State v. Swan, 7 Wyo. 166, 51 Pac. 209, 75 Am. St. Rep. 889, 40 L. R. A. 195.

See 44 Cent. Dig. tit. "Statutes," § 26.

A failure to concur in any amendment so made will invalidate the entire act. Prescott v. Illinois, etc., Canal, 19 Ill. 324.

The vote of concurrence must be that required on the final passage of the bill. Stephens v. Labette County, 79 Kan. 153, 98 Pac. 790; Norman v. Kentucky Bd. of Managers, etc., 93 Ky. 537, 20 S. W. 901, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 529, 18 L. R. A. 556. Concurrence by a majority is sufficient for the adoption of the amendments, the nature of which is not shown by the journals, under the provisions of Ala. Const. § 22, art. 4, permitting amendments to be concurred in by a majority vote, although the bill amended related to boundaries of counties, and which, under Ala. Const. § 2, art. 2, could not be passed except by a two-thirds vote. Jefferson County v. Crow, 141 Ala. 126, 37 So. 469; Jackson v. State, 131 Ala. 21, 31 So. 380.

An immaterial amendment need not in any way affect the substance where a reference to "Thompson & Steger's Code" was struck out and the "Revised Code of Tennessee" inserted in its place, both being the same book, it was held that there was not any substance and amendments requiring concurrence. Gaines v. Horrigan, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 608.

An omission of an emergency clause not concurred in by the house in which the bill originated is fatal. People v. Knopf, 198 Ill. 340, 64 N. E. 842, 1127.

Where a bill as approved contained important clauses which the journal shows were stricken out by amendment in one house, it is invalid. State v. Wendler, 94 Wis. 369, 68 N. W. 759.

31. Robertson v. People, 20 Colo. 279, 38 Pac. 326; People v. De Wolf, 62 Ill. 253 (holding that where the vote upon the motion to recede was less than a constitutional majority, the bill never became a law); In re Howard County, 15 Kan. 194 (in which case the court based its opinion upon the fact that the receding from amendments by a sufficient vote of the members of the house in which such amendments were added had always been considered a sufficient compliance with the constitutional provision requiring a vote to be taken and entered upon the final passage of a bill); People v. Chenango, 8 N. Y. 317 (holding that the constitutional requirement as to yeas and nays is complied with when a bill has been passed by such a vote in both houses and subsequent amendments have been passed in the same manner, which upon being disagreed to by one of the houses, was receded from by a vote without calling the yeas and nays).

If, after receding from the amendment, the bill is enrolled and signed by the governor, with the amendment still remaining in the bill, it is not valid. Smithee v. Campbell, 41 Ark. 471.

Where a conference committee makes a report recommending the recession by one house from certain specific amendments, the report must be adopted by the house in which the amendments were made and also by the house to which the bill had been transmitted with the amendments included. Jefferson County v. Crow, 141 Ala. 126, 37 So. 469.

The adoption by one house of a report of a conference committee recommending that the other house recede from certain specific amendments is not evidence of a concurrence in other proposed amendments not embraced within the committee's report. Jefferson County v. Crow, 141 Ala. 126, 37 So. 469, in which case the court stated that any implication, from the adoption by one house of the report of a conference committee, that it was intended thereby to concur in amendments proposed by the other house, must be a necessary implication and not an inconclusive one.

32. In re Howard County, 15 Kan. 194.

33. A constitutional requirement that each house of a legislature keep a journal of its proceedings means that the journal should show all the proceedings in each house and all of the steps taken in the passage of every bill. Montgomery Beer Bottling Works v. Gaston, 126 Ala. 425, 28 So. 497, 85 Am. St. Rep. 42, 51 L. R. A. 396; Cohn v. Kingsley, 5 Ida. 416, 49 Pac. 985, 38 L. R. A. 74.

The term "entered upon the journal," as applied to a provision relative to a proposed constitutional amendment, means that the amendment shall be spread at length on the journal, and the yeas and nays set out therein in full or at length. Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Cal. 479, 493, 11 Pac. 3 (where the court said: "The words 'entered in'

b. Compliance With Constitutional Requirements. In the passage of a bill by either house the journal thereof must show affirmatively that all the constitutional requirements were complied with by it;[34] but such compliance will be presumed, notwithstanding the failure of the journal to show such compliance, where it otherwise appears that the legislature has expressed its will in accordance with the constitution.[35] If it appears from the journal that a bill had not been actually Whatever meaning we may attribute to the word 'enter' or 'entry' taken by itself, in arriving at its meaning here we cannot dissociate it from the words used with it. We must arrive at the meaning of the word 'entered' when connected with the words joined with it, that is, the context"); Koehler v. Hill, 60 Iowa 543, 556, 14 N. W. 738, 15 N. W. 609 (where the court said: "It may be suggested that to enter or entering on the journal does not necessarily mean spreading the same at length thereon. This will be conceded, but that it may so mean must also, we think, be conceded. See Webster's Dictionary. Various instances where the words 'to enter' or 'entered' occur in statutes and Constitution may, no doubt, be cited, where they do not mean spread at length. But this is not of much significance — for the object to be attained must be considered in determining the meaning of the word entered, as used in the Constitution. The evident intent of the Constitution is that the proposed amendment should be entered at length on the journal, or, at least, so entered as to leave no reasonable doubt as to its provisions"). And see Thomason v. Ruggles, 69 Cal. 465, 11 Pac. 20.

Entries in the journal are sometimes made after the adjournment of the legislature under provisions made therefor either by the rules or by statute; but after the journal has been delivered to the secretary of state for filing in his office, the clerk cannot direct entries to be made, since his official connection with the journal has terminated. If it is provided that where a return of a bill is prevented by the adjournment of the legislature the governor shall file his objections with the secretary of state within a certain prescribed time, the bill will become a law without the governor's approval if he fails to file such objections within the required time. Stalcup v. Dickson, 136 Ind. 9, 35 N. E. 987.

Where a constitution provides that "if any bill shall not be returned by the governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the general assembly shall, by their adjournment, prevent its return," it was held that the adjournment contemplated is such that it deprives the executive of the ability to communicate with the house in which a bill shall have originated, during the period within which the executive is required to return the bill. An adjournment directed by the governor acting under the power given to him by the constitution to adjourn the legislature in case of a disagreement between the houses as to the time of adjournment, is sufficient to prevent the return of the bill. The signature of the governor to an act of the legislature is conclusive evidence of the executive approval against everyone but himself. He alone should be permitted to dispute it, and only then, while he holds control of the act, and before he shall have deposited the same in the archives of the state. Weeks v. Smith, 81 Me. 538, 81 Atl. 325.

Signature by mistake.— An act was signed by the governor by mistake, and a message was delivered to the house of representatives by his private secretary announcing his approval. This was done, not by the special direction of the governor, but according to usual routine of business, because the secretary had found it on the governor's table with his signature attached. Upon the governor's request the message of approval was sent back, and the governor's signature was erased. The bill had never been out of his possession. It was held that the act never became a law. People v. Hatch, 19 Ill. 283. But see Powell v. Hayes, 83 Ark. 448, 104 S. W. 177, in which case, the governor being ill and absent, the president of the senate became acting governor. The acting governor signed a bill just before his successor bill leaves his possession, he cannot regain control, erase his signature, and return the bill vetoed,[50] unless the bill was illegally passed and was wrongfully transmitted to him.[51]

4. Exercise of Veto Power — a. Authority to Veto. The authority of an executive to set aside an enactment of the legislative department is not an inherent power, and can be exercised only when sanctioned by a constitutional provision.[52]

b. Disapproval and Return of Bill — (I) In General. When the governor returns a bill to the legislature without his approval, he is generally required to state his reasons for not approving the same.[53]

(II) Portion of Bill. The question as to the right of the governor to veto a portion of a bill relates exclusively to the veto of items in appropriation acts.[54] was elected president of the senate, thereby becoming acting governor. The bill never left the governor's office, and the successor erased the signature of the former acting governor and sent the bill with a veto message to the secretary of state as required by law. The court held that the bill became a law when signed and that the erasure of the signature and subsequent veto were unauthorized. In Gardner v. Barney, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 499, 18 L. ed. 890, and Seven Hickory v. Ellery, 103 U. S. 423, 26 L. ed. 435, statements are found to the effect that a bill becomes a law when signed; and that everything done thereafter is with a view to preserving the evidence of its passage and approval. But in neither of these cases did it appear that the executive retained possession and control of the bill.

50. People v. McCullough, 210 Ill. 488, 71 N. E. 602.

After the governor approves and signs a bill, and deposits the same with the secretary of state, it has passed beyond his control. Its status has then become fixed and unalterable so far as he is concerned. State v. Whisner, 35 Kan. 271, 10 Pac. 852.

52. State v. Kline, 50 Oreg. 426, 93 Pac. 237.

All legislative acts required to be transmitted to the executive for his consideration (see supra, II, D, 1) may be vetoed by the executive, if within his constitutional authority (People v. Buffalo, 20 N. Y. Suppl. 51), notwithstanding a constitutional provision commanding the legislature to pass the bill (In re Veto Power, 9 Colo. 642, 21 Pac. 477).

The provision of the initiative and referendum amendment to the constitution that the veto power of the governor shall not extend to measures referred to the people is limited to measures which the legislature may refer, and does not apply to acts on which the referendum may be invoked by petition; the amendment authorizing such petition within ninety days after adjournment of the legislature, and the constitution requiring the governor to exercise his veto power, if at all, not later than five days after the adjournment. Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Oreg. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222.

It is immaterial that at the time the bill was returned, the governor was out of the state, he having stated his objections before his departure, and delivered them to his secretary for return to the house in which the bill originated. In re Opinion of Justices, 135 Mass. 594. Nor is it material that the objection stated by the executive is based upon a defect in the bill which does not in fact exist. Birdsall v. Carrick, 3 Nev. 154.

A return to be effectual must be such as places the bill beyond the executive control and in the possession, actual or potential, of the proper house (Harpending v. Haight, 39 Cal. 189, 2 Am. Rep. 432), or of the secretary of state, in case the legislature has adjourned (State v. Junkin, 79 Nebr. 532, 113 N. W. 256). A bill may be returned to a house which is in session, although no action may be taken thereon because of a lack of a quorum. Corwin v. Comptroller-Gen., 6 S. C. 390. A return by laying the bill upon the table of the presiding officer (In re Opinion of Justices, 45 N. H. 607), or by delivery to some officer or other suitable person connected with the house, where the house has adjourned for the day on the last day allowed for retention by the governor (Harpending v. Haight, 39 Cal. 189, 2 Am. Rep. 432. Contra, State v. Wheeler, (Ind. 1909) 89 N. E. 1) would be sufficient.

54. Porter v. Hughes, 4 Ariz. 1, 32 Pac. 165.

Where the governor is given the authority to veto a part of an appropriation bill he cannot exercise the power in relation to the provision contained therein which does not relate to the appropriation of money. Porter v. Hughes, 4 Ariz. 1, 32 Pac. 165 (in which case it was held, under the organic act of the territory of Arizona, providing that the governor might disapprove a bill and return it to the house in which it originated, together with his objections, that he could not veto a single item of an appropriation bill and permit the remainder of the bill to stand approved); State v. Holder, 76 Miss. 158, 23 So. 643.

If authority be given to veto any item in an appropriation bill the veto of such item only affects that part, and the remainder is approved. Com. v. Barnett, 199 Pa. St. 161, 48 Atl. 976, 55 L. R. A. 882 (in which case under a constitutional provision granting to the governor "power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill mak-

(III) Failure to Approve or Return. A failure to approve or return a bill within a prescribed time usually results in the bill becoming a law without executive action,[55] regardless of any contrary provisions in the bill itself.[56]

c. Passage Over Veto. After the return of a bill or resolution vetoed by the governor, it is usually provided that the same may become a law notwithstanding such veto, if it receives the votes of two thirds of the members of each house.[57]

E. Authentication, Enrolment, Filing, and Publication — 1. Signatures of Legislative Officers — a. Necessity. The effect of the failure of the proper officers to certify over their signatures as to the final passage of a bill as required by constitutional provision is not clearly determined by the authorities.[58] In some states, where the evident purpose of the signatures is to indicate to the governor that the bill has been constitutionally passed, it has been held that the failure to affix the signatures will not invalidate the act;[59] while in other ing appropriations of money, embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items of appropriation disapproved shall be void" (Pa. Const. art. 4, § 16), it was held that an appropriation of a lump sum for school purposes, in a general appropriation bill, may be vetoed in part); Pickle v. McCall, 86 Tex. 212, 24 S. W. 265.

55. Harpending v. Haight, 39 Cal. 189, 2 Am. Rep. 432; McNeil v. Com., 12 Bush (Ky.) 727.

Legislative declaration.— Where a legislature, on ascertaining by a committee that an act had been neither approved nor vetoed by the governor, nor by him transmitted to the secretary of state, declared the act to have become a law, and ordered that it be transmitted to the secretary of state, it is the duty of the court to treat the act as a law. Danielly v. Cabaniss, 52 Ga. 211.

56. Atlantic Coast Line Co. v. Mallard, 53 Fla. 515, 43 So. 755; Evers v. Hudson, 36 Mont. 135, 92 Pac. 462.

57. Smith v. Jennings, 67 S. C. 324, 45 S. E. 821; Brown v. Nash, 1 Wyo. 85.

"Two-thirds" vote.— Where the constitutional provision is to the effect that a bill may be passed over a veto by a vote of "two thirds of that house," it has been construed to mean two thirds of the members present at the time of the reconsideration of the bill or resolution. Smith v. Jennings, 67 S. C. 324, 45 S. E. 821. Two thirds of that house means two thirds of a quorum, that is, two thirds of a majority of all the members elected to the house. State v. McBride, 4 Mo. 303, 29 Am. Dec. 636. See also Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. C. 200, 285; Bliss v. Comptroller-Gen., 4 S. C. 462. Two thirds of the members present voting in favor of the bill after a veto is sufficient. The fact that the bill received two thirds of the votes recorded is not sufficient. Brown v. Nash, 1 Wyo. 85.

The fact that the vote required to pass a bill in the first instance is greater than that required to pass a bill over the governor's veto does not dispense with the necessity of a repassage of a bill upon its return disapproved. State v. Crounse, 36 Nebr. 835, 55 N. W. 246, 20 L. R. A. 265, in which case it was held that the governor being a part of the law-making power of the state, each bill before it becomes a law, even if constitutionally passed by two-thirds majority of each house, must be approved by him, passed over his veto, or remain in his hands more than five days, Sundays excepted.

58. In the absence of a constitutional or statutory requirement, the failure of the proper presiding officer to attach his signature will not affect the validity of the act, even though the rules of the house may require it. Simon v. State, 86 Ark. 527, 111 S. W. 991; Speer v. Allegheny, etc., Plank Road Co., 22 Pa. St. 376.

Unless expressly provided for, a bill passed over the governor's veto need not be again signed by the presiding officers of both houses. State v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 21 N. E. 274, 4 L. R. A. 65; Evansville v. State, 118 Ind. 426, 21 N. E. 267, 4 L. R. A. 93. Contra, State v. Howell, 26 Nev. 93, 64 Pac. 466.

Concurrent resolutions are usually required to be signed by the presiding officers of both houses as in the case of bills. In re Election of Executive Officers, 31 Nebr. 262, 47 N. W. 923, holding that a concurrent resolution determining a contest election of executive officers must be signed by the de facto presiding officer of the senate, although he is one of the officers whose election is contested.

Kansas.—Aikman v. Edwards, 55 Kan. 751, 42 Pac. 366, 30 L. R. A. 149 (holding that a failure of the presiding officers of the respective houses of the legislature to sign a bill within two days after its passage did not impair its validity, when approved by the governor); Leavenworth County v. Higginbotham, 17 Kan. 62.

Missouri.— Douglas v. State Bank, 1 Mo. 24.

Nebraska.— Taylor v. Wilson, 17 Nebr. 88, 22 N. W. 119; Cottrell v. State, 9 Nebr. 125, 1 N. W. 1008, in which case it appeared that the bill was enrolled and properly signed by all the required officers of both houses, except the president of the senate; and it was held that there was sufficient evidence states, where the signatures are required for purposes of authentication and identification, such a failure is regarded as fatal, upon the ground that the constitutional provision as to signatures is mandatory.[60]

b. Who May Sign. A temporary speaker,[61] and an assistant secretary,[62] have been held to be authorized to sign and certify to the passage of bills, under provisions requiring signature by a presiding officer or a secretary of state.

c. Manner of Signing. A constitutional provision that the presiding officer shall sign bills in the presence of the house and that the fact of signing shall be duly entered in the journals is sufficiently complied with when it appears that the bills were so signed, although it appears that the entries in the journal were not technically correct.[63]

2. Authentication and Filing. A statutory requirement that a bill be authenticated either by a proper entry upon the journal,[64] or by certificates executed by the presiding officers of both houses,[65] is binding upon the legislature, and a failure to comply therewith will affect the validity of the act.[66] The filing of the

before the governor to authorize the assumption that the bill had been constitutionally passed. In State v. Mickey, 73 Nebr. 281, 102 N. W. 679, the court refused to extend the principle laid down in the above cases to a bill which was not authenticated by the presiding officer of either house.

Where there is an entire disregard of the constitutional requirement of authentication by the presiding officers of both houses, and a failure to file in the office of the secretary of state and a subsequent publication by him the bill will not become a law. 62. State v. Glenn, 18 Nev. 34, 1 Pac. 186, holding that the requirement that bills shall be signed by the secretary of the senate is sufficiently complied with by a signature of the assistant secretary.

63. State v. Mead, 71 Mo. 266 (in which case it was held that a failure to enter in the journal the fact of the signature of the presiding officer did not invalidate the bill, although the constitution provided that the fact of the signature should be noted on the journal); Younger v. Hehn, 12 Wyo. 289, 75 Pac. 443, 109 Am. 66. The certificate required under the New York statute, Legislative Law (Laws (1892), c. 682), § 40, stating the date of passage, and the number of members present and voting for the bill, is defective which merely states that a majority of the members voted therefor without mentioning whether the required number were present. law in the office of the secretary of state, after its due passage and approval by the governor, is an essential step, made so either by statute [67] or by constitution.[68]

3. Publication — a. In General. Legislative acts must be published or promulgated, as required either by express constitutional provision or by statute.[69]

b. Method of Publication. Publication is not confined to mere printing; [70] but in its ordinary and usual acceptation includes publication in newspapers,

If the fact of the final passage of a bill appears from the journal, the failure of the clerk of the house to certify to its passage before the termination of his official functions does not affect its validity. Houston, etc, R. Co. v. Odum, 53 Tex. 343.

In the absence of proper authentication the governor may refuse to consider a bill. Hamilton v. State, 61 Md. 14, in which case the court held that the governor was justified in refusing to consider a bill not having attached thereto the great seal of the state as required in the constitution. E. 807 (holding that a bill, the passage of which had not been entered on the journal, which had not been signed by either presiding officer, or enrolled or filed in the office of the secretary of state, did not become a law, because of the absence of an authentic record of its due passage); Burke v. Cincinnati, 10 Ohio S. & C. c. Time of Publication. A provision in a statute that it be published for a specified time is directory.[73]

d. Effect of Failure to Publish. Where it is made the duty of an officer to cause an act to be published, his neglect thereof cannot defeat the taking effect of the act.[74]

e. Errors in Publication. Mere verbal omissions or defects in the published act will not defeat its operation.[75] In those states where the enrolled act is not conclusive and evidence is admissible to show, by the journals, whether such act was in fact passed,[76] if there is a material variance between the bill as passed and the act as enrolled the act is a nullity.[77]

Discrepancies in the printed act which are not material,[79] or which tend to give sensible meaning to verbiage contained in the enrolled bill,[80] do not affect the validity of the act.

4. Variance Between Enrolled Bill and Journal. A variance between the enrolled bill and the journal may be fatal.[81] In some jurisdictions, however, it is held to be the duty of the court to sustain the validity of the enrolled act, where the act is plain and unambiguous, and the journals are silent and ambiguous.[82]

F. Form and Requisites — 1. In General. A law must be complete in all its terms when it leaves the legislature.[83]

2. Appropriation Acts. Special provision is sometimes made by constitution that appropriation acts shall contain no provisions not relating to appropriations contained therein.[84]

3. Enacting Clause. The enacting clause is usually a constitutional requirement. Its form varies in the several states, but the general rule is that when required its omission is fatal.[85] A failure to use the words prescribed by the

4. Language Employed — a. In General. Unless expressly required by constitutional provision, the legislature is not restricted in the form of the expression of its will.[87]

b. Imperfections and Defects. The imperfection of a law will not render it void, unless it is so imperfect as to render it impossible of execution.[88] So the failure of an act to provide all the details required for its enforcement does not necessarily render it void.[89]

c. Reënactment by Reference. Independent of such a constitutional restriction it is probable that a reënactment of a former law by mere reference to it, without the required formalities, and without publication, would be ineffectual.[97]

d. Effect of Codification. The incorporation of an act into a code and its subsequent reënactment cures defects which may have existed in the original act by reason of failure to comply with formal requisites.[98]

G. Validity[99] — 1. Determination of by Courts[1] — a. Grounds For Jurisdiction.[2] In cases where the question is presented and is necessarily involved,[3] it is the power and duty of the courts to declare invalid acts of the legislature which are in undoubted conflict with constitutional provisions.[4] However, a violation of constitutional restraints and prohibitions is the only permissible ground for calling upon the courts to determine the validity of a statute,[5] and the unwisdom, impracticableness, unreasonableness, or injustice of the enactment furnishes no ground for interposition.[6]

b. Scope of Inquiry — (i) Steps Prior to Enrolment. In regard to the question as to how far the courts must treat an enrolled bill, properly authenticated, approved, and deposited with the secretary of state, as conclusive of the regularity and validity of its passage, the rule obtaining in a majority of the jurisdictions where the question has been decided is that such a bill is conclusively presumed to have been regularly enacted, and that the courts have no power to go behind

d. Rules Applicable — (I) IN GENERAL. The validity of a statute is to be determined by the application of its language to the subject to which it relates.[18] Although its general effect and consequence are to be considered,[19] the fact that it is or may be unjustly administered is not.[20]

(II) PRESUMPTION[21] IN FAVOR OF VALIDITY. The same presumption which attaches in favor of the constitutionality of a statute as regards its subject-matter[22] is indulged with reference to its form and enactment. 19. Scranton City v. Ansley, 34 Pa. Super. Ct. 133.

The effect in a particular case is not controlling, but the thing to be considered is the general purpose of the statute and its sufficiency to effect that purpose. Rochester v. West, 164 N. Y. 510, 58 N. E. 673, 79 Am. St. Rep. 659, 52 L. R. A. 548.

The knowledge or ignorance of the parties who may be affected by its operation is not material. Oakland v. Carpentier, 21 Cal. 642.

20. McGovern v. Hope, 63 N. J. L. 76, 42 Atl. 830; People v. City Prison, 144 N. Y. 529, 39 N. E. 686, 27 L. R. A. 718.

Extreme cases.— The validity of a law is not to be tested by the fact that its application to extreme cases, involving the assumption of gross misconduct of public officers, would result in great injustice. Rode v. Siebe, 119 Cal. 518, 51 Pac. 869, 39 L. R. A. 342.

In no event is the validity of the statute to be determined by what has been done under it in any particular instance, but by what may be done under it. Rochester v. West, 164 N. Y. 510, 58 N. E. 673, 76 Am. St. Rep. 659, 53 L. R. A. 548; Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289; Minneapolis Brewing Co. v. McGillivray, 104 Fed. 258. And see Gilman v. Tucker, 128 N. Y. 190, 28 N. E. 1040, 26 Am. St. Rep. 464, 13 L. R. A. 304.

e. Effect of Decision. A decision in favor of the validity of a statute conclusively settles the question.[24]

2. Recognition of Invalid Act. The legislature by repeatedly recognizing a law invalid for failure to comply with certain constitutional requirements as to form and procedure may effectually ratify it and make it valid.[25]

See 44 Cent. Dig. tit. "Statutes," § 56.

Long acquiescence in the constitutionality of the act may be considered in its support in a doubtful case. Somerset County v. Pocomoke Bridge Co., 109 Md. 1, 71 Atl. 462.

The rule does not apply where the validity of an act is assailed as a special act when a general law is applicable. Anderson v. Cloud County, 77 Kan. 721, 95 Pac. 583. Nor will a statute, which includes by general language subjects within and those without the constitutional jurisdiction of the state, be limited by judicial construction to the former class and then sustained. Cella Commission Co. v. Bohlinger, 147 Fed. 419, 78 C. C. A. 467, 8 L. R. A. N. S. 537.

24. State v. Bosworth, 13 Vt. 402.

Where a statute as a whole is held to have been regularly enacted, the validity of the adoption of each and every section thereof is a necessary consequence. Com. v. Hardin County Ct., 35 S. W. 275, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 113.

A decision that the statute is unconstitutional renders it null and void from the date of its enactment. See Constitutional Law, 8 Cyc. 804.

Effect of subsequent legislation on statutes held unconstitutional see Constitutional Law, 8 Cyc. 805.

Such an act is not validated by the approval of the governor (Wells v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 110 Mo. 286, 19 S. W. 530, 15 L. R. A. 847; Manor Casino v. State, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 34 S. W. 769), by an amendment of the constitution (State v. Tuffy, 20 Nev. 427, 22 Pac. 1054, 19 Am. St. Rep. 374;

3. Effect of Partial Invalidity [26] — a. Rule Stated. It is elementary that the same statute may be in part constitutional and in part unconstitutional, and if the parts are wholly independent of each other, that which is constitutional may stand while that which is unconstitutional will be rejected.[27] The rule is,

Bradley v. Baxter, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 122), or by becoming incorporated in a general revision (Dane v. McArthur, 57 Ala. 448; Cook v. Stewart, 85 Mo. 575).

Law reporting.—The provisions of an act creating a new system of law reporting in which the judges shall prepare the syllabi have been held to be so interdependent that the unconstitutionality of the requirement as to the syllabi renders the whole act void. Griffin v. State, 119 Ind. 520, 22 N. E. 7. See, generally, REPORTS, 34 Cyc. 1610.

Special legislation.—An act providing that the governor may declare special holidays on which the courts shall be open for the transaction of all judicial business, except the trial of an action based on a contract for the direct payment of money, is void in its entirety, as the exception is void on account of being special legislation, and it is an integral part of the act. Diepenbrock v.

not to be affected by minor invalid sections which confer more authority or jurisdiction than is authorized by the constitution,[34] or by invalid sections, relating to the qualification, appointment, election,[35] or compensation of judicial officers.[36]

(B) State Boards and Officers. Where the essential feature of an act is the appointment of a bureau by the governor, which feature is invalid as interfering with the right of local self-government, the act is void in toto.[37]

(C) Counties and Municipalities.[38] The invalidity of some sections does not in general affect the validity of the remainder of a statute incorporating a town,[39]

Tenure of office.— An act incorporating cities of a certain class is not rendered invalid as a whole by the alleged unconstitutionality of a provision extending the term of office of the police judge, whose term is limited by the constitution. State v. Malone, 74 Nebr. 645, 105 N. W. 893.

36. Harlin v. Schafer, 169 Ind. 1, 81 N. E. 721 [followed in Mumaw v. Turner, 169 Ind. 701, 81 N. E. 721]; Swartz v. Lake County, 158 Ind. 141, 63 N. E. 31; Bennett v. State, 16 S. D. 417, 93 N. W. 643. See, generally, JUDGES, 23 Cyc. 499.

The rule is otherwise in regard to acts relating to state officials, where only minor provisions are unconstitutional. State v. People's Slaughter House, etc., Co., 46 La. Ann. 1031, 15 So. 408; State v. Kelsey, 44 N. J. L. 1, holding that an act requiring the secretary of state to furnish copies of the laws to certain newspapers is not rendered invalid in toto by an unconstitutional provision reducing the compensation to be paid to the secretary for furnishing such copies below what it was when he took the office. And see Paterson R. Co. v. Grundy, 51 N. J. Eq. 213, 26 Atl. 788. See, generally, STATES.

39. Bass v. Lawrence, 124 Ga. 75, 52 S. E. 296; State v. Swift, 11 Nev. 128 (holding that an invalid provision relating to licenses does not render the whole incorporation act invalid); Fort v. Cummings, 90 Hun (N. Y.) 481, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 36; Rodman-Heath Cotton Mills v. Waxhaw, 130 N. C. 293, 41 S. E. 488 (holding that invalid provisions relating to the power of taxation may be eliminated without affecting the other portions of the act). See also MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 28 Cyc. 143.

An act amending a charter is subject to the same rule. Oak Cliff v. State, (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 77 S. W. 24 [affirmed in 97 Tex. 383, 79 S. W. 1]. Contra, in regard to an amendment, relating to the representation of a city on the board of county supervisors, and so framed that its provisions cannot be separated. Atty.-Gen. v. Gramlich, 129 Mich. 630, 89 N. W. 446.

Contra as to reincorporation acts.—Where the reincorporation feature of an act is unconstitutional, the provisions for dissolution fall with it. State v. Stark, 18 Fla. 255. Likewise a statute contemplating the dissolution of incorporated towns and cities, for classifying cities and towns,[40] or providing for the government of municipalities, and the appointment, election, and compensation of officers thereof.[41] The same rule applies to acts organizing counties,[42] to acts providing for the removal of the purpose of annexing their territory to another city, is void if a provision therein for determining such action by the vote of the taxpayers is unconstitutional. Valverde v. Shattuck, 19 Colo. 104, 34 Pac. 947, 41 Am. St. Rep. 208. As it is highly improbable that the general assembly would have enacted the provisions of an act for the redistricting of a city without the further provisions for the appointment of a board of control, the unconstitutionality of the latter provision renders the whole act invalid. State v. Pugh, 43 Ohio St. 98, 1 N. E. 439.

Election in remaining portion of county.—An error in a consolidation act which defeats the first election held under it in that portion of the original county excluded from the consolidation is not of itself sufficient to warrant a decision that the whole act is unconstitutional. People v. Hill, 7 Cal. 97.

Where part of a village charter restricting the right to vote at elections of officers of said village is unconstitutional, but was not the consideration for the enactment of the other portions of the charter, and the latter constitute an effective and sufficient village charter, they are valid as such. State v. Tuttle, 53 Wis. 45, 9 N. W. 791.

40. State v. Baker, 55 Ohio St. 1, 44 N. E. 516, holding that if in the formation of a class of municipal corporations an invalid exception is made, the exception alone will be treated as invalid, and the class sustained, where that will most likely give effect to the prevailing purpose of the legislature. See, generally, MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 28 Cyc. 55.

Transfer of cities from one class to another.—Although so much of Ky. St. § 3264, relative to transfer of cities of the third class to another class as provides for transfer by the circuit courts is void, the part providing for the future government of the transferred city and the rights of existing officers is valid. E. 508, holding that the fact that an act establishing schools in a city was unconstitutional, in that it authorized the exaction of matriculation fees from pupils residing in the city, did not render it invalid in toto.

Illinois.— People v. Hazelwood, 116 Ill. 319, 6 N. E. 480, holding that a disconnected section relating to the date of an election does not invalidate the remainder of the act.

Indiana.— State v. Blend, 121 Ind. 514, 23 N. E. 511, 16 Am. St. Rep. 411 [distinguishing Evansville v. State, 118 Ind. 426, 21 N. E. 267, 4 L. R. E. 19.

Michigan.— People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481.

Montana.— Dunn v. Great Falls, 13 Mont. 58, 31 Pac. 1017, holding that an act authorizing bonded indebtedness beyond the amount allowed by the constitution is void only as to the excess.

New Jersey.— Fagan v. Payen, (1904) 59 Atl. 568 [reversing 70 N. J. L. 341, 57 Atl. 469]; New Brunswick v. Fitzgerald, 48 N. J. L. 457, 8 Atl. 729. And see McCullough v. Franklin Tp., 59 N. J. L. 106, 34 Atl. 1088, where the rule was applied to an act conferring certain powers on the governing board of townships.

New York.— People v. Kenney, 96 N. Y. 294; People v. Coler, 71 N. Y. App. Div. 584, 76 N. Y. Suppl. 205 [affirmed in 173 N. Y. 103, 65 N. E. 956], holding that an act providing for the removal of a police commissioner by the mayor or the governor, although unconstitutional in conferring power of removal on the governor, is not invalid in toto, since the remainder of the act may be given effect consistent with the legislative intent.

Ohio.— Cincinnati v. Cincinnati St. R. Co., 1 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 591, 31 Cinc. L. Bul. 308.

See 44 Cent. Dig. tit. "Statutes," § 61; and, generally, MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 28 Cyc. 55.

Acts passed on same day.—An act providing that legislative bodies of incorporated cities and towns shall have power to license every kind of business transacted within their jurisdiction is not invalidated by another act which went into effect on the same day, conferring power on municipalities to license every kind of business, including the sale of intoxicating liquors, authorized by law and transacted in such city, for even if such subdivision of the latter act is void as being special legislation, such act cannot be regarded as part of the first act by reason of having been passed on the same day and relating to the same subject-matter. Ex p. Pfirrmann, 134 Cal. 143, 66 Pac. 205.

Where the unconstitutional provisions are so numerous that the court cannot say that the legislature would have passed the act with those provisions left out the whole act will be declared void. Malone v. Williams, 118 Tenn. 390, 103 S. W. 798, 122 Am. St. Rep. 1002.

42. Carleton v. People, 10 Mich. 250. See also COUNTIES, 11 Cyc. 345.

Contra, as to acts organizing districts within counties.—Where a provision in a special law creating an independent school-district was void as making a preëxisting bonded indebtedness of a city included in the new district a charge upon taxpayers of the new district who were not originally liable for its payment because not residents of the city, the whole act was rendered invalid thereby, in the absence of any means of de-county-seats,[43] or to acts relating to the offices, terms of office, and officers of a county.[44]

(II) Acts Relating to Particular Subjects — (A) Public Works and Improvements. Acts relating to public works and improvements, the acquisition of land therefor, and the assessment of damages and benefits, are valid even though they contain unconstitutional provisions, where, after eliminating such provisions, sufficient of the act remains to carry out its general purpose.[45]

(B) Taxation and Appropriations.[46] The rule which requires the rejection of termining that the legislature would have formed the new district at all without making the disposition that was made of the indebtedness. Cummins v. Gaston, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 109 S. W. 476. An act which provides for making each county a single poor district, and which is intended to operate as a whole, cannot be held to be in part constitutional and in part unconstitutional. Jenks Tp. Extension of territory of town.— The invalidity of a provision that a certain town shall not be required to keep in repair county bridges located within described territory which is sought to be annexed to the town does not affect the validity of so much of the act as provides for an extension of the territory of the town so as to include the territory described. Ham v. State, 156 Ala. 645, 47 So. 126.

The few instances in which such acts have been declared invalid in toto by reason of the unconstitutionality of a portion thereof are cases where the constitutional and unconstitutional parts were so intimately connected that it could not be presumed that the legislature would have passed the one without the other. an unconstitutional part of a statute and the retention of the constitutional part is applicable to taxation [47] and appropriation laws.[48]

(c) Primary Elections and Apportionment.[49] As the very nature of an apportionment act compels its treatment as a whole, the unconstitutionality of one provision renders the whole statute invalid; [50] but the whole of a primary election law is not rendered invalid by unconstitutional provisions requiring candidates to pay a fee for the filing of nomination papers,[51] improperly limiting delegates to national conventions,[52] or provisions relating to the qualification and nomination of candidates for the legislature,[53] or congress.[54]

(d) Intoxicating Liquors.[55] Acts regulating or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, as well as those providing for the holding of local option elections, have quite generally been upheld after striking out invalid sections,[56] such as those

III. General, Special, and Local Laws.

A. Terminology — 1. General or Public Laws. A general or public act is a universal rule affecting the entire community or class of the community covered by it.[69] It is not necessary, however, in order to constitute a statute a public act,

E. 76, 23 L. R. A. 139; In re Linden, 112 Wis. 523, 88 N. W. 645), or for the deduction of time for good conduct (Fite v. State, 114 Tenn. 646, 88 S. W. 941, 1 L. R. A. N. S. 520); but an unconstitutional section vesting in a board of prison commissioners the power to grant conditional pardons invalidates all other sections dependent on the power to grant such conditional pardon (In re Conditional Discharge of Convicts, 73 Vt. 414, 51 Atl. 10, 56 L. R. A. 658). See, generally, Prisons, 32 Cyc. 312.

In several cases the whole statute has been declared invalid on account of the unconstitutional section being the leading feature of the whole act and the remaining sections being inseparably connected with and dependent upon it (People v. McNulty, (Cal. 1891) 28 Pac. 816; State v. Ramsey County, 48 Minn. 236, 51 N. In England every statute that concerns the king and every statute that relates to all subjects of the realm is a public statute.

that it should be equally applicable to all parts of the state. It is sufficient if it extends to all persons doing or omitting to do an act within the territorial limits described in the statute.[70]

2. Special or Private Laws. A special or private act is a statute operating only on particular persons and private concerns.[71]

3. Local Laws. A local act is an act applicable only to a particular part of the legislative jurisdiction.[72]

St. 70, 32 Atl. 92); validating certain bonds (Owen County v. Spangler, 159 Ind. 575, 65 N. E. 743); and water rates in San Francisco (Spring Valley Water Works v. Bryant, 52 Cal. 132).

A public act may be local. Pierce v. Kimball, 9 Me. 54, 56, 23 Am. Dec. 537; Kerrigan v. Force, 68 N. Y. 381, 383. See also State v. Nichols, 28 Wash. 628, 69 Pac. 372. So a statute may be general and yet operative only in a particular locality. Mt. Vernon v. Evans, etc., Fire Brick Co., 204 Ill. 32, 34, 68 N. E. 208.

Public statutes may be divided into general and local. Lastro v. State, 3 Tex. App. 363, 365.

The terms "general" and "public" law are frequently used synonymously, but they are not the equivalent of each other. Every general law is necessarily a public law but every public law is not a general law. A general law is a law which operates throughout the state, alike upon all the people or all of a class. Any law affecting the public within the limits of the county or community would be a public law, though not a general law. Holt v. Birmingham, 111 Ala. 369, 372, 19 So. 735. The fact that the legislative representatives of a county sanctioned a local act applicable to it does not affect its unconstitutionality. Hamilton v. St. Louis County Ct., 15 Mo. 3.

Laws public in their objects may, unless express constitutional provision forbids, be either general or local in their application; they may embrace many subjects or one and they may extend to all citizens or be confined to particular classes, as minors, married women, or traders or the like. The authority that legislates for the state at large must determine whether particular rules shall extend to the whole state and all its citizens, or, on the other hand, to a subdivision of the state, or to a single class of its citizens only. b. Special Law Where General Is Applicable. The constitutional provisions of the constitutions of the several states of the Union generally prohibit special legislation in cases for which provision can be made by a general law.[87] It is the general doctrine that the legislature is the sole judge whether a provision by a general law is possible under a provision in the constitution to the effect that no special law shall be enacted, in all cases where a general law can be made applicable;[88]

Disentanglement of estates.—"It may sometimes happen that by the ingenuity of some and the blunders of other practitioners, an estate is most grievously entangled by a multitude of contingent remainders, resulting trusts, springing uses, executory devises, and the like artificial contrivances, (a confusion unknown to the simple conveyances of the common law,) so that it is out of the power of either the courts of law or equity to relieve the owner; or it may sometimes happen that by the strictness or omissions of family settlements, the tenant of the estate is abridged of some reasonable power, (as letting leases, making a jointure for a wife, or the like,) which power cannot be given him by the ordinary judges, either in common law or equity; or it may be necessary, in settling an estate, to secure it against the claims of infants or other persons under legal disabilities, who are not bound by any judgments or decrees of the ordinary courts of justice. In these, or other cases of the like kind, the transcendent power of parliament is called in to cut the gordian knot; and by a particular law, enacted for this very purpose, to unfetter an estate, to give its tenant reasonable powers, or to assure it to a purchaser against the remote or latent claims of infants or disabled persons, by settling a proper equivalent in proportion to the interest so barred." 2 Blackstone Comm. 344 [cited in Clarke v. Van Surlay, 15 Wend. Advances made by a building and loan association to its members differ so materially from other loan transactions that it was perfectly competent for the legislature to place them in a certain class for the purpose of regulating questions of usury and interest. The law is certainly not local for it is not confined to any locality, but it extends in its operation throughout the state. It is not special because it embraces all citizens of the state and gives to every person who may conform to its requirements the same rights and privileges. Union Sav. Bank, etc., Co. v. Dottenheim, 107 Ga. 606, 34 S. E. 217. "For many years, many states, and England as well, have pursued a policy of encouraging the operation of such associations as facilitate the building of homes for the people, and the public policy thereby involved would justify the legislature in its wisdom in classifying loans for such purpose, and made in such ways, as a group by themselves and subject to different restrictions and privileges than those applying to loans generally." the powers of a corporation [21] in time [22] is void as special legislation and in contravention of the constitutional provisions against such legislation.

d. Municipal Corporations — (i) In General. At common law the legislature has plenary authority over municipalities or other governmental subdivisions by general or special legislation,[23] but constitutional provisions frequently prohibit such special or local legislation.[24]

Rule stated.— "Every corporation has certain essentials which must appear in its articles. In this state these essentials are the corporate name, the corporate objects, the amount of the capital stock and the number of shares, the time of the corporate existence, the number of trustees and their names, and the principal place of business. It seems to us that a change in any of these essentials is, to that extent, the creation of a new corporation." So a preëxisting corporation cannot so amend its articles to accomplish objects prohibited by a statute declaring that no corporation should thereafter be created for a particular purpose. State v. Nichols, 38 Wash. 309, 312, 80 Pac. 462.

The change in the name of a preëxisting corporation so as to make use of the word "trust," the use of which word was prohibited to any company organized after the passage of the statute of 1903, chapter 176, is to that extent the creation of a new corporation and is forbidden by that statute. State v. Nichols, 38 Wash. 309, 80 Pac. 462. However, a change in name was held to be valid in Hazelett v. Butler University, 84 Ind. 230. See also CORPORATIONS, 10 Cyc. 155.

The only difference between the two cases suggested by the court in the New Jersey case is that in Kansas there were many vicious corporations existing by special law, while this was not the situation in New Jersey.

Municipal corporations are included within the prohibition against the passing of any special act conferring corporate powers. "There is certainly nothing in the words of the provision to suggest any such distinction or limitation. Nor do we see any reason why the local corporate bodies discharging public functions should not be governed by general and uniform laws as well as those for private enterprises. In fact, the weight of the argument seems to be the other way, for it can very well be seen that the aggregation of individual capital and energy into an associated organization may require different powers for each enterprise so established, while the powers to be exercised by cities, towns, townships, and school districts in the same State may or should be uniform in character all over the State. If any such rule is defensible at all, of which it is not our province to judge, its application to the latter class of corporations seems the more appropriate of the two." W. 147, holding that Const. art. 9, § 1, declaring that the legislature shall provide by general law for organizing new counties, changing county lines, etc., although mandatory, prescribes no penalty for failure to perform such duty, and hence such section does not render invalid a special act providing for the change of boundaries of a specified county.

goes into effect.[32] Classification is properly based on population when reasonably

State v. Kolsen, 130 Ind. 434, 29 N. E. 595, 14 L. R. A. 566, holding that the court cannot inquire whether the legislature intended bringing only one city under the act.

Rule stated.— "Whether in either case, the legislation presents a subject for judicial control depends upon whether the classification be substantial or illusive — substantial, in this sense, meaning that the limitation is incidentally consequent upon the character of the legislation; illusive, that the selection is extraneous from it. Such illusiveness results equally when a classification is created with a view of escaping the constitutional restriction and when one is adopted with a like result. Legislation for municipalities may deal with the municipal apparatus as such, or it may affect the citizen in other respects. Where the governmental apparatus alone is the subject of legislation, population ordinarily so fully connotes all the essential considerations that the general subject is, in the absence of palpable evasion, a question for legislative judgment. But where the legislation affects the citizen or taxpayer in other respects, classification by mere population is substantial or illusive according to the criterion already indicated, hence may present a question for judicial control." entire bill as presented. . . . But by joining a number of different subjects in one bill, the governor was put under compulsion to accept some enactments that he could not approve, or to defeat the whole, including others that he thought desirable or even necessary. Such bills, popularly called 'omnibus' bills, became a crying evil, not only from the confusion and distraction of the legislative mind by the jumbling together of incongruous subjects, but still more by the facility they afforded to corrupt combinations of minorities with different interests to force the passage of bills with provisions which could never succeed if they stood on their separate merits." Canons of construction have been adopted which may be summarized as follows: That every law is presumed to be valid; that this provision of the constitution is to be liberally construed, and all doubts resolved in favor of the law; that the title should also be liberally construed, giving to its general words paramount weight; that it is not essential that the best or even accurate words in the title be employed, but the remedy to be secured and mischief avoided furnish the best test of its sufficiency to prevent such title from being made a cloak or artifice to distract attention from the substance of the act, provided the title be fairly suggestive, and not foreign to the purpose of the statute. State v. State Institutions Bd. of Control, 85 Minn. 165, 88 N. W. 533.

The mere fact that legislative grants have at various times been included in acts with titles too restrictive is not sufficient to force the courts to disregard a plain mandate of the constitution directed against surreptitious legislation. See 44 Cent. Dig. tit. "Statutes," § 136.

"We must give the constitutional provision a reasonable construction and effect.—The constitution requires no law to embrace more than one object, which shall be expressed in its title. Now the object may be very comprehensive and still be without objection, and the one before us is of that character. But sidering substance rather than form,[82] to require the expression in the title of the general object but not the details or incidents,[83] or means of effecting the object sought [84]

it is by no means essential that every end and means necessary or convenient for the accomplishment of the general object should be either referred to or necessarily indicated by the title. All that can reasonably be required is, that the title shall not be made to cover legislation incongruous in itself, and which by no fair intendment can be considered as having a necessary or proper connection." Blair v. Chicago, 201 U. S. 400, 452, 26 S. Ct. 427, 50 L. ed. 801, per Day, J.

Common meaning given.— In determining whether the title of an act expresses its object within the meaning of the clause of the constitution on that subject, there should be attributed to the words used such meaning as they had then acquired in common and legislative usage. State v. Twining, 73 N. J. L. 683, 64 Atl. 1073, 1135 [affirming 73 N. J. L. 3, 62 Atl. 402]. And where the meaning attached to the terms in an act by a definition therein contained differs from that attached to them in common understanding, the title must express such special meaning so clearly as to put persons reading the same on inquiry. Com. v. Kebort, 212 Pa. St. 289, 61 Atl. 895.

Long use of a general title to a particular class of legislative enactments is such construction by the legislature of the constitutional provision that no law shall embrace more than one subject as to be entitled to consideration by the court in determining the sufficiency of such title. Calling a private act public does not relieve it from the constitutional prohibition. Belleville, etc., R. Co. v. Gregory, 15 Ill. 20, 58 Am. Dec. 589; Economic Power, etc., Co. v. Buffalo, 59 Misc. (N. Y.) 571, 111 N. Y. Suppl. 443 [affirmed in 128 N. Y. App. Div. 883, 112 N. Y. Suppl. 1127].

When a local or private bill contains provisions which apply to the whole state the act is valid, although the title does not refer to such provisions; but when a statute which applies to the state at large contains provisions of a local or private nature, not disclosed in the title, the latter provisions are void as being in violation of the constitution.

f. Submission to Popular Vote. An act may include a provision not indicated in its title for submission to popular vote,[94] and such provision does not make it duplex in character.[95]

B. Duplicity in Subject — 1. "Subject" or "Object." State constitutions sometimes forbid an act to embrace more than one "subject," which means the matter to which the statute relates,[96] or more than one "object," which is its general purpose.[97]

2. Amending Act. An amending act is not void for duplicity in amending two statutes,[98] or one statute in two particulars.[99]

3. One Subject and Its Branches or Subdivisions. A statute covering one subject with various branches is not void for multifariousness.[1]

96. Matter of Mayer, 50 N. Y. 504; Dorsey's Appeal, 72 Pa. St. 192.

Distinction stated. In People v. Lawrence, 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 177, 192 [affirmed in 41 N. Y. 137), the court says: "The constitution demands that the title of an act shall express the subject, not the object, of the act. It is the matter to which the statute relates, and with which it deals, and not what it proposes to do, which is to be found in the title. It is no constitutional objection to a statute, that its title is vague or unmeaning as to its purpose, if it be sufficiently distinct as to the matter to which it refers." In Texas a constitution forbidding an act from containing more than one object was amended to read "no bill . . . shall contain more than one subject." In Stone v. Brown, 54 Tex. 330, 341, Bonner, J., observes that "the word 'subject' may have been thus substituted as less restrictive than 'object.'" See also Fahey v. State, 27 Tex. App. 146, 11 S. W. 108, 11 Am. St. Rep. 182. "If any distinction is to be made, it seems to me that the word 'object,' in the connection in which it is used, is obviously of broader significance than the word 'subject.' . . . For all practical purposes, the words are synonymous, as indicated by Mr. Cooley [Const. Lim.]," per Turner, J., in Harland v. Territory, 3 Wash. Terr. 131, 145, 13 Pac. 453. That which is appropriate or relevant to the subject of a bill as expressed by its title, or is a necessary incident to the object of a bill as thus expressed, is germane, and one test is whether the legislation in the body of the bill is on matters properly connected with its subject as expressed by its title, or proper to the more full accomplishment of the object so indicated. If the title of an original act is sufficient to embrace a provision contained in an amendatory act, it is immaterial that the pose generally [31] and must be germane to the original act of which it is an amendment.[32]

3. Repealing Acts. A repealing act with a title simply referring to the original is sufficient.[33] An act may under a general statement of its subject in its title title of the amendatory act is insufficient. State v. Ranson, 73 Mo. 78.

New sections, even though germane, may not be added under a title to amend specified sections. State v. Southern R. Co., 115 Ala. 250, 22 So. 589; Shepherd v. Shepherd, 4 Kan. Ann. 598; Ex p. Hewlett, 22 Nev. 333, 40 Pac. 96. However, in Michigan the whole act seems to be open to amendment under an amending statute referring in its title to certain sections. Detroit v. Schmid, 128 Mich. 379, 87 N. W. 383, 92 Am. St. Rep. 468.

See, however, Com. v. Brown, 91 Va. 762, 21 S. E. 357, 28 L. R. A. 110, holding that if the title of an act is sufficient to embrace matters covered by an act amendatory thereof, it is immaterial that the title of the latter act does not express the purpose of the act.

Nature of the amendment.— The title of the amending act need not indicate the nature of the amendment. Leake v. Colgan. 125 Cal. 413, 58 Pac. 69; Fort St. Union Depot Co. v. Railroad Com'r, 118 Mich. 340, 76 N. W. 631; State v. Algood, 87 Tenn. 163, 10 S. W. 310.

An amendatory statute is not broader than its title, where the title gives notice to whosoever reads that legislation is impending which, by amending the act referred to in the title of the amending act, may touch upon the subject-matter of any of the provisions of the act amended. People v. Whitlock, 92 N. Y. 191.

An amendment applying local option to the original act is valid. Marion County v. Winkley, 29 Kan. 36; Wright v. Cunningham, 115 Tenn. 445, 91 S. W. 293.

Enlarging restrictive title.—"While a general title covering an entire subject cannot be enlarged by an amendatory act so as to include other matter, because thereby two subjects would be introduced in the body of the act, we can see no reason why a restrictive title cannot be enlarged by that of an amendatory act, so as to allow legislation germane to the body of the original act. The title of the original act could have been made broad enough to cover matter of the amendment, and whatever could have been done originally can be done by amendment. If the rule were otherwise, it would be impossible to amend an act with a restrictive title, however germane the proposed amendment might be to the body of the original act. While this direct question has not before been presented to this court, yet we think the principle is distinctly recognized in our cases." Memphis St. R. Co. v. Byrne, 119 Tenn. 278, 307, 104 S. W. 460.

33. Dunbar v. Frazer, 78 Ala. 538; Moore v. Burdett, 62 N. J. L. 163, 40 Atl. 631, reference to date of original is unnecessary. See State v. Brown, 29 Mont. 179, 74 Pac. 366, holding that a title, to repeal Bill No. 129 as amended by Bill No. 13, is insufficient where the real intention was to amend Bill No. 13.

Affirmative legislation under guise of repeal.—Where a bill, when read by its title, declares that nothing is to be done except to repeal a certain act, a section which attempts affirmative legislation is void, its subject not being expressed in the title. Stiefel v. Maryland Inst. for Instruction of Blind, 61 Md. 144; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Smyth, 103 Fed. 376. See, however, Yellow River Imp. Co. v. Arnold, 46 Wis. 214, 49 N. W. 971, to the effect that the repeal of a statute on a certain subject is properly connected with the subject-matter of a new statute on the same subject.

An intention to repeal all laws inconsistent with the proposed measure is necessarily implied, and need not be expressed in the title of a legislative bill. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Sprague, 69 Nebr. 48, 95 N. W. 46.

Reënactment.—An act entitled, a repealing act, which in fact repeals and reënacts the statute referred to is void. State v. Benzinger, 83 Md. 481, 35 Atl. 173.

Repeals by implication are not affected by constitutional provisions requiring the subject of an act to be expressed in its title. Trackman v. People, 22 Colo. 83, 43 Pac. 662; Union Trust Co. v. Trumbull, 137 Ill. 146, 27 N. E. 24; Mix v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 116 Ill. 502, 6 N. repeal all acts inconsistent with it,[34] but may not include a repeal of acts on a different subject.[35]

4. Penalties. Penalties for violations of a statute do not as a general rule need to be mentioned in the title.[36]

5. Title Referring to Extrinsic Document. A title referring to some extrinsic document for its subject is insufficient.[37]

6. "Etc.," or Similar Expressions in Title. The expression, etc., in a title may be considered in construing it,[38] but "for other purposes"[39] or "and so forth"[40] should not be considered in construing the title to an act.

7. Title Broader Than Act. The act may be valid, although its title is broader than the act itself.[41] On the other hand the title of an act may be void where it

V. Amendment, Revision,[33] and Codification.[34]

A. Amendment Defined. An amendment as applied to statutes means an alteration in the draft of a bill proposed or in a law already passed.[35]

B. Power to Amend — 1. In General. It is as competent for the people to withhold from the legislature the power of amending an act, as to withhold the the act making it criminal for a contractor to receive payment and neglect to pay laborers and materialmen.

Other definitions are: "An alteration or change of something proposed in a bill or established as law." Bouvier L. Dict.

"A change in some of the existing provisions of an act." Sheridan v. Salem, 14 Oreg. 328, 337, 12 Pac. 925.

"A modification or alteration proposed to be made in a bill on its passage, or an enacted law; also such modification or change when made." Black L. Dict.

"That which supplies a deficiency, adds to, or completes, or extends that which is already in existence, without changing or modifying the original." McCleary v. Babcock, 169 Ind. 228, 233, 82 N. E. 453; State v. Wyandot County, 16 Ohio Cir. Ct. 218, 221, 9 Ohio Cir. Dec. 90.

Derivation.—The word "amend" came into our language from the French "amender," the root or parent word being menda, a fault, and means in its most comprehensive sense "to better." Diamond v. Williamsburgh Ins. Co., 4 Daly (N. Y.) 494, 500.

The word "amend" is synonymous with "correct, reform, rectify." It means a correction of errors, an improvement, a reformation. It necessarily implies something upon which the correction, alteration, and improvement can operate. Something to be reformed, corrected, or improved. To amend a statute is to alter it, to annul or remove that which will improve it. McCleary v. Babcock, 169 Ind. 228, 233, 82 N. E. 453; In re Pennsylvania Tel. Co., 2 Chest. Co. Rep. (Pa.) 129, 131.

Distinguished from supplement.— It signifies something additional, something added to supply what is wanting. McCleary v. Babcock, 169 Ind. 228, 233, 82 N. E. 453; Webster Int. Dict.

A law is revised or amended, not when it is repealed, but when it is, in whole or in part, permitted to remain, and something is added to or taken from it, or it is in some way changed or altered to make it more complete or perfect, or to fit it the better to accomplish the object or purpose for which it was made, or some other object or purpose. Falconer v. Robinson, 46 Ala. 340, 348.

It is the effect, not the name given to an act, that determines its character. If a subsequent statute does in fact modify and change the proceedings to be had under a power of amending the constitution itself;[36] but one legislature cannot bind another as to the mode in which it shall exercise its constitutional power of amendment;[37] nor, on the other hand, can a legislature delegate to revisers, codifiers, or commissioners the power to amend.[38] It is competent for the legislature, at the same session, to alter, modify, or repeal a law by a subsequent act at the same session;[39] and a succeeding legislature can amend acts passed by its predecessors without express authority.[40] And a constitutional provision that "no bill shall be so amended in its passage through either house as to change its original purpose" does not affect the power of a subsequent legislature to make changes in a statute.[41]

2. Manner of Exercising Power. In the absence of a constitutional prohibition, a section of an act may be amended in one or more of four ways: By striking out certain words; by striking out certain words and inserting others; by inserting certain words; and by adding other provisions.[42] In amending a law, the legislature may substitute any provision it pleases for any other provision, whether cognate or not, if the new section is not foreign to the subject indicated by the title of the law in which it is inserted;[43] and a section may be amended by adding former act, the later act is an amendment of the earlier act. State v. Chadbourne, 74 Me. 506, 508.

40. Alexander v. McDowell County, 70 N. C. 208, holding that where an act authorizing a county to issue bonds to pay its subscription to a railroad omits to provide by whom the bonds should be signed and issued, a succeeding legislature has the power to amend the act in such particular, and so render valid the action of those who issued the bonds without express authority. And see cases cited infra, the following notes.

42. Fletcher v. Prather, 102 Cal. 413, 36 Pac. 658, holding that this mode of amendment does not repeal or disturb the existence of the parts of the original section not stricken out.

The objection to this mode of amendment is that it tends to confusion and uncertainty owing to the difficulty of correctly reading the original section with the amendments, a difficulty largely increased with each subsequent amendment. Fletcher v. Prather, 102 Cal. 413, 36 Pac. 658.

Amendment of general law by special act.— If there is no constitutional prohibition against such a practice, it is held that there can be no objection to the amendment of a general law by a special act. Murray v. State, 112 Ga. 7, 37 S. E. 111; Richardson v. Kansas City Bd. of Education, 72 Kan. 629, 84 Pac. 538.

A bill which subsequently becomes a law may be amended by a bill introduced before but passed after, the first bill becomes a law. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Winne, 20 Mont. 20, 49 Pac. 446.

Intention of legislature.— While, in amending statutes, it is proper to embrace in the first part of the amending act, as declaratory of the intention of the general assembly, what is to be the character of the amendment, still this part of the statute, which is merely declaratory of the legislative intention, is not to be looked to as the final determination of the general assembly. When a statute or a section of the code to be amended is recited in the statute in its amended shape, and it is in express terms declared therein that, when amended, the old law shall read in a certain way, this declaration by the general assembly, being the last expression of its intention as to what shall be the law of the state, absolutely controls where any conflict arises as to matter contained in this declaration of what the law shall be and what is set forth in the first part of the amending statute as declaratory of the legislative intention. If the declaratory part, which recites that certain amendments are to be made, is entirely omitted from the recital as to how the statute shall read when amended it is to be presumed that it was the intention of the general assembly to omit from the new law that part of the amending statute which was not carried into the new law as recited in the statute, and that the failure to strike from the declaratory part of the law so much of it as was not to be embraced in the new law was by mistake or inadvertence. Gilbert v. Georgia R., etc., Co., 104 Ga. 412, 30 S. E. 673.

Striking out words.— An act may be amended by an enactment that certain words shall thereto a new section, provided the section added relates to and is germane to the subject-matter of the act proposed to be amended.[44]

C. Acts Subject to Amendment — 1. In General. In general any statute which is not a mere nullity,[45] or which has not been entirely abrogated,[46] or repealed by implication,[47] may properly be amended.

2. Amendment of Amended, Repealed, or Void Statute. In many cases it is held that an amendment to be valid must not relate to a statute which has been repealed or declared unconstitutional,[48] and that where an entire act is void there is nothing to amend;[49] and thus it is held that an amendatory statute which attempts to amend a section which has already been amended and repealed by implication is void.[50] But in the absence of constitutional prohibition the better rule has been held to be that an amendatory statute will be upheld, although it purports to amend a statute already amended or which for any reason has been declared invalid;[51]

Compiled statutes, published under authority of law, and supposed to contain all the laws in force at the date of publication, may be amended by a proper reference thereto; and, if the amendatory act clearly points out the portion of the statute amended, the objection that the amendment is of the compiled statutes will be unavailing (In re White, 33 Nebr. 812, 51 N. W. 287); and an act passed, enrolled, approved, and deposited with the secretary of state is an act in force, competent of amendment, although by error, inadvertency, or misconception it may not have been compiled and published in the same manner as all other laws of the state (State v. Partridge, 29 Nebr. 158, 45 N. It is otherwise when there is only one section, or a part of one section, sought to be amended. and that a statute amended and not repealed may be amended;[52] and a statute amending a statute which has already been superseded by an amendatory statute is valid, where it was the intention of the legislature to amend the amendatory statute, and not the amended statute,[53] and a statute purporting to amend a repealed or void statute is valid where the provisions of the new statute are independent and complete in themselves.[54] Where a statute has been amended, a later statute, declaring the original act, with no express reference to the amendment, to be applicable, makes it applicable as amended and not in its original form.[55] An act is not void because its title purports it to be an act supplementary to an act which expired by its own limitation, where such act was subsequently revived.[56]

D. Effect of Invalidity or Inapplicability of Amendatory Act. Where a statute which undertakes to amend and reënact an existing statute is invalid, the existing statute remains in force;[57] and similarly if the amendatory act is not germane to the subject-matter of the original act it is of no effect as an amend-

In Alabama it is held to be clearly settled that the legislature may amend an original act which has been amended and repealed and disregard intervening amendatory and repealing acts. If a statute is wholly or in part unconstitutional, but has a title expressing a constitutional object, it may by amendment be rendered constitutional, without having recourse to an enactment independent throughout its provisions. Allison v. Corker, 67 N. J. L. 596, 52 Atl. 362 [modifying 66 N. J. L. 182, 48 Atl. 1118]. So an act dealing with a single subject-matter, but with two phases of the same, which is held valid as to one phase but inoperative as to the other, may be amended by an act relieving the defects applicable to the one portion, so as, in the single act, to complete the scheme of the original act. A statute amending a repealed statute "so as to read as follows" has been held operative without regard to the former statute. People v. Jefferson County Canvassers, 77 Hun (N. Y.) 372, 28 N. Y. Similarly a statute which amends a statute "so as to read as follows," and which covers substantially all the subject of the amended statute, is in effect a substitute for such statute, and not a repeal thereof, and a statute which in like manner again amends this amended statute is not void as an amendment of a repealed statute, but stands like an independent enactment in place of the two prior statutes. ment;[58] and no act can be rendered unconstitutional by a section which makes no change whatever in the law as it was before, and which might have been omitted without any effect.[59] Where it appears from an amendatory act that it is intended to amend some section of the previous act by changing it so as to read as set out in the amendatory act, and it does not appear from anything in the latter act for what provision the proposed reading is to be substituted, the latter act is void for uncertainty.[60]

E. Construction of Amendments. The use of the word "repealing" in the title instead of "amending" does not violate a constitutional provision requiring a recital in their caption of the title or substance of the bill to be amended, when the other words of the title clearly point out the sections, chapter, title, code, and subject to be affected by the provisions of the bill (State v. Page, 20 Mont. 238, 50 Pac. 719); and on the other hand an act declaring in its title that it is an amendment is valid, although it is in reality not an amendment but a repeal of the statute referred to (Malone v. Williams, 118 Tenn. 390, 103 S. W. 798, 121 Am. St. Rep. 1002).

chapter or year when the original act was passed, where there was no other act of the same title.[73] The failure of the legislature in amending the same section of the original act a second time to specifically refer to it as having been amended by the first amendatory act does not affect the validity or constitutionality of the second amendment.[74] An intention to repeal all laws inconsistent with the proposed amendment is necessarily implied and need not be expressed in the title of the amendment.[75]

2. Constitutional Prohibition Against Amending Merely by Reference to Title — a. Rule Stated. Under constitutional provision in many states no act may be revised or amended merely by reference to its title, but the act as revised or amended must be set forth and published at length.[76]

See 44 Cent. Dig. tit. "Statutes," § 204 et seq.

The constitution of Louisiana seems to have been the first to contain such a provision. Portland v. Stock, 2 Oreg. 69.

The object of the provision was to show the law-maker the true meaning of the proposed enactment without the necessity of resorting to the old law (Haring v. State, 51 N. J. L. 386, 17 Atl. 1079; Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. L. 123, 29 Am. Rep. 210), the mischief designed to be remedied being the enactment of amendatory statutes in terms so blind that both legislators and the public were deceived as to their import (People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481 [quoted in Bush v. Indianapolis, 120 Ind. 476, 22 N. E. 422]; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Sporer, 72 Nebr. 372, 100 N. W. 813); and to prevent laws relating to one subject from being made applicable to laws passed upon another subject (Edwards v. Denver, etc., R. Co., 13 Colo. 59, 21 Pac. 1011; People v. Squire, 107 N. Y. 593, 14 N. E. 820, 1 Am. St. Rep. 893).

This provision has been held to be directory merely and not mandatory so as to make a failure to comply fatal to the constitutionality of the amendment. East Georgia, etc., R. Co. v. King, 91 Ga. 519, 17 S. E. 939. The great weight of authority is, however, to the contrary. See cases cited supra, this note.

In Indiana the opposite construction formerly prevailed, and it was there held that the meaning of the provision is that the act revised or amended shall be inserted in full in the act amending or revising it. Armstrong v. Berreman, 13 Ind. 422; Kennon v.

was not intended to abolish the doctrine of amendment or repeal by implication,[79] or

Shull, 9 Ind. 154; Littler v. Smiley, 9 Ind. 118; Wilkins v. Muller, 9 Ind. 100; Rogers v. State, 6 Ind. 31. But in the case of Newcastle Southern Turnpike Co. v. State, 28 Ind. 382, these decisions were overruled (see Bush v. Indianapolis, 120 Ind. 476, 22 N. E. 422), and it is now held to be well settled that it is not necessary to set out the section to be amended and that the consitutional requirement is fulfilled by setting out the section as amended (Bush v. Indianapolis, supra; Niblack v. Goodman, 67 Ind. 174). But a section of a statute cannot be amended without setting forth the whole section as amended, no matter how many clauses the section may be divided into (Martinsville v. Frieze, 83 Ind. 507; Draper v. Falley, 33 Ind. 465), although if the amended act is set forth it will not invalidate the amendment, the amended act being treated as surplusage (Draper v. Falley, supra).

A code, body, or system of law adopted or enacted by a single act of a legislature, although it may contain inconsistent or repugnant provisions or one section or part may be modified, and to the extent of the modifications controlled by another, is not within the spirit or letter of the mandate (Ex p. Thomas, 113 Ala. 1, 21 So. 369; Ellis v. Parsell, 100 Mich. 170, 58 N. W. 839, holding that Laws (1893), Act 118, "to revise and consolidate" the laws relative to penal institutions, and the government and discipline thereof, and "to repeal all acts inconsistent therewith," although the acts revised and consolidated are not reënacted and published at length does not violate Const. art. 4, § 25, providing that the act revised and the sections altered or amended shall be reënacted and published at length; the terms "revise" and "consolidate" implying the intention to include entire control over the subject, and the provisions of the act covering the entire management of such penal institutions); and the adoption of a code by an act which declares the various chapters constituting the code to be in force is not reviving or amending laws by reference to their titles only, within the prohibition of the constitution (Hunt v. Wright, 70 Miss. 298, 11 So. 608), and to specify how and in what mode the law shall be designated and cited is not an enactment of new law (U. S. v. Moore, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,804, holding that the enactment of the Revised Statutes by act of congress was not the enactment of a body of laws as original legislation, but was simply the enactment of a more convenient expression of the law as it existed on Dec. 1, 1873; it does not enact or reënact anything as law which was not the law on that date).

Reference to sections of a code by number, in order to incorporate in the new act the provisions of said code sections, has the same effect as if the code sections had been copied into the new act. But such reference has no effect whatever on other code sections, not referred to by number, but being in the same article from which those specifically named are taken, and part of the same scheme of legislation, when said other sections have no bearing whatever on the new legislation. to forbid the enactment of supplemental laws;[80] and thus a statute which, while it may relate to other statutes or matters contained therein, does not in fact amend them is not within the constitutional prohibition,[81] and simply because a statute, which adds to or is properly described as a supplement to another act, by construction is incidentally amendatory thereof, it does not violate the clause of the constitution,[82] particularly where each act is complete as to its purpose;[83] nor is it invalidated by a reference to the act as to which it is supplementary.[84] Furthermore, an act which on its face is a complete and perfect act of legislation and does not purport to amend prior legislation is not interdicted by such a provision, although it amends by implication other legislation on the same subject.[85]

G. Codification, Compilation, and Revision. In many states the statutes have been collected and systematically arranged into a body of laws variously called a Code, Revised Statutes, Consolidated Laws, or some similar name,[95] which are held to be not mere compilations of laws previously existing, but bodies of laws so enacted that laws previously existing and omitted therefrom cease to exist, and such additions as appear therein are the law from the approval of the act adopting the code.[96] But revisers of statutes are presumed not to change the law if the language which they use fairly admits of a construction which makes it consistent with the former statutes;[97] and it is a well-settled rule that in the

Marginal notes no indication of construction.— By a resolution directing that a compilation of the general laws shall be published, with marginal notes indicating briefly the contents of each section, the general assembly does not sanction the construction to be placed on the different sections by the marginal notes to be thereafter prepared. Com. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Place, 21 R. I. 248, 43 Atl. 68. Furthermore, the failure of the revision committee to note, at the lower margin of Rev. St. § 3480, the amendment of Rev. revision of statutes neither an alteration in phraseology nor the omission or addition of words in the latter statute shall be held necessarily to alter the construction of the former act, excepting where the intent of the legislature to make such change is clear.[98] But where no effect can be given to the new language in any other manner, the law will be construed to be changed;[99] and the rule that a revision of the statutes making no substantial change in the preëxisting law shall be taken as only embodying, in changed form, the statutes previously existing, is not conclusive where the revision was adopted by the legislature, and has the force of law, especially where the revision contained new provisions, and enlarged and systematized old ones.[1] Although an act from which a section of the code was taken is subject to the constitutional objection that it contains matter different from that embraced in the title, this defect in the act does not render the section of the code invalid;[2] but if an act is void when first passed, the mere fact that it was copied into the Revised Statutes does not prima facie establish its validity, unless it be shown that it was reënacted by the legislature at some regular session,[3] although the mere appearance of a section in the Revised Statutes is sufficient authority for treating it as the law on the subject, until it is shown to be incorrect by the files in the secretary of state's office;[4] and the authority which attaches to a printed volume of the revision of the statutes duly certified is not lessened by the fact that a certain provision found therein does not appear in the printed volume of the annual session acts.[5]

Other definition.—"An abrogation of one statute by another." Butte, etc., Consol. Min.

2. Power to Repeal — a. In General. A legislature has plenary power to enact laws or repeal them, unless prohibited expressly or by implication by the state or federal constitution. The power to repeal a law is as complete and full as the power to enact it.[7] The act of one legislature is not binding upon future legislatures.[8] This power of repeal extends to a previous act of the same session,[9] even before it becomes a law.[10] Nor can one legislature bind a future legislature to a particular mode of repeal.[11]

b. Void Act. The right of the legislature to repeal an unconstitutional act is self-evident,[12] and the fact that an act is unconstitutional does not render unconstitutional an act passed to repeal it and to substitute another in its stead.[13]

3. Modes of Repeal — a. In General. In the absence of any constitutional restraint, a state legislature may exercise the power of repeal in any form in which it can give a clear expression of its will.[14]

b. Express Repeal — (i) In General — (a) Intention Governs. A clause in a statute purporting to repeal other statutes is subject to the same rules of interpretation as other enactments, and the intent must prevail over literal interpretation.[15]

(B) Reference to Subject of Repeal in Title of Repealing Act. If the subject of a statute is to repeal another statute, then that subject must be fairly expressed in the title.[16] If, however, the repealing act is upon the same subject as the act repealed, the repeal is properly connected with the subject-matter, and the repealing act is valid notwithstanding the title is silent on the subject.[17]

(C) Identification of Act Repealed — (1) IN GENERAL. Where a statute repeals a former statute, to give effect to the repealing statute, the repealing statute must be so pointed out as to leave no doubt as to what statute was intended.[18]

(2) BY REFERENCE TO TITLE. A constitutional provision that no law shall be repealed by mere reference to the title is not violated by an act referring to the date of the repealed act as well as to its title, there being no other act of the same date, with the same title,[19] or by an act which, in its body, contains the full title of the act to be repealed, and repeals the same.[20]

Expression of subject in title.— Under a constitutional provision that no bill shall embrace more than one subject, and that it shall be expressed in the title, it is not necessary in all cases that the repeal of a given statute should be expressed in terms in the title. Howlett v. Cheetham, 17 Wash. 626, 50 Pac. 522. See, generally, supra, IV, C, 3.

When the title does not refer to the repeal of any particular statute, but only to laws contrary to and in conflict with the provisions of the act, while the repealing clause undertakes to repeal a particular act, only so much of the act as is broader than the title is unconstitutional, and the rest is not affected. repealing a former statute, although the former be incorrectly described, providing the intention is clear.[21]

(II) Repeal of All Laws Within Purview. A later statute repeals an earlier one, if it covers the same subject and in general terms repeals all other laws within its purview.[22]

c. Implied Repeal[23] — (I) In General. A legislature may express its will in any form — affirmative or negative — that it pleases, so long as it does not transgress constitutional prohibitions. It is under no obligation to use words of express repeal.[24] But the repeal of statutes by implication is not favored by the courts.[25] The presumption is always against the intention to repeal where express

In State v. Knoll, 69 Kan. 767, 77 Pac. 580, it is held that where one act is mentioned in the title of a repealing act, and another in the body thereof, the latter being the one desired to be repealed, such act is not expressly repealed, even though correctly named in the body, but, where the repealing act was evidently intended to cover the whole subject, it affects a repeal of the act in question by implication.

An inaccuracy in the enumeration of laws repealed does not effect a repeal of the laws thus mentioned. People v. Lord, 9 N. Y. App. Div. 458, 41 N. Y. Suppl. 343; McKee Land, etc., Co. v. Swikehard, 23 Misc. (N. Y.) 21, 51 N. Y. Suppl. 399 [affirmed in 63 N. Y. App. Div. 553, 71 N. Y. Suppl. 1141]. The term "purview" means the enacting part of the statute in contradistinction to the preamble. Payne v. Conner, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 180, 181; The San Pedro, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 132, 139, 4 L. ed. 202. Hence the repeal is not confined merely to such parts of the former act as are inconsistent with the provisions of the repealing act. The San Pedro, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 132, 4 L. ed. 202. But a statute repealing all former acts within its purview does not repeal the provisions of former laws as to cases not provided for by the repealing statute. State v. Reynolds, 108 Ind. 353, 9 N. E. 287; Payne v. Conner, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 180; State v. Fuller, 14 La. Ann. 667. And where some of the provisions of the prior act are within the purview of the repealing act, and others are not, if to hold the former repealed and the latter not leads to an absurdity, none of the provisions upon the subject will be held repealed. Statute passed in ignorance of former law. — Where the legislature passes a law, the manifest object of which is to extend a benefit, or create a right, under a misapprehension or in ignorance of the existence or effect of a former law, which extended a greater benefit, or created a greater right, than that provided by the new law, the first law is not repealed or affected by the last, so as to limit or abridge the right or benefit and to restrict it within the limits of the last law, unless there are restrictive words showing an intention that no greater right or benefit shall be enjoyed than is provided in the last law. (II) Effect of Constitutional Requirements as to Repeal. A statute may be repealed by implication as well as by direct reference, notwithstanding a constitutional provision that all acts which repeal, revive, or amend former laws shall recite in their caption, or otherwise, the title or substance of the law repealed, revived, or amended;[30] that no law shall be repealed, revised, or amended by reference to its title only;[31] that no act shall be amended by providing that designated words shall be struck out;[32] or that no act shall embrace more than one subject.[33] Such provisions have no application to repeals by implication.[34]

(III) Modes of Implied Repeal — (A) By Inconsistency or Repugnancy. Where two legislative acts are repugnant to, or in conflict with, each other, the one last passed, being the latest expression of the legislative will, must govern, although it contains no repealing clause.[35] But it is not sufficient to establish such

The reason of the rule is that when the mind of the legislature has considered the object and details of the subject of the statute, and not in express language contradicted the original act, the latter act shall not be considered as intended to affect the previous provisions of the former, unless it is absolutely necessary to give the latter act such a construction as that its words shall have any meaning at all. That two acts are repugnant on principle merely forms no reason why both may not stand. Ex p. Smith, 40 Cal. 419.

A statute which does not take away any right, or impose any substantial new duty, but regulates with additional requirements a duty imposed by a previous act is not to be deemed inconsistent with the previous act. repugnant to each other unless they relate to the same subject.[40] Furthermore it is necessary to the implication of a repeal that the objects of the two statutes be the same. If they are not, both statutes will stand, although they may refer to the same subject.[41]

(B) By Act Covering Whole Subject-Matter. When two statutes cover, in whole or in part, the same subject-matter, and are not absolutely irreconcilable, no purpose of repeal being clearly shown, the court, if possible, will give effect to both.[42] Where, however, a later act covers the whole subject of earlier acts such repeal by implication it must appear that the subsequent statute covered the whole subject-matter of the former one, and was intended as a substitute for it.[44] If the later statute does not cover the entire field of the first and fails to embrace within its terms a material portion of the first, it will not repeal so much of the first as is not included within its scope, but the two will be construed together, so far as the first still stands.[45]

This rule does not rest strictly upon the ground of repeal by implication, but upon the principle that when the legislature makes a revision of a particular statute, and frames a new statute upon the subject-matter, and from the framework of the act it is apparent that the legislature designed a complete scheme for the matter, it is a legislative declaration that whatever is embraced in the new law shall prevail, and whatever is excluded is discarded. It is decisive evidence of an intention to prescribe the provisions mentioned in the latter act as the only ones on that subject which shall be obligatory. Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 58 Pac. 372; State v. Conkling, 19 Cal. 501; People v. Thornton, 186 Ill. 162, 57 N. E. 841; Roche v. Jersey City, 40 N. J. L. 257; Bracken v. Smith, 39 N. J. Eq. 169.

In the case of a statute revising the common law, the implication is at least equally strong. Com. v. Cooley, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 37.

The purpose of a statute revising the whole subject-matter of a former one is the provision of a new and comprehensive system of law as to the subject-matter, and is not an erection on former laws of a mere superstructure, but the erection of a new structure, using only such of the old materials as are suitable, so that the work consists of inclusion only by means of express and implied enactments and reënactments and express and implied adoption of existing laws. State v. Harden, 62 W. Va. 313, 58 S. E. 715, 60 S. E. 394.

Revision of statutes implies a reëxamination of them.— The word is applied to a restatement of the law in an improved and corrected form. A revision is intended to take the place of the law as previously formulated. Jernigan v. Holden, 34 Fla. 530, 16 So. 413.

Presumption from omission.—When a statute is revised and a provision contained in it is omitted in the new statute, the inference have been the intention of the legislature to cover the whole subject by the revision.[53]

cc. Time When Repeal Effected. A repeal is not effected until the revised law goes into effect.[54]

(b) CODIFICATION. Where the laws and jurisprudence of a state are reduced to the form of a code, without any clause of repeal, the rule of interpretation must be, as in cases of successive statutes, not to favor a repeal by implication, unless in case of manifest repugnance,[55] or where the legislature intended to cover the whole subject in the code.[56]

(2) EFFECT OF EXPRESS REPEALING CLAUSE.[57] The doctrine that a statute is impliedly repealed by a subsequent statute, revising the whole matter of the first,[58] does not apply where the revisory statute declares what effect it is intended to have upon the former, as where it provides that it shall operate to repeal all inconsistent or repugnant acts;[59] all acts of a public and general nature;[60] all acts in every case provided for in the code;[61] or all acts whose subjects are revised, consolidated, or reënacted in the revision or code.[62] In such cases only such is that a change in the law was intended to be made. If the omission was by accident, it belongs to the legislature to supply it. Buck v. Spofford, 31 Me. 34.

If the revising act does not legislate upon a subject the omission therefrom of a prior act relating to that subject does not operate to repeal that act. Com. v. Grinstead, 108 Ky. 59, 55 S. Applicability of such a provision.—A provision repealing all laws in every case provided for in the code itself applies, not in every particular instance or cause, but to every category or class of cases, or subject-matter upon which the code contains express provisions, and abrogates all previous laws on these subjects. effect can be given to the revisory act as it directs. The enumerated acts are repealed; all others remain in force.[63]

(3) Effect of Saving Clause. To guard against oversights and omissions necessarily incident to all statute revisions and codifications, a provision is frequently inserted to the effect that laws of a general nature not repugnant to the revision shall remain in force.[64] Furthermore it is customary to save from repeal special and local acts,[65] acts passed at the same legislative session,[66] and acts no part of which is embraced in the revision or codification.[67]

(d) By Amendatory Act — (1) In General. A law purporting to amend another law may or may not operate as a repeal of the original law. implication, repeal the old law so far as they are in conflict.[69] And where a new law, whether it be in the form of an amendment or otherwise, covers the whole subject-matter of the former, and is inconsistent with it, and evidently intended to supersede and take the place of it, it repeals the old law by implication.[70]

(2) By Amendment "So as to Read as Follows." Generally speaking, where a statute is amended "so as to read as follows," the amendatory act becomes a substitute for the original, which then ceases to have the force and effect of an independent enactment;[71] but this does not mean that the original is abrogated for all purposes, or that everything in the later statute is to be regarded as if first enacted therein.[72] On the contrary, the better and prevailing rule is that so much of the original as is repeated in the later statute without substantial change is affirmed and continued in force without interruption;[73] that so much of the act as is omitted is repealed;[74] and that any substantial change in other portions legislative policy,[81] or unless circumstances have so changed that the object of the statute has vanished or its reason ceased.[82] So a statute may become of no force, although not repealed, by a change of circumstances rendering its enforcement a fraud.[83] But the repeal of an act cannot be implied from the mere fact that some of the evils provided against in it are removed by a subsequent act.[84]

(G) By Acts Passed at Same Session. Where two acts relating to the same subject-matter are passed at the same legislative session, there is a strong presumption against implied repeal,[85] and they are to be construed together, if possible, so as to give effect to each;[86] but, if the two are irreconcilable, the one which is the later expression of the legislative will must prevail.[87] A statute cannot be superseded by one of earlier date;[88] or, where publication is necessary to put an act in force, by one which precedes it in the authorized publication of the laws.[89] But it is frequently provided that a revision or code must be construed as though

The reason of the rule is clear: In passing the special act, the legislature have their attention directed to the special case which the act was meant to meet, and consider and provide for all the circumstances of that special case; and, having so done, they are not to be considered, by a general enactment passed subsequently and making no mention of any such intention, to have intended to derogate from that which, by their own special act, they have thus carefully supervised and regulated. Where there are two acts or provisions, one of which is special and particular, and certainly includes the matter in question, and the other general, which, if standing alone, would include the same matter and thus conflict with the special act or provision, the special must be taken as intended to constitute an exception to the general act (Woodworth v. Kalamazoo, 135 Mich. 233, 97 N. The element of repugnancy between the provisions in a general statute and one that is special or local ordinarily will furnish little or no aid in arriving at the intention of the legislature in the matter of repeal. the words of the general act, by the subject-matter with which the general act is concerned, by other legislation on the same matter, by the surrounding circumstances, by the purpose to be accomplished, or by anything else to which reference may properly be had for the purpose of discovering the legislative intent.[1] Thus where the clear general intent of the legislature is to establish a uniform system throughout the state, the presumption must be that local acts are intended to be repealed.[2] So also where an act is passed to carry into effect a general mandatory provision of the constitution, all acts inconsistent therewith, although local, are repealed.[3]

(b) Acts Relating to Municipal Corporations. The principle generalia specialibus non derogant is especially applicable to cases where general statutes are argued to overrule the provisions of special charters granted to municipal corporations, or special acts passed for their benefit.[5] Of course where the repugnancy between their provisions is so irreconcilable that no reasonable field of operation for either can be found without trenching on the ground covered by the other,[6] or where the manifest intention of the later enactment is to revise the whole matter covered by disconnected general and special enactments, to furnish a substitute for all, and to introduce a new and exclusive rule upon the subject,[7] the later general provision is to be regarded as repealing the inconsistent earlier one.

Where a local and special statute covers the entire ground, and constitutes a complete system of provisions and regulations, which the general statute, if allowed to operate, would alter, it is not to be deemed repealed, except the intent to repeal is clearly manifested. Thus the provisions of the Greater New York Charter, relating to the civil service of the new city, operated to establish a special system, and to take the city out of the operation of the general civil service law (Laws (1883), c. 354), and were not repealed or affected by Laws (1898), c. 186, amending the general law. Classification acts.— While a previous local statute is not repealed by a subsequent general statute inconsistent with it unless words of repeal are employed, yet such rule is not applicable to classification acts: (1) Because the legislative intent to repeal local laws is fully expressed in those acts. (2) Because those acts are of a character to exclude the operation of the rule, being intended to revise the laws relating to municipal affairs so as to reduce all former types and forms of municipal government to three, one for each class. (3) Because the very nature of class legislation renders the rule inapplicable. Com. v. Macferron, 152 Pa. St. 244, 25 Atl. 556, 19 L. R. A. 568.

Whenever the legislature passes an act and applies its provisions to the entire territory of a county, inconsistent provisions in the charter of an incorporated town within the county are repealed by implication. Glover v. State, 126 Ga. 594, 55 S. E. 592.

(3) Acts Relating to Particular Subjects — (a) In General. A subsequent statute which is general does not repeal or abrogate a former statute intended to operate upon particular subjects,[8] or for the benefit and relief of individuals.[9]

(b) Elections. An act, special in its nature, and applying only to a particular class of elections, is not repealed by a general election law, unless an intent so to do is plainly manifested.[10]

(c) Private Corporations. Where a special charter to a private corporation is followed by general legislation on the same subject, which does not in terms, or by necessary construction, repeal the particular grant, the two are to be deemed to stand together, one as the general law of the land, the other as the law of the particular case.[11] Where, however, the language of the general law evinces a purpose on the part of the legislature to have a uniform law upon the subject, provisions in a special charter inconsistent therewith are repealed.[12]

(d) Procedure. A special act providing a special or summary mode of procedure in a particular case is not affected by a subsequent general act relating to procedure, unless there is found in the subsequent act a direct indication of an intent to repeal such special act.[13]

(e) Public Officers. A special or local act relating to the election and term of office of certain officers of a particular county is not repealed by a general act relating to such county officers in general,[14] unless it was intended by the sub-

(E) Amended Act. Where a section of a statute is amended, and afterward such section, "as amended," is repealed, the original section, and not the amendment merely, is repealed.[23] But where a so-called amendatory act is in reality affirmative and original in its character, it will not be affected by the repeal of the original act.[24]

(F) Penal and Criminal Laws — (1) IN GENERAL. While it is the duty of the court, in construing two sections upon the same subject defining criminal offenses, to so construe them as to bring them in harmony, and make them both effective and operative, to the end that a remedy may be afforded for the evil sought to be suppressed,[25] yet, when they are irreconcilably in conflict, the earlier is repealed.[26] In order that two penal statutes may be repugnant, they must relate to the same subject; in other words, where each statute is directed against a distinct offense, there can be no repugnancy, and no repeal.[27] Furthermore it is necessary to the implication of a repeal that the objects of the two statutes be the same.[28]

(2) BY CHANGE IN GRADE OF OFFENSE. Where a statute expressly alters the grade of an offense, as by making it a misdemeanor instead of a felony, or vice versa, it operates to repeal by implication the former law on the subject.[29]

Thus if a special law refers to a general law, and the general law is afterward repealed, such repeal does not operate as a repeal of the special law. Schwenke v. Union Depot, etc., R. (3) By Change of Penalty. It has been held that a subsequent statute which adds accumulative penalties or institutes new methods of proceeding, without altering the class or character of the offense, does not, without negative words, repeal a former statute.[30] On the other hand it is a well-settled rule that where a statute prohibits a particular act, and imposes a penalty for doing it, and a subsequent statute imposes a different penalty for the same offense the latter statute operates by way of substitution and not cumulatively, and repeals the former,[31] and this whether the penalty is increased,[32] or diminished ;[33] the intention to inflict two punishments for the same offense not being imputable to the legislature.[34] Where the change is not in the nature of the penalty or its degree, but only in the locality where it may be inflicted, no repeal is effected.[35]

(4) By Statute Covering Whole Subject-Matter. An act intended to be a complete system of statutory laws relating to crimes and punishments supersedes or repeals all existing laws on that subject.[36]

repealed;[51] there being nothing that can conflict with a void statute.[52] So where an act expressly repealing another act and providing a substitute therefor is found to be invalid, the repealing clause must also be held to be invalid,[53] unless it shall appear that the legislature would have passed the repealing clause even if it had not provided a substitute for the act repealed.[54]

B. Suspension. The suspension of a statute means a temporary stop for a time.[55] The power of suspending laws cannot be exercised except by the legislature.[56]

C. Revival — 1. In General. There are two distinct modes of reviving statutes that have been repealed — the one by legislative enactment,[57] the other by operation of law, as when a repealing act is itself repealed.[58] The legislature may make the revival of an act depend upon a future event, and direct that event to be made known by proclamation.[59]

declared,[62] or necessarily to be implied from the enactment of provisions conflicting with those of the law which would otherwise be revived;[63] and it matters not whether the repeal in either case be by express language or by implication.[64] Where a repealing act is repealed before it becomes operative, the original act continues in force by virtue of its original enactment and not because of its revival.[65]

The rule itself rests upon the theory that each expression of the legislative mind represents the legislative intent at the time of that expression, and that the repealing statute indicates a change of the legislative purpose as expressed in the prior law; and therefore when the repealing statute is in turn repealed, without any reference to the preëxisting law, the presumption is that the legislature intended by the repeal to restore the order of things existing under the repealed statute. This provision applies not only to laws expressly repealed, but also to repeals by implication.[68] It applies, however, only to statutes repealing statutes, and not to statutes repealing the common law.[69] Again this rule applies only to cases of absolute repeal, and not to cases where the original act has been merely suspended,[70] amended,[71] or modified.[72]

b. By Repeal of Amendment or Revision. The rule above stated [73] can have no application in a case where the statute repeals absolutely a prior existing law, and substitutes for it another and more comprehensive scheme of legislation, which undertakes to deal with the whole subject to which the prior statute relates.[74] This canon of construction is not absolute, but will yield to a contrary intention apparent from the language employed or from statutes in pari materia.[75]

c. By Expiration of Temporary Act. When a statute professes to repeal absolutely a prior law, and substitutes other provisions on the same subject, which are limited only till a certain time, the prior law does not revive after the repealing statute is spent, unless the intention of the legislature to that effect be expressed.[76]

Act Cong. Feb. 25, 1871 (16 U. S. St. at L. 431), providing that "whenever an act shall be repealed, which repealed a former act, such former act shall not thereby be revived," has no reference to the legislation of a territory; said provision being part of an act prescribing the forms of acts and resolutions of congress and rules of their construction. An offense against a temporary statute cannot be punished after the expiration of the act, unless a particular provision be made

3. Necessity of Republishing Revived Act. In the absence of a constitutional provision to the contrary, revival of a repealed statute by reference to its title only is valid.[77] The state constitutions, however, usually provide that no act shall be revived by reference to its title only, but the act revived shall be republished at length.[78]

4. Effect of Revival. Where an act is revived by a subsequent act, it is revived precisely in that form and with that effect which it had at the time when it expired.[79]

5. Effect of Repeal of Statute of Revival. Where a statute, reviving a statute which has been repealed, is itself repealed, the statute which was revived stands as it did before the revival.[80]

VII. CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

A. Rules of Construction — 1 In General — a. Introductory Statement. By the construction of a statute is meant the process of ascertaining its true meaning and application.[81] For this purpose resort may be had not only to the language and arrangement of the statute,[82] but also to the intention of the legislature,[83] the object to be secured,[84] and to such extrinsic matters as the circumstances attending its passage,[85] the sense in which it was understood by contemporaries,[86] and its relation to other laws.[87]

b. Judicial Authority and Duty. The proper construction of a statute is a for that purpose. The Irresistible, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 551, 5 L. ed. 520.

Where there is no such express repeal, but a repeal by implication only, then it would seem that, if the legislature allow the second act to expire, it was their intention to revive the first. See U. S. v. Twenty-five Cases of Cloths, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,563, Crabbe 356.

Legal or doctrinal interpretation.— It is said to be either "legal," which rests on the same authority as the law itself, or "doctrinal," which rests upon its intrinsic reasonableness. Legal interpretation may be either "authentic," when it is expressly provided by the legislator, or "usual," when it is derived from unwritten practice. Doctrinal interpretation may turn on the meaning of words and sentences, when it is called "grammatical," or on the intention of the legislator, when it is described as "logical." When logical interpretation stretches the words of a statute to cover its obvious meaning, it is called "extensive"; when, on the other hand, it avoids giving full meaning to the words, in order not to go beyond the intention of the legislator, it is called "restrictive." Black L. Dict. [quoting Holland Jur. § 344]. See also 14 Cyc. 824.

question for the court,[88] and should not be submitted to the jury.[89] The courts, however, must confine themselves to the construction of the law as it is,[90] and not attempt to construe statutes before they take effect,[91] to supply defective legislation,[92] or otherwise amend or change the law under the guise of construction.[93] The wisdom or want of wisdom displayed in the act [94] is not a question for the courts, nor are the motives of the legislature in including or omitting certain provisions.[95] It is the duty of the court to endeavor to carry out the intention and policy of the legislature,[96] and therefore it will not declare a statute unconstitutional in whole or in part where it is reasonably susceptible of a construction giving it effect in all its parts.[97] The rules for the interpretation of statutes are the same in courts of equity as in courts of law.[98]

jury.[3] Where a foreign statute has been construed by the courts of the state or country where enacted, such construction will be followed by the courts of other states,[4] or countries,[5] and by the federal courts.[6] The rule, however, rests merely upon the principle of comity, and not upon the full faith and credit clause of the federal constitution;[7] nor will it be applied where the decisions of the state of enactment are in conflict with those of the United States supreme court.[8] Furthermore the opinions of text-writers and the evidence of persons skilled in the foreign law may be resorted to in construing the foreign statute.[9] Where a foreign statute has not been construed in the state of enactment, the courts of the state where the cause is on trial will construe it as they would a like statute of their own state.[10]

d. Statutory Rules and Provisions [11] — (i) In General. It is competent for the legislature to enact rules for the construction of statutes, present [12] or future,[13] and when it has done so, each succeeding legislature, unless a contrary intention is plainly manifested,[14] is supposed to employ words and frame enactments with reference to such rules. Such statutory rules of construction may be only declaratory of the common law,[15] or they may operate to change the common-law rules of construction. It is the duty of the courts to give such construing acts their practical application so far as possible,[16] but they will not be construed so as to revive laws that have been repealed.[17] Such acts of legislative construction are not binding upon the courts as to transactions occurring before their passage,[18] but as to matters occurring thereafter such legislation guides all departments of the government,[19] even though plainly contradictory to the act construed.[20] A common legislative provision is that all statutes shall be liberally construed,[21] and this has been generally held to apply to all except penal statutes,[22] and in some cases to include even penal statutes.[23]

(ii) Interpretation Clauses and Definitions in Statutes Construed. The legislature may define certain words used in the statute,[24] or declare in the body of the act the construction to be placed thereon,[25] and the

visions,[37] the duty devolves upon the court of ascertaining the true meaning.[38] If the intention of the legislature cannot be discovered, it is the duty of the court to give the statute a reasonable construction,[39] consistent with the general principles of law.[40]

b. Equitable Construction. By the equitable construction of statutes is meant a construction which extends a statute to a like case not within the words of the statute, but within its purpose,[41] or which prevents the operation of a statute upon a case within the words, but not within the purpose of the statute.[42] This principle of construction was formerly applied,[43] especially to early acts of parliament,[44] which were brief and general in their terms; but the doctrine of equitable construction has now been abandoned.[45]

c. Spirit or Letter of Law. Closely allied to the doctrine of the equitable construction of statutes, and in pursuance of the general object of enforcing the intention of the legislature, is the rule that the spirit or reason of the law will prevail over its letter.[46] Especially is this rule applicable where the literal mean-

57. State v. Peet, 80 Vt. 449, 68 Atl. 661, 130 Am. St. Rep. 998, 14 L. R. A. N. S. 677, holding that the purpose of a statute, in whatever language it may be framed, must

and the statute should be given that construction which is best calculated to advance its object,[58] by suppressing the mischief and securing the benefits intended.[59] For the purpose of determining the meaning, although not the validity,[60] of a statute, recourse may be had to considerations of public policy,[61] and to the established policy of the legislature as disclosed by a general course of legislation.[62] Ordinarily where the law-making power distinctly states its design, no place is left for construction;[63] but a legislative declaration that a law was intended to promote a certain purpose is not binding on the courts, and they have the power to inquire its real as distinguished from its ostensible purpose;[64] and where the purpose of a statute does not appear on its face, it is open to inquiry.[65] If the purpose and well ascertained object of a statute are inconsistent with the precise words,[66] the latter must yield to the controlling influence of the legislative will resulting from the whole act.

e. Effect and Consequences. It is the rule for which there is an abundance of authority that the mere fact that a certain construction of a statute will cause inconvenience[67] or failure of justice[68] will not affect the judicial determination of a case involving such a construction. But where the proper construction of a statute is otherwise doubtful,[69] arguments from the inconvenience,[70] absurdity,[71] plainly,[80] implied in a statute is as much a part of it as that which is expressed.[81] But a statute should not be extended beyond the fair and reasonable meaning of its terms [82] because of some supposed policy of the law, or because the legislature did not use proper words to express its meaning.[83] The grant of a specific power or the imposition of a definite duty confers by implication authority to do whatever is necessary to execute the power or perform the duty.[84] Where a statute deals with a genus, and the thing which afterward comes into existence is a species thereof, the language of the statute will generally be extended to the new species,[85] although it was not known and could not have been contemplated by the legislature when the act was passed; but where the statute shows plainly that the word is not used as describing the whole genus put forward as the one applicable to the case, but only some particular species thereof, the rule has no application.[86]

g. Matters Omitted.[87] Where a statute is incomplete or defective,[88] whether as a result of inadvertence,[89] or because the case in question was not foreseen or contemplated,[90] it is beyond the province of the courts to supply the omissions,[91] even though as a result the statute is a nullity.[92] But where the ordinary interpretation of a statute leads to consequences so dangerous and absurd that they could never have been intended, the court may adopt a construction from analogous provisions, and thus supply an omission.[93] Where a statute prescribes the ascertaining the intention of the legislature,[3] if more than one significance may reasonably be attached to the language used,[4] or a literal construction will make the act absurd,[5] or will lead to injustice,[6] the court may properly resort to construction.[7]

b. Different Languages and Translations. Before the admission of Louisiana into the Union in 1812, the laws of the territory were passed and promulgated both in English and in French, and each text was entitled to equal respect.[8] But by

There is no room for interpretation of a statute where the language leaves no doubt as to its meaning.— Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87; King v. Armstrong, 9 Cal. App. 368, 99 Pac. 527.

The use of a word in one sense in one clause of a constitution of a state is no evidence that it is used in the same sense in every other clause, and where it is used in but one sense throughout the constitution it does not follow that the legislature used it in the sense in statutes subsequently enacted. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Gaines, 3 Fed. 266, 2 Flipp. 621.

But when it appears that the framers have used a word in a particular sense generally in the act, it will be presumed that it was intended to be used in the same sense throughout the act, unless the intention to give it a different signification plainly appears in the particular part of the act alleged to be an exception to the general meaning indicated. Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650.

Custom or usage cannot override the language of the statute.— U. S. v. Pine River Logging, etc., Co., 89 Fed. 907, 32 C. C. A. 406 (holding that a custom or usage, if ever admissible to affect the construction of an act of congress, by altering the ordinary meaning of ordinary words or phrases, must be shown to have been so prevalent in all sections where the law was to become operative, and so universal in such sections, as to leave no room for doubt that it was known to the law-makers, and that the statute was enacted with reference thereto); Love v. Hinckley, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,548, Abb. Adm. 436.

3. Alabama.— Favers v. Glass, 22 Ala. 621, 58 Am. Dec. 272, holding that a word which has two significations should ordinarily receive that meaning which is generally attached to it in the community; but when this construction would contravene the manifest intention of the legislature, this rule will be disregarded and effect given to the intention.

Illinois.— Chicago v. Green, 238 Ill. 258, 87 N. E. 417, holding that the meaning of a statute is to be discovered by construing words, not necessarily in their primary sense, but in the sense in which they were intended to be used.

the first constitution, adopted in 1812, it was provided that laws should be enacted in English, and the English text of statutes adopted since that time has been the law.[9] Since 1812 the French text of laws passed before that date has been entitled to great respect,[10] but if it cannot be reconciled with the English the latter must prevail.[11] In Quebec the English and French versions of the statutes are of equal authority,[12] and are interpreted as one and the same enactment.[13] Where a statute has first been enacted in a foreign language and afterward translated into English,[14] its history will be considered in giving it a construction.

c. Rules of Grammar. The ordinary rules of grammar will be applied for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of a statute,[15] but, after all, they are only rules of construction, and will yield to the clearly disclosed legislative intent.[16]

d. Punctuation. While punctuation, including quotation marks, brackets, etc., is subordinate to the text and can never control the plain meaning of a statute,[17]

as two laws on the same subject, and construed together."

The two texts were considered as parts of a whole, and not as distinct acts. State v. Moore, 8 Rob. (La.) 518; State v. Dupuy, 2 Mart. (La.) 177.

Where the French expressions were more comprehensive than those in English, or vice versa, the more enlarged sense was taken, as thus full effect was given to both texts. Chretien v. Theard, 2 Mart. N. S. (La.) 582; Hudson v. Grieve, 1 Mart. (La.) 143.

(2) If the variance occurs in a statute changing the law, the ordinary rules of legal interpretation will be applied to determine the intention of the legislature. it is nevertheless proper, in case of doubt, that punctuation, etc., should operate as an aid in the construction and interpretation of the statute.[18]

e. Existence of Ambiguity.[19] An ambiguity exists in a statute where it is susceptible of two or more different meanings or applications without doing violence to its terms.[20]

f. Technical Terms. Terms of art, or technical words and phrases [21] used in a statute, and such others as may have acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning in the law,[22] must be interpreted in accordance with their received meaning and acceptation with the learned in the art, trade, or profession to which they belong, unless it clearly appears from the context, or otherwise, that it was the intention of the legislature to use them in a different sense.[23]

g. Associated Words. In accordance with the maxim, noscitur a sociis,[24] the meaning of a word used in a statute must be construed in connection with the words with which it is associated.[25] Where several words are connected by a copulative conjunction, they are presumed to be of the same class,[26] unless a contrary intention appears.[27]

h. General and Specific Words [28] — (i) In General. General words in a statute should receive a general construction;[29] but they must be understood ness. They designate much more distinctly than by the use of commas the character of the clause which is included."

as used in reference to the subject-matter in the mind of the legislature, and strictly limited to it,[30] and should also be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice,[31] oppression, or an absurd consequence.[32] So words of general import in a statute are limited by words of restricted import immediately following and relating to the same subject.[33] It is generally true that a statute which treats of things or persons of an inferior degree cannot by general words be extended to those of a superior degree; [34] but when all those of an inferior degree are embraced by the express words used, and there are still general words, they must be applied to things of a higher degree than those enumerated.[35]

(II) Doctrine of Ejusdem Generis. By the rule of construction known as "ejusdem generis," where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes of persons or things, the general words will be construed as applicable only to persons or things of the same general nature or class as those enumerated.[36]

Authority to do "all other acts as natural persons," in the charter of a corporation fol-

The particular words are presumed to describe certain species and the general words to be used for the purpose of including other species of the same genus.[37] The rule is based on the obvious reason that if the legislature had intended the general words to be used in their unrestricted sense they would have made no mention of the particular classes.[38] The words "other" or "any other" following an enumeration of particular classes are therefore to be read as "other such like," [39] and to include only others of like kind or character.[40] The doctrine

42. Alabama.— Martin v. State, 156 Ala. 89, 47 So. 104, holding that the rule is not to be applied to a statute relating to the jurisdiction of the offense of assaults in which no "stick or other weapon" is used, since a "stick" is not technically a "weapon," although the statute manifestly intended it as such; and therefore the phrase "or other weapon" will not be restricted either to a weapon in a technical sense or to what may be commonly termed a weapon, but, as employed, includes any substance or matter foreign to the person used in committing an assault and battery.

the doctrine apply where the specific words of a statute signify subjects greatly different from one another;[43] nor where the specific words embrace all objects of their class, so that the general words must bear a different meaning from the specific words or be meaningless.[44]

i. Express Mention and Implied Exclusion.[45] In accordance with the maxim, "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," [46] where a statute enumerates the things upon which it is to operate,[47] or forbids certain things,[48] it is to be construed as excluding from its effect all those not expressly mentioned. And where it directs the performance of certain things in a particular manner, it forbids by implication every other manner of performance.[49] So where it prescribes certain conditions, compliance with which are necessary to the existence of a right, no other conditions need be fulfilled.[50] But the maxim should be applied only as a means of discovering the legislative intent,[51] and should never be permitted to defeat the plainly indicated purpose of the legislature.[52] Nor will it generally exclude the application of the statute to things of the same class as those expressly mentioned which have come into existence since the passage of the statute.[53]

j. Relative and Qualifying Terms and Their Relation to Antecedents. By what is known as the doctrine of the "last antecedent," relative and qualifying words, phrases, and clauses are to be applied to the words or phrase immediately preceding,[54] and are not to be construed as extending to [55] or including [56] others more remote, unless such extension is clearly required by a consideration of the entire act.[57]

k. Conjunctive and Disjunctive Words. Whenever necessary to effectuate the obvious intention of the legislature,[58] conjunctive words may be construed as disjunctive,[59] and vice versa.[60]

l. Singular and Plural Words. When necessary to give effect to the legislative intent,[61] words in the plural number will be construed to include the singular,[62] and words importing the singular only will be applied to the plural of persons and things.[63]

Preceding section.— By statute in many states it is provided that the word "preceding," when used by way of reference to any section of a statute, or title of a code, shall proceeding,[14] property,[15] prosecuted,[16] qualified elector,[17] railroad,[18] reasonable cause to believe,[19] recovery,[20] regularly,[21] saloon,[22] section,[23] sell,[24] shall,[25] soil,[26] suit,[27] undue,[28] unsold,[29] wantonly,[30] widening,[31] wittingly,[32] and year.[33] The word "person," when used in a statute, will be construed to include not only natural persons,[34] but also corporations,[35] unless the context clearly indicates that it was used in the more limited sense.[36] But the word "person" does not ordinarily include within its meaning the government of the United States, or of a state, or foreign country,[37] although it has been construed to do so,[38] especially mean the section next preceding that in which the reference is made, unless some other section is expressly designated, or unless the context requires a different construction. c. Conflicting Provisions.[60] In the consideration of conflicting provisions in a statute, the great object to be kept in view is to ascertain the legislative intent,[61] and all particular rules for the construction of such provisions must be regarded as subservient to this end. In accordance with the well-settled principle that the last expression of the legislative will is the law, in case of conflicting provisions in the same statute,[62] or in different statutes,[63] the last enacted in point of time prevails; [64] and on the same principle, if both were enacted at the same time, the last in order of arrangement controls.[65] As a corollary to this latter rule, a proviso in an act repugnant to the purview thereof is not void, but stands as the last expression of the legislative will.[66] Where the conflict is between words and figures, the words will be given effect.[67] Where general terms or expressions in one part of a statute are inconsistent with more specific or particular provisions in another part,[68] the particular provisions will be given effect [69] as clearer and

d. Context and Related Clauses.[71] The words, phrases, and sentences of a statute are to be understood as used, not in any abstract sense,[72] but with due regard to the context,[73] and in that sense which best harmonizes with all other parts of the statute.[74] In expounding one part of a statute therefore resort should be had to every other part,[75] including even parts that are unconstitu-

and in the English colonies,[92] that, where the meaning of the body of the act is doubtful, reference may be had to the title to remove the ambiguity or to supply an omission.[93] Ordinarily, where the body of a statute is free from ambiguity, the meaning expressed therein must be given effect, without resort to the title;[94] and in no event should the language of the title be permitted to control expressions in the enacting clause in conflict therewith.[95] In the absence of constitutional limitations the body of the statute may be couched in far more general language than the title,[96] and may even deal with subjects not embraced in the title,[97] and yet all the provisions of the enacting clause must be given effect. But under the provisions of a number of the state constitutions,[98] requiring that every statute shall have but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, the operation and scope of the enacting clause is limited by the title.[99] For the purpose of explaining and clearing up ambiguities in the enacting clauses of statutes, reference may also be had to the headings of portions of statutes,[1] such as titles, articles, chapters, and sections, and for this purpose it has been held that a code or revision is to be regarded as one statute.[2] But, as in the case of titles,[3] neither

92. O'Connor v. Nova Scotia Tel. Co., 22 Can. Sup. Ct. 276, 292, in which Sedgwick, J., after referring to the "supposed" English rule, forbidding consideration of the title, continues: "I doubt whether as a matter of law there is at present any rule at all upon the subject. In none of the cases referred to in the text books has the existence or authority of the rule been the point to be determined. The assertion of the rule has been dicta and nothing more. There is this difference too between English and colonial statutes. In England the title of an act is a creation of modern growth; at one time acts were passed without it and there is even now no binding rule as to its character. Colonial legislatures have, on the other hand, always been under a constitutional obligation, by virtue of express instructions from the crown, to take care that no clause shall be inserted in any act foreign to what the title of it imports." act;[20] that some effect is to be given to each;[21] that no exceptions are to be made to general language;[22] and that whenever a power is given or duty imposed, everything necessary for the execution of the power or performance of the duty is conferred by implication.[23] Presumptions are also indulged against any retrospective operation,[24] and against any unjust[25] or absurd consequences;[26] against any purpose or object hostile to religion;[27] and against any intention of the legislature to abandon its rights[28] or to infringe those of the coördinate departments of government.[29] In the absence of proof to the contrary, the laws of other states will be presumed to be in accord with those of the state of the forum.[30]

6. Extrinsic Aids to Construction — a. In General. The statute itself furnishes the best means for its own exposition, and if the sense in which words were intended to be used can be clearly ascertained from all its parts and provisions, a resort to extrinsic facts is not permitted to ascertain the meaning.[31] But where, after a consideration of the language of the entire statute, there remains a doubt as to its meaning, reference may be had to extrinsic matters,[32] such as maps[33] and other documents,[34] referred to in the act, or used as the basis of the act,[35] the circumstances existing at the time of its enactment,[36] general facts of common knowledge,[37] other legislation on the same subject,[38] and the results that would follow different constructions.[39]

d. History and Passage of Act. Where the language of a statute is ambiguous, its meaning may frequently be ascertained by resort to the history of its passage through the legislature.[47] While the authentication of an enrolled bill by the signatures of the presiding officers of the two legislative houses is conclusive evidence of its enactment,[48] yet for the purpose of interpreting the legislative will resort may be had to the history of the statute as found in the journals of the two legislative bodies,[49] and also to the original bill with the amendments noted thereon.[50] As a general rule the debates in the legislature are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of a statute.[51] Both treaty with a foreign nation, a court cannot inquire whether, in passing such act, congress had or had not an intention to pass a law inconsistent with the provisions of the treaty.

e. Contemporaneous Construction[56] — (i) In General. Primarily it is the function and duty of the courts to interpret the meaning of a statute, and where they can ascertain the legislative intent by the use of intrinsic aids alone[57] resort to its contemporaneous construction by other persons is both unnecessary and improper. But where the language of the statute itself is ambiguous or uncertain, the opinions entertained by contemporaries as to its meaning are frequently the best guides to the legislative intent.[58]

(ii) Practical Construction or Usage.[59] On the principle of contemporaneous exposition, common usage and practice under the statute,[60] or a

with the passage of the original act, and has been long continued.[81] So a declaratory statute explaining and construing a prior act of the legislature is binding as to future transactions,[82] although, if deemed erroneous by the courts, such construction will not be given a retroactive effect.[83] A legislative construction in one act of the meaning of certain words is entitled to consideration in construing the same words in another act,[84] but is not conclusive, as the words may have been used in different senses.[85] After all it must be remembered that the courts are the final arbiters as to the proper construction of statutes; [86] and in discharging this important function, they are at liberty to disregard a legislative construction, which, in their judgment, is not a correct exposition of the original act.[87] So also a recital in a statute that a former statute has been repealed or superseded by former acts is not binding on the courts.[88]

the adoption of a different rule would cause great mischief.[90] And when a statute has been construed by the highest court having jurisdiction to pass on it, such construction is as much a part of the statute as if plainly written into it originally.[91]

f. Evidence to Aid Construction. The enrolled bill stands as the final expression of the legislative will,[92] and its terms may not be varied or contradicted by a reference to the legislative journals,[93] nor is the evidence of a member of the legislature [94] or of any other person [95] admissible as to the legislative intent. But evidence may be introduced to identify documents mentioned in the statute,[96] or to identify the subjects upon which it is to operate.[97] Where technical words, or terms of art, are used in a statute, the evidence of persons engaged in the profession, trade, or occupation to which they pertain [98] may be admitted for the purpose of interpreting their meaning. And upon a prosecution of persons for violation of a statute, evidence may be introduced of the customary method of complying with its requirements.[99] Where the construction of a statute of another state or country is involved, the decisions of the highest court of such foreign state or country may properly be admitted into evidence to resolve the doubt.[1]

7. Construction With Reference to Other Laws — a. In General. Every statute is to be construed with reference to the general system of laws of which it forms a part, and must therefore be interpreted in the light of the customary or unwritten law,[2] of other statutes on the same subject,[3] and of the decisions of the courts.[4]

b. Construction With Reference to Common Law.[5] Statutes are to be construed with reference to the principles of the common law in force at the time of their passage;[6] and words used in a statute which have a definite and settled meaning at common law are presumed to be employed in the same sense.[7] Where a statute is purely in affirmance of a rule of the common law, it is to be interpreted in accordance with the construction that has hitherto been placed upon the common law.[8] It naturally follows also that statutes are not to be understood as effecting any change in the law beyond that which is expressed,[9] or is necessarily implied from the language used.[10] The court must assume, however, that the legislature knew the existing law, and that its purpose in enacting the statute was to make some change in the former law.[11]

utes will be construed with reference to the civil law [12] in accordance with the principles stated above.

d. Construction With Reference to Other Statutes — (I) In General. All statutes are presumed to be enacted by the legislature with full knowledge of the existing condition of the law and with reference to it.[13] They are therefore to be construed as a part of a general and uniform system of jurisprudence,[14] and their meaning and effect is to be determined in connection, not only with the common law [15] and the constitution,[16] but also in connection with other statutes on the same subject,[17] and, under certain circumstances, with statutes on cognate [18] and even different subjects.[19] This rule of construction, however, so far as prior statutes are concerned, is to be restricted to cases where the statute in question is really doubtful; if the statute is clear on its face, prior statutes may not be consulted to create an ambiguity.[20] In the construction of private statutes the rule is more restricted, and resort may not be had to any other private act not relating to the same parties and the same subject-matter.[21] Where two statutes are in apparent conflict, they should be so construed, if reasonably possible, as to allow both to stand and to give force and effect to each.[22] So the meaning of doubtful words in one statute may be determined by reference to another in which the same words have been used in a more obvious sense;[23] although it does not necessarily follow that the words have the same meaning in the two statutes, as they may have been used in entirely different senses.[24] If it is not possible to reconcile inconsistent statutes, the dates of their enactment will be examined in determining the legislative intent, and effect given to the later one.[25]

(II) STATUTES RELATING TO SAME SUBJECT-MATTER.[26] Statutes in pari materia are those which relate to the same person or thing, or to the same class of persons or things.[27] In the construction of a particular statute, or in the interpretation of any of its provisions, all acts relating to the same subject,[28] or having the same general purpose,[29] should be read in connection with it,[30]

855, 47 So. 18, in which the court says: "The rule of construction in such cases is that if courts can by any fair, strict or liberal construction find for the two provisions a reasonable field of operation, without destroying their evident intent and meaning, preserving the force of both, and construing them together in harmony with the whole course of legislation upon the subject, it is their duty to do so."

27. United Soc. v. Eagle Bank, 7 Conn. 456, 469, in which the court gives the following definition: "Statutes are in pari materia, which relate to the same person or thing, or to the same class of persons or things. The word par must not be confounded with the term similis. It is used in opposition to it, as in the expression 'magis pares sunt quam similes'; intimating not likeness merely, but identity. It is a phrase applicable to the public statutes or general laws, made at different times, and in reference to the same subject."

An interpretation leading to such a result should not be adopted unless it be inevitable. But the canon of construction in such cases is that if the courts can by any fair, strict or liberal construction find for the two provisions a reasonable field of operation, without destroying their evident intent and meaning, preserving the force of both, and construing them together in harmony with the whole course of legislation upon the subject it is their duty to do so."

(III) STATUTES ADOPTED AT SAME SESSION.[46] The rule that statutes in pari materia should be construed together applies with peculiar force to statutes passed at the same session of the legislature;[47] it is to be presumed that such acts are imbued with the same spirit and actuated by the same policy,[48] and they are to be construed together as if parts of the same act.[49] They should be so construed, if possible, as to harmonize,[50] and force and effect should be given to the provisions of each;[51] if, however, they are necessarily inconsistent, a statute which deals with the common subject-matter in a minute and particular way will prevail over one of a more general nature;[52] and of two inconsistent statutes enacted at the same session, that will prevail which takes effect at the later date.[53]

(IV) GENERAL AND SPECIAL STATUTES.[54] Where there is one statute dealing with a subject in general and comprehensive terms and another dealing with a part of the same subject in a more minute and definite way the two should be read together and harmonized, if possible, with a view to giving effect to a consistent legislative policy;[55] but to the extent of any necessary repugnancy between them,[56] the special will prevail over the general statute.[57] Where the special statute is later, it will be regarded as an exception to, or qualification of, the prior general one;[58] and where the general act is later, the special will be construed as

(v) Reënactment of or Reference to Former Statute [61] — (A) In General. The legislature may extend or continue [62] an existing statute, or may reënact it, in whole [63] or in part.[64] So a statute may adopt a part or all of another statute by a specific and descriptive reference thereto, and the effect is the same as if the statute or part thereof adopted had been written into the adopting statute.[65] Where, however, the adopted statute is referred to merely by words describing its general character, only those parts of it which are of a general nature,[66] or particularly relate to the subject of the adopting statute,[67] will be construed as incorporated into the latter in the absence of a clear intention to adopt the whole act. As a rule the adoption of a statute by reference is construed as an adoption of the law as it existed at the time the adopting statute was passed,[68] and therefore is not affected by any subsequent modification [69] or struction,[83] it is presumed to have intended that such provision should be understood and applied in accordance with that construction. This rule of construction, however, while recognized by all the courts,[84] is subject to a number of limitations.[85] The construction placed upon the statute by courts of the state from which it was adopted is regarded as persuasive, and indeed as entitled to very great weight,[86] with the courts of the adopting state, but not as conclusive;[87] and it will not be applied where it would be inconsistent with the constitution of the adopting state,[88] or contrary to the spirit and policy of its laws,[89] or is regarded as unsound in principle and against the weight of authority.[90]

A. 128 (holding that "this court will not blindly follow the construction given a particular statute by the court of a state from which we borrowed it, when the decision does not appeal to us as founded on right reasoning"); Rhea v. State, 63 Nebr. 461, 88 N. W. 789; Morgan v. State, 51 Nebr. 672, 71 N. W. 788 (holding that the construction of the statute by the courts of the state from which it was adopted will not be followed where such construction is un-

So the presumption does not arise where the statute differs materially from that of the state from which it was adopted; [91] nor where the judicial construction of the statute in the state where first enacted was not known at the time of its adoption in the other state; [92] nor where other jurisdictions having the identical or substantially the same provision had given the language a different construction prior to the adoption in question.[93] Indeed in a few cases the courts have gone so far as to declare that a statute adopted from another jurisdiction stands upon the same footing and is subject to the same rules of construction as other legislative enactments.[94] It is the construction of the statute which prevailed in the original state at the time of its adoption by the other state that is presumed to follow the statute; [95] and subsequent decisions of the original state have no more weight in the adopting state than that to which they are entitled by reason of their intrinsic merit.[96] That a statute is almost a literal copy of an earlier statute of a sister state is persuasive evidence of a practical reënactment of the statute of the sister state,[97] unless it also appears that earlier statutes substantially similar have also been enacted in other states.[98]

8. Construction as Mandatory or Directory [99] — a. In General. A mandatory provision in a statute is one, the omission to follow which renders the proceeding to which it relates illegal and void,[1] while a directory provision is one the observance of which is not necessary to the validity of the proceeding.[2] Whether a particular statute is mandatory or directory does not depend upon its form,[3] but upon the intention of the legislature, to be ascertained from a consideration of the entire act, its nature, its object, and the consequences that would result from construing it one way or the other.[4] In the application of subsidiary rules for the determination of the legislative intent in this respect there is no small confusion in the decisions,[5] but the following rules have been recognized as established. A provision of course is mandatory which is declared by the statute itself to be so.[6] When a particular provision of a statute relates to some immaterial matter, as to which compliance with the statute is a matter of convenience rather than substance,[7] or where the directions of a statute are given merely with a view to the proper, orderly, and prompt conduct of business,[8] the provision may generally be regarded as directory.[9] When a fair interpretation of a statute, which directs acts or proceedings to be done in a certain way, shows that the legislature intended a compliance with such provision to be essential to the validity of the act or proceeding,[10] or when some antecedent and prerequisite conditions must exist prior to the exercise of power,[11] or must be performed before certain other powers can be exercised,[12] then the statute must be regarded as mandatory.[13] When the statutory provision relates to acts or proceedings immaterial in themselves, but contains negative [14] or exclusive [15] terms, either expressed or implied,[16] then such negative or exclusive terms clearly indicate a legislative intent to impose a limitation, and therefore the statute becomes imperative, and requires strict performance in the manner prescribed.[17] Statutes which confer upon a public body or officer power to act for the sake of justice,[18] or which clothe a public body or officer with power to perform acts which concern the public interests [19] or the rights of individuals,[20] although the language is permissive merely,[21] will be construed as imposing duties rather than conferring privileges,[22] and will therefore be regarded as mandatory; but if they are purely enabling in character, simply making that legal and possible which otherwise there would be no authority to do,[23] they will not be construed to impose a duty to perform the acts authorized.

A statute specifying a time within which a public officer is to perform an official act regarding the rights and duties of others is directory merely,[24] unless the nature of the act to be performed,[25] or the phraseology of the statute,[26] or of other statutes relating to the same subject-matter, is such that the designation of time must be considered a limitation upon the power of the officer; but under statutes conferring privileges upon private individuals for a certain period of time, such privileges cannot be exercised after the lapse of the time allowed.[27]

b. Construction of Particular Language. As a general rule the word "may," when used in a statute, is permissive only[28] and operates to confer discretion,[29] while the words "shall"[30] and "must"[31] are imperative, operating to impose a duty which may be enforced. These words, however, are constantly used in statutes without regard to their literal meaning;[32] and in each case are to be given that effect which is necessary to carry out the intention of the legislature as determined by the ordinary rules of construction.[33] Thus the word "may" should be construed to be mandatory[34] whenever the public[35] or individuals [36] have a claim de jure that the power conferred should be exercised, or whenever something is directed to be done for the sake of justice or the public good; [37] but never for the purpose of creating a right.[38] So the word "shall" is to be construed as merely permissive [39] where no public benefit or private right requires it to be given an imperative meaning. Even "must" has been construed as merely directory,[40] where, from a construction of the entire statute and the object to be accomplished by it, such appears to have been the intention of the legislature. The words "it shall be lawful" are, according to their ordinary and natural meaning, permissive and enabling words only,[41] but will be construed as imposing a duty to exercise the power authorized whenever such construction is required for the enforcement of the rights of the public or of individuals.[42] The expression "shall and may" is ordinarily to be construed as mandatory,[43] but may be treated as merely directory where this clearly appears to be the legislative intent.[44] So likewise such expressions as "authorized and empowered," [45] and "shall have power" [46] are to be construed as mandatory or permissive in accordance with the legislative intent manifested in the particular act.

modifying the enacting clause, or of excepting something from its operation which otherwise would have been within it,[49] or of excluding some possible ground of misinterpretation of it,[50] as by extending it to cases not intended by the legislature to be brought within its purview. The proviso is generally introduced by the word "provided," but its existence and effect are to be determined rather by its matter and substance than by its form.[51] It should be construed together with the enacting clause,[52] with a view to giving effect to each [53] and to carrying out the intention of the legislature as manifested in the entire act.[54] The enacting clause is of course the principal part of the statute, and, as its terms may be presumed to have embodied the main object of the act, the proviso should be strictly construed.[55] The appropriate office of the proviso is to restrain or modify the enacting clause,[56] and not to enlarge it; [57] but where from the language employed

it is apparent that the legislature intended a more comprehensive meaning, it must be construed to enlarge the scope of the act,[58] or to assume the function of an independent enactment.[59] So the operation of a proviso is usually and properly confined to the clause or provision immediately preceding;[60] yet, where necessary to effectuate the legislative intent, it will be construed as applying also to other preceding[61] or subsequent sections[62] or to the entire act.[63] Where the proviso is entirely contradictory and repugnant to the enacting clause it has been declared void,[64] and the statute has been construed as if it contained no such clause; but in the case of only a partial inconsistency which cannot be harmonized, the proviso, as the later expression of the legislative will, prevails to the extent of the inconsistency.[65]

by express words in the enacting clause,[66] while a proviso follows the enacting clause and operates to defeat its operation conditionally.[67] A saving clause contains an exception of special things out of the general things mentioned in the statute,[68] and its most common use is in repealing statutes for the purpose of saving from their operation rights accrued,[69] duties imposed, penalties incurred,[70] and proceedings commenced.[71] Both exceptions [72] and saving clauses,[73] where directly repugnant to the purview of the act, are void.

is fairly strong in the case of an isolated, independent amendment,[86] but is of little force in the case of amendments adopted in a general revision or codification of the laws,[87] as in such case the change of phraseology may be due to a rearrangement of the statutes or to a desire to improve the style.[88]

b. Revisions and Codes.[89] A general revision or code is intended to contain all the statute law of a public nature in force in the jurisdiction at the time of its adoption.[90] It is compiled by collecting separate statutes, and by altering them as deemed advisable, and is intended as a substitute for all the public statutes in force before its adoption.[91] When the meaning of the language of the revision is plain and unambiguous, no recourse may be had to the original statutes to see if errors were committed in the revision;[92] but wherever necessary to construe doubtful language in the revision, the original acts may be consulted to determine the meaning intended.[93] In such cases also reference may be had to the report has been employed in vain, the section last adopted will prevail.[9] A mere change of phraseology in the incorporation of a statute in a general revision will not be regarded as altering the law,[10] unless it is clear that such was the intent,[11] such changes being frequently made on account of a difference in arrangement and a desire to improve the style.[12] In the adoption of the code, the legislature is presumed to have known the judicial construction which had been placed on the former statutes; and therefore the reënactment in the code of provisions substantially the same as those contained in the former statutes is a legislative adoption of their known judicial construction.[13] So where the legislature has revised a statute after a constitution has been adopted, such a revision is to be regarded as a legislative construction that the statute so revised conforms to the constitution.[14] A code is usually divided, for the sake of clearness and convenience of reference, into chapters,[15] titles,[16] articles, or sections, and the arrangement is entitled to some consideration in determining the construction of each division; but not to a controlling effect,[17] as the arrangement is not necessarily an accurate

17. Hooker v. Creager, 84 Md. 195, 35 Atl. 967, 1103, 36 Atl. 359, 35 L. R. or proper one, and sections grouped together may bear no relation to each other,[18] or widely separated sections may deal with the same subject and require construction with reference to each other.[19]

c. Repealing Acts.[20] Acts of the legislature, or parts of legislative acts, purporting to repeal prior statutes, are subject to the same rules of construction and interpretation as are applicable to other statutes,[21] and the courts should endeavor to give them just the effect that was intended by the legislature enacting them.[22] Where a statute is repealed, it must be considered as if it had never existed,[23]

The mere fact that acts are incorporated into a revision of the statutes, and the sections given new numbers by the revisers, does not change the force or effect of the acts. New York.— McCrea v. Champlain, 35 N. Y. App. Div. 89, 55 N. Y. Suppl. 125, holding that a proceeding begun under a statute prescribing a method for condemning lands for a village water float is not an "accrued right" under the terms of the general saving clause.

North Carolina.—Wilmington v. Cronly, 122 N. C. 383, 388, 30 S. E. 9, holding that an action to recover arrearages of taxes is an action for the recovery of rights accrued under the terms of a saving clause.

See 44 Cent. Dig. tit. "Statutes," § 313.

When right accrues.— Cushman v. Hale, 68 Vt. 444, 35 Atl. 382, holding that under a statute providing that a certain percentage of the fines mentioned should go to the prosecuting officer, his right to them had not accrued pending an appeal from the decision imposing the fines, and was therefore defeated by a repeal of the statute.

The privilege of renewing a license for mining permitted under the repealed act is not an "accrued right." Reynolds v. Atty.-Gen., [1896] A. C. 240, 65 L. J. P. C. 16, 74 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108.

Missouri.— Monett v. Hall, 128 Mo. App. 79, 106 S. W. 579, holding that the repeal of an ordinance imposing a penalty for its violation, pending a prosecution for the penalty, does not abate the action where the repealing ordinance provides that actions pending shall remain unaffected thereby.

New York.— Champlain v. McCrea, 165 N. Y. 264, 59 N. E. 83 [reversing 33 N. Y. App. Div. 259, 53 N. Y. Suppl. 1096]; Geneva, etc., R. Co. v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co.,

or by virtue of the statute repealed, shall not be affected by the repeal thereof. In some jurisdictions it has been held that general saving clauses do not apply to repealing statutes having a specific saving clause,[33] while in others they have been construed to supplement the saving clauses in special statutes.[34] Such general saving clauses are not invalid as applied to repealing laws passed subsequent to them, on the ground that they attempt to bind future legislatures,[35] as such legislatures, in passing statutes, are presumed to act with knowledge of previously existing laws.

11. Construction as Including or Binding Government.[36] The state, or the public, is not to be considered as within the purview of a statute, however general and comprehensive the language of such act may be,[37] unless expressly named

App. 579 [reversing 24 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 209]; Reg. v. Kerr, 26 U. C. C. P. 214 (holding that the laying of an information and arrest of the prisoners before the passage of a repealing act is sufficient to bring a prosecution within a saving clause as regards proceedings commenced and pending, although indictment was not found until after the passage of the repealing act); McDonald v. McDonell, 24 U. C. Q. B. 424 (holding that where a statute allowing three years for redemption before the sheriff can convey under a sale for taxes is repealed by a subsequent statute, except in so far as it might affect "any rates or taxes of the present year," "or any rates or taxes not otherwise provided for by this act," the sheriff could not convey to a purchaser who had bought at a sale under the former law, but less than three years before its repeal, although such a result was clearly not intended). And to the same effect see Re United Presb. Cong., 6 Ont. Pr. 129 (holding that a repealing act "saving any rights, proceedings, or things legally had, acquired or done under the said Acts, or any of them," preserved to rights, proceedings, and things completely had, acquired, or done, the efficiency which they had under the act repealed, but did not continue the repealed act for the purpose of perfecting rights, proceedings, or things not completely had, acquired, or done); McDougall v. McMillan, 25 U. "Pending actions."—An action to foreclose a mortgage on land, and to recover a judgment for a deficiency, in which a decree has been rendered ordering a sale, and holding defendants personally liable for any deficiency, is a "pending action" for the recovery of a personal judgment, within the meaning of Comp. St. (1899) c. 88, § 2, providing that the repeal of a statute shall not affect a "pending action." Hanscom v. Meyer, 61 Nebr. 798, 86 N. W. 381. The words "suit" and "civil cause" as used in Vt. St. §§ 28, 29, relating to the effect of the repeal of a statute on actions then pending, do not include proceedings before a board of railroad commissioners, whose functions are merely administrative or ministerial, and whose decision is final. Burlington v. Burlington Traction Co., 70 Vt. 491, 41 Atl. 514.

Defenses.— Fowler v. Vail, 4 Ont. therein,[38] or included by necessary implication.[39] This general doctrine applies with especial force to statutes by which prerogatives, rights, titles, or interests of the state would be divested;[40] but has been declared not to apply to statutes made for the public good, the advancement of religion and justice, and the prevention of injury and wrong.[41]

12. Effect of Statutes as Evidence.[42] Recitals in public statutes of matters of fact are admissible in evidence upon an issue as to such facts;[43] and, while such recitals in private statutes are not admissible in suits involving the rights of third parties,[44] they are admissible as between the state and the parties at whose instance the acts were passed,[45] and are particularly strong as evidence against such parties. Such recitals, however, whether in public[46] or private[47] statutes, are not conclusive even between the parties affected, or binding on the courts.[48]

3. Statutes in Derogation of Sovereignty.[91] Statutes in derogation of sovereignty, such as statutes containing exemptions from taxation,[92] or other public burdens, conferring sovereign powers upon corporations,[93] or allowing suits against the state, or its representative,[94] should be construed strictly in favor of the state, and should not be permitted to divest the state or its government of any of its prerogatives, rights, or remedies,[95] unless the intention of the legislature to effect this object is clearly expressed in the statute.

4. Legislative Grants.[96] As a general rule, legislative grants of property,[97] rights,[98] or privileges[99] must be construed strictly in favor of the public; and whatever is not granted in clear and explicit terms is withheld.[1] The rule is especially applicable to gratuitous grants made at the instance of the parties benefited,[2] and to grants of corporate franchises and privileges.[3] It must always be remembered, however, that a legislative grant is a form of statute, and, like all other statutes,[4] must be construed in accordance with the cardinal rule of ascertaining and enforcing the intention of the legislature.[5] Where this intention is obviously to deal liberally with the grantee, the terms of the statute should receive a fair and liberal interpretation; and this is especially true where it appears that the grant flows, not from the solicitation of the grantee, but from the government's own motion,[6] or where the state receives a valuable consideration therefor.[7] Where the legislature makes a grant of power to a municipal or public service corporation,[8] to any department or officer of the government,[9] or to any other public body,[10] such grant includes all powers that are necessary or incidental to the exercise of those expressly granted;[11] but such statutes are not to be construed to authorize anything that constitutes a nuisance,[12] unless it appears from express words or by necessary implication that the act is permitted notwithstanding its tending to the creation of a nuisance.[13]

Penal statutes can have no operation outside the state enacting them, nor be enforced in any other jurisdiction. Kennealy v. Leary, 67 N. J. L. 435, 51 Atl. 475.

Statutes punishing misdemeanors will usually be construed with less strictness than those punishing a higher grade of offenses. McGowan v. State, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 184 (holding that a statute passed at a time when all kinds of gaming were punished as misdemeanors authorizing the courts to construe all acts against gaming remedially is not applicable to a subsequent statute making certain kinds of gaming felonies); Randolph v. State, 9 Tex. 521.

Accumulative penalties.—As a general rule penal statutes will be so construed as to permit the recovery of but one penalty for all acts prior to the bringing of the action in order to work exemption from their penalties.[47] Such statutes are to be interpreted by the aid of all the ordinary rules for the construction of statutes, and with the cardinal object of ascertaining the intention of the legislature.[48] But, (Fisher v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 46 N. Y. 644; Sturgis v. Spofford, 45 N. Y. 446; Washburn v. McInroy, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 134; Parks v. Nashville, etc., R. Co., 13 Lea (Tenn.) 1, 49 Am. Indiana.— State v. Goodwin, 169 Ind. 265, 82 N. E. 459, holding that while the rule of strict construction applies generally to criminal statutes, the excessively strict construction that formerly prevailed has been so modified as to look to the legislative intent when plainly manifested; courts, on the one hand, refusing to hold those not clearly brought within the scope of the statute, and, on the other hand, refusing, by radical refinement or unreasonable, incongruous construction, to discharge those plainly within its scope.

Maine.— State v. J. P. Bass Pub. Co., 104 Me. 288, 71 Atl. 894, 20 L. R. A. N. S. 495.

New Hampshire.— Pike v. Jenkins, 12 N. H. 255, holding that courts are not to narrow the construction of penal statutes, but are to give effect, as near as may be, to the plain meaning of words; and, where they are doubtful, are to adopt the sense that best harmonizes with the context, and the apparent policy and objects of the legislature.

Ct. 94, 44 L. ed. 156 [affirming 77 Fed. 966, 23 C. C. A. 594] (holding that if the language of a penal statute is plain, it will be construed as it reads, and the words of the statute given their full meaning; if ambiguous, the court will lean more strongly in favor of defendant than it would if the statute were remedial); U. S. v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. 385, 18 L. ed. 830; U. S. v. Briggs, 9 How. 351, 13 L. ed. 170 (holding that where

if the acts alleged do not come clearly within the prohibition of the statute, its scope will not be extended to include other offenses than those which are clearly described and provided for;[49] and if there is a fair doubt as to whether the act charged is embraced in the prohibition, that doubt is to be resolved in favor of defendant.[50] So they will be construed to refer solely to the commission of acts the words of the enacting clause of a statute, even a penal statute, are more general than the title, the enacting clause governs); The Emily, 9 Wheat. 381, 6 L. ed. 116; U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76, 5 L. ed. 37; U. S. v. Williams, 159 Fed. 310 (holding that while penal statutes must be strictly construed, yet, if the act comes within the spirit and within the reasonable interpretation of the letter of the statute, it is sufficient, although there may be a literal interpretation that might be put on the statute which would not include the case); U. S. v. Lonabaugh, 158 Fed. 314; McInerney v. U. S., 143 Fed. 729, 74 C. C. A. 655; Peonage Cases, 123 Fed. 671 (holding that statutes imposing penalties for the invasion of the rights of the citizen in order to protect him in his liberty and happiness are not subjects of disfavor in the law, and are not construed with the same strictness or on the same footing as those which regulate or restrain the exercise of a natural right or forbid the doing of things not intrinsically wrong); Bryant v. U. S., 105 Fed. 941, 45 C. C. A. 145; Missouri v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 32 Fed. 722; In re Coy, 31 Fed. 794; The Harriet, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,099, 1 Story 251 [affirming 11 Fed. Cas. No. 14,473, 2 Abb. 129, 35 Ga. 344 (holding that even in determining the construction of a statute authorizing a confiscation of property for an offense by its owner, words are not to be confined to a strict technical sense, when so doing will clearly defeat the evident intent of the statute); U. S. v. Winn, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,740, 3 Sumn. 209 (holding that in the construction of penal statutes, the proper course is to search out and follow the true intent of the legislature, and to adopt that sense which harmonizes best with the context, and promotes in the fullest manner the apparent policy and objects of the legislature).

law rule requiring penal statutes to be strictly construed has been abolished by statute,[56] and in such jurisdictions they must be construed in accordance with the same principles as other statutes with a view to carrying out the intention of the legislature.[57]

8. Statutes Relating to Remedies and Procedure[58] — a. In General. As a general rule, statutes relating to remedies and procedure are to be construed liberally with a view to the effective administration of justice;[59] and this is especially true of statutes designed to render the methods of procedure more simple and convenient.[60] So statutes extending the right of appeal are remedial and should be liberally construed.[61] But the burden is on plaintiff to show the jurisdiction of the court,[62] and to prove every fact necessary to entitle him to the remedy provided.[63] And statutes which take away, change, or diminish fundamental rights,[64] statutory remedies for rights unknown to the common law,[65] and statutes which provide new and extraordinary remedies[66] must be construed

(holding that where it does not clearly appear from the statute whether the penalty is to be recovered in a summary way or by the ordinary mode of proceeding, the latter method must be adopted); De la Garza v. Booth, 28 Tex. 478, 91 Am. Under such a provision in Oklahoma (Wilson Rev. & Annot St. (1903) § 5144) all laws must be liberally construed in furtherance of justice (Morris v. Territory, 1 Okla. Cr. 617, 99 Pac. 760, 101 Pac. 111); but if there is a well-founded doubt as to an act being a public offense, especially one not malum in se, it should not be declared such (McCord v. State, (Cr. strictly, both as to the cases embraced within their terms and as to the methods to be pursued.[67]

b. Summary Proceedings.[68] All statutes authorizing summary proceedings must be strictly construed,[69] and strict conformity to the statute, in the exercise of the jurisdiction it confers, is essential to the regularity and validity of the proceeding.[70]

9. Revenue Laws.[71] As a general rule, revenue laws, such as laws imposing taxes and licenses,[72] are neither remedial laws, nor laws founded upon any permanent public policy;[73] but, on the contrary, operate to impose burdens upon the public, or to restrict them in the enjoyment of their property and the pursuit of their occupations,[74] and are therefore construed strictly.[75] The provisions of such statutes are not to be extended beyond the clear import of the language used;[76] in order to sustain the tax, it must come clearly within the letter of the statute,[77] and the powers granted to officers charged with its execution must be strictly pursued.[78] So, statutes creating forfeitures, or authorizing sales of property [79] for non-payment of taxes, must be construed strictly in favor of the citizen, and provisions allowing redemption from such sales should be construed liberally in his favor.[80] The doctrine of the strict construction of revenue statutes, however, should be applied with due regard to the intention of the legislature as expressed in the statute, and with a view to promoting the object of the statute; [81] and especially those provisions of the statute which are intended to prevent fraud should receive a liberal construction.[82] In pursuance of the beneficent public policy which favors equality in the distribution of the burdens of government, all exemptions of persons or property from taxation are to be construed strictly against the exemption; [83] the intention to create exemptions must affirmatively appear and cannot be raised by implication.[84]

10. Special or Local Laws.[85] Special or local statutes are usually passed at the instance of parties interested, and for the benefit of particular persons or localities, rather than for the general welfare, and are therefore to be construed strictly, both as to the extent of the territory in which they are operative [86] and also as to the powers granted by them.[87]

95. Ross v. New England Mortg. Security Co., 101 Ala. 362, 13 So. 564; Andrews v. St. Louis Tunnel Co., 16 Mo. App. 299; Eliot v. Cranston, 10 R. I. 88; Day v. McGinnis, 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 310, holding that under the code, section 162, providing that no general law shall go into operation or have any binding effect until the expiration of forty days after the adjournment without day, unless otherwise provided in the act itself, an adjournment to a day certain to hold a special session does not put acts passed in operation until forty days from the end of the latter session.

Constitutional and statutory provisions in regard to the procedure required for the enactment of a law have no application to the time when it shall take effect (Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 69, 82 Pac. 674), and a declaration of "an imperative public necessity that the constitutional rules requiring bills to be read on several days be suspended and this act placed on its final passage and it is so enacted" related to the method of passing the bill and not to the time of its taking effect (Wickes-Nease v. Watts, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 515, 70 S. W. 1001).

A resolution of the general assembly, authorizing a poor tort debtor to take the poor debtor's oath with the same effect as if he had been committed to jail for a contract debt, is not a statute within Gen. St. c. 22, § 19, prescribing the time when a statute shall take effect. Berry v. Viall, 12 R. I. 18.

For the common-law rule as to time of statutes taking effect see infra, VII, C, 5–10.

96. For express provisions see infra, VII, C, 2.

97. "General law," as used in Wis. Const. art. 6, § 21, declaring when acts take effect, etc., includes an act regulating the disposal of a part of the public funds of the state, previously regulated by general laws. State v. Hoeflinger, 31 Wis. 257. So the act of March 4, 1834, of the Maine legislature, annexing a part of one town to another, is a public act, and is to be construed accordingly as to the time of its taking effect (New Portland v. New Vineyard, 16 Me. 69); but an act repealing the charter of a town is not "a law of a general nature" within the meaning of Tenn. Const. art. 2, § 20, which cannot take effect for forty days after its passage (Johnson v. State, 3 Lea (Tenn.) 469, 31 Am. Rep. 648).

Private statutes.— The provision in Me. Rev. St. c. 1, § 1, that every statute shall take effect in thirty days from the recess of the legislature passing the same, unless otherwise prescribed, extends to private statutes. Cooper v. Curtis, 30 Me. 488. Under the Delaware statute (1843), the record of a private act of assembly dated from the time of lodging a copy in the recorder's office to be recorded; a private act was therefore not void, although not actually recorded within the year, if deposited in due time. Jefferson v. Stewart, 4 Harr. (Del.) 82.

98. The reason for the adoption of these provisions was the hardships and injustice entailed by the operation of the former rules by which statutes took effect either from the first day of the session or from their passage. Price v. Hopkins, 13 Mich. 318; Halbert v. San Saba Springs Land, etc., Assoc., 89 Tex. 230, 34 S. W. 639, 49 L. R. A. 193. See infra, VII, C, 4, 6.

mon provisions of this kind are that the statute shall take effect at a certain fixed day,[99] or a certain length of time after its passage [1] or approval,[2] or after the end of the legislative session,[3] or upon its publication,[4] or the proclamation of the governor announcing it in force.[5] Until the time arrives when it is to take effect and be in force, a statute which has been passed by both houses of the legislature and approved by the executive has no force whatever for any purpose,[6] and all acts purporting to have been done under it prior to that time are void.[7]

2. Express Provisions of Statute [8] — a. In General. In the absence of constitutional restrictions,[9] the legislature is free to fix in each act the time it shall take effect;[10] and may therefore provide that it shall take effect from its pas-

10. In re Hendricks, 5 N. D. 114, 64 N. W. 110, holding that Laws (1893), c. 74, relating to the revision of the statutes and the publication of the same, and providing, in section 7, that on delivery of the finished copies of the volume to the secretary of state, the governor shall proclaim the acceptance of the volume, and thirty days after the proclamation the statutes shall take effect, and thereafter be in force and be received as evidence of the laws of the state, fixed a date when the laws should go into effect, as well as when they should be received as evidence.

The time a particular statute shall take effect may be fixed by another statute passed at the same session, either as a separate enactment (Honeycutt v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 40 Mo. App. 674) or by way of amendment to the principal act (Elliott v. Lochnane, 1 Kan. 126). And where a statute was silent as to the time when it should take effect, but a supplemental act passed at the same session provided that the supplement should take effect from the time of its passage, it was held to relate back so as to embrace the time of the operation of the original act. sage[11] or approval,[12] or at a fixed date,[13] which may be either earlier or later than the date fixed by a general statute,[14] or upon publication,[15] or upon compliance with other requirements fixed by the act.[16] To the extent that the time fixed in the particular statute differs from that fixed by a prior general law, the particular statute, as the latest expression of the legislative will, prevails over the general law.[17] In order, however, for a provision in a particular statute to have the effect of putting a statute in operation at a different time than that fixed by the general rule, such provision must conform to constitutional requirements,[18] and the language must be clear and explicit; it is not sufficient that certain parts of the act might bear such a construction.[19]

b. Emergency Clause. In those jurisdictions in which, under the general rule, statutes do not take effect until some time subsequent to their passage and approval, it is commonly provided that when an emergency exists the legislature may declare a statute in force from its passage.[20] Under such provisions the

12. Ex p. Lucas, 160 Mo. 218, 61 S. W. 218; State v. Reynolds, 24 Utah 29, 66 Pac. 614, holding that where Const. art. 6, § 25, provides that all acts shall be officially published, and no act shall take effect until so published, nor until sixty days after the adjournment of the session at which it is passed, "unless the Legislature by a vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to each house, shall otherwise direct," the subordinate clause introduced by the conjunction "unless" was intended to modify both of the clauses preceding it; and, where it was provided that a statute should take effect upon approval, it became operative immediately upon approval, without previous publication.

Where the statute provides that it shall take effect immediately it is operative from its final passage (Fairchild v. Gwynne, 14 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 121 [reversed on other grounds in 16 Abb. Pr. 23]), which has been construed to mean its approval by the governor (Matter of Kemeys, 56 Hun (N. Y.) 117, 9 N. Y. legislature is the sole judge as to whether an emergency exists,[21] and its declaration is not open to question by the courts.[22] Where, however, such special provisions, permitting the legislature to except certain statutes from the general rule, are found in the constitution, the legislative declaration that an emergency exists must conform to the constitutional requirements,[23] and must be clear, distinct, and unequivocal.[24] A statute containing a valid emergency clause takes pass acts of a particular nature to take effect at once, such acts may be made to take effect upon their passage without an emergency clause, notwithstanding a general requirement of an emergency clause in acts intended to take effect before a certain time. An act providing that it shall take effect on and after its passage and approval does not express an emergency under Nebr. Const. art. 3, § 24. State v. Adams Express Co., 80 Nebr. 840, 115 N. So the phrase "from and after the passage of this act," occurring at the beginning of a statute, does not constitute a sufficient emergency clause. In re Alexander, 53 Fla. 647, 44 So. 175.

Referendum.— Under a constitutional provision for the submission of acts to the people before their taking effect "except as to laws necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety," a clause intended to put them in effect before the time prescribed by the general law must not only declare an emergency, but must also set forth such an emergency as described in the above quoted provision of the constitution. Sears v. Multnomah County, 49 Oreg. 42, 88 Pac. 522; Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Oreg. 118, 147, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222. But see State v. Bacon, 14 S. D. 394, 85 N. W. 605, holding that under a similar exception of "such laws as are passed for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety, support of the state government and its existing public institutions," a declaration that "the enactment of the foregoing provision is necessary for the immediate preservation and support of the existing public institutions of this state, and an emergency is hereby declared to exist," was a sufficient declaration of an emergency to make the statute effective from its passage and approval.

24. Wheeler v. Chubbuck, 16 Ill. 361; Mark v. State, 15 Ind. 98. Under Tex. Const. art. 3, § 39, providing that "no law . . . shall take effect or go into force until ninety days after the adjournment of the session at which it was enacted, unless in case of an emergency, expressed [therein], the Legislature shall . . . otherwise direct," and section 32 prescribing the manner in which laws are to be considered and passed, and authorizing such rules to be suspended in case of "imperative public necessity," a clause in an act reciting the existence of "an imperative public necessity that the constitutional rule requiring bills to be read on three several days be suspended, and this act placed on its final passage, and it is so enacted," related to the method of passing the bill and not to the time it should take effect. Wickes-Nease v. Watts, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 515, 70 S. W. 1001. See also Belcher v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 121, 44 S. W. 1106, 519. But see Jameson v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 385, 24 S. W. 508, holding that the act of March 15, 1893, section 3, reciting that certain conditions create an imperative necessity justifying suspension of the rule requiring bills to be read on three several days in both houses, suspended said rule, and enacted that the bill become a law from and after its passage, is a sufficient emergency clause to put the act in effect from its passage; and Orrick v. Ft. Worth, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 114 S. W. 677, to the same general effect. And see Swann v. Buck, 40 Miss. 268, holding that a law may take effect immediately, al-effect immediately it passes through all the formalities required by the constitution for the complete enactment of laws.[25]

3. Local Option Laws.[26] Where by the terms of a statute a question affecting only a particular subdivision of the state is authorized or directed to be submitted to the votes of such subdivision,[27] or the application of a general law to particular localities is suspended until adopted in such localities by popular vote[28] or the decision of some local government body,[29] the language of the act must be followed strictly,[30] and the suspended provisions will not be in force in such locality until all the steps required by the statute have been taken.[31] As a general rule, however, when a canvassing board to which is committed the duty of determining the result of such election decides that the provisions of the statute have been adopted, such decision is final and conclusive,[32] and the courts are without authority to inquire whether all who participated in the election were legally qualified voters.[33] Such a statute takes effect as an entirety at one and the same time in accordance with the general rule,[34] and it is only the application of certain provisions to particular localities that is suspended.[35]

4. Beginning of Legislative Session. The rule of the English common law was that, in the absence of a special provision in a statute as to the time of its taking effect, it related back and became effective from the first day of the session at which it was adopted;[36] and this rule continued in force in a few of the older though there is no express provision in it that shall do so, if the intention of the legislature to give it immediate effect is clearly manifested in some other manner than by the general phraseology of the act or resolution itself.

American states after the Revolution,[37] until abolished by constitutional or statutory provisions.[38]

5. End of Legislative Session or Time Computed Therefrom. By the constitutions and statutes of a number of the states,[39] in the absence of special provision fixing a different time, statutes go into effect upon the adjournment of the session of the legislature at which they are passed,[40] or a certain number of days,[41] or months,[42] after such adjournment.

How time computed.— The phrase, "until ninety days after the adjournment," has been construed to make the statutes effective on the first moment of the ninetieth day computed by excluding the day of adjournment (In re Boyce, 25 Wash. 612, 66 Pac. 54); but they do not become effective until the first moment of the ninety-first day computed in the same way, under cases making a distinction between the phrase in question and "until the ninetieth day" (Halbert v. San Saba Springs Land, etc., Assoc., 89 Tex. 230, 34 S. W. 639, 49 L. R. A. 193; Voight v. Gulf, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 59 S. W. 578 [reversed on other grounds in 94 Tex. 357, 60 S. W. 658]). In Ex p. Lucas, 160 Mo. 218, 61 S. W. 218, construing a constitutional provision in exactly similar terms as the above it is said, evidently through inadvertence, that a statute passed May 22 takes effect August 22. In Chapman v. State, 2 Head (Tenn.) 36, the same rule as that applied in In re Boyce, supra, is applied to a provision that statutes shall take effect forty days from the adjournment of the legislature. it shall take effect from its passage.[44] The rule that a statute shall take effect from its passage has usually been construed to make it effective from the time it has passed through all the forms required by the constitution to give it force and validity.[45] Thus, where the approval of the governor is required, it takes effect from the time of receiving such approval;[46] and, where the statute is passed by the constitutional majority over the governor's veto, from the time of such passage.[47] But in some jurisdictions the same language has been construed to refer to the time of the signature of the bill by the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature,[48] or even to the time of the passage through the second house of the legislature,[49] and in these jurisdictions, upon its approval by the governor, it relates back, and takes effect from the time of such signature or passage.[50] In North Carolina the same language has been construed to make the statute effective from the first day of the session.[51] In the jurisdictions where statutes take effect from their passage, it has been generally held that a statute takes effect on the day of the final enactment, without allowing any time for its publication or for its provisions to become known,[52] even though provision is made by general law for the publication of statutes;[53] but in some cases the day of approval has been excluded and the statute given effect at the first moment of the following day.[54] In a few states, by general constitutional or statutory provisions, statutes take effect a certain length of time after their passage.[55] Where, after their publication.[70] In accordance with the phraseology of these provisions in the different states, such publication may be in the newspapers or journals,[71] in pamphlets,[72] in bound volumes,[73] or by distribution of printed copies to certain designated officials;[74] and the statute is without force or effect until the requirements of the law have been substantially complied with.[75]

8. DATE FIXED IN ACT.[76] Where by general law, or by the express terms of the statute itself, it is to take effect upon a fixed future day, it will take effect from the first moment of the day named;[77] but where it is to take effect "from and after" a day named, that day is generally construed to be excluded from the operation of the act.[78]

9. CONDITIONS AND OCCURRENCE OF CONTINGENCY.[79] Upon the passage of a valid statute, which by its terms is to go into effect upon the happening of a certain contingency, or compliance with certain conditions, its language must be strictly followed;[80] and it will take effect only from the happening of the contingency,[81] or the performance of the conditions.[82]

A provision that statutes shall take effect "from and after" their publication has been construed to make them effective on the day after their publication (O'Connor v. Fond du Lac, 109 Wis. 253, 85 N. W. 327, 53 L. R. A. 831), and has also been construed to make them effective from the first moment of the day of their legal and proper publication (Kearny County v. Vandriss, 115 Fed. 866, 53 C. C. A. 192).

Evidence of date of publication.—Where the certificate of the secretary of state, annexed to a volume of private laws, bears a certain date, he being authorized to make such certificate only after the publication of the laws has been completed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the court will presume an act contained in such volume to have been in effect from the date of the certificate. In re Boyle, 9 Wis. 264.

10. Parts of Acts Taking Effect at Different Times. Where not prohibited by the constitution,[83] the legislature may direct that different parts of the same statute shall go into effect at different times.[84] Under constitutional provisions requiring all parts of a statute to take effect at the same time, it is sufficient that the statute becomes effective as an entirety at one time, notwithstanding that, as to some persons or matters affected by it, it becomes operative at different times.[85]

D. Retroactive Operation[86] — 1. In General — a. Nature of Retroactive Operation. Literally defined, a retrospective law is a law that looks backward or on things that are past; and a retroactive law is one that acts on things that are past.[87] In common use, as applied to statutes, the two words are synonymous.[88] In this literal sense all laws having an effect on past transactions or matters, or by which the slightest modification is made of the remedy for the recovery of rights accrued or the redress of wrongs done, are included equally with those which divest rights, impair the obligation of contracts, or make an act, innocent at the time it was done, subsequently punishable as an offense.[89] A retroactive or retrospective law, in the legal sense, is one that takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect to transactions or considerations and requires as a condition to its validity that something be done before it goes into operation, the act has no force until the thing required to be done is performed; but where a statute affects only one or more designated persons, either natural or artificial, those interested in its object may waive provisions intended for their benefit); Hobart v. Butte County, 17 Cal. 23; Little v. Frost, 3 Mass. 106.
