C. Form, Elements, and Requisites of Instructions[92]— 1. Language and Style[93]— a. In General. No precise form is necessary in giving instructions.[94] The duty imposed upon the trial court necessarily involves a large discretion as to the form and style in which instructions shall be given,[95] so long as the judgment of the jury is in no degree subordinated to the opinion of the court on the facts,[96] and the law is stated correctly.[97] However, it is said that departures from approved forms of instruction are to be avoided, and that this is so even though the courts may be able by such departure to state the law more concisely and intelligibly.[98] And in giving instructions to a jury, the court should avoid the employment of terms and definitions of a purely technical or scientific character,[99] especially where the questions to be submitted are well susceptible of presentation in plain, practical terms, easy of comprehension and application.[1] While it may not be improper under some circumstances to charge in language employed by the court of last resort in deciding similar propositions,[2] the embodiment in an instruction to the jury of the language used by such court does not necessarily make the instruction correct.[3] There are many things said in opinions that are sound law, but which nevertheless would be improper instructions to a jury.[4] It is very generally held that slight verbal or technical inaccuracies not calculated to mislead the jury will not vitiate the instructions.[5] On the other clerical error, is ground for reversal, where such error might have misled the jury.[6] Even the entire omission of a word or phrase,[7] which, when supplied, reverses the literal meaning of the sentence,[8] will not be ground for reversal if the court can clearly see, when the whole is taken together, what the idea was which was intended to be conveyed, and that it must have been understood as intended. So, mere inelegancies of expression, while not to be commended, constitute no ground for reversal.[9] Nor is it material error that instructions are not couched in the best language,[10] or that there is a lack of orderly arrangement in the propositions enunciated,[11] or that they might well have been separated into somewhat shorter and more compact paragraphs,[12] or that they are ungrammatical,[13] or not properly punctuated,[14] or inartificially drawn,[15] or prolix,[16] or contain surplusage.[17]

31 Pac. 453), is not ground for reversal, where it is improbable that the jury could have been misled. So in an action for injuries to a servant, the use of the word "platform" in an instruction, in describing the appliance on which the employee stood, where according to the evidence there was no platform, but merely a plank laid across the cross beams, there being no dispute about the evidence, was not misleading. Lee v. Wild Rice Lumber Co., 102 Minn. 74, 112 N. W. 887. And where, in an action for injuries to an employee, the grounds of negligence were the failure of the engineer to warn the employee of the backing of the train, and the failure to keep a brakeman stationed near the rear end of the train to warn the employee, and there was nothing in the evidence to suggest any other grounds of recovery, an instruction that if the person in charge of the engine at the time of the injury was guilty of negligence in operating the engine, followed by a distinct disjunctive statement of the two grounds of negligence alleged, is not misleading, although connected by the word "or," used in the sense of "that is." The omission of the word "if," when clearly a clerical error, not materially affecting the meaning of the instruction, is not ground for reversal. Madrey v. Meyers, 140 Ill. App. 218.

The inadvertent omission of the word "not" in an instruction, where not calculated to mislead the jury, is not prejudicial error. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Redus, (Tex. Civ. App. 1909) 118 S. So long as the law is stated correctly and intelligibly, the ultimate test of the soundness of instructions, it has been said, is not what the ingenuity of counsel can, at leisure, work out the instructions to mean, but how and in what sense, under the evidence before them, and the circumstances of the trial, would ordinary men and jurors understand the instructions.[18]

b. Instructing in Language of Statute.[19] Instructions in the language of a statute are sufficient.[20] "Laying down the law in the words of the law itself ought not to be pronounced to be error." [21]

c. Covering Principles in One Instruction. The entire law of the case need not be stated in a single instruction, and it is not improper to state the law as applicable to particular questions in separate instructions if there is no conflict in the law as stated.[22] Exceptions and qualifications of a rule, if stated in the charge, need not be stated in immediate juxtaposition with the rule.[23] If all the instructions, considered as a series, present the law applicable to the case fully and accurately, it is sufficient.[24] Nevertheless, the practice of stating all the essential ideas necessary to the expression of a single rule of law in one paragraph or instruction should not be departed from.[25] The jury should be given, in direct connection with each question, every legal proposition which the court deems necessary and proper for the jury to bear in mind in considering that question.[26]

2. Certainty, Definiteness, and Particularity[27]— a. In General. Instructions should be in plain and simple language,[28] clear and explicit,[29] certain,[30] definite,[31]

direct in statement,[32] and accurate.[33] Especially is this necessary where the evidence is conflicting [34] and the case close on the facts.[35] They should not leave too much to the discretion of the jury.[36] However, indefiniteness and uncertainty will not ordinarily constitute ground for reversal in the absence of a request for more specific instructions.[37]

b. Ambiguous Instructions.[38] Instructions which admit of two constructions are erroneous as tending to confuse and mislead the jury,[39] and it is of course proper to refuse them,[40] even though proper in substance.[41] If it is likely or apparent that prejudice resulted to one of the parties, the giving of such instructions is ground for reversal; [42] but it is otherwise if it is apparent that the jury were not mislead thereby.[43]

c. Vague and Obscure Instructions.[44] Instructions should be so worded that their meaning will not be obscure or vague and requested instructions defective in this regard may and should be refused.[45] However, the giving of an instruction defective in this regard is not ground for reversal unless it misleads

d. Argumentative Instructions.[49] Instructions should be clear and concise, presenting only the point or matter of law on which the party presenting them may rely,[50] and it is very generally held that instructions which are argumentative in character are improper,[51] and such instructions should of course be refused i-

United States.— Bottomley v. U. S., 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,688, 1 Story 135.

Instruction held defective.— In an action on contracts for clearing a railroad right of way, an instruction which left it to the jury to determine how much of the work was done by "defendant," inadvertently naming defendant, instead of plaintiff, and, if they found that the work was not completed, then to find why it was not completed, and left it to the jury to find the legal consequences of the failure to complete the work, was erroneous, because indefinite and involved. Harrison v. Franklin, 126 Mo. App. 366, 103 S. W. 585. In a close case involving a personal injury, an instruction which speaks of "wrongful acts, negligence and defaults," even limiting them to such as were charged in the declaration, is too general, and liable to mislead. Chicago v. Sutton, 136 Ill. App. 221. On a trial of the validity of a change of beneficiary in a policy, the court instructed that "if you believe from the evidence that insured was in a weak, mental, and physical condition, and while in such condition was compelled by fear or otherwise to sign such document, or make such request as was made to change said policies," etc. It was held that the use of the word "otherwise" was misleading for not giving the jury a guide, but leaving them to speculate as to what motive influenced insured. Hazard v. Western Commercial Travelers' Assoc., (Tex. Civ. App. 1909) 116 S. W. 625.

Instruction held not defective.— An instruction, in an action on a note, that the note in suit was barred by limitations, and furnished no evidence of liability against defendant, unless there had been a payment made thereon by defendant within six years before action brought, and that the burden of proof to establish the payment was on plaintiff, was not objectionable as ambiguous or misleading. Instructions held argumentative.— The following instructions have been held to be argumentative and improper: That the law abhors fraud (McClendon v. McKissack, 143 Ala. 188, 38 So. 1020); that admissions testified to have been made by a party to a suit should be received with caution because of the improbability that a party would make statements prejudicial to himself (Riddle v. Webb, 110 Ala. 599, 18 So. 323); that it is a sound rule of law that the jury may disregard the whole of the testimony of a witness who is found to swear wilfully falsely in one material thing (McClendon v. McKissack, supra); that the law is that one who has by his negligence proximately contributed to his injury cannot recover damages against another who has negligently caused his death, and that the rule is applicable, although the person injured is under fourteen years of age, if he has sufficient mental capacity (Moss v. Mosely, 148 Ala. 168, 41 So. 1012); an instruction, in an action by a firm for corn shipped to defendant for sale, that the contract on which the suit was based was merged into the written letters of a partner to defendant and the letters of defendant to the partner, and that the jury might look to the letters to determine with whom the contract was made (Dorough v. Harrington, 148 Ala. 305, 42 So. 557); an instruction that defendant had no absolute right to have plaintiff examined to determine the extent of her injuries (Birmingham R., etc., Co. v. King, 149 Ala. 504, 42 So 612); an instruction in an action against a railroad company for injuries resulting from a fire set by defendant's engine, that the mere fact that the fire originated from sparks emitted from an engine is not sufficient to fasten a liability upon the railroad company, and that the mere fact that a fire occurred along the line of defendant's road does not raise a presumption that it was caused by or originated from defendant's engine (Birmingham R., etc., Co. v. Martin, 148 Ala. 8, 42 So. 618); an instruction in an action for death of a servant while riding certain cars down an incline, that no duty rested on intestate's foreman to instruct him about riding the cars down the incline, if the danger was obvious and intestate was sufficiently developed to understand the danger (Woodstock Iron Works v. Kline, 149 Ala 391, 43 So. 362); instructions in ejectment, that the location of the land was a physical fact to be determined by the jury; that the testimony of certain expert witnesses should not be considered as that of experts, but merely as that of witnesses testifying to such particular physical facts; that as to physical facts, such as the location of streams or bluffs thereof and their meanderings, the testimony of those who knew the facts was as worthy of belief as that of experts (Chappelle v. Roberts, 150 Ala. 457, 43 So. 489); an instruction, in a case where the issue was the existence of a partnership, that, if the jury found from a preponderance of the evidence that defendant entered into a contract with the alleged firm whereby he was to share with them in any profits of the business, this would be deemed in law one of the most cogent evidences of partnership (Rector v. Robins, 82 Ark. 424, 102 S. W. 209); an instruction that one who owns property along the railroad must know that trains are expected to run with regularity, and if there are special risks from no want of care in the proper equipment of the trains, those risks are incident to the situation, and the extra care they demand devolves upon the other party and the consequences of not exercising it must fall on him, because the railroad is not in fault (Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Welch, 53 Fla. 145, 44 So. 250); an instruction in a personal injury action against a railroad, that the fact that plaintiff is deprived of the pleasure and satisfaction of life which only those having a sound body and the full use of all their members may enjoy might be considered in assessing damages invaded the province of the jury (Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. O'Conner, 171 Ind. 686, 85 N. E. 969); an instruction in an action for delay in delivering a telegram, sent by plaintiff's agent, that it was possible that plaintiff understood that the agent was acting for her when he went to send the message, but the evidence must show that he agreed to act as agent (Western Union Tel. Co. v. Northcutt, 158 Ala. 539, 48 So. 553, 132 Am. St. Rep. 38); an instruction, in an action for damages to a horse and buggy from a collision with a team of oxen and wagon on a public bridge, that public bridges are for the use of oxen and drays as much as for horses and buggies (Cohn, etc., Lumber Co. v. Robbins, 159 Ala. 289, 48 So. 853).

Instructions held not argumentative.—An instruction is not objectionable as argumentative because the judge arranges the evidence and comments on it (Emery v. Estes, 31 Me. 155); or unnecessarily elaborates it (Thrall v. Wilson, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 376); or admonishes the jury that in order to make conversations testified to evidence they must be satisfied that they had reference to the transaction in controversy (Whitcomb v. Fairlee, 43 Vt. 671); or in addition to a charge in general terms on contributory negligence, gives special instructions on contributory negligence conformable to the facts shown (Rambie v. San Antonio, etc., R. Co., 45 Tex. Civ. App. 422, 100 S. W. 1022); or because the instruction contains unnecessary repetitions of the matters which the jury may consider (Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Walker, 41 Ind. App. 588, 84 N. E. 730); or statements of undisputed facts (Davis v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 147 Mich. 479, 111 N. W. 76).

argumentative instructions. Some decisions lay down the rule broadly that such instructions are not ground for reversal.[53] While in others it is held that if the giving of argumentative instructions misleads the jury and is calculated to prejudice one of the parties it is ground for reversal,[54] unless the harmful effect is removed by other instructions.[55] In any event, it is said, the reviewing court will not reverse if the law was clearly and fully given in the charge considered as a whole, and the reviewing court is satisfied that the rights of the parties were not prejudicially affected by the vice complained of.[56]

e. Confused or Misleading Instructions.[57] It is proper to refuse instructions that would tend to mislead or confuse the jury,[58] and by parity of reasoning it is

Instructions held misleading.—An instruction is properly refused as misleading when it tells the jury that in determining the cause of an injury "they might look to the size and shape of the evidence" of injury on plaintiff's shoulder (Southern Bell Tel., etc., Co. v. Mayo, 134 Ala. 641, 33 So. 16), or, in a case where actual notice is not material and there is evidence of circumstances warranting the submission of the question of knowledge, that there is no evidence of actual notice (Clark v. Brookfield, 97 Mo. App. 16, 70 S. W. 934; Eldred v. Hazlett, 38 Pa. St. 16), or where several acts of negligence are claimed to have resulted in an injury, in singling out each separately and instructing that any one of them alone would not entail liability (Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Whidden, 23 Ohio Cir. Ct. 85), or conflicting [60] or the case close.[61] And this is true even though the instructions may be technically accurate.[62] In determining whether particular instructions mislead the jury, the court will credit the jury with common discernment and common sense.[63]

f. Inconsistent or Contradictory Instructions.[64] Conflicting or contradictory instructions furnish no correct guide to the jury, and the giving thereof is erroneous;[65] and it is of course proper for the court to refuse requested instructions which permits the jury to take into consideration matters which the law considers immaterial (Clewis v. Malone, 131 Ala. 465, 31 So. 596). An instruction is misleading when it submits to the jury facts conclusive of the controversy in such manner as to lead the jury to believe that they are not conclusive thereof (Mexican Cent. R. Co. v. Goodman, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 43 S. W. 580); or bases the right of recovery on inconclusive facts (Gill v. Staylor, 93 Md. 453, 49 Atl. 650); or confuses several grounds of liability (Wilson v. Dickel, 7 N. Y. App. Div. 175, 40 N. Y. Suppl. 45); or, in a case where the evidence tends to establish fraud, if it tells the jury that a transaction equally capable of two constructions must be presumed to be honest and fair (A. F. Shapleigh Hardware Co. v. Hamilton, 70 Ark. 319, 68 S. W. 490); or where the instruction unqualifiedly makes defendant's liability depend on its negligence, where defendant is responsible for the negligence of contractors under it (Taylor, etc., R. Co. v. Warner, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 60 S. W. 442); or makes the motive with which a party brought a suit, although on a valid claim, material (Sullivan v. Collins, 107 Wis. 291, 83 N. W. 310).

Instructions held not misleading.—An instruction is not misleading because in limiting an issue it makes reference to a specific fact, "as alleged in the petition" (Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Parvin, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 60, 64 S. W. 1008); or when it submits facts in terms employed by all of the parties during the trial (Capitol Freehold Land, etc., Co. v. Pecos, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 60 S. W. 286); or strongly urges the support of the law against mob violence (Pritchett v. Overman, 3 Greene (Iowa) 531); or in a malpractice suit uses the words "injuries complained of" (Miller v. Dumon, 24 Wash. 648, 64 Pac. 804).

affected with this vice.[66] Instructions of this character are misleading, as the jury are not supposed to know when the judge states the law correctly and when incorrectly.[67] and they should not be left to reconcile conflicting principles of law.[68] The giving of contradictory instructions is ordinarily held ground for reversal.[69] The error in giving incorrect instructions is not cured by giving correct instruc-

Compare Eyser v. Weissgerber, 2 Iowa 463, where it was said that a mere conflict between instructions in chief and those given at request of a party does not necessarily mislead.

Instructions held contradictory.—In an action for injuries to a servant, the court submitted in one instruction the issue of assumption of risk, but in another instruction stated that if defendant was negligent, and the injury resulted therefrom without fault on plaintiff's part, he was entitled to recover, unless there had been a settlement. It was held that the instructions were erroneous, as conflicting. Brusseau v. Lower Brick Co., 133 Iowa 245, 110 N. W. 577. In an action on a contract under which plaintiffs agreed to furnish lumber for a waterway, the waterway to be equal in quality to a sample lot of material theretofore furnished by plaintiffs, and to be constructed of the "heart of yellow pine," instructions that, if plaintiffs furnished the same quality of lumber as the sample, they were entitled to recover, were in direct conflict with instructions that plaintiffs were bound to furnish "heart of yellow pine," although the sample may not have been "heart of yellow pine." San Miguel Consol. Gold Min. Co. v. Stubbs, 39 Colo. 359, 90 Pac. 842. Where the court had properly instructed that defendant could not be held liable as a partner unless his conduct led plaintiff to believe that he was a partner, a subsequent instruction submitting the theory of an actual partnership by virtue of a contract, was erroneous and confusing. Bowen v. Epperson, 136 Mo. App. 571, 118 S. W. 528. In an action for death at a railroad crossing, the court charged that the "only" duty of the engineer on approaching the crossing, so far as its condition was concerned, was to sound his whistle and to ring the bell, that if such duties were discharged, the jury could not find a verdict for plaintiff on specifications of negligence with reference to the condition of the crossing and the sounding of the whistle or bell, and also charged that the operatives of the train, in passing over the crossing, were bound, in addition, to exercise a degree of care commensurate with the danger of collision reasonably to be apprehended at that location, and if they failed to do so, and in consequence thereof deceden received the injuries from which he died, the jury should find for plaintiff. It was held that such instructions were in irreconcilable conflict. Porter v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 199 Mo. 82, 97 S. W. 880.

Instructions held not contradictory.—Charges which present the different theories of the parties are not contradictory. Votaw v. McKeever, 76 Kan. 870, 92 Pac. 1120; Deford v. Dryden, 46 Md. 248. An instruction that a railroad was not liable for surface water concentrated and caused to flow on its right of way, by farm ditches constructed on a tract of land prior to plaintiff's ownership of the same, and which he maintained, was not in conflict with an instruction that the railroad was liable for maintaining an embankment obstructing the natural flow of surface water and causing the same to overflow plaintiff's land. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Arey, (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 100 S. W. 963. An instruction, which restricts the duty of a railroad to the construction of only such culverts in its embankment, constituting its roadbed, as the natural lay of the land requires for its necessary drainage, is not in conflict with an instruction that an owner could not recover for damages done by water concentrated on the right of way through farm ditches, at a point where the water did not naturally flow, or for damages done by the concentration of surface water on the right of way through farm ditches maintained by the owner. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Arey, supra. An instruction, in an action for the destruction by hogs of a growing crop, which, after stating certain facts to be found to authorize a verdict for plaintiffs, tells the jury that any finding for plaintiffs shall be whatever sum they were damaged by the hogs, not exceeding the sum asked in the petition, is not in conflict with, but is to be read with, one stating the measure of damages as the value of the crop where and when it was destroyed. Hunt v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 126 Mo. App. 261, 103 S. W. 133. In an action against a railway company for damages resulting from a fire caused by its engine, an instruction that if the engine was equipped with a spark-arresting device of the best kind in general use and was carefully handled, the verdict should be for the company, was not erroneous, as conflicting with an instruction that, if the fire was caused by sparks from the engine, plaintiff should recover, unless the company exercised ordinary care to have the engine provided with one of the best devices in use by railway companies, and unless the company exercised ordinary care to see that any such device was in reasonably good repair and that the engine was handled with ordinary skill. Womack v. International, etc., R. Co., 100

drawal of the erroneous instructions.[70] Where instructions are inconsistent with or contradict each other, it is usually impossible to say whether the jury was controlled by the one or the other.[71] The judgment will not be reversed, however, where the inconsistency is only apparent, and not actual;[72] where, as shown by special findings, the verdict follows the correct instructions;[73] where the verdict does not depend upon and it is apparent that it was not influenced by the instructions;[74] and a well-defined exception to the general rule exists where the inconsistency or conflict in the instructions is caused by error in the instructions favorable to the appellant or plaintiff in error. In such case the error being in his favor, he cannot be heard to complain.[75] There are also a few decisions which are not, properly speaking, exceptions to the rule, but seemingly in conflict with it. Of this character are decisions holding that the judgment will not be reversed because of conflicting instructions unless it affirmatively appears from the record that the

Tex. 453, 100 S. W. 1151. In an action for injuries to a servant, an instruction that, if a certain person was intrusted by a master with power to superintend and control the servant, the master was liable for his negligence causing injuries to the servant, unless the servant was guilty of contributory negligence or assumed the risk, or he and the third person were fellow servants, was not contradictory on the question of vice-principal and fellow servant. Reeves v. Galveston, etc., R. Co., 44 Tex. Civ. App. 352, 98 S. W. 929. In an action against a railroad company for death of a trackman by being struck by an engine backing out of a roundhouse at night, an instruction that if the presence of deceased on the track was known to defendant, its agents or servants in charge of the engine, or could have been known to them by the exercise of ordinary care on their part, etc., did not conflict with an instruction that there was no proof of defendant's negligence in not having discovered decedent at or near the track in a position of peril in time, by the exercise of ordinary care, to have avoided injuring him. Compare Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 38 Nebr. 112, 56 N. W. 794, in which it was held that the giving of instructions which are vague and conflicting, and which probably had the effect of confusing and misleading the jury is erroneous, and the fact that the general tenor of the instructions is more favorable to the unsuccessful party than to the successful one does not cure the error.

party complaining thereof may have been injured,[76] or unless the character of the instructions was such as to afford good reason for supposing they might have had the effect of misleading or confusing the minds of the jury.[77]

g. Request For Correct Instructions as a Basis For Assigning Error. If an instruction is not sufficiently clear and explicit,[78] or is argumentative or ambiguous,[79] or is confused or has a tendency to mislead,[80] the party aggrieved must have asked to have the same modified or have asked additional instructions as a basis for assigning error to the giving of such instructions. An objection that an instruction might be misconstrued by the jury cannot be raised by merely excepting to it.[81]

3. Stating Issues Made by Pleadings — a. Necessity. Pleadings, although read at the trial in the hearing of the jury, are addressed to the court. They are in technical language, understood by the court, but often unintelligible to the jury.[82] And it is accordingly held by the great weight of authority that it is the duty of the court to state to the jury the issues made by the pleadings, and erroneous to read the pleadings to the jury or refer them to the pleadings to ascertain the issues in the case.[83] A departure from this well-settled practice, it is

In an action against two defendants who pleaded separate defenses, the court, in its statement of the defenses in its charge, should correctly inform the jury as to the issues separately made by each defendant. Baldwin v. Self, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 509, 114 S. W. 427.

Instruction not in violation of rule.— An instruction that if plaintiff was the owner of the barn, contents, and hog-pen mentioned in plaintiff's petition, and such property was destroyed by fire from one of defendant's engines, defendant was liable for the damage, regardless of whether it was negligent or not, was not objectionable as referring the jury to the petition for the issues. Big River Lead Co. v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 123 Mo. App. 394, 101 S. W. 636. An instruction which refers to the petition for the purpose of identifying a thing about which an issue was raised is not open to the objection that it refers the jury to the petition to determine what the issues are. and contain important and intricate statements of fact;[84] and is reversible error where the pleadings are so involved as to make it doubtful whether the jury could understand the issues raised thereby,[85] or where the allegations are broader than the proofs,[86] unless the issues are clearly stated in other portions of the instructions.[87] It has been held, however, that failure to state the issues is not erroneous, or at least not prejudicial error, where the issues are simple and easily understood from the pleadings,[88] or when the parties agree that the pleadings shall form part of the instructions.[89] A reference by the court to the pleadings,[90] or the incorporation thereof in the instructions, is not prejudicial error, when the issues are clearly stated in other portions of the instructions.[91] And an instruction is not erroneous merely because it refers the jury to the pleadings for a narration of the facts therein contained.[92]

b. Requisites and Sufficiency of Statement[93]— (i) In General. The court should state fully to the jury the issues made by the pleadings,[94] but if the real issues be pointed out no particular method need be adopted.[95] Where the issues as stated by the court are such as enable the parties to present every phase of their contentions, the statement will be sufficient.[96] If the pleadings contain matters of evidence rather than ultimate facts, the court sufficiently states the issues by stating the ultimate facts pleaded;[97] and this, it has been said, is the

In Illinois, the practice of referring the jury to the pleadings for the issues has been frequently disapproved, but is not regarded as ground of reversal if no question of law as to what are the material allegations is submitted in that way. The form and number of the issues are not material, if those submitted are germane and offer each party a fair opportunity to present his version of the facts and his view of the law, so that the case may be tried on the merits. Horne v. Consolidated R., etc., Co., 144 N. C. 375, 57 S. E. 19.

better practice, because the issues might otherwise be obscured and the jurors in consequence misled.[98] In charging the jury the court is not required to make a brief presentation of the issues raised by the pleadings, as a preface to the law embodied in the charge, where the issues are sufficiently pointed out during its course.[99] Nor is it necessary that the issues be stated in a single paragraph of the charge. If they are fairly stated to the jury in some part of the charge in such manner as to be understood by the jury, this will be sufficient.[1] It is the entire series that is to be considered in determining the question whether the jury could be misled thereby.[2] Where the issues have been fairly stated by the court, a repetition thereof in instructions asked by counsel is properly refused.[3] And when it has fully instructed on the issues at the request of the parties it may omit reference thereto in instructions given on its motion.[4] Where the charge contains no adequate statement of the issues and its effect is necessarily misleading and unfair the judgment should be reversed.[5]

(II) Misstatement of Issues and Its Effect.[6] An instruction which misstates the issues or defenses is erroneous [7] and is properly refused,[8] and the giving thereof is a ground for reversal if it has a tendency to confuse or mislead the jury.[9] The defect is not cured by subsequent instructions correctly stating the issues.[10] Nevertheless, slight inaccuracies in stating the issues will not warrant a reversal. It is the duty of counsel, if he desires a more accurate statement of the issues, to ask for it; otherwise he will have no ground for complaint.[11]

4. Applicability of Instructions to Pleadings and Evidence [12]— a. Confining Instructions to Issues Raised by Pleadings and Evidence — (i) In General. Instructions should be confined to the issues presented by the pleadings and the evidence.[13] It is improper to give an instruction announcing a naked legal proposition, however correct it may be, unless it bears upon and is connected with the issues involved; and unless, further, there has been received some competent evidence to which the jury may apply it.[14] Such an instruction tends to distract questions which they are called upon to consider and decide, under the pleadings and the evidence, it does not commit an error for which the judgment will be reversed, even if it misconstrues one of the pleadings in the case, in giving such instruction. Stark v. Willetts, 8 Kan. 203.

of authority.[26] According to this latter doctrine, if, in the progress of a trial, evidence is introduced by either party at variance with the issues made by the pleadings, without objection as to its competency, the error is waived, and the court may properly instruct the jury in relation to the whole field of inquiry covered by the evidence.[27] It is proper to instruct in accordance with the theory upon which both parties tried the case, although the instruction be broader than the pleadings.[28] Even in those jurisdictions requiring instructions to be confined to the issues made by the pleadings, regardless of the evidence introduced, it is held that when the facts proven are not within the allegations of the pleadings, neither party can complain, if each procures instructions, declaring the rules of law applicable to the facts shown by the testimony regardless of the issues made by the pleadings, and asks a verdict in accordance therewith.[29] It has even been held error to confine the instructions to the pleadings, where the case is tried on another theory.[30] It is of course error to instruct the jury upon matters inadmissible in evidence under the pleadings, when proper objections are made, even though the court admits evidence against the objections.[31] But one who, against objection, introduced testimony upon a point not raised by the pleadings, cannot object to the giving of a charge based upon such testimony.[32]

26. In discussing the opposite doctrine Judge Thompson says: "This view ignores a principle which obtains in almost every situation in a civil trial, that the court is to disregard at every stage of the trial those errors or irregularities which it is competent for the party to waive, and which the party against whom they are committed does not object to at the time. The object of pleadings being merely to notify the opposite party of the ground of action or defense, if the party comes into court, it is not perceived why he may not waive the notice as in every other case, although the pleading may not advise him of the case or defense which is actually tendered in the evidence." 2 Thompson Trial, § 2310.

Presumption of amendment to conform with evidence.— When evidence is received without objection upon any particular ground not covered by the complaint, the court may assume that the complaint is as broad as the evidence when charging the jury, and the complaint will be deemed amended to conform with the evidence and charge, since the amendment could have been made as of course at the trial. In Virginia and West Virginia a large number of cases hold that where there is evidence tending to make out the supposed case, however inadequate in the opinion of the court, or to however little weight it may be deemed entitled, it is best and safest to give the instruction if it propound the law correctly. Southern R. Co. v. Oliver, 102 Va. 710, 47 S. E. 862; Richmond Pass., etc., Co. v. Allen, 101 Va. 200, 43 S. E. 356; Dingee v. Unrue, 98 Va. 247, 35 S. (Va.) 1; Farish v. Reigle, 11 Gratt. (Va.) 697, 62 Am. Dec. 666; Hopkins v. Richardson, 9 Gratt. (Va.) 485; Carrico v. West Virginia Cent., etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 86, 19 S. E. 571, 24 L. R. A. 50; McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 683, 41 Am. Rep. 682; State v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 703. In some of the later cases, however, it is held that, since the abolition of the scintilla doctrine, an instruction ought not to be given when the evidence on which it is based is insufficient to sustain a verdict. American Locomotive Co. v. Whitlock, 109 Va. 238, 63 S. E. 991; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Stock, 104 Va. 97, 51 S. E. 161; McDonald v. Cole, 46 W. Va. 186, 32 S. E. 1033; Bloyd v. Pollock, 27 W. Va. 75.

evidence be so slight as to be insufficient to support a verdict founded on it.[51] Even positive testimony is not always required. It is sufficient if the assumed fact may be reasonably inferred from the circumstances proved.[52] But, even in the jurisdictions upholding this doctrine, it has been held that in order to warrant giving an instruction the evidence should be fairly sufficient to raise the question involved therein,[53] of such force that fair-minded men might doubt or debate as to whether or not it had been proven.[54] Circumstances that raise only a possibility or conjecture ought not to be left to a jury as evidence of a fact which a party is required to prove.[55] Nor should instructions be given upon trifling and indefinite statements irrelevant to the question at issue.[56] Another line of cases hold that to justify an instruction upon an issue of fact, there should not only be evidence tending to establish that fact, but it should be sufficient, either alone, or in connection with other evidence upon correlative issues, to sustain a verdict founded upon it.[57]

(v) Basing Instructions on Evidence Improperly Admitted.[58] An instruction based upon incompetent evidence improperly admitted is erroneous,[59]

A conflict of testimony warrants a charge to the jury on the evidence, the court leaving the finding to the jury. Walker v. Lee, 51 Fla. 360, 40 So. 881; Byrne v. Doughty, 13 Ga. 46; Lee v. Conrad, 140 Iowa 16, 117 N. W. 1096; Atkins v. Gladwish, 27 Nebr. 841, 44 N. W. 37. A party has a right to request instructions to the jury based on the hypothesis which the evidence in his favor tends to establish. Such charges are not objectionable, although based on a partial view of the evidence, since the opposite party may request charges founded on a contrary hypothesis, if there is evidence tending to establish it. Griel v. Marks, 51 Ala. 566.

Slight evidence of undue influence is sufficient to authorize an instruction on that subject, that being peculiarly a question for the jury. Lischy v. Schrader, 104 Ky. 657, 47 S. W. 611, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 843.

The probative force and weight of competent evidence is for the jury, and an instruction should not be refused because the court may believe that the weight of the evidence does not support it. Morris v. Platt, 32 Conn. 75; Peoria, etc., R. Co. v. Puckett, 42 Ill. App. 642; De Camp v. Mississippi, etc., R. Co., 12 Iowa 348; State v. Tucker, 38 La. The charge should be confined to the case made out in proof; but, when there is testimony tending to raise the question, it is not for the court to pass on its sufficiency, and the charge is correct which leaves that to the jury, merely declaring its effect in law. and properly refused, and this, it has been held, is so, although the evidence was not objected to.[60]

(VI) BASING INSTRUCTIONS ON EVIDENCE EXCLUDED OR WITHDRAWN. An instruction based on evidence that has been excluded or withdrawn from the consideration of the jury is erroneous,[61] and properly refused,[62] although the action of the court in excluding the evidence was erroneous.[63] But if the error in excluding it is corrected, and there is ample proof on the subject, an instruction thereon is proper.[64]

(VII) APPLICATION OF LAW TO FACTS. It is not the proper course for a judge to lay down the general principles applicable to a case, and leave the jury to apply them; but it is his duty to inform the jury what the law is as applicable to the facts of the case.[65] But when the law of a case is fully, accurately, and clearly stated in instructions given to the jury, and each party has an opportunity in argument to apply the law to his view of the facts, it is not error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury on the application of the law to particular evidence.[66] And an instruction which states the law correctly, although in an abstract form, is not objectionable, where a following instruction recites the facts and applies the law as stated in the previous instruction.[67]

not affected by the fact that there is countervailing testimony.[70] As already shown, a party is not, however, entitled to an instruction on a theory as to which he has adduced no proof,[71] and where such is the case, the court should upon request instruct that one of several theories upon which recovery is sought is wholly unsupported by proof.[72] The theories of both parties need not, and generally should not, be stated in a single instruction,[73] and a party cannot complain that his theory of the case was not presented in his opponent's instruction,[74] if it is clearly brought out in instructions given at his request.[75]

(II) SEVERAL COUNTS OR DEFENSES. Where plaintiff declares upon several counts, he is entitled to an instruction that if he has proved any one of the causes of action alleged he is entitled to recover.[76] If there are defective counts in the declaration it is error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury to disregard them,[77] and instructions based thereon are erroneous.[78] It is error to give an instruction as covering the whole declaration which is applicable to only one count thereof.[79] While defendant may have the right to plead inconsistent defenses and has introduced testimony to sustain each, a charge that both cannot be true, that one must be false, is not erroneous.[80]

c. Ignoring or Excluding Evidence From Consideration of Jury[81] — (I) IN GENERAL. Instructions which ignore or exclude from the consideration of the jury evidence which is competent and material to the issues involved are erroneous,[82]

Where a count in contract is joined with a count in tort for the same cause of action, the court should instruct the jury that recovery can be had on only one of the counts. Holst v. Stewart, 161 Mass. 516, 37 N. E. 755, 42 Am. St. Rep. 442.

sideration finds frequent application in cases where the court in instructing the jury assumes to direct a verdict if the jury find the facts as summarized in the instruction; a form of instruction which according to some decisions is not in any event to be commended.[85] It is uniformly held that where a court instructs a jury upon which state of facts they must find a verdict for a party, the instruction should include all the facts in controversy material to the right of plaintiff or the defense of defendant;[86] and if an essential fact is omitted it cannot be supplied by another instruction.[87] For even where instructions may supplement each other, each one must state the law correctly as far as it goes, and they should be in harmony, so that the jury may not be misled.[88] The error in giving the instruction can only be cured by withdrawing it from the jury.[89] The rule, however, must be taken in its reasonable sense to apply only to the substantive and controlling facts; facts essential to the validity of the hypothesis, and not to the subsidiary and evidentiary facts; otherwise it would be difficult to tell where the trial judge should stop short of a recapitulation of the evidence and reasonable inferences, which cannot be contemplated by the rule.[90]

(II) Evidence Improperly Before Jury. Where evidence improper for the jury to consider has been introduced, the court may and should withdraw the evidence or direct the jury to disregard it.[91] If this is done, it is ordinarily held

Application of rule.— In an action on a note given for a machine sold defendant and shipped to it f. o. b. at shipping point by plaintiff, and which was injured when received by defendant, a part of the evidence tended to show negligence in loading on the cars. It was held that an instruction that, if the machine was properly loaded and was in proper condition for transportation, the jury must find for plaintiff, otherwise they must find for defendant, was erroneous as leaving out of view much important evidence bearing on the issue, and the liability of the carrier to the consignee for injuries from negligent loading and those received during transportation. Vaughan Mach. Co. v. Stanton Tanning Co., 106 Va. 445, 56 S. E. 140. An instruction, in an action for injuries to one coming in contact with a broken wire heavily charged with electricity, that the jury on finding facts recited based on plaintiff's evidence must find that defendant was negligent and must find for plaintiff unless he was negligent, was erroneous as withdrawing from the jury defendant's evidence showing its freedom from negligence. Southwestern Tel., etc., Co. v. Bruce, 89 Ark. 581, 117 S. W. 564. In an action by a passenger on a freight train for injuries from a collision while he was occupying the caboose cupola, where it appeared that others not occupying the cupola were also injured, a charge that if his act in occupying the cupola contributed "in any way whatsoever" to the injury, he could not recover, although defendant was grossly negligent, etc., was erroneous as disregarding evidence tending to show that the injury was not due to plaintiff's being in the cupola. Reed v. Yazoo, etc., R. Co., 94 Miss. 639, 47 So. 670. In an action for killing a horse on a railroad crossing, where the evidence showed that the engineer let off steam to scare it off the track, a charge permitting a recovery upon a finding that defendant omitted to blow the whistle, ring the bell, or slack or stop the train, was held to be erroneous as ignoring that evidence. sufficient to cure the error,[92] the presumption being that no prejudice resulted,[93] and it is only when it is reasonably apparent that the improper evidence has affected the verdict that there is ground for reversal.[94] If, however, it appears that the verdict was in any way affected by testimony improperly admitted, the case will be unrelieved of error regardless of an instruction not to consider the evidence.[95] In respect of the sufficiency of the action to be taken by the court in withdrawing improper evidence the decisions are not harmonious. According to some decisions nothing short of an express instruction to the jury to disregard the evidence will suffice,[96] it being said that the effect of incompetent testimony once admitted cannot be done away with, except by such a charge to the jury as

Applications of rule.— Thus if it appears that the testimony of a witness is hearsay (Pittman v. Gaty, 10 Ill. 186; Barr v. Wilmington Coal Min., etc., Co., 5 Ill. App. 442), or if evidence is admitted on the theory that it will be connected by other evidence with the fact sought to be proved, and is not so connected (Bedell v. Janney, 9 Ill. 193), the jury should be instructed to disregard it. So in an action for assault and battery, where witnesses have been improperly allowed to state their opinions, and the court has improperly characterized the action as trivial, the plaintiff is entitled to an instruction that "the jury are the sole judges of the facts in this case, and they are to determine this case upon their understanding of the facts introduced in evidence solely, without regard to any other person's opinion thereon, no matter whoever they may be." Zube v. Weber, 67 Mich. 52, 60, 34 N. W. 264. And where the court excludes certain evidence, and it is repeated by the witness, the witness should be cautioned as to the ruling, and the jury should be admonished not to consider the statement. U. Reason for rule.—Any other rule would make it necessary in every trial, where an error in the admission of proof is committed, of which error the court becomes aware before the final submission of the case to the jury, to suspend the trial, discharge the jury, and commence anew. A rule of practice leading to such results cannot meet with approval. Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 26 L. ed. 141.

Dec. 682; Henkle v. McClure, 32 Ohio St. 202; Castleman v. Griffin, 13 Wis. 535, holding that the fact that instructions are silent upon the subjects covered by evidence improperly admitted is not equivalent to a positive direction to disregard it and is not sufficient. And see Jones v. U. S. Mutual Acc. Assoc., 92 Iowa 692, 61 N. W. 485. In this case which was an action on an accident policy conditioned that it shall not cover injuries received by the insured while fighting, it appeared that insured was shot in a difficulty. Plaintiff's counsel, against defendant's objection, stated, in the presence of the jury, that he proposed to show that the person by whom deceased was shot had several days before attempted to secure a pistol, and that such person had grabbed at insured's watch and money with a drawn revolver, and evidence as to the person's attempt to secure a revolver was introduced. The evidence was afterward stricken out, and the jury were admonished to disregard the counsel's proposal and the evidence. It was held that it was error to refuse to direct the jury, in the instructions, to disregard the evidence and proposal, the previous admonition alone being insufficient to remove possible prejudice.

Instruction sufficient within the rule.—An oral instruction in respect of a letter improperly admitted, "Gentlemen, you will not further consider the letter of introduction, the contents of which have been read to you," is sufficient. Wright v. Gillespie, 43 Mo. App. 244.

will enforce on them the duty to disregard it completely.[97] Other decisions adopt a less stringent rule. In one case it was said that the nature of the instruction necessary to overcome the effect of evidence improperly before the jury is largely within the discretion of the trial court,[98] and in other cases it has been held that the fact of withdrawal of the evidence implies that it is not to be considered and renders it unnecessary to warn the jury in the general charge to disregard it,[99] that a direction during trial to reject evidence improperly admitted makes it unnecessary for the court to instruct the jury to disregard it,[1] that if the judge in summing up totally ignores the evidence, error cannot be predicated on a failure to expressly direct the jury not to consider it.[2] So it has been held that the court having immediately stricken out evidence, which was all he was asked to do, error cannot be predicated of failure to instruct the jury to disregard such evidence;[3] and that where a party fails to request that an instruction given by the court to correct an error in the admission of evidence be made more explicit, it will be deemed to have been satisfactory to him at the time, and he cannot afterward be heard to complain.[4] So it has been held that in the absence of a request for an instruction directing the jury to disregard evidence improperly admitted error cannot be predicated of a failure to give such instruction.[5]

(III) Evidence Offered, But Not Admitted. The court may refuse to instruct the jury that they are to disregard evidence that has been offered but not admitted.[6] Such a charge is equivalent to a reminder to the jury that they had been sworn to render their verdict according to the evidence and is unnecessary,[7] although it seems that it would not be improper to give such instruction.[8]

d. Ignoring or Excluding Issues, Theories, or Defenses[9]— (I) Statement of Rule. Instructions which ignore or exclude issues, theories, or defenses from the consideration of the jury are erroneous,[10] where there is any evidence

15. Instructions held obnoxious to rule ignoring defenses.—Where one of the defenses interposed is that the damages claimed have been released, it is error to instruct the jury that they may render a verdict for plaintiff without mentioning in such instruction the defense of release. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Nolan, 132 Ill. App. 427. An instruction, in an action against a street railway company for injuries in a collision with a car, that, if plaintiff was guilty of negligence that contributed approximately to the injury, he could not recover unless the company was guilty of subsequent negligence that proximately contributed to the injury, was erroneous, as pretermitting reference to wilfulness or wantonness on the part of the company, charged in the complaint. Garth v. Alabama Tract. Co., 148 Ala. 96, 42 So. 627. Where plaintiff was injured by the alleged negligence of his superintendent in prematurely directing him to uncap a mold, an instruction authorizing a recovery in case the superintendent directed the uncapping of the mold was erroneous as eliminating the question of defendant's negligence. Swiercz v. Illinois Steel Co., 231 Ill. 456, 83 N. E. 168. Where an action for injuries to a servant was submitted to the jury on all the counts of the declaration, and not on the third count alone, which alleged defendant's negligence in failing to provide plaintiff with sufficient help, the refusal of an instruction that the only question for decision was whether defendant was guilty of negligence in not providing sufficient help, etc., was not error. Kirk v. Jajko, 224 Ill. 338, 79 N. E. 577. Where, in an action by an architect, he alleged that the owner was to pay for superintendence five per cent of the lowest bid, which was six thousand one hundred and fifty dollars, and the owner alleged that he was only to pay provided a contractor was procured to erect the building for four thousand dollars, and there was evidence that the lowest bid was a little over five thousand dollars, an instruction authorizing a verdict for the architect for the amount sued for, if the jury believed the architect's claim, was erroneous, as withdrawing from the jury the question of the amount of the lowest bid. Loftus v. Green, (Tex. Civ. App. 1907) 104 S. W. 396. Where, in a suit involving the location of the boundary line between tracts as partitioned among the heirs of a decedent, the controlling inquiry was as to the location of the line fixed by the commissioners and confirmed by the court, an instruction ignoring the theory that the parties had acquiesced in the line for which one of the parties contended, yielding precedence to the supposed intention of the commissioners, was erroneous. Douglas Land Co. v. T. W. Thayer Co., 107 Va. 292, 58 S. E. 1101. In an action against a street railway company for injury caused by a collision between a car and plaintiff's buggy, an instruction to find for plaintiffs regardless of whether they were guilty of contributory negligence, if the motorman discovered their peril in time to have prevented the accident and did not use all means in his power to prevent the accident consistent with safety to himself and passengers, was properly refused, as ignoring the question of injury. Feille v. San Antonio Traction Co., 48 Tex. Civ. App. 541, 107 S. W. 367. An instruction as follows: "If the jury believe from the preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff while in the exercise of ordinary care was injured by or in consequence of the negligence of defendant, as charged in the second count of his amended declaration, then you can find defendant guilty," is held erroneous as ignoring the defense of assumed risk, which was one of the defenses at the trial of the case. Harte v. Fraser, 130 Ill. App. 494, 500. An instruction authorizing a verdict for plaintiff upon mere proof that its marble was damaged by discharges from defendant's gas plant, but ignoring defendant's legal right to operate its machines, and whether plaintiff devoted its premises to an unusual use, is erroneous in omitting important issues. Bradbury Marble Co. v. Laclede Gaslight Co., 128 Mo. App. 96, 106 S. W. 594. Where a petition for injuries to the conductor of a street car in a collision affirmatively charged that the collision was caused by a defective grip on the colliding car, and that defendant knew of such defect, an instruction attempting to enumerate the facts necessary to authorize a verdict for plaintiff, but omitting to require that defendant must have had knowledge of the defective grip, was prejudicially erroneous. Toncrey v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 129 Mo. App. 596, 107 S. W. 1091.

Instructions held not obnoxious to rule.— An instruction summarizing a case and telling the jury that if from a consideration of all the evidence they find the facts as stated, plaintiff is entitled to recover, is not subject to objection as ignoring the theory of the defense when it embraces all the elements essential to a recovery. Springfield Consol. R. Co. v. Hoeffner, 71 Ill. App. 162. Where there was no pretense that a prior locator of a mineral lode did the requisite location work within the specified time from his discovery, a charge in ejectment by a subsequent locator that, if the discovery was made by the prior locator more than sixty days before the subsequent relocation, plaintiff was entitled to recover, etc., was not erroneous as eliminating the possibility that the prior locator had done the location work, and otherwise complied with the law. Ingemarson v. Coffey, 41 Colo. 407, 92 Pac. 908. An instruction directing a finding for plaintiff, unless the jury found for defendant under instructions afterward given, one of which submitted the question of contributory negligence of the driver of plaintiff's team, for the killing of which the action was brought, was not objectionable, as eliminating the question of the driver's contributory negligence. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Summers, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 133, 111 S. W. 211. An instruction that if defendant's servant sustained the injuries complained of as the direct result of an accident, and not as a direct and natural result of defendant's negligence, the jury should find for defendant, was not objectionable as eliminating negligence from the jury's consideration and warranting them in finding for defendant if the injury was accidental, although the result of negligence. De Witt v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 96 S. W. 1122, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1161. Where, in ejectment to recover a town lot located on the public domain, the court in another instruction charged with reference to defenses other than abandonment, an instruction that defendant was required by a preponderance of the evidence to establish plaintiff's abandonment set up as a defense to entitle him to a verdict, and if he did not so prove, the jury should find for plaintiff, was not erroneous, as withdrawing the other defenses from the jury. Lindblom v. Rocks, 146 Fed. 660, 77 C. C. A. 86. Where, in an action for injuries to a switchman, it was shown that plaintiff was in defendant's employ, and was injured by an engine on its track, a statement in an instruction that defendant railroad company contended that plaintiff was in the employment of the company and was injured by an engine on defendant's track was not misleading in that it stated only the contention of plaintiff. Macon, etc., R. Co. v. Joyner, 129 Ga. 683, 59 S. E. 902. Where the petition in a servant's injury action did not allege negligence of the engineer of the train with which his train collided in failing to give signals of its intention to stop sooner than he did, a requested instruction was not objectionable by ignoring any negligence in that respect. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Rogers, (Tex. Civ. App. 1909) 117 S. W. 939. In an action against a railroad company, plaintiffs claimed that insufficient culverts in the railroad's embankment over a watercourse had resulted in overflows and that the velocity of the water had been increased, to the injury of plaintiffs' from an instruction issues sufficiently covered by other instructions,[16] or which have been properly eliminated from the case by the court,[17] or matters admitted by the pleadings.[18] So a party is not entitled to an instruction on a theory which is refuted by an admission in an agreed statement of facts,[19] or which is unavailable as a defense,[20] or where he has waived any claim for damages upon the count upon which the instruction is asked.[21] And an instruction which omits reference to the defense is sufficient where, if the facts to which the instructions apply are found to be true, the defensive matter cannot exist.[22]

(B) Issues Withdrawn or Abandoned. Instructions may and should be confined to issues insisted on at the trial,[23] and where issues are abandoned or expressly withdrawn by the parties, the court may[24] and should omit to submit them to the jury.[25] So issues disposed of during the trial and not to be passed on by the jury are properly omitted in the statement of the issues.[26] The court should not, however, withdraw or exclude from the consideration of the jury issues raised by the pleadings and evidence and not abandoned by the parties, and such action on its part is ordinarily ground for reversal.[27] An instruction that the jury crops. The court charged that if any dam, embankment, and culverts diverted the water or any part thereof from its natural course, and caused it to flow on plaintiffs' land, and any of the damage was caused thereby, etc., then plaintiffs were entitled to recover, but that defendant would not be liable for any damage by overflows of the creek which would have resulted independent of the embankment, if any, etc. It was held that such instructions were not objectionable as eliminating plaintiffs' claim that the embankment increased the velocity and force of the water, which was one of the alleged causes of plaintiffs' damages. Applications of rule.—Where a party announces that he will offer no evidence except as to certain averments of his petition (Crum v. Yundt, 12 Ind. App. 308, 40 N. E. 79); or asks instructions on one theory of his case only, seemingly abandoning another (Leabo v. Goode, 67 Mo. 126), it is not error for the court to fail to instruct upon the issue so abandoned.

(c) Immaterial Issues. The court may properly refuse to charge on immaterial issues,[29] and it is error to submit to the jury an immaterial question which is likely to confuse them as to the issues.[30] However, where appellant is not prejudiced, the submission of immaterial issues is not a ground for reversal.[31]

(d) Requests For Submission of Issues to Jury — (1) NECESSITY AND SUFFICIENCY.[32] Parties who desire the submission of particular issues to the jury should make requests therefor. In the absence of such request, failure to submit a particular issue is not ordinarily assignable as error.[33] The request should be specific so that the court may pass directly upon it.[34] An exception to a charge on a question of fact,[35] or a motion at the close of the evidence to dismiss the case,[36] or a suggestion that a certain fact is in dispute [37] is not the equivalent of a request for the submission of an issue. But where a party requests that the jury shall pass on the whole case, he need not name a particular question of fact.[38]

(2) OPERATION AND EFFECT. A request that specified issues be submitted to the jury operates as a waiver of the submission of all other issues.[39] A party at whose request a particular issue is submitted to the jury cannot thereafter be heard to complain of the action of the court in so doing.[40] The request is equivalent to an admission that there is evidence sufficient to go to the jury on the issue,[41] and the party making the request is bound by the jury's finding thereon.[42]

(E) Effect of Error in Submitting or Failing to Submit Issues or Questions to Jury — (1) SUBMISSION OF ISSUES TO JURY — (a) WHEN GROUND FOR REVERSAL. The submission of issues not within the pleadings, if calculated to mislead the jury, or prejudicial to the rights of a litigant, is reversible error.[43] The submission of issues as to which there is no evidence is ground for reversal where it is apparent that prejudice resulted,[44] as where the issue so submitted is controlling and is decided against appellant,[45] or where the verdict could not have been reached except by a consideration of the question erroneously submitted.[46] The judgment should be reversed where the submission of such issue unsupported by evidence has a tendency to mislead the jury,[47] or where there is no way to determine whether the jury disregarded the issue as to which no evidence was submitted.[48]

(b) When Error Harmless. Error in submitting an issue to the jury will not be ground for reversal if it could not have operated to appellant's prejudice.[49] The decision will not be reversed where the findings on issues properly submitted control the verdict,[50] and the finding on the issue improperly submitted could not affect the verdict,[51] where the finding on other issues renders a finding on the issue erroneously submitted immaterial,[52] where the jury made no finding as to the issue erroneously submitted,[53] where the record shows that the jury did not consider it [54] or was not influenced thereby in the determination reached,[55] where no other determination than that reached by the jury is possible,[56] where the erroneous submission of the issue is in appellant's favor,[57] where the finding on the issue erroneously submitted is in appellant's favor,[58] or where the court rejects an allowance of damages on items of damage improperly submitted to the jury [59] or requires plaintiff to remit a sum sufficient to cover such items.[60] may be reversible error.[61] But error in failing to submit an issue to the jury is harmless and not a ground for reversal where it is apparent that no prejudice resulted to appellant by reason thereof,[62] or if it does not appear that appellant was prejudiced,[63] or unless it is reasonably clear that appellant has been prejudiced thereby.[64] A reviewing court will not reverse for failure to submit an issue to the jury where no other verdict could have been rendered on the evidence,[65] or sustained if rendered,[66] where the evidence was insufficient to establish the issue in appellant's favor,[67] where the verdict rendered made a consideration of the issue not submitted unnecessary,[68] or where the verdict necessarily included a finding against appellant on the issue.[69] And if the issues submitted sufficiently dispose of the controversy, a party cannot complain because a particular issue was not submitted.[70]

(b) Special Interrogatories. Failure or refusal to submit special interrogatories is harmless where it is apparent that no prejudice could have resulted to appellant.[71] Refusal to submit special interrogatories is not a ground for reversal where no other general verdict could have been rendered,[72] where the answers would be immaterial under the general charge given,[73] where the answers to the interrogatories must necessarily have been answered adversely to appellant,[74] where the verdict covers all the issuable facts,[75] where the essential facts are embodied

View That Practice Permissible — (i) Statement of Rule. At common law, and in the absence of any constitutional or statutory restrictions, it is not error for the trial court, in its charge to the jury, to express an opinion on disputed questions of fact, provided such questions are ultimately left to the jury for their decision, without any direction as to how they should find the facts.[82] This practice prevails in the courts of a number of states, where there are no constitutional or statutory

In Michigan there seems to be a conflict of authority as to whether the trial court has a right to express an opinion on the weight of the evidence. In an early case it is said that an expression of opinion from the judge does not amount to a misdirection, even though it may be quite pointed, if the jury are fully informed and understand that they are not bound to follow it, and that they have the right and it is their duty to decide for themselves. Sheahan v. Barry, 27 Mich. 217. See also Tunnicliffe v. Bay Cities Consol. R. Co., 107 Mich. 261, 65 N. W. 226; Blumeno v. Grand Rapids, etc., R. Co., 101 Mich. 325, 59 N. W. 594; Davidson v. Kolb, 95 Mich. 469, 55 N. W. 373; Richards v. Fuller, 38 Mich. 653. But the court has indicated that this rule is not to be extended to cases where the instruction implies a duty on the part of the jury to yield their judgment to that of the judge. Blumeno v. Grand Rapids, etc., R. Co., supra; Mawich v. Elsey, 47 Mich. 10, 8 N. W. 587, 10 N. W. 57. Of course a party has no right to demand that such instruction be given. Perrott v. Shearer, 17 Mich. 48. On the other hand there are a large number of cases which seem to hold that it is error for the trial judge to express any opinion on the weight of the evidence or the credibility of witnesses. Schweyer v. Jones, 152 Mich. 241, 115 N. W. 974; Harker v. Detroit United R. Co., 150 Mich. 697, 114 N. W. 657; Valin v. McKerreghan, 104 Mich. 213, 62 N. W. 340; Letts v. Letts, 91 Mich. 596, 52 N. W. 54; Babbitt v. Bumpus, 73 Mich. 331, 41 N. W. 417, 16 Am. St. Rep. 585; Davis v. Gerber, 69 Mich. 246, 37 N. W. 281; Henry C. Hart Mfg. Co. v. Mann's Boudoir Car Co., 65 Mich. 564, 32 N. W. 820; Spalding v. Lowe, 56 Mich. 366, 23 N. W. 46. Thus what certain statements tend to prove, or the weight to be given them, are proper questions for the jury, and the court cannot instruct them as to the weight or importance to attach to any particular part of the testimony. To do so, would be but usurping the proper province of the jury. Cartier v. Douville, 98 Mich. 22, 56 N. W. 1045; Wessels v. Beeman, 87 Mich. 481, 49 N. W. 483; Hayes v. Homer, 36 Mich. 374; Blackwood v. Brown, 32 Mich. 104; Perrott v. Shearer, 17 Mich. 48. So it is improper for the trial judge to refer to a witness' testimony in scathing terms, and to pass such criticisms thereon as are calculated to impress the jury with his own views of the facts. Sterling v. Callahan, 94 Mich. 536, 54 N. W. 495; Pokriefka v. Mackurat, 91 Mich. 399, 51 N. W. 1059; People v. Lyons, 49 Mich. 78, 13 N. W. 365.

In New Hampshire it is said not to be the ordinary practice for the court to express opinions in regard to the weight of the evidence. Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 460. See also McDougall v. Shirley, 18 N. H. 108. But it is not irregular for them to make such suggestions in relation to the facts as they may suppose will be useful to the jury, the matter being left to them for decision. provisions forbidding judges to express any opinion upon the facts. Where this practice prevails the opinion of the court may properly be expressed, either directly, or inferentially through the drift of its comments and the marshaling of facts in its charge,[87] and the exercise of its discretion cannot be reviewed unless the court fails to submit the questions of fact to the jury without direction as to how they shall find the facts, or plainly abuses its discretion.[88] The fact that the opinion expressed is erroneous does not alter the rule.[89]

(II) NECESSITY OF EXPRESSING OPINION. Whether or not a trial judge will exercise his right of expressing an opinion on the facts depends upon his judicial discretion.[90] Unless the circumstances are exceptional,[91] he is not bound to do so,[92] even on request.[93]

(III) NECESSITY OF INFORMING JURY THAT OPINION ADVISORY ONLY.[94] Whenever the judge delivers his opinion to the jury on a matter of fact, it should be delivered as mere opinion, and not as direction, and the jury should be left to understand clearly that they are to decide the fact upon their own view of the evidence, and that the judge interposes his opinion only to aid them in cases of difficulty, or to inspire them with confidence in cases of doubt.[95] Ordinarily this duty is best performed by expressly informing the jury that they are the exclusive judges of the facts, and are not bound by the opinion of the court,[96] and it has been held error to omit to so instruct,[97] at least where the statute expressly requires it.[98] On the other hand it has been held that a charge on the facts is not objectionable for failure to accompany it with a statement that the jury alone are to weigh the evidence and determine the facts, especially where that power or duty is unmistakably suggested to the jury all through the charge.[99] And in one jurisdiction it is said that if a party fears undue influence upon the jury of what the court says in regard to the facts, he may request an instruction that the jury, and not the court, are to determine the facts.[1]

(IV) How Strong Opinion May Be Expressed. To what extent the right of expressing an opinion on the weight of evidence shall be exercised depends upon the discretion of the trial judge, subject to certain limitations.[2] It is said that a trial judge may express his opinion freely on the weight and value of evidence.[3] Very strong expressions of opinion on the facts are tolerated, indeed sometimes may be necessary;[4] and such an expression of opinion, however decided, is not the ground of an exception, if the jury are not misled,[5] and if no binding direction is given to the jury to find in accordance with such opinion,[6] and all questions of fact are fairly submitted to them to decide upon their own judgment.[7]

98. Under Minn. Pub. St. c. 61, § 22, providing that if the court, in its charge, "present the facts of the case, it must also inform the jury that they are the exclusive judges of all questions of fact," it was held error in the court to express an opinion on the facts without so informing the jury. It depends so much upon the particular circumstances of each case, upon the course and character of the argument and sometimes even upon facts outside of the case, such as popular excitement and external influences which affect, or are meant to affect, the feelings, prejudices, and judgment of jurors, that the judge alone can properly estimate them; and it becomes at times a difficult and delicate, although none the less an obligatory, duty upon him to determine what he ought to say and where he ought to stop. If the expression of opinion is made in such a manner that the jury may naturally regard it as a direction to them, and as excluding them from finding the fact for themselves, there being evidence, proper for them to consider, both for and against such direction, this is fatal error.[8] Moreover all comments on the evidence must be made in such a manner as not to be one-sided or unfair.[9] Within these limitations, it is the right of the court to aid them by recalling the testimony to their recollection, by collating its details, by suggesting grounds of preference where there is contradiction, by directing their attention to the most important facts, by indicating the true points of inquiry, by resolving the evidence, however complicated, into its simplest elements, and by showing the bearing of its several parts and their combined effect, stripped of every consideration which might otherwise mislead or confuse them.[10] to refuse it.[13] Such a constitutional or statutory provision is mandatory. It leaves no discretion to the judge as to whether or not he shall charge or comment on the weight of evidence, or as to whether or not he shall submit questions of fact solely to the jury.[14] A charge to a jury is perfectly unexceptionable only when the judge confines himself to the duty of setting forth the law applicable to the case, without either expressing or intimating any opinion as to the weight of the evidence, or the credibility of the witnesses.[15] Even if the knowledge of the judge trying a case may be superior to that of the witnesses in respect to facts in issue, yet the law does not permit him to bias the jury by his own opinion as to any disputed fact which is required to be proved.[16] It is generally held, however, that such a provision is not designed to deprive the courts of all power to deal with the facts proved;[17] but authorizes the court to state the testimony, with its legal effect and bearing upon the issues, and to indicate its particular application under the rules of law.[18] But in some jurisdictions, notably Texas, a more strict limitation is placed upon trial courts.[19]

(II) Manner of Expressing Opinion — (A) In General. Where charges on the weight of the evidence are prohibited, the court must not in any way indicate its opinion of the facts to the jury.[20] The whole matter of finding the facts of the case must be left entirely to the jury, without suggestions or leadings by the court.[21] Any remark made by a judge, whether direct or indirect, intentional or inadvertent, from which the jury may infer what his opinion is, as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence, or any part of it pertinent to the issue, is error;[22] and the fact that counsel or a witness was addressed, and not

By words or conduct the court may, on the one hand, support the character or testimony of a witness, or on the other may destroy the same, in the estimation of the jury. McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300.

In Maine the statute of 1874, c. 212, prohibits the trial judge from expressing an opinion upon issues of fact arising in the the jury, is a matter of no consequence. The effect upon the jury is the same.[23] Where, however, a ruling on the admissibility of evidence necessarily involves the expression of an opinion upon the evidence already introduced, such expression of opinion is not error.[24]

(B) By Questions Addressed to Jury. The opinion of the court on a question of fact may be as well conveyed to the jury by an interrogatory statement as by a direct, positive one. If the question is asked in such a tone and manner as to manifest the clear conviction of the court how it ought to be answered, it will be error, as an expression of opinion on the evidence;[25] but without some such peculiarity of tone or manner, intimating the opinion of the court, and influencing or tending to influence the judgment of the jury, the question may be nothing more than a proper direction of their attention to a material inquiry of fact.[26]

(III) CHARGES ON WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE ILLUSTRATED. A charge on the weight of evidence may be said to occur when, in the progress of a trial, a judge expresses his own opinion upon the force and effect of the testimony or of any part of it, or intimates his views of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence, in whole or in part.[27] It must be an opinion on some matter of fact. It must be such an expression of opinion on a matter of fact, that thereby the jury are made to know what is his estimate of the truth or falsity of some matter in testimony, and, lastly, such expression by the judge must relate to some matter of fact at issue between the parties.[28] Thus it has been held error for the trial court to define the character and amount of evidence necessary to sustain a verdict;[29] or where the evidence is conflicting to tell the jury that they must find for a party designated if they believe certain witnesses,[30] or if they believe the evi-case. This language has been construed to require a direct and positive expression of opinion to require a reversal of the judgment. State v. Benner, 64 Me. 267. It does not follow that the judge has expressed an opinion upon the issue because his opinion may be inferred from some allusion which he may make to some obvious and indisputable fact (McLellan v. Wheeler, 70 Me. 285); nor because an inference favorable or unfavorable to the position taken by one of the parties may be drawn from such obvious truth or fact (McLellan v. Wheeler, supra).

In State v. Harkin, 7 Nev. 377, 383, the court said: "It is evident that the opinion of the court can be as effectively conveyed to the jury by expressing it in their hearing while ruling upon an objection to evidence, as by embodying it in what purports to be a declaration of the law for their instruction. Accordingly, and we think correctly, it has been held that the judge has no more right to volunteer, before the jury, his opinion upon a material fact in controversy, while deciding a question of law on the trial, than he has to charge the jury in respect to such fact. . . . The right to a decision on the facts, by a jury uninfluenced and unbiased by the opinion of the judge, has been deemed worthy of a constitutional guarantee. It cannot be lawfully denied, by the simple evasion of looking at the counsel instead of at the jury, or of foisting the opinion into a ruling upon the testimony."

For example, where the trial judge, in charging the jury, asked: "Is that the way an honest man would act? . . . Do honest people act so?" it was held that the natural and almost inevitable effect of this language was to influence the jury in reaching a conclusion by conveying to them the impressions which the testimony left upon the mind of the judge; and, therefore, that the judge transcended the limits prescribed for him by the constitution. it to the jury to determine whether such facts have been so proved; [8] naming the circumstances which the jury might consider in determining the case; [9] explaining for what purpose certain testimony was admitted; [10] or stating, analyzing, comparing, and explaining the evidence.[11]

(v) Cure by Subsequent Charge and Harmless Error. Where the trial judge has expressed an opinion on the weight of the evidence, the error is not ordinarily considered as corrected by his subsequently telling the jury that it is their exclusive province to determine on the sufficiency or insufficiency of evidence, and that they are not bound by his opinion in regard thereto.[12] Nor will judgment be reversed for an instruction as to the sufficiency of evidence on an immaterial point.[13] And of course a party cannot complain because the judge intimates an opinion on the facts, when it is favorable to him.[14] However, a charge on the weight of the evidence will not always require the reversal of the judgment. Thus, if no other conclusion could be arrived at on the evidence, and it is apparent that no harm could have resulted, the error will not be sufficient to justify a reversal.[15]

6. Summing Up Evidence [16]— a. Definition or Description. Summing up may be described as follows: When the evidence is gone through on both sides, the judge, in the presence of the parties, the counsel, and all others, sums up the whole to the jury, omitting all superfluous circumstances, observing wherein the main question and principal issue lies, stating what evidence has been given to support it, with such remarks as he thinks necessary for their direction, and giving them his opinion in matters of law arising upon that evidence.[17] Summing up, it will be observed, is a very different thing from charging on the weight of the evidence, and to prevent confusion it is necessary to keep this distinction in mind.

b. Authority of Court to Sum Up Evidence. In the absence of any statutory or constitutional provision prohibiting such practice,[18] it is the privilege, although not necessarily the duty, of the court to sum up the evidence in its charge to the jury,[19] and to state its recollection of what has or has not been testified to, submitting the whole matter to their consideration and judgment.[20] Such practice is not an infringement of a statutory or constitutional provision prohibiting the expression of opinion by the trial court upon issues of fact.[21] In some states, by express provision, the court is permitted to "state the testimony," [22] provided the jury are informed that they are the exclusive judges of all questions of fact.[23]

Another definition.— Summing up, on the trial of an action by a jury, is a recapitulation of the evidence adduced, in order to draw the attention of the jury to the salient points. The counsel for each party has the right of summing up his evidence, if he has adduced any, and the judge finally sums up the whole in his charge to the jury. Smith, Act 157; Black L. Dict.

c. Necessity of Summing Up. Ordinarily the omission of the court to sum up the evidence is no ground to set aside the verdict.[24] If the testimony is of a complicated character, difficult of recollection and comprehension, and there is a controversy between the parties litigant as to what facts are deposed to, it may be the duty of the court either to state the testimony or to recall the witness 517, the court must not recapitulate the facts so as to influence the verdict. Hewes v. Barron, 7 Mart. N. S. 134.

In Oregon Hill Annot. Laws, § 200, prohibits the trial court from presenting the facts of a case to the jury. Under this section it is not error to instruct the jury that there is evidence for plaintiff "to the effect," etc., and that there is evidence "tending to show," etc., since this does not amount to an attempt to state the facts to the jury, but merely calls their attention to the theories of the respective parties. upon the controverted points for explanation;[25] but when there is no dispute relative to the facts deposed to, and the testimony is not complicated or difficult of recollection, the court, in its discretion, may decline exercising power given it without committing error.[26] This is a legal discretion, and the refusal to exercise it is not error unless it can be shown that injury did or might necessarily be supposed to have arisen from this refusal.[27]

d. Manner of Summing Up. The minuteness with which a trial judge, in his charge to the jury, shall recapitulate the evidence, is largely within his discretion.[28] The judge is not bound to recapitulate all the evidence in his charge to the jury,[29] or even any considerable portion thereof.[30] It is enough if he gives to the jury a general review of the evidence on the one side and the other which fairly and adequately presents the course of the respective contentions of the parties, with enough reference to the items of evidence to assist the jury in recalling it as a substantial whole and to appreciate its bearings.[31] If a party desires the entire testimony, or any specific part thereof, recapitulated to the jury, he should make the request in apt time and before verdict.[32] In stating testimony, it is not necessary to take the witnesses one by one, and give the words of each separately;[33] but the judge may, and probably should, state to the jury the various questions of fact arising out of the testimony, together with the evidence bearing upon such questions, in its natural and proper order, without regard to the order in which it was detailed by the witnesses from the stand.[34] The charge must not be inaccurate on matters of substance,[35] and, for reasons which are

e. Misstatement of Evidence. If the trial court misstates the evidence on a material fact to the prejudice of the party complaining it is reversible error,[37] although the testimony is elsewhere correctly stated.[38] But a trial judge is not held to a literal and verbatim statement of the testimony of a witness.[39] It is only necessary that he should give correctly the substance of the testimony.[40] Nor is it every misrecollection of the court of a witness' testimony, or every misstatement of his language, that works material error.[41] It must be with reference to a material point,[42] and such a misstatement as probably misleads the jury.[43] Moreover the attention of the court should be called to the matter at the time,[44] and if this is not done, exceptions will not be allowed.[45]

Illustrations.— Where the court instructs the jury that certain material testimony had been given, which is not shown by the record to have been given, it is ground for reversal. Dougherty v. King, 22 N. Y. App. Div. 610, 48 N. Y. Suppl. 110. So it has been held error to refer to the testimony of a witness as hearsay when only a portion thereof is hearsay (Fengar v. Brown, 57 Conn. 60, 17 Atl. 321), or to convey the impression that only one witness has sworn to a certain material fact when in fact two witnesses have testified to such fact (Idaho Mercantile Co. v. Kalanquin, 8 Ida. 101, 66 Pac. 933).

Where the judge is particular to give the jury only his recollection of the evidence, and the whole matter is distinctly left to their determination, the fact that the judge misstates some of the evidence has been held not to be error. Knapp v. Griffin, 140 Pa. St. 604, 21 Atl. 449; Green v. Dodge, 79 Vt. 73, 64 Atl. 499. Thus where a statement of the evidence, while not in conformity to the contention of the party objecting thereto, was supported by some testimony, and was not given as a binding statement, or as anything more than a recitation of the court's understanding thereof, error could not be predicated thereon. 7. Assumptions of Fact in Instructions[46]— a. Material Controverted Facts— (i) Statement of Rule. An instruction should not assume the existence of a material fact in dispute,[47] although the testimony to the contrary is slight,[48] unless such evidence is so vague and uncertain as to be of no value,[49] or so clearly defective as not to raise an issue.[50] The court should never assume an issue proven, unless the evidence is so conclusive one way that the minds of reasonable men could reach but one conclusion as to the result.[51] Instructions assuming material facts in dispute are objectionable as being on the weight of the evidence.[52] It follows therefore that requests for such instructions are properly refused.[53] assaulted plaintiff wilfully, the jury might give vindictive damages,[65] or if they find for plaintiff they will assess his damages in such sum as they believe from the evidence will compensate for all pain caused him,[66] or that plaintiff if guilty of contributory negligence in using the car as alleged in the petition could not recover,[67] or that he cannot recover if the jury believe from the evidence that certain things happened "which" caused plaintiff's injuries,[68] or that under certain stated circumstances it was the duty of the motorman to use every reasonable effort to stop the car and if he failed to do so his employer was guilty of negligence,[69] or if they found for plaintiff they would consider injuries inflicted, if any, and bodily and mental anguish endured, if any.[70] In other cases instructions in the following form have been held not to be subject to the criticism that they assume a controverted fact: That if certain facts were found in regard to the condition of a sidewalk, and that the officers of the city had passed the place, then the city would be presumed to have notice of the dangerous condition of the sidewalk; [71] that if a lessor had created an obstruction the lessee was not responsible unless it maintained it after demand to abate it, and if the lessee held it as the person who originally constructed it, without any request to remove it, without any increase in the flow of water it was not responsible; [72] that if a remittance by plaintiff to defendant was not a loan, but to make good an overdrawn account, there could be no recovery therefor; [73] that plaintiffs sued defendant on a verbal contract wherein certain things were agreed on, defendant denying the contract, etc.; [74] that the jury may consider all the facts in evidence surrounding the transaction in regard to the releasing of defendant from the obligation to pay the sum claimed to be released; [75] that proof of liability is made out when certain facts are shown; [76] that if the evidence showed that plaintiff and her husband treated certain paper as their joint property, it would authorize a finding that each had a half interest, and that any interest inconsistent therewith was relinquished to the other; [77] that in the contingency of the maker of a note becoming insolvent, an old note and mortgage may be more valuable than a new note and mortgage; [78] that when unsoundness of mind of a permanent nature has been established, the presumption is that that state of unsoundness exists or continues until the contrary is shown;[79] that plaintiffs having the burden of proof they must establish the allegations of their petition by a preponderance of evidence; [80] that the jury are to determine for themselves what allegations of the complaint have been proven by a preponderance of the evidence and what have not,[81] or that if the jury believe certain recited evidence they should find for plaintiff; [82] or that a decedent had a right to give his wife property, without any writing evidencing the gift, and the same would be valid against her heirs.[83]

mentary,[86] or record, evidence.[87] The court may assume the existence of a fact where only one finding as to such fact would be justified under the evidence,[88] or where under the evidence there is no ground for a difference of opinion as to the existence of the fact,[89] or reasonable men could draw but one conclusion therefrom,[90] or where the evidence is such as to warrant a peremptory instruction.[91] Instructions of this character are not open to the objection of charging in respect of matters of fact [92] or in violation of a statute forbidding a judge to express or intimate his opinion as to what has or has not been proved.[93] However, the court can treat a fact as undisputed only when it is not only unopposed by direct evidence but is not in conflict with proper inferences from other facts in evidence.[94] Nor does it follow that because testimony as to certain facts is uncontradicted it must necessarily be believed, or that the court is authorized to assume the existence of such facts in instructing the jury.[95] The very matter stated by the witness may be too improbable to be believed by an intelligent person, and its mere statement its own refutation, without a word of impeaching or contradictory testimony.[96] Where there are other circumstances shown by the evidence which have a bearing upon the weight and credit to be given to uncontradicted testimony the question as to whether the fact is proved is for the jury.[97] The court cannot assume as proven matters supported only by the uncontradicted testimony of a party or other interested witness.[98] And where the uncontradicted testimony is opinion evidence, the court has no right to assume as proved the matters to which it relates.[99]

Where facts have been admitted either by the pleading,[7] or by the parties on the trial of the case,[8] the court should assume their existence. A requested instruction which assumes that the existence of such facts is an open question is properly refused,[9] and the giving of such instruction is erroneous.[10]

d. Facts as to Which There Is no Evidence.[11] An instruction which assumes the existence of certain facts, or of evidence tending to prove them, when in fact there is no such evidence, is erroneous and should not be given.[12]

e Facts Shown Not to Exist. An instruction which assumes the existence of facts which the evidence shows do not exist,[13] or which the evidence strongly tends to show do not exist,[14] are erroneous, and the refusal thereof proper.[15]

f. Matters of Common Knowledge. That the court in instructing the jury recognizes and states matters of common knowledge is not available error.[16]

g. Facts Assumed For Purpose of Illustration. Illustrations which are apt and clearly made and are not so extended as to withdraw the attention of the jury from the issue to be determined are not generally erroneous, but may sometimes be beneficial.[17] It is not error for a trial court, in its instructions to a jury, to state so much of the admitted facts as may be necessary to illustrate and apply the law to the case on trial.[18] The assumption of a state of facts not in evidence, merely by way of illustrating and explaining some proposition of law applicable to the case under consideration, and not as having been proved, is not erroneous,[19]

Limitation of rule.— The submission incidentally of a fact admitted by the pleadings is not prejudicially erroneous where the instructions taken as a whole do not place the existence of that fact before the jury as a controverted issue, and where upon a review of the instructions and evidence it appears that the jury could not have been misled. especially where the jury are explicitly informed that the facts are stated merely by way of illustration.[20] This is a matter of common practice, and no intelligent juror can be misled by such illustrations.[21] On the other hand illustrations which are inapt or irrelevant or are so made as to confuse or mislead the jury are to be avoided.[22]

h. Assumption of Non-Existence of Facts. The court may in its charge assume that there was no evidence to establish a certain fact when such is the case.[23] But where there is evidence tending to show certain facts an instruction which assumes their non-existence is erroneous,[24] and this is so, although the evidence be slight.[25] Nor should the court assume that a fact is doubtful where there is no conflict in the testimony and no room to hesitate or doubt as to the existence of such fact.[26]

i. When Improper Assumption Harmless. An improper assumption of fact in an instruction will not operate to reverse where it is apparent that the party complaining was not injured thereby,[27] as where the verdict is manifestly just,[28] or where the instruction assumes the existence of a fact favorable to the case of the party complaining,[29] or which appears to have been established by his evidence.[30]

8. Instructions as to Inferences From Evidence. As shown in another chapter, the inferences to be drawn from the facts in evidence are for the jury.[31] An instruction which denies the right is properly refused,[32] and if given is erroneous.[33]

9. Comments of Judge on Merits of Cause or Conduct of Parties. It is improper for the court to comment on the cause in such manner as to impress the jury that the punishment of one of the parties for acts done by him ought to be great,[43] and it is error to comment on the nature of the case in a manner likely to unduly influence the jury, as by denouncing as harsh a remedy by attachment in favor of a landlord against his tenant,[44] or to state that it considers the case a very simple one, both as to the law and fact, and that the controversy is over a small amount;[45] that the controversy is a trifling matter and the main question is as to the costs,[46] that plaintiff is justified in bringing the action,[47] that defendant's conduct should be stopped by a verdict against him;[48] or, in a malpractice case, that plaintiff has the court's sympathy, and if entitled to a verdict and the jury does not give it to him recklessness among surgeons would be encouraged;[49] or for the judge to intimate to the jury that he has personal knowledge of the facts favorable to one of the parties;[50] or in submitting special questions by request to state that the questions are gotten up to befuddle and mislead the jury,[51] or that plaintiff has presented a very thin case;[52] in an action for injuries caused by negligence to characterize defendant's conduct as "gross and almost criminal negligence";[53] to intimate that the jury ought to award punitive damages;[54] to make an objectionable reference to the good faith of plaintiff's claim to land in suit;[55] or in an action of trespass to refer to the inconsistency of pleas of not guilty and license;[56] or, in a contested case, to say that plaintiff's theory is the more plausible,[57] that the cross-examination of a witness for defendant developed the theory of plaintiff,[58] or that it was not clear to the court how defendant's counsel work out a proposition contended for;[59] or to comment upon the demands of one of the parties while not upon the stand.[60] A charge that "the contract will be sent to the jury box with you, gentlemen, and you can wrestle with it at your pleasure, I cannot read it in the present light" is not an unfavorable comment on the contract as having been printed in small type.[61]

10. Giving Undue Prominence to Particular Matters[62]— a. Issues, Theories, and Defenses. refused.[64] It cannot be inferred, however, from the fact that the contentions of plaintiff were stated more at length than those of defendant that undue stress was laid upon or undue prominence given to plaintiff's contentions.[65] And in submitting issues of fact to the jury the trial judge may state the rules of law pertinent to the case both in the abstract and concrete, without giving undue prominence to the matter in question.[66] So the giving of several instructions on the question of damages has not a tendency to lead the jury to think the court believes that plaintiff should have a verdict; the court cautioning them that they are to make no such deduction, and all but one of the instructions being worded to prevent the giving of excessive damages in the event of a verdict for plaintiff.[67] And the singling out of a certain matter for special consideration if error is harmless where the jury are further instructed that in determining the question all the evidence in relation to it must be considered.[68]

b. Particular Evidence[69]— (i) Statement and Application of Rule. It is not the duty of the trial court to deal separately with particular phases or fragments of the testimony, and instruct thereon.[70] On the contrary it is very

Applications of rule.—Where the issue of contributory negligence was sufficiently submitted in one paragraph of the charge, such issue is unnecessarily emphasized by submitting it in another paragraph. Malone v. Texas, etc., R. Co., 49 Tex. Civ. App. 398, 109 S. W. 430. In an action for injuries at a railroad crossing, it is error for the court to emphasize the contributory negligence of plaintiff by charging on such negligence in several variant forms. Buchanan v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 48 Tex. Civ. App. 299, 107 S. W. 552.

Instruction held not objectionable to rule. —In an action for injuries to plaintiff's wife in alighting from a car, where defendant pleaded contributory negligence, in that she left the car on the side opposite the depot, and that she attempted to leave it with a lot of bundles and packages in her arms, rendering her unable to use the railings, whereby she was caused to lose her balance and fall, special instructions on the subject of contributory negligence conformable to these phrases, given in addition to a charge in general terms on contributory negligence, were not erroneous as giving undue prominence to the issue. Instructions in violation of rule.— In an action by a teamster for injuries caused by a collision with a street car, an instruction that, if the car could have been seen or heard by plaintiff in time to have avoided the collision had he looked or listened, then

(II) Instructions Held Not in Violation of Rule. The rule stated in the preceding section applies only where there are several facts tending to prove or disprove a proposition. It has no application where there is only a single undisputed fact constituting plaintiff's entire case;[76] or where the instructions refer to the evidence of a single witness, who is the sole witness as to certain matters, merely for the purpose of identifying that element of the evidence,[77] or refer to items of damages testified to to refresh the jurors' memory;[78] and it has been held that error is not assignable for singling out particular facts where the jury is further instructed to consider all the evidence.[79] So an instruction is not erroneous as singling out and giving undue prominence to particular facts where the facts stated comprise all the facts essential to a determination of the case,[80] or which direct the jury that in determining the credibility of witnesses they may take into consideration relationship to parties to the suit,[81] or the probability or improbability of testimony,[82] or stating that if plaintiff did not receive any of the injuries complained of he could not recover,[83] that mortgages in evidence did not of themselves show a partnership,[84] that certain evidential facts are evi-

the fact that he says he did look and listen, but did not see or hear the car, in the absence of some obstacle to prevent his seeing or hearing, has no probative force to prove that he looked and listened and did not see or hear the car, was improper as singling out and commenting upon plaintiff's testimony. Zander v. St. Louis Transit Co., 206 Mo. 445, 103 S. W. 1006. Where plaintiff was injured while passing between two parts of a train which had been opened at a crossing, an instruction that if plaintiff's companion saw the train was about to move and warned plaintiff not to proceed, and thereafter plaintiff persisted in attempting to cross the track ahead of the train, she could not recover, was properly refused as singling out particular facts to the exclusion of others on which the jury was authorized to find a verdict. Boyce v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 120 Mo. App. 168, 96 S. W. 670. In an action against a street railway company for injuries to a passenger while alighting from a car, an instruction which predicates a denial of the right of plaintiff to recover, unless the jury are satisfied that the car stopped more than once on the occasion, is objectionable, as singling out a particular fact in the case, and as forbidding a recovery on the belief of the particular fact, although the jury may find under the pleadings that the carrier is liable, and as seeking to turn the result of the cause on a single fact, whereas the issues are broader. Birmingham R., etc., Co v. Wright, 153 Ala. 99, 44 So. 1037. In an action by a town against a county involving the extent of a site dedicated by the town to the county for a courthouse, etc., a charge that in determining the area dedicated the jury should consider the practical construction of the parties of their respective rights by their actions upon the square was properly refused, because it singled out one fact. Victoria v. Victoria County, (Tex. Civ. App. 1909) 115 S. W. 67. In an action for damages for delay in the transportation of cattle, an instruction singling out certain facts and stating that the jury could consider them in determining what was a reasonable time for the shipment of the cattle was erroneous in giving too great emphasis to the particular facts. Dupree v. Texas, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1906) 96 S. W. 647. A requested charge that the jury should consider with the other facts and circumstances the fact that plaintiff requested defendant's station agent not to report the accident, and the fact that plaintiff made no claim against defendant on account of her alleged injuries for over a year, etc., was properly refused, as singling out certain facts. Landrum v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 132 Mo. App. 717, 112 S. W. 1000. An instruction, in an action against a railway company for the death of a pedestrian struck by a train at a public crossing, that it was the duty of the pedestrian in approaching the track to stop, look, and listen, was properly refused because it gave undue prominence to particular facts as constituting contributory negligence. dentiary of an ultimate fact,[85] that stipulated facts are to be taken as true,[86] or, under conflicting evidence, instructs as to the burden of proof, the preponderance of evidence and the inevitable result to plaintiff of the evidence being evenly balanced;[87] or applies the principles of law stated in a previous paragraph;[88] or instructs that if the jury believes defendant plaintiff is entitled to some damages;[89] or submits to the jury the question of an inference that may be drawn from facts in evidence;[90] or calls to their attention material facts proved in order to exhibit the true points in controversy;[91] or specifies the elements of damage that may be considered;[92] or, where stating the testimony for both parties impartially, recites the testimony for plaintiff more fully than that for defendant;[93] or states that the weight to be given to the testimony of an uncontradicted witness is for the jury;[94] that the jury should not accord to certain opinion evidence undue weight as being that of experts or persons especially qualified to testify, but that it was entitled to such consideration as is due the testimony of competent witnesses in ordinary cases;[95] or that, as decedent was deaf, it was his duty to exercise great caution in the use of his remaining senses to avoid danger from the train by which he was killed,[96] however correct they may be as legal propositions.[97] Such instructions are objectionable as being argumentative,[98] and the rule condemning them is especially applicable where the facts singled out are not controlling,[99] or where the court authorizes or directs the jury to reach certain conclusions from the evidence singled out if they believe it.[1] However, where the record is otherwise free from error and the case is not close upon the point emphasized, the judgment will not be reversed for that reason.[2]

Invasion of province of jury.—An instruction invades the province of the jury which singles out one established fact in the case, and informs the jury that from that fact alone as a matter of law a certain conclusion does not follow. c. Testimony of Designated Witnesses.[3] It is hardly more than a repetition of the principles heretofore laid down to state that it is error for a trial court in its instructions to the jury to single out the testimony of a designated witness or witnesses and lay particular stress on it, thereby obscuring other evidence in the case and minimizing its effect, and requested instructions vicious in this respect are properly refused.[4] The reason of the rule is obvious. Each party to an action is entitled to have all the evidence relevant to the issues considered fairly by the jury, and this right is seriously prejudiced, if not defeated, when the court singles out and isolates the testimony of a particular party or witness and gives to it undue importance.[5]

d. Propositions of Law. As is shown in the following section it is objectionable and sometimes ground for reversal to give undue prominence to a proposition of law by repetition thereof,[6] and a requested instruction which gives undue prominence to propositions of law is properly refused.[7] However, an instruction giving the rule of damages if the jury should find for plaintiff does not so emphasize such a finding as to exclude from the minds of the jury the alternative of Instructions in violation of rule.—In ejectment, instructions that the location of the land was a physical fact to be determined by the jury, and that the testimony of certain expert witnesses should not be considered as that of experts, but merely as that of witnesses testifying to such particular physical facts, and that as to physical facts such as the location of streams, or bluffs thereof, and their meanderings, the testimony of those who knew the facts was as worthy of belief as that of experts, were objectionable, as giving needless prominence to certain testimony at the expense of other testimony. Chappelle v. Roberts, 150 Ala. 457, 43 So. 489. An instruction that all the statements, made by plaintiff while upon the stand testifying, which were against her interest must be accepted by the jury as absolutely true, and that all statements made by her in her own favor should be given such weight and credence as the jury might deem them entitled to, was erroneous, as singling out and commenting upon plaintiff's testimony. Huff v. St. Joseph R., etc., Co., 213 Mo. 495, 111 S. W. 1145.

Instructions held not in violation of rule.— Undue prominence is not given to the testimony of a witness merely by calling attention to him by name, where his version of the transaction is not referred to (West Chicago St. R. Co. v. Dougherty, 64 Ill. App. 599); where his name is mentioned but once and that on an issue which was answered as a question of law (Lance v. Butler, 135 N. C. 419, 47 S. E. 488); where it is mentioned merely for the purpose of telling the jury that they have no right to disregard his testimony because he is related by marriage to plaintiff (North Chicago St. R. Co. v. Wellner, 206 Ill. 272, 69 N. E. 6 [affirming 105 Ill. App. 652]); where the president of a corporation testifies in its behalf by telling the jury that his testimony is not conclusive but that they should take into consideration all the evidence (Sanders v. North End Bldg., etc., Assoc., 178 Mo. 674, 77 S. W. 833); or to say that plaintiff's own testimony is to be judged by certain proper tests when the jury is directed to subject the testimony of all other witnesses to like tests (Kavanaugh v. Wausau, 120 Wis. 611, 98 N. W. 550); or by instructing that the jury might consider any interest which witnesses might feel (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 166 Ill. 572, 46 N. E. 1125); or where there were but two witnesses for plaintiff and the testimony of one of them fully presented plaintiff's claim by charging that if the jury believed that witness they should find for plaintiff (Gregg v. Mallett, 111 N. C. 74, 15 S. E. 936).

finding for defendant, and therefore an assignment of error to the giving of such instruction cannot be sustained.[8]

11. REPETITION.[9] The court is not bound to bring forward into each succeeding instruction all that has gone before,[10] and should not reiterate propositions of law in other instructions after once clearly stating them to the jury.[11] Repetition of instructions involving the same principles of law is ordinarily considered improper and to be avoided in charging the jury,[12] unless in order to fairly and intelligibly present all the issues in the case it becomes necessary to repeat a proposition.[13] The repetition of instructions is objectionable on several grounds, one of which is that it has a tendency to give undue prominence to particular features of the case,[14] and may be pursued to such an extent as to amount to a

What does not amount to repetition.— Where the general charge states a proposition in general terms, a further instruction stating it in connection with the facts is not repetition within the rule. Anderson v. Jefferson Cotton Oil, etc., Co., 32 Tex. Civ. App. 288, 74 S. W. 342. Instructions, each presenting facts to some extent different, are not subject to objection as constituting unnecessary repetition. Central City Loan, etc., Co. v. Vincent, (Tex. Civ. App. 1909) 117 S. W. 912. In a suit to set aside certain deeds, the court charged that the undisputed evidence showed that L was the agent of the ultimate grantee in the purchase of the property, and that if L and S, or either of them, knew, before the execution of the deed by plaintiff and her husband and L, that plaintiff was compelled to sign through fear of her husband, or if at the time the deed was signed by her the notary failed to fully explain it, or failed to take her acknowledgment as required by law, the knowledge of such facts by S and L would be binding on the ultimate grantee. It was held that such instruction was not objectionable as involving undue repetition. London v. Crow, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 190, 102 S. W. 177. Where the court stated in the general charge that the burden of proof was on plaintiff to establish the material allegations of his petition, the giving of a special charge that, if a passenger is injured while alighting from a train, he cannot recover therefor, unless it is shown by a preponderance of evidence that the injury was caused by the failure of the company to exercise the proper degree of care, was not objectionable as giving due prominence to the rule of law expressed. Illustration.— It is not erroneous to repeat a proposition of law, in giving instructions to the jury, in proper connection with other facts or principles involved when necessary to fairly and intelligently present all the issues in a case (Grau v. Houston, 45 Nebr. 813, 64 N. W. 245); or to state in connection with each issue submitted that it must be established by a preponderance of the evidence (Martin v. St. Louis South Western R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 56 S. W. 1011).

14. Kahl v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 125 Ill. App. 294; Meachem v. Hahn, 46 Ill. App. 144, 149 (in which it was said: "Counsel may select the strong and salient points appearing, and seek in the argument to direct the thought of the jury to them as being the important and controlling features of the case, but the instructions of the court should not be made the medium for conveying such views to the jury"); Stringfellow v. Braselton, (Tex. charge upon the weight of the evidence.[15] So the repetition of the same propositions may have the effect of embarrassing and confusing the jury.[16] "Instructions are intended to give to the jury a clear and concise statement of the law governing the case. The duplication of instructions has a tendency to mislead or confuse, rather than to guide the jury, and thus to frustrate the very object intended to be accomplished, by their being given at all."[17] While it is proper to refuse to give instructions which are merely repetitions of others given,[18] the repetition of instructions is not ordinarily considered ground for reversal.[19] But where the repetition of instructions gives undue prominence to one phase of the case, and such prominence is calculated to prejudice a party by inducing the jury to believe that the issue presented is the controlling one,[20] or where the instruction is objectionable in form,[21] the judgment will be reversed.[22] And instructions objectionable in this regard, when taken in connection with other instructions, may authorize a reversal.[23] However, as is shown in a subsequent chapter where the question is considered at length, it is not erroneous to repeat instructions at the request of the jury.[24]

12. APPEALS TO SYMPATHY OR PREJUDICE.[25] It is error for the court in its charge to improperly appeal to the sympathies and prejudices of the jury,[26] and requested instructions containing such appeals are properly refused.[27]

13. BASING BELIEF ON EVIDENCE. Although there are some decisions which hold that it is not necessary that the instructions should predicate the belief of the jury as to the existence or non-existence of facts on the evidence, and that this is necessarily implied,[28] there is an equally large number which hold that instructions to the jury should direct them to base their belief on the evidence, and that the giving of instructions which do not contain this requirement is erroneous,[29]

An instruction that if the jury "are the sole judges of all questions of fact in this case" is erroneous for not referring them to the evidence for guidance in finding the facts. Maxwell v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 140 Ill. App. 156.

An instruction that if the jury find certain facts they should find accordingly is erroneous, as the belief upon which a jury is authorized to act must be a belief from the evidence. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Libey, 68 Ill. App. 144.

An instruction that the belief of the jury, independent of the evidence, might control and warrant a verdict is erroneous. People v. Peden, 109 Ill. App. 560.

An instruction requiring the jury to base their belief on the evidence and instructions is erroneous. Kranz v. Thieben, 15 Ill. App. 482. But an instruction that does not require the jury to believe any fact from the instructions, but merely informs them that, if under the evidence and instructions, they believe defendant liable and give a verdict for plaintiff, they shall assess his damages is proper. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Kendall, 49 Ill. App. 398.

"If you find from the preponderance of the evidence."— The use of the phrase "if you find from the evidence" is equivalent to the employment of "if you find from the preponderance of the evidence," and is free from ground of complaint. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Warriner, 132 Ill. App. 301 [affirmed in 229 Ill. 91, 82 N. E. 246]. The expression "if you find from the evidence" means a finding from a consideration of all the evidence, and therefore calls for a finding from the preponderance of the evidence. Donk Bros. Coal, etc., Co. v. Thil, 228 Ill. 233, 81 N. E. 857 [affirming 128 Ill. App. 249]; Ducharme v. St. Peter, 135 Ill. App. 530.

unless the facts are admitted or uncontroverted.[30] An instruction is proper that tells the jury that they have no right to permit anything to influence their minds except the evidence and the law,[31] and the court should, on request, instruct that the jury have no right to indulge in conjecture and speculations not supported by the evidence.[32] But the court is not required to repeat in every clause of an instruction,[33] or in each of a series of instructions,[34] that the jury must "find from the evidence," after the words have once been used in such a way that by reasonable construction they would be applicable to each fact required by the instruction to be found by the jury.[35] An instruction which leaves the jury free to consider facts not proved by the evidence, but of which they have been informed in some other way,[36] or which tells the jury that to determine a fact they must look to the evidence as far as it is clear and unambiguous,[37] is erroneous.

14. Hypothesizing Evidence. Upon the trial of an issue of fact by a jury, where there is a conflict of evidence, it is the duty of the court, in instructing the jury, to charge hypothetically;[38] that is, to propound the law, and direct its

"Circumstances appearing on the trial."— An instruction on the credibility of witnesses should not use the phrase "circumstances appearing on the trial," but the phrase "circumstances appearing in evidence." Illinois Commercial Men's Assoc. v. Perrin, 139 Ill. App. 543.

Proper substitutes for phrase.— The phrases, under the evidence and instructions of the court, and, from the preponderance of the evidence in this case and under the instructions of the court, are proper substitutes for the customary term from the evidence. Preventing attention to arguments of counsel.—An instruction that the jury should arrive at its verdict "solely on the evidence introduced, being governed by the instructions of the court, and to permit nothing else to influence or prejudice its action," is not objectionable in that it precludes the jury from giving its attention to the arguments of counsel. facts so stated.[42] Neither is such a charge within the rule prohibiting the singling out of particular facts in the chain of proof.[43] If the charge thus given is supposed to influence the mind of the jury in its determination upon the facts, the opposite party should pray the court to state the law as applicable to the converse of the facts supposed.[44] It is not necessary to the giving of an instruction that the evidence should establish conclusively the hypothesis stated in it;[45] if there be any evidence conducing to establish the assumption it is sufficient to authorize the giving of the instruction, and it is for the jury to find whether the facts stated are made out by the evidence.[46]

15. Defining Words and Phrases Used.[47] Where the court is authorized to construe words, it may expound their meaning in the charge.[48] When a word has several meanings, it is not error for the court to direct the jury to inquire in what sense it was used by a witness.[49] The meaning of ordinary words, when used in their usual or conventional sense, need not be explained to the jury,[50] although to do so is not prejudicial error.[51] An intelligent juror understands what they mean, and an attempt to define words of an ordinary accepted meaning tends to mystify rather than enlighten.[52] If, however, the court does define them, it is bound to define them correctly, with reference to the issues of the case.[53] The court need not define such terms as tenant, rented,[54] scope of employment,[55] city,[56] flying switch,[57] riot,[58] market value,[59] unfitness, carelessness,[60] negligence,[61] reasonably,[62] reasonable time,[63] and malice;[64] and failure to define the terms preponderance of evidence,[65] prima facie,[66] material fact,[67] con-

Reason for rule.— The average legal mind does not always carry a correct idea of the various words and phrases which have a technical meaning in the law. Hence it is not to be expected that the unprofessional men of the jury can, without explanation, grasp the meaning of such expressions. It is therefore the better practice in all cases for the judge to explain to the jury the meaning of such expressions when they occur in his instructions. Holmes v. Clisby, 121 Ga. 241, 48 S. tion defining the term,[20] and if the court has in its general charge sufficiently defined a term, it may properly refuse an instruction containing substantially the same definition.[21]

16. Length and Number of Instructions. It is necessary to any useful effect they may have on the minds of jurors that instructions should be as few, and short, and pointed as may consist with the object of giving clear ideas to the jury of the main points of law governing the case as applied to the facts.[22] The simpler and plainer instructions can be framed and cover the issues, the better the jury will understand them, and the less liable will they be to run counter to some rule of law.[23] It is very generally held improper therefore for counsel to ask,[24] or for the court to give, long and numerous instructions,[25] because it does not enlighten the minds of the jurors on the issues submitted, but tends rather to introduce confusion.[26] And the practice is further objectionable as increasing the labor of both the trial and reviewing courts.[27] However, the mere fact that instructions given are lengthy will not of itself warrant a reversal.[28] But a reversal is authorized if such a number is given as will confuse the jury and make their verdict mere guess-work.[29] The practice of requesting an unnecessarily large number of instructions is one not to be approved, they being calculated to confuse a jury, cannot be critically examined by the trial judge, and afford unnecessary opportunities for errors.[30] The right to demand instructions has a limit,[31] and the trial judge may place a reasonable limit on the number of instructions he will consider on behalf of either party.[32] But he cannot arbitrarily fix the number of instructions that shall be presented or passed on.[33] Where an unreasonable number of instructions is presented, the court may refuse all of them, and in lieu thereof prepare and give, of its own motion, instructions covering the cause of action or defense,[34] or give such of the instructions with or without modification as suffice to cover the case,[35] or it may require the instructions to be consolidated or condensed within such limits as may be reasonable;[36] but the better view is that the court cannot refuse to instruct at all on the matter covered by the requests merely because of the unreasonableness of the number or length of instructions asked, but should pursue one of the courses outlined in the three preceding paragraphs of text.[37] Error cannot be assigned to the refusal to give any of an unreasonably large number of requested instructions, if the instructions given cover the whole ground of dispute.[38] But if both parties ask an unreasonably large number of instructions, and they are given as requested, neither can complain that the court instructed the jury at such length as to mislead them.[39]

D. Requests For Instructions[40]— 1. Power of Court to Instruct in Absence of Request. Except in one state where there is a statutory prohibition against so doing,[41] it is permissible for the court to instruct the jury, although no Reason for rule.— A hard and fast rule that instructions shall be limited to a given number is unreasonable. It is the prolixity and confusing character of the charge, as a whole, that rules of this character are designed to obviate. Restriction in point of number only of the instructions will not remove the evil. Chicago City R. Co. v. Sandusky, 198 Ill. 400, 64 N. E. 990.

41. In Mississippi, the court is prohibited request for instructions is made.[42] "One of the very objects of having a judge is to instruct the jury on the law applicable to the case. Instead of its being error for the court on its own motion to instruct, where it seems to be required by the justice of the case, it is rather the duty of the judge to give such instructions." [43]

2. Necessity For Requests [44]— a. As a Basis For Assigning Error For Failure to Instruct — (I) Failure to Give Any Instructions — (A) View That This Is Permissible in Absence of Request. It is the rule in a number of states that, in the absence of requests for instructions, the court need not give any instructions at all; [45] and if improper instructions are asked, the court may overrule the motion without giving any instructions.[46] So it has been held that the court need not give any instructions to the jury where the request made is merely that the jury be instructed generally; [47] that the court is only required to give special instructions prepared and presented by the parties; [48] but if without request the court undertakes to do so, it is its duty to see that the instructions given are correct,[49] and if the law is misstated in a material point, to the prejudice of a party to the suit, the court's action becomes the subject of review, as in case of any other misdirection of a jury.[50]

(B) The Contrary View. In a number of states the rule is well settled that it is the duty of the court to give the jury appropriate instructions on all the material issues in the case, and that the court is not relieved from this duty by failure of the parties to request instructions.[51] A non-compliance by the court by statute from charging the jury in the absence of request therefor (Bacon v. Bacon, 76 Miss. 458, 24 So. 968; Archer v. Sinclair, 49 Miss. 343; Davis v. Tiernan, 2 How. 786); and it has been held reversible error to do so even though the matter so charged be legal and applicable to the issue (Williams v. State, 32 Miss. 389, 66 Am. Dec. 615); and the judge cannot evade the rule by handing a charge to counsel who returns it requesting that it be given (Watkins v. State, 60 Miss. 323).

Application of rule.— Where defendant relies mainly upon one defense, and introduces evidence to sustain it, it is error demanding a new trial for the judge to omit to call the attention of the jury to this defense. This is true whether or not he is requested by counsel to do so. Unless the judge charges upon such defense, and thereby calls the attention of the jury to it, the case is not properly tried, and there is a failure to submit to the jury one of the important issues made. Chattanooga, etc., R. Co. v. Voils, 113 Ga. 361, 38 S. E. 819. Where it appeared that the contract sued on was void for want of consideration, a failure to so instruct was error. Rowell v. Vershire, 62 Vt. 405, 19 Atl. 990, 8 L. R. A. 708. When the question of notice was in issue, it was error to ignore it, and merely to charge that plaintiff by showing the proofs of loss, etc., had made out a prima facie case. Donahue v. Windsor County Mut. F. Ins. Co., 56 Vt. 374.

53. Kansas.— In a trial by jury, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury on questions of law which he deems applicable to the case as made by the pleadings and evidence; and if a party desires other or different instructions, he must make his request in writing for them, as provided by section 275 of the code. If no such request is made, the instrnctions given stand as the law of the case for that trial. Douglass v. Geiler, 32 Kan. 499, 4 Pac. 1039. And see Paola Nat. Bank v. Hampson, 4 Kan. App. 217, 45 Pac. 970, holding that where the evidence is conflicting, it is the duty of the court to charge on all questions as to which there is a conflict in the evidence.

North Carolina.— In this state a statute imposes upon judges the duty to state in a plain and correct manner the evidence given in the case, and declare and explain the law arising thereon, and it is held that the statute is mandatory and makes it the duty of the court to instruct the jury whether requested or not. Falkner v. Pilcher, 137 N. C. 449, 49 S. E. 945; Burton v. Rosemary Mfg. Co., 132 N. C. 17, 43 S. E. 480; Tucker v. Satterthwaite, 120 N. C. 118, 27 S. E. 45; Bailey v. Poole, 35 N. C. 404. While it may be conceded, as a general proposition, that a party cannot complain because a particular issue was not submitted to the jury unless he tendered it, the rule is subject to the qualification that the issues submitted must in themselves be sufficient to dispose of the controversy and to enable the court to proceed to judgment. Falkner v. Pilcher, supra. A limitation on this rule is that the court need not, in the absence of a request, charge the jury whenever the facts at issue are few and simple and no principle of law is involved. Holly v. Holly, 94 N. C. 96.

Texas.— Under Sayles Rev. St. art. 1316, as amended by Laws (1903), p. 55, c. 39 (Sayles' Annot. St. Suppl. p. 154), providing that the court shall charge the law of the case to the jury unless the parties expressly waive it, it is the duty of the trial court to charge the jury generally, although no proper charges are requested by the parties. Wallace v. Shapard, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 594, 94 S. W. 151. And see Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Buchanan, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 165, 84 S. W. 1073. Under this statute which the court considers to be mandatory it will be sufficient if the charge given covers the substantial issues of the case. It does not require the court to charge on every phase of every issue in a case. San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Votaw, (Civ. App. 1904) 81 S. W. 130.

(II) PARTIAL NON-DIRECTION [54]— (A) Statement of Rule. It is a rule of very general application that if instructions given are correct as far as they go, it cannot be assigned as error that the court omitted to instruct on all points involved in the case if the attention of the court has not been directed thereto by special requests for instructions on those points.[55] As was said in an early

it is held to be the duty of the party who considers himself aggrieved thereby to request fuller or more specific instructions from the court. In the absence of such request there is no basis for an assignment of error to the giving of such instructions. Merely saving exceptions thereto will not be sufficient,[59] as it is not equivalent to a request for fuller or more specific instructions.[60] The fact that instructions are too narrow [61] or too broad,[62] or that the court fails to state or charge on all of the issues or defenses,[63] or charge with sufficient fullness on the issues by the husband will not subject it to his debts; [6] or to fully explain the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur"; [7] to instruct as to what constitutes irregularities at an execution sale when an instruction is given as to the effect of such irregularities; [8] to instruct as to what constitutes material allegations, on instructing on necessity of proving material allegations; [9] or to instruct as to permissive possession, or instructing as to adverse possession; [10] or to instruct that possession must be open, actual, notorious, and unequivocal, or instructing that possession is notice,[11] or, the question being one of notice, to fail to instruct as to constructive notice.[12] Nor in the absence of a request can it be objected that the instructions state general propositions of law, instead of applying the law to the facts of the case,[13] or that the propositions of law stated in the instructions, although correct in the abstract, have no application to the case.[14]

b. As a Basis For Assigning Error For Giving Erroneous Instructions. Appellant cannot complain upon appeal of the failure of the trial court to give an instruction which was not asked by him in that court.[15] But if there is a material misdirection in the charge of the court, it is sufficient ground for reversal, although no instructions were asked,[16] unless it is upon a mere abstract proposition, and it is apparent upon the whole case that it could not have misled the jury.[17] If the court gives instructions, either of its own motion or on request, it must give them in such a way as to correctly state the law.[18]

3. Time of Making Requests [19] — a. Statement of Rule. Requests for instructions must be made in proper time, and if not so made, the general rule is that error cannot be assigned to a refusal to give them.[20] This is so whether the request for instructions is made too late [21] or is made prematurely.[22] In most jurisdictions the time for presentation of requests is regulated by statute or rules of court, and in many of them the requests must be presented at the close of the evidence and before commencement of the argument in order to lay a basis for assigning error for refusing them.[23] Such a rule, it has been held, is a reasonable one.[24] And where it prevails, requests for instructions may be refused when presented during the argument [25] or after close of the argument,[26] after the court has begun giving instructions [27] or after the jury has been instructed,[28] or after the jury has retired [29] or after verdict.[30] In a number of states the rule requiring requests to be presented at the close of the evidence and before commencement of the argument does not obtain. Thus it has been held in one state that requests for instructions made during the course of the argument are in time.[31] In another the request may be presented at any time before the argument is closed.[32] And in others, it has been held error to refuse a request, although it is not made until after the general charge is given.[33] So, in one state, requests for instructions must be made after the general charge has been given and not previous thereto, or error cannot be assigned to their refusal.[34]

b. Waiver of Requirements of Rule. The court may in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion waive a requirement of a statute or rule of court that requests for instructions be presented at a designated time, and may give an instruction not so presented if it thinks proper to do so.[35] At any stage of the trial the judge should necessarily have the discretion to permit special prayers to be handed up, in order that his instructions to the jury may be made amply sufficient to cover every phase of the case.[36] By receiving requests after the expiration of the time limited by the rule the court, in effect, gives leave to present such instructions at that time.[37] And where the court passes on propositions preferred after argument it is bound to state the law correctly.[38]

c. Exceptions to Rule. While, as stated in a previous section, it is, in general, proper to refuse requests for instructions not presented at the proper time,[39] there are nevertheless some exceptions to the rule. Peculiar circumstances may exist which would render the enforcement of the rule unjust to one of the parties and when this is so the court should disregard it and grant instructions requested if correct, although asked too late under the rule.[40] Thus the rule requiring requests for instructions to be presented before argument does not apply where the occasion for the instruction arises after the argument has commenced, as where the course of argument makes an instruction necessary,[41] nor is the rule operative where the cause is submitted without argument.[42] So it has been held that a party may well assume that, without special requests therefor, the judge will properly instruct the jury on the leading points of the case,[43] and if at the close of the charge it appears that the judge has omitted to refer to important matters that should be explained or has instructed erroneously in regard to them, it is the duty of the court to entertain and grant proper requests for further instructions.[44] Nevertheless, it must appear that such instructions are rendered necessary by the general charge,[45] and the party desiring them must make his request therefor at the close of the charge.[46] A request in an action wherein more than one plea has been filed that the court cause the jury, in the event they find for defendant, to specify on which one or more of the pleas the verdict is rendered, is in time, where made before the verdict has been recorded, and the jury has dispersed.[47]

4. Form and Requisites of Requests[48] — a. In General. In previous chapters the requirements governing instructions as to matters of form and substance have been considered at length.[49] Requested instructions must of course be drafted in conformity with these requirements to entitle the party presenting them to have them given in charge to the jury. A party desiring an instruction must formulate it,[50] and state definitely and unequivocally that he desires it to be given.[51] A mere suggestion to the trial court is not sufficient to require it to submit an issue; but a charge, properly framed, presenting the question desired to be passed on, must be requested,[52] and it is the duty of counsel, if the court misapprehended his meaning in a request to charge, to call its attention to the fact; otherwise, he is concluded by the interpretation put on the request by the court.[53] A plaintiff in framing his instructions need only present the law applicable to his theory of the case as supported by the evidence, and need not anticipate and negative possible defenses [54] or counter-claims.[55]

b. Necessity of Writing.[56] If statutes or rules of court provide that requests for instructions shall be presented in writing, error cannot be assigned to the refusal of oral requests for instructions.[57] And in the absence of such provisions, the reduction of requested instructions to writing is said to be the usual and better practice.[58] It is perfectly competent, however, for the court to waive a requirement of this nature, and when it does so, failure to charge proper requests is ground for new trial.[59] Merely placing a written instruction on the judge's desk without calling his attention to it does not satisfy a statutory requirement that requests for instructions be presented in writing.[60] But the fact that a prayer for an instruction was on the reverse side of the paper on which the prayers were written does not of itself obviate error in failing to give such instruction.[61] Special charges, if intended to be separate requests, must be presented on separate pieces of paper, and where counsel requests several charges, written on one sheet, the court may treat them as a single request.[62]

c. Submission of Requested Instructions to Opposing Counsel. It is not error to permit the attorney of one of the parties to examine the instructions requested by his opponent before submission thereof to the jury,[63] and courts may enact rules to that effect and refuse requested instructions for non-compliance therewith.[64]

5. Argument For and Against Giving Requested Instructions.[65] In requesting an instruction, counsel need not state his reasons therefor,[66] but he has the right to be heard in support of his requests if he so desires;[67] and it is also proper for the court to give the adverse party an opportunity to present an argument against giving the requested instructions.[68]

6. Allowance or Refusal of Requests For Instructions[69] — a. In General. Where requests for instructions material to the issues are properly presented, counsel is entitled to a definite answer granting or refusing them;[70] but where the points presented to the court are fully answered by the general charge, it is sufficient without a separate and detached response to each; and when this is done those that are not answered may be considered as negatived by the court.[71] The refusal of an instruction is not equivalent to the assertion of the converse of the proposition contained in it.[72]

b. Correct Requests[73] — (i) Duty to Give in Charge to Jury. Within proper limits the parties may demand and the court is required to give instructions to the jury.[74] Where a timely request is made for instructions which correctly propound the law and which are also warranted by the evidence and pleadings in the case, it is the duty of the court to give them,[75] and error to refuse them,[76] unless covered by other instructions given,[77] or by the general charge.[78] This is so, although the evidence is conflicting[79] or slight, as the party asking an instruction is entitled to the benefit of whatever inferences the jury may think proper to draw from the proof, however slight.[80]

(II) Method of Giving in Charge to Jury — (A) View That Charge in Language of Request Unnecessary.[81] The decisions almost universally hold that a judge is not bound to charge the jury in the exact language of the requests for instructions by counsel. Although the requested instructions be correct as propositions of law and warranted by the evidence, the form of expression may be his own. If he instructs the jury correctly and in substance covers the relevant rules of law proposed to him by counsel, there is no error in refusing to adopt the more expedient, the decisions are not altogether harmonious. In some decisions it is said that when counsel present to the court correct views of the law, in a clear and distinct form, and so as not to mislead the jury, the better practice is for the court to adopt the instructions thus presented.[83] And, on the other hand, it has been said that the practice of taking the instructions as requested by the respective parties, and therefrom formulating a general charge embracing all the matters of law arising upon the pleadings and the evidence, is always to be commended, because in this way the points in issue may be sufficiently declared, and clearly presented to the jury, without unnecessary repetition and verbose language. The court's duty is to simplify its charge to the jury, and make every effort to render it as free from complexity as possible.[84] When this is done, however, "the law ought to be declared fully and accurately and in terms certain, explicit and intelligible to the jury upon the points raised by counsel." [85] And the court must not alter the sense of the requested instructions,[86] or impair their force.[87]

(B) View That Court Must Charge in Language of Request.[88] Under the statutes of Alabama, where written requests for instructions are presented, the instructions, where correct, if given at all must be given in the exact language of the request. The statute is construed to be mandatory and the giving of instructions in other language, although substantially correct, is reversible error.[89]

And see Eldred v. Oconto Co., 33 Wis. 133; Andrea v. Thatcher, 24 Wis. 471, holding that non-compliance by the court with a former statutory requirement that instructions asked should be given without change or modification would not warrant a reversal unless a substantial right of the party complaining should be affected injuriously thereby.

Nevertheless, it is the right and duty of the court, if it thinks it necessary, to give additional explanatory instructions,[90] and if the requested instructions are erroneous, a qualification amounting only to a correction thereof will not be ground for reversal.[91] In North and South Dakota also the court is required by statute to instruct the jury in the language of the request;[92] and if the court materially changes the language and import of the requested instructions, and gives them in charge to the jury as coming from the party making the request, the judgment will be reversed.[93] Under the statute of Florida, an alteration of the instructions is a refusal to give them as proposed and is error if the instruction in either form is material and the jury may be misled to the injury of the party excepting.[94] And in West Virginia, in the absence of any special statutory provision, one offering an instruction is entitled to have it given in his own language if it correctly propounds the law applicable to the case, where there is evidence to support it, and where it is not misleading.[95] Nevertheless a verdict will not be set aside where this is not done, if it can clearly be seen that the instruction as modified is the same in legal effect as the one offered.[96]

c. Requests Wholly or Partially Erroneous[97] — (1) Statement of Rule. The form and substance of a requested instruction must be such that the court may properly charge the jury in the terms of the request, without qualification or modification. If a requested instruction is erroneous either wholly or in part it is properly refused,[98] and the same is the case in respect of a series of instruc-

what is right and reject what is wrong[5] although it is perfectly competent for it to do so if it sees fit.[6]

(II) Limitations of Rule. In Texas it has been frequently held that, although a requested instruction is erroneous, yet if it is sufficient to direct the court's attention to the point involved, it is the duty of the court to charge thereon, and this seems to be supported by the weight of authority in that state,[7] although there are decisions, some of which are of very recent date, to the contrary.[8] The rule laid down by the majority of the Texas decisions just considered seems to be sustained by recent decisions of Kansas and Massachusetts.[9] And if an attempt be made by an instruction to submit to the jury the matter defectively covered by the request, it should be sufficiently explicit to cover the field of the request.[10] And in an early Vermont decision it was held that, although a party may not be entitled to the particular charge to the jury which he requests, yet it is the duty of the court to charge as the facts in the case require.[11] So in Virginia and West Virginia there are a number of decisions in which it is said that if the instruction is so equivocal that to give or refuse it might mislead the jury, it would be the duty of the court to modify and give the instruction as corrected.[12] This doctrine has, however, been severely criticized by a recent decision of the court of appeals of Virginia on account of the difficulty of its application.[13]

d. Inconsistent Requests. A party is bound by the theory of the case presented by the instructions given at his instance,[14] and it is proper to refuse instructions requested by him which are inconsistent with other instructions given at his request;[15] and where several instructions are requested, some of which are inconsistent with the others and involve different theories of the case, a party submitting such instructions cannot complain of the trial court in adopting one of the theories of the case and giving the instructions applicable thereto and refusing those which were inconsistent with the ones given.[16] Inconsistency between instructions given at plaintiff's request and those given at defendant's request, arising from the latter being too favorable to defendant, cannot be complained of by him.[17]

e. Requests Covered by Other Instructions Given[18] — (i) STATEMENT OF RULE. It is elementary and well settled that the court may properly refuse requested instructions, although they announce correct rules of law, where the propositions therein enunciated are fully and correctly covered by the general charge or by other instructions given on request of either party.[19] given, is to prescribe a rule so vague and indefinite as to embarrass, rather than to assist trial courts in the performance of their duty. It is the duty of juries to respect the instructions given them. It is not to be supposed that they have any knowledge with respect to those which the court refuses to give; and finally, if it be conceded that the offer of instructions, their discussion, and the judgment of the court upon them, take place in the presence of the jurors, it is an impeachment of their integrity, or of their intelligence, to assume that they were influenced or misled by what has occurred."

all.[19a] Especially does the rule apply where the charge given by the court contains a clearer statement of the law than the requested instruction[20] or concretely applies to the facts a principle of law which is stated abstractly in the requested instruction,[21] or where the requested instruction singles out and tries to give undue prominence to particular portions of the evidence.[22] And the fact that the language of the written request is quoted from opinions in reported decisions does not affect the rule.[23] These doctrines have been announced with such frequency by the courts that citation of authority thereof is almost a waste of space. In the notes hereto are set out some decisions which will illustrate the rule stated.[24]

24. A refused instruction as to the law if plaintiff was not intoxicated, yet if, but for the effect of the beverage he had drunk, he would not have been injured, was amply covered by the instruction given as to the law, if he was in a state of intoxication, and such state of intoxication, if any, placed him in such a condition that he was unable and failed to exercise the care and caution that a reasonably prudent person would have exercised to avoid injury to himself under similar circumstances. El Paso Electric R. Co. v. Ryan, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 114 S. W. 906. A requested charge, in an action for injuries sustained by a fall over an obstruction on a sidewalk, that plaintiff is required to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, was covered by an instruction given that, if plaintiff's injury was wholly or in part caused by his negligence "in failing to watch or observe his footsteps," the verdict must be for defendant. Lattimore v. Union Electric Light, etc., Co., 128 Mo. App. 37, 106 S. W. 543. A request to charge that plaintiff, in order to recover damages for non-delivery of a telegram, was bound to show that the error was caused by the misconduct, fraud, or want of due care on the part of the telegraph company, its servants or agents, was covered by an instruction that the burden of proof was on plaintiff to establish its case by a preponderance of the evidence, and, unless it had done so, the verdict should be for defendant. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Sunset Constr. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 109 S. W. 265 [reversed on other grounds in 102 Tex. 148, 114 S. W. 98] Where, in an action against a carrier for injury to a shipment of horses, the court charged that for plaintiff to recover the jury must find that the carrier was negligent and that the horses were injured as the proximate result thereof, the refusal to charge that, unless the jury believed that rough handling of the horses was due to negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury no damages could be awarded on account of rough handling, was not erroneous. (II) Qualifications and Limitations of Rule. Nevertheless where instructions are asked by either party to a suit, which correctly state the law on the issues presented and the evidence, it is error to refuse them unless the points are fairly covered by other instructions given.[25] The refusal to give a specific instruction clearly applying the law to the facts of the case is not justified by the fact that the law in a general way is covered by the instructions given and is etc., R. Co. v. Cunningham, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 368, 113 S. W. 767. The jury having been charged that, if plaintiff's injuries were wholly or partially caused by his failure to watch and observe his footsteps, he could not recover, the court did not err in refusing to charge that, in order to watch or observe his footsteps, he was bound to use his "God-given senses." Lattimore v. Union Electric Light, etc., Co., 128 Mo. App. 37, 106 S. W. 543. In an action by a trustee in bankruptcy against the bankrupt, where the court charged that, if conveyances from a bankrupt to his wife were given to satisfy his debt to her and the property conveyed was no more than was reasonably sufficient to pay the debt, defendant should recover, it was not error to refuse a charge that a conveyance of property made in good faith to pay an honest debt is not fraudulent, although the debtor may be insolvent, and the creditor is aware at the time of sale that it will have the effect of defeating other creditors in the collection of their debts. Maffi v. Stephens, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 354, 108 S. W. 1008. Where, in an action for seduction, there was no evidence of loss of wages, an instruction that the jury could not find anything on that score, because there was nothing on which they could compute damages, sufficiently covered a request to charge that plaintiff could not recover for any loss of his daughter's services or earnings after the date of the writ. Thiebault v. Prendergast, (R. I. 1908) 69 Atl. 922. A request to charge that if when plaintiff alighted, or attempted to alight, the train was in motion, and that such attempt was negligence which contributed to his injury, the jury should find for defendant, regardless of whether those in charge of the train were negligent, was sufficiently covered by an instruction that if plaintiff attempted to alight while the train was in motion, and in so doing was negligent, the jury should find for defendant, regardless of whether the train was stopped a reasonably sufficient time for plaintiff to alight in safety. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Berry, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 521, 109 S. W. 393. In an injury action by a passenger, instructions that railroads are not insurers of passengers, and are not liable for accidental injuries, and, if plaintiff was injured by the sudden jerking of the train, but such jerking was the usual movement incident to the running of such trains, he could not recover, were properly refused, as being fully covered by instructions to find for defendant if the injury was accidental, and that passengers assume the ordinary risks incident to the running of trains, including the ordinary swinging and jerking of the train. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Richardson, 87 Ark. 602, 113 S. W. 794. Where, in an action for the penalty imposed by Comp. Laws (1897), § 4157, for obstructing a highway, the court charged that, if the jury should find that defendant erected a gate across the highway, as complained of, under the advice and consent of the highway commissioner, defendant was not liable, the refusal to charge that, if defendant was informed by the commissioner that he might erect a gate, and he did so under the advice of the commissioner, there was no obstruction under the statute was not erroneous. La Barre v. Bent, 154 Mich. 520, 118 N. W. 6. In an action for rent, etc., aided by an attachment, under which a quantity of corn was taken, in which defendant pleaded a counter-claim for the value of the corn taken under the writ, the court having expressly called attention to the fact that the corn, for the value of which defendant sought to recover, was that seized under the attachment, and in another instruction reminded the jury of that fact, an instruction that the jury's attention be confined to the corn taken under the attachment was properly refused. Beck v. Umshler, 139 Iowa 378, 116 N. W. 138. Where, in an action by a broker for commissions for procuring a purchaser, the court charged that the broker could not recover without showing an agreement between the owner and the purchaser for the sale and purchase of the real estate, and that, unless the minds of the owner and the purchaser met on all the terms of the contract, the broker could not recover, a further instruction that it was the duty of the broker to bring a purchaser whose mind and that of the owner would meet on the terms of the contract was properly refused, as covered by the instruction given. Applications of rule.— Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger due to the failure of the carrier to heat its coach, to furnish reasonably safe means of transfer from one train to another, and to furnish a reasonable opportunity to procure food during the journey, the court in its main charge submitted the combined causes as a ground for recovery, a requested charge, submitting the various causes as distinct grounds of recovery, was not objectionable as being a repetition of the instruction given. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Harrington, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 386, 98 S. W. 653. In an action for the wrongful discharge of an employee under contract to act as gen-ground for reversal unless the court can see that no prejudice resulted therefrom.[26] Instructions given from which the jury might have inferred the rule to be as laid down in the instructions asked and refused are not the equivalent of nor a sufficient answer to requests in which the propositions of law are specifically applied to the facts;[27] and it has been held that even though the instruction requested is not technically correct, it is the duty of the court to which the instruction is offered to prepare and give a correct instruction on the point.[28] Each party has the right to have the jury instructed so clearly and pointedly as to leave no ground for misapprehension or mistake.[29]

f. Time of Giving Instructions Asked. The court may pass upon requested instructions and give them to the jury before delivering the general charge.[30] Where a statute so provides, requested instructions should be given to the jury before argument.[31]

eral manager of defendant's stores, an instruction that, if the jury found and believed from the evidence that, because of the employee's refusal to change his employment to one materially different from and inferior to that which he had contracted for, the keys of the store in which his headquarters as general manager were located were demanded from and surrendered by him, plaintiff was wrongfully discharged, was not objectionable as being covered by the main charge, where no reference to the surrender of the keys was made in the main charge. Wolf Cigar Stores Co. v. Kramer, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 411, 109 S. W. 990. The giving of an instruction which covers only a part of one asked is not sufficient ground for refusing to give the latter. United States.— Western Union Tel. Co. v. Morris, 105 Fed. 49, 44 C. C. A. 350, in which it was said that where a general charge correctly states the law of a case, but does not eliminate and set forth the crucial issues which the jury is to determine, or specifically apply the law to those issues, either party is entitled, upon request, to additional instructions from the court which clearly and tersely state to the jury the very issues which they must determine from the evidence, and the law specifically applicable to those issues.

Application of rule.— Refusal to instruct "that while the law permits the plaintiff in the case to testify in his own behalf, nevertheless the jury have the right, in weighing the evidence, to determine how much credence is to be given to it, and to take into consideration that he is the plaintiff and interested in the result of the suit," is not rendered harmless error by giving its substance in a long, general instruction as to weight of evidence, and credibility of witnesses. g. Assigning Reasons For Refusal.[32] If the jury know the contents of the instruction refused, the court should state that it is refused for the reason that it is covered by other instructions given,[33] otherwise the jury may infer that the instruction was refused on its merits, and misunderstanding and prejudice result.[34] If, however, the instruction has not been read in the presence of the jury, and it does not know that the instruction has been refused, it needs no explanation of the reason for the refusal.[35]

7. Modification of Requested Instructions[36] — a. Power of Court to Modify. As previously shown, it is the rule in most jurisdictions that no obligation rests on the trial court to modify erroneous requested instructions, and as modified give them in charge to the jury.[37] Nevertheless, unless there is a statute or rule of court prohibiting it,[38] it is proper for the court, if it sees fit, to modify a defective or erroneous instruction requested, and give it in charge to the jury in its modified form.[39] And even though an instruction requested is correct and might well have been given in the language of such instruction, the party requesting it cannot complain of a modification which merely changes the language and not the meaning thereof.[40] This is scarcely more than a repetition of the well-settled principle elsewhere considered, that the court is not bound to charge in the exact language of the request, although correct, but may use its own forms of expression in charging the jury, provided the subject-matter of the request is thoroughly covered.[41]

b. What Modifications Permissible. This power to modify includes any error or defect of which a requested instruction may be susceptible. Thus the court may modify an instruction which is susceptible of a wrong construction,[42] is obscure and indefinite,[43] or unintelligible;[44] which singles out a particular witness instead of being made applicable to all witnesses;[45] or which withdraws a material issue from the jury.[46] So the court may modify an instruction abstractly correct so as to present the law applicable to the facts more appropriately and intelligibly;[47] or in order to make the requested instruction conform to other instructions asked by the party;[48] or it may strike out matter which contains an independent proposition which should have been prepared as a separate request,[49] or omit words from an instruction that is complete without them.[50] Where, by request of defendant, the court charges that the existence of recited facts would free defendant from liability, the court may, on its own motion, state the converse of the proposition.[51] And a party cannot complain because an instruction submitting this theory of the case was modified so as to present the theory of the other side at the same time.[52] So, where an instruction is asked, and the court gives the instruction, but adds to it some other matter which in no degree modifies the import of that given, and is a matter proper to be called to the attention of the jury, the party asking the instruction has no ground for complaint.[53] Nor can error be assigned where the effect of the words added to a request for an instruction is simply to express that which would be implied without them.[54]

c. Method of Making Modification. In modifying instructions, the modification should be so made that the instruction originally asked and the modification thereof can be readily identified so that exceptions may be saved for purposes of review.[55] Otherwise a charge not requested might appear in the record as being given at the request of a party who was prejudiced thereby.[56] If the court modifies an instruction it is error to give it as the charge of the party unless he has consented to the modification.[57] The modification should also be made in such manner that the jury cannot see what the court holds not to be the law.[58] The better way to modify a requested instruction is for the judge to write a new instruction embodying the modification.[59] But when a modification is appended to a requested charge in such a manner as to show the precise charge asked and the precise modification, and the whole is intelligible to the jury, there is no available error.[60] Modification by erasures and interlineations is ordinarily disapproved of and is forbidden by statute in some states;[61] but a modification so made if not prejudicial to the party objecting thereto,[62] or to which the party makes no objection,[63] will not be ground for reversal. And so it has been held that a judgment will not be reversed because of an erasure in an instruction which left the words erased legible, where the matter intended to be stricken out was of no importance whatever.[64] The objectionable portion of a requested instruction may be eliminated by a separation of the paper on which it is written.[65] And the modification of a numbered instruction is properly given in an instruction of a separate number.[66] The instruction as modified should be given in such manner that the jury understand that the request was not refused in its entirety.[67]

d. What Erroneous Modifications Harmless or Prejudicial. Although a modification made is erroneous, the judgment will not be reversed where no prejudice could have resulted.[68] And where a requested instruction is erroneous and should have been refused, a modification thereof, although itself wrong, is not a ground for reversal.[69] On the other hand it is prejudicial error to modify a correct instruction on a material point,[70] as for instance, by assuming as in dispute, material facts as to which there is no controversy.[71] So prejudicial error is committed by adding to an instruction upon one point of the case, words directing the jury as to other branches of the case,[72] by practically eliminating the main defense presented thereby;[73] or by submitting other matters of inducement merely, and not of the substance of the charge, and which, if true, would make a different cause of action, especially where there was no proof of such other matter.[74]

Rep. 180. And see Morris v. Guffey, 188 Pa. St. 534, 41 Atl. 731. In this case plaintiff was entitled to the instructions he asked in these points, and the court concurred. They were all in the alternative, and the court followed the affirmation with the instruction that, if the jury did not find the facts as claimed by plaintiff, the law as stated in them would have no application. The court held that there was no error in this. It was possibly over-caution, but could not prejudice plaintiff.

8. Withdrawal of Requests. Requests for instructions may be withdrawn before the court has found on them,[75] either at the instance of the party presenting the request,[76] or on his consent at the court's suggestion.[77] But after requests for instructions have been examined by the court, refused, and ordered filed, they are then subject to the control of the court and cannot be withdrawn without the consent of the parties and consent of the court, and are subject to the inspection of the opposite party.[78]

9. Waiver and Correction of Error in Refusing Requests. Error in refusing to give requested instructions is cured where the court subsequently gives them of its own motion,[79] or recalls the jury shortly after they have retired for consultation, and submits such instructions to them.[80] So, where counsel has an

A modification which does not alter the meaning of the instruction is not assignable as error. Spencer v. St. Louis Transit Co., 111 Mo. App. 653, 86 S. W. 593. A requested charge that a railroad company is not bound to anticipate or provide against storms such as have not within practical experience been known in the locality was given with the modification that the company and its servants must exercise the care necessary under those circumstances to prevent accidents from occurring. It was held that substantially the same proposition requested having been contained in prior and subsequent requests which were charged, and the law having been correctly given in the original charge, the error contained in the modification was not ground for reversal. What amounts to withdrawal of request.— Where defendant excepts to an instruction that a certain fact has not been established and asks an instruction leaving that question to the jury, and plaintiff consents that the original instruction might be so modified, defendant by withdrawing his request waives the exception, as it will be assumed that the court on plaintiff's consent would have charged as defendant requested. opportunity to have the jury recalled, and his requests charged, but does not avail himself of such offer, he must be deemed to waive whatever right he has with respect thereto.[81] And where a requested instruction is properly refused, but afterward given with the consent of the opposite party, the party making the request cannot complain.[82] An exception to the refusal to give an instruction is not waived by proceeding with the trial after such refusal.[83]

10. Appellate Review of Disposition of Requests. A party is entitled to have the charge set out in the record in full which is given in lieu of instructions requested in order that the reviewing court may see whether it covered the instruction asked;[84] but if he fails to have this done and the record does not contain the instructions given or all of them it will be presumed that instructions refused if correct were covered by the instructions given.[85] If on an examination of the record it appears that instructions refused as having been covered by instructions given were not in fact so covered, the verdict will be set aside without examining as to the technical accuracy of the requested instruction.[86]

E. Cautionary Instructions — 1. Definition or Description. The term "cautionary instruction" is one which the courts have used with great frequency, but, so far, neither courts nor text-writers have attempted to define or describe it. Instructions falling within this designation, do not, strictly speaking, relate to the law of the case, but enunciate the rules prescribed for the conduct and deliberations of the jury, place the burden of proof on the proper party, state the degree of proof required, and announce the rules by which the jury are to be controlled in determining the weight of the evidence, and in testing the credibility of witnesses, irrespective of the particular issues being tried.

2. General Rules For Weighing Evidence.[87] Within certain limits, the judge may propose to the jury rules to aid them in weighing the evidence.[88] Care must be taken, in so doing, not to trench upon the exclusive province of the jury to determine the degree of credit to be given to particular elements of evidence. "He may instruct them as to the rule, but not as to the weight of the evidence."[89] In giving rules for weighing evidence to the jury, the court should state them as general rules, subject to be controlled and modified by the case before them, as made by all the testimony.[90]

3. Credibility of Witnesses[91] — a. In General. As previously shown, the jury are the judges of the credibility of witnesses,[92] and it is proper for the court to so instruct them.[93] So, as is shown in the following section, the court may lay testimony of a witness; [97] which authorize the jury to wholly disregard evidence for speculation and unfounded reasons; [98] which inferentially direct the jury that they may determine what witnesses to believe or disbelieve without restriction; [99] which single out one party and directs the jury with respect to judging of his credibility; [1] which state that there is no preponderance of evidence where two equally credible witnesses have sworn to a contradictory state of facts,[2] or that the testimony of defendant equally balances that of a witness; [3] which permit the jury to pass upon the credibility of witnesses by means of a consideration, among other things, of all "the other circumstances appearing on the trial;" [4] or, without telling the jury that they are the sole judges of the credibility of witnesses, assume that credit must be given to the witness who was best or apparently best supported by corroborative evidence.[5] So an instruction is erroneous which assumes the truth of a witness' testimony,[6] or which expresses an opinion as to whether a disputed fact is sufficiently proven,[7] or states that if the jury cannot say who told the truth they must find the facts not proven; [8] or which is based on metaphysical abstractions which suggest suspicion and invite conjecture.[9] Instructions of this character are vicious as invading the province of the jury. On the other hand it is held that the court may instruct that testimony is not open to censure because the witness is a private detective,[10] or that the credibility of a witness is not affected by the fact that he cannot read or write,[11] or is a negro; [12] or that it is for the jury to determine what weight shall be given to the testimony of a person of unsound mind, but found by the court to be a competent witness; [13] but the court may instruct them that if they believe from the evidence that the witness has not sufficient mental capacity to understand what is going on, they are not at liberty to consider his testimony.[14] So the court may in its discretion tell the jury that they are not bound to believe the testimony of a witness because it is contained in a deposition, any more than they would if he testified from the witness stand.[15]

not in violation of the rule against invading the province of the jury.[18] When a proper request is made, it is the duty of the court to give instructions of this character,[19] but it need not do so in the absence of such request.[20] And none of the methods by which the credibility of witnesses and the preponderance of the evidence are to be determined are essential to an instruction stating what facts will create a liability or constitute a cause of action.[21]

(II) APPEARANCE AND DEMEANOR OF WITNESS WHILE TESTIFYING.[22] The court may instruct the jury that they are at liberty to consider the appearance of a witness, and his manner and demeanor while testifying,[23] but should not state that they must do so.[24] And an instruction calculated to lead the jury to believe that they must look alone to the witness' appearance on the stand in determining his credibility is properly refused.[25] And it is not proper in giving instructions of the character under consideration to single out any particular witness as it would necessarily give the impression that the court thought such witness had acted differently from any other witness.[26]

(III) BIAS OR PREJUDICE.[27] It is proper to instruct that the jury may consider the bias or prejudice of a witness, if any has been disclosed by the testimony,[28] and error to instruct that a circumstance tending to show bias on the part of a witness has nothing to do with the issues in the case.[29] So an instruction excluding testimony tending to show hostile feeling toward the losing party on the part of an important adverse witness is erroneous.[30] In advising the jury to consider the bias of witnesses it is error to single out a particular witness or set of witnesses.[31]

(IV) CHARACTER AND ENVIRONMENT.[32] The court may instruct that the jury may consider the character of the witnesses,[33] and their environment, and the influences to which they may be subject.[34] Where there is evidence on which to base the charge, the court must on request charge that if the jury find from the evidence that a witness is a person of bad moral character,[35] or that he is a hired witness,[36] this should be considered in determining the weight to be given to his testimony, and an instruction that, if a certain witness named is a person of bad reputation for truth and veracity, then as a matter of law that fact tends to discredit his testimony, and the jury may disregard it except as corroborated by other credible testimony or other facts proven, is proper.[37] Where it appears that a witness has been tampered with,[38] or that the agent of one of the parties to the suit was sent to a witness with intent to corrupt or entrap him,[39] it is proper to instruct the jury to inquire how far the parties were connected with the transaction. The court may refuse to instruct that the conviction of a witness of the crime of perjury is a mere nullity, where the judgment of conviction has been reversed on appeal, this being a matter of common knowledge.[40]

(v) Intelligence and Opportunities For Observation. Among other tests for determining the credibility of witnesses, the court may instruct the jury that they "may,"[41] "should," or "must"[42] take into consideration the intelligence of the witnesses, and their opportunities for observation and means of knowledge as disclosed by the evidence. The jury is not thereby told that the testimony of one class of witnesses is entitled to greater weight than that of another class. It is, however, an invasion of the province of the jury to instruct them that they should believe the witnesses with the best opportunity for knowing the facts testified to and having the least inducement to swear falsely,[43] or that the testimony of witnesses having superior opportunities for knowing what took place, etc., is entitled to greater weight than those whose opportunities for such knowledge were not so great.[44] While a jury may consider the opportunities of a witness of knowing the facts about which he testifies, and his interest or want of interest in the case, yet there is no rule of law requiring the jury to believe the witness who has least interest in the case and the best opportunity of knowing the facts to which he testifies.[45]

(VI) INTEREST.[46] It is very generally held proper to instruct the jury that they "may" take into consideration the interest of a party or other witness in determining the credibility of his testimony,[47] and according to the weight of authority the court may instruct the jury that they "should" consider such interest.[48] Instructions of this character are not objectionable as charging the jury with respect to matters of fact,[49] and a refusal of such instructions is error,[50] unless there is no evidence which would warrant the giving of the instruction;[51] and the error is not cured by a general instruction that the jury are the judges of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given to the testimony of each,[52] nor by an instruction that the jury are to use their common sense and experience in regard to the credibility of witnesses.[53] Such instructions should be general, and not single out a particular witness or the witnesses of one party,[54] unless such witness or witnesses are the only ones to whom the instructions can apply.[55] Accordingly, instructions that plaintiff's interest may be considered in determining the credibility of his testimony are proper and should ordinarily be given when requested,[56] unless there are other parties or witnesses who have testified in the case to whose testimony the principle is applicable. Under these circumstances if the instruction be limited to plaintiff's testimony, it is objectionable to the rule against singling out particular evidence for comment.[57] Instructions which deny the jury's right to consider the interest of witnesses in determining the credibility of their testimony are of course erroneous.[58] The court may properly charge the jury that it is for them to say whether they will believe an interested witness,[59] and it has been held not improper to modify an instruction that the jury may in weighing the testimony consider the interest of witnesses by adding that the jury had the right to weigh such testimony by the same rules applied to the testimony of all other witnesses.[60] It is erroneous to charge that the testimony of a disinterested witness is entitled to more weight than that of an interested party;[61] that the weight to be given to the testimony of the parties depends on the interest each has in the result of the suit;[62] that it is the duty of the jury to believe the witness who has the least inducement to swear falsely;[63] that the interest of a witness affects his credit;[64] that the jury should disregard the testimony of a witness if they find him interested;[65] that the testimony of an interested witness is entitled to no consideration;[66] that, as a general rule, a witness who is interested will not be as honest, candid, and fair in his testimony as one who is not interested;[67] that the jury should give statements made by a party in his own favor only such weight as they may believe the statements entitled to, considering his interest in the result;[68] or that the jury are bound to believe a witness who was uncontradicted and unimpeached,[69] the reason being that from his connection with the parties or the subject in controversy, and other similar circumstances, they might properly disbelieve him.[70] So it is erroneous to charge that the jury may disregard the testimony of an uncontradicted or unimpeached witness because of interest,[71] since they should not disregard such testimony without weighing it and considering it in connection with other evidence.[72] There is no legal presumption against the testimony of a witness merely because he is the employee of one of the parties;[73] and where the credibility of such witness is not assailed, or there is nothing to show bias or prejudice on his part, an instruction that the jury may consider his relationship to the party in determining his credibility,[74] or which suggests that the jury may disregard or discredit the testimony of witnesses merely because they were employees of one of the parties is erroneous and should not be given.[75] And it has been held erroneous to refuse an instruction that the testimony of the employees of a party cannot be arbitrarily disregarded in the absence of anything to discredit it or contradict it.[76] The court, may, however, instruct that if the interest or employment of a witness has impaired or biased his judgment, such fact may be considered in weighing his testimony.[77] An instruction that the jury have no right to disregard the testimony of any witness because he is an employee of one of the parties may be refused where there is nothing to indicate that the jury would disregard the testimony of any witness, and the court has instructed that the testimony of each witness should receive such credit as it seemed to be entitled to.[78]

(VII) IMPEACHMENT[79] — (A) In General. While the court may instruct the jury as to the law relating to the impeachment of witnesses,[80] it is not bound to do so in the absence of a request for such instruction.[81] The court may charge that a witness can be impeached by showing general bad "moral character"; the use of the word "moral" being neither restrictive nor misleading, and being used in its broadest sense.[82] So it is proper to instruct that if the jury believe that a witness has been successfully impeached, they may consider such impeachment in weighing his testimony;[83] that a party cannot impeach his own witness, but it is error to charge that a party introducing a witness thereby indorses the credibility of such witness;[84] to tell the jury that a witness has been impeached;[85] that the testimony of an impeached witness is of no value unless corroborated;[86] that impeach-

ing evidence should weigh heavily against a witness;[87] that a witness cannot be impeached by the testimony of only two witnesses;[88] that impeaching evidence is generally worthless to destroy the witness' evidence;[89] that a witness may be as effectually impeached by a lack of intelligence as by the positive testimony of other witnesses;[90] that the jury may wholly disregard the testimony of a witness whose reputation for truth and veracity is bad, no matter how truthful his testimony may appear to be,[91] or that refers to one method of impeachment only when the evidence tends to show impeachment by several methods.[92] Where the court undertakes to instruct as to the methods whereby a witness may be impeached, it should instruct as to all methods of impeachment so far as such instructions are authorized by the evidence.[93]

(B) Statements Out of Court in Conflict With Testimony. The court may instruct that witnesses may be impeached by evidence that they made statements out of court in conflict with their testimony in the case.[94] It may also charge that evidence as to such statements should be carefully scrutinized, as it is easy to mistake a word or expression of a third person,[95] or that it is often very unreliable and likely to be colored by the feelings of the listeners.[96] Such instructions must be general and not single out a particular witness,[97] and to authorize the instruction the contradictory statements must be as to matters material to the issues,[98] and the court should so charge.[99] The party or witness must be given the benefit of any explanation he makes of the discrepancy.[1] It is error for the court to refuse to instruct in a proper case that if the jury believe that a party

In an action for personal injuries against a street railway company, an instruction on behalf of plaintiff is a proper one, which is to the effect that if the jury should find discrepancies between a statement made by plaintiff at the time of the accident and her testimony at the trial, and they should find that when she made the statement she was suffering from shock and pain, they will consider what effect the shock and pain may have had on her ability to correctly ascribe the true cause of the accident at the time of making it. "Successfully impeached."—Where the only basis for an instruction on the impeachment of witnesses was in the alleged fact that witnesses who testified for defendant were contradicted by those who testified against it, and that one of defendant's witnesses had made statements regarded by defendant as inconsistent with his sworn testimony, it was improper to charge that, if any witness had been "successfully impeached," or had wilfully sworn falsely to any material matter, the jury, as a matter of law, might disregard his or their entire testimony except in so far as it had been corroborated, etc., without further defining the words "successfully impeached." (VIII) FALSITY OF TESTIMONY — FALSUS IN UNO[3] — (A) Power or Duty) Instruct Regarding Maxim. Instructions in relation to the maxim falsus in uno ılsus in omnibus should only be given when warranted by the evidence.[4] In ther words, instructions on the maxim should be given only where the credi- ility of some witness is attacked, or his own testimony is contradictory and onflicting, or where he is an interested party and is contradicted by a number f disinterested witnesses,[5] or where the evidence is of such a character that it ıust in the nature of things either be true or knowingly false,[6] and mere conflict ı the testimony will not warrant the instruction.[7] There is a conflict of authority ıs to whether, under any circumstances, the court is bound to give an instruction ın the subject, although the facts would render the giving of such instruction ›roper.[8]

(B) Character and Sufficiency of Instructions Given. As regards the character ıf the instruction it is very generally held erroneous to charge the jury that they hould or must disregard the whole testimony of any witness who has knowingly ır wilfully sworn falsely as to any material matter,[9] or who has knowingly sworn alsely to any material matter unless his evidence is corroborated.[10] No inflexible rule of law should be interposed between the witness and the jury commanding the jury to take all, or exclude all, of his testimony.[11] Within the rule stated, an instruction is not objectionable which states that the jury cannot arbitrarily disregard the evidence of any witness, but that if they believe a witness had testified falsely in part, they should disregard that part and consider the remainder of his testimony believed to be true.[12] It is, according to many decisions, proper to instruct that if the jury believe that any witness has wilfully sworn falsely to any material fact, they are at liberty to disregard the entire testimony of such witness, except in so far as it is corroborated by other credible evidence,[13] or so far as the jury believes it to be false,[14] and some of these decisions hold that the omission of the clause relating to corroboration renders the instruction erroneous.[15] According to other decisions, it is proper to instruct the jury that if any witness has wilfully sworn falsely to any material fact, they may disregard the entire testimony of such witness,[16] and it has even been held erroneous to give an instruc-alleged false testimony given by the witness is material,[25] is erroneous. And an instruction that the jury are the judges of the credibility of the witnesses, and of the weight to be given their statements, and if the jury believe, from all they have "seen and heard at the trial," that a witness has sworn falsely, they may disregard entirely his testimony, while too broad, will not be held to have misled the jury to suppose they could go outside the evidence and the demeanor of the witnesses.[26] The instruction must be general and extend to all the witnesses,[27] whether testifying in person at the trial or by deposition.[28] A proposition of law laying down a rule of evidence should be given in general terms, and not stated as being applicable to one certain witness or one certain class of witnesses.[29] So the instruction should not specify the particulars as to which the false swearing is claimed,[30] or be limited to cases where the swearing was palpably false,[31] and need not include in express terms witnesses who wilfully exaggerate, as there is no difference between wilful exaggeration and wilful false swearing.[32] If the court in its general charge gives a sufficient instruction on the subject, it need not give a further instruction thereon requested by one of the parties.[33]

Reason for rule.— The maxim, Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, is not a conclusive presumption of law, but only an advisory suggestion to the jury, which warns them to receive such testimony with caution, and warrants them in rejecting it altogether. It puts such testimony upon the same footing as that of an accomplice, which is to be viewed with suspicion, but, if credited by the jury, will support a verdict. Finley v. Hunt, 56 Miss. 221.

in arriving at their conclusion, in so far as such testimony is not based on such elements;[37] that, as to certain questions the testimony of experts is always admissible, that it may be given on facts as proved by other witnesses, and should not be arbitrarily disregarded,[38] and that in considering their testimony they should take into consideration their professional standing and experience.[39] But an instruction that the jury should consider an expert's skill, and value his testimony accordingly, is erroneous.[40] So it is error to instruct that if "the statements of fact, which are accepted as true for the purpose of answering the hypothetical questions, are substantially correct, then you will give to said testimony such weight as you deem it entitled to,"[41] or to give an instruction which criticizes expert testimony,[42] or casts discredit upon it;[43] which tells the jury that it may be rejected merely because it is expert testimony,[44] that expert evidence if in conflict with the positive testimony of credible witnesses must fail,[45] or that the testimony of expert witnesses does not establish a fact as to which they had testified;[46] or which tells the jury they may consider what interest, if any, such witnesses have in the suit.[47] It is error to instruct as to the weight to be given the testimony of experts or other persons who testify as to their opinion,[48] as to instruct that in regard to testamentary capacity the opinion of the testator's neighbors, if persons of good common sense, is worth more than the opinion of medical witnesses,[49] or more than the testimony of other witnesses whose opportunities of observation had been more limited;[50] that the testimony of experts on such issues is usually of very little value;[51] that the testimony of experts who knew and had treated deceased was entitled to greater weight than that of experts who founded their opinions on hypothetical questions;[52] that the opinion of expert witnesses, if opposed to the physical facts, must give way to such facts;[53] that the opinion of persons not experts on insanity is of little weight;[54] that the opinions of a certain class of witnesses are more trustworthy than those of another class;[55] that expert testimony should be received and weighed with caution;[56] or that the testimony of an expert as to value must be accepted as correct where it is the only direct evidence on that point.[57] An instruction that experts are not infallible and that the jury must judge for themselves as to the value of their opinion is not objectionable,[58] and the jury may be instructed to consider the facts and circumstances upon which the opinion of the witness is based as well as the opinion itself.[59] So it has been held that an instruction that, while expert testimony on the genuineness of a signature should be given such weight as the jury find it entitled to, yet testimony of that character is of a low order, and ought not to overthrow the positive and direct evidence of credible witnesses, who testify from their personal knowledge, and is most useful in the case of conflict between witnesses as corroborating testimony, is proper.[60] Error cannot be assigned for failure to instruct on the subject of expert testimony in the absence of a request for such instruction,[61] or to charge fully on the subject in the absence of a request therefor.[62]

4. CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.[63] Instructions that contradictory testimony should be considered in the light of surrounding circumstances, and credence given where warranted,[64] or, that if the jury cannot reconcile conflicting testimony, they must determine what is true and what is false by the application of the tests given by the court and all other tests within their skill and power,[65] are proper. Where contradictions or discrepancies exist in the testimony, the jury should reconcile them if possible,[66] and while there are some decisions which maintain the contrary doctrine,[67] the weight of authority is that the court may properly charge that, if possible, the jury should reconcile [68] or harmonize [69] conflicting evidence, rather than to reject the testimony of some of the witnesses as wilfully false; and it has been held error to instruct them not to attempt so to do.[70] It is error, however, to instruct the jury that they are not at liberty to reject the testimony of any witness because his statements are in conflict with another witness, since it invades the province of the jury.[71] And when there is an apparent conflict between the testimony of one witness and two others, it is error to charge that the jury are to consider from the evidence whether the two are not mistaken, thus discriminating against the two, especially when the testimony is of the same character and alike impeached on the record.[72]

5. Circumstantial Evidence.[73] The court may properly define circumstantial evidence as proof of such facts as will naturally lead the mind to the conclusion contended for and will exclude any other reasonable inference.[74] One relying on circumstantial evidence is entitled to a charge, that it may be considered,[75] and a statement as to its force and effect,[76] provided a proper request for an instruction on the subject is made, but not otherwise.[77] The court may instruct that circumstantial evidence when strong and convincing is often the most satisfactory from which to draw conclusions as to the existence or non-existence of a disputed fact.[78] Instructions should not be given which have a tendency to minimize the effect of circumstantial evidence, and prevent the jury from giving it proper consideration.[79] And the court should not instruct that circumstantial evidence is as good as direct evidence,[80] or state that there is no circumstantial evidence on a point when there is,[81] or characterize direct evidence as circumstantial evidence and instruct the jury so to consider it,[82] or say that slight circumstances will carry conviction of the existence of fraud.[83] And a statement that plaintiff had sought to prove his case by circumstantial evidence is reversible error where it is sustained by direct and positive evidence.[84]

6. Positive and Negative Testimony.[85] As is shown in another part of this treatise, courts are prohibited by constitutional or statutory provisions in most jurisdictions from charging upon the weight of the evidence, and in most of the jurisdictions where this rule obtains, it is well settled that the court should not instruct the jury in respect of the relative value of positive and negative testimony, the view being taken that instructions of this character are on the weight of the evidence,[86] and an unnecessary and improper interference with the province of the jury.[87] It has been very properly said that within the limits of their proper range, the jury must be left to decide each for himself what witness or class of witnesses is entitled to the greatest consideration.[88] There are, however, some jurisdictions where the rule also charging on the weight of the evidence prevails in which instructions of this character are held proper,[89] although on what theory, it is not easy to understand. In the federal courts and also in other jurisdictions where it is not improper to charge on the weight of the evidence, instructions as to the relative force of positive and negative testimony may be given.[90] The giving of such instructions is largely within the discretion of the court even where there is evidence on which they may be based,[91] and of course should not be given when there is no evidence to which they are applicable,[92] as for instance when the testimony on both sides is positive.[93] And it would seem that the refusal of such instructions is in no case reversible error,[94] although there is author-

In New Jersey, where a charge on the weight of evidence can be given, an instruction of the character under consideration has been condemned. It was said: "We are unable to see upon what principle a judge is justified in stating to a jury that one piece of evidence, which is legitimate, is not to be treated by the jury the same as other evidence in the cause. It is for the jury to say whether the testimony of a witness, having an equal opportunity to hear and whose hearing is equally good, and who testifies that he did not hear the blowing of a whistle or the ringing of a bell, notwithstanding he listened, shall or shall not be given equal credit with the testimony of a witness, similarly situated, who testifies that he did hear. 94. See Stanley v. Cedar Rapids, etc., R. Co., 119 Iowa 526, 529, 93 N. W. 489, in which the court held a refusal of such instruction proper, saying: "The proposition involved related simply to matters to be considered in weighing evidence. These would occur to every sensible and reasonable man without any instruction, and courts may well as-

ity directly to the contrary,[95] and in one case it was held not erroneous to refuse the instruction where the court had already instructed the jury that they were judges of the testimony, and should consider it fairly and impartially, and give it the weight they might think it entitled to.[96] Of course if the court has given a sufficient instruction on the subject it may refuse further instructions announcing the same principles.[97] In giving instructions on this head it is error to charge, without qualification, that positive evidence is stronger than negative evidence or to use in a charge language to that effect,[98] because it excludes from the consideration of the jury the credibility of the witnesses,[99] the question of equal opportunity of knowledge of the facts,[1] and the giving of equal attention to the matter testified to.[2] On the other hand the following instructions have been approved: The rule generally is, everything else being equal, that positive testimony is rather to be believed than negative testimony;[3] that positive evidence is stronger than negative evidence if other things are equal and the witnesses are of equal credibility;[4] that, when witnesses are otherwise equally credible and their testimony entitled to equal weight, greater weight and credit should be given to those who swear affirmatively or positively to a fact, rather than to those who swear negatively or to a want of recollection;[5] or that the rule of law is that the positive testimony of one credible witness to a fact is entitled to more weight than the testimony of several witnesses equally credible who testify negatively, or to collateral circumstances merely persuasive in their character from which a negative may be inferred.[6]

7. ADMISSIONS.[7] It is proper to instruct that it is the duty as well as the right of the jury to consider an admission as tending to prove a fact.[8] In perhaps the greater number of jurisdictions, instructions which admonish the jury to receive evidence of verbal admissions with caution are held to be erroneous as being a charge on the weight of the evidence and an invasion of the province of the jury [9] It is said that the idea expressed in such instructions is proper matter for argument but not otherwise the subject of legal cognizance,[10] and that the evidence of such admissions should be given such weight by the jury as they may think them entitled to without any advice of the court as to their force.[11] There are, however, jurisdictions in which instructions of the character under consideration are upheld,[12] but when given, it is not erroneous to further instruct that it is for the jury to determine the weight of the evidence according to the way in which it affected their own minds.[13] According to what is believed to be the better view, it is erroneous to instruct the jury that the admissions of a party are strong evidence against him,[14] or conclusive against him; [15] that such admissions are legal and

Instructions obnoxious to rule.— It is error to instruct that as a general rule the statements of a witness as to verbal admissions of a party should be received with caution as that kind of evidence is subject to much imperfection and mistake (Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. Instructions held proper under this rule.— That admissions should be scanned with care (Mims v. Brook, 3 Ga. App. 247, 59 S. E. 711); that admissions should be scanned with care and the jury should not give them more meaning than they are justly entitled to (De Loach v. Stewart, 86 Ga. 729, 12 S. E. 674); that statements of witnesses as to verbal admissions should be cautiously received as such evidence is subject to imperfection and mistake (Allen v. Kirk, 81 Iowa 658, 47 N. sufficient evidence against him but not in his favor;[16] or that admissions, if fully and deliberately made to a disinterested person, are of weight.[17] There are, however, decisions in which it has been held proper to give instructions of this character.[18] With respect to admissions by a party during the trial, it is held erroneous to instruct that statements made by plaintiff which are against his interest may be taken as true, but his statements favorable to himself are only to be given such credit as the jury under all the facts and circumstances deem them entitled.[19] Such instructions, it is said, are vicious as singling out the testimony of a witness, and as a comment on the probative force of his testimony.[20] In the absence of a request, the court need not give any instruction on the subject.[21]

8. Non-Production of Evidence — a. In General. It is well settled that where evidence which would properly be part of a case is within the control of the party whose interest it would naturally be to produce it, and, without satisfactory explanation, he fails to do so, the jury may draw an inference that it would be unfavorable to him,[22] and it is not improper for the court to instruct the jury to this effect.[23] The most familiar exemplification of this doctrine is in the case of failure of a party to call a witness under his control to a material fact peculiarly within the knowledge of the witness. This, it is generally held, is a subject of just criticism before the jury, and the court in charging the jury may properly direct them that failure to call the witness is a circumstance they may take into consideration as creating a presumption unfavorable to the party who failed to call the witness.[24] Of course in calling attention to the non-production of evidence, it is in no case proper to give binding instructions as to the effect of its omission,[25] and, in any event, the court is not bound, on its own motion, to give any instruction on the subject;[26] and if counsel is dissatisfied with an instruction given, he should call the attention of the court to the supposed defects by a request to extend and amplify the charge.[27] But when requested the court should, when the facts warrant it, give a cautionary instruction on the subject, and a denial of the request is error.[28] Instructions on this head should not be given in the absence of any showing that the evidence would be relevant,[29] where there was something which defendant might have contradicted or explained by such witnesses;[30] where the evidence would be inadmissible if introduced;[31] where there is nothing to show that the party had any witnesses whom he might produce,[32] or who were that an accident did not occur at a certain time and place, the court may properly remind the jury that several of defendants' employees who were present at the scene of the accident were not produced to disprove it. Collins v. Leafey, 124 Pa. St. 203, 16 Atl. 765. Where the court in the charge referred to the fact that a co-promisor of defendant had not been called as a witness, and instructed the jury that they should take it into consideration in determining the credit they should give to the witnesses, without giving any binding instruction as to the omission, the reference was but a natural deduction from the circumstance, and such instruction was not error. Steininger v. Hoch, 42 Pa. St. 432. In an action for injuries sustained in a collision of two street cars, plaintiff testified that a policeman asked if he did not want to go to a hospital; that he said, "No," he preferred to go to G's house; that "they took a cab for us and put us in the cab, and I went up to my friend, Mr. Goldstein's house." On cross-examination he stated that when he first came to, after the accident, he "was in a cab; that is the first time I knew anything about it, when my friend Goldstein and the other fellow, then they started to push me around in the cab." It was held to sustain a charge that plaintiff testified that a policeman took him to G's house, and that the jury could consider why the policeman was not called as a witness. Goodstein v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 69 N. Y. App. Div. 617, 74 N. Y. Suppl. 1017. The failure of a party to call as a witness in his behalf, his wife, who had knowledge of the facts, raises a presumption that her testimony would have been unfavorable to him, since the wife of a party is not equally available as a witness for the adverse party as for the husband, and the court may so charge on request. Carpenter v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 13 N. Y. App. Div. 328, 43 N. Y. Suppl. 203. And see Sesler v. Montgomery, (Cal. 1888) 19 Pac. 686.

Sufficiency of charge.— A charge on the effect of failure to produce evidence within the power of a party is sufficiently definite and intelligible when it announces the presumption of law to be that the evidence, if produced, would be prejudicial to the party. If competent for the court to declare in what respect and to what extent such failure would prejudice, attention should be called to these points by a request to extend and amplify the charge. Under such a state of facts an instruction that such failure might be considered by the jury as a circumstance against defendant is erroneous); Flynn v. New York El. R. Co., 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. 375 (holding that if, irrespective of the testimony that might be given by the persons not called, defendant has sufficiently met plaintiff's case, there is no reason for defendant calling more witnesses); Fitzpatrick v. Woodruff, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. 436 (holding that the omission to call a witness who has no other or better knowledge of the matter in dispute than those who are produced and give evidence is not a suspicious circumstance entitling the adverse party to any presumption to his prejudice).

under his control;[33] where the evidence would be merely cumulative;[34] where the witness' evidence would be competent for both parties, and the witness is equally accessible to both parties,[35] or, where the witness, although called by a party, was withdrawn by him without being examined, and there was nothing to show that he was in any way under the power and control of such party.[36] So it has been held that such instruction is improper where the absent witness cannot be procured by subpœna, that the fact that the party might have secured his testimony by issuing a commission which he is under no obligation to do does not warrant the giving of such instruction.[37] And it is likewise erroneous for the court to use language in its instructions to the jury from which unfavorable inferences may be drawn from a defendant claiming his statutory privilege of objecting to the competency of plaintiff as a witness in an action against the estate of a decedent.[38] It is not improper to instruct that no unfavorable inference is to be drawn from the failure of a party's attorneys to testify.[39] It has been held error to refuse to charge that the jury are not to draw any deductions against either party from objections made and evidence excluded, as the refusal affirms the converse of the proposition.[40]

b. Non-Production of Books and Documents. If a party fails or refuses to produce books or documents when ordered by the court, it is, in general, proper to charge that the jury might presume that the books and documents would operate against his claim.[41] Such instruction should not be given, however, where the order is not served in time to enable the party to produce the books or documents.[42] And an instruction commenting adversely on the non-production thereof should not be given when it is shown that they are not under the control of the party.[43]

c. Failure of Party to Testify or Submit to Physical Examination.[44] Whether or not it is in any case proper for the court in charging the jury, to comment on the failure of a party to testify is a subject about which the courts are not agreed. According to some decisions it is a personal privilege, that a party in a civil suit has, whether he shall testify in his own behalf, and if he fails to avail himself of the right, it is error for the court, in an instruction, to call the attention of the jury to the fact in any way.[45] This view, however, is against the weight of authority, which holds that the failure of a party to attend the trial,[46] or to testify as to material facts within his knowledge,[47] makes it proper for the court in instructing the jury to direct their attention to the fact as a matter that they might consider and give such weight as they think it might deserve. Of course if there is nothing to show that such facts are within the knowledge of the party, the giving of such instruction is erroneous.[48] And it is also erroneous where the adverse party failed to make out his case.[49] The court may instruct that the jury may consider the refusal of plaintiff to submit to a physical examination, and give this circumstance such weight as they think it entitled to.[50]

9. NUMBER OF WITNESSES. It is proper to instruct that the jury may consider the number of witnesses and their concurrence in support of a given statement of fact;[51] that it is their duty to weigh the evidence and not merely count the witnesses on either side;[52] that they should be governed by the quality and not quantity of the evidence;[53] that "by preponderance of the evidence is not necessarily meant a greater number of witnesses, but only such weight of evidence as satisfies the jury of the truth of the allegation to be established";[54] that everything else being equal, the testimony of the greater number of witnesses will outweigh the testimony of the smaller number;[55] that the preponderance of evidence is not necessarily determined by the greater number of witnesses, and that the jury must give weight to that part of the testimony in the veracity of which they have the most confidence;[56] that it is the superior weight of evidence that inclines the minds of jurors to accept one side in preference to the other, regardless of the number of witnesses;[57] that the jury are not to be swayed by the number of witnesses, but by the quality of the testimony;[58] or that the weight of evidence does not depend alone on the number of witnesses, but on the amount of credit the jury gives to one or all of the witnesses, where the court gives further instructions as to the general tests of credibility.[59] So where there was conflict in the evidence on questions of fact, an instruction that testimony of one credible witness is entitled to more weight than the testimony of many others, if the jury of defendant's participation in the commission of a trespass was altogether circumstantial, and the verdict was for plaintiff, it was held that the judge did not err in charging the jury that, although one or more of the circumstances detached would not authorize the inference that defendant was the trespasser, yet that his direction or consent to the trespass might be deduced from all the circumstances as enumerated in the charge, one of which was that defendant, having the opportunity to take the stand and exculpate himself, had declined to do so. App. 373, holding that an instruction which tells the jury "that the preponderance of evidence in a case is not alone determined by the number of witnesses testifying to a particular fact or state of facts" is erroneous. The instruction should have stated that the preponderance of evidence does not necessarily consist in the number of witnesses testifying to a fact or state of facts.

have reason to believe that such witnesses have knowingly testified untruthfully, is proper if the evidence warrants it,[60] although in the absence of such evidence the giving of the instruction would be reversible error.[61] On the other hand, it is error to charge that the jury should not believe the testimony of any person, however prominent or respectable, in preference to the contradictory testimony of two or more others; [62] that the testimony of a greater number of credible witnesses on one side might be considered more worthy of confidence and trust than the testimony of a lesser number of witnesses of equal credibility; [63] or that the weight of the evidence necessarily consists in the number of witnesses.[64] Instructions which give or have a tendency to give the jury to understand that the preponderance of evidence is to be determined by the number of witnesses on each side; [65] which exclude the element of the number of witnesses; [66] or state that the number of witnesses has nothing to do with the case in the determination of the question of preponderance of the evidence; [67] or state that if the jury believed that the testimony of two contradictory witnesses on opposite sides were entitled to equal credit the testimony of a third created a preponderance of testimony in favor of the party in whose favor he testified unless there was some fact or evidence tending to corroborate the opposite party; [68] or state that where witnesses of equal candor, fairness, and intelligence testify, with equal knowledge, opportunity of knowledge, and memory, and their testimony is in all respects of equal weight and credibility, and there is nevertheless a conflict which cannot be reconciled, a verdict should be rendered in harmony with the testimony of the greater number of witnesses, since it takes from the consideration of the jury all corroborating circumstances,[69] are properly refused. An instruction that preponderance of evidence does not mean the number of witnesses is not strictly accurate and is properly refused.[70] Where plaintiff's case is supported by his testimony alone, and contradicted by defendant, an instruction that the rule requiring plaintiff to prove his case by a preponderance of evidence "does not necessarily mean that plaintiff must have two witnesses to the wrongful act, but that the case in all its facts and circumstances given in evidence must preponderate in their judgment in favor of the plaintiffs," should not be given.[71]

10. Presumptions.[72] In criminal cases, and in civil cases, in which the allegations of plaintiff amount to a charge of crime,[73] defendant is entitled to an instruction as to the presumption of innocence, and in cases charging fraud that fraud is not to be presumed,[74] and in some cases it may be proper for the court to warn the jury against indulging a presumption.[75] An instruction as to a presumption, however, is ground for reversal where it is irrelevant,[76] erroneous,[77] too broad and indefinite,[78] or otherwise misleading;[79] where it is said to be a presumption of law, whereas it is only one of fact;[80] or where confusion may result from failure to distinguish between a prima facie and a conclusive presumption;[81] and it is erroneous to instruct that a presumption of negligence from defective machinery or appliances, or the circumstances of an accident operate to shift the burden of proof.[82] But reversal will not be had for instructions as to presumptions that are merely informal,[83] or immaterial,[84] if it clearly appears that no injury resulted.

11. Burden of Proof.[85] In some states it is considered the duty of the court to instruct the jury as to the burden of proof in the particular case,[86] as that the burden is upon plaintiff,[87] or upon the party holding the affirmative,[88] or that as to affirmative defenses the burden is upon defendant,[89] or upon which party the burden of proof rests as to each material issue.[90] On the other hand, in at least one state,[91] it is error for the court to instruct the jury directly that the burden of proof rests upon one of the parties; and, without expressly referring to it, the instructions must be so framed as to indicate which party has the burden of proof on each issue.[92] In still other jurisdictions, an instruction as to the burden of proof is proper in certain cases,[93] but not in others.[94] Such instructions have been sustained on an issue of fraud,[95] an issue as to whether a deed absolute upon its face is a mortgage,[96] and in many other cases in which the burden is clearly upon one or the other party.[97] Regardless of the rule as to the propriety of instructing at all as to the burden of proof, an instruction constitutes reversible error when it places the burden on the wrong party; [98] or places upon one party the burden of proving facts admitted in the pleadings by the other party; [99] or places upon a party the necessity of proving all of certain allegations instead of any one of them,[1] or only some of them; [2] or is otherwise misleading.[3] So instructions as to the burden of proof have been held erroneous when applicable only to the burden of evidence,[4] or when not followed by instructions as to the shifting of the burden of evidence.[5] But an instruction misplacing the burden of proof is not ground for reversal where the party upon whom it should have been placed has clearly proved his contentions,[6] or where the verdict was in favor of the party upon whom it was placed; [7] and all instructions as to the burden of proof should be read together,[8] and no reversal should be had therefor for mere informality or inaccuracy of statement if it clearly appears from the whole case that the jury were not misled thereby.[9] So a failure to give an instruction as to the burden of proof is immaterial if the evidence fully justifies a verdict in favor of the party upon whom the burden properly rested,[10] or where the burden has been tacitly assumed by the right party;[11] and in any event the court is not called upon to express its opinion before the conclusion of the evidence.[12] Instructions containing the terms "burden of proof,"[13] or "preponderance of evidence,"[14] without explanation of their meaning, may be refused; but they are not ground for reversal where they do not mislead.[15] Failure to instruct on the burden of proof cannot be assigned as error when no request for such instruction is made.[16]

Immaterial facts.— Such charge does not place upon plaintiff the burden of proving immaterial facts alleged by him. Collins v. Clark, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 341, 72 S. W. 97.

"Slight" preponderance.— An instruction that a slight preponderance is sufficient to support a verdict in favor of the party hav-

given,[20] although omission to give an instruction on preponderance of evidence is not a ground for reversal, in the absence of a request for such instruction.[21] Conversely an instruction that the jury must find for plaintiff, if the jury find from the evidence that he has made out his case by a preponderance of the evidence, is correct,[22] and a refusal of such instruction is erroneous.[23] So, except in cases where the affirmative of the issues is in part on plaintiff and in part on defendant [24] it is proper to instruct that if the evidence is evenly balanced plaintiff cannot recover,[25] and defendant is upon request entitled to such instruction,[26] and it is error to instruct that defendant cannot recover unless his evidence preponderates.[27] There is a sharp conflict of authority as to the propriety of using the words "fair" or "clear" in addition to the word "preponderance" in instructing as to the degree of proof required. Some decisions hold that there is nothing misleading in the use of these words and that instructions containing them may with propriety be given.[28] According to other decisions, the addition of these words to the word "preponderance" is erroneous and should be avoided because liable to be construed as requiring a higher degree of proof than is furnished by the preponderance alone;[29] but if it is apparent that the jury were not mislead by the use of these words in the instruction, the judgment will not be reversed.[30] It is error to instruct that it is incumbent on a party to make out his case by a preponderance of the evidence so far as he has the affirmative of the issue, without indicating in what respect he has the affirmative;[31] to give an instruction which requires plaintiff to prove every allegation of his petition or fail as to his entire cause of action;[32] or, where there are several defenses each complete in itself, to impose upon defendant the burden of establishing all of such defenses.[33] Where the evidence is conflicting, it is error to refuse to instruct on the mode of determining the preponderance of the evidence.[34] In explaining what is meant by the term "preponderance of evidence," it may properly be defined as meaning the greater weight of the evidence,[35] or the "best evidence,"[36] or such evidence, as when weighed with that which is offered to oppose it, has more convincing power in the minds of the jury,[37] or as evidence in favor of a proposition which is of a little better quality than that opposed to it.[38] On the other hand, an instruction that a preponderance of the evidence means more and better evidence is inaccurate,[39] and so is an instruction that by preponderance of the evidence is meant testimony of such superior weight and convincing force as satisfies the mind of its truth.[40]

But where evidence is offered but not admitted, it is error for the court to instruct that the preponderance of the evidence means the greater weight of the evidence to be determined after an examination of all the evidence tendered. 36. Johnstone v. Seattle, etc., R. Co., 45 Wash. 154, 87 Pac. 1125, holding that such instruction is not liable to mislead the jury; the term "best evidence" obviously not having been used in the technical sense.

38. Stener v. Riggs, 128 Mich. 129, 87 N. W. 109. And see Hammond, etc., Electric Co. v. Antonio, 41 Ind. App. 335, 83 N. E. 766, holding that it is not error to instruct that the slightest difference in the weight of the evidence is a preponderance sufficient to justify a verdict in favor of the party in whose favor such preponderance exists, for all that the law requires is that the party having the burden of proof shall have a preponderance of the evidence, and this means only that the evidence shall be in some degree more convincing to sustain his contention than that of his adversary, and the term "fair preponderance of the evidence," often used in instructions, is really meaningless.

39. Boyer v. Broffey, 109 Ill. App. 94. It is improper to charge that a preponderance of evidence is an expression that may mean considerable, or not much, depending on how the jury understand it, but in the final analysis it means this: What do you think about it having your minds guided by the evidence? 40. Bryan v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 63 Iowa 464, 19 N. W. 295.

And it has been held that an instruction is erroneous which tells the jury, among other things, that they are "at liberty to decide that the preponderance of evidence is on the side which in their judgment is sustained by the more intelligent, the better informed, the more credible and the more disinterested witnesses, whether these are the greater or the smaller number," [41] or which states that if, after considering all of the testimony, the jury were inclined to the opinion that under the instruction plaintiff was entitled to recover, then the tendency preponderated in his favor.[42]

b. Instructions Requiring Proof Beyond Reasonable Doubt. In civil cases, a party is not required to prove his case or defense beyond a reasonable doubt. This is a higher degree of proof than the law requires,[43] and the giving of an instruction which requires or in effect requires this degree of proof is of course erroneous,[44] and the refusal thereof proper.[45]

c. Instructions Using Word "Satisfy" in Connection With Proof Required. The use of the word "satisfy" in instructions relating to the degree of proof required is very generally held erroneous. Thus instructions are held erroneous as requiring too high a degree of proof, which require that the jury shall be satisfied from the evidence,[46] unless the charge, when considered as a whole, clearly shows that the court did not intend to require more than a preponderance of the evidence.[47] Before it can be said that the mind is "satisfied" of the truth of a proposition, it must be relieved of all doubt or uncertainty, and this degree of conviction is not required even in criminal cases.[48] So instructions are erroneous which require the jury shall be thoroughly[49] or entirely satisfied;[50] satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence,[51] or reasonably satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence;[52] satisfied or convinced by a preponderance of the evidence;[53] satisfied by clear and convincing proof;[54] satisfied with clearness and certainty,[55] or satisfied by abundant proof;[56] or which require the consciences of the jurors to be satisfied,[57] that plaintiff produce satisfactory or clear and satisfactory evidence,[58] or that he must satisfactorily prove the necessary facts by a preponderance of the evidence,[59] or prove the facts by a preponderance of the evidence so clear that it leaves the mind well satisfied of the truth thereof.[60] But, in Alabama, where the rule differs from that of all other states as regards the degree of proof required in civil cases,[61] an instruction that plaintiff cannot recover if the jury are "reasonably satisfied" that he ought not to recover is proper, and it has been held that a refusal to give such instruction on request is reversible error.[62]

d. Other Instructions Requiring Too High a Degree of Proof. Any instruction in a civil case which is calculated to impress on the jury that more than a preponderance of the evidence is necessary to establish a fact is erroneous.[63] Instructions impose too high a degree of proof which require that the facts be established by the party having the burden of proof,[64] or that the jury be convinced,[65] or clearly convinced,[66] or clearly and satisfactorily convinced,[67] or convinced from a preponderance of the evidence,[68] or which require that conviction be produced in the minds of the jury,[69] or that they must have an abiding conviction as to the facts,[70] or that the facts must be "conclusively" [71] or absolutely shown,[72] or shown by clear proof,[73] or clear and positive proof,[74] or clear and convincing proof,[75] or clear, convincing, and conclusive proof,[76] or with certainty,[77] or that the facts be clearly and distinctly,[78] or clearly or fairly proven,[79] or shown with reasonable certainty,[80] by evidence that is clear and unequivocal,[81] or by the weight of the evidence by testimony in which the jury have implicit confidence,[82] or that the facts be proved with reasonable certainty by credible testimony,[83] or clearly and with certainty by a preponderance of the evidence,[84] or that the jury must find for defendant if the evidence leaves the jury uncertain.[85] A party cannot complain of an instruction which places too great a degree of proof on his opponent.[86]

e. Instructions Requiring Too Low a Degree of Proof. An instruction is erroneous as requiring too low a degree of proof which contains the requirement "if the jury are reasonably persuaded from the evidence." [87] And it is error to instruct that the jury may find in favor of the party whose theory they consider the most probable.[88] It is the duty of the jury to determine which theory is supported by a preponderance of the evidence and not which is probably true.[89]

13. LIMITING PURPOSE FOR WHICH EVIDENCE MAY BE CONSIDERED,[90] The court may instruct the jury as to the purpose for which evidence which has been admitted may be considered,[91] and limit the consideration to the purposes.[92] But it is error to give instructions passing on material evidence restricting the jury to a consideration of it to determine one question when it was material to determine other questions, and had been admitted generally for all purposes.[93] Where evidence competent for one purpose merely,[94] or as to one issue,[95] or against one party,[96] is admitted, or evidence in part irrelevant and incompetent is admitted without objection,[97] or evidence is admitted provisionally,[98] the court should charge the jury that it should not be considered for other purposes than those for which it was admitted unless the purpose is so obvious as to render an instruction unnecessary.[99] However, failure to do so is not assignable as error, unless the court is requested so to charge, it being the duty of the party claiming that the effect of the evidence be limited to ask an instruction to that effect.[1] And, where the court prohibits counsel from commenting on evidence for purposes other than that for which it was admitted, error cannot be predicated of an omission to limit by instruction the purposes for which the evidence may be considered.[2] If a party neglects to ask for instructions limiting the application of evidence, he cannot afterward take advantage of the court's failure to give such instructions by an exception to the charge, even if it would have been error to refuse to limit the evidence in response to a request to do so.[3] It is error for the judge in his charge to marshal this evidence along with other evidence in the case,[4] or to state that it is competent for a purpose for which it is incompetent.[5] And, where improper testimony is inadvertently admitted, it is the duty of the court to withdraw it from the jury.[6] The court need not instruct to disregard hearsay evidence admitted without objection,[7] and it may decline to instruct as to the effect of particular evidence taken alone,[8] and should refuse an instruction pointing out that the testimony of a party was contradicted by two witnesses.[9]

14. CONTENTIONS AND ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.[10] The court may instruct the jury as to questions of law which are raised by counsel in argument,[11] or instruct them as to what it may believe, perversions of legal positions, assumed by adverse counsel before the jury.[12] The court may also make remarks or suggestions appropriate to the positions of counsel demanded by the circumstances of the case and not calculated to prejudice the right of the complaining party;[13] or may recapitulate fairly such contentions of counsel as illustrate the bearing of the evidence on the issues,[14] or instruct the jury to disregard unsworn statements of counsel made to discredit witnesses;[15] or, where evidence has been admitted for one purpose and counsel undertakes to use it for another purpose, direct the jury to confine it to the purpose for which it was admitted;[16] or, if counsel misstates the evidence, caution the jury to be guided by the evidence and not the statements of counsel,[17] or to disregard such statements,[18] or add to correct instructions that the jury should decide cases mainly upon the ground taken and discussed by counsel in the argument,[19] or caution the jury to ignore legal authorities read to them by counsel,[20] or correct misstatements of law by counsel.[21] It is error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury to disregard improper assertions of counsel on argument,[22] where such assertions are calculated to prejudice the complaining party;[23] but error cannot be assigned for failure to do so in the absence of request.[24] An instruction to consider the evidence without prejudice removes any objection to arguments of counsel, where the court was not requested to interpose during such argument.[25] Where there is warrant for an instruction under the evidence, it is not objectionable because it is broader than the claim made by counsel for the party in whose interest it is given in his closing argument.[26] The court cannot be required, in advance of the argument, to instruct on the province of counsel in arguing the case. This conduct cannot be anticipated on the part of counsel.[27]

15. Cautions Against Sympathy or Prejudice.[28] It is not improper to instruct the jury that they are not to be influenced by sympathy or prejudice, if the circumstances warrant it.[29] The giving or refusal of such instructions is, however, ordinarily a matter of discretion with the court.[30] The parties are certainly not entitled to a cautionary instruction of this character in the absence of special circumstances connected with the trial, which would make such instruction essential to a fair trial.[31] But where the court discovers a popular prejudice against a party, it is the duty of the court to state the law so clearly and unequivocally as to leave the jury no escape from their duty.[32]

16. Duties of Jury[33] — a. In General. It is proper to tell the jury that it is their duty to determine the facts from the evidence and apply thereto the law as stated in the court's instructions,[34] but erroneous to direct the jury to determine the facts solely from the evidence without stating that the evidence must be considered in the light of the instructions.[35] It is proper to instruct the jury that they must receive the law from the court and be governed thereby.[36] A party is on request entitled to such instruction,[37] and the refusal thereof is error.[38] It is not necessary, however, that the jury be told in every instruction that they must be governed thereby.[39] It is not error for the court to instruct the jury that they act as arbitrators to arbitrate the differences between the litigants;[40] or that the privilege of correcting errors of law that the court might make does not rest with the jury;[41] or to direct the jury to say on which of two defenses they found for defendant, if they so found.[42] An instruction is erroneous which gives the jury to understand that they should not base their verdict on an inference or guess,[43] or directs them to find in favor of that party whose theory is more acceptable, more probable, and more consistent with their experience,[44] or that they may use the instruction so far as they find it applicable.[45] The refusal of an instruction which warns the jury against being influenced by a newspaper article is not error, unless it appears that the discretionary power of the court to give or refuse such instruction has been abused.[46] And it has been held that giving an instruction concerning the respective duties of the court and jury lies in the discretion of the court, and its refusal is not prejudicial error.[47]

51. Clarke v. Robinson, 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 55. And see Barry v. McCollom, 81 Conn. 293, 70 Atl. 1035, 129 Am. St. Rep. 215, holding that where plaintiff, in an action for libel, was a witness in her own behalf, and one of the alleged libelous statements was that she had not "even the externals of refinement," an instruction that the possession of the externals of refinement was rather a subject of the jury's own observation was erroneous, as misleading the jury to believe that such observation was the best evidence. But see Reves v. Hyde, 14 Daly 431, 13 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 323, 14 N. Y. St. 689, 28 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 38 [reversing 11 N. Y. St. 681].

Reason for rule.— It is better that they should determine the fact upon the testimony of others, delivered under all the guards and sanctions which the law can impose, and subject to all the scrutiny which the parties and the jury themselves can exercise, than that the jury should decide according to the secret results of their own observation, which being unknown until disclosed in the verdict, are free from scrutiny and almost free from responsibility. Clarke v. Robinson, 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 55.

is left to the opinion of the jury without any reference to the testimony,[52] is erroneous, and it is of course proper to refuse instructions of this character.[53] However, the jury may be instructed to weigh the evidence in the light of their general knowledge and experience as applied to the ordinary transactions of life.[54] But the instruction must be confined to such knowledge, observation, and experience as the jurors share in common with men generally,[55] and should not limit this general knowledge to that acquired by persons in any particular line of business.[56] It is error to instruct that matters within the common knowledge of mankind do not require proof, where the attention of the jury is not directed to the particular matters they might consider without evidence thereof.[57]

(II) In Determining Credibility of Witnesses. It is proper to instruct the jury to take into account their experience of men and their actions in determining the credibility of witnesses;[58] but it is error to instruct them that they can act upon their private and personal knowledge of the character of the witnesses.[59]

(III) On Consideration of View. Impressions made upon jurors by a view of premises examined by them under order of court are not evidence,[60] and therefore to instruct them to use as evidence what they saw or learned on such view is error.[61] When, before a view by the jury, they are cautioned not to consider their own observations, and are properly instructed as to the purpose of the view, an instruction in regard to the same matter need not also be given at the close of the trial.[62] When the jury have been properly permitted to view the premises in dispute, it is not improper to refuse a request which requires the court to instruct the jury that "they are not to take into consideration anything

c. Agreeing on Verdict.[64] Instructions which have a tendency to restrain jurors from agreeing on a verdict should not be given.[65] On the other hand, the court may impress upon the jury the propriety and importance of coming to an agreement and harmonizing their views, state the reasons therefor, and tell them it is their duty to try to agree; [66] but should not give instructions having a tendency to coerce the jury into agreeing on a verdict. While the court may reasonably urge an agreement, its discretion does not extend to the limit of coercion.[67] So instructions which direct or sanction a compromise verdict by the jury are erroneous and should not be given.[68] The law does not expect, nor does it tolerate, the agreement by a juror on a verdict, unless he is convinced that he is right.[69] It does not contemplate that the jurors shall compromise, divide, or yield for the mere purpose of agreement.[70] The court may instruct the jury against reaching a verdict by compromise,[71] but the giving of such instruction is discretionary and it may with equal propriety be refused.[72]

17. Effect of Verdict. It is well settled that the court is not bound to instruct the jury as to the consequences which will flow from their verdict.[73] But there is a considerable lack of harmony as to the propriety of giving such instructions. Some decisions seem to lay down the rule without qualification that such instructions are erroneous.[74] Many of the decisions relate to the propriety of giving instructions as to the effect of the verdict, in respect of costs. In one jurisdiction it is held without qualification that any instruction on this head is erroneous.[75] In another, such instruction is held proper in cases where punitive damages may be given,[76] but not in actions on contract;[77] and in another, it is proper to give such instruction in actions of tort,[78] but in no other kind of action.[79] As respects other instructions as to the effect of the verdict, it has been held proper to instruct that a verdict and judgment for plaintiff will authorize a body execution against defendant;[80] and it is not a ground for reversal that the court instructs the jury that plaintiff's right to recover in another action would not be precluded by a verdict for defendant in the case on trial,[81] and on the other hand it is reversible error to instruct that if plaintiff is unsuccessful, he may ultimately lose the whole sum which he claims as damages.[82] So it has been held that where the jury have rendered a verdict assessing damages severally against defendants, it is reversible error for the court to send them back to the jury room with the instruction that a satisfaction of the judgment on the smaller assessment of damages would operate to preclude the collection of the larger.[83] to error when instructions are reduced to writing,[85] the court may instruct the jury orally in the absence of statute providing otherwise.[86] But where oral instructions are given, it is the right of the party who desires to except thereto to have them reduced to writing so that they may be reviewed on appeal.[87] In most jurisdictions it is a matter of statutory regulation whether instructions must be reduced to writing. Some of the statutes require written instructions to be given when requested, and others require instructions to be reduced to writing, although no request is made therefor.[88] These statutes are uniformly held to be mandatory, and a non-compliance therewith erroneous, and a ground for reversal if injury results;[89] and it has been held that this is so even though no injury resulted,[90] although this latter proposition is also denied.[91] If, by the provisions of the statute, written instructions must be given on request, the court may instruct orally in the absence of a request to reduce the instructions to writing,[92] the rule being that in the absence of such request the court may instruct either in writing or orally,[93] and in any event if the parties have consented to the giving of oral instructions, they are estopped from objecting.[94] The court, when requested to charge in writing, cannot charge orally, although the party refuses to write out instructions he desires to have given.[95] Nor is it an excuse for failure to give a written charge that it was impracticable to put the whole charge in writing, within the time in which it was necessary to conclude the trial.[96] Notwithstanding a statutory prohibition against instructing orally, yet if oral instructions are given, only the party aggrieved by them can complain.[97]

2. What Are Instructions Within Rule. Instructions proper are directions in regard to the law of the case,[98] statements of rules of law governing the matters in issue.[99] A proposition to which the judge gives his assent in argument is an instruction,[1] as is also the judge's direction as to the duty of the jury to try the case on the testimony,[2] or a communication as to the effect or non-effect, propriety or impropriety, of parts of the evidence,[3] and the oral citing and subsequent reading of a statute.[4] On the other hand, remarks made orally by the presiding judge are no part of the charge unless bearing upon questions of law or fact involved in the issues.[5] Remarks to the jury of a general character as to their duty and power as jurors are not a part of the instructions required to be put in writing.[6]

Thus, it is not necessary to reduce to writing explanations to jurors on their voir dire examination as to what will or will not disqualify them,[7] remarks cautioning the jury that they have no right to inspect the place where the accident causing the injury occurred,[8] or directions as to the form of the verdict,[9] or to sign or seal the verdict,[10] to abstain from talking with others,[11] to retire and consider the verdict further,[12] to direct them to bring in a verdict covering the issues in a cross complaint,[13] or to answer certain interrogations; [14] or directions to the jury respecting the authority of nine jurors to make a verdict,[15] or as to the importance of agreeing on a verdict if the jury could do so without the sacrifice of their honest convictions.[16] So the court may give his opinion orally on a motion to exclude testimony; [17] the purposes of the opening statement in ruling on an objection thereto,[18] or, in ruling on the admissibility of evidence, explain the rulings; [19] state for what purpose evidence is admitted,[20] limit its application,[21] or direct the jury to disregard it; [22] repeat to the jury, for their information, an admission made by one of the parties; [23] direct the jury to disregard improper remarks of counsel to which objection has been made,[24] or to disregard a mistake made by the judge; [25] recapitulate the evidence,[26] or explain at whose request certain charges were given; [27] confine counsel in their argument to the controlling points in the case and state in the presence of the jury what those points are; [28] remark on the length of the trial and apologize for his impatience during its progress; [29] direct a verdict,[30] or refuse to give further instructions; [31] or, in replying to an exception to the charge, say that he has not attempted to state the facts but merely to state what is claimed,[32] or answer a question asked by a juror; [33] and it is not an instruction within the meaning of the requirement that instructions must be in writing for the court to make a remark not addressed to the jury.[34]

3. ORAL MODIFICATIONS OR QUALIFICATIONS.[35] Where instructions are required to be in writing any modification or qualifications thereof must also be in writing,[36] unless oral modifications or qualifications are assented to by the parties.[37]

4. WHAT IS A SUFFICIENT COMPLIANCE WITH STATUTES. Where the charge is required to be in writing, the entire charge must be in writing, and it has been held ground for reversal that the instructions are partly oral and partly written.[38] The requirement that instructions be in writing is complied with when the instructions are written in pencil,[39] or when they are partly in pencil and partly typewritten.[40] If written instructions are substituted for oral instructions previously given, there is a substantial compliance with the requirement that instructions shall be in writing,[41] as is also the case where a written charge containing pencil changes is read to the jury, and, after verdict copied and verified by the stenographer.[42] And, according to some decisions, it will be a sufficient compliance with the requirement if oral instructions are subsequently reduced to writing.[43] The decisions are not uniform on this point, however. Thus it has been held sufficient for the judge to deliver his instructions orally and have them taken down by the stenographer where the statute contains provisions expressly authorizing this procedure.[44] And, on the other hand, there are decisions which hold that in the absence of such authorization such procedure is not permissible.[45] Decisions are also conflicting as to whether reading from books or papers as a part of the charge is in violation of the requirement that instructions be in writing. Thus it has been held that statutes may properly be read as a part of the charge,[46] while other decisions maintain the contrary doctrine.[47] The same difference of opinion exists as to the propriety of reading pleadings as a part of the instructions.[48]

5. Time For Requesting Written Instructions and Sufficiency of Requests. If the court is not required to instruct in writing except on request, the request must be made within a reasonable time before the charge is to be given in order that the court may have sufficient time to prepare written instructions.[49] The request should be made at such time that the granting of the request would not delay the business of the court.[50] Such reasonable time is generally at or before the close of the evidence,[51] which, it is said, is the limit of "apt time" as settled by established practice;[52] and, if the request is made at this stage of the trial, it will be sufficient, notwithstanding a rule of court requiring the request to be made before commencement of trial. Such a rule is unreasonable and invalid.[53] However, request for written instructions comes too late if made after the argument,[54] or after the court has begun to instruct orally.[55] The request for written instructions should be made in such a manner as to inform the court clearly of the desire of the party on the subject.[56] If the party wishes to have the entire charge put in writing, and not merely special requested instructions, the request should explicitly so inform the court.[57]

Where the argument to the jury had not commenced when the request was made, it will not be deemed too late because of the mere intervention of an argument by counsel, at the judge's invitation, upon the question as to whether there was any evidence of a particular fact, when the jury had retired from the court room for the recess, and as preliminary to the discussion before them after the recess. Reason for rule. — If counsel may wait until the close of the argument before making the request, it would necessarily cause great delay in the proceedings of the court, and materially increase costs and expenses. G. Signing, Sealing, Numbering, and Noting Disposition of Instructions [58] — 1. Signing of Instructions by Court. In the absence of some statutory provision requiring the court to sign instructions, error cannot be assigned for its failure to do so.[59] But in some jurisdictions, statutes varying somewhat in phraseology have been enacted which provide for the signing of instructions by the court. Failure of the court to sign the instructions is not assignable as error in the absence of an exception based on that ground,[60] and in some jurisdictions has been held not to constitute reversible error in any event,[61] although in another it has been held ground for reversal if a proper exception has been saved.[62] By the statutes of one state, it is provided that all instructions given by the court must be signed by the judge and filed as part of the record. It is held that this statute is mandatory, and unless so signed, or filed, or incorporated in a bill of exceptions properly filed, or filed by order of court, the instructions do not become a part of the record and no question on the subject of instructions is presented to the reviewing court.[63]

2. Signing of Instructions by Counsel or Parties. The statutes of some states provide that requested instructions shall be signed by counsel or parties, and non-compliance with this requirement is uniformly held to justify a refusal thereof.[64] It is immaterial that the requested instructions contain full and accurate statements of the law; [65] and in case of refusal of correct instructions, when questioned by the party requesting them, the opposite party may invoke the failure to sign in defense of the action of the court.[66] However, if the instructions asked state the law correctly, the court may, in its discretion, give them, although not signed and the giving thereof furnishes no ground for reversal.[67]

What is a sufficient compliance with statute.— Where a defendant presented instructions to the trial court, the request reciting the caption of the case, and that defendant therein requested the court to give the jury each of the following instructions, numbered 1 to 32, inclusive, which was signed by defendant's attorneys as attorneys for defendant, and the requested instructions followed, but were not signed at the end thereof by defendant or his counsel, the instructions were sufficiently signed within the statute requiring all instructions to be numbered consecutively, and signed by the party or his counsel. In the absence of any statutory provision on the subject, it has been said that the practice of submitting to the jury instructions, with signature of counsel attached to them, is not to be commended, but it is not a ground for reversal.[68] Nor is it a ground for reversal that instructions given the jury were written on paper bearing the letter heads of one of the attorneys in the case.[69]

3. Numbering Instructions. Where, as is the case in some jurisdictions, the statutes require parties or counsel to number requested instructions, non-compliance with the requirement justifies a refusal thereof.[70] However, it has been held that the giving of instructions defective in this regard is not reversible error, even though proper exceptions are saved.[71] And, although a statute requires the court to number its instructions, objection for failure to do so is waived if no objection is made or exception taken at the time the charge is given.[72] And in any event, the giving of instructions not numbered as required by statute is not reversible error, if the rights of the parties are not prejudiced thereby.[73]

4. Sealing Instructions. Under the statutes of one state it was formerly necessary for the court to seal instructions, and a failure to do so, if excepted to, constituted reversible error.[74] Because of a change in the statutes of that state, it is no longer necessary for the court to seal the instructions.[75]

5. Noting Disposition of Instructions.[76] The words "given" or "refused" indorsed on the judge's charge sufficiently show the disposition of the charge.[77] Statutes in some jurisdictions provide that instructions given shall be marked "given" and instructions refused shall be marked "refused."[78] These provisons have no application to instructions which show upon their face that they were given by the court of its own motion.[79] In construing them, it has been held a sufficient compliance for the judge to write upon the margin of the first of several sheets of paper fastened together and containing instructions asked, "Instructions, one to seven, all refused."[80] Failure to mark instructions "given"[81] or "refused"[82] in accordance with statutes so providing is not a ground for reversal if the record shows that they were in fact given or refused, or where the defeated party himself noted on the margin an exception to the giving or refusal of the instruction as the case may be, although such exception was accompanied by a special exception to the failure of the court to so mark it,[83]

or where no prejudice resulted therefrom,[84] the statutory requirement that instructions shall be marked as "given" or "refused" being merely directory.[85] And, in any event, a non-compliance with the statutory requirement cannot be assigned as error unless objection was duly made in the trial court.[86] The inadvertent action of the court in marking "refused" on a correct instruction on an important branch of the case, and giving it so marked to the jury with other instructions marked "given," is reversible error.[87] And, where of two requested charges, one containing matter which the jury might properly have considered was refused and so marked, but being on the same piece of paper with the one given, was afterward handed to the jury by the court, to take away, with a caution that it had been refused and was not to be considered by them, it was held reversible error, as its effect was a denial of the matter which the jury might properly have considered in the refused charge.[88] Refusal to mark instructions "given" or "refused" after verdict is not error as at that time the court is without power to pass on the instruction.[89]

H. Manner of Delivery or Refusal of Instructions[90] — 1. In General. It is the right of a party who has presented written requests for instructions to have them read in the presence of the jury,[91] and this right is not abrogated by a statute which provides that charges moved for by either party must be in writing, and must be given or refused in the terms in which they are written and must be taken by the jury with them in their retirement.[92] According to the weight of authority the instructions should be read by the court itself.[93] In that way, and only in that way, it has been said, can there be any assurance that every principle of law given the jury for their guidance receives its due emphasis.[94] Where this view prevails, the rule is not complied with where the instructions are read by counsel in the presence of the jury and the court states that such instructions are given to the jury,[95] or where they are merely handed to the jury without being read at all.[96] There are, however, some cases which hold that it is sufficient

if the law is given in charge so plainly that the jury can have no difficulty in understanding it, whether it is repeated in their hearing by the judge himself, or read by another and sanctioned and charged by him as read.[97] On reading requested instructions, the court should make it clear that the matter read is approved by the court and given to the jury for their guidance.[98] It is not sufficient for the court to say that instructions are given subject to be qualified by instructions given for the opposite party without designating the qualification intended,[99] that they may be considered as given as far as they are consistent with the general charge and refused as far as they were inconsistent therewith,[1] or that the jury might use them so far as practicable in arriving at a verdict.[2] And it is improper for a judge to weaken the force of a proper instruction by sarcastic comment, so as to leave the jury in doubt whether the instruction was given or refused,[3] or by intimating that, although the instructions given in behalf of a party are correct, they present a loose and inadequate presentation of the law applicable to the case,[4] or to intimate that his personal opinion is otherwise than the law he charges.[5] And on the other hand, the underscoring of parts of instructions is not a practice to be approved of, since it may cause the jury to give undue weight to such portions, to the undervaluing of other parts of the instructions.[6] However, it is not error for the judge in his charge to characterize the rule of law stated by him as the rule of common sense.[7] Failure of the clerk to send to the jury one of the written instructions which had become accidentally detached is not ground to reverse unless prejudice shown.[8]

2. Necessity For Delivery of Instructions in Open Court and in Presence of Counsel.[9] It is a rule of universal application that instructions to the jury must be delivered in open court,[10] in order that the parties may have an opportunity to know what they are, except to them if desired, and ask other explanatory instructions if deemed necessary.[11] And according to the weight of authority the instructions must be delivered in the presence of counsel or after an attempt has been made to notify them.[12]

3. Tone or Manner in Delivering Charge. According to some decisions, the tone in or emphasis with which the trial judge delivers the charge is not a ground for reversal where there is nothing in the record to indicate that the jury were misled thereby,[13] or unless the effect of the charge is to cause a mistrial.[14] And the weight of authority is that while the manner or emphasis of the trial judge in delivering the charge may have been prejudicial, yet if the charge contains a correct statement of the law as applied to the facts, the reviewing court cannot relieve against the error, because there is no way by which it can be shown by the record, or its influence estimated.[15]

4. CHARACTERIZING INSTRUCTIONS AS GIVEN ON REQUEST OF ONE PARTY OR THE OTHER. Instructions, when given, are those of the court,[16] and the better practice is to make no distinction between that portion which originates with the judge, and that which originates with either counsel, and to give all proper requested instructions as emanating from the court itself.[17] However the characterizing of instructions as given at the request of one party or the other is not error, or at least not available error.[18]

5. NOTATION OF AUTHORITIES ON INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN. It is improper to give an instruction containing the notation of a decision, but the error will not warrant a reversal,[19] and it has been held error to refuse an instruction defective in this respect, but otherwise proper; that the notation should be erased and the instruction given.[20]

6. STATING REASONS FOR GIVING OR REFUSING INSTRUCTIONS. With the reason for an instruction the jury has nothing to do,[21] and, if an instruction given be correct, it is immaterial that a wrong reason was given therefor.[22] Similarly, if an instruction is properly refused, it makes no difference that the reason assigned for the refusal was erroneous.[23]

7. READING FROM BOOKS.[24] Unless prohibited by statute, in instructing the jury, the court may read to it pertinent sections of the statutes,[25] and even though the sections are not strictly applicable, the error is not reversible if the jury were not mislead thereby.[26] So the court may read extracts from decisions if they state the law correctly and are applicable to the facts of the case.[27] The fact that the decision read from is that of another state,[28] or was rendered on a former appeal taken in the same case, makes no difference,[29] provided nothing contained therein states the result of the previous trial.[30] It is error, however, to read an extract from a decision not applicable to the facts of the case,[31] where such extract, apart from the context, is likely to mislead the jury.[32] It is also erroneous to read the full text of a reported case as an instruction to the jury, as such action tends to confuse and mislead them.[33]

8. Reading Refused Instructions to Jury. It is not necessary to read refused instructions to the jury,[34] or to inform them that requests for such instructions have been made.[35] On the contrary, it is better practice not to read them.[36] It is of no consequence to the jury what is contained in the rejected instruction, as they are not to be governed by it, and have no use for it[37]

I. Instructions on Submission to Jury For Special Verdict, or Special Findings — 1. Special Verdict. It is very generally held that where a case is submitted to the jury for a special verdict,[38] it is unnecessary[39] and improper[40] to instruct the jury generally as to the law of the case,[41] and in some states it is error to instruct them to return also a general verdict.[42] On the other hand it is held that instructions concerning the nature of the action,[43] the issues,[44] the

Stating that the facts of the case read from were similar to the one then before the court, and that he adopted the decision in the case read as the law on the subject, accentuates the error. rules of evidence,[45] the form of the verdict,[46] and the general duties of the jury[47] are proper.

2. Special Findings. Under a statute authorizing submission for either a general or a special verdict, it is error to instruct the jury to return both a general verdict and answers to special questions,[48] and in submitting special questions, care should be taken in so framing them as to avoid prejudice to either party.[49] It is error to charge the jury to make their special findings conform to their general verdict;[50] or to instruct the jury as to what answers would be consistent or inconsistent with a general verdict in favor of either party;[51] or in any way, either expressly or by necessary implication, to instruct the jury as to the effect of particular answers on the ultimate right or liability of either party;[52] or to

In submitting the question as to whether defendant's want of ordinary care was the cause of the injury, an instruction that if the jury find lack of ordinary care on the part of defendant, they must answer "yes," is erroneous, as it withdraws the question as to whether defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. J. Construction and Operation [62]— 1. General Rules. The object of an instruction is to convey information to the jury for immediate application to the subject-matter before them.[63] Therefore the language of an instruction must be considered with reference to the issues raised by the pleadings and the evidence;[64] and if a charge, when so construed, is free from error, it will not be ground for reversal, although wrong as an abstract proposition.[65] The words employed must be taken in their ordinary and popular acceptation,[66] and will not be subjected to analytical criticism.[67] They will be construed according to their essential meaning,[68] and refined distinctions will not be indulged in.[69] Where an instruction is susceptible of more than one construction or meaning, the court will adopt that which, in the exercise of ordinary good sense, was evidently given to it by the trial court and jury.[70] Where, however, an instruction is such that

Omission of qualifications or exceptions.— Where an instruction, as far as it goes, states a correct proposition of law, but is defective because it fails to qualify or explain the proposition it lays down in consonance with the facts of the case, such defect is cured if subsequent instructions are given containing the required qualifications or exceptions. instruction. An exception exists, however, where an instruction purports to sum up all the facts, the proof of which will warrant a verdict for a party. In such a case the instruction must be correct, and, if erroneous or incomplete, it is not susceptible of cure by any other instructions.[98]

4. Error Cured by Withdrawal or Correction. An error in a charge is cured where the court subsequently withdraws or corrects it.[99] In such a case it will be presumed that the jury accepted the withdrawal or correction, and acted thereon,[1] unless from all the circumstances of the case the contrary appears probable.[2] The withdrawal must be express,[3] and in language so explicit as to preclude the inference that the jury might have been influenced by the erroneous instruction.[4]

K. Exceptions and Objections[5]— 1. Right to Except — a. In General. A party has a right to except to the giving and the refusing of instructions,[6] provided he is prejudiced thereby[7] and has not, by his conduct, estopped himself to make objection.[8]

b. Estoppel or Waiver.[9] A party cannot except to an instruction given at his own request,[10] or in harmony with one he requested,[11] or which was admitted,[12] or consented to,[13] by him. Thus a party, having asked an instruction, will not be permitted to object that there is no evidence to justify it,[14] or another, relating to the same matter,[15] even if his own request was refused.[16] But where a party is unable to induce the court to instruct the jury according to his view of the law, the fact that he asks instructions presenting the most favorable view of the law that the court will entertain does not estop him on appeal to assign error upon the action of the court.[17] No modification of an erroneous instruction can be assigned for error by the party asking the instruction.[18]

Suppl. 477 (holding that the practice of giving the jury facts and instructions at length, which are by a single sentence eliminated at the close of the charge, is prejudicial to the defeated party, and should not be indulged in).

A qualified correction and retraction of an erroneous material statement in a charge does not correct the original error. Orendorf v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 119 N. Y. App. Div. 638, 104 N. Y. Suppl. 222. Thus, an error in the judge's charge is not cured by a retraction, accompanied by the remark that he had no doubt of the propriety of it. Meyer v. Clark, 45 N. Y. 285.

2. Time For Taking Exceptions. The common-law rule, as generally stated, was that exceptions to instructions or refusal to instruct must be taken at the trial in order to be available.[19] This rule has been generally construed to require exceptions to the giving or refusing of instructions to be taken at the time they are given or refused,[20] and before the retirement of the jury.[21]

The object of an exception is to call the attention of the circuit judge to the precise point as to which it is supposed he has erred, that he may then and there consider it, and give new and different instructions to the jury, if in his judgment it should be proper to do so. Beaver v. Taylor, 93 U. S. 46, 23 L. ed. 797; Mountain Copper Co. v. Van Buren, 133 Fed. 1, 66 C. C. A. 151; Park v. Bushnell, 60 Fed. 583, 9 C. C. A. 138. Any other rule would enable a party to sit silently by, knowing that some error had been committed against his interest, of which perhaps no other person was aware at the time, and thus take the chance of a verdict in his favor, while having the sure means of setting aside the verdict if it happened to be against him. Presumption as to time.— When a bill of exceptions sets out an instruction given by the court, following it with the words, "to which defendant excepted," it will be presumed that the exception was taken at the trial, and while the jury were at the bar, although there was no explicit statement to that effect. In the federal court, exceptions to the charge are of no avail unless the record shows that they were taken while the jury were at the bar (Hickory v. U. S., 151 U. S. 303, 14 S. Ct. 334, 38 L. ed. 170; Klaw v. Life Pub. Co., 145 Fed. 184, 76 C. C. A. 154; Mountain Copper Co. v. Van Buren, 133 Fed. 1, 66 C. C. A. 151; Erie R. Co. v. Littell, 128 Fed. 546, 63 C. C. A. 556; Park v. Bushnell, 60 Fed. 583, 9 C. C. A. 138), although the omission to do so was in conformity to a practice prevailing in the trial court, but not embodied in a rule, by which exceptions were permitted to be taken after the close of the trial, and included in the bill of exceptions as if taken at the proper time (Mountain Copper Co. v. Van Buren, 133 Fed. 1, 66 C. C. A. 151; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Baker, 85 Fed. 690, 29 C. C. A. 392; Johnson v. Garber, 73 Fed. 523, 19 C. C. A. 556). But where a case was submitted to the jury but two hours before the expiration of the term by limitation, and the court refused to detain the jury to give a party time to reduce his objections to the instructions to writing, and present the same, but gave him permission to present them within a reasonable time after the jury had retired, which was done, the fact that the objections were not taken before the jury retired was held not to deprive such party of the benefit thereof. Dalton v. Moore, 141 Fed. 311, 72 C. C. A. 459.

Exception to additional charge to jury.— An exception to additional instructions to the jury, given by the court on their returning an incomplete verdict, must be taken before the jury retire again, and comes too late after they have brought in their final verdict. Bynum v. Southern Pump, etc., Co., 63 Ala. 462.

Further instructions in absence of counsel. — Instructions given to a jury upon their coming into court after they have retired to consider their verdict, and not excepted to at the time, cannot be reviewed on error, although counsel were absent when they were given (Cornish v. Graff, 7 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 204 [affirmed in 36 Hun 160]; Stewart v. Wyoming Cattle Ranche Co., 128 U. S. 383, 9 S. Ct. 101, 32 L. ed. 439. But see Merchants' Exch. Bank v. McGraw, 76 Fed. 930, 22 C. C. A. 622), unless permitted by rule of court. Thus, in Massachusetts, the forty-eighth rule of the superior court provides that, when instructions are given in the absence of counsel, the presiding justice may permit exception thereto at any time within twenty-four hours next following. This rule is reasonable, and binding on parties. McCoy v. Jordan, 184 Mass. 575, 69 N. E. 358. Rule 58 of the circuit court for the district of Montana, which permits exceptions to the charge of the court or to the refusal of instructions requested to be taken after the jury have retired, but, if practicable, before the verdict has been returned, was intended to permit such course to be followed, where it would be in the interest of justice by avoiding the confusion of the jury or where further instructions were given in the absence of counsel, and not to permit exceptions generally to be taken after the close of the trial contrary to the settled rule of the federal courts; and where the judge, after instructing the jury but before sending them out, retired to his room with counsel and there heard and allowed the exceptions, the rule does not require him to afterward entertain or allow further exceptions. Montana Min. Co. v. St. Louis Min., etc., Co., 147 Fed. 897, 78 C. C. A. 33 [re-

3. Mode of Taking and Noting Exceptions. In the absence of a statute reserving exceptions to instructions as a matter of course,[22] the right to except to the giving or refusal of instructions must be actually exercised.[23] But unless expressly prescribed,[24] the form in which exceptions are saved is of no consequence.[25] They may be taken expressly, or they may be allowed by the court without request, in which case no formal exception by counsel is necessary.[26] Whatever form may be used, if the counsel and the judge both understand that exceptions are saved, the judge may and should allow such exceptions.[27] But if the court seeks to give an exception to a party, it must do it in language clear and definite;[28] and while the ruling of the court may entitle the party to an exception, yet, where the language used by the court is so indefinite that it is not pointed out, the party must, in order to make the question available, point out the objectionable language, and interpose thereto the exception which has been allowed by the court, when the record is made up.[29] As a general rule exceptions to instructions may be reserved either by a bill of exceptions[30] or by notes written upon the instructions,[31] versed on other grounds in 104 U. S. 204, 27 S. Ct. 254, 51 L. ed. 444].

22 N. C. Code, § 412, subd. 3, provides that if there is error in the instructions of the trial judge it shall be deemed excepted to without the filing of any formal objections. McKinnon v. Morrison, 104 N. C. 354, 10 S. E. 513.

23. Coleman v. Gilmore, 49 Cal. 340, holding that a statement made by counsel to the official reporter, when the court charges the jury that he wishes it understood he saves an exception to the charge, does not amount to an exception, even if it was assented to at the time by the opposing counsel.

For example a request "to charge the jury in a certain way, and to file the opinion of record" is not equivalent to a bill of exceptions, without which the charge of the court, filed in pursuance of such request, is not a subject for the assignment of error. Bratton v. Mitchell, 3 Pa. St. 44. So the mere handing to the judge presiding at the trial of written requests for instructions does not necessarily imply that, if the requests are not granted, an exception is saved. Leyland v. Pingree, 134 Mass. 367. And where an instruction was excepted to at the close of the charge, and the court thereupon gave an additional instruction upon the same point for the purpose of curing the difficulty, to which counsel said nothing, it was held that no exception was saved. Muller v. Powers, 174 Mass. 555, 55 N. E. 323; McCart v. Squire, 150 Mass. 484, 23 N. E. 323.

24 In Montana the statute, section 253, provides: "If any party to the trial desires to except to any instruction given by the court, or to the refusal of the court to give an instruction asked for, or any modification thereof, he shall reducc such exceptions to writing, and file the same with the clerk, before the cause is submitted to the jury." An agreement between counsel that certain instructions granted or refused shall be deemed excepted to, without complying with this statute, is of no effect. Herman v. Jeffries, 4 Mont. 513, 1 Pac. 11.

In Nebraska to make exceptions to the charge of the court to the jury available to the party excepting, it is necessary that the exceptions be reduced to writing, together with so much of the evidence as is necessary to explain it. Code, § 309. Monroe v. Elburt, 1 Nebr. 174.

25. Leyland v. Pingree, 134 Mass. 367.

26. Mitchell v. Turner, 149 N. Y. 39, 43 N. E. 403, holding that where the trial court, in modifying requests to charge, states, "I give you an exception to both your requests to charge," a formal exception by counsel is unnecessary.

27. Leyland v. Pingree, 134 Mass. 367.

28. Henderson v. Bartlett, 32 N. Y. App. Div. 435, 53 N. Y. Suppl. 149, holding that a mere statement by the court that "I understand counsel to except to my failure to charge all the requests not charged, and to all modifications of requests," does not prevent any question; nor does it relieve a party from pointing out with reasonable certainty the particular wherein the ruling or the charge is excepted to. In Columbia Mill Co. v. National Bank of Commerce, 52 Minn. 224, 53 N. W. 1061, after the charge of the court, when defendant began to state its exceptions, the court said: "The exceptions will be made so broad that they will cover all requests of either plaintiff or defendant, either as refused or modified by the court." This remark did not dispense with the necessity to take exceptions. At most, it could be taken only as leave to the parties to state their exceptions specifically when they should come to make up the "case" or bill of exceptions; and even as such it is not commendable practice, for the purpose of an exception to the charge is to call the attention of the trial court, before the jury retires, to specific instructions or instructions refused, so that the court may make any proper correction before it is too late, which it is, when the case or bill of exceptions comes on for settlement. The remark did not give leave — the court below could not do so — to make up the exception in the appellate court.

For example, where a party objects to an instruction, and makes the objection the subject of a bill of exceptions, the failure to object to a subsequent instruction embodying the same principle does not impair his right to rely on the exception taken. dict,[38] or on a motion for a new trial,[39] is too late and will not be considered. In many jurisdictions the common-law rule in this respect has been changed, and the practice is now regulated by statute.[40]

In section 343 of the Indiana Practice Act, it is provided that "the party objecting to the decision must except at the time the decision is made." 2 Rev. St. (1876) p. 176. The statute is mandatory. On this point the courts have no discretion. In Alabama, under Code, § 2758, which permits a party to reserve by bill of exceptions any charge or decision of the court that would not otherwise appear of record, the exception must be taken before the jury retires; and an exception to a portion of the general charge comes too late when taken after the jury has returned and asked for further instructions. Hayes v. Solomon, 90 Ala. 520, 7 So. 921; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Moog, 81 Ala. 335, 1 So. 108.

In California, under Code Civ. Proc. § 646, an exception to the giving or refusal of instructions must be taken at the time the ruling is made. Garoutte v. Williamson, 108 Cal. 135, 41 Pac. 35, 413; Sharp v. Hoffman, 79 Cal. 404, 21 Pac. 846; Sierra Union Water, etc., Co. v. Baker, 70 Cal. 572, 8 Pac. 305, 11 Pac. 654; Mallett v. Swain, 56 Cal. 171; Robinson v. Western Pac. 4. Sufficiency of Exceptions — a. In General. Each exception in a bill of exceptions should be specific, pointed, and explicit, showing specifically and

In Illinois, section 53 of the practice act provides that exceptions to the giving or refusing of any instructions may be entered at any time before the entry of final judgment in the case. Since the enactment of that provision it has not been the custom to take exception in open court at the time instructions are given or refused, but the practice has been to present objections on the motion for a new trial, and to enter the exceptions before final judgment. Collins Ice-Cream Co. v. Stephens, 189 Ill. 200, 59 N. E. 524.

In Iowa, under Code (1873), § 2789, exceptions to instructions not taken at the time may be taken within three days after verdict (Rowen v. Sommers, 101 Iowa 734, 66 N. W. 897; Maxon v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 67 Iowa 226, 25 N. W. 144; Clark v. Reiniger, 66 Iowa 507, 24 N. W. 16; Parker v. Middleton, 65 Iowa 200, 21 N. W. 562; Bailey v. Anderson, 61 Iowa 749, 16 N. W. 134; Brant v. Lyons, 60 Iowa 172, 14 N. W. 227; Harrison v. Charlton, 42 Iowa 573), in a motion for a new trial (Patterson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 70 Iowa 593, 33 N. W. 228; Deere v. Needles, 65 Iowa 101, 21 N. W. 203). Likewise under the express provisions of the code, section 3709, it is sufficient if exceptions are taken in the motion for a new trial. Shoemaker v. Turner, 117 Iowa 340, 90 N. W. 709. But the giving of time within which to file a motion for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, does not extend the time for filing exceptions to instructions. Leach v. Hill, 97 Iowa 81, 66 N. W. 69; Bush v. Nichols, 77 Iowa 171, 41 N. W. 608.

In Massachusetts, under St. (1863) c. 180, § 2, modifying the thirty-fourth rule of the superior court, a party must allege exceptions, either orally or in writing, before the jury retires. Lee v. Gibbs, 10 Allen 248. An exception to a charge taken after the jury has commenced to go out is too late, and it is not error to refuse to call them back. Spooner v. Handley, 151 Mass. 313, 23 N. E. 840.

In Michigan, under the provisions of Rev. St. (1846) p. 161, § 62, it is competent for a party to allege exceptions to the charge given to the jury at any time before they shall find their verdict, in the absence of any rule to the contrary; but the more general and better practice is that a party should take his exceptions before the jury retires. Doyle v. Stevens, 4 Mich. 87.

In New York, Code, § 995, expressly allows an exception to a charge to be taken before the verdict is given. Polykranas v. Krausz, 73 N. Y. App. Div. 583, 77 N. Y. Suppl. 46; De Leon v. Echeverria, 45 N. Y. Super. Ct. 240; Broadway Trust Co. v. Fry, 40 Misc. 680, 83 N. Y. Suppl 103. Under this section an exception may be taken on the bringing in of a sealed verdict, after the jury have been allowed to separate. Panama R. Co. v. Johnson, 58 Hun 557, 12 N. Y. Suppl. 499. But it is an exception to the charge as made which can be taken at any time before the jury have rendered their verdict. Walker v. Second Ave. R. Co., 57 N. Y. Super. Ct. 141, 6 N. Y. Suppl. 536 [affirmed in 126 N. Y. 668, 27 N. E. 854]. An exception to a refusal to give a requested instruction must be taken at the time of such refusal. Walker v. Second Ave. R. Co., supra.

In North Carolina exceptions to the charge, and for refusing to give special instructions, are in time if taken at or before the stating of the case on appeal (Tillett v. Lynchburg, etc., R. Co., 116 N. C. 937, 21 S. E. 698; Blackburn v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co., 116 N. C. 821, 21 S. E. 922; Lowe v. Elliott, 107 N. C. 718, 12 S. E. 383), although the better practice is to assign all exceptions in making motion for new trial (Lowe v. Elliott, supra; McKinnon v. Morrison, 104 N. C. 354, 10 S. E. 513). But an exception for omission to charge must be made before verdict. State v. Harris, 120 N. C. 577, 26 S. E. 774; State v. Groves, 119 N. C. 822, 25 S. E. 819; State v. Varner, 115 N. C. 744, 20 S. E. 518. An objection to a failure to put a charge in writing is waived by not excepting before verdict, when the mistake, if any, can be corrected. Phillips v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 130 N. C. 582, 41 S. E. 805. Under the code, section 550, if there is an error in the instructions given, an exception thereto is valid if entered within ten days after adjournment for the term. Williams v. Harris, 137 N. C. 460, 49 S. E. 954; State v. Harris, supra.

In North Dakota, under the code, a party desiring to except to instructions given in an oral charge has twenty days within which to do so under all circumstances. Lindblom v. Sonstelie, 10 N. D. 140, 86 N. W. 357. Under the provisions of sections 5298 and 5722, revised codes, a district judge has power to extend the time within which exceptions to a charge may be taken, either before or after such time has elapsed; but such extension should be granted only upon good cause shown, and in furtherance of justice. Lindblom v. Sonstelie, supra.

In South Dakota, under section 5049, Comp. Laws, "exceptions to the giving or refusing any instruction, or to its modification or change, may be taken at any time before the entry of final judgment in the case." Under this section there is no distinction, in respect to the time within which exceptions may be taken, between instructions given at the request of counsel, and instructions given by the judge of his own motion. Uhe v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 4 S. D. 505, 57 N. W. 484. Section 5079, Comp. Laws, defining exceptions, and providing that they "must be taken at the time the decision is made," does not repeal or qualify section 5049, providing that exceptions to instructions may be precisely what ruling is claimed to be error.[41] This result may be accomplished either by excepting to so much of the charge as instructs the jury that the law is so and so;[42] or by stating, by way of recital, the part of the charge excepted to;[43] or by calling on the court to charge in a certain way; and if the court refuses so to charge, then by excepting to such refusal.[44] It is not essential, in an exception to a portion of a charge, to repeat the language excepted to, although this is strictly the more accurate practice;[45] it is sufficient if the attention of the court is fairly directed to the error complained of,[46] either by a recital of the language used, or of its very substance.[47] An exception attributing to the court language not contained in the instruction is bad.[48]

b. General Exceptions — (1) To Instructions Given. Exceptions to a charge which embraces several legal propositions should be specific, and should call the attention of the court to the error complained of.[49] For reasons which

In Wisconsin, Rev. St. (1878) § 2869, permits exceptions to instructions actually given to be taken at any time during the trial term. Gehl v. Milwaukee Produce Co., 116 Wis. 263, 93 N. But exceptions to the refusal of the court to instruct as requested by either party must still be taken at the trial, or they must be deemed to have been waived. Gehl v. Milwaukee Produce Co., supra. Statutory permission to take exceptions to the charge after the trial does not include exceptions to refusals to give requested instructions. Gutzman v. Clancy, supra; Little v. Iron River, 102 Wis. 250, 78 N. W. 416; Thrasher v. Postel, 79 Wis. 503, 48 N. W. 600; Adams v. McKay, 63 Wis. 404, 23 N. The practice of excepting to fractions of a sentence in a judge's charge is not to be commended. It is better to at least give the entire sentence; and an exception to mere disjointed fragments will often be so improper that the appellate court will not deal with it at all. The office of an exception is to point out, and call the attention of the court to, any proposition of law which is claimed to be erroneous, so that, if the court has inadvertently stated any rule of law erroneously, it may at once correct it. Shull v. Raymond, 23 Minn. 66; Packard v. Bergen Neck R. Co., 54 N. J. L. 553, 25 Atl. 506; Hindman v. Louisville First Nat. Bank, 112 Fed. 931, 50 C. C. A. 623, 57 L. R. The office of an exception is to point out some specific error in law, and the counsel should, by his exception, lay his finger upon the precise request refused, or the error in the charge, not only that the court may, upon the error being pointed out, correct it, but also that the court of review may not be left to spell out and dig up errors which, after they are discovered, may be more apparent than real, and may have arisen from mere inadvertence or misapprehension upon the trial. Kennedy v. Falde, 4 Dak. 319, 29 N. W. 667; Galloway v. McLean, 2 Dak. 372, 9 N. W. 98; Ayrault v. Pacific Bank, 47 N. Y. 570, 7 Am. Rep. 489.

Where the exception is not to a statement of a rule of law, but only to an error in the statement of facts, such as an error in dates or amounts, or in the statement of what the pleadings contain, or to the absence of some qualifying word or phrase in the definition of a rule of law, the exception should point out distinctly the very error or mistake complained of. Philip Schneider Brewing Co. v. American Ice-Mach. Co., 77 Fed. 138, 23 C. C. A. 89.

Applications of rule.—An exception "to that part of the charge about probable cause," reciting the first sentence employed by the court in treating of that subject, is sufficiently specific. Rogers v. Mahoney, 62 Cal. 611. So an exception "to so much of the charge as related to smooth, level, and slippery ice not being a defect under the conditions named" sufficiently indicates the statement of legal propositions to which objection is made. Adams v. Chicopee, 147 Mass. 440, 18 N. E. 231. But an exception to the charge "commencing with the words . . . and from there to the end," is bad, where such portion of the charge contains distinct propositions. Calkins v. Seabury-Calkins Consol. Min. Co., 5 S. D. 299, 58 N. W. 797. And an exception, "to so much of" a long and elaborate charge "as requires the evidence should show there was an intention to deceive" is too general, and presents no point which an appellate court can consider. Phœnix Assur. Co. v. Lucker, 77 Fed. 243, 23 C. C. A. 139. So likewise an exception taken "to that portion of the court's charge, which defines the effect of the Automobile act of charge embracing distinct legal propositions is insufficient.[50] For prevention 1903," p. 80, c. 55, when the court laid down numerous propositions as flowing from that act, is so general as to be nugatory. Addis v. Rushmore, 74 N. J. L. 649, 65 Atl. 1036. And an exception to the last half of a long charge has been held too general and indefinite to be available in the supreme court. Bigelow v. West Wisconsin R. Co., 27 Wis. 478.

Notwithstanding a statutory provision that "no reason need be assigned for exceptions," wholesale exceptions, without reference to the specific matter claimed to be objectionable, are not authorized. Nebeker v. Harvey, 21 Utah 363, 60 Pac. 1029.

Exceptions to rule.— The rule that exceptions to instructions should be precise and pointed, so as not to require the court to search for errors through long passages, does not apply when it is necessary or useful to cite an entire passage in order to form a just view of the error complained of. Hicks v. U. S., 150 U. S. 442, 14 S. Ct. 144, 37 L. ed. 1137.

In Iowa the rule prior to the revision was that a general exception taken to the whole of the judge's charge entitled the excepting party to present for review an erroneous position in any portion of the charge, and this rule governs in all actions begun before the revision took effect. Wilhelmi v. Leonard, 13 Iowa 330; Eyser v. Weissgerber, 2 Iowa 463. But, under the revision, the rule is recognized that a general exception to several instructions given, some of which are correct, raises no question for review in the supreme court. Carpenter v. Parker, 23 Iowa 450; Redman v. Malvin, 23 Iowa 296; Eddy v. Howard, 23 Iowa 175; Loomis v. Simpson, 13 Iowa 532; Davenport Gas Light, etc., Co. v. Davenport, 13 Iowa 229. Section 2789 of the code provides that "either party may take and file exceptions to the charge or instruction given, or to the refusal to give any instructions offered, within three days after the verdict, and may include the same in a motion for a new trial, but in either case the exceptions shall specify the part of the charge or instructions objected to (Ludwig v. Blackshere, 102 Iowa 366, 71 N. W. 356; Byford v. Girton, 90 Iowa 661, 57 N. W. 588; Patterson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 70 Iowa 593, 33 N. W. 228; Miller v. Gardner, 49 Iowa 234; Hale v. Gibbs, 43 Iowa 380), and the ground of the objection (see infra, IX, K, 5). An exception to instructions after verdict, which specifies them by number, is sufficiently definite as to the part objected to. Miller v. Gardner, supra.

In Ohio, the amendment of section 5298 of the Revised Statutes, providing for a general exception to the charge of the court to a jury, does not apply to pending actions. Cincinnati v. Anderson, 19 Ohio Cir. Ct. 603, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 523.

tions.[50a] A general exception is bad unless the whole charge is wrong.[51] It is insufficient if any one of such propositions is proper,[52] but will suffice if the charge contains Distinction between oral and written charges.— While a general exception to a charge containing two or more propositions will not be considered on appeal, if the charge is in writing, a more liberal rule will be applied if the charge is oral, and the instructions specially mentioned in the exception will be reviewed. Lichty v. Tannatt, 11 Wash. 37, 39 Pac. 260.

Distinction between general charge and requests.— In California, a general exception, although sufficient as to instructions given at the request of the other party, is not so as to those given by the court of its own motion. Williams v. Casebeer, 126 Cal. 77, 58 Pac. 380; Cavallaro v. Texas, etc., R. Co., 110 Cal. 348, 42 Pac. 918, 52 Am. St. Rep. 94; Sukeforth v. Lord, 87 Cal. 399, 25 Pac. 497, (1890) 23 Pac. 296; Rider v. Edgar, 54 Cal. 127; Robinson v. Western Pac. R. Co., 48 Cal. 409; McCreery v. Everding, 44 Cal. 246; Shea v. Potrero, etc., R. Co., 44 Cal. 414; Waldteufel v. Pacific Vineyard Co., 6 Cal. App. 624, 92 Pac. 747; Miller v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 6 Cal. App. 395, 92 Pac. 332.

Discretion of court.— It has been held that a rule of court providing that no general exception to the whole charge shall be allowed may be enforced or relaxed in the discretion of the court below. Collins v. Leafey, 124 Pa. St. 203, 16 Atl. 765. Thus, where a general exception has been sealed to the entire charge, bringing it regularly before the supreme court for construction, and afterward the parts excepted to are separately and specifically assigned as error, there is a substantial conformity with the rules of this court relating to assignments of error. Collins v. Leafey, supra; Mosgrove v. Golden, 101 Pa. St. 605. So where it appears that certain exceptions formally taken to instructions, and signed by the judge, have been mislaid, it is proper to allow a general exception to the entire charge. Collins v. Leafey, supra. But see Eldred v. Oconto Co., 33 Wis. 133, holding that the rule that an exception to instructions, to be of any avail in this court, must be specific, calling the attention of the court below to the particular error claimed to exist, is established mainly for the protection of the prevailing party, and is in furtherance of justice, and cannot be abrogated by the practice of any trial court.

The following exceptions have been held too general to require consideration in the appellate court: That a charge to the jury was calculated to produce a certain result (Gable v. Rauch, 50 S. C. 95, 27 S. E. 555); that it fails to submit the real issue (Thomas v. Parker, 69 Ga. 283); that it was argumentative (Goldstein v. Smiley, 168 Ill. 438, 48 N. E. 203; Owen v. Brown, 70 Vt. 521, 41 Atl. 1025), misstated the testimony (Keystone Lumber, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Dole, 43 Mich. 370, 5 N. W. 412), or was misleading (Gum v. Murray, 6 Mont. 10, 9 Pac. 447; Alt v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 5 S. D. 20, 57 N. W. 1126); or that it improperly assumed facts (Emmons v. Alvord, 177 Mass. 466, 59 N. E. 126); or expressed an opinion on the facts (Walters v. Laurens Cotton Mills, 53 S. C. 155, 31 S. E. 1; Hayes v. Sease, 51 S. C. 534, 29 S. E. 259; Carpenter v. American Acc. Co., 46 S. C. 541, 24 S. E. 500; Greene v. Duncan, 37 S. C. 239, 15 S. E. 956; Strohn v. Detroit, etc., R. 51. Arkansas.— Fones v. Phillips, 39 Ark. 17, 43 Am. Rep. 264, holding that if the record shows a general objection to a particular instruction, the objection must prevail, if any material part of the instruction is bad, unless it is divisible into wholly disconnected parts.

For example, where the whole charge proceeds on a false theory, and there is no reason to suppose that the error was inadvertent, a general exception is sufficient. Snyder v. Viola Min., etc., Co., 3 Ida. 28, 26 Pac. 127. So, where an instruction deals solely with the question of the measure and elements of damage, and any error in the instruction, in view of its phraseology, will render it erroneous as a whole, an objection and exception to the giving of it as a whole is sufficiently particular to cover any error therein. Compare Bernstein v. Humes, 78 Ala. 134, holding that where a charge consists of a single sentence, containing several connected and dependent clauses, a general exception to the entire clause is sufficient to reach error in any part.

For example, in an action to recover for the death of plaintiff's son, an exception to the portions of the general charge on the measure of damages as contrary to law is sufficiently specific to raise the question of the correctness of the charge on one element of damages, since all the elements together constitute the measure of damages, and, if one element was wrongly stated, the measure was a defective one. thereof, by number, without specifying the particular matter deemed objectionable, is ordinarily held to be too general,[58] and will not be considered if any portion of the instruction or paragraph objected to is correct.[59]

(II) To Failure or Refusal to Instruct. It is the duty of counsel to specify the particular points in the charge,[60] or in the omission or refusal to charge,[61] to which they take exception, and a general exception to a refusal to give several instructions requested collectively will not be considered on appeal,[62]

In Colorado, where the instructions are given in writing, and separately paragraphed and numbered, an exception to the giving of a certain numbered instruction is sufficient. Big Hatchet Consol. Min. Co. v. Colvin, 19 Colo. App. 405, 75 Pac. 605. In Ritchey v. People, 23 Colo. 314, 47 Pac. 272, 384, it was held that such exceptions to instructions given in writing, and which were separately paragraphed and numbered, were sufficient. The court, however, drew a distinction between the case of written instructions separately paragraphed and numbered and the case of one general charge delivered orally, citing Miller v. People, 22 Colo. 530, 45 Pac. 408; Edwards v. Smith, 16 Colo. 529, 27 Pac. 809; Keith v. Wells, 14 Colo. 321, 23 Pac. 991, in which such exceptions to a charge which was oral and general were adjudged insufficient. See also Willard v. Williams, 10 Colo. App. 140, 50 Pac. 207. In Denver v. Hyatt, 28 Colo. 129, 63 Pac. 403, it is said that trial courts should require counsel to specify alleged errors in instructions given, when exceptions are taken; but where this is not required, and the instructions are paragraphed, a mere exception to each instruction separately is sufficient, if allowed in that form. In Iowa, an exception to instructions between certain numbers given, and to each of them, is sufficiently specific, when the objection is made at the time the instructions are given. Mann v. Sioux City, etc., R. Co., 46 Iowa 637. In Washington, under the act of March 8, 1893 (Laws (1893), p. 112), § 4, exceptions to a charge may be taken by specifying, by numbers or paragraphs or otherwise, the parts of the charge excepted to. Suppl. 298 (holding that when the court in its charge correctly refers to some parts of those requests to charge which it had refused, and had made it unnecessary to charge other parts by the way in which it described the legal liability of the party making the request, an exception without specifying any particular omission is too general to be considered); Luce v. Hassam, 76 Vt. 450, 58 Atl. 725.

Vermont.— Goodwin v. Perkins, 39 Vt. 598.

Wisconsin.— Harrison v. Crocker, 39 Wis. 68, holding that on a single exception to a refusal to give two instructions asked by the appellant, this court can only consider whether both instructions, taken together, are a correct statement of the law.

United States.— Chateaugay Ore, etc., Co. v. Blake, 144 U. S. 476, 12 S. Ct. 731, 36 L. ed. 510; Anderson v. Avis, 62 Fed. 227, 10 C. C. A. 347.

A contrary rule prevails in some states. Thus in Maryland it is held that where prayers for instructions are presented at the same time, and form a series of consecutive propositions, the ruling of the court thereon is a single act, and one exception thereto is sufficient to embrace the whole. McCosker v. Banks, 84 Md. 292, 35 Atl. 935. In such a case, the appellate court will regard the refusal in the same light as if each question raised had been separately determined, and formed the subject of an independent exception. Planters' Bank v. Alexandria Bank, 10 Gill & J. (Md.) 346. So, under the Missouri code, a formula often used for saving the exceptions is "which instructions the court refused, to which refusal of the instructions thus prayed, the defendant, by his counsel, then and there excepted at the time." Whittlesey Pr. 482. Such an exception entitles the party to have each refused instruction considered in this court. Weber v. Kansas City Cable R. Co., 100 Mo. 194, 12 S. W. 804, 13 S. W. 587, 18 Am. St. Rep. 541, 7 L. R. A. 819. In Iowa, when instructions are asked and refused, and such refusal is excepted to at the time and noted on the margin of each instruction, a general exception presents a question for review upon each instruction so refused. fication of the requests submitted.[67] Nor will the appellate court consider a general exception to a refusal to charge as requested, when the requests are numerous, and some are fully complied with, while others are in part, or are wholly disregarded.[68] But if all the requested instructions are proper and should have been given,[69] or if all but one are given,[70] a general exception is sufficient. And exceptions are sufficiently specific where it appears that each offer or request was separately made and passed upon, and each ruling excepted to.[71] Any

An exception to such portions of a charge as are variant from the requests made by a party, not pointing out the variances, cannot be sustained. Beaver v. Taylor, 93 U. S. 46, 23 L. ed. 797. In Requa v. Rochester, 45 N. Y. 129, 6 Am. Rep. 52, ten propositions were submitted to the judge, who proceeded to charge the jury and substantially adopted some of the propositions. At the close of the charge, the counsel excepted to the charge in all the particulars specified in those written requests, "so far as the judge had not charged as requested"; this exception was held not to have pointed out in what the counsel conceives the court has erred, and gave no aid for the correction of any error into which the judge had fallen. In Chamberlain v. Pratt, 33 N. Y. 47, 52, defendant excepted to the general charge of the court so far as it differed from his requests. The court said: "This exception is not sufficient to raise any question for our consideration. It is not an exception to any point of the charge as given; nor to any refusal of the judge to charge as requested; but to the whole charge so far as it differed from the six propositions presented. But as the whole charge is not given, it is impossible to see wherein it did differ from such propositions." But in Stubbs v. Johnson, 127 Mass. 219, it was held that if defendant asks the judge to rule that, on all the evidence, plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and excepts to the rulings of the judge so far as not in accordance with the instruction asked, all the instructions given on this point are open to him on his exceptions.

Illustrations.— When the bill of exceptions states that "the defendants requested the court to give each of the following charges in writing," setting them out, "but the court refused to give either of said charges, and to such refusal the defendants excepted," the exception brings up for revision the refusal of each one of the charges, as if a separate exception had been reserved to each. Lehman v. Bibb, 55 Ala. 411. So where five distinct requests to charge, separately numbered, were submitted to the court, who rules upon, denying or modifying, each separately, and counsel "excepted to said refusals and modifications of said instructions, as given," it was held that such exception was sufficiently specific, and would be understood as apply-reason which the court may have stated for refusing to give the instructions is immaterial, and no exception to this reason stated is required.[72]

5. Statement of Grounds of Objection. In some jurisdictions, an exception to instructions must specify the ground of objection.[73] But when an erroneous proposition of law is asserted, as applied to the case on trial, it is sufficient to except generally, without stating the ground of objection.[74] In others it is held that while an exception to an instruction must point out the part of the instruction that is bad, it need not give any reason why it is bad,[75] that being a matter of argument.[76] The rule is sometimes stated as follows: When the charge, without asserting an erroneous proposition of law, as applied to the case, is ambiguous or deficient in fullness, or does not go far enough, or is not sufficiently explicit, the party excepting should call the attention of the court to the particular grounds upon which he objects, so that it may be corrected.[77]

6. Scope and Questions Raised — a. In General. A general exception challenges merely the correctness of the legal proposition which the charge affirms,[78] and cannot, it has been said, be construed as extending beyond the matter which immediately precedes it.[79] Such an exception to a charge does not bring up

In Iowa, under Code (1873), § 2787, the grounds for exceptions to instructions need not be stated, where the exceptions are taken at the time the instructions are given. W. 690; Johnson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 51 Iowa 25, 50 N. W. 543; Price v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 42 Iowa 16. But exceptions to instructions not taken when they are given must specify the ground of objection. Ludwig v. Blackshere, 102 Iowa 366, 71 N. W. 356; Brantz v. Marcus, 73 Iowa 64, 35 N. A bare complaint that "the court erred" in giving a particular instruction brings nothing into question except the soundness, in the abstract, of the proposition or propositions therein announced. Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Bond, 111 Ga. 13, 36 S. E. 299.

any particular remark made by the judge,[80] or any omission in such charge,[81] unless the attention of the judge was directed to the point at the time.[82] In short, a general exception will be insufficient where the special point of the objection insisted upon is such that if it had been specifically pointed out at the trial it might have been obviated,[83] or where the general objection was calculated to divert the attention from the special objection on which the party intended to rely.[84] But where there is some substantial error which misled the jury,[85] or the whole charge is bad,[86] or where a single proposition is charged incorrectly as a statement of law,[87] the noting of a general exception operates to present the error to the court of review; and the excepting party is under no duty to request that the rule, as formulated correctly, be charged,[88] unless the error is the result of a mere inadvertence, and so would have been corrected had the court's attention been called to it.[89] Where the ground of exception is expressly stated, none other than the stated objection can be considered.[90]

b. Applications of Rule. In applying these principles, a general exception is held to be insufficient to raise an objection to the propriety of the charge,[91] or as to the time or circumstances of giving the same; [92] to the use of objectionable language; [93] to merely formal defects; [94] that the court misstated the Failure to number or mark instructions "given," etc.— While the provisions of a statute requiring instructions to be separately numbered, and marked "given" or "refused," as the case may be, are mandatory, still the failure to observe those requirements presents nothing for review, unless exception is specially taken on that ground. testimony;[95] that the charge was based on incompetent evidence,[96] or on facts not shown by the evidence;[97] or that it invaded the province of the jury,[98] was ambiguous,[99] misleading,[1] or inconsistent with other instructions given.[2]

7. Effect of Failure to Except. Where no exceptions are taken to the giving or refusing of instructions at the trial, the parties are concluded by their failure to take exceptions, and the appellate court cannot examine them.[3] So also the objection that there was an omission to charge on an essential point must be taken below, and cannot be raised for the first time in the appellate court.[4] Accordingly, failure to except to instructions on the ground that they contradict an instruction already given;[5] that they are not supported by the evidence;[6] that they improperly assume facts,[7] or misstate the evidence;[8] that the instructions were oral when required to be in writing,[9] or were not indorsed as "given"[10] is a waiver of the objection. But when the verdict of the jury has been made to turn upon an erroneous charge, and the judgment upon the merits is thus founded on error, the judgment will be reversed, although no exception was taken thereto.[11] And where the appellant was misled into omitting to except, the same result will follow, if justice requires it.[12] Although a party may not except to all the rulings in which there is error, he cannot be denied the benefit of the exceptions that he does take.[13] Conversely when specific objections are taken to instructions, any others which might have been urged, but were not, must be deemed to have been waived.[14]

Under Md. Act (1862), c. 154, objection cannot be raised in the court of appeals, to a prayer, for having assumed a fact, unless such objection appears to have been raised and decided below. Lane v. Lantz, 27 Md. 211; Young v. Mertens, 27 Md. 114. This act applies as well to an instruction which assumes several facts, as to one in which only one fact is assumed. If there be proof to sustain the facts competent to go to the jury, and the court below in its instruction assumes them, instead of submitting them to the jury, the objection, under the act of 1862, must be taken at the trial, otherwise it cannot be insisted on in the appellate court, as cause for reversal. (II) As to Amount of Damages. Where the verdict is for defendant, a refusal to instruct on the subject of damages,[38] or exemplary damages,[39] is harmless error. So, likewise, where it is manifest from the amount of the verdict that the jury did not include exemplary damages, the error, if any, in refusing to give a charge excluding a finding for such damages, is harmless.[40] And where the damages awarded do not exceed the amount claimed in the complaint, the failure to limit the amount of recovery to such sum is harmless error.[41] court, and not to the jury; but there is no rule which requires the jury to be sent out while such an argument is in progress before the court, or which declares that, in the course of an argument to the court, the law shall not be read in the hearing of the jury, but such matters must rest largely in the discretion of the presiding judge,[44] who may have the jury removed,[45] or permit them to remain,[46] when counsel is engaged in reading law-books to the court. It is not error to permit the jury to remain during the discussion of a motion for nonsuit,[47] or of the proper form of verdict.[48] But it is irregular and improper to call on counsel, in the hearing of the jury, to waive any legal right.[49] And complaint that witnesses have been tampered with by a party should not be made in the presence of the jury, but they should be retired, and opportunity given to make the complaint and have it investigated.[50] Juries have no concern with exceptions to rulings, and it is not necessary that they be present when exceptions are taken or allowed.[51]

2. Officer in Charge.[52] Except in cases where they find a verdict without leaving their seats,[53] the jury during their deliberations should be placed in charge of a duly authorized officer of the court,[54] and that too, although they do not leave the court-room, if they are left alone. In such case, the same necessity exists for putting them in charge of an officer as if they had retired from the court.[55] Officers who are interested in the result of a lawsuit should not personally attend the jurors during their deliberations,[56] and where officers are interested, the court may appoint a special officer to attend the jury during trial.[57] While it is proper for the court to administer a special oath to the officer put in charge of the jury,[58] a special oath need not be administered in the absence of some statutory requirement to that effect. The official oath of the officer is sufficient.[59]

3. Separation of Jury[60]— a. With Consent — (i) Before Final Submission.[61] Before final submission of the cause to the jury, it is very generally held proper for the court to permit the jury to separate during adjournment for rest and refreshments,[62] or where the further consideration of the case is postponed for several days,[63] the matter of so doing resting largely in the discretion of the court.[64] Especially is this true when no motion is made against granting permission or cause shown for not allowing the separation.[65] But to give the court authority to permit separation of the jury, the consent of counsel is unnecessary.[66] Permission may be granted over objection of counsel,[67] and the action of the court in this regard will not be ground for reversal when no abuse of discretion is shown.[68] Permitting several of the jurors to go to a closet outside of the court-room, in custody of an officer of the court, is not improper.[69]

(II) AFTER FINAL SUBMISSION.[70] A verdict will not be set aside merely because after being charged, the jury were permitted to leave the court and separate before giving their verdict.[71] So, permitting one of the jurors after retirement and before a verdict has been agreed on, to go to another room in charge of an officer and telephone instructions to an employee will not vitiate the verdict.[72] And, according to the weight of authority, it is within the discretion of the court to give the jury permission to separate if they find a verdict during an adjournment, and to return a sealed verdict on the reassembling of the court.[73] Especially is this true where the separation of the jury is by consent of the parties;[74] but the fact that this permission was given without notice to counsel will not vitiate the verdict in the absence of any showing of prejudice.[75] In no event will a judgment be reversed because the jury are permitted to separate after retirement and before agreement, where no injury is shown or attempted to be shown.[76] And a separation after an agreement cannot vitiate a verdict unless there is ground for suspicion that the jury have been improperly tampered with, and the verdict affected by intervening circumstances.[77]

In Georgia it is held that the jury should not be permitted to separate without consent of counsel after submission of the cause, but where, after submission of the cause and before retirement, the court, in the presence of counsel, gives permission to the jury to separate, and counsel make no objection, their consent will be presumed (Adkins v. Williams, 23 Ga. 222; Riggins v. Brown, 12 Ga. 271); and if permission is granted in counsel's absence, their failure to make any objection when the jury reassembles will also be held to be an implied consent to the dispersal (Stix v. Pump, 37 Ga. 332).

b. Without Consent.[78] The propriety of keeping a jury together until they have rendered their verdict cannot be too strongly inculcated; but the object is to obtain an unbiased expression of their judgment;[79] and, although the dispersion of the jury without leave may render the members thereof punishable as for a contempt,[80] it is very generally held that separation of the jury without permission of the court after finding their verdict but before rendition thereof, while an irregularity, does not of itself vitiate the verdict, and that the court may nevertheless receive it, when uninfluenced by any intervening cause.[81] So it has been held that the fact that a jury separate, without leave of the court, after a case has been committed to them, and before they have agreed upon their verdict, and afterward come together and agree, will not vitiate the verdict, if the jurors were not tampered with and their verdict affected thereby.[82] Likewise, the temporary absence of a juror from the jury room, without permission of the court, affords no ground for disturbing the verdict, when there is no proof of misconduct on his part with reference to the cause on trial.[83]

c. Asking Counsel if They Object to Separation of Jury. For the court to ask counsel, in the hearing of the jury, if they had any objection to separation of the jury, is not good practice,[84] as his refusal might excite the feelings of the jury against him.[85] Nevertheless, it is not ground for reversal where resulting prejudice is not shown.[86]

4. Admonitions to Jury.[87] When permission is given the jury to separate, the jury should be appropriately instructed not to talk about the case with others nor to permit any person to discuss the case with them.[88] It has been held, however, that this requirement is waived if the parties allow the jury to separate without asking such admonition;[89] and where the jury are so admonished when retiring under direction, that if they have not reached a verdict in a given time they may separate for a definite period, it is not necessary that the admonition be repeated before actual separation.[90] If no other verdict could have been rendered on the evidence, failure to give the jury proper cautions on permitting them to separate cannot be availed of as error.[91] If the court have reason to believe that the jurors have expressed a determination to render a verdict in favor of one of the parties, irrespective of the facts proved, he may before the parties have challenged them admonish them as to their duty to decide the case fairly and impartially on the evidence.[92]

B. Misconduct of Jurors[93]— 1. In General. It has been held not improper for the jury to take notes of what is said if too much time is not consumed thereby,[94] or for the jury with the permission of the court to make memoranda of articles in suit and the value placed thereon by the evidence.[95] Nor is the jury guilty of any misconduct in sending one of their number to ask the court to explain its instructions,[96] or in sending out for refreshments while deliberating upon their verdict.[97] On the other hand, it is improper for the foreman of the jury to endeavor to find out how the jury stood upon a former trial of the case.[98] And it is gross misconduct for a jury that has been authorized to make a sealed verdict and disperse, to seal up a piece of paper stating that they could not agree and then to disperse, and the case could not be given to the jury again even if the parties did not object.[99] But every irregularity which would subject the juror to censure should not overturn the verdict, unless there is some reason to suspect that irregularity may have had an influence on the final result.[1] In the absence of prejudice to the party complaining, misconduct of jurors is not a ground for reversal.[2] It is not sufficient to vitiate a verdict that some of the jury during the progress of a trial played cards with one of the attorneys of a party;[3] that a juror pending the trial made statements to persons not interested in the case respecting the effect of the evidence;[4] that a juror during recess of trial conversed with the agent of one of the parties,[5] or with a party,[6] or a witness,[7] on matters not connected with the case. So it is not ground for reversal that a juror cross-examined a witness,[8] or communicated with persons unknown to the officer in charge,[9] or upon counsel's making a statement in his opening address saying

"that won't help you a bit, — that will not do you any good." [10] It has been held sufficient to vitiate a verdict that some of the jurors during trial took dinner at a restaurant with the successful party, at his invitation and expense; [11] that a juror went to the house of a person not friendly with plaintiff and who held a pass over defendant's road and spent the night there with defendant's attorney; [12] that a juror conversed with several persons about the cause; [13] that a juror, in an action for injuries alleged to be due in part to a defective switch, without the knowledge of the court, personally examined the switch; [14] that a juror during recess read a medical book bearing on the case; [15] that the remarks of a juror during the trial showed prejudice; [16] or that the jurors took into consideration the fact that plaintiff's son had previously recovered a judgment in his own right for the injuries complained of.[17] In determining whether the misconduct of a juror was prejudicial, the reviewing court is not bound by the opinion of the trial court.[18] By agreeing to excuse a juror, and to proceed with the trial with eleven jurors, a party waives any objection he might have taken to the conduct of such juror.[19]

2. Drinking Intoxicating Liquors.[20] If a juror is rendered incapable of performing his duties by drinking intoxicating liquors,[21] or drinks at the expense of the successful party,[22] it is, of course, a ground for reversal. But the merely drinking of intoxicating liquors, when the drinking is not at the expense of one of the parties, and the jurors are not incapacitated from performing their duties as such furnishes no ground for disturbing the verdict.[23]

3. Disclosure of Verdict.[24] Disclosure of the nature of a sealed verdict by a juror before its announcement is reprehensible conduct on his part,[25] but is not of itself sufficient to invalidate the verdict.[26] A motion to vacate the verdict on that ground is addressed to the judicial discretion of the trial court.[27]

4. Unauthorized View or Inspection.[28] Jurors must render a verdict on about fifteen minutes," the legal presumption is that the losing party in the case was thereby injured, and, in the absence of any explanation of the matter, there should be a new trial.

evidence introduced on the trial of the cause,[29] and it is not permissible that they should go on a private search for evidence,[30] because such examination may put them in possession of facts which, although incompetent, would have a potential influence upon their decision,[31] and the parties would have no opportunity of meeting, explaining, or rebutting evidence thus obtained.[32] By such conduct the jurors are in effect obtaining evidence, the nature and importance of which it is impossible for the parties to know.[33] While, as heretofore shown, the court may in its discretion allow a view or inspection by the jury,[34] a view or inspection by a juror or jurors without consent of the court,[35] or in disobedience of a ruling refusing it,[36] is misconduct, which may or may not vitiate the verdict according to circumstances. It has been held in a case where the act of the juror was in direct disobedience of a ruling of the court refusing to allow a view, that no inquiry will be made as to whether or not prejudice to a party resulted, but the verdict will be set aside on the broad ground that the misconduct of the juror has a tendency to corrupt and cast suspicion upon the administration of justice,[37] and viewing the premises in company with the witnesses of one of the parties has been held fatal to the verdict.[38] So the verdict is vitiated where it clearly appears,[39] or it can reasonably be inferred [40] that the unauthorized view or inspection influenced the verdict, or where the court cannot determine, with any reasonable certainty, whether the result was affected or not; under these circumstances it will be assumed that it was.[41] And, where some of the jurors make an unauthorized view, the irregularity is not cured by direction of the court to the entire jury to make a view.[42] On the other hand, it has been held that not every unauthorized view or inspection will be sufficient ground to set aside the verdict, and if it conclusively appears [43] or is reasonably clear that no prejudice resulted to either of the parties,[44] or that there was only a bare possibility that there was a prejudicial result,[45] the verdict must stand. And misconduct of jurors in regard to unauthorized views or inspections may be waived, and is waived, when the unsuccessful party remains silent although aware of it,[46] or, knowing of it, goes on with the trial and does not call the court's attention to it until after the return of the verdict.[47]

C. Misconduct of Others Affecting Jury [48]— 1. Of Parties, Relatives, or Friends.[49] Misconduct of a party to induce a jury to decide in his favor is dealt with more strictly by the court in its refusal to allow the retention of benefits under a verdict so obtained than similar misconduct of a third party or a juror without the knowledge of either party.[50] Thus it has been held reversible error that the successful party talked to a juror with reference to the case during the progress of the trial; [51] that he supplied jurors with meals, luxuries, and cigars not taxed or taxable as costs,[52] or paid to jurors who were dissatisfied with the regular fees an additional amount which they knew was a gratuity paid them by him; [53] or in an action for personal injuries, where one of the questions litigated was as to the ringing of a gong on a car sufficiently loud enough to warn plaintiff, that the successful party rang a gong, which had been admitted in evidence, in the presence of the jury.[54] So it is sufficient to vitiate the verdict that the successful party and a friend talked with and treated individual jurors during trial; [55] that friends of the prevailing party had conversation with jurors about the case intended to and calculated to influence the verdict; [56] or that the brother of the successful party, who was looking after the case for her, drank with a juror at his invitation and purchased dinner for himself and the juror, although both denied talking about the case.[57] On the other hand, it is not reversible error that the court refused a new trial because plaintiff in a personal injuries case became prostrated and was attended by physicians in the court room during trial, it not appearing that the attack was simulated.[58] And conversation by plaintiff's mother with a juror, she being ignorant that he was a juror, will not operate to reverse, where it is apparent that what was said could have had no influence on the jury.[59]

2. Of Officers.[60] Courts should not countenance or tolerate any act or conduct by court officers that might influence the conduct of any member of a jury in favor of either party in reaching conclusions in the case they are considering.[61] Misconduct of an officer in charge of a jury may be of such a character as will vitiate a verdict.[62] He should not speak to the jury while deliberating, except to ask if they have agreed; [63] and it has been held ground for reversal that the sheriff in charge of the jury tells them that unless they speedily agree the judge will take them to another county,[64] or that in his opinion the judge will detain them for a week unless they agree,[65] or that he remained with the jury while deliberating, talked with them concerning the case and threatened a juror who declined to vote without further consideration that he would cause him to be fined for contempt.[66] The fact that the officer was present with the jury during their deliberations is not ground for reversal; [67] and it is not ground for reversal that he asked them whether they were likely to agree, and stated that he was going home in an hour; [68] that he wrote on a piece of paper "it is a clear case" and left it in the jury room; [69] that, in response to a question from a juror, he said that he supposed the judge would call the jury in some time during the following week; [70] or that when the jury were viewing the place of the accident he placed there on the railroad track a small red dress that was worn by the deceased when injured.[71]

3. Of Counsel.[72] It is the duty of counsel to keep away from jurors when out of the court room during trials, and not to converse with them beyond the exchange of the usual salutations. They are bound to the highest honor and integrity and to the utmost good faith in the trial of causes,[73] and it has been held that where one of defendant's counsel played cards with some of the jurors in the case during the time the case was on trial, the verdict for defendant should have been set aside on the ground of public policy, regardless of whether the verdict was affected by the misconduct.[74] This holding, however, is against the weight of authority. Thus it has been held that where there was no conversation about the suit, the verdict will not be vitiated because one of the jurors, in pursuance of a previous invitation, took dinner and supper with an attorney of the appellee during the progress of the trial, and discussed private business with him;[75] that, during a recess, after part of the evidence on both sides had been introduced, the court, over defendant's objection, permitted plaintiff's counsel to have a private consultation with a juror to ascertain the facts to which the juror could testify in the case;[76] that counsel complied with a juror's request, on retiring, to send him certain needed medicines;[77] or that counsel conversed privately with jurors and publicly treated them in a saloon, where it was shown that this had no influence on the verdict.[78]

4. Of Trial Judge.[79] It is improper for the judge to go into the jury room even though he has no speech with them.[80] He has no more right in the jury room while the jury are deliberating than any other person.[81] According to some decisions, this is of itself sufficient ground to reverse the judgment,[82] although there is authority to the contrary.[83]

5. Miscellaneous. It is not improper for the court to send the jury to take a meal at the only hotel in the town where the court sits, although the house be kept by counsel for the successful party in the suit.[84] A verdict is not vitiated by the fact that after submission, and that during separation of the jury by consent of court, bystanders in the presence of jurors, but without knowing them to be present, made remarks about the case;[85] that a witness addressed improper remarks to the jury, it not appearing that such remarks influenced the jury;[86] that a person not a juror was in the jury box and in the jury room when they retired, pending argument of a motion, his presence being due to a mistake on his part and no communications having passed between him and the jurors;[87] or, that during the trial, matter, improper for the jury to know, appeared in the newspapers, it not appearing that such matter reached the jury.[88] But a verdict is incurably vitiated if evidence of the public sentiment as to the case is allowed to reach the jury,[89] or by the fact that a witness, in the hearing of one or more of the jurors, made a statement intended to and which did improperly influence the verdict.[90] Where the court is aware of an attempt to bribe a juror, it is error to continue the trial without notifying the parties of that fact, and for this error the judgment will be reversed.[91]

D. Deliberations and Manner of Arriving at Verdict[92]— 1. Deliberations in General. In making their verdict the jury must determine the facts from the evidence, and must receive the law from the court and be governed by it.[93] They should consider all the evidence introduced which is decided by the court to be admissible,[94] and the verdict must be based on their belief from the evidence.[95] If the evidence is conflicting, the jury should reconcile it if possible,[96] without convicting either of the conflicting witnesses of intentional and deliberate false swearing.[97] If not possible to reconcile the evidence, they should give credence to so much of it as is entitled to belief,[98] and find a verdict for the party in whose favor there is the greatest weight of evidence, considering the character of the witnesses, their means of knowing the facts of which they speak, and their fairness, intelligence, interest, and all other circumstances showing the value of their testimony.[99] It is the duty of the jurors to make every possible effort to agree,[1] and they should deliberate patiently and long, if necessary, on issues submitted to them, and without prejudice, or previously formed bias,[2] to the end that the litigation may be speedily terminated, and the expense of mistrials avoided. But these considerations should not influence them to violate their consciences, by uniting in a verdict, believed by them, upon the law and facts, to be wrong.[3] While the verdict should be the result of sound judgment, dispassionate consideration and conscientious reflection,[4] the law does not prescribe the length of time that a jury shall consider their verdict,[5] and they may render a verdict without retiring [6] or on very brief deliberation after retiring. This alone does not impeach or weaken the verdict.[7]

2. Taking Papers or Articles to Jury Room[8]— a. Pleadings. As was shown in a preceding chapter, it is the duty of the court to state the issues made by the pleadings and not refer the jury to the pleadings to ascertain the issues.[9] Nevertheless, unless forbidden by statutes,[10] it is not error, or at least not reversible error, to permit the jury to take with them into the jury room the pleadings in the case,[11] the pleadings having been explained by the court to the jury,[12] although it has been said, and very properly, that the practice is, at best, of very doubtful propriety [13] and should not be permitted unless there is some special reason therefor.[14] In any event, the court is under no obligation to permit the jury to take the pleadings to the jury room, and error cannot be assigned to its refusal to do so,[15]

as the pleadings are addressed to the court and not to the jury.[16] And they should not be permitted to inspect paragraphs of a petition which have been stricken out on motion,[17] or pleadings which have been eliminated by demurrer,[18] or otherwise,[19] or to take with them the pleadings in the cause to be used as evidence of admissions by one of the parties.[20]

b. Instructions.[21] In the absence of statutory provision on the subject there is some conflict of authority as to the propriety of allowing instructions to be taken to the jury room. According to some decisions the instructions may, in the discretion of the court, be taken by the jury to their room when they retire to deliberate,[22] while others hold that it should not be permitted,[23] at least without consent of the parties.[24] In some states the matter is a subject of statutory regulation. Thus under some statutes all written instructions, whether given or refused, and so marked, may be taken by the jury to the jury room,[25] and a refusal to allow them to be so taken is error.[26] Under others, instructions given may be taken by the jury on their retirement,[27] and it is error to refuse a request that instructions given at the instance of a party be given or sent to the jury on retirement.[28] The jury should have all or none of the instructions given, and it has been held prejudicial error that important instructions were omitted, although through inadvertence.[29] However, it has been held that where part of the instructions are inadvertently given to the jury, if the court on discovering the fact recalls the jury, takes the instructions from their possession and instructs them to give all the instructions equal weight, and it does not appear that the jury read the instructions the verdict is not vitiated.[30]

the verdict rendered on a former trial of the case, no objection being made thereto, and it not having been done fraudulently or designedly to influence the verdict.[31] So, the taking of such verdict among other papers will not operate to reverse where it is shown that the verdict was not seen by the jurors;[32] where it appears by the affidavit of the jurors that they did not read the verdict until they had agreed on their own;[33] or where the jury were distinctly instructed to treat it as if it did not exist, and to found their verdict upon the evidence before them.[34]

Applications of rule.— The rule has been applied in the case of letters (Tabor v. Judd, 62 N. H. 288), abstracts of title (Frugia v. Truehart, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 513, 106 S. W. 736), written instruments sued on (Tubbs v. Dwelling-House Ins. Co., 84 Mich. 646, 48 N. W. 296; Bulen v. Granger, 63 Mich. 311, 29 N. W. 718), pleadings (Reynolds v. Vinier, 125 N. Y. A. 28), X-ray photographs (Chicago, etc., Electric R. Co. v. Spence, 213 Ill. 220, 72 N. E. 796, 104 Am. St. Rep. 213), the notarial protest of a bill (Mullen v. Morris, 2 Pa. St. 85), notes admitted to prove the genuineness of a signature (Robertson v. Millar, 1 McMull. (S. C.) 120), a verified written statement, introduced in evidence, of plaintiff's claim in an action against a railroad company for killing stock (Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Wilson, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 405, 84 S. W. 274), copies of accounts (Mooney v. Hough, 84 Ala. 80, 4 So. 19), or any sealed or unsealed instrument except depositions (Standard Starch Co. v. McMullen, 100 Ill. App. 82; Alexander v. Jameson, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 238).

After retirement of jury.— The court may recall the jury for the purpose of handing ties.[41] Whether or not permission shall be given to the jury to take out books, papers, or documents,[42] and the determination as to what papers shall be taken out by the jury,[43] is very generally held to be a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court, which is not reviewable except where there has been an abuse of such discretion,[44] and some decisions even hold that such discretion is absolute and not reviewable in any case,[45] although this doctrine is contrary to the weight of authority.[46] Where a portion of a book, paper, or document is excluded from evidence, the jury should not be permitted to take the paper on retirement unless something is pasted over the excluded portion,[47] or it is separated from the admissible portion,[48] or unless the jury are cautioned to confine themselves strictly to an examination of those parts only which are competent evidence.[49] It is prejudicial error to allow papers to be taken to the jury room which were not admitted them a paper, which was read in evidence, but accidentally omitted to be given to them (Flanders v. Colby, 28 N. H. 34), or may send the paper to them after they have retired (Hudspeth v. Mears, 92 Ga. 525, 17 S. E. 837; Kline v. Huntingdon First Nat. Bank, (Pa. 1888) 15 Atl. 433).

Evidence not within rule.— It is improper to permit the jury to take into retirement an affidavit admitted for the purpose of impeaching a witness. Fein v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Assoc., 60 Ill. App. 274. Papers exhibited on the trial as a means of comparison of handwritings are not evidence in the cause within a statute authorizing the jury to take out papers read in evidence. Cox v. Straisser, 62 Ill. 383. After the jury have retired to their room for consultation, they are not entitled to have sent out to them a plot, exhibiting several marked lines, some of which are legal, and were admitted in evidence, and others illegal, and therefore rejected. The Iowa statute, providing that the jury may take with them all books of account and all papers which have been received in evidence, has been held to be permissive, and the court in the first instance need not send them with the jury, but on request of the parties it is error to refuse to permit the jury to take them. in evidence and which contain a statement of material and damaging admissions;[50] but a judgment will not be reversed for permitting papers not in the case to be taken by the jury in their retirement where it could not have prejudiced the party,[51] nor unless objection be made at the time.[52] To constitute error for the court not to send papers in evidence out with the jury, the record must show a request that this be done.[53]

(II) DEPOSITIONS.[54] It has been said that by the English practice depositions are never sent to the jury room,[55] and in a number of American states, sometimes because of and sometimes in the absence of statute, it is held erroneous for the court to permit the jury to take to their room depositions read on the trial,[56] the reason assigned being that the party whose case is sustained by depositions would have an improper advantage over the party whose proofs were oral only.[57] On the other hand, in other states, the practice of permitting the jury to take out depositions is permissible,[58] the reason assigned therefor being that it enables the jury to refresh their memory as to the testimony that has been given.[59] Whether or not this permission shall be given is discretionary with the court.[60]

Refusal to permit the depositions to be taken at the request of one juror, the others

Although a deposition be erroneously permitted to go to the jury, the judgment will not be reversed on that account, where it appears that no prejudice could have resulted,[61] or where seasonable objections were not made.[62]

(III) Papers Attached to Deposition. Where papers attached to a deposition were admitted in evidence independently of their connection with the deposition, the jury may be permitted to take them to the jury room,[63] but in such case the papers should be detached from the deposition.[64] Papers attached to the deposition which are not introduced independently but as part of the deposition should not be sent to the jury unless by the consent of all the parties.[65] And it is error to permit the jury to take papers detached from the deposition where the effect of such taking is to give them a wrong impression of the facts in controversy.[66] Where certain exhibits, part of the deposition of a witness, had been shown to the jury without objection, it was not error for the court to permit their separation from the deposition and to send them out to the jury.[67]

e. Law Books. It is error for the court to deliver to the jury law books for the purpose of permitting the jury to determine what is law.[68]

f. Calculations, Memoranda, and Documents Not in Evidence.[69] The general rule is that it is prejudicial error and a ground for reversal to permit the jury to take with them to the jury room papers, not in evidence, which would tend to influence the verdict; [70] and it makes no difference that the papers were given to dissenting, is not error. Lafoon v. Shearin, 95 N. C. 391.

Illustration of rule.—Where an abstract of title is introduced in evidence independently of an attached deposition of the county clerk, which is also introduced to show that the abstract was made from the records, the abstract becomes an independent piece of written evidence, and may be taken by the jury in their retirement. Frugia v. Trueheart, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 513, 106 S. W. 736. So it has been held that the jury should be allowed to take out an itemized list, in evidence, as an exhibit to a deposition of the reasonable values before and after their injury of forty-two items of goods. Harmless error.—The fact that copies of "account sales" which had been attached as exhibits to a deposition were taken by the jury to their room is not ground for reversal of a judgment, where no objection was made at the time, and the facts shown by the exhibits were conclusively established by other evidence. the jury by mistake.[71] But the mere fact that such papers were taken to the jury room with the concurrence of the judge is not prejudicial error if it appears that the papers were not read or considered by the jury.[72] Nor will the cause be reversed where the papers taken out by the jury were immaterial in character and could not have any bearing upon the result;[73] where it is clear that they could not have influenced the verdict;[74] or where, although not introduced in evidence, they formed a part of the pleadings and as such were taken out by the jury.[75] Exceptions to the general rule have been recognized in some decisions. Thus it has been held, although not uniformly, that where the jury are informed that such memoranda are not evidence, it is not error to permit them to take into retirement a paper containing a calculation or estimate as to what was due plaintiff,[76] a memorandum referring to the various items of debit and credit in an account,[77] a bill testified to as being correct,[78] or memoranda used by witnesses in giving their testimony.[79] So it has been held that the court may send to the jury after retirement a diagram used in the examination of witnesses,[80] or a book concerning which a witness has testified and which contains only entries concerning which he has testified.[81] The court is vested with a sound discretion in allowing papers of the character under consideration to go to the jury and may properly refuse to permit this to be done.[82]

g. Typewritten Copy of Oral Testimony. Where by mistake and inadvertence a typewritten copy of oral testimony given on an examination in chief is improperly given to the jury when retiring to deliberate, and which is referred to freely, the fact that on the following day the testimony given on cross-examination is also furnished them will not cure the error, since the jury is authorized to consider the evidence in its oral form only.[83]

h. Models and Other Articles. The court may permit the jury to take with them, on retirement, models used on the trial to show the situation under which an injury occurred,[84] or models showing locations of mines, although admittedly not facsimiles, but admitted in evidence for the purpose of explaining the testimony.[85] So it has been held that the taking by the jury to their room of tools offered in evidence, even though contrary to the direction of the court, will not render the verdict nugatory where it does not appear in any way that such action was prejudicial to the party complaining,[86] and the taking out of a hat introduced in evidence through mistake is not prejudicial error, where little if any attention was paid to it by the jurors, and was not used for the purpose of influencing the minds of the jurors, and did not influence them.[87]

3. Use of Personal Knowledge by Jurors[88]— a. In General. It was undoubtedly the ancient doctrine that jurors were to render their verdict upon facts within their personal knowledge, as well as upon those derived from the testimony of the witnesses duly sworn and testifying in the case.[89] But at the present day it is thought a greater object, and more likely to secure the administration of justice, to submit cases to impartial and unbiased jurors; and that those are less likely to be so who have come from the immediate neighborhood of the parties, and have been either eye-witnesses to the facts, or have had their minds imbued with the popular feeling as to the merits of the controversy.[90] With this change as to the proper qualifications of a juror, it has come to be well settled that a juror cannot give a verdict founded on facts in his own private knowledge, but must disregard such knowledge and arrive at his verdict from evidence regularly produced in the course of the trial proceedings.[91] If a juror

Where a juror or jurors base the verdict on material matters within his or their personal knowledge, and not given in evidence, or where a juror communicates to the other jurors his personal knowledge of material facts bearing on the case and not given in evidence, the verdict is generally held to be fatally defective.[98] However, it has been held that in order to warrant a reversal it must appear that the statements made by the juror were of positive facts within the knowledge, or asserted to be within the knowledge, of the juror making them, and such as the jury might receive as evidence of the fact asserted, and not as the mere expression of opinion of the juror;[99] and that misconduct of a juror in stating matters of his own personal knowledge not testified to will not operate to reverse if the verdict was correct.[1]

b. Application of General Knowledge to Matters Under Consideration. To the general rule that facts in issue must be found by the jury on the evidence adduced at the trial and on the evidence alone, there is a distinct and well-defined exception, namely, that the jury have the right in making up their verdict to use their general knowledge and experience such as any man may bring to the subject,[2] and may and should take into account all the presumptions which, according

Applications of rule.—Where it appears by an undisputed showing in an action for damages for the change of a street grade that one of the jurors had prior knowledge of the premises involved in the controversy, that he based his own conclusion partly thereon, and used it to influence his fellow jurors in arriving at their verdict, the latter must be set aside. Falls City v. Sperry, 68 Nebr. 420, 94 N. W. 529. Where one of the principal questions involved in a case is as to the amount of damage done to a hedge by fire caused by defendant, and the evidence upon the subject is conflicting, and one of the jurors during the deliberations of the jury, and before they have fully agreed upon their verdict, states to the other members of the jury in substance that he had had about the same amount and kind of hedge burned by defendant that plaintiff had, and that defendant had paid him one dollar and fifty cents a rod as damages therefor, and this amount is greater than the amount of plaintiff's damages as shown by the evidence of the witnesses, and the verdict of the jury is in favor of plaintiff, and assesses his damages at two hundred and thirty dollars, it is held that the statement of the juror may have influenced the verdict of the jury, and is sufficient under the circumstances to require the granting of a new trial in favor of defendant. Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Bayes, 42 Kan. 609, 22 Pac. 741. Courts and juries acting within their special provinces must take notice of matters of general knowledge and use their common sense, when the evidence makes the issue of law or fact depend upon their exercise. Deans v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 107 N. C. 686, 12 S. E. 77, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902. Juries would be very little fit for the high and responsible office to which they are called if they migbt not avail themselves of these powers of their minds when they are most nscessary to the performance of their duties. Patterson v. Boston, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 159.

Analogy to judicial notice.—As the jury is bound to keep within the restrictions imposed upon courts by the principles of judicial notice, so also it has the liberty which that principle allows to the courts. Thayer Ev. 296. So far as the matter in question is one upon which men in general have a common fund of knowledge and experience the analogy of judicial notice obtains to some extent and the jury are allowed to resort to this possession in making up their minds. 1 Greenleaf Ev. (16th ed.) 17; Murdock v. Sumner, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 156; Johnson v. Hillstrom, 37 Minn. 122, 33 N. W. 547.

What are matters of common knowledge. —The following are matters of common knowledge within the rule stated in the text: The fact that horses are liable to be frightened by locomotive engines and moving trains of cars, and that collisions at highway crossings are often caused thereby (State v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 86 Me. 309, 29 Atl. 1086), or that a person habitually intemperate is incompetent and unfit to have charge of a railroad train (Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Davis, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 45 S. W. 956 [reversed on other grounds in 92 Tex. 372, 48 S. W. 570]. So in an action for death by wrongful act, the jurors' common knowledge as to life expectancy is sufficient for the admeasurement of damage on proof of deceased's age, habits, and earning capacity, and the disposition of his earnings. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Morgan, 114 Ala. 449, 22 So. 20. And it has been held, in an action for injuries by collision with a street car, that the jury may, without evidence, take notice in a general way of the character of traffic on the street on which the collision occurred. Metropolitan St. R. Co. v. Summers, 75 Kan. 342, 89 Pac. 652.

What are not matters of common knowledge.— On the other hand, it is not within the general knowledge of persons in what space an engine or train can be stopped going at the speed of forty-five miles an hour and equipped with the appliances as the one operated by the company at the time of the accident. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Shannon, 33 Kan. 446, 6 Pac. 564. The jury in an action for the value of surgical services has no right to find malpractice without testimony from persons who are qualified to give opinions on the methods of treatment. Wood v. Barker, 49 Mich. 295, 13 N. W. 597.

Testing credibility of witnesses.—A juror is entitled of course to use his general knowledge and experience on a subject for the purpose of testing the credibility of the witnesses, as on a question of value. Patterson v. Boston, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 159; Falls City v. Sperry, 68 Nebr. 420, 94 N. W. 529. But see McKain v. Love, 2 Hill (S. C.) 506, 27 Am. Dec. 401.

judge of the weight and force of that evidence by their own general knowledge of the subject of inquiry.[6]

e. Knowledge Derived From View or Inspection.[7] The power of the courts in respect of granting a view or an inspection, and the mode of conducting it has been elsewhere considered.[8] The purpose of this section is a consideration of the operation and effect of a view, and on this branch of the subject decisions relating to view in criminal prosecutions,[9] and in condemnation proceedings[10] are excluded because elsewhere considered in this work. There is considerable lack of harmony in the decisions. The rule which prevails in many jurisdictions is that when a view or inspection is permitted to the jury, what they may observe cannot under any circumstances become evidence; and that while they are entitled to use the results of their observation for the purpose of enabling them to better understand the matter in controversy between the parties, and to better understand and apply the evidence given in the case, this is the sole use to which the results of such observation can be put.[11] They are not authorized to consider any fact bearing upon the merits of the controversy derived from such view,[12] nor does it authorize them to ignore physical facts or disregard settled rules of law.[13] The reasons assigned are usually those given for the general rule that jurors must disregard all personal knowledge of the case and give a verdict based on evidence regularly produced in the course of the proceedings.[14] Where this doctrine prevails instructions which authorize or direct the jury to consider as evidence their own observations derived from the view are of course erroneous.[15]

It would be impossible to determine how much weight was due to the inspection by the jury as contrasted with the opposing evidence, or (treating the inspection as in the nature of evidence) whether it was sufficient to raise a substantial conflict in the evidence. The cause would be determined not upon evidence given in Court, to be discussed by counsel and considered by the Court in deciding a motion for a new trial, but upon the opinions of the jurors founded on a personal inspection, the value or the accuracy of which there would be no method of ascertaining."

But it is proper to instruct the jury to consider the evidence in the light of the knowledge obtained by their inspection.[16] And a request for an instruction directing the jury to disregard everything they saw and every impression they received from the view is properly refused.[17] In a number of states the view prevails, and it is perhaps the one more consonant with reason, that the result of the juror's observation on a view is evidence which in making up their verdict they may consider in connection with evidence regularly produced before them in court.[18] Where this view prevails, it is proper to give the jury instructions

Reason for rule.— Perhaps the strongest reason in support of this view is the difficulty, if not impossibility, of eradicating from the mind the impression made by the view so as to render a verdict without reference thereto. See Fitzgerald v. La Porte, 67 Ark. 263, 54 S. W. 342. The folly of the rule that impressions derived from a view are not evidence, it is said, is apparent from the constitution of the human mind, and the well understood processes by which juries arrive at conclusions, and the following state of facts is given by way of illustration. If a dozen witnesses should testify that there was no window on the north side of the house from which one man had sworn that he viewed the affray, and the jurors on view should see the window, all lawyers would know that it would be futile, on the argument, to insist to the jury that their verdict must be based on the non-existence of the window, since the point had been sustained by a vast preponderance in the number of witnesses. Denver, etc., R. Co. v. Pulaski Irr. Ditch Co., 11 Colo. App. 41, 52 Pac. 224. On this subject an eminent commentator on Trial has expressed his views as follows: "There is no sense in the conclusion that the knowledge which the jurors acquire by the view is not evidence in the case. The conception that what a body of jurors see themselves, relevant to the issue to be decided by them, is not evidence, but something to be considered by them in weighing oral evidence, is nonsense. What they see is evidence in a primary sense, and what is detailed to them concerning the same subject-matter by witnesses, is evidence in merely a secondary sense. An objective lesson always impresses itself more vividly upon the mind than an oral lesson. Such a conclusion is tantamount to saying that they are to take the trouble of going in a body to inspect land, or other material object, out of court, and that when they come to make up their verdict they must resolutely forget the impressions acquired from such inspection." 1 Thompson Trials, § 893.

Applications of rule.—Where, in an action to this effect,[19] and erroneous to instruct the jury to disregard evidence obtained by the view.[20] Nevertheless the jury cannot arbitrarily disregard evidence regularly admitted in the trial of the cause and base their verdict solely on the result of their observations. The verdict must be supported by other evidence than that derived by the jurors from the view;[21] and instructions which inform the jury that they may reach a verdict on the result of their observations, without regard to the testimony or in opposition thereto, are fatally erroneous.[22]

4. Experiments by Jury.[23] Jurors are not allowed to make private experiments or investigations for the purpose of determining essential controverted points,[24] and for them to do so constitutes such misconduct as will ordinarily vitiate the verdict.[25]

5. Manner of Arriving at Verdict[26]— a. Chance Verdicts[27]— (i) In General. Every verdict should be the result of the exercise of judgment and reflection and conscientious conviction on the part of the jury, and whenever it is made to appear to the court, by satisfactory proof, to have been the effect of chance or lot, it should be set aside.[28] to recover a balance due on a building contract, the jury viewed the premises, what they saw as to the condition of the surface of the concrete floors and general character of the work was evidence of its value to be considered with other testimony. The opinion in this case contains an argument strongly in favor of the rule stated in the preceding paragraph of text, but it was held unnecessary to hold in accordance therewith, as the verdict could be upheld on other grounds.

trine it is almost universally held that if the jury, for the purpose of arriving at a verdict, agree that each member should set down a sum according to his own judgment, that the aggregate should be divided by twelve, that they will be bound by the result whatever it may be, and that the quotient should be returned as the verdict, such agreement will vitiate the verdict and it should be set aside whenever the fact is made to appear by proper evidence.[30] Such verdicts are regarded in the same light by the courts as gambling verdicts, as much so as if the jury had thrown dice, or resorted to any other species of gaming, to determine the amount.[31] The reason for this rule is obvious. Such a method of procedure substitutes the fluctuating and uncertain hazards of a lottery for the deliberate

In some of the books it is said, that if the jurors previously agree to abide by the sum so produced, the verdict is bad, but if after the result is known they do agree to it, the verdict is good. This seems very much like a distinction where no difference in practice can exist: for after the result is known, and the jurors are called upon in the words of the ancient and yet prevailing form to answer to the verdict pronounced by their foreman, 'so say you all;' and when the verdict so delivered and thus interrogated, passes without dissent, it seems strange that the court should set it aside because the jurors had not agreed to it"); Cowperthwaite v. Jones, 2 Dall. (Pa.) 55, 1 L. ed. 287. And compare Cleland v. Carlisle Borough, 186 Pa. St. 110, 40 Atl. 288, holding that, although a verdict is reached by adopting in accordance with a previous agreement the amount arising by dividing by twelve the amounts fixed by each juror, still, none of the jurors having expressed dissatisfaction with it, although they were together twenty minutes after agreeing on it, and it not being manifestly wrong or unjust, it will not be disturbed.

Curing error by remittitur.— Where all the jury agreed that plaintiff was entitled to recover nine hundred dollars but disagreed as to the exact amount between that sum and one thousand dollars, any irregularity in arriving by lot at a verdict for nine hundred and fifty dollars was cured by a remittitur of anything in excess of nine hundred dollars. conclusions of their reflections and interchange of views.[32] It would also enable one juror, by marking down a very large or small sum, to produce an average and procure a verdict for an amount which would be unreasonable and at utter variance with the judgment of the other jurors.[33] Nor is it necessary that every member of the jury was a party to the agreement to be bound. It is enough to vitiate the verdict if the greater number so agreed;[34] and even though there was in fact no agreement to abide the result, if some of the jurors considered themselves so bound and acted accordingly, the verdict is vitiated.[35] Nevertheless, in order to render a verdict objectionable on the ground that it was a quotient verdict, it must affirmatively appear that the jurors bound themselves in advance to arrive at a verdict in that manner,[36] and that they in fact did so,[37] and the burden of proving such agreement is on the party assailing the verdict.[38] If a prearrangement of the character under consideration does not affirmatively appear, the presumption of law is that it has not been made; such a presumption, as a general rule, exists in all instances in favor of right acting.[39] So it has been held that a verdict illegal because of a previous agreement to be bound by the result of averaging the amounts which each juror thinks should be awarded may be repudiated and a valid verdict found as a result of proper deliberation;[40] and where they in fact repudiate the agreement and agree on an amount different from that found under the illegal agreement the verdict is good.[41] But it has been held that a mere subsequent assent to the verdict illegally found is not alone sufficient to purge it of illegality.[42]

Evidence insufficient to show quotient verdict.— It has been held that there is no presumption that individual jurors have compromised their opinions in arriving at the amount of a verdict in an action for libel where there is no evidence as to damages, from the mere fact that the verdict is for a certain number of dollars and cents. Eufala v. Speight, 120 Ala. 613, 25 So. 1009; Meyer v. Press Pub. Co., 46 N. Y. Super. Ct. 127. So it has been held that a verdict for two thousand one hundred and forty-four dollars will not be set aside as being a gambling verdict, upon consideration of its amount alone, without other evidence appearing on the record. Giese v. Schultz, 69 Wis. 521, 34 N. W. 913. And where a party averred in his affidavit that the adverse verdict was a quotient verdict, four jurors denied it, and stated the manner of reaching the amount awarded, and the bailiff averred that the party was not in a position to hear what was said in the jury room, it was held that it was not error to refuse a new trial. Model Clothing House v. Hirsch, 42 Ind. App. 270, 85 N. E. 719.

Evidence held sufficient to show quotient verdict.— Where, on the back of a paper containing instructions taken into the jury room and returned with the verdict, there appears a memorandum showing twelve different amounts in a column, the total thereof, and its division by twelve, the verdict, which corresponds with the quotient so obtained, will be set aside, on the presumption that it is the result of an agreement by the jurors, in advance, to average their separate assessments. In this case the jury agreed to divide the sum total of what each thought plaintiff should recover by twelve, and render a verdict for the result, which gave nine thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars, when one juror refused to render so large a

(B) Absence of Agreement That Average Estimate Shall Be Binding.[43] While as shown in the preceding section a verdict obtained by averaging the estimates of the individual jurors, in pursuance of an agreement to be bound by the result, is fatally defective,[44] yet if the averaging of the estimates is adopted merely for the sake of arriving at a reasonable measure of damages, and the jurors are left free to accept or reject the result, as they see fit, a verdict for a sum which is the average of the amounts fixed by the individual jurors, and to which they agree,[45] or for a different amount,[46] is not objectionable. The vitiating fact is in the agreement in advance to abide by the result.[47] Verdicts, it has been said, are often and properly the result of mutual concessions. Without something of this kind twelve men can hardly be expected to come to a unanimous conclusion upon any computation of unliquidated damages.[48] Where, as is usually the case, there is a diversity of opinion as to the amount which ought to be given, the verdict must necessarily be the result of mutual concession, and the jury are verdict, and insisted that five thousand dollars was sufficient, but after argument consented to a verdict of nine thousand five hundred dollars. It was held that such verdict was not invalid as obtained by lot.

(III) AVERAGING ESTIMATES OF WITNESSES. A jury need not fix the amount of damages at the exact sum testified to by any one witness or by any two, but may find an intermediate sum.[50] While there is authority to the contrary,[51] it has been held not improper for the jury in estimating the damages to which plaintiff is entitled to average the amounts testified to by the witnesses.[52] Nevertheless, the ordinary rules of weighing testimony, such as honesty, disinterestedness, opportunity for knowledge, and intelligence, should be resorted to, before attempting to reach a satisfactory result by averaging the values sworn to.[53]

(IV) OTHER VERDICTS DEPENDENT ON ELEMENT OF CHANCE. The drawing of lots to determine whether the verdict shall be for plaintiff or defendant;[54] or to induce a part of the jurors to assent to a larger verdict than in their judgment should be given;[55] or an agreement by the jury to render a verdict for an amount fixed by three of the jurors;[56] or an agreement by the jurors that a certain number of ballots should be taken and the verdict should be rendered for the party receiving the majority of ballots;[57] or an agreement by three of the jurors who are for defendant to join the other jurors in rendering a verdict for plaintiff if the other jurors sign a statement to the effect that they believe defendant had wilfully testified falsely;[58] or an agreement by some of the jurors who are for defendant to join the other jurors in a verdict for plaintiff, provided the damages awarded do not exceed a certain amount;[59] such agreements, being executed, vitiate the verdict.

b. Compromise Verdicts.[60] Where the liability of defendant is established, and the compensation to which plaintiff is entitled is measured by a fixed and uncontroverted sum,[61] or where the damages are fixed or liquidated,[62] the verdict should either be for the amount sued for, or in favor of defendant. The jury have no right to give a compromise verdict for less than the amount in suit, and if they do so, the verdict should be set aside as being without evidence to support it, or the jury sent back with directions to find for the full amount in case they found for plaintiff.[63] A jury should not be permitted under the forms of law to do what is palpably unjust.[64] However, the prohibition against compromise verdicts has no application where the damages sought to be recovered are unliquidated,[65] for it is obvious that where this is the case a unanimous conclusion would be almost impossible except as the result of mutual concessions.[66] Where a verdict was warranted by the testimony of one witness in the case, it is not necessarily a compromise verdict.[67] So a verdict is not necessarily objectionable as being a compromise verdict because it does not include interest on the notes in suit.[68] And where the court instructed the jury that they could fix under the evidence what they thought was fair and right, the fact that plaintiff was allowed less than he sought, and more than defendant claimed he should have received, was insufficient to show that the verdict was by way of compromise.[69] Where, in an action on an order drawn on funds due a contractor, a verdict is rendered for the only amount for which it could be rightfully rendered, a contention that it is a compromise verdict, which is based merely on the coincidence of the amount with the remainder after certain credits are deducted from the contract price, is unavailing.[70]

E. Assisting, Urging, or Coercing Agreement[71] — 1. Re-Reading or Recapitulating Evidence.[72] It has been stated in an early English abridgment that "when the jury are retired, under the charge of the officer, they may come back into court to hear the evidence of a thing of which they are in doubt," [73] and this practice was approved in an early New York case in which it was assigned as a reason that "the law allows the jury all reasonable opportunity, before their verdict is put upon record and they are discharged, to discover and to declare the truth according to their judgment." [74] It is of course obvious that, if at the request of the jury and of both parties the stenographer reads such portions of the testimony as the jury desired to hear, neither party can afterward be heard to complain.[75] And, on the other hand, it has been held that where the foreman, after the retirement of the jury, informed the judge that they could not agree as to what the testimony of certain witnesses was, it was error for the court, over the objection of counsel for both parties, to recall the jury and allow the stenographer to read to them his notes of the evidence of such witnesses.[76] While there is authority to the contrary,[77] it is held proper, in the absence of any statutory provisions on the subject, for the jury, after retirement, to return into court and Reading part of evidence under agreement that all be read.— Where counsel agreed to permit a witness's testimony to be read in the jury room if all of it was read, and the stenographer read part of it to the jury, when they told him that they had heard enough and excluded him from the jury room, his failure to read the rest of it was not prejudicial error; it not appearing that the jury knew of the agreement that all of the testimony should be read. App. 110, 44 Pac. 854, 855, in which it was said: "Without regard to any question of the legal effect of this testimony, it was serious error to permit it to be read to the jury after the case had been submitted to them. They thus heard a portion of the plaintiff's testimony with the permission of the court to question a witness as to certain facts of the evidence given by him on the stand,[78] or to have the evidence of a witness or witnesses read to them by the stenographer,[79] or for the court at the request of the jury to recapitulate parts of the testimony;[80] and it has been held error for the court to refuse the request of counsel for defendant, made in the presence of plaintiff's counsel, to bring in the jury and state the evidence to them as requested by them.[81] In some states the matter of reading or recapitulating evidence to the jury on their return into court after retirement is a subject of statutory regulation. Thus in construing the various statutes it has been held proper or at least not available error for the court on request of the jury to have the stengrapher read the testimony of certain witnesses,[82] or for the court to read the testimony from the stenographer's notes,[83] or to give his recollection as to the testimony on a point in dispute.[84] So it has been held that where the jury at their request and that of counsel are brought into court to hear the evidence of certain witnesses read, and after the evidence of one of the witnesses had been read the court stated the substance of the evidence given by the others, there was not such an abuse of discretion as warranted a reversal.[85] Where the trial court, in response to a request by the jury that certain portions of the evidence be read to them, read more evidence than was requested, but such additional evidence, so read, was in favor of the losing party, he cannot be said to have been prejudiced.[86] twice, and the last time disconnected from all the other evidence, so that they went back to their room with their memories refreshed as to this; and having listened to it out of its connection, they would be liable to give it an importance to which it was not entitled, and which they would not have given it otherwise." And see Westgate v. Aschenbrenner, 39 Ill. App. 263, 264, holding that "it was correct for the court to refuse to allow the stenographer's notes to be read to the jury as a part of the evidence to refresh the jury's mind as to what the evidence was."

2. Giving Further Instructions[87] — a. On Court's Own Motion.[88] The court may exercise a wide discretion in the matter of charging the jury, and may of its own motion recall the jury and give them additional instructions, or give such instructions when they return to court and report that they are unable to reach an agreement.[89] It has been held that the court may exercise this power, even though the jury say that they do not want any further instructions;[90] and after the jury has announced that they have agreed upon a verdict, the judge may send them out again with further instructions before receiving the verdict.[91] So, where no instructions are offered by either party and the jury returns a verdict without fixing the amount of damages, the court may instruct the jury orally that they must find the amount of damages, and send them back to the jury room for that purpose.[92] It is only in cases of abuse of the discretion of the court resulting in injury that the exercise of this discretion will be reviewed,[93] and where the court might have directed a verdict in favor of the party who prevailed at the trial, any error committed in exercising its power to recall the jury and give further instructions is harmless.[94]

96. In Arizona the statute provides that court may, at the request of the jury, give them further instructions after they have retired.[97] This practice, it is said, is commendable as tending to a correct and despatchful administration of justice.[98] And when the jury ask for further instructions, the power of the court is not limited to the explanation of such questions of law only as should be voluntarily proposed by the jury.[99] Whether or not the court is bound to give the jury further instructions when they request them does not seem to be well settled. There are rulings both ways on the question.[1] But the correct doctrine, it is apprehended, is that the court is vested with a wide discretion in the matter, which discretion will not be reviewed except in cases of palpable abuse thereof resulting in injury.

c. On Request of Counsel — (1) In General. As was shown in a preceding chapter, unless timely requests are made for instructions, error cannot ordinarily be assigned to their refusal, and requests are not in time when made after the jury have retired.[2] And while the court may recall the jury and give them further instructions at the request of counsel,[3] the decided weight of authority is to the effect that it may in its discretion refuse to do so,[4] especially where the jury has no further instructions shall be given to the jury after the argument begins. Under this statute it has been held that error cannot be assigned to a refusal to give additional instructions at the request of a juror. Southern Pac. Co. v. Wilson, 10 Ariz. 162, 85 Pac. 401.

In Mississippi the provisions of the statute are restrictive of the common-law powers of judges in the matter of charging juries. Where a case has been submitted to a jury and they have retired to consider of their verdict, it will be error for the court, without the consent of the parties, to explain at the request of the jury a matter of law to them bearing upon the case upon which they notified him that they had doubts. This has been held ground for reversal. Taylor v. Manley, 6 Sm. & M. 305. However, in a later case it was held that while it is irregular for the judge in the court below, after the jury have retired, to instruct them upon any point involved in the case, yet if the instruction be in conformity with the law and pertinent to the facts, the irregularity will not be sufficient to reverse the judgment below, although excepted to, at the time, by the party objecting to it. But see Clarke v. Pierce, 82 Miss. 462, 465, 34 So. 4, holding that under Rev. Code (1892), § 732, requiring the judge, on request of either party in writing, to instruct the jury already received all instructions necessary to aid it in reaching a verdict.[5] It is said that after the case had been submitted to the jury the question of reopening the case for further and new instructions to the jury as to matters of law is as much addressed to the discretion of the court as the question of reopening it for further and new evidence as to matters of fact.[6] The discretion possessed by the court is a broad one, and unless it clearly appears that there has been an abuse thereof, the judgment will not be reversed.[7]

(II) After Additional Instructions Given on Request of Jury. A different question is presented when the court has given additional instructions at the request of the jury. Under these circumstances it is very generally declared, either directly or inferentially, that after the jury has been given additional instructions at the request of the jury, additional, explanatory, or qualifying instructions should be given at the request of counsel if the ends of justice so require.[8] Yet if it can be clearly seen that no injury has been done to the party complaining by the further instructions given, the judgment will not be reversed.[9] And if the court merely repeats the instructions already given, the rule has no application and counsel are not entitled to additional instructions.[10]

d. Nature, Requisites, and Sufficiency of Instructions.[11] The court may re-read the charge to the jury on learning that it is not understood by them,[12] or on the principles of law applicable to the case, where a proper additional charge in writing was requested by plaintiff on the jury's requesting additional instructions after submission of the cause, it was error to refuse such instruction on the ground that it was not asked until after the jury had retired. In this case it was said: "It is not only the right, but the duty, of the court, where the ends of justice so require, to give the jury, at any time before the verdict is received, any further instructions, which correctly state the law, that may be requested by either party in writing."

Reasons assigned for rule.—In the nature of things, the line should be drawn somewhere, else either party might continue to request additional instruction, thus interrupting the labors of the jury from time to time until their verdict was made. Such a practice would also interfere with the trial judge in the disposition of other business taken up after the disposition of the case. Young v. Hahn, (Tex. Civ. App. 1902) 69 S. W. 203 [reversed on other grounds in 96 Tex. 99, 70 S. W. 950]. It would be dangerous to allow the recall of a jury for a further or additional charge upon the bare request of counsel without grounds. Under such a rule the ingenious lawyer would always have it in his power to have emphasized to the jury by the court any proposition he might choose to submit, and have the jury believe the court attached great weight to the matter about which it had been recalled for instructions. Bowling v. Memphis, etc., R. Co., 15 Lea (Tenn.) 122.

A requested instruction not supported by the evidence is of course properly refused. Ivey v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 63 N. Y. App. Div. 311, 71 N. Y. Suppl. 633.

Where the court improperly refuses requested instructions, and after the retirement of the jury they come into court for further instructions, and counsel renews his request for the instructions previously refused, error may be assigned to their refusal. Yeldell v. Shinholster, 15 Ga. 189.

W. 203, 206 [reversed on other grounds in 96 Tex. 99, 70 S. in order to satisfy one or all of them as to the true state of the law upon the issues before them.[13] A more difficult question is presented when a request is made for the re-reading of one or more instructions of the entire charge. Instructions must be taken as an entirety;[14] and while it is no doubt proper to re-read or state orally the substance of an individual instruction the meaning of which the jury fail to understand, without repeating the whole charge,[15] under any other circumstances, it is apprehended it will be error to re-read an isolated instruction because it unduly emphasizes the matters therein covered[16] and tends to give the jury to understand that the matter thus disjointedly charged upon is controlling in the case;[17] and in any event the judge should caution them that all the law of the case is not given in that one, but that it only covers that particular phase of the case.[18] The court may of its own motion or at request of counsel recall the jury after they have retired to give instructions improperly refused,[19] to correct or modify instructions given,[20] or to amplify its charge[21] and give additional instructions on material issues not covered by the original charge.[22] It may instruct the jury as to the number of jurors required to render a verdict,[23] and may, in answer to a question if the court had given the jury an instruction of a certain tenor, state that it had.[24] The court also has power to instruct the jury to reconsider their determination as to the amount of a verdict whether the action be for liquidated or unliquidated damage.[25] Any additional instructions or explanations of instructions given should come from the court and no one else.[26] And care should be taken to clearly define the scope and object of such additional instructions.[27] And as is the case with instructions originally given,[28] further instructions should not ignore or exclude from the consideration of the jury material issues covered by the instructions originally given;[29] nor should a full, complete, and different charge upon any of the material facts involved in the issues of the case be given.[30] So where instructions are given in answer to questions asked by the jury they should of course be responsive to the questions,[31] but this does not mean that the court is limited to giving categorical answers to the questions asked.[32] On the contrary, if it appears that more than a categorical answer is necessary to keep the issues to be decided correctly before the minds of the jury, it is the duty of the court to give such further instructions as would be necessary to that end.[33] Where instructions are required to be given in writing, and further instructions are given, these instructions must also be in writing,[34] unless, as may be done, this requirement is waived.[35] Where, in response to a request for further instructions, the court adequately instructs the jury on the only material point in the case, and the record does not show that the court failed to make clear any matter called to its attention, an objection that the request for further instructions was not fully answered cannot be sustained.[36]

the issue and the evidence, there can be little toleration of obvious, unreasonable obstruction to an agreement.[39] This is entirely fit and proper as tending to bring about unanimity of opinion after a full and free interchange of views among the jurors and to prevent unnecessary mistrials.[40] As reasons for agreeing, the court may properly remind the jury of the expense to the state or county,[41] or to the parties,[42] the number of times the case has been on trial,[43] the length of time consumed in the trial, or in previous trials of the same case,[44] the importance of the case,[45] the necessity for a decision of the case by some jury,[46] and the probability of their being able to decide the case as well as any other jury.[47] So it has been held not improper to refer to the records of the previous juries as to agreements,[48] or to state that there had been no mistrials since the beginning of the trial judge's administration.[49] So the court may properly advise the jury that while they should not surrender any conscientious opinion founded on the evidence,[50] they should lay aside all pride of judgment,[51] that each juror should reëxamine for himself the grounds of his opinion,[52] and that they should consider their differences in a spirit of fairness and candor,[53] with an honest desire to arrive at the truth and with the view of arriving at a verdict.[54]

modern jury trial the enforcement of the duty of jurors was sought through harsh coercive measures.[56] But whatever views on the subject may have formerly obtained, it is now universally held to be erroneous for the court by words or acts to threaten or attempt to coerce the jurors for the purpose of compelling them to render a verdict.[57] While as shown in another section all proper motives to induce them to agree upon a common result may be repeatedly and earnestly urged upon them,[58] they should be left free to act without any real or seeming coercion on the part of the court,[59] and should be left to feel that, should they continue to disagree, they are not to be exposed to unreasonable inconvenience, nor to receive the animadversion of the court.[60] However, where remarks which might be construed as of a coercive nature are explicitly withdrawn, there is no available error.[61]

b. Length of Time Jury May Be Kept Together to Reach Agreement. All who are familiar with jury trials know that juries are prone to report to the court their inability to agree, but, not being discharged, often render a verdict in a reasonable time thereafter.[62] Accordingly, it is the duty of the court to keep the jurors together until it is satisfied that they have made an honest effort to agree, and that their inability to do so is due to a conscientious difference of judgment.[63] How long the jury should be kept together, before discharging them for inability to agree on a verdict, is a matter depending upon the circumstances of each case,[64] and resting in the sound discretion of the court,[65] which

See 3 Blackstone Comm. 375, in which it was said that "the jury . . . in order to avoid intemperance and causeless delay, are to be kept without meat, drink, fire, or candle, unless by permission of the judge, till they are unanimously agreed. . . . If the jurors do not agree in their verdict before the judges are about to leave the town, though they are not to be threatened or imprisoned, the judges are not bound to wait for them, but may carry them round the circuit from town to town in a cart."

Statement by Court as to Length of Time Jury Will Be Kept Together — (I) Propriety of So Doing. While there are decisions to the contrary,[67] the rule supported by the weight of authority is that the court should not allude to its own purpose as to the length of time the jury are to be kept together for the purpose of reaching an agreement.[68] It is improper to tell the jury, in case of disagreement, that they will be confined for a specified length of time,[69] or until they reach an agreement.[70]

Sending jurors out several times.— It is not an abuse of discretion for the court to hold the jury together after they have declared a number of times that they cannot agree, in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Cowherd, 96 Ky. 113, 27 S. W. 990, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 373. The Maine statute (Rev. St. (1903) c. 84, § 100) provides that when a jury, not having agreed, return into court, stating the fact, the court may explain any questions of fact or restate any particular testimony and send them out for further consideration, but they shall not be sent out a third time in consequence of their disagreement, unless on account of disagreements not stated when they first came into court. Under this statute exceptions will not be sustained when it does not appear that they were sent out a third time in consequence of their disagreement, nor when it does not appear that they were sent out at all after the first time on account of difficulties not stated when they first came into court. (11) Whether Verdict Vitiated by Statement.[71] While as shown in the preceding section, it is very generally held to be improper for the court to state the length of time the jury will be kept together, there is a difference of opinion as to whether the verdict is thereby vitiated. Some decisions lay down the rule apparently without qualification that while improper it is not ground for reversal.[72] While others take the extreme view that the judgment will be reversed without inquiry as to whether the jury were in fact improperly influenced; that it is enough for the court to see that improper influence was brought to bear on the jury, which might have interfered with the free, unbiased, and deliberate exercise of their judgment.[73] Other decisions in which it was unnecessary to go so far hold that where it reasonably and satisfactorily appears that the jury were influenced by the improper statements of the court, as for instance where the jury almost immediately thereafter return a verdict,[74] or where there was any doubt as to whether the jury were improperly influenced,[75] the verdict is thereby vitiated; and on the other hand, it has been held that if it appears that the jury did not act hastily, but with due deliberation, the verdict must stand.[76] The verdict is of course vitiated if the court, in addition to stating that Telling the jury by implication that they will be kept together until agreement is erroneous. Green v. Telfair, 11 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 260. Accordingly, it has been held that a statement by the judge to the jury emphasizing the cost of the trial to the county for each day the court was in session, impressing on them their duty to settle the case, and asking them to struggle with the case until they came to an agreement, being calculated to leave the impression that the court was obliged to keep them until they reached a verdict is prejudicial. Hodges v. O'Brien, 113 Wis. 97, 88 N. W. 901. On the other hand, it has been held that where, at a late hour, the court instructed the jury that, if they agreed "before the incoming of the court in the morning," they would be discharged by the sheriff, and if they did not agree, they were to stay until they did agree, such instruction merely meant that they were to keep together until morning unless they agreed before, and not that they were to be kept indefinitely unless they agreed, and did not constitute ground for reversal. Knapp v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 114 Mich. 199, 72 N. W. 200. This latter case seems to contain a stronger implication than the former.

Failure to make provision for discharge on adjournment.— Where the judge on adjourning court for several days makes no provision for discharging the jury during his absence from the county, unless they agreed, the verdict should be set aside. Ingersoll v. Lansing, 51 Hun (N. Y.) 101, 5 N. Y. Suppl. 288. To the same effect is McCormick v. Cox, 8 Colo. App. 17, 44 Pac. 768, which holds that to adjourn court for two days, leaving the jury with instructions that, if they should reach a verdict before the court reconvened, they should seal it, and deliver it to the clerk invalidates the verdict so coerced. But see Stevenson v. Detroit, etc., R. Co., 118 Mich. 651, 77 N. W. 247, in which it was held on a very similar state of facts that the verdict would not be set aside as obtained by coercion and restraint.

E. 830. A later case in Texas (North Dallas Cir. R. Co. v. McCue, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 35 S. W. 1080) attempts to explain and distinguish Burgess v. Singer Mfg. Co., supra, as having been decided on the ground that no other verdict could have been legitimately returned, but there is nothing in the opinion of that case to warrant such construction by the later decision, in which the court appears to be receding from an untenable position as gracefully as possible.

the jury will be kept together for a specified time or until they agree, states that they will be kept without food or not furnished with sufficient food.[77]

d. Threatening to Keep Jury Without Food. While in the beginning of the modern jury trial, the court might keep the jury together without food or drink until they agreed,[78] this practice has long since been repudiated, and it is now improper for the court to do so, or to threaten that it will have the jury confined without food or on insufficient food,[79] or to state that they can have no food except at their own expense.[80]

e. Directing or Intimating That Minority Should Yield Their Opinion. 85. Particular instructions or remarks held erroneous.— The following instructions have been held erroneous: That sometimes the minority must yield their judgment in order to get a verdict (Miller v. Miller, 187 Pa. St. 572, 41 Atl. 277); that if there was a large majority of the jury on one side and a small minority on the other side, perhaps the minority would yield to the will of the majority and by further consideration reach a verdict (Sargent v. Lawrence, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 540, 40 S. W. 1075); that if ten men were one way and two another, there was something wrong in the intelligence or in the conscientious action of some jurymen (Hagen v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 79 N. Y. App. Div. 519, 80 N. Y. Suppl. 580); that "if I were a juror, and quite a large proportion of my fellows were against me, and I was standing out, and I thought that they were honest and fair, the first thing I would do would be to get before a large looking-glass and look at myself and see if I could find out what was the matter with me" (Twiss v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 61 N. Y. App. Div. 286, 70 N. Y. Suppl. 241); that "no juror ought to remain entirely firm in his own conviction one way or another, until he has made up his mind beyond all question, that he is necessarily right and the others are necessarily wrong" (Cranston v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 103 N. Y. 614, 617, 9 N. E. 500); that "if there is a mistrial in this case I shall inquire into it, and if I find that any juror has stubbornly refused to do his duty or wilfully tried to bring about a disagreement so as to interfere with the administration of justice, I will send him to jail for contempt of court" (Lively v. Sexton, 35 Ill. App. 417, 419); that "no juror should make up his mind that he will stand by his opinion forever, that he will listen to no suggestion of his fellows, but simply stand in his traces and remain there stalwart and stolid" (Dominick v. Hill, 6 N. Y. St. 329, 333); so in a case where one of the jurors told the court that "there's eleven of us that could get together in about a minute," it was held error for the court to say "I trust and presume that every juror is acting rationally in this matter and that nobody is acting from a dogmatic spirit merely for the purpose of asserting his opinion" (McPeak v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 128 Mo. 617, 627, 30 S. W. 170).

Particular instructions or remarks held not erroneous.— It has been held not improper to instruct the jury that if one or two of the jury differed in their views of the evidence from the others they should be thereby induced, although not required to surrender conscientious convictions, to doubt the correctness of their own judgments, and should be led to inquire whether they were not mistaken (Gibson v. Minneapolis, etc., R. Co., 55 Minn. 177, 56 N. W. 686, 43 Am. St. Rep. 482); or that "the fact that a juror finds his judgment opposed to the judgment of a majority of the panel ought to induce him, jury were influenced by the instructions, as for instance where they almost immediately afterward return a verdict, the verdict will not be permitted to stand.[88] But it is not reversible error for the court to direct a juror to agree with his fellows, when the evidence is of such a character that the court may take the case from the jury and direct a verdict.[87]

f. Miscellaneous Instances of Coercion. On disagreement of the jury, it is error for the court to state that he will take them to the next county;[88] that the court had no use for juries that could not agree and that at times men mistake stubbornness for firmness;[89] that if they did not agree, the public might suspect them of corruption, and if the disagreement was due to stubbornness a proper penalty would be the disgrace of exclusion from jury service;[90] that the case "has become an incubus upon the business of the court. . . . You must decide it. . . . It is no credit to a man merely because he has an opinion to stubbornly stick to it, but he should be open to argument and reason and conviction";[91] or that the amount was small, and that it cost the county more to try the case than was involved to either of the litigants.[92] On the other hand, it is not improper for the court to inquire of the jury the reasons for their failure to agree,[93] and if there is a probability of their agreeing,[94] to ask them in what proportion they are divided;[95] or to express regrets at their failure to agree and state that he will send them back to the jury room to see if they could reach a verdict,[96] as there is nothing in this that can be construed as coercion. So it has been held that a direction to the jury "to go back to their room and figure it out, and not allow the lawyers to tangle them,"[97] or to consider the case "in as mechanical a way as you can fairly and conscientiously, and we will hope to hear from you again more favorably,"[98] if error, does not vitiate the verdict.

5. Urging Jury to Hasten Verdict. The action of a court in directing a jury to hasten their verdict is within the court's discretion, and is not ground for reversal, unless it otherwise appears that probably such conduct was prejudicial to the complaining party.[99] held that no communication ought to take place between the judge and the jury after the cause has been committed to them by the charge of the judge, unless in open court.[2] One of the principal reasons assigned, and it is in itself amply sufficient, is that the proceedings should all be open, notorious, and in the presence of the parties, so that they may except to them in the manner provided by law, and that the toleration of a practice to the contrary would deprive the parties of a substantial right.[3] But aside from this, the rule is founded upon considerations of sound public policy,[4] which, among other things, requires that the jury, in deliberating upon their verdict, should be untrammeled by extraneous influences, and this can

The contrary doctrine.— The rule stated in the text does not obtain in South Carolina. The court may hold communications with the jury without disclosing their nature to counsel. It was said: "The intercourse between the jury and the bench is, in many respects, very confidential. Often the communications from the jury are of that kind which ought not to be communicated to the bar." Goldsmith v. Solomons, 2 Strobh. (S. C.) 296, 300 [disapproving Sargent v. Roberts, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 337, 11 Am. Dec. 185]. It was said, however, in a later decision by the same court that "there is no doubt that the safer and better practice is that all instructions should be given in open court to the full panel, and not to the foreman or any other member." Nevertheless as the remark to the foreman on his return to court did not amount to a new instruction and did not qualify or modify any previous instruction, it was held that there was no ground for a new trial. McCord v. Blackwell, 31 S. C. 125, 140, 9 S. E. 777. In New Hampshire, it is held that after adjournment of court, the judge may in the absence of and without giving counsel an opportunity to be present instruct the jury on questions of law. only be secured by a rigid adherence to the safeguards thrown around them.[5] Private communications between court and jury naturally tend to create suspicion and distrust,[6] and the public interest requires that litigating parties should have nothing to complain of or suspect in the administration of justice.[7] While it is conceded that a strict adherence to this rule may at times be attended with inconvenience, it is said that it is better so than to permit a practice so liable to abuse and so much in conflict with the rights of the parties.[8] While, as already stated, the courts are practically unanimous in holding private communications between court and jury improper, a more difficult question arises in this connection on which the courts are far from harmonious; and that is whether such communications as a matter of law nullify the verdict. Thus one line of decisions, and they probably constitute the weight of authority, holds that any private communication between the judge and jury is such misconduct as will work a reversal without reference to the question whether such misconduct affected the verdict,[9] or was committed without any purpose or intention of influencing the jury.[10] According to these decisions the defeated party should not be required to show that the action of the court was prejudicial.[11] It is said that "the principle upon which the rule rests is that such communications are so dangerous and impolitic that they will be conclusively presumed to have influenced the jury improperly," [12] and that the policy of the law forbids any inquiry into the fact whether or not harm resulted.[13] There are, however, decisions which, although they concede the impropriety of private communications between court and jury, have refused to reverse on the ground that the error could not have been prejudicial in that particular case.[14] in open court, it is held erroneous for the judge to go into the jury room and give further instructions,[16] or to send further instructions to the jury room,[17] unless, as may be done, counsel assent thereto.[18] In jurisdictions where any private communications between judge and jury nullify the verdict as matter of law, the giving of such instructions is of course reversible error, irrespective of prejudice.[19] But in jurisdictions where such communications must be prejudicial to warrant a reversal, if it is apparent that no harm could have resulted from the giving of such instructions, the judgment will not be reversed.[20] In any event, where instructions have been privately communicated to the jury, and it is impossible to ascertain with any certainty what they were, there is ground for reversal.[21]

(II) OTHER COMMUNICATIONS.[22] In respect of other communications, it has been held, where the view prevails that any private communications between court and jury constitute reversible error, that the judgment should be reversed where the court privately communicates to the jury the amount claimed by plaintiff,[23] or what the effect of the verdict will be;[24] reads the answer of defendant to them;[25] answers a question as to whether any evidence had been given on a certain point,[26] or an inquiry relating to the evidence of a designated witness;[27] or cautions the jury with reference to conduct while going to, remaining at, or returning from a meal,[28] or communicate with them in reference to ordering supper if they were not likely to agree before meal time.[29] There are, however, decisions which adopt a less stringent rule. Thus it has been held that where the communication is limited to a collateral direction as to the manner of using the papers supplied for the reception of the verdict, the verdict will not be set aside.[30] So it has been held not a ground for reversal that the court privately answered a question as to whether it was necessary for all the jurors to sign the verdict,[31] or told the jury, while standing at the door of the jury room, that he could answer no questions unless the parties were present and agreed,[32] or went to the jury room and told the jury, in response to a question asked by them, that they could not add anything to plaintiff's demand.[33]

c. Consent of Counsel to Infraction of Rule. Counsel may consent to communications between the court and jury not made in open court,[34] and of course if they do so they cannot afterward object.[35] According to some decisions, this consent must be express;[36] and it has been held that it cannot be inferred from their silence, but must be made to appear affirmatively, otherwise the judgment will not be reversed.[37] There are decisions, however, which hold that consent may be implied, and that if counsel are present and make no objection the error will be waived;[38] and that error is also waived where, after objection is made and overruled, counsel fail to except to the action of the court.[39]

7. Necessity For Presence of Counsel — a. Where Evidence Re-Read or Recapitulated. If the evidence is read or recapitulated to the jury, either by authority of or in the absence of statutory provisions, counsel for both parties should be present,[40] or notice and an opportunity to be present given them.[41] and a non-compliance with this requirement is reversible error,[42] unless it is clear that a correct verdict was rendered.[43] But in the absence of anything to the contrary in the record, it will be presumed that the trial judge followed the proper practice in this regard.[44] Where, at the jury's request, the court undertakes to state anew the evidence on a given point, the better practice is that all the evidence on that point should be given.[45] It has been held, however, that the court has some discretion as to how fully the evidence should be stated, and that a failure to state all of the evidence is not a ground for new trial,[46] especially if the omission to state subject, and Read v. Cambridge, 124 Mass. 567, 26 Am. Rep. 690, this would have been reversible error, irrespective of prejudice.

b. Where Additional Instructions Given.[48] There is a conflict of authority as to the propriety of giving the jury further instructions after they have retired to consider their verdict, in the absence of counsel. The rule enunciated by one line of decisions is that the court may give further instructions after the retirement of the jury either at the request of the jury or of its own motion, although counsel are not present, and although no attempt is made to secure their presence, provided the instructions are given in open court.[49] The theory on which these decisions proceed is, that it is the duty of counsel to be present while the court is open until the trial is concluded;[50] and that the absence of counsel while the

App. 528, holding that where, on the jury's request to have certain testimony read to them, the court reads only a portion thereof, the inference is that the court considered the portion not read of no importance, and when such is not the case it is ground for reversal.

Failure to notify court where counsel may be found.—Counsel who leave the place where the court is held without notifying the court where they may be conveniently found, and without making any arrangement for their being called when the jury shall return their verdict, or if they shall come before the court and request further instructions, are to be deemed to have waived their right to be present. court is in session, at any time between the impaneling of the jury and the return of the verdict, cannot limit the power and duty of the judge to instruct the jury in open court on the law of the case as occasion may require.[51] Many of the decisions under consideration concede that it is desirable and the better practice to attempt to procure the attendance of counsel when further instructions are given, but hold that the court is under no obligation to do so.[52] On the other hand, in a number of states the rule is well settled that the giving of further instructions to the jury in the absence of counsel and without a reasonable attempt being made to notify them is reversible error,[53] the reason usually assigned being, that the right to accept and the right to ask counter or explanatory instructions and to except to their refusal is taken away.[54] Presence of the unsuccessful party's agent, who was not his legal counsel, does not obviate the error;[55] nor is it cured by an offer of the court to give the unsuccessful party an exception after verdict rendered and a discharge of the jury.[56] Where, however, a reasonable Limitation of rule.—Where the instructions given are upon a matter which whether it existed as a fact in the case or not could have made no difference in the verdict, the fact that such instructions were given in the absence of counsel cannot be assigned as error. Hughes v. Wheeler, 76 Cal. 230, 18 Pac. 386. So it has been held that where the instruction is merely as to the form of the verdict, and does not involve the giving of information on any point of law arising in the case, it is not reversible error to give the instruction in the absence of counsel. Tilley v. Montelius Piano Co., 15 Colo. App. 204, 61 Pac. 483. And see Wade v. Ordway, 1 Baxt. (Tenn.) 229, holding that while it is erroneous to instruct the jury in the absence of a party's counsel, yet if it can clearly be seen that no injury has been done to the party by the instruction given no reversal can be had.

effort has been made to notify counsel and procure their attendance, the court may properly give further instructions to the jury in their absence.[57]

c. Where Papers Sent Out to Jury Room. Submitting to the jury the contract in suit after their retirement, in the absence of parties and counsel or notice to them, if erroneous, will not operate to reverse in the absence of any showing of prejudice.[58]

F. Discharge For Failure to Agree.[59] As was shown in a preceding section, it is the duty of the court to keep the jury together so long as there is any probability of their agreeing, and that it is vested with a large discretion as to the time the jury should be kept together, which discretion is not reviewable except where there is an abuse thereof.[60] This power to determine when a jury shall be discharged on disagreement is judicial,[61] and cannot be delegated to a clerk of the court.[62] When, under direction of the court, a jury is discharged and permitted to separate for inability to agree upon a verdict in a case committed to them, they no longer have charge of the case;[63] and cannot reassemble and agree upon a verdict.[64] And although the verdict is affirmed, when the facts are brought before the court on motion, it will be set aside.[65] But so long as the jury have not separated and left the court room, and their discharge has not been recorded, the verdict is valid and may be received.[66]

G. Objections and Exceptions.[67] A party having knowledge of facts, during the trial of a cause, which he claims constitute misconduct on the part of jurors, or other persons affecting jurors, must make the same known to the court at once, and have the matter promptly disposed of.[68] This he must do as a matter

Reasons for rule.— There are grave objections of public policy against arresting judgments in such instances, upon the mere absence of counsel, after proper attempts by the court to secure their attendance, for this would enable counsel, by neglecting to attend court, or by voluntary and unreasonable absence, to interfere unreasonably with the business of the court and further progress of the cause. Sufficiency of exceptions.—It has been held that an exception to the court's instructions in which he stated his intention to send the pleadings to the jury was an exception to the

of good faith and fair dealing toward the court and his opponent, and he will not be permitted to withhold such knowledge from the court during the trial, or allow the case to be submitted to a jury, and thus speculate upon the verdict.[69] By such conduct he will be held to have waived his right to have the verdict set aside on that ground,[70] unless he satisfy the court that such jurors, as a matter of fact, were prejudiced against him thereby, and could not render a fair and impartial verdict in the case.[71] Thus it has been held that improper communication by or with jurors; [72] the taking of improper books and papers to the jury room; [73] act of sending them. It will be presumed that he did send out the pleadings. Kansas City, etc., R. Co. v. Eagan, 64 Kan. 421, 67 Pac. 887. On the other hand, it has been held that where the court told the jury that they had a right to take a certain account in evidence with them for consideration, and the bill of exceptions did not show that the jury actually took the account to their room, there was no available error. Everything must be presumed in favor of the correctness of the court's action, until the contrary is made to appear. Porter County First Nat. Bank v. Williams, 4 Ind. App. 501, 31 N. E. 370. Where all that a bill of exceptions shows is that, as the jury were about to retire, plaintiff's counsel handed them an affidavit which they should not have taken to the jury room, and that counsel for defendant remarked to the court that he did not consent, and the jury took the affidavit to their room, this is not equivalent to a ruling of the court that they might take it, and to an exception to such ruling. For example, the objection that the jury took with them into retirement papers not in evidence (Bass v. Winfry, 20 Ga. 631; Clapp v. Norton, 106 Mass. 33), or which had been underscored by counsel (Lippus v. Columbus Watch Co., 13 N. Y. Suppl. 319), cannot be raised after verdict. So, while it is improper to permit a jury to take the attorney's notes of evidence without the consent of the parties or their attorneys, where such consent is given, the circumstances cannot be afterward urged as an objection to the verdict. Baker v. Rice, 52 Mo. 23. And if the fact that one of the jurors takes notes of the evidence which he carried into the jury room with him is a valid ground of complaint, it is waived by failure to seasonably object thereto. Presumption of knowledge by counsel.— It is to be presumed that the attorneys conducting the trial knew of the delivery of the papers to the jury. State v. Nichols, 29 Minn. 357, 13 N. W. 153. It is not enough in such case for the moving party to show that he was "ignorant of the actual character of the papers." The statement does not reach the fact which alone is material in this connection, viz.: Was the attorney ignorant of the fact that the papers in respect to which error is alleged were delivered to the jury? If the attorney knew, as it must be presumed he did, in the absence of showing to the contrary, that the court delivered to the jury the papers referred to, although he was ignorant of their actual character, it was incumbent upon him to see that papers not proper to go to the jury should be withheld, and, by objection or otherwise, to call the attention of the court to what is now complained of as error. State v. Nichols, supra.

Time for making objection.— Objection that papers should not be allowed to go out with the jury should be made before the papers the rendering of a verdict by less than a full jury;[74] permitting a jury to separate after agreeing on a verdict, but before it is announced,[75] or without being admonished by the court not to talk about the case;[76] sending instructions to the jury room after retirement instead of calling the jury into court and instructing them;[77] and the asking of improper questions by the court of the jury,[78] or by a juror of a witness,[79] is waived by failure to object thereto until after verdict. But the rule requiring exceptions to proceedings to be taken at the time applies only to proceedings in open court, and not to proceedings out of court.[80] So where the complaining party had no opportunity to interpose a formal exception, he may raise the question on appeal, although no exception was taken at the time.[81]

XI. VERDICT.[81a]

A. Definitions — 1. VERDICT. A verdict is the answer of the jury concerning any matter of fact, in any cause committed to them for trial,[82] its object being to announce to the court the judgment of the jury, as to how far the facts, established by the evidence, conform to those which are alleged, and put in issue by the pleadings,[83] and also for which party and in what amount to render judgment.[84] The facts declared by it constitute the basis of the judgment.[85]

Verdicts are general,[86] or special.[87] These two classes of verdicts will be considered at length in the following chapters.

2. GENERAL VERDICT. A general verdict is that by which the jury pronounce generally upon all or any of the issues, either in favor of plaintiff or defendant.[88] It is a finding in favor of the prevailing party of every material fact properly submitted to the consideration of the jury.[89] Simple responses of "yes" or "no" to issues submitted constitute general verdicts.[90]

3. SPECIAL VERDICT. A special verdict is where the jury finds the facts particularly, and then submits to the court the questions of law arising on them.[91] The jury finds the facts of a case, leaving the ultimate decision of the case upon those facts to the court, concluding conditionally that if, upon the whole matter thus found, the court should be of opinion that plaintiff has a good cause of action, they then find for plaintiff, and assess his damages; if otherwise, then for defendant.[92] This proceeding is entirely anomalous. It is unknown and unrecognized by the common law, or by practice prior to the statute of Westminster II,[93] which in fact originated the special verdict as it now exists.[94] There also exists another species of special verdict, as where the jury return a general verdict for plaintiff, subject nevertheless to the opinion of the court on a special case stated by counsel on both sides, as a matter of law.[95] But this proceeding has gone out of practice.[96] The object of a special verdict is solely to obtain a decision of the issues of fact raised by the pleadings, not to decide disputes between witnesses as to minor facts even if such minor facts are essential to establish, by inference or otherwise, the main fact.[97]

B. General Verdict — 1. Preparation and Formulation — a. In General. Ordinarily, a trial judge is not obliged to prepare forms of verdict,[98] but may do so if a party is not prejudiced thereby;[99] but if he does so, the forms should be complete as the case requires.[1] And where the issues are different between plaintiff and several defendants, it is error for the court to decline to give a form of verdict whereby the jury might find for plaintiff against one defendant and in favor of the other defendants.[2] A party may be permitted to prepare proper blank forms of verdict and send them to the jury for their use,[3] and the jury having found for plaintiff for the amount or quantity of his claim the court may direct plaintiff's attorney to formulate the verdict.[4] But the judge cannot, as the jury's clerk, even at the request of the jury, draw up their verdict.[5] The court may decline to allow the jury to frame their verdict so as to affect the interest of a stranger to the suit.[6]

b. Necessity of Reducing to Writing. In some jurisdictions an oral verdict is sufficient.[7] In other jurisdictions under statutory or constitutional provisions, the verdict must be in writing and signed by the foreman.[8] Where a verdict is directed the better practice is held to be to return a formal verdict in writing, but the absence of such verdict is not fatal to the validity of the judgment;[9] but if a general verdict is in writing and signed, it is immaterial that the answer to a special interrogatory is not in writing at the time, and it may afterward be received, as it is to be inferred that they agreed on an answer to the question before arriving at a verdict.[10]

c. Signature. Since a verdict is not required to be in writing, in the absence of statutory or constitutional provision,[11] a verdict is not, in the absence of statute, required to be signed.[12] Where, however, the verdict is signed a signature by one of the jurors as foreman in behalf of himself and his fellow jurors is sufficient;[13] but failure of the foreman to sign will not invalidate a judgment entered upon the verdict, in the absence of an appeal or motion in arrest.[14] Under some statutes, the verdict must be signed by the foreman.[15] Statutes or rules requiring signature of all jurors under certain circumstances have no application to a case where the cause is tried by less than the regular number of jurors by consent.[16] Where one of the jurors cannot sign the verdict because unable to sign his name, it is proper for the trial judge to write the juror's name and cause him to make his mark.[17]

d. Sealing — (I) DIRECTION. The court may, without regard to the consent or objection of parties,[18] direct the jury, in case they should agree, to sign the verdict, place it in an envelope, and return it into open court,[19] or may direct the baliff to permit the jury, upon agreement, to sign and seal their verdict and return it into court the following morning,[20] or, upon the jury's coming into court to report agreement, counsel being absent, may instruct the jury to seal their verdict and return it into court on the following day.[21]

(II) OPENING SEALED VERDICT. While the court may under stipulation of the parties open a sealed verdict in the absence of the jury and if necessary reduce it to proper form,[22] it may be opened at any time by the court, notwithstanding parties have agreed that it shall be opened on a particular day.[23] And the accidental unsealing of the verdict by the foreman does not vitiate it,[24] nor does the fact that counsel, out of curiosity, opened it.[25] Where a sealed verdict is directed, it is error to receive an open verdict.[26] The reception of a sealed verdict in the absence of some of the jury is illegal,[27] unless consented to by the parties. If, however, they give such consent, they thereby waive all exceptions because of such separation.[28]

e. Unanimity. In most jurisdictions, all the jurors must agree upon the verdict,[29] unless the express consent of both parties be shown to the entry of judgment thereon,[30] and a verdict is invalid if it is reached by agreement of the jurors to abide by a decision of less than all of their number.[31] In some jurisdictions a unanimous verdict is not required by statute, it being sufficient if a specified number of jurors agree upon the verdict.[32] Where the law authorizes a verdict where three fourths of the jurors concur, a verdict signed by seven jurors only is a nullity;[33] but a verdict unanimous on its face is good, although the judgment recites that three fourths, of the jurors, although not all, concurred therein.[34]

2. Rendition and Reception[34a]—a. When Received; Adjournments. A verdict cannot be received and entered during a period of adjournment,[35] in the absence of agreement,[36] or statutory authority.[37] Under some statutes, a jury cannot bring in a sealed verdict at a term other then the one at which the cause was submitted to them,[38] but under other statutes the rule is otherwise.[39] A verdict is not void because it is not written on the original petition.[40]

b. Where and by Whom Received. A verdict must be returned into court,[41] and is not final until pronounced and recorded in open court.[42] In the absence of statutory warrant, the court cannot authorize another person to receive the verdict, although the parties consent thereto;[43] but it is often held that by consent of the parties the clerk may receive a verdict in the absence of the judge,[44] and where the parties are present and consent to the reception of the verdict, it is not rendered illegal by the absence of one of the assistant judges,[45] and where the judge who tried the case is called away before verdict rendered, it is proper for the court to receive and enter the verdict.[46]

c. Necessity of Presence of Party or Counsel. A verdict may be received by the court in the absence of the parties to the suit,[47] and in the absence of their counsel,[48] where such absence is voluntary and while the court is in regular session,[49] especially where they were called into court and did not respond,[50] or where the cause of the complaining party is without merit.[51] It is the duty of counsel to remain in the court room until the final disposition of the case, and if they leave, it is no part of the judge's duty to send for them to be present at the return of the verdict.[52] To sustain an objection to a verdict received in the absence of counsel or party, it must affirmatively appear that they were not notified.[53]

d. Poll of Jurors — (I) RIGHT — (A) In General. To poll a jury is to call the names of the persons who compose a jury and require each juror to declare what his verdict is, before it is recorded.[54] The judge may, on request of either party, allow the jury to be polled,[55] and in some jurisdictions it is the absolute right of either party to have the jury polled on request,[56] whether the verdict is sealed or declared by the foreman,[57] and in these jurisdictions, a refusal by the court to poll the jury on request is error,[58] although the denial of the right does not render the verdict a nullity.[59] In other jurisdictions it is discretionary with the court whether it will poll the jury;[60] but if there is a good reason, a request by either party to test the unanimity of the jury by a poll should be allowed.[61] The right to poll does not exist in case of a directed verdict.[62] An objection that the jury were not polled comes too late after judgment.[63]

(B) Waiver. The right to poll the jury is waived by a stipulation that the officer in charge of the jury may receive the verdict.[64] Upon the question whether an agreement of counsel that the jury may bring in a sealed verdict affects the right to poll, the cases are not in accord, some holding that it waives the right,[65] the majority, however, holding otherwise,[66] and where the bill of exceptions shows that the sealed verdict was opened and read by consent of counsel, they cannot object that it was read in the absence of the jury, so as to deprive them of an opportunity to poll the jury.[67]

(II) When Request Must Be Made. It is too late to make a request for the poll of the jury after the verdict has been received and recorded,[68] or where the jury has dispersed after handing the verdict to the clerk,[69] or after the jury have been discharged.[70] A request that the jury be polled upon their bringing in a special verdict in which the answers to interrogatories are inconsistent, before the jury further deliberate under the order of the court, is premature.[71]

(III) Mode of Poll — (A) Questions. Where the jury has been polled as to a general verdict, it is discretionary with the judge whether he poll the jury as to special issues,[72] or they may be polled en masse as to special findings.[73] On poll a juror should be asked "Is this your verdict?" or words to that effect,[74] but no objection lies to the form "Do you find for the plaintiffs or for the defendant?" [75] It is improper to ask the juror "Is this your verdict and are you still satisfied with it?" [76]

(B) Answers. No particular form of answer is essential in the polling of a jury,[77] it being sufficient that the answer of each juror clearly showed that the verdict was when signed, and was likewise at the time of polling, the verdict of such juror.[78] If the juror answers "It is not my verdict," no further inquiry can be made of him.[79] In the absence of objection at the time it is a sufficient answer for a juror to say "I assented to it," or "I agreed to it," [80] or "It is my verdict as far as it goes." [81] A verdict is not vitiated by the fact that a juror hesitated to agree to it,[82] or where, in answer to the inquiry, he says it is not his verdict but he consented to it, and subsequently answers that it is his verdict,[83] or says he consented to it under protest.[84]

(IV) Dissent or Disagreement of Jurors and Resubmission of Cause. A juror may disagree to the verdict after it is received and upon his examination on poll,[85] whether the verdict be a sealed verdict or not,[86] or he may express his dissent when the verdict is about to be delivered.[87] To make the verdict good, the poll of the jury must show unanimity,[88] and if the verdict is in writing it should be read to the jury, and they must assent to it as read,[89] and such assent must be given in open court.[90] Assent may be presumed, if the verdict is read by the judge in court and accepted without objection at the time,[91] or if assented to by the foreman without disagreement being expressed by other jurors.[92] Where it appears on the jury's coming in with a verdict that their agreement is only apparent, they may be sent out to reconsider the verdict;[93] and, similarly, where the poll shows that a juror consented to the verdict merely in order to prevent a hung jury, although not satisfied that the successful party had established his case,[94] that the verdict is the result of compromise,[95] or that a juror's assent is qualified,[96] the verdict should not be received. More than one poll may be taken, where the court believes a mistake has been made, or is informed by a juror that he desires to change his vote,[97] and the verdict will stand if he thereafter agrees to it upon its being read to him.[98] If the disagreement is merely as to costs, it will not invalidate the verdict,[99] nor will dissatisfaction with the legal effect of a verdict.[1]

(v) Disclosing Grounds of Verdict. The court may inquire of the jury respecting their verdict and the grounds upon which they proceeded, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the case has been properly tried,[2] in the absence of and without the consent of counsel,[3] and the inquiry may be made after the jury have been discharged and have separated.[4] But such a proceeding is discretionary with the court,[5] and a refusal to instruct the jury after their discharge to deliver to counsel the calculations on which their verdict is based is not error,[6] and the judge may refuse to hear the grounds of the verdict, although the jury may desire to state them,[7] or may decline, after the jury has separated, to make an inquiry as to their finding as to a particular fact.[8]

3. Form and Language — a. Necessity and Sufficiency of General Finding. A general verdict is proper when it will ascertain and fix the rights of the parties,[9] and under some statutes in a case tried by jury as of right, a general verdict must be rendered,[10] and the court cannot render a judgment on findings of particular

(II) AMOUNT OF RECOVERY. In an action in which a money judgment is sought, the jury must find the amount due as well as the right of recovery,[28] this rule being statutory in some states,[29] and a general verdict for either party does not authorize judgment for any amount.[30] The rules above stated as to the certainty and definiteness required in a verdict [31] apply to the finding of the amount due, and a verdict not finding such amount with sufficient definiteness to authorize a judgment to be entered thereon for any definite sum is bad and will be set aside;[32] but strict technical accuracy is not required in the statement of the amount,[33] it being sufficient if that can be ascertained by mere mathematical calculation,[34]

the verdict for plaintiff includes principal and interest, and fails to specify separately the amount of each, a new trial should be granted, unless plaintiff renounces future interest on the judgment.[46] But if a verdict is sufficiently definite to be rendered certain by mere mathematical calculation or reference to the pleadings it is sufficient,[47] as in the case of a verdict finding the amount on which interest is to be calculated, and the date from which, or period for which, it is to run,[48] and the computation of interest may be made by the court,[49] and a judgment will not be reversed because the judge computed interest, instead of allowing the jury to do it, no objection having been made at the time.[50] But the verdict is insufficient if the term is not fixed,[51] and the court cannot render judgment on a verdict entirely insufficient and insensible.[52] Where the jury renders a verdict for a certain sum "and interest," although such verdict is defective, it being the duty of the jury to compute the interest or give the grounds of computation, plaintiff may take judgment for principal alone,[53] and a verdict, although including interest in the damages and thus informal, may be allowed to stand.[54] Where

A verdict for a specified sum, "with interest," is not subject to accurate computation, in the absence of something to indicate from what date interest is to be computed; that the complaint claims interest from a certain day not warranting the inference that the jury had that date in mind. not having been demanded by defendants.[63] A verdict for "plaintiffs," there being but one plaintiff,[64] or for "plaintiff," there being several plaintiffs,[65] or the same party being plaintiff in two capacities,[66] is sufficient, if the intention of the jury drawn from the whole verdict is plain; and the same rule applies to a verdict in a joint action, for one of two plaintiffs by name,[67] or where both plaintiffs claim in the same right.[68] A general verdict is good as to the parties before the court, although one of the parties has not been served or has not appeared,[69] or is dead,[70] or although rendered in the name of a former plaintiff who is represented by his heirs,[71] and upon dismissal or disclaimer as to some of the defendants, a general verdict for plaintiff is valid as to the remaining parties,[72] and the same is true where there has been a substitution of parties plaintiff.[73]

(II) SEVERANCE. Where there are two plaintiffs claiming in joint right, the jury cannot find in favor of one and against the other,[74] unless the defense is personal to one of the plaintiffs as the statute of limitations.[75] Conversely, in actions on a joint contract there cannot be a verdict in favor of one and against other defendants,[76] unless on a plea of the statute of limitations,[77] infancy,[78] or bankruptcy.[79] In actions for tort, however, the jury may find in favor of one and against other defendants; [80] and in such actions it is error for the court to refuse to submit a form of verdict in favor of one defendant and against another;[81] and where joint tort-feasors are sued in the same action, separate verdicts for different amounts may be awarded against them, and punitive damages allowed against one, and not against the other.[82] Where defendants are severally liable, a verdict against one not taking into account the other is good,[83] in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary,[84] and silence as to the other defendant is held to raise a necessary implication of a finding in favor of the defendant not named,[85] particularly where the relation of defendants to plaintiff are different,[86] where the defendant as to whom there is no finding in the verdict was not served,[87] or where the jury's answers to special interrogatories show that such defendant was not liable.[88] If under the pleadings and proof, the verdict, if any, against defendants must be joint, a verdict against "defendant" will be so understood.[89] Separate verdicts should be found in cases tried together.[90]

by the pleadings [92] and evidence.[93] The jury need not find on an issue as to which there is no evidence,[94] or dispose of matters not within the issues made by the pleadings,[95] nor need the verdict be in the words of the issue,[96] or technically embrace all the issues,[97] it being sufficient if in sense or legal effect it substantially responds to the pleadings and covers the issues,[98] and it cannot be objected to a verdict that it is too broad if every essential matter put in issue is concluded by it,[99] nor is it an objection that it contains surplusage.[1] The same rules will be applied in equitable as in legal actions to determine the sufficiency of the verdict.[2] to the jury, if one found by them necessarily negatives others which they have failed to find, the judgment will stand.[4] Similarly, a general verdict is not objectionable, where the petition, although containing two or more counts, states substantially only one cause of action,[5] or where plaintiff might have included all that the petition sets up in one count instead of two,[6] and a recovery on either count would bar a suit on the other count.[7] But generally where different counts contain different causes of action, the jury should find a separate verdict as to each cause,[8] although it is held that a general verdict by the jury without stating upon which of several counts the verdict was rendered is not reversible error,[9] particularly a verdict in damages substantially responsive to all the issues,[10] or where at the trial all the counts but the one found on were ignored,[11] or withdrawn from the consideration of the jury by instruction;[12] and a general verdict on a petition containing two counts, on only one of which evidence was introduced, will be presumed to be based on that count.[13] Similarly, where a verdict for plaintiff states the items on which the jury found, defendant is not prejudiced by the jury's failure to specify in the verdict the counts on which the verdict was based.[14] It has been held that a general verdict in the absence of a showing to the contrary may be applied to all causes of action,[15] and a verdict capable of a construction in which it may be understood as comprehending all the issues is good.[16] If a special verdict on each issue is desired, it should be demanded.[17] Where there are two counts in a declaration, and evidence given on both and a general charge by the court on the facts applying to each count, a general verdict on both counts is not erroneous,[18] and a general verdict is an answer to all the counts of a declaration where the general issue was pleaded to all; [19] but a verdict on the general issue only is erroneous, where the general issue and special pleas are pleaded,[20] and a general verdict cannot be sustained where there are two counts in the petition, one good and one bad, and the court has erroneously submitted the bad count as well as the good one to the consideration of the jury.[21] Where, however, the jury finds for plaintiff on both of two independent paragraphs of the complaint, the judgment will not be reversed for error in the finding on the second paragraph if that on the first paragraph is proper,[22] and a verdict may be for defendant on one count and for plaintiff on other counts; [23] and where the jury specifies the counts on which a finding for plaintiff is based, it is in effect a finding for defendant on all other counts.[24] A verdict for defendant upon all pleas will not be set aside where there is evidence sufficient to sustain one of such pleas.[25] Separate verdicts may be required where separate actions have been consolidated.[26]

(II) Several Issues Presented in One Count or Several Counts Covering the Same Transaction. Where defendant interposes several pleas to a single count, or to several counts founded on the same transaction, a general verdict for plaintiff is a finding against defendant on all the issues and is sufficient.[27] And, although it is sometimes required by statute that a verdict in defendant's favor should show on which of the several pleas it was rendered,[28]

Code (1895), § 5330, providing that, on several pleas filed, a verdict for defendant must show on which of the pleas the verdict is rendered, where more than one plea is filed, the court should on timely request from plaintiff cause the jury, in the event they find for defendant, to specify on which one or more of the pleas the verdict is rendered, and that plaintiff is entitled to demand that the jury specify on which a verdict is rendered for defendant, notwithstanding the proof may wholly fail to support one of them.

a general finding for defendant will usually be sustained if the evidence is sufficient to support any of the defenses,[29] but not if error is committed in the admission of evidence on any issue.[30] A special verdict for plaintiff on one of such issues, ignoring the others, is bad.[31] The jury should be required to make a separate finding on a plea of venue.[32]

(III) Defective, Immaterial, or Inconsistent Counts or Issues. Where two counts are inconsistent, a general verdict for plaintiff will be set aside,[33] as will be also a verdict inconsistent with either of the two issues in an action;[34] but a special verdict on one of the counts will support a judgment, where the two counts are inconsistent only in stating the nature and origin of plaintiff's rights.[35] In some cases, particularly those decided under statutes specially so providing, a general verdict rendered on several counts, some of which are defective, will stand,[36] even though there is but one good count,[37] the general verdict being referred to the good count,[38] unless a good and defective cause of action are so commingled that it is impossible to tell for which alleged injury the jury found the verdict.[39] In other cases, such a verdict has been held to be subject to be set aside, it not appearing that the verdict was not based upon the defective count,[40] unless the evidence adduced at the trial is applicable only to the good counts.[41] A general verdict cannot be sustained where there are some bad counts and the special findings are that plaintiff has sustained each count,[42] and a verdict

In determining whether the defense presented consists of several pleas or of only a single plea within a statute providing that, where several pleas are filed, a verdict for defendant must show on which of the pleas the verdict is rendered, the court should look to its substance, and not merely to its form. In an action for breach of contract a denial of the paragraphs wherein the breach and damages are alleged constitutes a distinct defense equivalent to a plea of the general issue, but a simple denial of a paragraph of a petition, alleging that defendant is a partnership, is not equivalent to a plea of no partnership whether considered as a plea in abatement or in bar, and is therefore not to be considered as a distinct defense. founded wholly upon an immaterial issue will be set aside;[43] but where issue is taken on several pleas, some of which are material and others immaterial, the verdict will stand,[44] unless the evidence sustains only the immaterial issue, in which case, if there are other issues, defendant is held to be not entitled to a general verdict.[45]

(IV) COUNTER-CLAIM, SET-OFF, AND PAYMENT. Where there is a set-off or counter-claim, the verdict need not name the amounts found due plaintiff and defendant respectively, but only the difference;[46] and where the allegations of a complaint and those of a counter-claim are of such a nature that the finding rendered for defendant upon the counter-claim necessarily involves a finding against plaintiff upon the complaint, an express finding on the complaint is unnecessary;[47] but if the jury find specially on the cause of action and the counter-claim, the verdict must clearly show in whose favor the balance rests and the amount thereof.[48] Where there is a notice of set-off under the general issue, a finding that plaintiff is indebted to defendant in a stated amount is good, being by necessary inferences a verdict for defendant.[49] Conversely, in such a case a general verdict for plaintiff is a valid finding by the jury, the set-off being in effect a part of the issue.[50] Upon a plea of payment, a general verdict may be found for plaintiff, for the amount found due after deducting all payments

46. Clemmons v. Clemmons, 68 Vt. 77, 34 Atl. 34; Edleman v. Kidd, 65 Wis. 18, 26 N. W. 116. But see Buchanan v. Smith, 1 Baxt. (Tenn.) 350, holding that defendant is entitled where the plea of set-off is relied upon to a judgment for the excess of his claim, which excess must be ascertained by the jury, and to do this they must find in their verdict that something is due plaintiff.

In Missouri it is held that the verdict should make separate findings on the cause of action and counter-claim. Marshall v. Armstrong, 105 Mo. App. 234, 79 S. W. 1161. But in an action on rent notes in which a counter-claim was interposed, the verdict that the value of the claim relied on to establish a counter-claim was equal to the amount of the notes, and finding the issues for the tenant, was sufficient as against the objection that it did not make separate findings on the petition and counter-claim. Lauderdale v. King, 130 Mo. App. 236, 109 S. W. 852.

Effect of stipulation.—Where, in an action on a note, the parties stipulate that if the jury find for defendant their verdict shall be for a certain amount on a counter-claim interposed by him, a verdict for defendant for such amount is, by necessary implication, a finding adverse to plaintiff, and covers both causes of action. Taylor v. Short, 38 Mo. App. 21.

If accounts are equally balanced, the verdict should be for defendant, unless a statute provides that in that event neither party shall recover costs when the verdict should be nothing due either party. Morgan v. Hefler, 68 Me. 131.

When the amount claimed by plaintiff is admitted, the jury may in assessing damages on the counter-claim deduct this amount, showing the deduction in the verdict. If the verdict fails to show the deduction it will be made by the court. Brainard v. Lane, 26 Ohio St. 632.

In reconvention, the verdict must respond to the issues made by the pleadings, and unless special should pronounce upon the respective rights or actions of both parties. Morgan v. Driggs, 17 La. 176 [following Johnston v. Bagley, 4 La. 333]. But where the claim in reconvention grows out of the very matter upon which plaintiff's right of action is based, two judgments are held unnecessary, because sustaining one necessarily rejects the other. Kelly v. Caldwell, 4 La. 38. See also Erwin v. Bissell, 17 La. 92.

Matters in mitigation in a breach of promise case cannot be considered as a set-off or counter-claim, and the court properly refuses to interrogate the jury as to the amount allowed by them in mitigation upon the verdict for plaintiff. Mayhin v. Webster, 8 Ind. App. 547, 35 N. E. 194, 36 N. E. 373.

47. Beers v. Flock, 2 Ind. App. 567, 28 N. E. 1011.

A verdict "for the defendant" simply is sufficient to defeat plaintiff's claim (Phillips v. Lewis, 12 N. Y. App. Div. 460, 42 N. Y. Suppl. 707), but it is not sufficient as a basis of a decree in favor of defendant upon a cross bill (Anderson v. Webb, 44 Tex. 147).

admitted or proved;[51] and in assumpsit, upon a plea of non assumpsit and payment, a finding that defendant did assume and promise, without any express finding as to the plea of payment, is a good verdict;[52] but where there were pleas of payment and set-off, a finding simply that defendant had not paid is not sufficiently responsive and will be set aside.[53] Upon a general denial and counterclaim pleaded, a general verdict for plaintiff is sufficient to dispose of both issues.[54] Where no set-off is pleaded a verdict in favor of defendant for a certain sum cannot stand.[55]

f. Surplusage. Verdicts are to have reasonable intendment, and surplusage or immaterial findings may be rejected in construing them. Thus, if the verdict finds the issue and something more, the latter part of the finding will be rejected as surplusage, and judgment rendered independently of the unnecessary matter, there being nothing to show that the jury reasoned falsely.[56] And a verdict will not be invalidated merely because the jury, through their foreman, immediately after the rendition of the verdict expressed their opinion as to the merits of the case, such opinion not being at variance with the verdict,[57] or made an award concerning costs,[58] or, the cause being submitted to the jury on special issues alone, they return a general verdict therewith,[59] and so much of the verdict as relates to facts admitted by the pleadings may be stricken out.[60] All these matters will be treated as surplusage, and judgment rendered on the valid part of the verdict, and it is not fatal that the verdict is not technically accurate if the court can see how it should be corrected.[61] But no part of the verdict, no matter how erroneous on its face, which is essential to make the finding responsive to the issues can be stricken out as surplusage,[62] nor can part of the verdict be so stricken out if the verdict is ambiguous.[63]

g. Disregard of Instructions.[64] The instructions to the jury constitute the law of the case, and the jury are bound to follow them in making up their verdict.[65] If they fail to conform to this rule prescribed by law for their conduct, the court may refuse to receive the verdict,[66] and where the verdict is clearly contrary to the instructions given it may be set aside,[67] whether the instructions did or did not correctly state the law,[68] particularly where the evidence is undisputed.[69] On the other hand, it is held that the mere fact that the jury disregarded an incorrect instruction is not a ground for reversing a judgment thereon,[70] particularly where the verdict is plainly justified by the evidence,[71] and it is manifest to the appellate court that justice has been done,[72] the complaining party not having been injuriously affected by the disobedience of the jury; [73] and the fact that a verdict is against the evidence and instructions is no ground for reversal where the evidence and instructions relate altogether to an issue not made by the pleadings.[74] It is held not to be error to disregard an instruction to state in the verdict upon which of several counts the verdict is based,[75] and a verdict will not be set aside because contrary to instructions which were inapplicable,[76] or conflicting,[77] or where under all the circumstances it is more reasonable to assume that the jury forgot the instruction rather than that they purposely disobeyed it,[78] or where the disregard was merely technical.[79] A verdict is not contrary to the instructions where there is evidence on which under the instructions given the jury is authorized to find the verdict returned.[80] Disregard by the jury of an instruction as to the amount of recovery is cured by a remittitur.[81] is not improper,[84] or the jury may retire and correct it.[85] And it is error to refuse a jury permission to retire and reconsider their verdict, where on hearing it read by the clerk they state to the court that it is not their verdict.[86] The amendment may be made even though the jurors have separated, where the object of the amendment is only to express the legal meaning of the finding.[87] But the verdict cannot be amended by the jury after it has been entered of record and they have been dismissed.[88]

(II) UNDER DIRECTION OF COURT. The rule is well settled that the court may, with proper instructions, recommit a verdict to the jury for their reconsideration, where the verdict which they have rendered is not in the proper form,[89]

As for instance, where it appears that it was arrived at by chance or lot (Roy v. Goings, 112 Ill. 656. But see Harrington v. Butte, etc., R. Co., 36 Mont. 478, 93 Pac. 640); is greater in amount than the juris-dict for plaintiff without assessing the damages in a case where damages should be assessed by them,[94] or award inadequate damages;[95] and it is error to decline to permit the jury to retire to amend the verdict.[96] This may be done even after the jury have been discharged, where the amendment goes to formal matters only but does not materially alter the sense of the verdict,[97] and although the verdict has been sealed,[98] and although counsel be absent.[99] But diction of the court (Street v. Stuart, 38 Ark. 159); awards costs (Simonds v. Shields, 72 Conn. 141, 44 Atl. 29; Cooper v. Pegg, 16 C. B. 264, 454, 24 L. J. C. P. 167, 3 Wkly. Rep. 456, 81 E. App. 323, 29 Pac. 21); or finds separate amounts against joint defendants (Hanley v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 127 N. Y. App. Div. 355, 111 N. Y. Suppl. 575).

Where there was no dispute as to the amount plaintiff was entitled to recover, if at all, and the jury had been properly instructed, there was no error in declining to receive a verdict for half the amount, reinstructing them on this point, and directing their further consideration of the case, but without attempting to direct them as to how the main issue should be resolved. Chandler v. Hinds, 135 Wis. 43, 115 N. W. 339.

Interest.— The jury may be remanded or permitted to amend, under instruction from the court, a verdict, which fails to include interest, in a case in which it should be awarded (Johnson v. Ridir, 84 Iowa 50, 50 N. W. 788; Sutliff v. Gilbert, 8 Ohio 405); or which, by its form, shows that interest was intended to be but was not added (Mark v. Hudson River Bridge Co., 56 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 108). But a clerk has no right, after a trial terminated, to change the verdict for plaintiffs as recorded in his minutes by adding the words "with interest," although they were contained in the verdict as announced by the foreman, where the jurors assented to the verdict as originally recorded. Correction of obvious error.— The court has power to reconvene a jury after they have returned their verdict, to correct an obvious error therein which the foreman called to the attention of the court immediately after they had taken their seats in the court room, although the verdict had been sealed, and although the jury since signing the same had separated for the night. a jury cannot be reassembled for the purpose of amending or reconsidering a verdict after they have separated and mingled in other affairs or other cases;[1] and after a verdict has been recorded, it cannot be reconsidered by the jury even by order of the court;[2] and it is error for the court to send out the jury to make special findings harmonize with the general verdict.[3]

b. By Court. It is the court's duty to see to it that the verdict is in proper form to carry into effect the findings of the jury, and to that end, where the intention of the jury is ascertainable, the court may amend the verdict, and by correcting manifest errors of form or substance make it conform to the intention of the jury,[4] if the matter of amendment can in no way affect the questions sub-

Such amendments have been made where the jury apportioned the costs between the parties (Nation v. Littler, (Kan. 1898) 52 Pac. 96; Foote v. Woodworth, 66 Vt. 216, 28 Atl. 1034), or made an error in computation

mitted to the jury.[5] The amendment may be made with the consent of the jury,[6] or without such consent and after the jury have separated,[7] and have been discharged,[8] and at any time before final judgment,[9] and after the trial of another cause;[10] and the appellate court may make the amendment when the case comes before it.[11] The amendment may be made upon the judge's notes at the trial, or on other clear evidence,[12] but to warrant amendment the data for amendment

(Gould v. Hartwig, 71 Kan. 438, 80 Pac. 976; How v. How, 48 Me. 428), or failed to include an undisputed item (Fischer v. Reilly, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 757).

A verdict for plaintiff without stating damages may be amended by the court by adding nominal damages. Coit v. Waples, 1 Minn. 134.

A verdict incorrectly recorded may be amended by the court. Grist v. Hodges, 14 N. C. 198; Dowell v. Vannoy, 14 N. C. 43; Ivens' Appeal, 33 Pa. St. 237; Baker v. Lawrence, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608, 18 Wkly. Rep. 835; Marianski v. Cairns, 1 Macq. H. L. 766.

Directed verdict.—The court may amend a verdict so as to conform to instructions where under a peremptory instruction to find for plaintiff the jury returned a verdict for defendant (Christopher v. White, 42 Mo. App. 428); or find for plaintiff in less than the directed amount (Mouat v. Wells, 76 Minn. 438, 79 N. W. 499; Hilburn v. Harrell, (Tex. Civ. App. 1895) 29 S. W. 925). But where smaller verdict is by direction of counsel received by court it is proper for the court thereafter to refuse to reform the verdict to correspond with the instructions. Fay Fruit Co. v. Talerico, (Tex. Civ. App. 1902) 69 S. W. 196. A directed verdict for one party cannot be changed into verdict for the opposite party. Brush v. Kohn, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 589.

Where a court might have directed a verdict to include a specified item, such as attorney's fees, it may add the item to the amount returned by the jury. Yakima Nat. Bank v. Knipe, 6 Wash. 348, 33 Pac. 834. Similarly, where upon admitted facts the court might have directed a verdict for a specified amount and the jury contrary to instructions find a less amount the court may increase the damages to the proper amount. Schweitzer v. Connor, 57 Wis. 177, 14 N. W. 922. But see Morris v. Burke, 15 Mont. 214, 38 Pac. 1065, holding that a court has no right to refuse to receive a verdict for plaintiff for fifty dollars on the ground that if plaintiff is entitled to recover he is entitled to recover one hundred dollars.

Adding name of party.—Where a suit is brought in the name of a father to recover damages for the death of an infant son, and the jury returned a verdict in a lump sum for the parents as "total damages for the death of their son," the record may subsequently be amended by the court by adding the name of the mother of the deceased. Mere irregularities by the court in performing this duty is not ground for new trial. Brown v. Rounsavell, 78 Ill. 589.

The amendment may be made by an attorney at the direction of the court. Washington v. Denton First Nat. Bank, 64 Tex. 4.

Substituting one verdict for another.—Where a jury, by mistake of the foreman in the use of blank forms of verdict submitted, returned two complete verdicts into court, one for defendant and the other for plaintiff, their intention being to render a verdict for plaintiff, according to plaintiff's verdict so returned, it was proper for the court, after receiving the verdict for defendant, and then discovering the other verdict, to substitute the one for the other, according to the jury's intention, under the court's power to amend the verdict to conform to the facts. must be certain and unmistakable,[13] and must appear in the record.[14] The court has no right, without the consent of the jury, so to revise or amend the verdict in a substantial part as to change the sense of their verdict, thus invading the exclusive province of the jury, and substituting its verdict for theirs,[15] although the court directed what the verdict should be,[16] particularly after the jury disperse and the verdict is recorded.[17] After a verdict is recorded, a motion to correct the verdict must be made in the court in which it was recorded.[18] A verdict incomplete at the term at which it was rendered may be set aside by the court at any subsequent term for the purpose of perfecting it.[19]

In an action on a note providing for an attorney's fee where no evidence is introduced by defendant and none but the note itself by plaintiff, the construction of the note is for the court, and defendant is not injured by the fact that the court, instead of estimating the attorney's fee, and instructing the jury to include it in their verdict, adds it to the verdict itself. Yakima Nat. Bank v. Knipe, 6 Wash. 348, 33 Pac. 834.

An undisputed item of plaintiff's claim having been overlooked by both parties and a general verdict for defendant having been putably due, on pain of granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial;[31] and the court in the exercise of its discretion to conform the verdict to the intention of the jury and to the pleadings may reduce the amount,[32] as for instance where the jury render a verdict for double the amount claimed by plaintiff;[33] and a verdict may be amended by the court by the computation and addition of interest, if it appears that it was the intention of the jury that it should be added and if sufficient data is at hand upon which to compute it.[34] But there being nothing to show for what time the jury intended to allow interest, the addition of such amount in the verdict returned is erroneous.[35]

(II) Remission or Reduction of Amount of Recovery. A verdict may be amended as to the amount of recovery by the entry of a remittitur of the excess of the verdict over the amount claimed or proved;[36] by remitting an excess returned, plaintiff cannot complain of the amendment of the verdict and a rendition of judgment for him for such item under defendant's stipulation and an order of the court. Fischer v. Reilly, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 757.

of interest found in the verdict,[37] or interest improperly found;[38] by releasing a party's claim as to a right not passed on by the verdict;[39] or by remitting amounts included in the verdict due to parties who have not joined in the suit.[40] But where a verdict is too large to meet the approval of the trial court, it is error for the court to reduce it and enter judgment for the reduced amount, without giving plaintiff an option to accept that amount or submit to a new trial.[41]

5. Construction, Operation, and Effect — a. Construction and Operation — (I) In General. General verdicts are to be very liberally construed with a view to effectuating the intent of the jury,[42] and all presumptions are indulged in in their favor,[43] and as against answers to special interrogatories, in conflict therewith.[44] But no fact that a party would not have been allowed to prove can be invoked under such presumption,[45] and nothing is presumed to have been proved by the verdict but what is expressly stated in the pleadings or is necessarily implied from the facts so stated,[46] and where the attention of the jury is directed to but one of two counts, a general verdict will be presumed to be on that count.[47] The verdict must be construed with reference to the instructions and pleadings and in the light of the issues made by them,[48] and in connection with the entire record.[49] Where two different amounts are given as damages the presumption is that the lesser amount was the one intended.[50]

(II) VERDICT BY CONSENT. A verdict is not vitiated by the fact that it was agreed on between the parties,[51] and such verdict is subject to impeachment by a third party only upon showing that he has been injured, or that he has opposing rights that cannot be concluded by it.[52] Such a verdict, covering the whole litigation, is a verdict upon the merits,[53] and the presumption is that everything that could have legally been found for the party in whose favor the verdict was taken has been so found.[54] As between the parties it must be deemed at least as favorable to the party in whose favor it was rendered on the facts in issue as it would if the verdict had been found on a submission;[55] and where there is an agreed verdict and agreed special findings, it cannot be claimed that the evidence did not warrant the verdict except in so far as it may be controlled by the special findings.[56]

b. Conclusiveness. The court will not inquire into the facts after a verdict founded upon conflicting evidence.[57] But a verdict without judgment is not evidence of the facts found by it.[58] Where a separate verdict has not been demanded, a joint verdict against defendant who has made default and defendants answering is conclusive against all defendants;[59] but a verdict against but one defendant imports a finding in favor of a co-defendant.[60]

c. Evidence Affecting Verdict[61] — (I) AFFIDAVITS AND TESTIMONY OF JURORS TO SUSTAIN, IMPEACH, OR EXPLAIN. Jurors will not be heard to impeach a verdict duly rendered by them and recorded, and their affidavits introduced for such purpose will be disregarded,[62] as will be also the affidavits of others setting forth the hearsay statements of jurors.[63] Thus jurors cannot impeach their verdict by affidavits that the verdict was the result of misapprehension,[64] or was arrived at by lot, or by averaging estimates,[65] or that improper matters were considered by the jury.[66] But affidavits of jurors are admissible to show that the verdict, as received and entered of record, by reason of a mistake does not embody the true finding of the jury,[67] or to correct an erroneous statement of the verdict to the court or entry by its clerk;[68] and affidavits of jurors are admissible when made in support of[69] or to explain a verdict, as for instance by showing whether interest was computed on plaintiff's claim,[70] or where a sealed verdict is returned without specifying the amount of the recovery to show what they intended to be understood as their verdict.[71] officers in charge of the jury which show the violation on their part of their sworn duties,[72] or affidavits of third parties on information and belief that a verdict was arrived at by chance, the verdict having been affirmed by each juror on poll,[73] are not sufficient to overcome the verdict. Parol evidence is admissible to show a mistake in the verdict of a jury.[74]

6. Objections and Exceptions — a. Right and Time to Object; Grounds. Objection to irregularity or informality in a verdict must be taken at its rendition,[75] at the term at which the verdict is returned,[76] and before the jury is discharged,[77] otherwise the objection will be deemed to have been waived. The objection of irregularity should be taken by motion to set aside on that ground,[78] and comes too late upon a motion for a new trial,[79] or on appeal.[80] A party who is not injured thereby cannot complain of the uncertainty of the verdict or of defects therein.[81]

b. Sufficiency and Scope of Exception. An objection to a verdict must specify the particulars in which the defect lies.[82] An exception that the verdict is contrary to law,[83] to instructions,[84] or to the evidence [85] is too vague and general, and will not be considered. But an objection that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence is sufficient if it designates some particular material fact and avers that such fact is not sustained by the evidence.[86] considered,[88] and the only one that can be looked to by the appellate court,[89] and the form of the verdict as recorded must control in case of variance between it and the written verdict brought into court by the jury.[90] It is not necessary that the record of entry of a verdict should show that the jury were sworn.[91]

b. Amendment or Correction of Record.[92] The record of a verdict in case of clerical mistake may be amended to conform to the verdict as rendered,[93] although the term has expired,[94] and the court may after the expiration of the term direct the recording of a verdict which was not recorded when returned.[95] Where, in order to arrive at the meaning of the jury in its verdict, it is necessary to consider the evidence which has not been made a part of the record, the court may require the record to be completed by bill of exceptions or bill of evidence.[96]

8. Verdict Subject to Opinion. In some jurisdictions the jury may bring in a verdict for either party subject to the opinion of the court upon a point of law.[97] This is a general and not a special verdict.[98] The facts on which it arises must either be admitted on the record or found by the jury.[99] A verdict conditioned upon and subject to the court's opinion upon a demurrer to the evidence remains conditional until the court acts upon the demurrer and gives judgment or sets it aside,[1] and it is error to render judgment on the verdict without determining the demurrer.[2]

9. Conditional Verdict. It is generally held that the jury cannot render a conditional verdict in an action at law.[3] In some states, however, this practice is permitted.[4]

C. Special Interrogatories, Verdict, or Findings[4a] — 1. Power to Find Specially or to Require Special Findings — a. Rules Stated. At common law the jury can find either a general or special verdict, and it may decline to find other than a general verdict,[5] and the judge cannot compel it to find either a general or special verdict or to give reasons for a general verdict.[6] The form of verdict which may be rendered is now in the large majority of jurisdictions regulated by statutes, which provide that the jury may in actions for the recovery of money or specific property find generally or specially;[7] and in many jurisdictions it is within the discretion of the court to submit special findings or special interrogatories to the jury,[8] without having been requested so to do by either wholly within the province of the court, or by interrogatories take the opinion of the jury on matters of law.[14]

b. Special Findings Accompanying General Verdict. At the request of parties, the jury may express an opinion distinct from their verdict,[15] and under some statutes may be required to return both a general verdict and special findings,[16] and the court cannot in the absence of a general verdict render judgment on findings in answer to interrogatories,[17] unless the conduct of the parties has been such as to justify the presumption that they have waived a general verdict.[18] Other statutes contemplate either a general or special verdict, but not both.[19] Special findings accompanying a verdict rendered on direction of court are immaterial.[20]

2. QUESTIONS SUBMITTED — a. In General. Special interrogatories bearing directly upon the issues and calling for findings of ultimate facts essential to the determination of such issues are proper and should be submitted upon request,[21]

Construction of California statute.— Code Civ. Proc. § 625, providing that the court on the request of any of the parties must direct the jury to find a special verdict, requires the court on proper request of either party to direct the jury, if they return a general verdict, to give answers to any material question, which will enable the court to apply the law to the facts actually found. The term "special verdict" in the code does not mean a finding on every material issue, but the object of the statute is to determine whether a general verdict is or is not against the law. The court in determining whether a party has a right to special findings must determine whether a question will admit of a direct answer, or whether an answer favorable to the party preferring the request will be inconsistent with a general verdict for the adverse party, and, where these conditions are satisfied, the request should be granted, whether an issue is called a question of fact or a question of fact is called an issue, or whether the request relates to one or several questions. Plyler v. Pacific Portland Cement Co., 152 Cal. 125, 92 Pac. 56.

The right is complied with by submission of a sufficient number of questions to cover singly every material fact in controversy under the pleadings and evidence. Baxter v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 104 Wis. 307, 80 N. W. 644.

When the issues are of a complicated nature the court must submit special questions. Burke v. McDonald, 2 Ida. (Hasb.) 679, 33 Pac. 49.

A general verdict accompanied by answers to special questions is not a special verdict. Gale v. Priddy, 66 Ohio St. 400, 64 N. E. 437; McDougall v. Ashland Sulphite-Fibre Co., 97 Wis. 382, 73 N. W. 327.

Under the Pennsylvania practice, a special verdict must place on record all the essential facts of the case, disputed or undisputed, upon which facts alone without inferences of further facts the judgment is to be rendered, and where a case is submitted generally the fact that certain disputed questions of fact were also submitted for findings thereon does not render the verdict a special one. Elliott v. Miller, 158 Fed. 868.

A refusal of defendant's request to require the jury to find a separate general verdict was not prejudicial error where the finding under the instructions was necessarily an unfavorable answer to the question propounded by defendant. order to justify the refusal, the interrogatories requested must have been fully covered by those given,[40] and where the interrogatory refused requires a more specific answer than the one submitted, the refusal is error.[41]

d. Questions Disposed of by General Verdict. The court need not submit for special findings questions necessarily disposed of by the general verdict,[42] or the answers to which would be decisive of the sole issue and equivalent to a special verdict.[43] Thus where the issues as framed are sufficient to present to the jury every defense that was made in the case, the refusal to submit issues in the form presented by defendant is not error.[44]

3. Requests For Special Findings — a. Necessity and Sufficiency. A party desiring a special verdict or answers to special interrogatories must request the submission of such interrogatories or the finding of such special verdict,[45] and no error can be predicated on a failure to submit a particular question in a special verdict which was not requested, but merely an exception taken to the verdict because it did not contain it.[46] The request must be unconditional,[47] and must be accompanied by a request to submit particular findings.[48] A mere request by one party that certain specific questions and no others be submitted is not sufficient.[49] Under some statutes the request must be in writing,[50] and entered on the minutes of the court.[51]

b. Time For Presenting. The time for filing requests for special findings is largely in the discretion of the trial court,[52] but they should not be submitted at such a stage as to work surprise or be manifestly unfair to the other side.[53] They may be presented before the issues are closed,[54] and before argument begun,[55] and after arguments on requested instructions.[56] They need not be received after argument commenced [57] or closed,[58] after the court has intimated the character of the instructions it will give,[59] or after the main charge has been given,[60] and it is too late to submit requests for special findings after general verdict,[61] after verdict directed,[62] or after the discharge of the jury.[63] Requests for special findings are premature if made before any evidence has been introduced in the cause.[64] Exception to the court's refusal to submit special interrogatories must show when the interrogatories were presented to the court.[65]

c. Submission to Opposing Counsel. Under some statutes special interrogatories to the jury must be submitted to counsel for the opposite side,[66] before arguments begun,[67] and if not so submitted may be properly refused by the court.[68] But the court is not bound to submit to counsel special interrogatories given on its own motion,[69] nor special interrogatories submitted by counsel during argument, it being within the discretion of the court whether to submit interrogatories presented at that late stage of the trial.[70]

4. Preparation and Form of Interrogatory — a. In General. In the absence of statute no particular form is required in the submission of special interrogatories, it being sufficient if they substantially present the issues, and, when answered, determine the rights of the parties,[71] and the form of questions and manner of propounding them is largely in the discretion of the trial court.[72] Each question should be clear and concise, and presented in such form that the jury can give a direct answer thereto,[73] which will support the judgment,[74] and should call for a finding on one single, distinct, material proposition, and should not be double,[75] and should neither narrow nor enlarge the issue as presented by the evidence.[76] Special interrogatories are properly refused, where misleading or confusing,[77] or ambiguous,[78] as where they are in the alternative; [79] and questions must be confined wholly to facts and not embody law applicable thereto.[80] The duty of preparing a form of special verdict devolves on counsel; [81] but the jury may make alterations therein or frame a special verdict themselves,[82] and the court is not obliged to require interrogatories to be answered in the form prepared by counsel.[83]

b. Leading or Suggestive Interrogatories. It is no objection to a special interrogatory that it is leading,[84] or that it is so framed that no other answer than yes or no can be given thereto.[85] But the interrogatory should not be suggestive of the answer desired,[86] and should not be so worded or marked that an inference prejudicial to either party may be drawn therefrom.[87]

interrogatories submitted,[88] so as to make them relate to ultimate instead of evidentiary facts,[89] or make them proper in form or pertinent to the issues,[90] or may prepare others in its discretion, where those submitted are not adequate or in proper form.[91]

6. Withdrawal. It is held that the court cannot, over the objection of the party at whose instance they were submitted, withdraw from the jury pertinent interrogatories submitted by request,[92] particularly after the jury have deliberated upon them,[93] although the jury cannot agree on the answers thereto, where the right of recovery is based upon the answers to the interrogatories;[94] nor can it after general verdict permit the withdrawal of special questions at the instance of the party who submitted them and over the objection of the opposite party.[95] On the other hand, it is held that it is discretionary with the court to withdraw questions not yet passed upon,[96] where such action is not prejudicial to either party,[97] and the court may withdraw special questions, the answers to which are embodied in other findings,[98] or questions which were submitted by the court;[99] and where it is discretionary with the court to require the jury to make special findings, the court may withdraw one or all questions submitted upon which the jury cannot agree.[1] Failure to compel answers to special questions is in effect a withdrawal of such questions.[2] their verdict,[4] and a failure of the foreman to sign the same is ground for new trial.[5] But if signed by the foreman as shown by his signature to the general verdict, it is immaterial that he does not sign as foreman,[6] or, where the verdict contains a number of findings, that the foreman signs each of them;[7] nor is the general verdict necessarily vitiated by the failure of the foreman to sign written answers of the jury to special interrogatories submitted to them.[8] Like a general verdict, they must be announced in open court.[9]

8 SUFFICIENCY OF VERDICT OR FINDINGS — a. In General. A special verdict finds facts and concludes that, if upon the facts found plaintiff should recover, then the jury find for plaintiff, but if otherwise then they find for defendant,[10] and if it fails to do so is imperfect.[11] A special verdict must find all the facts essential to judgment and necessary to entitle the party having the burden of proof to recover, and cannot be aided by intendment or by extrinsic facts,[12] and

The court should decline to receive the general verdict until the questions are answered, if the jury fails to answer all questions submitted for special findings. Redford v. Spokane St. R. Co., 9 Wash. 55, 36 Pac. 1085.

Plaintiff's cause of action need not be affirmatively established by the jury's answers

nothing must remain for the court to do but to draw conclusions of law,[13] or to make a mathematical calculation to ascertain the damages.[14] Special verdicts need not find either way as to facts alleged, but not supported by evidence,[15] or as to facts in evidence, but not embraced within the issues made by the pleadings,[16] and a finding cannot be upheld unless based on some competent evidence.[17] The verdict is sufficient if it be good in substance,[18] considered in the light of the facts of the case,[19] although unskilfully framed,[20] and it is not necessary that a finding be made as to every allegation of the complaint, if sufficient facts are found to constitute a cause of action within the allegations.[21] Where an answer to an interrogatory is fully covered by answers to other interrogatories, it is not error to refuse to require the jury to make the former more specific,[22] and a finding necessarily decisive of the case dispenses with the necessity of answering other questions.[23] Where the special findings show that the jury found for plaintiff on a sufficient paragraph of the complaint, the fact that it also found for plaintiff on an insufficient paragraph does not vitiate the verdict,[24] and, although a special finding of the jury is not warranted by the evidence, the judgment will not be disturbed if the general verdict is sustained by the evidence.[25]

b. Definiteness and Certainty. The findings must be definite and certain,[26] and equivocal expressions are insufficient,[27] "yes" or "no" being the preferable answers where possible;[28] and where, instead, the jury give answers from which it cannot be determined whether they accord or conflict with the general verdict, the verdict is bad.[29] But the facts need not be found with greater minuteness in the verdict than they are stated in the pleadings,[30] and where the findings of a special verdict are evasive, but cannot prejudice the party alleging error, they will not be disturbed upon appeal.[31] Where a verdict is uncertain by reason of inconsistent findings it cannot be cured by disregarding the uncertain portions, although the verdict is sufficient without them.[32]

c. Ultimate or Evidentiary Facts or Conclusions. To sustain a judgment rendered thereon, special verdicts or findings must contain statements of ultimate and not evidentiary facts;[33] and a special verdict is defective which instead of stating facts states inferences or conclusions of law,[34] or presents no other question than the relevancy of testimony adduced on trial.[35] But a finding of probative facts is generally held sufficient if the ultimate facts necessarily result therefrom,[36] and a special verdict finding what the law has made conclusive evidence of a fact is tantamount to a finding of such fact,[37] and where the facts properly found are sufficient to sustain the special verdict, it is not rendered insufficient because another special finding consists merely of conclusions of law [38] or contains evidentiary facts.[39] A finding that plaintiff was free from negligence,[40] or that persons converted money to their own use,[41] or, the issue being whether a party had sufficient mental capacity to make a gift inter vivos, a finding that the donor was of unsound mind,[42] are conclusions, and not findings of fact, and usury is a conclusion of law from the facts found.[43] On the other hand it has been held, and very prop-

d. Failure to Answer Interrogatories or to Make Findings — (i) In General. It is the duty of the jury to find the special issues submitted,[45] and where the verdict is incomplete on account of a failure to embrace a finding on material issues, the court may call the attention of the jury to the fact and require them to return to their room and complete the verdict,[46] and it is error for the court to refuse to require the jury to answer interrogatories.[47] But the general verdict is not invalidated by failure to answer special questions, where answers to such questions favorable to the party against whom judgment is rendered would not necessarily render the judgment erroneous;[48] and a judgment will be reversed for the refusal of the court to require answers to special interrogatories only where the answers to such interrogatories would control the verdict;[49] and, generally, neither party being harmed, failure to answer special interrogatories will not authorize a new trial where the general verdict is in proper form.[50] And error cannot be predicated on the failure of the jury to answer special interrogatories which the court did not call upon them to answer,[51] where neither party requested an answer,[52] or where the question is too general to require an answer;[53] and failure to definitely answer a special interrogatory is not prejudicial where the matters covered thereby are concluded by answers to other interrogatories,[54] and the court need not require more definite answers, where the intention of the jury is plain,[55] or where the legal effect of the answers would remain the same.[56] The failure of the jury to answer some of the questions submitted is harmless, where the trial court in its findings resolves the questions in appellant's favor;[57] nor is the omission of the jury to find one of the issues joined prejudicial to plaintiff whose declaration was so defective that no judgment could be rendered thereon in his favor.[58]

(II) Immaterial, Inconclusive, and Uncontroverted Facts or Issues. The jury need not find on undisputed facts or facts conclusively established,[59] or on facts admitted by the pleading,[60] nor is it necessary to find on immaterial issues.[61] And where a fact, if found, is immaterial, it is not error to refuse to require a jury to make more specific answer to an interrogatory as to the existence of that fact,[62] and insufficient answers to special interrogatories are not ground for reversal, where the interrogatories were such that no answers which could have been made would have controlled the general verdict.[63] Where the answers to interrogatories cover all material questions, the judgment is not invalidated because the jury answered some immaterial questions in addition thereto.[64] Errors in findings upon a defense are immaterial where the verdict, taken in connection with the charge, shows that it was not based upon such findings.[65]

(III) Adverse or Negative Findings and Disagreement of Jury. Where special findings fail to find a fact in issue, such silence will be regarded as equivalent to an express finding against the party having the burden of proof on such issue.[66] The jury should not be permitted to answer pertinent interrogatories that they "do not know," such an answer being equivalent to no answer at all,[67] unless the evidence does not warrant any other finding,[68] and the same applies where the jury report an inability to agree.[69] A finding that a certain fact probably does not exist,[70] or that the weight of the evidence justifies the jury in answering "no," [71] sufficiently finds that the facts do not exist.

But where as a conclusion of law from the special verdict, the general verdict is unwarranted, judgment upon it is erroneous. Aguirre v. Alexander, 58 Cal. 21.

If on any count of the petition the general verdict can be made to stand consistently with the special findings, it will not be set aside. Jemmison v. Gray, 29 Iowa 537.

Erroneous instruction.—A motion for judgment on special findings, notwithstanding the general verdict, the jury having failed verdict and special findings cannot stand.[95] In determining the force of the interrogatories, nothing but the pleadings, the verdict, and the answers can be considered,[96] and no regard will be paid to answers of the jury with reference to matters not submitted to them,[97] or immaterial matters,[98] or mere conclusions.[99]

9. Construction and Operation — a. Construction. Special verdicts must be construed liberally with a view of ascertaining the intention of the jury,[1] and answers returned by a jury to interrogatories addressed to them are to be taken together and not separately,[2] and if possible are to be so construed as to harmonize them and uphold the general verdict,[3] and special findings will not be disturbed unless flagrantly against the evidence.[4] A special verdict will be construed most strongly against the party upon whom rests the burden of proof,[5] and a special finding received without objection most strongly against the party in whose favor it is found.[6] If the jury in a special verdict find facts only, the court must to reach the conclusion in the general verdict made necessary by applying to its special findings the law as laid down in the instructions, will not be granted, the law having been erroneously given and, in fact, authorizing the general verdict. draw the legal conclusions from them,[7] and if they draw conclusions against the law upon the face of them, the court will reject the conclusion and judge upon the facts.[8] But where all the facts are not found and a conclusion is drawn which might have been warranted by the facts not found, the court will not reject the conclusion,[9] and where facts are found warranting either of two conclusions, the court will adopt the conclusions arrived at by the jury.[10] An admission of fact in a pleading will prevail over a special finding of the jury to the contrary.[11]

b. Conclusiveness and Effect as Evidence. A party, at whose instance or with whose consent, a particular question has been submitted to the jury, is bound by their answer thereto so far as the trial is concerned,[12] and such finding is evidence against other parties who have agreed to be bound thereby.[13] But a special verdict not received by the court and forming no part of the record is not evidence of any fact found by it.[14]

c. Effect as General Verdict. The court cannot treat, as a general verdict, a verdict that shows that the jury did not intend it as such.[15] But where the law authorizes only a general verdict, a verdict, although in form special, will be regarded as a general verdict.[16]

10. Amendment or Correction of Special Verdict or Finding — a. In General. The jury may change its verdict or special findings at any time before they are received.[17] The court may also amend a special verdict or finding in matters of form and may remedy defects resulting from inadvertence, the intention of the jury being clear,[18] and the court may compute and insert, during the term at which the special verdict is returned, the amount of damages to which plaintiff is entitled under the verdict.[19] But the court cannot without the consent or over the objection of the parties amend a special verdict or finding in matters of substance,[20] unless the finding is so contrary to the undisputed credible evidence as to justify the court in directing a verdict or changing an answer.[21] The proper remedy, where facts are not sufficiently found, or are contrary to law, or are not sufficiently sustained by the evidence, or where additional facts should have been found, is by motion for new trial,[22] and not by motion to make the special findings more specific.[23] But the judge may set aside a special finding and let the general verdict stand,[24] and where the issues not passed on are entirely distinct from those that are, the court may order a retrial as to these issues not passed on only.[25]

b. Remanding Jury or Resubmission of Interrogatory. also an objection that the question submitted was not the only one in the case,[35] or that the court received a special verdict without requiring a general verdict.[36] In the absence of a motion to have them sent back for fuller answer, it is no ground for new trial that special findings do not respond sufficiently to requests therefor,[37] or that the jury failed to answer them,[38] directly and definitely,[39] and these objections not having been taken before the jury are discharged are deemed waived and cannot be taken advantage of on appeal.[40] But a special verdict may be attacked at any time for failure to pass on all material and controverted questions, there being no general verdict.[41] Where special issues are submitted to the jury at a party's request he cannot complain that there was not evidence sufficient to make a finding on such issues.[42] A general objection to the submission of certain questions does not raise the objection that the discretion of the jury to render a general or special verdict has been interfered with.[43]

XII. TRIAL BY COURT.[44]

A. Hearing and Determination of Cause — 1. In General — a. Power and Duty of Court in General. tional powers in such case, except such as belong to the judge and the jury, in an ordinary case.[47] Where a question of fact is submitted to a jury, a party has a right to be heard by counsel in argument thereon, but, where the case is tried to the court, the matter of argument is within the sound discretion of the court.[48] It is error for the court to invite another judge, who had not heard the testimony, to sit with him during the argument of a case, and to consult with such judge in regard to the same.[49]

b. Submission of Cause on Agreed Statement of Facts or Stipulation — (i) On Agreed Statement of Facts — (A) In General. Parties may submit a case to the court, without a jury, on an agreed statement of facts,[50] and in such case, the parties are estopped to deny the truth, competency, or sufficiency of any admission contained therein.[51] As in a special verdict, the facts must be distinctly and expressly agreed upon and set forth as admitted; [52] and all questions as to the formal pleadings are understood to be waived,[53] unless directly reserved.[54] It is essential to a case stated that there be a pending action to support it; if there be no action there can be no judgment,[55] and to sustain judgment for plaintiff, the statement must show all the facts necessary to his recovery.[56] The decision is to be made upon the facts actually stated,[57] and in the absence of any provision to that effect,[58] no inferences of fact can be drawn,[59] unless, as matter of law, they are necessary inferences.[60] The agreed statement of facts is equivalent to a special verdict,[61] and the proper judgment thereon is a mere conclusion of law,[62] the judgment to be pronounced precisely as if a jury had found a verdict in that form.[63]

(B) Discharge or Vacation. An agreed statement of facts is not conclusively binding on the parties.[64] The stipulation of facts made by the parties may, under some circumstances, in the exercise of a wise discretion, be vacated, and additional evidence be received.[65] Thus if a case is defective in setting forth the facts,[66] or if there has been any material mistake or omission in making up the same,[67] it may be discharged. If parties desire the case to be amended or discharged, or the facts to be varied, steps must be taken to effect these objects before the decision is announced.[68]

(II) On Stipulation. Issues of fact in civil cases may be tried and determined without a jury, whenever the parties or their attorneys of record file a stipulation in writing, consenting to that mode of trial.[69] Ordinarily, the judge will accede to the wishes of the parties where they waive a jury and try the issues of fact himself.[70] But he is not bound to do so, and may refuse without giving any reasons therefor.[71] A submission of an action to the court for trial clothes it with all the functions of a jury in determining the facts and rendering a judgment based thereon.[72] It is equivalent to a request by both parties for a direction of a verdict,[73] and constitutes an admission that only questions of law are involved, and that there are no disputed or controverted questions of fact in the case.[74] The stipulation and pleadings are substitutes for findings of fact and if they support the judgment, it will not be disturbed.[75] Where by stipulation of parties all issues of law and fact are referred to the court, it is error for the court to pass on some of the issues of fact and refer others to a jury.[78]

c. Submission of Special Issues to Jury[77] — (i) In General. In the cases triable by the court without a jury, the court may, on application of either party, or upon its own motion,[78] submit one or more questions of fact to the jury for its information.[79] Whether it will do so seems to be a question for the exercise of a sound discretion on its part, which exercise of discretion will not be reviewed on appeal, except in manifest cases of abuse.[80] The refusal of an application to have the issues of fact sent to a jury is not error,[81] although based to some extent on the condition of the jury calendar.[82]

(ii) Framing and Settlement of Issues. Issues must be framed in a trial without, as with, a jury.[83] The issues to be tried should be plainly and distinctly stated,[84] by way of interrogatories which may be prepared by the court, or counsel under the direction of the court, or which may be submitted by counsel to the court.[85] When an issue is directed, the court should indicate who are to

(III) INSTRUCTIONS.[87] If, in an action triable by the court either with or without a jury, only certain specific questions of fact are required to be answered by the jury, subject to the power of the court to accept or reject the answers in whole or in part, it is not error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury.[88]

(IV) VERDICT AND FINDINGS. Where a trial by jury is not a constitutional or statutory right, but the court seeks the aid of the jury in the determination of one or more questions of fact, it may adopt the findings of the jury, modify them, or render a decision as though the trial had taken place without a jury.[89] The verdict at most is but evidence for the information of the court,[90] and while the finding of a jury upon controverted questions of fact will have great weight with the court,[91] it is in no wise bound thereby, for the responsibility of determining viding that special issues shall be made up by the parties under the direction of the court, and setting forth briefly and clearly the true questions of fact to be tried, where both parties formulated issues to be submitted to the jury, some of which were immaterial, it was not error for the trial court, in making up the issues, to submit portions of those formulated by each party, omitting those deemed immaterial. Burton v. Farmers' Bldg., etc., Assoc., 104 Tenn. 414, 58 S. W. 230. A proper construction of this statute requires the court to see that proper and material issues are submitted, and such as are determinative of the question involved; and while, on the one hand, the court may not arbitrarily frame these issues without regard to the pleadings, yet it may at the same time, and it is its duty to, so mold them after they are submitted by the parties as to reach the merits of the controversy. Upon the one hand, parties cannot require the court to undertake the task of framing the issues; upon the other, they may not restrain it from so shaping them as in its sound judgment may be necessary to test the material and determinative questions of fact in the case. Burton v. Farmers' Bldg., etc., Assoc., 104 Tenn. 414, 58 S. W. 230.

If the issues are not prepared by counsel, it is the duty of the judge who tries the case to do so. Bowen v. Whitaker, 92 N. C. 367.

No. 31 provide that notice of an application to frame issues must be made within ten days after issue is joined, the court has power to open a default and allow the application to be made after the ten days; but facts must be shown to excuse the neglect to apply within the prescribed time. Analogy to chancery practice.—Findings of a jury upon special issues submitted to them by the court are not to be regarded in the light of a verdict, but should be treated as in chancery practice. Adkins v. Ware, 35 Tex. 577.

Sufficiency of verdict.—A verdict, on exceptions to an auditor's report submitted by the court to a jury, that "we, the jury, sustain the auditor in regard to exceptions 7, 8, 9, 11, and 14," is a compliance with the requirements that the jury shall find on the exceptions seriatim. Cutliff v. Boyd, 72 Ga. 302.

the facts rests upon the trial judge.[92] Where only part of the material issues made by the pleadings are submitted to a jury, the court should, if requested, hear testimony and make findings as to the remaining issues.[93]

2. Reception of Evidence[94] — a. In General. In trials by the court, the same rigid rules as to the admission of evidence should not be enforced as in trials before a jury.[95] In such trials, it is usually the better practice to admit all evidence not clearly inadmissible,[96] even though the court may afterward exclude it,[97] to the end that any difference of opinion between the trial and appellate courts regarding it may not necessitate the delay and expense of a new trial. In recognition of this principle, it is better for the trial court, in cases where the evidence offered is of doubtful competency, to admit the evidence, as the reviewing court could then make a final disposition of the case, whereas, if competent evidence be excluded, it would necessitate remanding the case for a further hearing.[98]

b. Order of Proof — (I) In General. The court trying a cause without a jury has a broad discretion in regard to the order of admitting testimony.[99] It may permit the introduction of additional evidence after the close of the evidence,[1] or after argument,[2] or may permit a witness to be recalled after the trial has been adjourned if an opportunity is given to rebut his testimony.[3]

(II) Reception After Submission of Cause. In trials by the court, it is discretionary with the court to reopen the cause after it has been submitted

The court may receive technically inadmissible evidence not pertinent to the issues to aid it in exercising its discretion. Ferguson v. Stamford, 60 Conn. 432, 22 Atl. 782.

The fact that a deed offered in evidence was not read in evidence does not prevent the court from acting thereon. Webb v. Archibald, (Mo. 1894) 28 S. W. 80.

98. Powell v. Adams, 98 Mo. 598, 12 S. W. 295. While in a trial to the court all evidence clearly incompetent and immaterial should be rejected, a liberal practice should be adopted in admitting evidence, so that the supreme court, in case of an appeal, will on a trial de novo have all material facts before it for consideration, and thus avoid the necessity of remanding the cause for the admission of material evidence erroneously rejected. Degginger v. Martin, 48 Wash. 1, 92 Pac. 674; Hastings v. Anacortes Packing Co., 29 Wash. 224, 69 Pac. 776.

In North Dakota, in trials under section 5630 of the revised codes, where an appeal is taken, all evidence offered must be brought upon the record in the district court, in order that it may furnish the basis for a decision in the appellate court. If, against objection, improper evidence is introduced below, the error can be corrected by excluding such evidence in considering the record. Otto Gas Engine Works v. Knerr, 7 N. D. 195, 73 N. W. 87.

I. 374 (holding that it is no improper exercise of that discretion to permit evidence to be offered which was necessary to plaintiff's case, and which he had prepared, but which he failed to offer in the proper stage of cause, only because he understood that the fact proposed to be proved was admitted by the other party); Wright v. Rambo, 21 Gratt. (Va.) 158.

Illustrations.— The admission in the course of a trial of evidence whose relevancy depends upon facts alleged but not proved is not necessarily erroneous (Gage v. Averill, 57 Mo. App. 111); but, when the relevancy of a transaction is dependent upon the existence of an agency or notice, the safer course is not to receive evidence of it until such agency or notice has been first established (Gage v. Averill, supra). And evidence affecting the competency of a witness should be heard before the witness is examined. Arnold v. Chesebrough, 30 Fed. 145.

to permit the introduction of additional evidence,[4] unless it appears that it subjects one of the parties to surprise or prejudice;[5] and unless the discretion has been harshly exercised, an appellate court will not interfere.[6] But the court cannot thus reopen the case and let in additional testimony without notice to the opposite party,[7] so as to give him an opportunity to meet the new testimony,[8] and to be present and cross-examine witnesses.[9]

c. Effect of Error in Admission of Evidence — (i) In General. In a suit in equity,[10] or in any case tried by the court without a jury,[11] error in the admission of evidence is not a ground for reversal, if there is sufficient legal evidence to

e. Opinion Evidence. When a case is tried to the court, the extent to which expert testimony may be received rests largely in its discretion.[23] But the unsworn statements of an expert are not admissible as evidence, and a finding of facts based thereon cannot be sustained.[24]

f. Objections and Exceptions and Rulings Thereon. In some jurisdictions, particularly in the federal courts, where a cause is tried to the court without a jury, the objection to the admission of evidence is not properly the subject of a bill of exceptions,[25] unless the right to except is reserved.[26] In other jurisdictions the rule is that exceptions not only may be taken to the admission or rejection of evidence;[27] but that to enable the appellant to avail himself of the errors of the trial court in this respect, the bill of exceptions must show that he excepted to the action of the court in admitting or rejecting the evidence at the time.[28] The court may receive evidence subject to objection, and reserve its ruling on such objection.[29] While a party has the right to have his objection passed on before the case is decided, he must specifically demand that this be done,[30] and a mere general objection to the reception of testimony "subject to objection" is not sufficient to preserve the point for review.[31]

3. Rulings on Weight and Sufficiency of Evidence — a. In General. On a trial by the court without a jury, it is the province of the judge to determine

Comparison of handwriting.— When a case is tried before the judge, and the execution of a writing is put in issue under the plea of non est factum, it is the province of the judge, just as it is the province of the jury when the trial is by jury, to examine and compare all papers in evidence bearing upon the issue; and from such comparisons, and from the other evidence before him, to draw his conclusions as to whether the writing is genuine or spurious. the credibility of the witnesses,[32] and the weight to be attached to their testimony,[33] and the appellate court will not disturb or set aside the finding, unless it is apparent that the court misunderstood or disregarded material evidence introduced on the trial.[34] The court is at liberty to discredit any witness or multitude of witnesses,[35] and may disregard any testimony which it deems unworthy of belief,[36] although it is uncontradicted.[37]

time before judgment;[41] but defendant by introducing evidence in his own behalf after the overruling of a demurrer interposed by him to plaintiff's evidence takes the risk of supplying defects in plaintiff's proof.[42] A motion at the close of the evidence that the court find the issues for defendant is in effect a demurrer to the evidence,[43] and raises the question of law whether the evidence tends to show any right of recovery in plaintiff.[44] In considering and deciding a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence in a case tried to the court, the same rule obtains as in cases tried to a jury.[45] The court cannot weigh conflicting evidence, nor regard the case as though submitted by defendant upon plaintiff's showing, but must consider, as true, all portions of the evidence which tend to prove the allegations of the petition.[46]

c. Dismissal or Nonsuit.[47] Under the practice in some states, in the trial of a cause without a jury, it is error to grant a motion for nonsuit.[48] But, as a general rule, the submission of a cause to the court for trial, where the judge acts both as court and jury, does not deprive plaintiff of his right to a nonsuit.[49] In some jurisdictions, the court upon a trial without a jury may grant a nonsuit

In equitable proceedings, strictly speaking, there is no such thing as a motion for a nonsuit. Stevens v. Trafton, 36 Mont. 520, 93 Pac. 810; Streicher v. Murray, 36 Mont. 45, 92 Pac. 36. In a suit in equity the proper practice upon a motion to dismiss at the close of plaintiff's evidence is to make findings and render judgment on the merits; not, as in a suit at law, to enter judgment of compulsory nonsuit. Spuhr v. Kolb, 111 Wis. 119, 86 N. W. 562. A motion to dismiss a bill on the ground that there was no testimony tending to sustain the allegations thereof was, in effect, a motion for nonsuit, which cannot properly be made in an equitable action. 49. Hall v. Schuchardt, 34 Md. 15, holding that care should be taken to so conduct the trial as to afford him the same opportunity of exercising it, as if a jury were sworn.

In Illinois, a party is entitled to take a nonsuit at any time before the entry of the finding. Plaintiff may take a nonsuit after the court has stated its finding but before a minute of record has been made. Howe v. Harroun, 17 Ill. 494; Paepcke-Leicht Lumber Co. v. Berkowsky, 73 Ill. App. 400; Mundhenke v. Mundhenke, 64 Ill. App. 122; Turnock v. Walker, 54 Ill. App. 374. at the close of plaintiff's evidence, on the ground that a fair preponderance of the proof established facts preventing recovery by plaintiff,[50] although there is evidence tending to sustain plaintiff's claim.[51] In others, it is said that the rules as to nonsuit are the same whether the trial is by court or by a jury,[52] and that a nonsuit should not be granted when the evidence is sufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff, whether the trial is by the court or by a jury.[53] Nor can a trial court rightly dismiss the action, without a verdict or findings of fact, on the ground that plaintiff has failed to establish a cause of action, unless the evidence is such that it would not sustain a verdict or finding for plaintiff.[54] But where the court is satisfied, at the close of plaintiff's case in an action tried without a jury, that he cannot recover, it may dismiss the complaint on the merits without hearing the evidence of defendant.[55]

4. Declarations of Law and Decision[56] — a. In General — (i) Declarations of Law — (a) In General. In equity cases, it is not proper practice for courts to give instructions on the law, and a refusal to give requested instructions is not error.[57] But in actions at law, although there is no jury to be charged,

The rule applicable to a trial by jury does not obtain where there is a trial of a law action by the court. In such a trial the court weighs the facts, and determines them by a preponderance of the evidence; and when plaintiff's evidence was all introduced, and defendant offered no evidence, the question for the court to determine was whether, by a preponderance of the evidence, plaintiff was entitled to a judgment. Hayward v. Jackman, 96 Iowa 77, 64 N. W. 667.

51. Lambuth v. Stetson, etc., Mill Co., 14 Wash. 187, 190, 44 Pac. 148, where the court said: "Where the entire trial is before the court which must finally pass upon the law and facts of the case, there is no good reason why it should not be allowed to determine the facts necessary to a proper application of the law at any time during the trial. It would be worse than useless for the court, after its attention had been called to the insufficiency of the evidence offered by plaintiff to establish the facts necessary to enable him to recover, and after being satisfied that such was the nature of the evidence introduced by plaintiff, to require defendant to put in evidence to disprove that which had been already sufficiently disproved."

When the evidence is sufficient to raise a question of fact requiring a decision on the merits, the dismissal of a law action tried to the court on defendant's motion at the close of plaintiff's case is reversible error, since such dismissal is equivalent to a nonsuit. Where an action at law is converted into an equitable proceeding by the answer, it is improper for the trial court to give declarations of law (Freeman v. Wilkerson, 50 Mo. 554); and it is not error in the court below, on the trial of such action, to refuse ina party has the right to demand that the principles of law involved in the case shall be given by the court as distinctly as in instructions to the jury,[58] so as to enable the appellate court to determine the theory of law adopted by the trial court;[59] and if they show that the court adopted the wrong theory and came to a wrong conclusion, the judgment should be reversed.[60] So where requested declarations of law announce correct principles, and are supported by the evidence, their refusal constitutes reversible error,[61] unless they are covered by other declarations given,[62] or unless by exceptions to the rulings of the court during the trial,

In Illinois, under Pr. Act, § 41, it is only where the parties to a cause are entitled to trial by jury, and by agreement have submitted the same to the court for trial without a jury, that the presentation of propositions of law is proper. In Missouri, in the trial of actions at law by the court without a jury, the court may either give or refuse instructions the same as when trying the case before a jury, or pursue the course pointed out by Rev. St. (1889) § 2135, and state its conclusions of fact separately from the conclusions of law, but the court should not pursue both courses, because they are inconsistent. the same questions are preserved for review as would be preserved by the declarations of law.[63] When it appears from the whole record that substantial justice has been done, a judgment will not be reversed because of error in holding or refusing to hold propositions of law.[64] Nor will a judgment be reversed because the court fails to declare the law as fully as it might have done,[65] especially if the declarations given announce correct rules of law applicable to the facts and the evidence justifies the finding.[66] But if the declarations given show that a material issue was not considered, a reversal will be directed.[67]

(B) Form, Requisites, and Sufficiency. In testing the soundness of declarations of law submitted to be held, the same rules of law are to be observed as in the case of instructions asked for the guidance of a jury.[68] They should be framed in like manner as on trial before a jury,[69] should state the law only,[70] should not assume the existence of disputed facts,[71] and should be predicated on a hypothetical statement of the contested facts.[72] Declarations of law, it has been held, are properly refused where they pertain purely to questions of fact;[73] submit, as propositions of law, mixed questions of law and fact;[74] assume facts as to which the evidence is conflicting,[75] or which are inapplicable to the issue,[76] or to the facts in evidence; [77] where they ignore material evidence,[78] comment on the weight and probative force ot the evidence,[79] or ignore the separate functions of court and jury.[80] But it is said that declarations of law are not subject to the rule against generality and abstraction applicable to instructions to juries.[81]

(c) Time For Requesting. Declarations of law should be submitted to the court before argument,[82] or before the cause is submitted to the court,[83] or at least before the decision of the case is announced; [84] and, when seasonably presented, it is reversible error for the court to refuse to consider such propositions.[85] But propositions of law submitted after decisions rendered,[86] or on the hearing of a motion for a new trial,[87] are properly refused.

(d) Withdrawal. It is not error in the trial court to permit a party to withdraw his propositions of law even after the court has announced its findings in the case; [88] and if the adverse party desires to raise the same questions and have them passed upon by the court, he should present them himself.[89]

(ii) DECISION — (a) In General. In cases tried by the court without a jury, whether in equity or at law, there must be a decision of the court.[90] Such decision is usually required to be in writing,[91] signed by the judge,[92] and filed with the clerk,[93] and must direct the entry of judgment thereon.[94] Furthermore, the decision is usually required either to state separately the facts found and the conclusions of law,[95] or to state concisely the grounds upon which the issues have been decided.[96]

(B) Time For Rendition and Filing. In the absence of statutory provision on the subject, the matter of the time when a judge may decide a case submitted to him for decision is as much a matter of judicial discretion and judgment as the matter of how he may decide it.[97] Statutes, however, frequently require that the decision, in case of trial without a jury, shall be rendered and filed within a certain time after the cause is submitted. But such statutes are directory merely,[98]

Compromise judgment.—A judgment simply "for defendant," finding no amount due either party, in an action in which there is a counter-claim of several items, none of which could be set off without leaving some money due one party or the other, is a compromise judgment, which cannot stand. Taking case under advisement.— Unless inhibited by statute, a judge has discretionary power, after hearing the evidence and arguments of counsel in a case tried without a jury, to take the case under advisement until the next term. But when the trial court, at the close of the testimony, sets a day for his decision, a decision for defendant, rendered before such a day, in the absence of plaintiff and without notice to him, constitutes reversible error as it deprives plaintiff of his right to take a nonsuit. (c) Matters to Be Determined. It is error for the trial court to refuse to pass on an issue made by the pleadings, when evidence is offered tending to prove it.[1] Every issue of law or fact raised by the pleadings requires a finding;[2] but the court should not find and decide questions upon which neither side have invoked judicial action,[3] and which are not in issue.[4]

b. Objections and Exceptions. On the trial of a cause by the court without a jury, exceptions lie to the opinion or rulings of the court upon questions of law only.[5] Exceptions must be saved to each specific ruling as it occurs during the Fact not in issue but important to have determined.—Where the insolvency of a corporation is not one of the issues made by the pleadings, but it is important to have the question passed on, a request should be made on the trial before the decision, or by a motion afterward to have the same inserted, or at the settlement, when the opposite party can be present. Heroy v. Kerr, 8 Bosw. (N. Y.) 194, 21 How. Pr. 409 [affirmed in 2 Abb. Dec. 359, 2 Keyes 582]. Where the court refuses to pass on a fact not in issue by the pleadings, but important for a party to the case to have determined, the remedy of the party is by appeal from such denial as from an order on a motion, not by exception to it as to a decision on a trial so as to send the whole case for a new trial. B. Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law[9] — 1. Nature and Purpose. The making of findings of fact and conclusions of law is for the protection of both court and parties,[10] the purpose of such findings and conclusions being to dispose of the issues raised by the pleadings,[11] and to make the case easily reviewable by exhibiting the exact grounds upon which the judgment rests.[12] When made, findings of fact are analogous to, and have the force and effect of, a special verdict,[13] and are so considered when passed upon by a reviewing court.[14]

2. When Authorized or Required[15] — a. Necessity of, in General. It is a common provision in the code and practice acts of the various states that, upon the trial of a case by the court without a jury, the court shall, as a basis of its judgment, state findings of fact and conclusions of law separately and in writing, and a failure to state such findings and conclusions is ground for reversal,[16] provided, in several jurisdictions, that proper requests to find be made by one of the parties,[17] and that exceptions be taken to the failure to find.[18] Although the want of findings renders a judgment subject to vacation or reversal on proper proceedings being taken therefor, it does not make the judgment void[19] or subject to collateral Partial requirement.— Under Ill. Rev. St. (1893) c. 10, § 42, which allows parties to actions at law tried before the court without a jury to submit to the court written propositions to be held as law in the decision of the case, a litigant cannot require the court to make special findings of fact. Lack of time to prepare findings before the close of the term has been held to excuse the making of findings and the refusal to do so is not error (Davis v. State, 75 Tex. 420, 12 S. The rule is limited to mean that it is not sufficient to excuse the making of findings that the evidence would sustain a verdict or finding for defendant, but it must be such as to require, as a matter of law, a verdict or finding against plaintiff. Du Breuille v. Ripley, 106 Minn. 510, 119 N. W. 244; Ness v. March, 95 Minn. 301, 104 N. W. 242; Heim v. Heim, 90 Minn. 497, 97 N. W. 379; Herrick v. Barnes, 78 Minn. 475, 81 N. In Washington the rule that findings are not required on dismissal has been applied to equitable actions (Noyes v. King County, 18 Wash. 417, 51 Pac. 1052. And see Thorne v. Joy, 15 Wash. 83, 45 Pac. 642); but it has been held inapplicable to actions at law tried by the court (Slayton v. Felt, 40 Wash. 1, 82 Pac. 173).

Where one defendant is dismissed from the action, no finding is necessary as to him. Pacific Paving Co. v. Vizelich, 1 Cal. App. 281, 82 Pac. 82.

Where a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence has been sustained, special findings made by the court thereafter are superfluous; but when not antagonistic to the ruling in the demurrer they may be regarded as stating the reasons for upholding it. Darlington v. Cloud County, 75 Kan. 810, 88 Pac. 529.

The court may nevertheless make findings and does not commit reversible error in so doing, unless it departs materially from the facts agreed upon. ment that findings of fact and law be stated is held not applicable to orders not amounting to judgments,[27] or to equitable actions,[28] although, as to the latter, the weight of authority is to the contrary.[29] Under the codes of some states, the right to findings may be waived by the parties,[30] but a waiver will not be presumed;[31] and the court may, of its own motion and without any request by the parties, make written findings.[32]

Recital of findings of fact in decree see Equity, 16 Cyc. 476.

In California the rule which prevailed at one time (Walker v. Sedgwick, 5 Cal. 192) that findings were unnecessary in equity suits was changed by the act of 1861 (Lyons v. Lyons, 18 Cal. 447).

Where a case is tried partly by the court and partly by a jury, the court may adopt the findings of the jury (Hoyt v. Hart, 149 Cal. 722, 87 Pac. 569; Gordon v. Lemp, 7 Ida. 677, 65 Pac. 444; Sylvester v. Guernsey, 22 Wis. 569); and supplement them with findings of its own (Gordon v. Lemp, supra; Drinkwater v. Sauble, 46 Kan. 170, 26 Pac. 433; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Tracy, 77 Hun (N. Y.) 443, 29 N. Y. Suppl. 77 [affirmed in 150 N. Y. 565, 44 N. E. 1126]); but where the case is of a wholly equitable nature, although the court may direct any or all of the questions of fact to be tried by jury, and although the court may adopt or modify the findings of the jury, it is not relieved of the duty of stating findings in writing (Mandeville v. Avery, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 745); and, on the other hand, where an action was tried on the theory that it was solely one at law for damages and the judgment given was one for damages only, the objection that the judgment was based wholly on the verdict and that no findings of fact were made by the court is unavailable (Cushing-Wetmore Co. v. Gray, 152 Cal. 118, 92 Pac. 70, 125 Am. St. Rep. 47). Also where the main issue in a case is one triable by jury and the granting of an injunction is but ancillary to the main issue, it is sufficient if the facts warranting the injunction appear in the decree, without a separate finding being made. Reiner v. Schroeder, 146 Cal. 411, 80 Pac. 517.

30. Castle v. Smith, (Cal. 1894) 36 Pac. 859 (waiver of equitable relief); Shroyer v. Campbell, 31 Ind. App. 83, 67 N. E. 193 (waiver of special findings); Salls v. Barons, 40 Kan. 697, 20 Pac. 485.

Failure to appear at the trial amounts to a waiver under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 634 (Hibernia Sav., etc., Soc. v. Clarke, 110 Cal. 27, 42 Pac. 425; Fincher v. Malcolmson, 96 Cal. 38, 30 Pac. 835); and such a failure to appear exists where defendant, by attorney, appeared specially to move for a continuance of the case, and on the motion being denied withdrew from the trial (Eltzroth v. Ryan, 91 Cal. 584, 27 Pac. 932).

Giving notice of motion for a new trial does not amount to a waiver of findings. Savings, etc., Soc. v. Thorne, 67 Cal. 53, 7 Pac. 36.

31. Bard v. Kleeb, 1 Wash. 370, 25 Pac. 467, 27 Pac. 273. Contra, in California, where it must affirmatively appear that findings were not waived, before their absence in the record constitutes a fatal defect. Richardson v. Eureka, 110 Cal. 441, 42 Pac. 965.

App. 575, 86 S. W. 651, holding that Rev. St. (1895) art. 1331, authorizing appellate courts to deem an issue not submitted and not requested by a party as found by the court applies only to cases submitted on special issues by the court, and does not authorize the lower court to make a finding of its own motion on a plea in reconvention in the nature of a cross action, where the only issues specially submitted relate to the main action, and not to the plea in reconvention.

The court is not limited, in making its findings, to those requested. Pell v. Baur, 16 N. Y. Suppl. 258 [affirmed in 133 N. Y. 377, 31 N. E. 224].

code practice of most states, a request by one of the parties to the case is necessary in order to make it the duty of the court to state specific, rather than general, findings;[33] and it has been held in some cases that it is not a ground for reversal for the court to fail to make any findings of fact, in the absence of a request therefor,[34] and of an exception to the court's refusal or non-compliance with the request.[35] It is also the rule that a party cannot complain of the failure of the court to find on any one particular issue or question in the absence of a request on his part to so find.[36] To be of any avail, a request for a finding must be made by one of the

In California it seems that it is the duty of the court to find upon all the material parties,[37] and should not be in the form of a finding, but should point out the propositions on which a finding is desired,[38] with special particularity in regard to any particular issue or fact on which a finding is sought.[39] Although the practice of presenting unnecessarily numerous requests is condemned by the courts,[40] and although a request need not be accompanied by a statement that it is presented with a view of taking an exception,[41] requests for conclusions of fact and of law should be separated,[42] and a request must be applicable to and supported by the evidence,[43] in the whole and not merely in part.[44] It is also necessary in some jurisdictions that the request be entered on the minutes of the court.[45]

b. Time For Making.[46] Some statutes impliedly, if not expressly, require a issues regardless of any request of the parties. Haight v. Tryon, 112 Cal. 4, 44 Pac. 318; Davies v. Angelo, 8 Cal. App. 305, 96 Pac. 909.

In New York, although it has been asserted that it is the duty of plaintiff, not only to prove his cause of action, but to procure findings by the court which will sustain the judgment rendered in his favor (Triest v. New York, 193 N. Y. 525, 86 N. E. 549 [reversing 126 N. Y. App. Div. 934, 110 N. Y. Suppl. 1148 (affirming 55 Misc. 459, 105 N. Y. Suppl. 571)), it has been held that defendant must make requests in order to be in a position to have the findings reviewed on the ground that they are against the weight of evidence (Crouch v. Moll, 3 Silv. Sup. 601, 8 N. Y. Suppl. 183), and that an omission to find facts claimed by the unsuccessful party to be warranted by the evidence can only be taken advantage of, by the making of a request to so find and the taking of an exception to the refusal of the court to grant the request, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 992, 993, 1023 (Ostrander v. Hart, 130 N. Y. 406, 29 N. E. 744 [affirming 8 N. Y. Suppl. 809]; Lyons v. Cahill, 55 N. Y. Super. Ct. 553).

37. Jones v. Hall, 9 Ind. App. 458, 35 N. E. 923, 37 N. E. 25.

38. Edgar v. Stevenson, 70 Cal. 286, 11 Pac. 704; Miller v. Steen, 30 Cal. 402, 89 Am. Dec. 124. But see Quinlan v. Calvert, 31 Mont. 115, 77 Pac. 428, where the court stated that it would make findings of fact and gave defendant ten days "to submit in writing his findings," and it was held that, under such circumstances, the submission of written findings by defendant had the effect of requesting findings in writing.

Under the Connecticut statutes, requests for a finding and for the incorporation of facts in a finding must be so framed as to be distinguishable (Beckwith v. Ryan, 66 Conn. 589, 34 Atl. 488; Schlegal v. Allerton, 65 Conn. 260, 32 Atl. 363); but it is competent for the court to waive any informality in the requests (Scholfield Gear, etc., Co. v. Scholfield, 70 Conn. 500, 40 Atl. 182).

39. Waterson v. Kirkwood, 17 Kan. 9; Wrigglesworth v. Wrigglesworth, 45 Wis. 255.

Implied request.— It has been held, in an action for damages caused by the construction of an elevated railroad, that while defendant did not ask the trial court to find from the evidence that there were any benefits to the premises, yet a claim in the request to find that allowances should be made for benefits in the estimate of damages implies that on the evidence benefits were apparent. request for findings to be made before a final submission of the case;[47] and, although no time limit is prescribed by statute, a request, to be entitled to compliance, must be made a reasonable time[48] before judgment,[49] it being the rule in one jurisdiction that it must be made before trial and that, when made afterward, the court may, in its discretion, recognize or ignore it.[50]

W. 472, holding that, although a finding for plaintiff is not requested until after the court has announced its finding for defendant, the court may properly make and file such requested finding on the same day.

That it is so required by court rule in Michigan see Stafford v. Crawford, 118 Mich. 285, 76 N. W. 496; Brown v. Haak, 48 Mich. 229, 12 N. W. 219.

The discretion is properly exercised by refusing to grant a request to state special findings made after the court has begun to render judgment and state its general findings (Turpie v. Lowe, 158 Ind. 47, 62 N. E. 628; Moore v. Barnett, 17 Ind. 349; Miller v. Lively, 1 Ind. App. 6, 27 N. E. 437), or after such general findings have been filed (Brundage v. Deschler, 131 Ind. 174, 29 N. E. 921). Neither does the judge abuse his discretion in refusing plaintiff's request for a special finding made the day set for entering a finding, although defendants had made a request for special findings and later withdrawn it. Suppl. 613] (holding that, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1022, 1023, the court is only required to note in the margin the manner of disposing of each proposition, and to file or return the statement to the attorney presenting it, and is not required to incorporate in its decision requested findings so far as they are granted); Goetting v. Biehler, 33 Hun (N. Y.) 500 (holding that Code Civ. Proc. § 1023, gives no right to refuse to pass on requests on the ground that they are unnecessary). However, N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1023, requiring the court to note on the margin of requests the manner in which they have been disposed of was repealed by Laws (1894), c. 688, p. 1719 (Mutual Milk, etc., Co. v. Tietjen, 89 N. Y. Suppl. 391), but was subsequently restored (Bremer v. Manhattan R. Co., supra).

The writing of the word "proven" on requests to find has the same effect as if the matter stated in such requests were incorporated in the findings made. Arthur v. Norfield Parish Cong. Church Soc., 73 Conn. 718, 49 Atl. 241.

The word "refused," when written on the margin of requested findings, means nothing more than a refusal to make the findings (Helena v. Hale, 38 Mont. 481, 100 Pac. 611), and is not equivalent to a finding to the contrary (Lawrenceville Cement Co. v. Parker, 15 N. Y. Suppl. 577, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 263 [affirmed in 133 N. Y. 622, 30 N. E. 1150]).

The Pennsylvania equity rule, providing that a judge sitting as a chancellor may adopt or affirm requested findings, or any of them, or state his findings of fact or of law in his own language, applies to each request and makes it the duty of the judge to make a separate and distinct answer to each request. are liberally construed, and a failure to respond to each specific request is not assignable as error where the parties are not prejudiced thereby,[52] or the ruling on such requests otherwise appears of record.[53] Although the court, after consenting or refusing to give requested findings, is at liberty to change its mind before the decision of the case,[54] where the court fails to pass on requests at or before the decision, it is not sufficient to do so on the settlement of the case,[55] or on overruling a motion for a new trial.[56]

4. Preparation, Form, and Filing — a. In General. Findings of fact and conclusions of law are required to be in writing,[57] signed by the judge,[58] and to be in such form as to be distinguishable from an opinion, as an opinion will not Kingston Coal Co., 203 Pa. St. 509, 53 Atl. 348. If the judge feels that, in the findings "in his own language," he has answered a request, he should say so by indicating in connection with the request itself what he regards as his answer to be found in his own independent findings. Hoyt v. Kingston Coal Co., supra. However, on the trial of a quo warranto suit by the court without a jury, under the provision of the act of April 22, 1874, no further answers to requests for findings of fact are required than the statement of facts found by the court. Withdrawal of request.—As such statutory requirements are for the benefit of the party presenting requests, the rights conferred by them may be waived by the party withdrawing his requests with the consent of the court and before the latter has passed upon them. Smith v. Mayfield, 163 Ill. 447, 45 N. E. 157 [affirming 60 Ill. App. 266]; Highway Com'rs v. Kline, 96 Ill. App. 318.

53. Vestal v. Young, 147 Cal. 715, 82 Pac. 381; Atwater v. Morning News Co., 67 Conn. 504, 34 Atl. 865; Schuler v. Eckert, 90 Mich. 165, 51 N. W. 198, holding it not to be error in the court to refuse to find on questions of fact, where some of them presented immaterial issues and the others were sufficiently answered in the general findings.

General refusal.—Where several requests to find are refused, it is not error to refuse to mark the refusal on each request separately (Lawrenceville Cement Co. v. Parker, 15 N. Y. Suppl. 577, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 263 [affirmed in 133 N. Y. 622, 30 N. Co., 61 N. Y. Super. Ct. 312, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 703 [affirmed in 141 N. Y. 281, 56 N. E. 400]; Uhlenhaut v. Manhattan R. Co., 60 N. Y. Super. Ct. 501, 18 N. Y. Suppl. 797).

The requirement is satisfied by a reduction of the findings to writing after rendition of judgment (Nathan v. Sloan, 34 Ark. 524; Randolph v. Campbell, (Kan. App. 1897) 47 Pac. 560; S. C. Forsaith Mach. Co. v. Hope Mills Lumber Co., 109 N. C. 576, 13 S. E. 869), as well as having an announcement of findings in open court entered on the record (Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Hamilton County, 79 Fed. 575, 25 C. C. Necessity of motion for new trial to prevent objection that findings are not supported by evidence see NEW TRIAL, 29 Cyc. 748, 756.

Incompetent or rejected evidence.—Although a party should object to the admission of evidence if he does not wish a finding based thereon (McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 154, 64 Pac. 278; Boyd v. Miller, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 165, 54 S. W. 411), it is not error for the court to refuse to make findings which would have to derive their support from incompetent evidence (Peoria, etc., R. Co. v. Attica, etc., R. Co., 154 Ind. 218, 56 N. E. 210; Ullman v. Jacobs, 86 Hun (N. Y.) 186, 33 N. Y. Suppl. 248), especially when such evidence has been admitted over objection (Martin v. Minnekahta State Bank, 7 S. D. 263, 64 N. W. 127. But see Leman v. Borden, 83 Tex. 620, 19 S. W. 160). It is error for the court to base a finding on excluded evidence (Thompson v. Johnson, 92 Tex. 358, 51 S. W. 23 [reversing (Civ. App. 1898) 50 S. W. 1055]) or on a deposition which was objected to when offered, and with respect to which objection the court did not decide at the time but reserved its ruling, as no opportunity to offer rebutting testimony is given (Tripp v. Duane, (Cal. 1887) 13 Pac. 860).

Findings based on observation.—A judgment cannot be sustained where the findings appear to be based in part on facts discovered by the judge on inspection of the premises (Stanford v. Felt, 71 Cal. 249, 16 Pac. 900); nor, in an election contest where the only evidence offered as to the age of a voter was that he was past twenty-one, has the judge a right to disregard the testimony and decide the issue on information gained by some other method, whether by observation or otherwise (Bigham v. Clubb, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 312, 95 S. W. 675).

Findings based on estimate of counsel.— In an action at law by a state for the value of rock removed from the bed of creeks belonging to the state, it is error for the judge, in reaching a conclusion as to the quality of rock removed, to average the estimates of counsel on the ground that the testimony submitted was so unintelligible and confused that a true estimate could not be made therefrom. Findings on immaterial matters.— If there are findings which support the judgment, and these findings are supported by the evidence, it is immaterial that there are other findings which the evidence does not support. McKibbin v. McKibbin, 139 Cal. 448, 73 Pac. 143;

(II) FACTS SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE. It is essential to the sufficiency of findings of fact that they be sustained by the evidence;[92] but where, as a matter of law, there is any competent evidence in their favor, the reviewing courts of most jurisdictions will not review or disturb them on the ground of insufficiency of evidence;[93] nor, even though there is a total insufficiency of evidence to support some of the findings, will they reverse, where the error is not prejudicial.[94] Where Necessity of motion for new trial to prevent objection that findings are not supported by evidence see NEW TRIAL, 29 Cyc. 748, 756.

Incompetent or rejected evidence.—Although a party should object to the admission of evidence if he does not wish a finding based thereon (McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 154, 64 Pac. 278; Boyd v. Miller, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 165, 54 S. W. 411), it is not error for the court to refuse to make findings which would have to derive their support from incompetent evidence (Peoria, etc., R. Co. v. Attica, etc., R. Co., 154 Ind. 218, 56 N. E. 210; Ullman v. Jacobs, 86 Hun (N. Y.) 186, 33 N. Y. Suppl. 248), especially when such evidence has been admitted over objection (Martin v. Minnekahta State Bank, 7 S. D. 263, 64 N. W. 127. But see Leman v. Borden, 83 Tex. 620, 19 S. W. 160). It is error for the court to base a finding on excluded evidence (Thompson v. Johnson, 92 Tex. 358, 51 S. W. 23 [reversing (Civ. App. 1898) 50 S. W. 1055]) or on a deposition which was objected to when offered, and with respect to which objection the court did not decide at the time but reserved its ruling, as no opportunity to offer rebutting testimony is given (Tripp v. Duane, (Cal. 1887) 13 Pac. 860).

Findings based on observation.—A judgment cannot be sustained where the findings appear to be based in part on facts discovered by the judge on inspection of the premises (Stanford v. Felt, 71 Cal. 249, 16 Pac. 900); nor, in an election contest where the only evidence offered as to the age of a voter was that he was past twenty-one, has the judge a right to disregard the testimony and decide the issue on information gained by some other method, whether by observation or otherwise (Bigham v. Clubb, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 312, 95 S. W. 675).

Findings based on estimate of counsel.— In an action at law by a state for the value of rock removed from the bed of creeks belonging to the state, it is error for the judge, in reaching a conclusion as to the quality of rock removed, to average the estimates of counsel on the ground that the testimony submitted was so unintelligible and confused that a true estimate could not be made therefrom. Findings on immaterial matters.— If there are findings which support the judgment, and these findings are supported by the evidence, it is immaterial that there are other findings which the evidence does not support. McKibbin v. McKibbin, 139 Cal. 448, 73 Pac. 143;

there is no testimony supporting a defense, a finding against defendant on that issue is proper;[95] and where the evidence is conflicting and unsatisfactory as to a certain fact, the refusal of the court to find the existence of that fact is not error.[96]

(III) MATERIAL AND IMMATERIAL ISSUES — (A) In General. It is essential to the sufficiency of findings of fact that they be responsive to and cover all the material issues of the case,[97] or at least sufficient of the issues raised by the plead-

Evidence sufficient to sustain any one of several counts supports a general finding for plaintiff where there are several counts for the same cause of action. Pelton v. Nichols, 180 Mass. 245, 62 N. E. 1. Likewise, where a general finding that all the allegations of the complaint are untrue is justified by the evidence as to one allegation, which, alone and independently of the others, would justify the conclusion of law in favor of defendant, the fact that the finding as to some other allegation is unsupported by the evidence is error without prejudice. New York Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Crays, 76 Minn. 450, 79 N. W. 531.

Where a finding of waiver of demand is warranted by the evidence, but not a finding that demand has been made, the making of the latter finding is harmless error. Stanford v. Coram, 26 Mont. 285, 67 Pac. 1005.

Facts pertinent to issue.— In making a special finding, where there is any evidence on a point pertinent to an issue in the cause, the court is required to find either the existence or non-existence of the fact. Gulick v. Connely, 42 Ind. 134. Also where there is found by the trior to be a probability so strong as to induce a reasonable belief in an impartial mind, as to the existence of a fact material to the issue, the parties are entitled to a finding of the existence of such fact. Hoyt v. Danbury, 69 Conn. 341, 37 Atl. 1051.

Finding on bar of action by limitation.— Where the statute of limitations is pleaded, failure to find on such issue is ground for reversal of the judgment (Porteous v. Reed, (Cal. 1886) 12 Pac. 117), except where the admitted facts establish the conclusion that the statute of limitations has not run against ings to sustain the judgment;[98] but where they do embrace all such issues, their sufficiency is not affected by an omission to find on immaterial issues,[99] or on matters not made issues by the pleadings,[1] or on matters made issues by the pleadings but not by the evidence,[2] nor is it affected by findings on immaterial points or issues or on issues outside the pleadings, even though erroneous, as such find-the claim (Bell v. Adams, 150 Cal. 772, 90 Pac. 118). However, a finding that the action was not barred by the statute is sufficient to support a judgment for plaintiff, although the date on which plaintiff demanded the money in question of defendant is not found. Matters improperly in pleadings.— It is not the duty of the court to make findings upon the matters which, although controverted in the pleadings, are foreign to the issue between the parties, and which, upon motion, would have been stricken out of the pleadings as irrelevant and redundant. Waiver of cause of action.— It is proper for the findings to show that plaintiff at the trial waived one of the alleged causes of action. Wm. Barie Dry Goods Co. v. Casler, 138 Mich. 172, 101 N. W. 215.

Where no reply is necessary under a code provision that the statement of any new matter in the answer is deemed controverted by plaintiff, whether facts establish an affirmative defense pleaded in the answer is an issue raised by the law on the answer, and a finding of such facts is within the issues (Peck v. Noes, 154 Cal. 351, 97 Pac. 865; Craigo v. Craigo, 22 S. D. 417, 118 N. W. 712), and must be made (Lyon v. Plankinton Bank, 15 S. D. 400, 89 N. W. 1017). Thus where a finding is verbatim the same as new matter alleged in the answer, it is not outside the issues. Snyder v. Emerson, 19 Utah 319, 57 Pac. 300.

Answer and cross complaint.—A judgment rendered upon a finding of the truth of the allegations of a cross complaint, without any findings on the issues raised by the answer to the original complaint in the action, will not be sustained, when the allegations of the cross complaint do not cover the issues thus raised. Demick v. Cuddihy, 72 Cal. 110, 12 Pac. 287, 13 Pac. 166.

Separate defense covered by general issue.—Where an alleged separate defense simply sets up matters contained in a general issue of ownership framed on the other pleadings, a failure to make specific findings thereon is not error. Black v. Black, 74 Cal. 520, 16 Pac. 311.

Waiver by decision on motion.—Where the trial court properly found, on motion to set aside a stipulation for judgment filed on behalf of a defendant, that the attorneys filing the stipulation had authority from him and that the stipulation was binding, it was not necessary to make findings on issues raised by pleadings filed by him. Pacific Paving Co. v. Vizelich, 2 Cal. App. 515, 83 Pac. 459. It is also held that on a motion for judgment based on a confession of the allegations of a counter-claim, the court need not find facts which are not a part of the counter-claim. Daggs v. Phœnix Nat. Bank, 177 U. S. 549, 20 S. Ct. 732, 44 L. ed. 882 [affirming 5 Ariz. 409, 53 Pac. 201].

appear to be material become immaterial and require no findings, where a finding on another issue is determinative of the case,[13] an application of this principle being the lack of necessity of finding on all the defenses, where a finding on one issue necessarily determines the case against plaintiff.[14]

(IV) MATTERS ADMITTED OR NOT DENIED. The court is justified in finding facts as they are admitted in the pleadings;[15] but it is not necessary for it to make findings as to matters admitted or not denied in the pleadings,[16] or otherwise agreed upon,[17] and findings made which are inconsistent with those admitted or agreed will be disregarded or set aside,[18] unless judgment is based thereon, in which event a reversal must be had.[19]

b. Manner of Finding — (I) IN GENERAL. In making up its findings of fact the court should be governed by the code or statutory provision under which it is proceeding,[20] and not attempt to find expressly on the issues, but rather to make a complete finding of all the ultimate[21] and constitutive facts within the issues,[22]

When consistent.—A finding that the property traded by defendant to plaintiff would have been worth thirty thousand dollars if his representations had been true is not inconsistent with the admission of the answer that it would have been worth forty-eight thousand dollars if the representations alleged in the complaint had been true; one of these, that its market value was forty-eight thousand dollars, not being found to have been made, and, if made, not being a representation of fact. Barbour v. Flick, 126 Cal. 628, 59 Pac. 122. It has also been held that a finding that all the allegations of the complaint are true except as to damages, that all the allegations of the answer are untrue, that all the allegations of the cross complaint are untrue, and that all the allegations of the answer to the cross complaint are true, is not against the pleadings and evidence, merely because plaintiff admitted some of the allegations of defendant's answer on uncontroverted matters. As that is certain which can be made certain, a reference in a finding to a specified number of inches of water is not indefinite, as it is to be construed according to the customary kind of water measurement in that locality. Collins v. Gray, 3 Cal. App. 723, 86 Pac. 983. Also a finding "that the law of said states is the same as the law of this state" is a sufficient finding as to the law of other states. Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 280, 24 Pac. 743.

Recurrence of same subject-matter in finding.—Where the finding of the court gives the words of an assignment, which has been previously decided to be "by its very terms, fraudulent in law and in fact," the invalidity of the assignment will afterward be taken sufficiently to appear, when its terms appear, without stating it to be the same assignment previously decided upon. Keep v. Sanderson, 12 Wis. 352.

Brevity and conciseness are not valid objections to findings, where elaboration would not have made them more clear. Krauskopf v. Pennypack Yarn Finishing Co., 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 506.

Findings held sufficiently definite and certain.—A finding that at the time of the alleged contract "plaintiff's mind was in an abnormal condition, superinduced by drunkenness" is sufficient to show that he was then mentally incapable of making a contract (Franks v. Jones, 39 Kan. 236, 17 Pac. 663); and, in an action for the possession of land, with damages for its detention, a statement in the judgment, following the general statement of facts, that "the rental value of said land was $40 or $50" is a sufficient finding of such rental value (Gibson v. Barbour, 100 N. C. 192, 6 S. E. 766). A finding is not rendered indefinite and uncertain by its employment of the term "continuing contract" (In re Myer, 14 N. M. 45, 89 Pac. 246); nor by its reference to the only two deeds in evidence as the "short deed" and "long deed," where the findings, evidence, and decree clearly show what property was described in the one known as the "short deed," and that the other one, called the long deed, contained a description of the residue of the property in controversy (Boyd v. Slayback, (Cal. 1884) 5 Pac. 161); and, similarly, where it is alleged that defendant released the "mare named 'Mollie' and the mare named 'Pat,'" the property is sufficiently described by the finding that "those two certain horses named 'Molly' and 'Pat' were released" (Troxler v. Buckner, 126 Cal. 288, 58 Pac. 691). For other illustrations of findings held sufficiently definite and certain see Hick v. Thomas, 90 Cal. 289, 27 Pac. 208, 376; In re Abbott, 74 Cal. 381, 16 Pac. 21; Taylor v. Bulmetto, 18 N. Y. Contradictory counts.—Where plaintiff cannot recover on both counts in his declaration because they are contradictory, so that success upon one count would involve a defeat on the other, the facts found must, to warrant a recovery, sustain one or the other of the counts without any support from the other, and must be such as to enable the court clearly to determine which count the findings supported. Capen v. Stevens, 29 Mich. 496.

Only one cause of action.—Where a single cause of action is made the subject of two or more counts for the purpose of meeting different phases of proof, a single finding on all of the counts is sufficient. Sain v. Rooney, 125 Mo. App. 176, 101 S. W. 1127; Hess v. Gansz, 90 Mo. App. 443; Hazell v. Clark, 89 Mo. App. 78.

Consolidation of actions.—Where a number of proceedings to enforce mechanics' liens against the same property are consolidated, all facts in issue may be embodied in a single set of findings and there is no impropriety in making a finding that all of the land on which the building was situated was necessary for its convenient use and occupation, although some of the complaints contain no allegation upon this issue. Union Lumber Co. v. Simon, 150 Cal. 751, 89 Pac. 1077, 1081.

Separate findings as to different parties.—The court cannot be required to make separate findings of fact as to each separate plaintiff or defendant or group of plaintiffs or defendants. Turpie v. Lowe, 158 Ind. 47, 62 N. E. 628.

30. Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 95 Pac. 154, 159 (holding that where the ultimate question was how much a party had expended in purchasing land, and the court found on sufficient evidence the amount expended, an error in a finding as to the price per acre is immaterial); Field v. Burr, 129 Cal. 44, 61 Pac. 665 (use of word "plaintiff" for "intervener"); Doolan v. Cunningham, (Cal. 1884) 4 Pac. 1193 (designation of defendants in singular instead of plural); Boies v. Vincent, 24 Iowa 387 (finding that there was a sale, instead of an executory agreement to sell and deliver); Sherrid v. Southwick, 43 Mich. 515, 5 N. W. 1027; James v. Turner, 78 Tex. 241, 14 S. W. 574 (reference to the instrument made the basis of the action as a note instead of a contract); Moore v. Lee, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 127, 83 S. W. 420.

Indiana.— Mount v. Montgomery County, 168 Ind. 661, 80 N. E. 629, 14 L. R. A. N. Massachusetts.— Kendrick v. Kendrick, 188 Mass. 550, 75 N. E. 151, 74 N. E. 598 (holding that a finding that a woman named "Bethiah," against whom a judgment of divorce was rendered under the name of "Bertha," "was addressed as Bertha by her husband, and that she was known by that name to some extent, although it did not appear that she was so known outside the family," was a finding that she was known by both names); Glidden v. Nason, 186 Mass. 140, 71 N. E. 304.

Michigan.— Tower v. Detroit, etc., R. Co., 34 Mich. 328, holding that a finding that the condition of the contract in suit was performed "as the parties should be understood to have intended," and that the condition "ought to be held performed" is equivalent to a finding that it was performed according to the intent of the parties, or according to its legal effect.

Findings held not equivalent.—A finding that a certain clearing-house rule had not been established by a universal, uniform, and general custom is not a finding that no such custom existed as a fact. Atlas Nat. Bank v. National Exch. Bank, 178 Mass. 531, 60 N. E. 121. In an action to recover an assessment for grading a street, a finding upon the fact of dedication does not arise out of findings that the supervisors "had no authority or jurisdiction" to order the work done; that the superintendent of highways, etc., "did not legally make, sign, or issue any assessments" therefor; that the land was not "lawfully assessed" for any sum. Spaulding v. Wesson, 84 Cal. 141, 24 Pac. 377. Neither is a statement in one of the conclusions of fact, that the sum paid for a stock of goods "was an inadequate consideration" equivalent to a finding that the sale was fraudulent (State v. Purcell, 131 Mo. 312, 33 S. W. 13); nor is a finding that a note and mortgage purport to be executed in the name of the principal by her attorney in fact, who in executing them assumed to be authorized, equivalent to a finding that such attorney in fact was authorized to execute the note and mortgage (Hibernia Sav., etc., Soc. v. Moore, 68 Cal. 156, 8 Pac. 824).

Under statutes requiring special findings upon request, it is error for the court to deny a request and make only general findings. Ross v. Miner, 64 Mich. 204, 31 N. W. 185.

it,[38] as it will be deemed to cover all special matters necessary to support the judgment.[37] As has been shown, under the statutes of most jurisdictions, special findings need not be made unless requested,[38] and in one jurisdiction there is no authority for making them, in the absence of a request. When so made, they will be treated as a general finding,[39] as will also alleged special findings which are not signed by the judge,[40] or are not followed by conclusions of law.[41] Although frequently done, the making of both general and special findings in the same case is irregular,[42] and when the general finding is first made, it is not superseded by the later special finding;[43] but when made at the same time, special

Where a special finding has been requested and made, a general finding will be disregarded. Stephenson v. Boody, 139 Ind. 60, 38 N. E. 331. However, where a special finding is preceded by what appears to be a general finding, which forms part of the same entry as that in which the special finding is incorporated, it will not be regarded as an independent general finding, but as a mere findings will control the general finding, in the event of inconsistency.[44] In construing a special finding, a reviewing court will not supply facts by intendment.[45]

(III) Conclusions of Law or Findings of Fact.[46] The conclusions of law necessary to be stated are the conclusions which, under the facts found, are required by the law,[47] and while correct practice requires that conclusions be stated on every issue of fact formed by the pleadings and tried by the court,[48] it is not necessary that this be done or that they be in any particular form, a general conclusion that plaintiff or defendant recover or have judgment being held sufficient.[49] The conclusions must be based upon and sustained by the preface to the special finding. Clark v. Deutsch, 101 Ind. 491.

Error cannot be predicated on the insufficiency of special findings, unnecessarily made in addition to the general finding (Moody v. Arthur, 16 Kan. 419; Meath v. Mississippi Levee Com'rs, 109 U. S. 268, 3 S. Ct. 284, 27 L. ed. 930), as such special findings may be treated as surplusage (Damon v. Quinn, 143 Cal. 75, 76 Pac. 818).

But see Smith v. Smith, 75 Kan. 847, 89 Pac. 896, holding that special findings made by the court, stating that certain allegations of plaintiff's petition are not sustained by the evidence, do not warrant a reversal of the judgment for plaintiff, where there are allegations of fraud in plaintiff's petition, not negatived by the special findings which are found to be true.

Findings held sufficiently specific.—Where defendant pleads that the action is barred by certain specified sections of the code of civil procedure, a finding that plaintiff, at the time of commencing the action, was under the age of twenty-three years, and that his cause of action is not barred by either of the sections pleaded is sufficiently specific. Ybarra v. Sylvany, (Cal. 1893) 31 Pac. 1114. Also a finding in condemnation proceedings "that all the facts alleged in the complaint are true, except as to those hereinafter otherwise specified, and as to those allegations the court finds as follows," the court then finding specifically as to certain facts, does not mean that all the facts so excepted are necessarily untrue, but that they are as found specially. Conclusion defined see Conclusion, 8 Cyc. 551.

Where facts stated admit of but one conclusion, the deduction therefrom is a conclusion of law, and not an ultimate fact (De Pauw Plate Glass Co. v. Alexandria, 152 Ind. 443, 52 N. E. 608), but where such conclusion necessarily follows, it is not error to fail to state in express terms a "conclusion of law" (Miller v. Hicken, 92 Cal. 229, 28 Pac. 339).

Proper and improper conclusions.—Where findings of fact showed that plaintiffs had contracted to build a church for defendant, and that there was due on said contract, and for extra work, a certain sum, together with attorney's fees, less certain payments and deductions which were found for defendant, conclusions of law correctly stating the aggregate of such amounts, as the amount plaintiff was entitled to recover and defendant was to be credited with, were proper (Bird v. St. John's Episcopal Church, 154 Ind. 138, 56 N. E. 129); and where, in proceedings to establish a claim against the estate of a decedent for labor performed under a special contract, the controversy depended on whether the contract had been made, and the court found the existence of a contract between claimant and a corporation of which decedent was president, and for which he had acted in making the contract, but did not find that the contract sued on was made, the conclusion rejecting the claim was proper (Light v. Schneck, (Ind. App. 1908) 86 N. E. 442). On the other hand it is improper to find, as a conclusion of law, a matter of fact, such as payment (Braden v. Lemmon, 127 Ind. 9, 26 N. E. 476), or negligence (Texas Midland R. Co. v. Johnson, (Tex. Civ. App. 1901) 65 S. W. 388).

Finding of bar of action as fact.— It is proper to find as a fact, and not as a conclusion of law, that the interest of the assignee of a recorded mortgage in the mortgaged premises is barred by the statute of limitations (Spaulding v. Howard, 121 Cal. 194, 53 Pac. 563), and a finding that the action is barred by the statute will be treated as one of an ultimate fact, although contained in or stating conclusions of law (Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 19, 77 Pac. 712; Luco v. Toro, (Cal. 1888) 18 Pac. 866).

Ownership is regarded as a question of ultimate fact in one jurisdiction (Curtis v. Boquillas Land, etc., Co., 9 Ariz. 62, 76 Pac. 612, 8 Ariz. 258, 71 Pac. 924 [affirmed in 200 U. S. 96, 26 S. Ct. 192, 50 L. ed. 388]), while, in another jurisdiction, it may be found either as an ultimate fact or as a conclusion of law (Savings, etc., Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 922; Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 273, 12 Pac. 161; Gardner v. San Gabriel Valley Bank, 7 Cal. App. 106, 93 Pac. 900), and the question as to which it is in a particular case depends on the issues tried (Gardner v. San Gabriel Valley Bank, supra). A finding that a certain conveyance passed title will be construed to be a conclusion of law (Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 273, 12 Pac. 161), as will also a finding that a certain party was the owner of property, when it follows findings showing the details of the transactions claimed to have made him owner (Insurance Co. of North America v. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co., 97 Tenn. 326, 37 S. W. 225), and a finding that the title to lots of which defendants were in possession passed to innocent purchasers at a sheriff's sale in a proceeding to which defendants were not parties (Lowe v. Turpie, 147 Ind. 652, 44 N. E. 25, 47 N. E. 150, 37 L. R. A. 233); but a finding that plaintiff is the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the described parcel of land is a finding of an ultimate fact (Ybarra v. Sylvany, (Cal. 1893) 31 Pac. 1114).

quently happens that a statement of fact cannot be made without including a conclusion, and as often a conclusion, although one of law, must be stated in the form of a statement of fact.[54] The insertion in a conclusion of law of a statement which is only surplusage does not constitute reversible error.[55]

(IV) ULTIMATE OR EVIDENTIARY FACTS. The setting out of matters of evidence and subordinate facts in the findings is neither necessary,[56] nor proper,[57] as a finding of ultimate facts necessarily includes all the probative facts, together with the inferences therefrom,[58] and it is the province and duty of the court to state ultimate, rather than evidentiary or probative, facts in its findings.[59]

A finding of mental competency necessarily involves the inference that the person named was not entirely without understanding (Ripperdan v. Weldy, 149 Cal. 667, 87 Pac. 276); and need not be accompanied by a finding as to the donor's physical condition or other facts stated in the complaint as inducement to the ultimate facts (Wheelock v. Godfrey, (Cal. 1893) 35 Pac. 320).

A finding of the execution of a conveyance necessarily includes a finding of every fact essential to such conveyance. Thus, a finding that an assignment for benefit of creditors was made necessarily means a valid assignment, acknowledged in accordance with the statute. Benner v. Kilpatrick, 54 N. Y. Super. Ct. 532.

Identity of evidentiary and inferential facts.— Where the evidentiary fact and the inferential fact are one and the same thing, although the evidentiary fact is itself the evidence, it is more than that, and not only may, but must be stated in the findings. Thus, in an action to recover land by one claiming as grantee of the heirs of a former owner, against the latter's son, to whom such former owner had orally agreed to convey it, a special finding that the son was indebted, and that the father retained the title to the land to prevent the son's creditors from seizing it does not show fraud (Wilson v. Campbell, 119 Ind. 286, 21 N. E. 893); nor does a finding that, before plaintiff accepted defendant's proposition for a settlement in full, for services rendered by plaintiff pursuant to a contract, defendant

It follows that a statement of evidentiary facts alone is insufficient,[60] unless they are of such a nature and are so stated that the ultimate facts necessarily result therefrom.[61] However, where the ultimate facts are properly found and stated, an additional statement of evidentiary facts is not cause for reversal,[62] as such statement will be deemed surplusage and disregarded,[63] especially in case of any inconsistency between it and the ultimate facts found.[64]

(v) Reference to Pleadings and Evidence. In making up its findings, it is competent for the court to merely refer to exhibits or documents given in evidence [65] or to the pleadings, provided the reference is sufficiently distinct

Inadequate reference.—A finding "that the evidence does not show that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief prayed for in his bill, to wit, to an account," followed by a decree to make it intelligible and the facts are sufficiently stated in the pleadings;[66] but the practice is regarded unfavorably by reviewing courts, as it imposes additional labor on them,[67] and is not permitted in some jurisdictions.[68] Portions or paragraphs of a pleading may be thus referred to,[69] and the most common application of the rule is, where there is a general finding that all the facts or allegations contained in the complaint are true and such finding is held to be sufficient,[70] dismissing the bill with costs, is not a sufficient finding of fact (Fitzsimmons v. Robb, 173 Pa. St. 645, 34 Atl. 233); nor is a finding which is uncertain in its reference to the evidence (Lang v. Specht, 62 Cal. 145).

Reference to an answer is permissible (Davis v. Drew, 58 Cal. 152); and a finding is sufficient when it states that the allegations of defendant's answer or affirmative defense are true (Wilkinson v. Bethel, 13 Ida. 746, 93 Pac. 27) or untrue (McLennan v. Wilcox, 126 Cal. 51, 58 Pac. 305; Paden v. Goldbaum, (Cal. 1894) 37 Pac. 759), or when it employs similar terms (Brown v. Roberts, 90 Minn. 314, 96 S. W. 793; Catlin v. Henton, 9 Wis. 476). Thus a finding "that the matters and facts alleged in defendant's special defense and cross complaint, on file herein, except the allegations of plaintiff's employment and agreements under such employment, are untrue in substance and in fact" supports a judgment for plaintiff. Heintz v. Cooper, (Cal. 1896) 47 Pac. 360. On the other hand, findings are insufficient when their reference to the answer creates uncertainty. Uncertainty is created, within the meaning of this rule, by a general finding that all the material denials and averments of the answer are true, and that all material averments of the amended complaint in intervention are true (Holt Mfg. Co. v. Collins, 154 Cal. 265, 97 Pac. 516); by a general finding that all the material allegations of the answer are supported by the evidence and true, and that all the material allegations of the complaint in conflict therewith are unsupported by the evidence and untrue (Sterrett v. Sweeney, 15 Ida. 416, 98 Pac. 418, 20 L. R. A. N. S. 963); by a finding "that all the issues of fact raised by the pleadings in this case are hereby found and decided in favor of the defendant and against plaintiff" (Wood v. Broderson, 12 Ida. 190, 85 Pac. 490); by a finding that all the allegations of the complaint are true, and all the allegations of the answer, "so far as they are inconsistent with the allegations of said complaint." (Krug v. F. A. Lux Brewing Co., 129 Cal. 322, 61 Pac. 1125 [distinguished in Continental Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. Wilson, 144 Cal. 776, 78 Pac. 254]); or by a finding that all the allegations of the answer are untrue, except only in so far as they accord with the foregoing facts (Harlan v. Ely, 55 Cal. 340). Where all the findings of fact as to issues made by a cross complaint are that the court finds that there is no competent evidence to sustain the facts stated in the allegation, giving its number as it appears in the cross complaint, and following that with the allegation, there is no sufficient finding of fact. 69. Homeseekers' Loan Assoc. v. Gleeson, 133 Cal. 312, 65 Pac. 617 (holding that a finding that certain paragraphs of the complaint are true is equivalent to a finding that the averments of the paragraphs are true); Kennedy, etc., Lumber Co. v. S. App. 740, 91 Pac. 416 (holding that a finding that each and every allegation contained in plaintiff's complaint is true is but the express finding of that which is impliedly found by judgment for plaintiff on the headings); Bitter v. Mouat Lumber, etc., Co., 10 Colo. App. 307, 51 Pac. 519 [affirmed in 27 Colo. 120, 59 Pac. 403]; Norton v. Wilkes, 93 Minn. 411, 101 N. W. 619; Combination Steel, etc., Co. v. St. Paul City R. Co., 52 Minn. 203, 53 N. Insufficient reference.—Findings of fact are insufficient when by their reference to the complaint they introduce uncertainty. Thus, a finding that all the material allegations of the complaint are true, or are sustained by the testimony, is insufficient, as it leaves uncertain what allegations were deemed mate-provided the complaint states a cause of action,[71] and the answer consists of denials only;[72] but in a majority of the cases sanctioning such a practice, the general finding was accompanied by specific findings or another general finding that the allegations of the answer were untrue.[73]

(VI) EXTRINSIC FACTS AND PAPERS. Findings of fact are required to be complete in themselves, unaided by extrinsic facts or papers,[74] unless they be documents set out in the pleadings or otherwise in the record,[75] or deeds, maps, or other public records.[76]

(VII) IMPLIED AND NEGATIVE FINDINGS — (A) In General. Findings need not expressly negative every possible exception or qualification of the facts found,[77] as an implied negation necessarily exists, where the facts found are inconsistent with those not found.[78] Thus, where plaintiff's affirmative case is wholly incon-rial by the court. Musselman v. Musselman, 140 Cal. 197, 73 Pac. 824; Warren v. Robinson, 71 Cal. 380, 12 Pac. 265; Ladd v. Tully, 51 Cal. 277 [followed in Hardenberg v. Hardenberg, 54 Cal. 591]; Breeze v. Doyle, 19 Cal. 101; Abrahamson v. Lamberson, 68 Minn. 454, 71 N. W. 676. Likewise a finding that "the several allegations of the complaint not in conflict with the foregoing findings are true" is insufficient (Goodnow v. Griswold, 68 Cal. 599, 9 Pac. 837), as is also one that "plaintiff had wholly failed to substantiate his allegations by a preponderance of the evidence" (Milwaukee Nat. Bank v. Gallun, 116 Wis. 74, 92 N. W. 567).

71. Knudson v. Curley, 30 Minn. 433, 15 N. W. 873.

72. Lewis v. Adams, (Cal. 1885) 7 Pac. 779 (holding that where the statute of limitations is set up as a defense, a finding that "all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true" is not a finding as to the issue of the statute of limitations); Chatfield v. Continental Bldg., etc., Assoc., 6 Cal. App. 665, 92 Pac. 1040; Bahnsen v. Gilbert, 55 Minn. 334, 56 N. W. 1117.

73. See the cases cited in the preceding notes.

When general finding superfluous.— A concluding finding that "all other averments in the pleadings herein and in issue, not comprised and passed upon in these findings, are not true," is improper, but is not reversible error, where the preceding findings are so full and specific, and so clearly cover all the material issues, as to rebut the suggestion of uncertainty. Perkins v. West Coast Lumber Co., 120 Cal. 27, 52 Pac. 118, (1897) 48 Pac. 982. Similarly, where findings covering all the issues in a cause are made, an additional finding that all the allegations in the complaint are true and denials of the answer untrue, except as "hereinbefore otherwise found," is surplusage and may be disregarded. Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 Pac. 868. However, a general finding that all the allegations of the complaint are true, in an action wherein the answer consists of denials only, loses none of its certainty because there are, in addition to the general finding, certain specific findings of facts covered by the general finding. Chatfield v. Continental Bldg., etc., Assoc., 6 Cal. App. 665, 92 Pac. 1040.

74. Murry v. Nixon, 10 Ida. 608, 79 Pac. 643; Hodge v. Ludlum, 45 Minn. 290, 47 N. W. 805; Corliss v. Pulaski County, 116 Fed. 289, 53 C. C. A. 567 (holding that they cannot be aided by the bill of exceptions); Olcott v. Ennis-Calvert Compress Co., 114 Fed. 907, 52 C. C. A. 527 (holding that findings of fact which state that the facts are the same as those in a certain case are insufficient, where the case cited contains no specific findings of ultimate facts); Burnham v. North Chicago St. R. Co., 78 Fed. 101, 23 C. C. A. 677 (holding that where the only finding is that the facts are as set forth in the agreed statement of facts, which is mainly a statement of evidence and not of ultimate facts, a judgment rendered thereon is invalid). But see Biddle v. Pierce, 13 Ind. App. 239, 41 N. E. 475, holding that in a suit for distributive shares of an estate, the court need not, in its conclusions of law, state the exact amount due each party, but it is sufficient if data are given from which the exact amount can be calculated.

A written acknowledgment must be set out in the findings of fact in order to support a conclusion of law that such acknowledgment removes the bar of the statute of limitations on the note sued on. Park v. Park, 32 Ind. App. 642, 70 N. E. 493.

Where an agreement is the sole basis of a judgment, either it or the substance of it must be set out in the findings of fact. Citizens' Bank v. Farwell, 56 Fed. 570, 6 C. C. A. 24.

75. Corliss v. Pulaski County, 116 Fed. 289, 53 C. C. A. 567.

Incorporation, by reference, of exhibits in findings see supra, XII, B, 5, b, (V).

77. Schelske v. Orange Tp., 147 Mich. 135, 110 N. W. 506. But see Tracy v. Colby, 55 Cal. 67, holding that a finding that one person conveyed land to another upon a contract and agreement made on the day of the sale, and not in pursuance of any fraudulent contract made prior thereto, is defective, as it does not negative the allegation that there was such a prior contract, but simply expresses the opinion of the court that it was not fraudulent.

78. Tehama County Bank v. Crumley, 74 Cal. 461, 16 Pac. 207; Graham v. Kibble, 9 Nebr. 182, 2 N. W. 455; Milwaukee Nat. Bank

sistent with the truth of defendant's case, the conclusive establishment of the former is necessarily a complete negative of the latter.[79]

(B) Effect of Burden of Proof. Where no evidence is introduced in regard to an issue, or the evidence introduced is insufficient to support it, the finding thereon should be against the party having the burden of proof,[80] and an omission of the findings to cover a particular fact or issue is to be deemed a finding, on that fact or issue, against the party having the burden of proof.[81]

v. Gallun, 116 Wis. 74, 92 N. W. 567. And see Atkins v. Little, 17 Minn. 342, holding that a finding of fact to the effect that a person "sold" his interest in a mill implies that he received value therefor, when there is nothing to indicate the contrary.

Sufficient negation.— A finding that damages sought to be recovered accrued within a period covered by limitations immediately prior to the commencement of the action, when such statute is made a defense, is a sufficient finding on such defense and negatives it. Shurtliff v. Extension Ditch Co., 14 Ida. 416, 94 Pac. 574. Also, a finding that the agent who transacted all of a certain business for a corporation had no knowledge that a mortgage had been paid is a sufficient finding that the corporation had no notion of such facts and negatives the idea that the corporation had notice. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Talbot, 113 Ind. 373, 14 N. E. 586, 3 Am. St. Rep. 655. Where the court found that plaintiff had rendered services worth a stated amount, and that he had been paid a named sum, the finding sufficiently made it appear that only the amount named had been paid, and defendant could not object that it did not support a judgment for the difference. Tyler v. Davis, (Cal. 1892) 31 Pac. 1125.

When no implication exists.— No findings will be implied where the findings made state that the "foregoing are all the facts in the case." Schwartz v. Skinner, 47 Cal. 3. A finding that words in a contract were attempted to be erased does not imply that they were erased (Sullivan v. California Realty Co., 142 Cal. 201, 75 Pac. 767); nor does a finding that defendant did not collect a note in gold coin imply a collection in other moneys, where it also stated that defendant did not collect the sum in gold coin "or in any manner or sums or at all" (Hardin v. Dickey, 123 Cal. 513, 56 Pac. 258).

80. Monterey County v. Cushing, 83 Cal. 507, 23 Pac. 700; Dillon Implement Co. v. Cleaveland, 32 Utah 1, 88 Pac. 670.

The omission to make any findings cannot be taken advantage of by a party having the burden of proof, where he has offered no evidence. Demartin v. Demartin, 85 Cal. 71, 24 Pac. 594.

A finding that defendant introduced no evidence on an issue tendered by him is sufficient to support a judgment for plaintiff. Kiesel v. Bybee, 14 Ida. 670, 95 Pac. 20.

App. 97, 87 Pac. 205; Kilgore v. Emmitt, 33 Ohio St. 410, holding that where a special finding has been given on part of the issues, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, the general finding and judgment will be presumed to include all issues made in the case not specifically passed on. But see Messerly v. Mercer, 45 Mo. App. 327, holding that where special findings ignore undisputed important points and important controverted points for defendant, it will be held that his theory of the case had not received consideration by the court and that the judgment should therefore be reversed.

(VIII) INCONSISTENT FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS. A judgment cannot stand when it is based on findings of fact which are antagonistic, inconsistent, or contradictory as to material matters,[82] or when it is based on conclusions of law which are at variance with the findings of fact; [83] but the courts endeavor to reconcile findings which appear to be contradictory,[84] and in a majority of the cases wherein inconsistency has been claimed, the contention has been denied by the courts.[85] In the event of conflict, a finding of ultimate facts will control over a recital of probative facts in the finding or opinion, unless such recital purports to cover all the probative facts of the case; [86] findings of fact will prevail

Silence as to facts warranting larger judgment.— Where a special finding is silent as to facts which would entitle a party to the action to a larger amount than was awarded him under the judgment, the presumption is that such facts did not exist. Inconsistency of findings as ground for new trial see NEW TRIAL, 29 Cyc. 817.

Another statement of the rule is that an appellant who seeks to reverse a judgment based upon inconsistent and irreconcilable findings is entitled to the benefit of those that are most favorable to him. over conclusions of law;[87] and if one of two conflicting findings or conclusions support the judgment, it will control.[88] Where special issues are submitted to a jury, the findings of the jury are subordinate to and controlled by the findings of the court, in case of conflict.[89]

c. Conclusiveness.[90] When authorized at all,[91] and when followed by judgment,[92] findings of fact are conclusive upon the rights of the parties as to the issues necessarily involved and passed upon,[93] until formally set aside by the trial or appellate court.[94]

6. Amended or Additional Findings and Venire De Novo — a. Amendment or Correction. Except in a few jurisdictions, where there is no authorized procedure for the modification or correction of findings once made except by motion for a new trial,[95] a trial court has authority to change, modify, or correct its find-

Correct judgment.— A judgment will not be reversed because of inconsistent conclusions of law, when the judgment directed to be entered is in accordance with the correct conclusion of law on the facts found. Recital as to basis of findings.— An objection that the court erred in rendering a decree without proof of any of the material allegations in the complaint denied by the answer is untenable where the findings of fact recite that they were made from "the admission of the pleadings and the evidence taken," since such recital imports verity. Martin v. Eagle Development Co., 41 Oreg. 448, 69 Pac. 216.

Effect of oral statement of judge.— When the testimony is not in the record, a finding for plaintiff is not impaired by showing that at the time of announcing its decision the court stated that he believed defendant's testimony, as there is nothing to indicate but what the finding was based, in whole or in part, upon plaintiff's testimony. Setting aside of findings.— That what purported to be the findings of the court in a case, but were not in fact the findings, were inadvertently entered of record does not preclude the court from setting them aside when the error was discovered, or deprive it of jurisdiction to proceed with the consideration of the case as though they had not been entered. Conformity to admitted facts.—A failure of the trial court to comply with a request to amend its findings so as to conform to the facts admitted constitutes error, unless the finding as made could not have been detrimental to the party requesting the modification. Boothe v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 53 Oreg. 576, 98 Pac. 509, 101 Pac. 390.

Motion sufficient in substance.—A motion for more specific findings, which recites that the only issue involved was the true location of the division line between the parties, and that the court did not find upon that issue, nor determine where the line was located, wherefore plaintiff moved the court to state in writing the conclusion of fact and the law as found by him, governing such issues is not objectionable as being too general to require specific findings. Parker v. Thomas, (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 72 S. W. 229.

A request for corrected findings is properly refused where the finding made contains all the facts proved material to the proper presentation of the questions of law raised by an appeal (Swain v. O'Loughlin, 80 Conn. 200, 67 Atl. 480); where the proposed amendments are recitals of proof rather than state-

b. Additional Findings. Where the findings of fact and conclusions of law do not pass on all the material issues or are otherwise incomplete, the remedy of an aggrieved party is to apply by motion to the trial court for additional findings,[6] as the court has power, at least during the term and before entry of final judgment, to supplement its findings with further or additional findings,[7] upon proper notice being given to the parties.[8] The denial of such a motion is error,[9]

ments of ultimate facts (Fairfield v. Hart, 139 Mich. 136, 102 N. W. 641), or where the findings objected to are immaterial and the refusal to strike them out is not prejudicial (Whalen v. Gleeson, 81 Conn. 638, 71 Atl. 908). Also, where deeds were referred to as exhibits in a court's finding of facts, and made a part thereof, there is no error in a refusal to change the finding regarding land conveyed by the deeds so as to conform to the descriptions therein, the statement complained of not being intended to be an accurate description. In Indiana one who excepts to conclusions of law thereby admits that the facts were fully and correctly found, but after the disposal of such exceptions, the correctness of the facts specially found, or the failure of the court to find certain facts may be questioned either by a motion for a new trial or by a motion for a venire de novo. unless the findings already made fully protect the rights of the parties,[10] or the additional requested findings are inconsistent with those made.[11]

c. Venire De Novo. Although, technically speaking, the remedy of venire de novo is applicable only to jury trials, the Indiana courts have, by common usage, employed the term in designating the remedy available when the finding of a court is defective in form.[12] This, however, is the sole instance in which the remedy may be invoked,[13] it being considered not available when the ground of complaint is that the finding does not cover all the material facts,[14] or that it embraces more than is necessary,[15] or that the conclusions of law are not sustained by the facts found.[16] A motion for a venire de novo may properly be made at any time before final judgment on the finding.[17]

App. 120, 62 N. E. 282; Sweitzer v. Heasley, 13 Ind. App. 567, 41 N. E. 1064. Compare State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 102 Me. 385, 67 Atl. 312, holding that exceptions are not allowable unless the right to take exceptions is expressly reserved before the hearing.

The exceptions provided for by the California statute relate, not to errors, but only to defects in the findings. Carroll v. Benicia, 40 Cal. 386.

Under the Indiana practice the exception must be taken to the conclusion of law upon the facts found, and not to the finding (Grimes v. Duzan, 32 Ind. 361); and it is also held that it is only where special findings are made in pursuance of a request, and conclusions of law stated therein, and signed by the court, that an exception is available (State v. Kamp, (Ind. 1886) 8 N. E. 714). An exception to a conclusion of law that contractors were entitled to a mechanic's lien against a church on the ground that the contract was that of individuals who signed it on behalf of a church, and not that of the church, is unavailing, where the court has expressly found the contract to have been that of the church. Bird v. St. John's Episcopal Church, 154 Ind. 138, 56 N. E. 129.

A motion for judgment, notwithstanding the findings, is not the proper remedy of the of the decision,[19] or within such other time as is allowed by statute,[20] and no review of such lack or insufficiency can be had unless objection is made thereto in the trial court,[21] and exceptions taken.[22] Although no particular form or mode of making and saving exceptions to findings of fact and conclusions of law is required,[23] and although, on account of there being no need of exceptions being more specific than the findings objected to, general exceptions are sometimes held sufficient.[24] Ordinarily, exceptions should not be general but should specifi-party against whom the findings are made. Walters v. Walters, 168 Ind. 45, 79 N. E. 1037; Smith v. State, 140 Ind. 343, 39 N. E. 1060; Robertson v. Huffman, 101 Ind. 474; Bibbler v. Walker, 69 Ind. 362; Smith v. Jeffries, 25 Ind. 376; Hughes v. Meehan, 84 Minn. 226, 87 N. W. 768.

E. 744 (holding that exceptions to the conclusions of law must be taken at the time they are filed, and not at the time judgment is rendered thereon); Roeder v. Keller, 135 Ind. 692, 35 N. E. 1014; Radabangh v. Silvers, 135 Ind. 605, 35 N. E. 694; Barner v. Bayless, 134 Ind. 600, 33 N. E. 907, 34 N. E. 502; Hull v. Lough, 109 Ind. 315, 10 N. E. 270, 58 Am. Rep. 405; Dickson v. Rose, 87 Ind. 103 (holding that exceptions to conclusions of law on the facts specially found must be taken before a motion for a new trial is made); Matthews v. Fry, 143 N. C. 384, 55 S. E. 787; Thomson-Houston Electric Light Co. v. Henderson Electric, etc., Light Co., 116 N. C. 112, 21 S. E. 951 (holding that exceptions to findings of fact must be filed before the court adjourns for the term). And see Winstandley v. Breyfogle, 148 Ind. 618, 48 N. E. 224 (holding that after conclusions of law have been made, exceptions thereto should be taken by the party before he takes any further steps in the case); Cox v. Leviston, 66 N. H. 167, 20 Atl. 246 (holding that an objection that a finding is contrary to evidence should be taken advantage of before judgment).

20. Schwarz v. Weber, 103 N. Y. 658, 8 N. E. 728, within ten days after service upon appellant's attorney of a copy of the decision of the court, and written notice of the entry of judgment thereupon.

Under the Washington statute, providing that exceptions may be taken either by stating to the judge when the decision is signed that the party excepts thereto, or by filing written exceptions within five days after the filing of the decision, where findings and conclusions purport to have been signed on one day, and the exceptions appear not to have been noted by the court until the following day, in the absence of anything in the record to the contrary, the exceptions will be presumed to have been properly stated to the judge at the time the decision was signed. Burrows v. Kinsley, 27 Wash. 694, 68 Pac. 332. However, the filing of exceptions by appellant to the findings of fact, within five days of the service of the findings on him, instead of within five days of the filing of the findings is not sufficient. Mann v. Provident L., etc., Co., 42 Wash. 581, 85 Pac. 56.

An extension of the statutory time by the court is not permissible (National Bank of Commerce v. Seattle Pickle, etc., Works, 15 Wash. 126, 45 Pac. 731), even in favor of plaintiff, where defendant has filed exceptions within the prescribed time, and judgment has not been entered (Harris v. Mercur, 202 Pa. St. 313, 51 Atl. 969).

21. See APPEAL AND ERROR, 2 Cyc. 703.

Acquiescence in an adverse finding either by entering into a stipulation that it shall be taken as true (Staffeldt v. Granger, 106 Ill. App. 297), or by making it the basis of a subsequent proceeding in the cause, precludes a party from having it reviewed on appeal (Walsh v. Walsh, 1 Nebr. (Unoff.) 719, 95 N. W. 1024).

23. Climax Tag Co. v. American Tag Co., 234 Ill. 179, 84 N. E. 873 (holding, however, that the mere announcement by counsel that he disagrees with the court is not equivalent to an exception, as it must appear from the bill of exceptions that what counsel did at the time was intended to preserve the question for review by a higher court); Leavenworth v. Mills, 6 Kan. 288; Spaulding v. Strang, 38 N. Y. 9 (holding that matter of law is sufficiently excepted to, if pointed out with certainty in the exceptions, although in language different from that in which it is stated by the court).

An exception to the judgment is unnecessary where an exception is taken to the conclusion of law on which the judgment is based (Barnhart v. Farr, 55 Iowa 366, 7 N. W. 644), and it has been held immaterial that no exception was taken to the findings of the court, when an exception is taken to the judgment, and the record discloses that the findings of fact do not support the judgment (Voight v. Mackle, 71 Tex. 78, 8 S. W. 623).

24. Boyce v. Wabash R. Co., 63 Iowa 70, 18 N. W. 673, 50 Am. Rep. 730 (holding sufficiently specific a general exception to a conclusion of law that, as the right was based on the statute of another state, there could be no recovery); McCorn v. McCorn, 100 N. Y. 511, 3 N. E. 480; Pratt v. Foote, cally point out the error complained of,[25] it being the rule that a general exception is of no avail where any of the findings or conclusions are correct,[26] and that an exception to the conclusions of law admits the correctness of the findings of fact.[27] The sustaining of exceptions generally has the same effect as it would have upon a verdict.[28]

Conversely, when all the conclusions of law are erroneous, a general exception is sufficient. Ludlow v. Gilman, 18 Wis. 552. Also, an exception to a finding of fact, designated by number, without stating the grounds of exception, is sufficient, although the finding joins several propositions, if the finding as to all the propositions is wrong. An exception to a finding of fact, it seems, simply presents the question whether there is any evidence to sustain it. Sherman v. Foster, 158 N. Y. 587, 53 N. E. 504 [affirming 91 Hun 637, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 1133].

TRIAL TERM. A term at which a cause may for the first time be called for trial.[1]

TRIATIO IBI SEMPER DEBET FIERI, UBI JURATORES MELIOREM POSSUNT HABERE NOTITIAM. A maxim meaning "Trial ought always to be had where the jury can have the best knowledge."[2]

TRIBE. See INDIANS, 22 Cyc. 117.

TRIBORD. A French word for "starboard."[3]

TRIBUNAL. The seat of a judge; the place where he administers justice; a judicial court; the bench of judges.[4] (Tribunal: In General, see COURTS, 11 Cyc. 633. Arbitrators, see ARBITRATION AND AWARD, 3 Cyc. 568. Church, see RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES, 34 Cyc. 1182. De Facto, Unauthorized or Illegal, see COURTS, 11 Cyc. 724. For Removal of Municipal Officer, Discretion Vested in, see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 28 Cyc. 520. International, see INTERNATIONAL LAW, 22 Cyc. 1756.)

TRIBUTARY. A running natural stream which empties into another stream;[5] in ordinary language, a stream running into another stream.[6] (See, generally, NAVIGABLE WATERS, 29 Cyc. 285; WATERS.)

TRICK. As a noun, a sly, dexterous, ingenuous procedure fitted to puzzle or amuse;[7] classed as a synonym with strategy, wile, fraud, cheat, deception, delusion.[8] As a verb, to deceive by cunning or to impose on, to defraud, to cheat.[9] (Trick: Entry of House by, see BURGLARY, 6 Cyc. 178, 179. Larceny by, see LARCENY, 25 Cyc. 40. Obtaining Money or Property by as Criminal Offense, see FALSE PRETENSES, 19 Cyc. 391 note 30. See also, generally, FRAUD, 20 Cyc. 1; GAMING, 20 Cyc. 878.)

TRICYCLE. A three-wheeled vehicle.[10] (Tricycle: Use on Sidewalk, see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 28 Cyc. 912 note 3. See also BICYCLE, 5 Cyc. 686.)

5. Ogilvy Irr., etc., Co. v. Insinger, 19 Colo. App. 380, 75 Pac. 598, 599, where it is held that "this limited definition" of the term cannot be adopted as applicable to the rule, under irrigation laws, entitling one who has appropriated water from a river, to prevent the diversion of water from a tributary thereof.

6. Harbottle v. Terry, 10 Q. B. D. 131, 137, 47 J. P. 186, 52 L. J. M. C. 31, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 219, 31 Wkly. Rep. 289, where it is said: "The word has no technical meaning, and its popular meaning is not very indefinite."

A pond formed by obtaining a flow of water from a stream — the water being afterwards returned to the stream — is not a "tributary" of the stream (Harbottle v. Terry, 10 Q. B. D. 131, 137, 47 J. P. 186, 52 L. J. M. C. 31, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 219, 31 Wkly. Rep. 289. See also Moses v. Iggo, [1906] 1 K. B. 516, 519, 21 Cox C. C. 136, 70 J. P. 251, 75 L. J. K. B. 331, 94 L. T. Rep. N. S. 548); but where the water of a brook flows in its natural channel, the only alteration being that the damming up of the brook has enlarged the channel into what is called a pond, the waters still going down the same channel and ultimately issuing out of this old channel into a river, the damming up of the water in the brook does not prevent the water so dammed up from being a tributary (Cook v. Clarebrough, 94 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550 note).

As used in a policy of insurance giving the insured permission to navigate the Mississippi and tributaries, except the Missouri and Arkansas rivers, the term was held to include navigable waters which did not empty directly into the Mississippi, but which emptied into the Red river, which empties into the Mississippi. TRIED. Properly used in reference to a chancery suit, in which the court called a jury to decide special issues, when the verdict has been "sanctioned and established" by the chancellor.[11]

TRIENNALIS PACIFICUS POSSESSOR BENEFICII EST INDE SECURUS. A maxim meaning "The undisturbed possessor of a benefice for three years is thereafter secure from challenge." [12]

TRIENNIAL COHABITATION. See MARRIAGE, 26 Cyc. 915.

TRIFLING SUM. As in the definition of nominal damages, a phrase said to mean such a sum as a penny, one cent, six and a quarter cents.[13]

TRIMMING. In reference to loading or unloading of boats at grain elevators, work performed by longshoremen with hand-scoops or shovels, on the vessel unloading or receiving the grain.[14] In the plural, that which serves to trim, make complete, ornament, or the like.[15]

TRINITARIANS. Those who believe in the trinity or tri-unity of God.[16]

TRINKET. Ornaments of dress; superfluities of decoration;[17] any small piece of ornament or decoration; of more ornament than use;[18] a small ornament, as a jewel, a ring, or the like.[19] (See JEWEL, 23 Cyc. 374; ORNAMENT, 29 Cyc. 1530.)

TRINODA NECESSITAS. In Saxon law, a three-fold necessity or burden. A term used to denote the three things from contributing to the performance of which no lands were exempted, namely, pontis reparatio, (the repair of bridges,) arcis constructio, (the building of castles,) et expeditio contra hostem, (military service against an enemy).[20]

"There is a distinction between some of the articles, which are more especially articles of ornament with reference to dress, and others which, though of a somewhat ornamental character, do not constitute ornaments of dress, but are only occasionally produced. As to the former,— bracelets, shirt-pins, rings, and brooches,— they are clearly articles of personal decoration and adornment, and literally fall within the description of 'trinkets.' It is said, that, inasmuch as they are also articles of utility, they cease to be trinkets. But I do not agree to that. Their main and principal object plainly is that of ornament. It is true they may also be applied to some useful purpose; yet, inasmuch as they are essentially ornamental, I do not think the fact of their being capable of being turned to some use raises any difficulty." TRIORS. In practice, persons who are appointed to try challenges to jurors, that is, to hear and determine whether a juror challenged for favor is or is not qualified to serve.[21] (Triors: In General, see JURORS, 24 Cyc. 348. Of Proceedings For Removal of Municipal Officers, see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 28 Cyc. 440.)

TRIP. In its ordinary signification, a journey, a jaunt or excursion by some person.[22] In relation to transportation, the performance of service one way over a route.[23] (See CONTINUOUS TRIP, 9 Cyc. 212; ROUND TRIP, 34 Cyc. 1816.)

TRIPLICATE. See DUPLICATE, 14 Cyc. 1122.

TRIPPING. In mechanics, releasing or setting free some mechanism.[24]

TRISTIBUS ET TACITIS NON FIDUNTUR. A maxim meaning "Melancholy and secretive persons are not to be trusted." [25]

TRIVIAL. Trifling; inconsiderable; of small worth or importance.[26] (Trivial: Errors as Ground For Reversal, see APPEAL AND ERROR, 3 Cyc. 443. Matters, Exercise of Equity Jurisdiction in, see EQUITY, 16 Cyc. 124.)

TROLL. A long rope extended on the water for many fathoms, with baited hooks attached to it, about three or four feet apart.[27]

TROLLEY SYSTEM. As used in reference to street railroads, a term said to imply the use of a stationary engine and overhead wires strung on poles.[28] (See, generally, STREET RAILROADS, 36 Cyc. 1338.)

TROOPER. A term said to include only persons regularly enrolled in some troop of cavalry.[29]

TROOPS. A term which conveys to the mind the idea of an armed body of soldiers, whose sole occupation is war or service, answering to the regular army.[30] (See, generally, ARMY AND NAVY, 3 Cyc. 812; MILITIA, 27 Cyc. 489.)

TROTTING. See RACING, 32 Cyc. 1469 note 13.

TROUBLE. That which causes disturbance, annoyance, or the like.[31]

The old system of working roads by conscription of labor was a part of the trinoda necessitas, and this system was handed down to us by our British forefathers. State v. Holloman, 139 N. C. 642, 647, 52 S. E. 408.

I. DEFINITION, NATURE, AND ELEMENTS.

A. Definition. Conversion is "an unauthorized assumption and exercise of the right of ownership over goods or personal chattels belonging to another, to the alteration of their condition or the exclusion of an owner's rights." [1] The legal wrong denominated "conversion" is any unauthorized act of dominion or ownership exercised by one person over personal property belonging to another; [2]

1. Bouvier L. Dict. [quoted in Industrial, etc., Trust v. Tod, 170 N. Y. 233, 245, 63 N. E. 285; Laverty v. Snethen, 68 N. Y. 522, 524, 23 Am. Rep. 184; Thorp v. Robbins, 68 Vt. 53, 56, 33 Atl. 896].

A similar definition is "either in the appropriation of the thing to the party's own use and beneficial enjoyment, or in its destruction, or in exercising dominion over it 'in exclusion or defiance' of the plaintiff's right, or in withholding the possession from the plaintiff, 'under a claim of title inconsistent with his own.'" 2 Greenleaf Ev. § 642 [quoted in King v. Franklin, 132 Ala. 559, 566, 31 So. 467; Hunter v. Cronkhite, 9 Ind. During the last argument of the case he is reported to have said: "An action of trover is not now an action ex maleficio, though it is so in form;" and also, "in substance, trover is an action of property. History of action.— "The action of trover or conversion was, in its origin, an action of trespass on the case for the recovery of damages against a person who had found goods, and refused to deliver them on demand to the owner, but converted them to his own use, from which word, finding, the remedy is called an action of trover. By a fiction of law actions of trover were at length permitted to be brought against any person who had in his possession, by any means whatever, the personal property of another, and sold or used the same without the consent of the owner, or refused to deliver the same when demanded. The injury lies in the conversion and deprivation of the plaintiff's property, which is the gist of the action, and the statement of the finding of trover is now immaterial and not traversable; and the fact of conversion does not necessarily import an acquisition of property in the defendant. It is an action for the recovery of damages to the extent of the value of the thing converted. The object and the result of the suit are not the recovery of the thing itself, which can only be recovered by an action of detinue or replevin." 1 Chitty Pl. (14th Am. ed.) p. 146 [quoted in Burnham v. Pidcock, 33 Misc. (N. Y.) 65, 67, 66 N. Y. Suppl. 806 (affirmed in 58 N. Y. App. Div. 273, 68 N. Y. Suppl. 1007)]. Distinguished from trespass.— There are two principal differences between actions of trespass and trover for personalty appropriated by defendant, the first of which is that in trespass there is always either an original wrongful taking, or a taking made wrongful ab initio by subsequent misconduct, while in trover the original taking is supposed or assumed to be lawful, and often the only wrong consists in a refusal to surrender a possession which was originally rightful, but the right to which has terminated. 2. Intent as an Element of Conversion — a. In General. Intent to convert property will not alone sustain an action of trover;[18] the intent must be accompanied by a positive act.[19] If such act was unauthorized by the owner of the property, an intent to convert it will be conclusively presumed, or rather defendant's intent will be regarded as immaterial.[20] But if the act which deprived plaintiff of his goods was authorized by him,[21] or was performed for his benefit or the benefit of some interested third person,[22] or was otherwise lawful on the part of defendant, the latter cannot be held liable in trover without proof of an intent to convert the property to his own use.[23]

Illustrations.— Trover may be maintained by the maker of a negotiable note against one who obtained it without legal delivery and wrongfully negotiated it to a bona fide holder (Decker v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. 313; Murray v. Burling, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 172), by an accommodation maker against the party accommodated, who has taken up the note and claims it to be a valid obligation (Park v. McDaniels, 37 Vt. 594), by an accommodation accepter for an acceptance fraudulently obtained by the drawer and pledged to one having notice of the fraud (Evans v. Kymer, 1 B. & Ad. 528, 9 L. J. K. B. O. S. 92, 20 E. C. L. 586, 109 Eng. Reprint 883), or by a payee or accepter against a holder to whom the bill has been transferred by plaintiff's agent without even apparent authority (Cranch v. White, 1 Bing. N. Cas. 414, 27 E. C. L. 700, 6 C. & P. 767, 25 E. C. L. 679, 4 L. J. C. P. 113). So too trover lies against one who purchased, after maturity, a bill which had been fraudulently negotiated to him by an agent (Wood v. McKean, 64 Iowa 16, 19 N. W. 817; Weathered v. Smith, 9 Tex. 622, 60 Am. Dec. 186; Vermilye v. Adams Express Co., 21 Wall. (U. L. 816), against one who took a note without permission after refusal of the consideration offered (Vancleave v. Beach, 110 Ind. 269, 11 N. E. 228), against a wrongful holder who has collected the note by suit (Rushing v. Tharpe, 88 Ga. 779, 15 S. E. 830), against one who has diverted a negotiable instrument, whether made or indorsed by plaintiff, to a purpose other than that for which it was delivered (Kidder v. Biddle, 13 Ind. L. 59), against one who has negotiated a note before the happening of an event on which the use of the note was made contingent (Thompson v. Carter, 6 Ga. App. 604, 65 S. E. 599; Brown v. St. Charles, 66 Mich. 71, 32 N. W. 926; Boyer v. Fenn, 19 Misc. (N. Y.) 128, 43 N. Y. Suppl. 533 [affirming 18 Misc. 607, 43 N. Y. Suppl. 506]), against one who took a note as security for a usurious loan (Keutgen v. Parks, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 60) or under a strict indorsement "for account of" plaintiff (Treuttel v. Barandon, 1 Moore C. P. 543, 8 Taunt. 100, 4 E. C. L. 59), or against one who cashed a bill or draft according to the tenor of a forged indorsement (Kleinwort v. Comptoir Nat. d'Escompte, [1894] 2 Q. B. 157, 63 L. J. Q. B. 674, 10 Reports 259) or of an indorsement prohibited by a gambling act (Williams v. Wall, 60 Mo. 318); but not against a third party who has taken the instrument in good faith and due course, without notice, and for value (Goodwin v. Robarts, 1 App. Cas. 476, 45 L. J. Exch. 748, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 179, 24 Wkly. Rep. 987; Wookey v. Pole, 4 B. & Ald. 1, 22 Rev. Rep. 594, 6 E. C. L. 365, 106 Eng. against the payee or holder who refuses to surrender it,[39] even though the fact of payment is denied.[40] But trover will not lie for the conversion of a note on which judgment has been rendered.[41]

E. Muniments of Title. Title deeds,[43] land contracts,[44] abstracts of title,[45] and leases [46] are subjects of conversion.

F. Judgments. As trover will not lie for a record,[47] it will not for a judgment.[48]

G. Copies of Account-Book Entries. A debtor who has copies of his creditor's account may, if the creditor obtain possession of and refuse to return them, maintain trover against him therefor.[49]

H. Coin, Bank-Notes, and Money Generally. Gold coin,[50] bank-notes,[51] and money of any kind [52] may be converted. Money, however, is a subject of conversion only when it can be described or identified as a specific chattel.[53]

I. Buildings and Building Materials. All kinds of buildings which are personal property [54] are subject to conversion, and the owner or possessor of the land who wrongfully prevents their removal may be compelled to respond in trover for their value.[55] Trover will likewise lie for the material out of which a house was built, if the house was subject to conversion at the time it was wrecked.[56]

M. Animals.[67] Trover is maintainable for wild animals which have strayed away without gaining their natural liberty,[68] for dogs wrongfully retained,[69] and for domestic animals unlawfully impounded or seized on execution.[70]

N. Manure. Manure, although lying on the ground, if not incorporated with the soil is property for the conversion of which trover is a proper remedy.[71]

O. Repairs Added to a Chattel. Ordinarily materials used in the repair of a chattel become a part of it and are therefore incapable of conversion, but the rule is otherwise when repairs are made under a stipulation that title to the parts added to the chattel shall not pass until they are paid for.[72]

P. Mail Matter. A wrongful detention of mail matter by a postmaster will subject him to an action for conversion.[73]

Q. Property of no Value. Trover cannot be maintained for any kind of personal property, unless it be shown that it was of some value.[74]

III. Acts Constituting Conversion and Liability Therefor.

A. Destruction of or Injury to Property — 1. In General. It may be stated as a general rule that the tortious destruction of goods or personalty,[75] or the serious maltreatment of a chattel[76] is a conversion. But destruction or loss of property will not be regarded as tortious when it was necessary for the protection either of defendant or his property,[77] or when it resulted from accident,[78] negligence,[79]

4. Cutting Wires. The cutting and carrying away of electric wires without first offering the owner a reasonable opportunity for reclaiming them is a conversion.[84]

B. Assertion of Ownership or Control of Property — 1. In General. Verbal assertions of ownership or right of possession do not amount to a conversion,[85] unless they are uttered in proximity to the property, in a manner indicating a determination to control it, and coupled with an apparent ability to do so.[86] And an asportation of goods is not in itself a sufficient assertion of ownership to constitute a conversion,[87] unless prompted by an intent to deprive the owner either of his property or possession.[88] Nor is an interference with a chattel under circumstances which show the owner's right to be unquestioned, although such interference be accompanied by consequences injurious to him.[89]

2. Possession by Defendant. A defendant cannot be charged with a conversion of goods unless he had an actual or constructive possession of them at the

3. Pretense of Title. An unfounded assertion of ownership or title to a chattel, made by one who is in possession thereof, is an actionable conversion.[92]

4. Forbidding Sale of Property Seized Under Process. Merely forbidding an officer to sell property on execution against another person is not a conversion.[93]

5. Conversion of Part as Conversion of Whole. Conversion of a part amounts to conversion of the whole of a chattel when the circumstances evince a purpose to control or dispose of the whole of it,[94] or whenever the remaining part is thereby impaired in value or utility.[95]

6. Unauthorized Collection of Money. Receiving payment under a claim of right upon a security which belongs to another but which is in the wrong-doer's possession is an assertion of ownership which constitutes actionable conversion.[96]

8 PURCHASE AT INVALID PUBLIC SALE. The appropriation to one's use of property purchased at an invalid public sale is a conversion, even if the purchase was made in good faith.[22]

9. PROPERTY ACQUIRED UNDER INVALID CONTRACT. A refusal to permit an owner to take possession of or handle chattels which defendant holds under an invalid contract,[23] or a contract that has been rescinded,[24] constitutes a conversion; but trover will not lie against one who obtains by a void contract possession of goods that he is entitled to hold.[25]

10. CONFISCATION BY PUBLIC AUTHORITIES. An officer who wrongfully confiscates the property of a private person for public or other use is guilty of conversion.[26]

11. INDUCING DELIVERY BY AFFIDAVIT OF OWNERSHIP. Where the ownership of property is in dispute it is not an unlawful conversion to induce the other party by means of an affidavit of ownership to surrender possession thereof.[27]

12. TAKING UNDER COLOR OF LICENSE. Taking property under a license which has been revoked is a conversion.[28]

13. APPROPRIATION OF PROCEEDS OF SALE. An appropriation of the proceeds of the sale of a chattel which was authorized by its owner will not justify an action for conversion of the chattel;[29] but an appropriation or unauthorized diversion of the proceeds by the purchaser will sustain an action in conversion for the amount.[30]

14. INTERFERING WITH DECEDENT'S PROPERTY. An unauthorized interference with a decedent's personal estate will render the wrong-doer liable in trover for whatever loss occurs.[31]

e. Sale of Property in Which Another Has a Part Interest or Lien. A wrongful sale of goods whereby a person who has a part interest therein, or a lien thereon, is deprived of the same, is a conversion whether the wrong-doer be an owner of another part or a lien-holder,[48] or a stranger to the property.[49]

4. Transfer of Corporate Stock on Company's Books. It is a conversion to cause a certificate of shares of stock to be transferred on the company's books to a person other than the owner, notwithstanding the wrong-doer sent to the owner another certificate for the same number of shares, which the latter returned.[50]

5. Transfer of Paid Note. If the holder of a note which has been paid transfers it to a third person who thereafter obtains judgment against the maker, the latter may recover the amount of the judgment in trover from the holder.[51]

6. Property Purchased For Another's Benefit. One who bids in property at a judicial sale for the benefit of another, and at his request, and then appropriates it to his own use, is liable in trover therefor.[52]

version.[54] If, however, the detention be based on a negation of the owner's rights, or be accompanied by an intent to convert the property to the holder's own use, a right of action for conversion will arise.[55]

2. Detention to Permit Investigation of Title or Right to Possession. A bona fide reasonable detention of goods by one who has assumed some duty respecting them,[56] for the purpose of ascertaining their true ownership, or of determining the right of demandant to receive them, will not sustain an action for conversion.[57] thereof is a conversion, whether accomplished by merely forbidding it,[58] threats,[59] injunction,[60] locking up the goods,[61] or requiring the performance of a condition which is not enforceable at law.[62]

b. Refusal of Landlord to Permit Tenant to Remove Property. A landlord will be held guilty of a conversion if he refuses to permit an outgoing tenant to remove his trade fixtures or other personal property,[63] unless the refusal was by means of an injunction sued out by the former,[64] or the latter failed to exercise his right of removal prior to his surrender of the premises or abandonment of his term.[65]

4. Holding Property For Expenses Incurred. The right to retain property until repayment of expenses incurred in relation thereto depends upon the character of one's possession. If that possession be wrongful, the right does not obtain and trover will lie.[66] If rightful, and the expenses were incurred in the performance of a duty pertaining to the property, the right does obtain and trover will not lie,[67] if a legal tender of the amount thereof does not accompany the demand.[68]

A tenant removed, before the expiration of his term, some of his goods from the premises and began business in another place. The landlord took forcible possession of the premises and locked them up. Several days afterward the tenant demanded possession of the premises, but not of his goods. No objection to taking his goods was made by the landlord. This seizure of the premises was held not to be a conversion of the tenant's property. Mattice v. Brinkman, 74 Mich. 705, 42 N. W. 172. See also Thorogood v. Robinson, 6 Q. 2. As Fixing Time of Conversion. Ordinarily the date of demand and refusal is the date of the conversion [74]

3. Necessity of Demand and Refusal — a. In General. Trover will not lie against one rightfully in possession. Such a possession must first be transformed into a wrongful one by a refusal to surrender the property. Hence demand and refusal are necessary for the maintenance of trover in all cases in which defendant was rightfully in possession.[75] Demand and refusal are superfluous, however, whenever a conversion can be otherwise shown, and evidence thereof may be omitted when any one of the following circumstances is proved: Unavaila-

e. Refusal Before Demand. Trover may be maintained without a previous demand where there has been a refusal to give up the chattel.[90]

f. Demand Against Persons Purchasing From Wrong-Doer. Demand and refusal need not be proved in trover against a third person either where, with knowledge of the owner's rights, he received property by purchase or otherwise from one unauthorized so to dispose of it;[91] or where he, whether a bona fide purchaser or not, has sold such property or otherwise converted it to his own use.[92] But proof of demand and refusal may be omitted in trover against third persons who took as bona fide purchasers and still retain the property.[93]

g. Transfer of Property by Person Having no Title or Right. An action for conversion without a prior demand and refusal is justified by a transfer of property by one having no right or title thereto, irrespective of the character of his possession.[94]

h. Property Taken by Trespasser. In trover for property taken by a trespasser evidence of demand on him therefor is unnecessary.[95]

i. Property Taken by Mistake. That defendant carried away or otherwise converted the property in controversy by mistake does not entitle him to a demand.[96]

j. Property Obtained by Fraud. One from whom chattels have been obtained by fraud can maintain trover against the person so obtaining them without a prior demand.[97]

k. Property Obtained by Void Contract. Demand and refusal need not be proved in an action for conversion against a defendant who obtained the property in question through a void contract.[98]

l. Conversion by Agent or Servant. Trover will lie without previous demand and refusal against a servant or agent who has converted his principal's or master's goods;[99] but mere refusal of agent to pay over upon demand money collected for his principal is not sufficient to sustain trover.[1] explicit and complete to apprise defendant of what particular property is claimed,[4] and must be clothed in absolute, unequivocal terms.[5]

b. By Whom Demand Made. A demand may be made only by him who has the right of immediate possession,[6] his attorney, whose authority will be presumed,[7] or by some other agent,[8] who must exhibit his authority if requested to do so by the person in possession of the property.[9]

c. On Whom Demand Made. A demand should be made on the person who has the actual possession or control of the goods claimed.[10]

4. Harris v. Hackley, 127 Mich. 46, 86 N. W. 389; Kewaunee County v. Decker, 30 Wis. 624.

Demand of key to building in order to get property is sufficient demand for the property itself. Swartz v. Gottlieb-Bauernschmidt-Straus Brewing Co., 109 Md. 393, 71 Atl. 854.

Property embraced.—A demand must not embrace more property than the owner is entitled to recover. Forth v. Pursley, 82 Ill. 152; Swartwout v. Evans, 37 Ill. 442; Abington v. Lipscomb, 1 Q. B. 776, 1 G. & D. 230, 6 Jur. 257, 10 L. J. Q. B. 330, 41 E. C. L. 772. But a demand covering more than one is entitled to does not justify a refusal of what he may rightfully claim, unless he decline to accept anything less than the full quantity demanded. Gragg v. Hull, 41 Vt. 217.

A demand by letter is insufficient (Teeple v. Hawkeye Gold Dredging Co., 137 Iowa 206, 114 N. W. 906; White v. Demary, 2 N. H. 546; Miller v. Smith, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 173. Contra, Logan v. Houlditch, 1 Esp. 22), unless defendant acknowledge the receipt of it and refuse to deliver the goods, or deny having possession of them (Pattee v. Gilmore, 18 N. H. 460, 45 Am. Dec. 385; Rice v. Yocum, 155 Pa. St. 538, 26 Atl. 698). A conversion is not to be inferred from the neglect of defendant to answer a letter containing a demand. Miller v. Smith, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 173. And if a verbal demand and a demand in writing are made at the same time, and neither contains a reference to the other, evidence of the verbal demand will suffice. Smith v. Young, 1 Camph. 439.

Demand of officer.— Where the statutes do not require his official designation a demand addressed to a public officer in his private name is sufficient. Duggan v. Wright, 157 Mass. 228, 32 N. E. 159. But a demand on an officer who has seized personal property will not bind plaintiff in execution when sued for a conversion thereof. Mulheisen v. Lane, 82 Ill. 117.

A demand of payment for converted goods will sustain trover. La Place v. Aupoix, 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 406; Thompson v. Shirley, 1 Esp. 31. But a demand of payment for goods destroyed will not support an action for conversion of others which were saved. Barrett v. Suttis, 17 Nova Scotia 262.

Immediate removal of property.— To constitute a valid demand it is not necessary that the owner be prepared to remove his property immediately. Edmundson v. Bric, 136 Mass. 189.

6. Carr v. Farley, 12 Me. 328, holding that where one of two receiptors of attached property sold it, a demand on the purchaser made by the other for its return was sufficient.

Demand by prior owner.— A demand made by an owner of property prior to his sale of it will not entitle his vendee to maintain trover therefor. Buel v. Pumphrey, 2 Md. 261, 56 Am. Dec. 714; Hall v. Robinson, 2 N. Y. 293; Howell v. Kroose, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 357, 2 Abb. Pr. 167.

As to demand on agent or servant see infra, III, G, 7, d.

A demand on one partner after a dissolution of the partnership will not charge another partner with a conversion of goods delivered to the firm. Pattee v. Gilmore, 18 N. H. 460, 45 Am. Dec. 385.

d. Time of Demand. A demand should be made after plaintiff's right of possession has accrued [11] and while right of possession is in him,[12] and before an action is commenced. But evidence of demand and refusal after issuance, or service, of summons may be submitted to the jury as proof of a prior conversion.[13]

e. Place of Demand. A personal demand for the possession of chattels may be made on the one who has them under his control, although they be at a distance from the place of demand;[14] but he is not bound to deliver them where demanded.[15]

6. Compliance With Demand. Compliance with a demand before an action is instituted bars a recovery in trover, if defendant was lawfully in possession of the property.[16]

7. What Constitutes Refusal — a. In General. An actionable refusal to deliver property must be, if oral, positive and unambiguous.[17]

b. Qualified Refusal.[18] A refusal given in recognition of the owner's rights but qualified by certain conditions will not serve as a cause of action for conversion.[19]

Demand against part of several wrongdoers.— In order to maintain trover against two or more who are wrongfully in joint possession of another's chattels, a demand must be made on each of them. Mitchell v. Williams, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 13. But this rule does not apply when the joint wrongful possessors are partners. Ball v. Larkin, 3 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 555.

In trover against a corporation and four individuals to recover notes, defendants did not set up separate defenses, but pleaded jointly. In their answers they admitted possession, but denied conversion, and that the notes belonged to plaintiff. They pleaded in abatement that there had never been a demand upon any of them for the notes and that the action was premature, but there was no separate trial on that plea. There was evidence to show that the four individual defendants were brothers and controlled the corporation, and that written demand had been made on the company for the notes. It was held that the failure to show demand on each defendant was not ground for setting aside a verdict against all the defendants. Garbutt Lumber Co. v. Prescott, 134 Ga. 382, 67 S. E. 1127.

Ignorance of owner.— A refusal to deliver goods by a person ignorant of the real owner, or in doubt as to the identity of the party making the demand, does not amount to a conversion. Sandford v. Wilson, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 247; Green v. Dunn, 3 Campb. 215 note; Solomons v. Dawes, 1 Esp. 83.

Silence or neglect to answer will not constitute a sufficient refusal (Richards v. Pitts Agricultural Works, 37 Hun (N. Y.) 1; McLean v. Graham, 5 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 741), unless defendant took time to consider and promised to answer (Ryerson v. Ryerson, 8 N. Y. Suppl. 738; Weeks v. Goode, 6 C. B. N. S. 367, 95 E. C. L. 367).

c. Refusal by Person Having Only Part of Property. A general refusal to deliver over a number of articles upon the demand of their owner is evidence of a conversion, although the party making the refusal has only a portion of the articles demanded under his control.[20]

d. Refusal by Agent or Servant. The refusal by a servant or agent to deliver to a stranger goods intrusted to him by his master or principal is not evidence of conversion in trover against the latter,[21] unless it was the duty of the servant or agent, in obedience to instructions from the master or principal, or by virtue of the nature of his business, to act touching a demand for the property.[22]

8. Time For Complying or Refusing. The law grants a reasonable time for investigation, consideration, and compliance with demand or refusal to deliver.[23]

9. Grounds of Refusal. Grounds of refusal, if stated at all, must be truly stated, and all that are not mentioned, if any at all are mentioned, will be deemed to be waived.[24]

IV. ACTIONS.

A. Right of Action and Defenses — 1. Nature and Scope of Remedy and Right to Sue in General — a. Title to Land Involved. Trover will not lie when title to land is an issue.[25]

b. Buyer Refusing to Pay For Goods. When delivery of and payment for goods were to be concurrent acts, a vendee who receives and refuses to pay for the goods obtains a wrongful possession, and may be sued in trover by the vendor;[26]

c. Property Wrongfully Replevied. A defendant in replevin who recovers judgment may bring trover against the plaintiff on the latter's failure to return the property replevied.[28]

d. Stolen Goods. Pending an indictment for larceny, defendant may be sued in trover by the owner of the goods.[29]

e. Wrongful Seizure Under Process. An action for conversion may be maintained for a wrongful seizure and disposition of property under an attachment,[30] execution,[31] or distress,[32] but not for goods taken out of plaintiff's possession under a search warrant.[33]

f. Sale Induced by Fraud. A sale of goods procured by fraud entitles the vendor to bring trover for their value against the defrauding vendee.[34]

g. Property Procured Under Illegal Contract. Trover will lie for property not paid for, which defendant obtained under an illegal contract.[35]

h. Refusal to Pay Over Money Received For Another. Trover will lie whenever plaintiff's money has come into defendant's possession, and has been converted by him, without any assent on plaintiff's part, express or implied, that the relation of debtor and creditor should thereby arise.[36] receipt of the proceeds of defendant's wrongful act,[44] by accepting the hire agreed upon for the use of the thing converted,[45] or by bringing an action for damages or assumpsit for the proceeds of the wrongful disposition of the property.[46] But neither a demand for payment for the goods,[47] nor for their possession,[48] nor for the proceeds of a wrongful sale of them,[49] will operate as a waiver of the tort.

2. Statutory Provisions and Remedies — a. In General. Code provisions substituting procedure for the common-law action of detinue do not abolish the substance of the common-law action of trover and conversion.[50] But a statute may grant relief by trover in cases where such form of action was not recognized by the common law,[51] and may create an enlarged measure of damages.[52] The statutory form of action for conversion may be limited to the conversion of "plaintiff's goods." 3. Title and Right to Possession of Plaintiff — a. Necessity of Title or Right to Possession — (i) In General. An unbroken line of authorities establishes the rule that trover cannot be maintained by one who has neither title nor right of possession.[56] It has been stated in some decisions that trover will not lie unless at the time of conversion plaintiff had a property right, general or special, in the chattel converted, or was in possession or had a right to the immediate possession thereof.[57] Numerous other authorities declare the rule to be that a plaintiff in trover must have had property, either general or special, and possession or the right of immediate possession.[58] A rule more accurate and universal, and under which all of the cases apparently conflicting may be harmonized, may be stated thus: He who seeks to recover in trover must prove that he was in actual possession of the chattel converted at the time of conversion, or felled timber or raised a crop on unoccupied or wild land has been permitted to maintain trover against another who took the timber or the crop and converted it to his own use.[77]

c. Nature and Sufficiency of Possession — (I) POSSESSION UNDER CLAIM OF TITLE. Possession under a claim of title or right is sufficient to sustain an action for conversion against one who does not show a better right or title.[78]

(II) CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION. A constructive possession founded on a valid title [79] is sufficient for the maintenance of trover.[80]

d. Persons Entitled to Sue — (I) IN GENERAL. Trover may be brought by any one whose ownership of, or special interest in, the property involved entitles him to the right of immediate possession thereof at the time of its conversion,[81] and, according to the common law relating to the assignment of choses in action, no other person can maintain the action.[82] But it is now held in many jurisdictions that under special statutes or general codes of procedure an assignment of property previously converted empowers the assignee to sue for the conversion in his own name.[83]

(II) ASSIGNEE FOR CREDITORS. An assignment by a bankrupt confers on his assignee a right of immediate possession which will support an action for conversion.[84]

(III) INDORSEE OR OTHER HOLDER OF NOTE OR BOND. The holder of a note or bond may sue for a conversion thereof, even if he cannot maintain an action thereon in his own name,[85] although he may be neither the payee nor an indorser,[86] and even if the note has never been delivered to him.[87] Likewise an indorsee in blank of a note held as collateral security may maintain trover for a conversion of it.[88]

(IV) CONSIGNOR OR CONSIGNEE OF GOODS. A consignor of goods may bring trover for the conversion of them, if he have the right of immediate possession;[89] and so may a consignee who has accepted a consignment,[90] or made advances thereon.[91]

(V) EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. A conversion of a decedent's goods will subject the wrong-doer to an action in trover by the executor or administrator,[92] provided the latter has title to the goods or right to the immediate possession thereof.[93]

(VII) JOINT OWNERS. Joint owners of a chattel may unite in an action for a conversion of it,[98] without showing the exact interest of each in it.[99] It is not so clear, however, that all of the owners of a chattel must be joined as plaintiffs in trover. Some cases assert the necessity of such a joinder.[1] Others hold that trover may be brought by one joint owner, if he have the right of immediate possession, or be duly authorized by his coöwners so to do.[2]

(VIII) OWNER OF STOLEN PROPERTY. The owner of a stolen chattel may recover for a conversion thereof, even if defendant be a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice of the theft, unless the chattel were a negotiable instrument.[3]

(IX) OFFICER CLAIMING UNDER LEVY. An officer may bring trover against one who has wrongfully converted goods which the former was claiming under a valid levy [4] of an execution,[5] attachment,[6] or distress.[7]

b. Payment or Tender of Amount of Lien or Indebtedness. Where a lien on, or an indebtedness for, goods exist in favor of one in possession of them, a tender of the amount of such lien or indebtedness must be made before trover will lie,[46] unless he previously disposed of the property or otherwise terminated his lien;[47] neglected to claim a lien and state the amount thereof,[48] coupled the lien with another claim,[49] based his refusal to deliver on another ground,[50] or failed to perform the contract which would have entitled him to a lien.[51]

c. Return of Consideration on Rescission of Contract. Where title has passed in a sale or exchange of goods procured by defendant's fraud, plaintiff cannot recover for a conversion thereof without proof of a rescission of the contract and of a return or tender of the consideration received,[52] unless the consideration was money only.[53]

d. Institution of Criminal Proceedings. The institution of a criminal prosecution against one who has feloniously obtained goods and converted them is a condition precedent to the bringing of trover against him,[54] but not to the bringing

f. Failure of Wrong-Doer to Receive Benefits of Conversion. Defendant cannot escape liability for a conversion on the ground that it resulted in no profit or benefit to him.[65]

g. Prior Conversion. A conversion by defendant or a third person prior to the conversion alleged is no defense.[66]

h. Order of Superior. Acting under orders of a superior officer will justify a conversion only when the orders and surrounding circumstances amount to duress.[67]

i. Prior Adjudication. In trover for unlawful conversion of different items of personal property it is a valid defense pro tanto to plead a former adjudication as to any such item.[68]

j. Taking Property From Defendant by Legal Process. Conversion is not excused by the subsequent taking of the property from the wrong-doer by virtue of legal process,[69] unless it be further shown that the owner or person entitled to the possession has received it or the proceeds of any disposition which may have been made of it.[70]

k. Title or Right to Possession — (i) Of Defendant. It is competent and proper for defendant in an action of trover to allege in himself as a defense either title to the property in controversy,[71] a right of possession[72] or a rightful posses-

(II) Of Third Person. The cases relating to title in a third person as a defense may be divided into three groups, from the first of which may be formulated the rule that such a defense is not allowable. In the majority of these cases, however, defendant made no effort to connect himself with the title of such person, or he was estopped from making such a defense.[74] The second group establishes the rule that is sustained by a preponderance of authority, viz.: that such defense is allowable if defendant is in privity with the third person or can in some way connect himself with the latter's title.[75] The cases in the third group assert the

Although the distinction between different forms of action is abolished by the code, a complaint for conversion must still contain all the material allegations that were essential to the sufficiency of a declaration at common law. Sigel-Campion Live Stock Co. v. Holly, 44 Colo. 580, 101 Pac. 68.

Allegations that defendant hired three horses of plaintiff and had returned two, but had neglected to return the third after demand, constitute a complaint for breach of contract of bailment, but not for conversion. Tichenor-Grand Co. v. Weingarten, 116 N. Y. Suppl. 634.

Sufficient averment to sustain common-law fiction.—A count in trover, which alleges that plaintiff lost the money in question and that the same came to the possession of defendant by finding, is a sufficient averment to sustain the action of the common law to support an action of trover. So in trover for promissory notes, neither their dates nor times of payment need be alleged. New Brunswick Bank v. Neilson, 15 N. J. L. 337, 19 Am. Dec. 691. And in trover for a deed it is unnecessary to state the names of the parties thereto or the nature or boundaries of the estate conveyed thereby. Weiser v. Zeisinger, 2 Yeates (Pa.) 537. In trover for bank-notes the following description was held sufficient: "Divers promissory notes against sundry persons, and in various amounts of great value, to wit: of the value of four thousand dollars." Burrows v. Keays, 37 Mich. 430. Similar descriptions were sustained in Moody v. Keener, 7 Port. (Ala.) 218; Benson v. Eli, 16 Colo. App. 494, 66 Pac. 450; Dows v. Bignall, Lalor (N. Y.) 407. But the following description: "That on the same day and year the plaintiff was lawfully possessed of $25 of bank notes on different banks," was held insufficient in that there were no names, numbers, or marks whereby to identify the notes. A complaint for the conversion of "$1,850 in cash" (Durham v. Cox, 81 Conn. 268, 70 Atl. 1033), for the value of 5,950 "Mexican dollars" (Ramirez v. Main, 11 Ariz. 43, 89 Pac. 508), or for "all the saloon fixtures value,[99] or location,[1] will suffice; but a declaration which contains no description of specific property is fatally defective.[2]

(v) VALUE OF PROPERTY. In some states allegations of value are held to be material,[3] and in others immaterial.[4]

(vi) TITLE AND RIGHT TO POSSESSION. A complaint or declaration in trover is fatally defective unless it alleges either that at the time of conversion plaintiff had title, general or special, and the right of immediate possession,[5] or that he was at that time in the actual possession of the property and was wrong-on the premises No. 424 M. street" giving city and county (Greenebaum v. Taylor, 102 Cal. 624, 36 Pac. 957) is sufficient. But "certain goods, to wit: a lot of goods in a certain store in A." is not a sufficient description, being uncertain both as to kind and quantity. Edgerley v. Emerson, 23 N. H. 555, 55 Am. Dec. 207. And a declaration for "three thousand five hundred dollars lawful money in the United States" is too indefinite a description. (VII) CONVERSION OR DETENTION. A complaint or declaration in trover which does not allege a conversion by defendant is demurrable.[10] The allegation Allegation in the present tense.—A complaint for conversion which alleges ownership in the present tense instead of the time of the conversion is defective. Northness v. Hillestad, 87 Minn. 304, 91 N. W. 1112; Smith v. Force, 31 Minn. 119, 16 N. W. 764.

Title in plaintiff at the commencement of the action need not be averred. Hunt v. Hammel, 142 Cal. 456, 76 Pac. 378. But see Clapp v. Glidden, 39 Me. 448, which holds otherwise.

Answer in reconvention.—A defendant who alleges a conversion in his answer in reconvention must show that he was the owner of the property or entitled to the possession thereof. Beckham v. Burney, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 42 S. W. 1041.

Where right to sue is dependent upon a statute, plaintiff must bring himself within terms of statute. Lindale Brick Co. v. Smith, (Tex. Civ. App. 1909) 118 S. W. 568.

6. California.— Rosenthal v. McMann, 93 Cal. 505, 29 Pac. 121.

Indiana.— Kehr v. Hall, 117 Ind. 405, 20 N. E. 279.

Missouri.— Citizens' Bank v. Tiger Tail Mill, etc., Co., 152 Mo. 145, 53 S. W. 902; Golden v. Moore, 126 Mo. App. 518, 104 S. W. 481; Little Rock Bank v. Fisher, 55 Mo. App. 51.

Rhode Island.—Williams v. Smith, 28 R. I. 531, 68 Atl. 306.

Canada.— Morgan v. Rice, 16 Nova Scotia 368.

See 47 Cent. Dig. tit. "Trover and Conversion," § 197.

Use of term "assignee" after name of plaintiff does not of itself authorize the conclusion that the declaration purports to be for a cause of action that accrued to the assignors before assignment to plaintiff. Bloom v. Sexton, 33 Mich. 181.

7. Harvey v. Lidvall, 48 Oreg. 558, 87 Pac. 895.

Allegation that plaintiff's intestate was "seized and possessed" of the property is sufficient. Grant v. Hathaway, 118 Mo. App. 604, 96 S. W. 417.

In conversion for turpentine, collected in boxes cut from pine trees, it is sufficient to allege ownership of the turpentine; the ownership of the trees or land being immaterial. Melrose Mfg. Co. v. Kennedy, 59 Fla. 312, 51 So. 595.

8. Alabama.— Southern R. Co. v. Attalla, 147 Ala. 653, 41 So. 664.

Georgia.— Sparta Bank v. Butts, 1 Ga. App. 771, 57 S. E. 1061.

Indiana.— Stewart v. Long, 16 Ind. App. 164, 44 N. E. 63; Swope v. Paul, 4 Ind. App. 463, 31 N. E. 42.

Michigan.—Warren v. Dwyer, 91 Mich. 414, 51 N. W. 1062; Harvey v. McAdams, 32 Mich. 472.

Montana.—Paine v. British-Butte Min. Co., 41 Mont. 28, 108 Pac. 12, holding that plaintiff may plead that at the time of the conversion he was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the property, or he may set forth the facts showing his title and right of possession, but the averments of such facts must be clear and precise and certain to common intent.

Nebraska.— Fike v. Ott, 76 Nebr. 439, 107 N. W. 774; Reed v. McRill, 41 Nebr. 206, 59 N. W. 775. But a chattel mortgagee who sues a stranger for conversion must plead the facts which constitute his special ownership. Raymond v. Miller, 50 Nebr. 506, 70 N. W. 22. But see Kavanaugh v. Oberfelder, 37 Nebr. 647, 56 N. W. 316, in which a mortgagee recovered under a general allegation of ownership.

New York.— Heine v. Anderson, 2 Duer 318.

Tennessee.—Hawkins v. Pearce, 11 Humphr. 44.

Texas.— Shaw v. Adams, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 177.

See 47 Cent. Dig. tit. "Trover and Conversion," § 197.

If he undertakes to do so he must plead sufficient facts for the purpose. Anoka First Nat. Bank v. St. Croix Boom Corp., 41 Minn. 141, 42 N. W. 861; Paine v. British-Butte Min. Co., 41 Mont. 28, 108 Pac. 12.

As against a special demurrer for ambiguity and uncertainty, a complaint in an action for conversion is not sufficient which merely alleges facts from which title in plaintiff may be inferable, and where no direct allegation of ownership is made, title in plaintiff, as distinguished from any one else, must be the inevitable inference from the facts stated. Paine v. British-Butte Min. Co., 41 Mont. 28, 108 Pac. 12.

9. Richmond First Nat. Bank v. Gibbons, 7 Ind. App. 629, 35 N. E. 31; Paalzow v. North Carolina Estate Co., 104 N. C. 437, 10 S. E. 527.

10. Alabama.— Baker v. Malone, 126 Ala. 510, 28 So. 631.

of conversion may be general in character and without recital of evidentiary facts,[11] in the absence of a special demurrer,[12] or it may consist merely of a statement of facts which constitute a conversion.[13]

(VIII) TIME OF CONVERSION. It is not necessary to allege the precise minute or hour of the day when the goods were converted,[14] or the day of the month;[15]

Massachusetts.— Cumnock v. Newhuryport Sav. Inst., 142 Mass. 342, 7 N. E. 869, 56 Am. Rep. 679; Wells v. Connahle, 138 Mass. 513.

Texas.— Bryden v. Croft, (Civ. App. 1898) 46 S. W. 853; Field v. Davis, (Civ. App. 1895) 32 S. W. 71.

Wisconsin.— Palmer v. O'Rourke, 130 Wis. 507, 110 N. W. 389.

Illustrations.—An averment that defendant unlawfully, fraudulently, wilfully, and maliciously took the property is not an averment of a conversion. Triscony v. Orr, 49 Cal. 612. So an allegation that defendants, who had rightfully caused an attachment to be levied on property, did, "by and through" the officer, convert it to their own use, is demurrable as stating a mere conclusion of law. Burt v. Decker, 64 Iowa 106, 19 N. W. 873. "That the defendants took and converted goods to their own use, etc.," may constitute a count in trover, for the taking and converting may have been the same act. Hatch v. Holland, 28 U. C. Q. B. 213.

England.— Keyworth v. Hill, 3 B. & Ald. 687, 5 E. C. L. 394, 106 Eng. Reprint 811.

See 47 Cent. Dig. tit. "Trover and Conversion," § 198.

The word "converted" contains a concise notice to defendant that plaintiff will offer evidence of whatever is essential to the proof of a conversion. Thayer v. Gile, 42 Hun (N. Y.) 268.

The word "detained" in a declaration means an adverse detention, and it is unnecessary to plead leave and license specially. Bain v. McDonald, 32 U. C. Q. B. 190 [citing Whitmore v. Greene, 13 M. & W. 104].

Express promise to pay need not be alleged. Hitson v. Hurt, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 360, 101 S. W. 292.

Allegation that defendant converted the assets mentioned to his own use does not necessarily constitute a complaint in trover and conversion. Brayton v. Sherman, 1 Silv. Sup. (N. Y.) 420, 5 N. Y. Suppl. 602 [reversed on other grounds in 119 N. Y. 623, 23 N. E. 471].

Wyoming.— Cone v. Ivinson, 4 Wyo. 203, 33 Pac. 31, 35 Pac. 933.

See 47 Cent. Dig. tit. "Trover and Conversion," § 198.

Joint conversion.— In trover, where two counts showed a single trespass, and one a single conversion, alleged to have been the act of defendants, the wrong complained of was charged as the joint act of defendants. Mattingly v. Houston, (Ala. 1909) 52 So. 78.

14. Hunt v. Hammel, 142 Cal. 456, 76 Pac. 378.

The day, when stated, is immaterial. Dietus v. Fuss, 8 Md. 148. But see Williams v. McKissack, 125 Ala. 544, 27 So. 922, holding that if the time of conversion be alleged it must be proved with certainty.

15. Peacock v. Feaster, 51 Fla. 269, 40 So.

but the complaint must comply with the terms of a statute prescribing allegations as to time.[16]

(IX) DEMAND AND REFUSAL. Where an actual conversion is alleged an averment of demand and refusal is not required.[17]

(X) DAMAGES. A declaration or complaint which alleges the value of the property converted will not be adjudged bad because it lacks an averment of damage,[18] or contains a prayer for possession instead of damages,[19] or for a valuation fixed by agreement instead of general damages.[20]

(XI) CURE OR WAIVER OF DEFECTS. Insufficiencies of a petition or declaration may be supplied by defendant's plea or answer,[21] or may be waived by defendant's failure to demur,[22] or to object to the admission of evidence under the defective or wanting allegation.[23]

b. Plea or Answer — (I) IN GENERAL. Under the common-law system of pleading, pleas in trover are either general or special. The general pleas are:

74; Leon v. Kerrison, 47 Fla. 178, 36 So. 173.

Allegations of time of conversion are not essential, for the statute of limitations is defensive matter. Hixon v. Pixley, 15 Nev. 475; Young v. Wall, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 69; George v. Graham, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 69. Contra, Mount v. Cubberly, 19 N. J. L. 124; Glenn v. Garrison, 17 N. J. L. 1.

Ohio.— Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 49 Ohio St. 489, 32 N. E. 476, 34 Am. St. Rep. 579, 21 L. R. A. 117.

Wisconsin.— Johnson v. Ashland Lumber Co., 45 Wis. 119.

See 47 Cent. Dig. tit. "Trover and Conversion," § 200.

A complaint may allege an unlawful taking and conversion of personal property in one paragraph, and in another plead that, if it should appear that the taking was lawful, then the conversion occurred through a refusal to surrender the property. Bryden v. Croft, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 46 S. W. 853.

Failure to allege demand and refusal is cured by an answer setting up ownership of the property in defendant. Daggett v. Gray, 110 Cal. 169, 42 Pac. 568; Rosenau v. Syring, 25 Oreg. 386, 35 Pac. 844.

Allegation of wilful and malicious taking of property and refusal to return after repeated demands is sufficient to warrant exemplary damages for maliciously retaining property after demand. Shandy v. McDonald, 38 Mont. 393, 100 Pac. 203.

18. Illinois.— Mattingly v. Darwin, 23 Ill. 618.

Indiana.— Ryan v. Hurley, 119 Ind. 115, 21 N. E. 463; Frederick v. Koons, 40 Ind. App. 421, 81 N. E. 1155; Allen v. Toner, 24 Ind. App. 121, 56 N. E. 250.

Maryland.— Richardson v. Hall, 21 Md. 399; Stirling v. Garritee, 18 Md. 468.

New York.— Gleason v. Morrison, 20 Misc. 320, 45 N. Y. Suppl. 684.

Pleading specially.— Special damages and the facts to sustain them must be pleaded. Smith v. Connor, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 46 S. W. 267; Bodley v. Reynolds, 8 Q. B. 779, 10 Jur. 310, 15 L. J. Q. B. 219, 55 E. C. L. 779. Likewise that plaintiff is proceeding under a statute providing for double damages. Springer v. Jenkins, 47 Oreg. 502, 84 Pac. 479.

19. Howard v. Barton, 28 Minn. 116, 9 N. W. 584.

20. Yardum v. Wolf, 33 N. Y. App. Div. 247, 54 N. Y. Suppl. 192.

21. Salida Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. Davis, 16 Colo. App. 294, 64 Pac. 1046; Ferrera v. Parke, 19 Oreg. 141, 23 Pac. 883; Ramsey v. Hurley, 72 Tex. 194, 12 S. W. 56.

22. Brickley v. Walker, 68 Wis. 563, 32 N. W. 773.

23. Smith v. Force, 31 Minn. 119, 16 N. W. 704. But see Greenthal v. Lincoln, 67 Conn. 372, 35 Atl. 266, where it was held that where defendant's answer set up no title in him, failure to demur thereto, or to object

(1) "Not guilty," [24] which denies plaintiff's title, right of possession, and the wrongful conversion alleged; and (2) "Not possessed," which denies plaintiff's right of immediate possession, or actual possession at the time of the alleged conversion.[25] A special plea admits plaintiff's right and confesses that he once had a cause of action against defendant for the act alleged to be wrongful, but avoids plaintiff's right of recovery by setting up the statute of limitations or matters of discharge.[26] The answer in an action for conversion under the code system of pleading is governed by the general principles of pleading; [27] but it is to evidence of title, was not a waiver of an objection to a finding of title in defendant, based on such evidence.

24. In this country "not guilty" has been very commonly employed because it admits all defenses except statutes of limitation, releases, and other matters of discharge. Vaden v. Ellis, 18 Ark. 355; 2 Greenleaf Ev. § 648.

In England prior to the adoption of the Hilary rules "not guilty" was a common plea. But by virtue of St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 42, § 1, which provided that the judges of the superior courts of law at Westminster might alter the system of pleading, the following rule relating to trover was adopted: "In actions on the case, the plea of not guilty shall operate as a denial only of the breach of duty or wrongful act alleged to have been committed by the defendant, and not of the facts stated in the inducement, and no other defence than such denial shall be admissible under that plea." Reg. Gen. Hilary Term, 4 Wm. IV, Pleadings in Particular Actions, IV, par. 1. Under this rule the plea of "not guilty" operates as a denial of the conversion only, and not of plaintiff's title. 1 Chitty Pl. 530.

Denial of the conversion alleged is equivalent to plea of general issue. Fenlason v. Rackliff, 50 Me. 362.

26. Indiana.— Coffin v. Anderson, 4 Blackf. 395.

Iowa.— Howes v. Carver, 7 Iowa 491.

Michigan.— The general issue of "not guilty" and a notice that special defenses will be offered is sufficient foundation for the introduction of the proof thereof. Grenier v. Hild, 124 Mich. 222, 82 N. W. 1050; Hine v. Commercial Bank, 119 Mich. 448, 78 N. W. 471; Eureka Iron, etc., Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 489, 33 N. W. 834; Adams v. Kellogg, 63 Mich. 105, 29 N. W. 679; Frankel v. Coots, 41 Mich. 75, 1 N. W. 940; Fry v. Soper, 39 Mich. 727. Notice of special defenses under the general issue is not required in justice of the peace courts. McLaughlin v. Smith, 45 Mich. 277, 7 N. W. 908.

Missouri.— Fry v. Baxter, 10 Mo. 302.

New York.— Hurst v. Cook, 19 Wend. 463.

England.— Hartford v. Jones, 1 Ld. Raym. 393, 91 Eng. Reprint 1161.

Canada.— Millard v. Kirkpatrick, 4 U. C. Q. B. 248.

By special plea or answer defendant may set up anything which confesses and avoids plaintiff's right of action, as an estoppel (Norwegian Plow Co. v. Haines, 21 Nebr. 689, 33 N. W. 475), ratification (Steinhardt v. Bell, 80 Ala. 208), accord and satisfaction (McFadden v. Schroeder, 4 Ind. App. 305, 29 N. E. 491, 30 N. E. 711), "taken damage feasant" (Carey v. Dazey, 5 Harr. (Del.) 445), that the property was purchased by defendant from plaintiff (Gunn v. Gillespie, 2 U. C. Q. B. 124), redelivery of the goods to plaintiff (Johnson v. Lamb, 13 U. C. Q. B. 508), subsequent sale of the goods on execution in favor of defendant and against plaintiff (Wehle v. Butler, 35 N. Y. Super. Ct. 1, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 139, 43 How. Pr. 5), and plaintiff's own illegal act or fraud in obtaining the property in controversy (Miller v. Hirschberg, 27 Oreg. 522, 40 Pac. 506; Keating Implement, etc., Co. v. Terre Haute Carriage, etc., Co., 11 Tex. Civ. App. 216, 32 S. W. 556; Boucher v. Shewan, 14 U. C. C. P. 419). But no evidence of a fact which tends to show a confession and avoidance will be admitted unless a foundation therefor has been laid by appropriate averments in the plea or answer. Blum v. Langfeld, 37 N. Y. App. Div. 590, 56 N. Y. Suppl. 298; Boyle v. Williams, 1 Misc. (N. Y.) 112, 20 N. Y. Suppl. 727; Luckey v. Gannon, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 209, 37 How. Pr. 134; Geo. R. Dickinson Paper Co. v. Mail Pub. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1895) 31 S. W. 1083; Wells v. Abrahams, L. R. 7 Q. B. 554, 41 L. J. Q. B. 306, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 326, 20 Wkly. Rep. 659.

A special plea is bad in form if it amounts only to the general issue (Briggs v. Brown, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 87; Kennedy v. Strong, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 289; Turner v. Waldo, 40 Vt. 51), or if the case can be tried on a general traverse (Beall v. Folmar, 122 Ala. 414, 26 So. 1; Webb v. Fox, 7 T. R. 391, 101 Eng. Reprint 1037; Monaghan v. Hayes, 4 U. C. C. P. 1).

27. See PLEADING, 31 Cyc. 126.

Illustrations.— It is not error to overrule a demurrer to an answer in trover which amounts to an argumentative denial (Leary v. Moran, 106 Ind. 560, 7 N. E. 236), which tenders the property, disclaims title, and alleges that the property was worth nothing for hire (Trammell v. Mallory, 115 Ga. 748, broader in its scope than the common-law pleas in trover, for it may contain all the defenses which defendant may have, if they are not inconsistent, whether they be in abatement or bar, whole or partial, legal or equitable, or, under some circumstances, a counter-claim.[28]

(II) ALLEGATIONS AS TO TITLE OR RIGHT TO POSSESSION. Defendant in trover may deny plaintiff's title or right of possession,[29] or may plead title in himself to the property alleged to have been converted,[30] or to the land from which he severed and removed it.[31]

(III) DUPLICITY. At common law a plea setting up more than one defense is bad for duplicity.[32] This rule of pleading was abrogated in England by the statute of Anne,[33] which has been adopted substantially in many of the states of the United States.[34]

c. Replication or Reply. Inasmuch as there is no legal excuse or justification for a wrongful conversion, a replication is superfluous and improper where the plea is either "not guilty" or "not possessed," but it is proper where the plea is a special one of limitations or discharge.[35]

42 S. E. 62), or which refers to the property described in the second paragraph in plaintiff's second cause of action (Spalding v. Allred, 23 Utah 354, 64 Pac. 1100). A denial that defendant took the goods wrongfully or unlawfully is an admission of the conversion (Proctor v. Irvin, 22 Mont. 547, 57 Pac. 183; Podlech v. Phelan, 13 Utah 333, 44 Pac. 838); but an admission of a demand and non-compliance therewith is not an admission of a refusal to deliver (Halbran v. Gray, 25 Misc. (N. Y.) 693, 55 N. Y. Suppl. 501).

Under this statute pleas manifestly inconsistent could not be joined; but, the statute being regarded as remedial, the rule was relaxed to permit the pleading of several defenses, even though they appear to be contradictory or inconsistent. 1 Tidd Pr. 655.

d. Amendments. Amendments are liberally allowed in actions for conversion.[36] Thus an amendment may be made alleging that goods claimed to have been converted were wilfully and maliciously taken,[37] inserting an allegation of demand,[38] averring a new time and place when the goods were received by defendant,[39] or stating more specifically the acts of conversion.[40] But amendments will not be allowed that state a new cause of action,[41] or unless they are tendered at the proper time.[42]

2. Issues, Proof, and Variance — a. Evidence Admissible Under Declaration, Petition, or Complaint. Under an averment of ownership plaintiff may show any kind or quantity of interest in the goods converted which will sustain trover;[43] and under the name of an article converted it is competent to prove that other things essential to its use were taken with it.[44] A general allegation of conversion will permit proof of successive conversions;[45] and under the averment that defendant wrongfully took, carried away, and converted to his own use, evidence may be admitted to show that he obtained possession of plaintiff's property by fraud, forgery, or under a usurious contract.[46] But an allegation of demand of the proceeds of a sale will not support proof of a demand for the property itself;[47] under a general averment of damage plaintiff cannot prove special losses or a greater loss than the amount stated;[48] and in trover for stock converted by a

b. Matters of Defense That Must Be Proved. Limitations, release, ratification, and all matters of discharge are affirmative defenses and must be established by defendant.[50]

c. Evidence Admissible Under General Issue. All defenses in bar are admissible under the general issue except matters of confession and avoidance;[51] and defendant, having tendered such an issue, may offer evidence of any fact which tends to negative either the act of conversion,[52] the wrongfulness of the conversion alleged,[53] plaintiff's ownership,[54] or his right of possession.[55] And whenever a defendant may show title either in himself or a stranger he may do so under a general traverse.[56] So, under the general issue, defendant may show a taking conversion of a thing different from the one described [69] is a fatal variance. Plaintiff must prove the title which he has chosen to plead (Gregory Point Mar. R. Co. v. Selleck, 43 Conn. 320), but not necessarily to the extent of perfection alleged if a less interest will sustain a verdict (Smith v. Konst, 50 Wis. 360, 7 N. W. 293).

Illustrations.— Variances have been held immaterial as to place (Colorado First Nat. Bank v. Brown, 85 Tex. 80, 23 S. W. 862), and time of conversion, if shown to have been before the commencement of the action (Bancroft Co. v. Haslett, 106 Cal. 151, 39 Pac. 602; Aldrich v. Higgins, 77 Conn. 370, 59 Atl. 498; Meyer v. Doherty, 133 Wis. 398, 113 N. W. 671, 126 Am. St. Rep. 967, 13 L. R. A. N. S. 247). Conversion of a mare may be shown under the allegation "horse" (Drexel v. Levan, 2 Woodw. (Pa.) 59), of a due-bill described as a promissory note (Taylor v. Morgan, 3 Watts (Pa.) 333), and of a city warrant, No. 893, alleged as No. 896 (Roe v. Cutter, 4 Wash. 611, 30 Pac. 663). An allegation of ownership will be sustained by proof of a mortgage title. Duggan v. Wright, 157 Mass. 228, 32 N. E. 159. A conversion alleged to have been committed by defendants and others is sustained by proof that defendants alone committed it. Barron v. Davis, 4 N. H. 338. And under the code of procedure, abolishing forms of action, when a plaintiff in his complaint alleged and set out a case in trover, and the proof showed that it should have been in the nature of assumpsit for money had and received, plaintiff was entitled to recover, notwithstanding the variance. Oates v. Kendall, 67 N. C. 241. Where the controversy is only as to the amount of property converted it is not necessary to prove that the taking was tortious, although so alleged. Foster Lumber Co. v. Kelly, 9 Kan. App. 377, 58 Pac. 124.

72. Evidence generally see 16 Cyc. 821.

73. Derby v. Gallup, 5 Minn. 119.

It will be presumed that ownership and right to possession continue until shown to have been parted with (Laubenheimer v. Bach, 19 Mont. 177, 47 Pac. 803), that a consignee is the owner of the goods shipped (Benjamin v. Levy, 39 Minn. 11, 38 N. W. 702), and that a father, instead of his unmarried son who lives with him, is the owner of chattels on the premises (Reid v. Butt, 25 Ga. 28).

A possession in defendant nearly a year after he sold and boxed goods for shipment will not be presumed in him in the absence of evidence as to what became of them. Whitney v. Slauson, 30 Barb. (N. Y.) 276. Nor will a bare possession of a chattel be presumed to be tortious (Glaze v. McMillion, 7 Port. (Ala.) 279), or be evidence of title unless held adversely (Willis v. Snelling, 6 Rich. (S. C.) 280). Defendant's possession is not presumptive evidence of ownership as against the recent previous possession of plaintiff (Weston v. Higgins, 40 Me. 102) and an unexplained possession will be deemed to be held under him who next before had possession of the chattel (Barnes v. Mobley, 21 Ala. 232).

Where title in plaintiff's ancestor is admitted, recovery can be defeated only by proof that such title has been divested. Powers v. Hatter, 152 Ala. 636, 44 So. 859.

74. Stickney v. Smith, 5 Minn. 486. See also Spencer v. Morgan, 5 Ind. 146, holding that a conversion may be inferred from a failure of a bailee to deposit in a bank tling the holder to the payment of money will be deemed to be worth its face value.[75]

(II) BURDEN OF PROOF.[76] In trover the burden of proof is on plaintiff, and it remains with him throughout as to traversed material averments of his declaration, petition, or complaint.[77] Where, however, plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, the burden of evidence shifts to defendant to prove title in himself or a third person,[78] that he is a bona fide purchaser or holder,[79] that he has enhanced the value of the article converted,[80] that plaintiff's title is fraudulent,[81] and facts that are within defendant's own knowledge or control.[82]

b. Admissibility — (I) IN GENERAL. Evidence is admissible if it tends to prove or disprove a material allegation or denial of either party's pleading;[83]

Presumption of license.— A tenant of timber land who cut trees on adjoining land will be presumed to have had license or authority therefor from the owner of the latter tract (Winlack v. Geist, 107 Pa. St. 297, 52 Am. Rep. 473); but where such a trespasser cuts timber under the license of one not the owner, the latter will not be presumed to have any authority from the owner of the land to grant such license (Millard v. McDonald Lumber Co., 64 Wis. 626, 25 N. W. 656).

Where one having possession of property, and knowing that he has no claim to it, withholds it from the true owner, he may be presumed to have assented to the wrongful act of another by which such possession was obtained. Anderson v. Kincheloe, 30 Mo. 520.

dence any act, declaration, or admission of plaintiff which tends to contradict a material averment of his pleading or disclose his consent to the act of conversion;[87] or of defendant which admits his liability or disproves his defense.[88]

(v) Motive and Good Faith of Defendant.[89] Evidence of defendant's good faith is admissible when material as to whether his act constituted a conversion,[90] or when it relates to the measure of damages;[91] but, intent not being essential to conversion, such evidence is usually not admissible.[92]

(vi) Indictment of Defendant For Larceny. Evidence of a prior indictment and conviction[93] of the thief is admissible in trover against a purchaser of stolen goods; but in trover against the thief evidence of his acquittal is inadmissible.[94]

(vii) Existence, Identity, and Description of Property. Evidence of any fact which relates to the existence or non-existence,[95] to the identity,[96]

v. Elseffer, 132 Mich. 100, 92 N. W. 772; Allison v. Mattlieu, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 235; Striker v. McMichael, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 89.

Where plaintiff has offered no evidence touching the identity of the thing converted to the description,[97] or to the quantity [98] of property in controversy, which is alleged to have been wrongfully converted, is admissible.

(VIII) TITLE AND RIGHT TO POSSESSION — (A) Of Plaintiff. Evidence, oral or written, which tends in any degree to prove [99] or to disprove [1] plaintiff's title or possession is admissible even though it be statements made by plaintiff himself,[2] a lease, or record of an action, to which defendant was not a party,[3] or a sale to defraud creditors, defendant not being one of them.[4]

(B) Of Defendant. The right of defendant to the admission of evidence in support of title or right of possession in himself is as broad as that of plaintiff,[5] evidence offered by defendant in that regard will not be admitted. Whistler v. Teague, 66 Ind. 565.

Insolvency of maker cannot be shown where he is defendant in the action (Stephenson v. Thayer, 63 Me. 143; Ackerman v. Green, 195 Mo. 124, 93 S. W. 255), nor where the action for conversion is brought several months before the maturity of the note (Kellogg v. Tompson, 142 Mass. 76, 6 N. E. 860).

When a party places his defense on the insolvency of a third person, it is incumbent on him to prove it (Walrod v. Ball, 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 271), for the ability of the maker to pay the note will be presumed until the contrary is proved (Neff v. Clute, 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 466). And as the value of commercial paper must depend largely upon the integrity and business habits of those who issue it, the mere fact that the maker of a note, which has been wrongfully converted, has not sufficient property liable to execution to pay it cannot of itself be regarded as a good defense in an action of trover for its wrongful conversion. c. Weight and Sufficiency[15] — (I) Degree of Proof Required. A preponderance of the evidence relating to any material issue in trover is sufficient to sustain it,[16] even when the act of conversion alleged constitutes a crime.[17] Very slight evidence will suffice when not excepted to on the trial.[18]

(II) Existence, Identity, and Description of Property. A general description of the property in controversy, given by witnesses, will suffice, if it enables the jury to identify the property with reasonable certainty and will justify them in returning a verdict for actual damages in some amount.[19]

Illustrations.— An officer's return showing that he took possession of chattels and sold them before the trial of an action to determine the title sustains trover against plaintiff in the action in which the writ of attachment was issued. Schluter v. Jacobs, 10 Colo. 449, 15 Pac. 813. A warehouseman's sale of grain, without notice to the owner, is sufficient proof of a conversion, notwithstanding defendant's allegation that the sale was made necessary by the inroads of insects. Jordan v. Shireman, 28 Ind. 136. An admission by defendant that he has lost the goods is sufficient evidence of a conversion, without demand and refusal. La Place v. Aupoix, 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 407. A public officer, upon being required to make a report of the receipts of his office and to pay the same into the state treasury, replied that he had received no money belonging to the state. This reply was sufficient evidence of a conversion of all of the money of the state which had come into his hands, as fast as received. People v. Van Ness, 79 Cal. 84, 21 Pac. 554, 12 Am. St. Rep. 134. That wood was one day in plaintiff's possession and two days has been commenced, very slight evidence of conversion will suffice.[26] But the proffered evidence of a conversion will be insufficient if it would not sustain a verdict, or if the jury find that the acts and conduct of defendant do not amount to a denial of plaintiff's ownership or a deprivation to him of his property.[27]

(B) Time of Conversion. Prima facie the date of conversion is the day when the goods were wrongfully taken.[28] Evidence which discloses a conversion after the institution of the action, or within a period which began prior to, and terminated after, that event, is insufficient.[29]

(C) Connection of Defendant With Act of Conversion. The connection of defendant with a conversion will be sufficiently shown by proof of any facts or circumstances which will justify an inference that he assisted in wrongfully taking the goods, shared in the proceeds thereof with guilty knowledge, or participated in some act which in law amounted to a conversion.[30]

(v) Value of Converted Property. A verdict for nominal damages will be sustained, if an actual conversion has been proved, even though evidence as to the value of the property converted be entirely wanting;[31] but a verdict for more than nominal damages will be reversed if there be no evidence of value, or the evidence be too indefinite, uncertain, or weak to sustain a judgment.[32]

D. Damages — 1. Grounds and Elements of Compensatory Damages — a. In General — (i) Measure of Damages in General. The actual loss or injury suffered by plaintiff is in general the measure of damages in an action for a conversion.[33] If the conversion be a technical one, or if no actual loss be shown, defendant will nevertheless be liable for nominal damages.[34] Double damages,

(II) As Affecting Liability For Costs. Damages in trover are given as a compensation for property converted, and should not be affected in amount by the right of one party to receive, or the liability of the other to pay, costs.[36]

(III) Amount Received by Defendant. The measure of damages in case of the conversion of money or its equivalent is the amount thereof with interest.[37] In the case of the conversion of property which has been reduced to money by defendant the measure of damages is also the amount received with interest.[38]

(IV) Special Property or Qualified Right of Plaintiff. A plaintiff who had only a special property or qualified interest in goods which have been converted can recover only the value of such property or interest, not exceeding, however, the value of the goods, against a defendant who held the title to, or was entitled to the remaining interest in, the goods;[39] but as against a stranger who had neither title nor right of possession plaintiff may recover the full value of the converted property.[40]

(v) Depreciation of Property. The depreciation and deterioration of property between the dates of its conversion and return to plaintiff are proper elements of damages.[41]

(vi) Wrongful Use of Converted Property. No damages are recoverable for any wrongful or injurious use made of converted property by defendant after the conversion alleged.[42]

(vii) Cost of Replacing Property. The cost of replacing property is not a proper measure of damages,[43] except in cases of conversion of shares of stock,[44] of property having no market value,[45] or where plaintiff was compelled to procure other goods to fill a previously made contract or supply an immediate need of an article specially manufactured.[46]

(viii) Value of Use of Property. As a general rule the value of the use of the property which has been converted and not returned is neither a proper measure nor a proper item of damages.[47] But the lessee of a chattel who has been deprived of it by the wrongful act of the lessor may recover in trover the value of the use of the chattel for the remainder of the term.[48] And an owner may recover the value of the use of a chattel during the period intervening between its conversion and return to him,[49] or between an original wrongful and a subsequent rightful detention or taking.[50]

The place of the wrongful taking is to be deemed the place of conversion, and not that of a subsequent demand and refusal. Ward v. Carson River Wood Co., 13 Nev. 44. But where plaintiff's logs were removed from his land to S and there manufactured into lumber, he may recover their value at S, even though he might have treated the removal as a conversion, as he could have brought replevin at S (Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218); and in trover against one who removed sand from plaintiff's land and sold it, the measure of damages was the value of the sand, with interest, at the place of sale (Nashville, etc., R. Co. v. Karthaus, 150 Ala. 633, 43 So. 79).

If the goods have no market value at the place of conversion, their value at such place may be shown in other ways (Marsh v. Union Pac. R. Co., 9 Fed. 873, 3 McCrary 236), and resort may be had to evidence of market value at the nearest place where there is a market (Wallingford v. Kaiser, 191 N. Y. 392, 84 N. E. 295, 123 Am. (B) Property of Fluctuating Value — (1) IN GENERAL. If the property converted was of fluctuating value, the owner may recover, according to some authorities, the highest market value within a reasonable time after conversion;[63] according to others, the highest value attained between the time of conversion and the bringing of the action, with interest;[64] but by the weight of authority, the highest value between conversion and the day of trial.[65]

(2) SHARES OF STOCK. The courts are not agreed as to the correct measure of damages for the conversion of shares of stock. There are three recognized rules: (1) The value of the stock at the time of conversion;[66] (2) the highest membership in a board of trade,[77] and other documents[78] is the value of the property conveyed or represented thereby.

(VIII) INCREASE OF, OR DIVIDENDS ON, CONVERTED PROPERTY. In an action for conversion of chattels or shares of stock the measure of damages does not permit proof of the increase of said chattels, or dividends accruing on said stock, since the wrong alleged was committed.[79]

(IX) INCREASE OF VALUE BY ACT OR EXPENDITURE OF DEFENDANT — (A) In General. The value added to a chattel by the labor or expenditure of defendant will not be recoverable, unless he enhanced the value with knowledge of the owner's rights and in defiance thereof.[80]

(B) Cutting Logs or Harvesting Crops. The amount recoverable in trover for logs or crops wrongfully converted depends upon the innocency of defendant, be he the original wrong-doer or his vendee. If defendant acted under a mistake or a bona fide claim of right, he will be liable, in some states, for the value of the crops or trees as they stood immediately prior to the cutting;[81] in other states for the value immediately after the cutting, when the conversion is deemed to be complete;[82] and in still other states for the enhanced value.[83] But if the trespass was a wilful one no deduction will be made for the value of defendant's labor or expenditures.[84] If defendant be an innocent purchaser from an innocent trespasser, he is liable for the value of the property when it was taken by the latter;[85] if from a wilful trespasser, the value at the time of his purchase;[86] and if he purchase with notice of the owner's rights, he must pay the value borne by the property at the time of the latter's demand therefor.[87]

(x) Amount For Which Property Was Sold or Agreed to Be Sold. The measure of damages is not what the converted property was sold for at an auction or attachment sale,[88] was sold for by plaintiff or others to defendant or his debtor,[89] the price paid for it by plaintiff,[90] or what defendant had agreed to sell it for.[91]

c. Special Damages Additional to Value of Property — (i) In General. A palpable injury beyond the value of the property converted may be a ground for recovery in trover,[92] if it be specially pleaded.[93]

(ii) Damages From Detention. It is proper to award as damages not only the value of the property converted, but also compensation for the wrongful detention thereof, such compensation being either interest on the value[94] or a greater sum if interest will not fully compensate the owner.[95]

(III) EXPENSE OF RECOVERING PROPERTY. As a general rule, reasonable and necessary expenses incurred in recovering the property converted are a proper element of damage;[96] but such expenses are not recoverable against a purchaser in good faith of the converted property,[97] nor where the expenditures have not resulted in its recovery.[98]

(IV) COSTS AND EXPENSES OF SUIT. A plaintiff is not entitled to recover attorney's fees, or any expenses of the prosecution of an action for conversion beyond taxable costs, except as provided for by statute.[99]

2. MITIGATION OF DAMAGES — a. In General. Strictly speaking, mitigating circumstances are admissible only under the issue of exemplary damages, for not even the motive and intent of defendant in converting property are allowed to affect the owner's right to recover his actual loss.[1] But trover is to some extent an equitable action,[2] and it very often happens that justice to defendant demands the admission in evidence of certain facts or circumstances, not by way of excuse, Plaintiff will not be allowed damages for detention which are remote and speculative, such as profits that might have been derived from the use of the thing converted. Sledge v. Reid, 73 N. C. 440; Farmers' Bank v. McKee, 2 Pa. St. 318. In Read v. Fairbanks, 13 C. B. 692, 1 C. L. R. 787, 17 Jur. 918, 22 L. J. C. P. 206, 76 E. C. L. 692, it was held that freight which might have been earned by a ship which defendant converted is not a proper element of damages. But in Cockburn v. Muskoka Mill, etc., Co., 13 Ont. 343, it was held that plaintiff, being unable to procure other logs to saw, was entitled to the loss of profits caused by defendant's conversion of his logs. See, generally, DAMAGES, 13 Cyc. 29.

Damages for interruption of business by detention of property are recoverable only upon proof that such interruption was the necessary result of defendant's wrong under the conditions existing at the time. Bowen v. King, 146 N. C. 385, 59 S. E. 1044.

But see Williams v. Deen, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 575, 24 S. W. 536, holding such expenses not recoverable where the property was taken by defendant through mistake for which the plaintiff was as much responsible as defendant.

Under statute entitling plaintiff to "a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property," in an action for conversion of wheat by a tenant, expenses incurred by the landlord in paying the lien of a farm laborer for wages are not proper elements of damage. but for the purpose of determining and ascertaining plaintiff's real loss, or that portion thereof caused by defendant.[3]

b. Expenses Incurred in Caring For Property. Expenses, such as freight, storage, insurance, and feeding of animals, incurred by defendant in protecting and preserving the property in controversy, should be allowed in mitigation of damages;[4] but no allowance should be made for expenses of the very act of conversion,[5] nor for services or expenditures included in the consideration of a contract made with a third party.[6]

c. Attachment of Property While in Hands of Defendant. An attachment by plaintiff in trover of goods while in defendant's possession affords no ground for mitigation of damages where it appears that said goods were returned to and retained by defendant.[7]

d. Return of Property to Plaintiff. As a general rule, an offer to return property converted is not admissible even in mitigation of damages;[8] but where the conversion is technical, inadvertent, or the result of a mistake, and the property is still in statu quo, an offer to return it may be shown in mitigation of damages.[9] Acceptance of an offer to return followed by a reassumption of control by plaintiff will not bar an action for conversion,[10] but it will mitigate the damages,[11] and fix the measure thereof at the difference between the value of the property at the time of its conversion and its value at the time of its return.[12]

e. Appropriation of Property or Proceeds to Use of Plaintiff. By the weight of authority, a tortious possessor cannot mitigate damages by showing an application of the property or its proceeds, either by himself or others, to plaintiff's use or benefit;[13] but in some jurisdictions such application is allowed in mitigation of damages.[14]

f. Deduction of Sums Received. A defendant in trover is entitled to a deduction from the value of the converted property, of all sums received by the owner thereof from defendant or defendant's vendor on account of the same.[15]

g. Deduction of Liens or Other Claims Against Property. Damages may be mitigated by the deduction of any lien on the property in controversy, or of any

h. Retention Acquiesced in by Plaintiff. Long-continued acquiescence in another's possession with knowledge of his claim of right will, in an action of trover, bar plaintiff's right to damages that would not have been suffered but for such acquiescence.[17]

3. Exemplary Damages. Exemplary damages may be recovered whenever it appears that defendant's taking of the property was characterized by malice, oppression, or a wanton disregard of the owner's rights;[18] but not against one taking under a bona fide claim of right.[19]

4. Inadequate or Excessive Damages. The trial court may require a remittitur or grant a new trial whenever the verdict is plainly excessive or inadequate, and the court should do so if necessary to meet the ends of justice.[20]

E. Trial, Judgment, and Review — 1. In General — a. Dismissal, Nonsuit, and Stay of Proceedings. A nonsuit in an action of trover will be justified

by plaintiff's failure to offer evidence tending to prove a material allegation of his declaration or complaint, such as a wrongful conversion or the value of the property taken;[21] but not by a failure to prove a matter immaterial to the case, such as malice, or demand when the taking was tortious, or a material matter against an unnecessary party.[22] So it is error to dismiss some of plaintiffs when defendant asks for affirmative relief;[23] but it is not error to stay the action on defendant's paying the costs and redelivering the property to plaintiff, where it is unchanged in condition, and plaintiff makes no claim for special damages.[24]

b. Scope of Inquiry and Power of Court. Questions of title may be tried in trover;[25] but they must relate to the legal title,[26] and it is not competent for the court to attempt to adjust equities between the parties.[27]

c. Leave to Tender Property Into Court. Defendant may bring the specific chattel involved in an action of conversion into court and make a tender thereof in mitigation of damages,[28] having first obtained leave so to do by a motion addressed to the discretion of the judge, whose decision is final.[29]

d. Reception of Evidence. The court has large discretion as to the form in which evidence shall be submitted,[30] and as to the order of its introduction,[31] including the admission or rejection of evidence in rebuttal or surrebuttal which should have been introduced in chief,[32] and permission to a plaintiff who has rested his case to reopen it and make further proof.[33]

e. Reference. It is the duty of the court, when an action for conversion has been referred, to see that the measure of damages adopted conforms to the rule applicable in such trials by juries.[34]

2. Questions For Jury — a. Title and Right to Possession. Whenever in an action of trover claim of title and right of possession at the time of the conversion is controverted, the issue should be submitted to the jury both when the testimony pertinent thereto is conflicting and when reasonable minds might draw different conclusions from an undisputed state of facts;[35] but it is error to submit such

Where the testimony was undisputed, that defendant claimed to own the property absolutely, it was unnecessary to submit the issue of conversion to the jury if they found faith of defendant in trover are material issues they must be passed on by the jury, and not by the court.[41]

d. Demand. Whether or not a demand has been made upon defendant for the property is ordinarily a question of fact to be determined by the jury;[42] but the question of a demand need not be submitted to the jury where plaintiff fails to make out even a prima facie case of conversion,[43] nor where the evidence conclusively shows a demand.[44]

e. Waiver of Conversion. Whether certain acts or conduct of plaintiff amount to a waiver of the conversion alleged is a mixed question of law and fact to be passed on by the jury under instructions of the court.[45]

f. Damages. In trover the rule of damages is a question of law for the court,[46] and the amount thereof, under the rule given by the court, a question of fact for the jury,[47] even in a default case.[48]

3. Instructions — a. In General. The court should instruct the jury fully as to the law applicable under the evidence of the particular case.[49] An instruction is properly refused where it does not state the law correctly,[50] or the evidence does not warrant it,[51] or renders it superfluous,[52] or the point has already been covered by other instructions.[53] An instruction is erroneous which submits an issue not in controversy,[54] submits a question of exemplary damages when plaintiff has proved no right to actual damages,[55] gives plaintiff a right of election as to the measure of damages where defendant asks for and is entitled to affirmative relief,[56] fails to separate law and fact,[57] provides for relief not prayed for and not proper under the facts,[58] prescribes an erroneous rule of damages,[59] or is otherwise misleading.[60] A defective instruction, however, will often be no ground for a reversal, if there was no request for a more accurate one,[61] or if the defect is one of form rather than substance.[62]

b. Invading Province of Jury. An instruction invades the province of the jury, and the giving of it is reversible error, when it assumes a fact as proved where the evidence only tends to prove it,[63] or the evidence in regard to it is contradictory;[64] when it takes from the jury a case in which there is sufficient evidence to sustain a finding;[65] when it ignores the sole issue on which the case was tried;[66] passes on the sufficiency of the evidence;[67] directs the jury to consider a particular part of the evidence as of greater weight;[68] withdraws other issues from the jury;[69] directs the jury to find for plaintiff in a particular event when they might find from other testimony that there was no right of recovery;[70] directs the allowance of a given rate of interest where the allowing of interest is discretionary with the jury;[71] or directs a verdict on the testimony of one witness when other witnesses have testified to the same matter.[72]

c. Title and Right to Property. Where title or right to property alleged to have been wrongfully converted by defendant is in issue, a general instruction that plaintiff must prove it will suffice;[73] and such an instruction should be given even though plaintiff's testimony as to his title is uncontradicted.[74] And defendant is entitled to an instruction in his favor as to title, if the evidence warrants it.[75]

Subsequently stating law incorrectly.— Where, in an action for the conversion of property, there was evidence that a third person owned the property as trustee, and the court correctly charged that plaintiff to recover must show that he was, at the time of the taking, the owner of the property or entitled to the possession thereof, and then incorrectly stated in effect that the fact that the third person owned the property as trustee at the time of the taking was no defense, the instructions were irreconcilable, necessitating a new trial after verdict for plaintiff. Johnson v. Blaney, 198 N. Y. 312, 91 N. E. 721 [reversing 132 N. Y. App. Div. 925, 116 N. Y. Suppl. 1139].

Misleading instruction.— Where, in an action for conversion of building materials and machinery, defendant showed that under a building contract he had a right to take possession of a part of the materials and machinery, an instruction that one accused of conversion could not question plaintiff's title or right of possession by showing that the taking was in good faith or under a mistake, was misleading on the question of recovery of actual damages. Baldwin v. Davidson, (Tex. Civ. App. 1910) 127 S. W. 562.

An instruction as to title of the property alleged to have been converted, not based upon evidence, is reversible error.[76]

d. Acts Constituting Conversion. The court should instruct as to whether acts of which evidence has been admitted are sufficient, if proved, to constitute conversion;[77] and such instructions, if erroneous,[78] are ground for reversal.

e. Identity of Property. If the identity of the property alleged to have been converted is an issue, the court should instruct that plaintiff cannot recover unless he establishes such identity,[79] and an instruction which assumes the identity of the property converted with that of plaintiff is erroneous.[80]

f. Demand and Refusal. Where under the pleadings and evidence of the particular case proof of demand and refusal are essential to conversion,[81] or may constitute one mode of conversion,[82] the jury should be so instructed; but otherwise no instruction as to demand and refusal need be given.[83]

g. Motive and Good Faith of Defendant. Where the motive or good faith of defendant are material to the issue of a recovery or of the measure of damages the jury should be so instructed;[84] but otherwise no instruction need be given as to these matters.[85]

h. Degree of Proof Required. Preponderance of evidence is all that is required to sustain an issue,[86] and an instruction which casts upon a party the burden of proving his contention beyond a doubt is erroneous.[87]

i. Measure of Damages. It is the duty of the court to give the jury a statement of the general rules as to the measure of damages applicable to the particular case.[88]

Turpentine privileges.— In an action for conversion of crude turpentine, where defendant had turpentine privileges on the land to Jan. 1, 1908, and timber or sawmill privileges thereon to Jan. 1, 1910, it was not error to charge that defendant had the timber rights "from January 1, 1910, subject to plaintiff's right to turpentine therein from the 1st day of January, 1908, until such time as timber shall be cut" by defendant. Melrose Mfg. Co. v. Kennedy, 59 Fla. 312, 51 So. 595.

Instructions as to time at which damages assessed.— It is not error to charge that the measure of damages must be assessed as value of property at a time it was alleged to have been converted, and at which its value was proved, although there was evidence tending to show the conversion occurred at another time (Rogers v. Twyman, 56 S. W. 665, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 40); but a verdict for plaintiff must be set aside where the court excluded all evidence of value at date of conversion and then limited the jury to assessment of damages at value on said date (Thompson v. Schaetzel, 6 Dak. 284, 42 N. W. 765).

4. Verdict and Findings, Judgment and Enforcement — a. Verdict and Findings — (i) In General. In addition to the formal parts, a verdict for plaintiff need contain only a finding for plaintiff and the amount of damages recoverable;[89] and a verdict for defendant only a finding for him, without assessment of damages.[90] A verdict is void which is contrary to,[91] or inconsistent with,[92] the evidence;[93] or which fails to fix the value of the property or assess the damages;[94] or is not responsive to the issues.[95]

(ii) Special Verdict or Findings. A special verdict to sustain judgment for plaintiff should find either a conversion or such facts as will render the conversion a question of law;[96] and may find such facts as will sustain a verdict for defendant.[97]

Upon a joint verdict of guilty against more than one defendant and an assessment of several damages, plaintiff may have a venire

(IV) ALTERNATIVE VERDICT. In Georgia plaintiff is entitled, at his option, to elect between: (1) An alternative verdict for the property or its value; (2) a verdict for damages alone; and (3) a verdict for the property alone, and its hire, if any; [99] and where plaintiff has given bond and taken the property and is then cast in the suit, defendant is entitled to a like election.[1]

(V) SUFFICIENCY OF FINDINGS OF REFEREE. The findings of a referee have been held sufficient even as to facts that are not expressly stated, where they are clearly implied.[2]

b. Judgment[3]—(I) IN GENERAL. A judgment in trover is properly one for damages only and not for the recovery of the property converted.[4] A judgment will not be set aside merely because the property is loosely described in the petition,[5] because the prayer of the petition is for possession instead of damages,[6] nor because the verdict is defective where it is not void;[7] but in an action of trover it is error to render judgment on account as for value of property purchased.[8] A judgment rendered on a verdict against two or more defendants for a joint conversion must be joint in form;[9] but a joint judgment for several conversions is erroneous.[10] An unsatisfied judgment against one joint tort-feasor is not a bar to a judgment against another,[11] and a plaintiff may elect as to which one of several judgments against joint tort-feasors he will enforce;[12] but satisfaction of one such judgment operates as a discharge of all,[13] and an election by plaintiff to enforce one estops him from thereafter claiming a higher amount of damages in a suit against another joint tort-feasor.[14]

(II) ALTERNATIVE JUDGMENT.[15] In some states an alternative judgment may be rendered for the property or its value;[16] but in others an alternative judgment is not authorized and the judgment must be for money only.[17]

Retaking possession of the property under bond does not deprive plaintiff of his right to elect a money verdict (Hudson v. Goff, 77 Ga. 281, 3 S. E. 152); but disposition of the property beyond his power to produce it does so deprive him (Mallory v. Moon, 130 Ga. 591, 61 S. E. 401).

In New York, the form of the judgment, whether for the property or for damages, is dependent upon the substantial nature of the action. Wilsey v. Rooney, 16 N. Y. Suppl.

(III) CONFORMITY TO FINDINGS. A judgment is void where it does not conform to the findings of the court or jury,[18] but an immaterial departure from the verdict is not ground for reversal.[19]

(IV) AGAINST DEFENDANT AND SURETIES. The bail of a defendant who has given bond is bound by the judgment equally with defendant,[20] and where plaintiff recovers a verdict, he may have judgment rendered thereon against defendant and his sureties jointly, without scire facias or other proceedings.[21]

(V) OFFER OF JUDGMENT. An offer of judgment in trover is sufficient, although it does not include an offer of judgment for costs.[22]

c. Satisfaction of Judgment. An alternative judgment in trover can be satisfied only by restoring the whole of the property or paying the entire amount of damages, and restoration of part of the property and payment for the remainder is not sufficient.[23]

d. Effect of Judgment or Satisfaction on Title to Property. In several jurisdictions title to property involved in an action for conversion is held to be transferred to defendant by the entry of judgment in plaintiff's favor.[24] But the prevailing doctrine is that title is vested in defendant only upon the full satisfaction of the judgment.[25] Defendant's title, whether vested in him by the judgment or by the satisfaction thereof, relates back to the date of the conversion.[26]

5. Appeal and Error — a. Record.[27] A reversal may not be had on appeal where the record does not show material error in the court below[28] to which objection was properly made,[29] or does not show by which party erroneous evidence was offered,[30] nor will an appeal be allowed for an error that can be corrected without prejudice to appellant.[31]

b. Questions of Fact, Verdict, and Findings. An appeal will not lie on a question of fact which was submitted to the jury on conflicting evidence,[32] or on an issue which the jury must have passed on in arriving at their verdict,[33] or from a finding based on the owner's estimate of value where the market value of the property was not clearly ascertainable.[34]

c. Harmless Error. A judgment will not be reversed or a new trial be granted unless the error complained of was materially prejudicial to the appellant.[35]

d. Determination and Disposition of Cause. A reversal should be had on appeal where the record discloses a variance,[36] contains no evidence, or insufficient evidence, of the value of the chattels converted;[37] fails to show that the property was ever in the possession or under the control of defendant;[38] or whenever it appears that the damages given are manifestly inadequate[39] or compensate plaintiff for a greater interest in the property than he owned.[40]

TRUCK ACT. In English law, the name of a statute [1] passed to abolish what is commonly called the "Truck System," under which employers were in the practice of paying wages of their work people in goods, or of requiring them to purchase goods at certain shops.[2] (See MASTER AND SERVANT, 26 Cyc. 1028.)

TRUCK WAGON. As used in an exemption statute a term held not to apply to one of those movable stores that traverse the State on wheels or runners, covered it may be with the meretricious adornments of carving and gilding, as well as paint and varnish, but rather to one of those vehicles used most commonly for farm work or heavy hauling, with horses or mules, as a "cart" is with oxen.[3]

TRUE. Conformable to fact; in accordance with the actual state of things; correct; not false, erroneous, inaccurate or the like; right, to precision; conformable to a rule or pattern; exact; accurate; [4] that which is frank and natural, rather than that which is precise and technical; [5] just; [6] honest, sincere, not fraudulent.[7]

TRUE VERDICT. The voluntary conclusion of the jury after deliberate consideration.[8]

TRUNK. A receptacle with stiff sides and a hinged cover or upper part, used especially for carrying clothes, toilet articles, etc., for a journey.[9]

TRUNK RAILWAY. A commercial railway, whose main line, whether operated by steam, electricity, or any other motive power, connects towns, cities, counties, or other points within the state or in different states, and which railroad company, under its charter, or under the general law, has the legal capacity of constructing, purchasing, and operating branch lines or feeders connecting with its main stem or trunk, the main or trunk line bearing the same relation to its branches that the trunk of a tree bears to its branches, or the main stream of a river bears to its tributaries.[10]

TRUSSED ROOFS. Roofs packed or bound closely.[11]

TRUSS PLATE. A piece of flat metal, with two holes to secure the ends of the so-called truss rod.[12]

TRUSS ROD. An elongated U-bolt, made to conform to the parts of the car around which it is looped or bolted.[13]

TRUSS SEAT. A hook projecting from a plate of which the hook is a part.[14]

TRUST. A contract, combination, confederation, or understanding, express or implied, between two or more persons to control the price of a commodity or service, for the benefit of the parties thereto, and to the injury of the public, and which tends to create a monopoly;[15] a species of combination organized by individuals or corporations for the purpose of monopolizing the manufacture of or traffic in various articles and commodities, which was well known and fully understood when the anti-trust act was approved;[16] in mercantile law, an organization of persons or corporations, formed mainly for the purpose of regulating the supply

v. Tappan, 11 Wheat. (U. S.) 419, 420, 6 L. ed. 509.

"True verdict" see post, this page.

"True vote" see State v. McLin, 16 Fla. 17, 45.

"Truly" distinguished from "fairly" see FAIRLY, 19 Cyc. 310 note 43.

8. Southern R. Co. v. Williams, 113 Ala. 620, 625, 21 So. 328, where it is said: "And it is none the less a true verdict, because the respective jurors may have been liberal in concessions to each other, if conscientiously and freely made. A verdict is not a true verdict, the result of any arbitrary rule, or order, whether imposed by themselves or by the court, or officer in charge. If a jury should agree in advance that their verdict should be the result of quotient of a division by twelve of the sum total of all the jurors' separate assessment, a verdict brought about by such an agreement, ought to be set aside."

9. Century Dict.

The specification "trunk" is equivalent to mention of its contents, under the customs act providing that if a passenger's baggage contains any dutiable article it shall be mentioned. U. S. v. One Trunk, 171 Fed. 772, 774.

"Chest" distinguished see Potter v. State, 39 Tex. 388, 389.

11. Diamond State Iron Co. v. Giles, 7 Houst. (Del.) 556, 568, 11 Atl. 189, where it is said: "They are necessarily very heavy roofs; and although they are sometimes said to be self-supporting, this is said only in respect to their being packed or bound closely but not otherwise; for their weight when supported either by walls or pilasters is uncommonly heavy in comparison to the weight of other kinds of roofs."

14. Thomas v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 149 Fed. 753, 755, 79 C. C. A. 89, where it is said to be familiar to every one who suspends his hammock on his porch, and has been in use from time immemorial.

15. State v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co., 152 Mo. 1, 43, 52 S. W. 595, 45 L. R. A. 363.

"In the olden times such practices were called contracts in restraint of trade.—Now-a-days they are called trusts. There is no difference in the principle. There is a difference in the extent and methods. Those the courts condemned long ago were as mere saplings compared to the mammoth oaks, when considered alongside of those of to-day." State v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co., 152 Mo. 1, 44, 52 S. W. 595, 45 L. R. A. 363.

A contract providing that the purchaser shall handle only beer named in the contract, and that the manufacturer shall sell to no other dealer in the town or vicinity, creates a "trust" within the meaning of a statute prohibiting trusts and conspiracies against trade. Fuqua v. Pabst Brewing Co., 90 Tex. 298, 301, 38 S. W. 29, 750, 35 L. R. A. 241.

and price of commodities, etc.[17] (Trust: As an Estate, see TRUSTS. As a Monopoly, see MONOPOLIES, 27 Cyc. 901.)

TRUST COMPANY. As defined by statute,[18] any domestic corporation formed for the purpose of taking, accepting, and executing such trusts as may be lawfully committed to it and acting as trustee in the cases prescribed by law, and receiving deposits of moneys and other personal property, and issuing its obligations therefor, and of loaning money on real or personal securities.[19] (Trust Company: In General, see BANKS AND BANKING, 5 Cyc. 612. As Guardian of — Incompetent, see INSANE PERSONS, 22 Cyc. 1140 note 96; Infant, see GUARDIAN AND WARD, 21 Cyc. 37. Taxation of, see TAXATION, 37 Cyc. 825.)

TRUST DEED. See CHATTEL MORTGAGES, 6 Cyc. 996; MORTGAGES, 27 Cyc. 966; RAILROADS, 33 Cyc. 483; TRUSTS.

TRUSTEE. In the widest meaning of the term, a person in whom some estate, interest, or power in or affecting property of any description is vested for the benefit of another.[20] (Trustee: In General, see TRUSTS. Act Granting Right to Accounting From as Impairing Vested Right, see CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 8 Cyc. 896. Action on Case Against For Wrongful Conveyance of Property, see CASE, ACTION ON, 6 Cyc. 689 note 22. Admissions by, see EVIDENCE, 16 Cyc. 984, 1036. Agreements by as Fraudulent, see CONTRACTS, 9 Cyc. 470.

The term is not employed in a technical legal sense, in the title of "An act to define trusts, and to provide for penalties," etc. "By very recent commercial usage this meaning of the word has been extended so as to comprehend combinations of corporations or capitalists for the purpose of controlling the price of articles of prime necessity, or the charges of transportation for the public." Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 86 Tex. 250, 266, 24 S. W. 397, 22 L. R. A. 483.

A trust may or may not be endowed with corporate powers; if not, then it is a mere aggregation of individuals or partnerships. State v. Haun, 61 Kan. 146, 152, 59 Pac. 340, 47 L. R. A. 369.

17. Black L. Dict. [quoted in Mollyneaux v. Wittenberg, 39 Nebr. 547, 557, 58 N. W. 205].

"In order to constitute a trust within the meaning of the statute [making contracts void where a combination of capital, skill or acts is formed to create or carry out restrictions in trade or to prevent competition in the sale or purchase of commodities] there must be a 'combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more.' 'Combination' as here used means union or association. If there be no union or association by two or more of their 'capital, skill or acts' there can be no 'combination' and hence no 'trust.' When we consider the purposes for which the 'combination' must be formed to come within the statute, the essential meaning of the word 'combination,' and the fact that a punishment is prescribed for each day that the trust continues in existence, we are led to the conclusion that the union or association of 'capital, skill or acts' denounced is where the parties in the particular case designed the united co-operation of such agencies, which might have been otherwise independent and competing, for the accomplishment of one or more of such purposes." Gates v. Hooper, 90 Tex. 563, 565, 39 S. W. 1079 [quoted in State v. Continental Tobacco Co., 177 Mo. 1, 36, 75 S. W. 737].

Functions.— "A trust company accepts and executes all trusts of every description committed to it by any person or corporation, or any courts of record, receives the title to real or personal estate on trusts created in accordance with the laws of the state and executes such trusts, acts as agent for corporations in reference to the issuing, registering and transferring certificates of stock and bonds and other evidence of debt, accepts and executes trusts for married women in respect to their separate property, and acts as guardian for the estates of infants." Jenkins v. Neff, 163 N. Y. 320, 330, 57 N. E. 408.

In any proper sense they are not banking institutions. Mercantile Nat. Bank v. New York, 121 U. S. 138, 159, 7 S. Ct. 826, 30 L. ed. 895.

20. Hill Trustees [quoted in Haggerty v. Badkin, 72 N. J. Eq. 473, 477, 66 Atl. 420; Jones v. Byrne, 149 Fed. 457, 463].

"The word . . . is one of significance. It is constantly made use of, not only in legal phraseology, but in common speech, to indicate that one holds the title to property, not in his own absolute right, but for the benefit of some other party or parties." Welles v. Larrabee, 36 Fed. 866, 870, 2 L. R. A. 471.

It is often used loosely in application to persons not coming within the strict legal meaning of the term. Burchinell v. Koon, 8 Colo. App. 463, 46 Pac. 932, 933 [citing Knox v. Gye, L. R. 5 H. L. 656, 675, 42 L. J. Ch. 234].

Construed as including the board of directors of a corporation see People v. Turnbull, 93 Cal. 630, 631, 29 Pac. 224.

In a general broad sense the term includes assignees, guardians, and receivers. McNeill v. Hagerty, 51 Ohio St. 255, 266, 37 N. E. 526, 23 L. R. A. 628; Cross v. Brown, 19 R. I. 220, 248, 33 Atl. 147.
