2. Bills of Lading — a. Nature; What Constitutes; Duty to Issue. An instrument issued by the carrier to the consignor, consisting of a receipt for the goods and an agreement to carry them from the place of shipment to the place of destination, is a bill of lading.[80] Of course it is not essential that a bill of lading be issued, for in the absence of any such instrument the rights of the shipper and the duty of the carrier are to be determined by the common law.[81]

b. Validity and Effect as Between the Parties; Construction — (i) Delivery and Acceptance. A bill of lading delivered by the carrier to the shipper and accepted by the latter, although without signature by him, is presumed to constitute the contract for carriage.[82] And the shipper receiving the bill of lading is conclusively presumed to have read it and acquiesced in its terms, in the absence of fraud, imposition, or mistake.[83]

But in Texas there is an express statute imposing a penalty on common carriers for refusing to give when demanded a bill of lading, stating the quantity, character, and condition of the goods received for transportation, and under such statute a railroad company incurs the penalty prescribed by giving a bill of lading describing the quantity as "a carload," when the shipper demands that the weight be stated. (II) Construction of Bills of Lading. So far as the bill of lading is a contract the language used therein is subject to the rules of construction which govern other contracts.[84] Therefore, where the terms employed have by usage acquired a particular signification, the parties will be presumed to have used them in that sense.[85] If there are no conditions as to the route, the fact that the bill is issued by a railroad company does not imply that the shipment is to be "all rail."[86] While the instrument is to be construed as a whole, invalid conditions will not necessarily render the whole contract invalid, and it may be enforced as far as it is valid.[87] In general, where the suit is for breach of contract, it is for the court to construe and determine the effect of the bill of lading, and a reference of the question to the jury is erroneous.[88]

(III) Estoppel — (A) As to Transferee of Bill of Lading. The bill of lading, however, may be something more than a contract between the carrier and the shipper. It usually is intended to constitute a representative of the goods, and stands for them, so that a transfer of the bill is a transfer of the goods themselves.[89] And therefore when the carrier issues a bill of lading containing a statement as to the quantity of goods received, with the understanding that the goods may be transferred by means of a transfer of the bill of lading, the transferee is justified in relying on the representations of the carrier made in the bill with reference to the quantity of goods received under it, and as to one who receives the bill in good faith, relying on the statement of quantity, and pays a consideration, the carrier is estopped from showing that he has not received the quantity of goods recited in the bill.[90] But the right of the consignee or transferee to rely on the recitals of the bill of lading in this respect depends on his having paid consideration by reason of recitals in the bill itself.[91] Nor does the estoppel apply to a case where the owner of the property did not purchase it while it was in the hands of the carrier, and therefore did not take title to it through the bill of lading, but the shipment was made by his agent.[92] One who takes property by transfer of the bill of lading in payment of an antecedent debt may rely on the bill of lading as against the carrier as effectually as may a purchaser for any other valuable consideration.[93] To guard against such estoppel the carrier may insert in the bill of lading "quantity, weight, and contents unknown," or some like clause qualifying his representation, and in that event he will not be liable to an assignee for value if he delivers all the goods received.[94] But the usual statement in the bill of lading that contents and value are unknown will have no application to grain in bulk as to which the carrier has full opportunity to advise himself, and the quantity stated will be binding upon him.[95]

(B) When No Goods Are Received. The doctrine of the preceding section is fully recognized where there is a valid bill of lading and the only question is as to the quantity of goods received; but where the carrier contends that no goods were received, and that the bill of lading was therefore issued by its agent through fraud or mistake, another and more difficult question is involved, that is, whether the carrier is bound by the act of his agent in issuing a fraudulent or erroneous bill. If the circumstances are such as to authorize the agent to issue some bill of lading, then, as decided in the cases cited in the preceding section, the carrier is bound by the agent's error, for he is acting within the scope of his general authority, and by some courts the same reasoning is applied to a bill issued where no goods are received, and it is held that as the agent is authorized in general to issue bills of lading, the carrier will be bound by his acts in erroneously issuing a bill of lading where no goods are received, as fully as by his erroneous act in issuing a bill of lading for a greater quantity of goods than are received.[96] But the supreme court of the United States has reached the opposite conclusion, and holds that as the receipt of the goods lies at the foundation of the contract to carry and deliver, if no goods are actually received there can be no valid contract, and that the agent of the carrier, having no authority to issue a bill of lading without a receipt of the goods, cannot bind the carrier, even as to an innocent transferee for value of the bill of lading.[97] A number of the state courts have adopted the same course of reasoning, and hold that a carrier is not estopped by a bill of lading, even in the hands of a transferee for value, from showing that no goods whatever were actually received.[98]

L. 665, and follows The Schooner Freeman v. Buckingham, 18 How. (U. S.) 182, 15 L. ed. 34. See also King v. The Propeller Lady Franklin, 8 Wall. (U. Extent of this rule.— Thus the fact that the shipper was allowed to fill out the bill of lading and leave a blank which afforded an opportunity for increasing the statement of the quantity of goods shipped was held not to render the common carrier liable for loss occasioned by forgery of the shipper in raising the bill of lading. Lehman v. Central R., etc., Co., 12 Fed. 595. On the same principle as that recognized in Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. S. 7, 26 L. ed. 998, it was held that where, in pursuance to agreement in course of dealing between carrier and shipper, bills were issued for cotton which remained in the possession of a compress company as agent of the shipper, and was destroyed by fire before delivery to the carrier, the consignee of the bill of lading, even without notice of such agreement and course of dealing, could not recover from the carrier. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. McFadden, 154 U. S. 155, 14 S. Ct. 990, 38 L. ed. 944. The case of Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. But it is distinguished from a case where the consignee was allowed to fill out bills of lading as the agent of the carrier and transfer them as collateral security to persons who had no knowledge of any irregularity, and in such case the carrier was held liable to the holder of the bill of lading. The distinction made is that the officers of the company had knowledge of the course of business which enabled the consignor to perpetrate the fraud, and were negligent in allowing it to continue. 1. The Bark Delaware v. Oregon Iron Co., 14 Wall. (U. S.) 579, 20 L. ed. 779. "The rule is well settled, that, under the ordinary forms of bills of lading, the contract imports that goods are to be stowed under deck; and if carried on deck, the owners of the vessel will not be protected from liability for their injury or loss, by the usual exception of dangers of the sea." And it has been held that an express agreement in writing concerning the stowage of a portion of the articles shipped on deck gave rise to the presumption that other articles of the shipment were to be carried under deck, and that therefore parol evidence was not admissible to show an agreement as to the articles not expressly referred to insure on the Isthmus, and that the carrier had refused to be liable as such during transportation across the Isthmus was inadmissible on the ground that it would vary the terms of the contract.[2] A custom founded on constant departure from the terms of the bill of lading is not available to control the contract.[3] There are a few apparent exceptions to the general proposition, but they are not real qualifications of the rule, which is too well established to be questioned.[4] Of course, as already indicated,[5] if the bill of lading is not received by the shipper until after the goods have been completely delivered to the carrier and accepted by him for transportation, it will not constitute a contract, for the relations of the parties have already been determined by acceptance without the bill of lading.[6] If the bill of lading is as to any element of the contract ambiguous, parol evidence is admissible to show what the agreement was in that respect.[7] While in general a bill of lading is conclusive as to the rate charged for transportation, it may be shown by parol that as a matter of fact the representation that the goods are being carried at a reduced rate in consideration of a limitation of liability is false.[8] No doubt also a subsequent modification of the terms of the written agreement, for instance that the goods are to be shipped by another boat than that named, may be established by parol.[9]

(B) Considered as a Receipt. A bill of lading is an instrument twofold in its character: it is a receipt as to the quantity and description of the goods shipped, and a contract to transport and deliver the goods to the consignee or other person therein designated, and upon the terms specified in the same instrument.[10] It states the terms of the shipment, and also specifies the quantity of goods received, and sometimes their condition. While it may not, as already stated, be varied by parol evidence so far as it embodies the terms of the contract, yet, so far as it constitutes a receipt, it is like other receipts or written acknowledgments, subject to be contradicted or explained by proof as to the facts. Thus a bill of lading is evidence of the receipt of the goods by the carrier,[11] but may be to. Sayward v. Stevens, 3 Gray (Mass.) 97, 101. But in other cases parol evidence that the goods were to be stowed on deck was held admissible in the absence of any stipulation in the bill of lading. Doane v. Keating, 12 Leigh (Va.) 391, 37 Am. Dec. 671; Chubb v. Seven Thousand Eight Hundred Bushels of Oats, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,709, 26 Law Rep. 492.

4. Thus it is said that a bill of lading may be aided by parol evidence to show the relations in which the parties stood at the time of shipment in order to give effect to the terms of the instrument (Blanchard v. Page, 8 Gray (Mass.) 281); and that collateral agreements, not necessarily covered by the terms of the bill of lading, may be shown (Baltimore, etc., Steamboat Co. v. Brown, 54 Pa. St. 77). So, although the shipper is impliedly bound on the face of the bill to pay the freight, it may be shown by parol that the carrier received the goods under an agreement with a third person to pay the freight, at least where such third person has in fact made payment. Wayland v. Mosely, 5 Ala. 430, 39 Am. Dec. 335. And a stipulation in the bill of lading that the carrier shall not be liable for stock beyond the actual cash value, not exceeding one hundred dollars per head, does not preclude evidence of a parol agreed valuation of ten dollars per head. Harned v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 51 Mo. App. 482.

But it may be shown that the agent issu-

contradicted by evidence that no goods were received.[12] Authorities agree without dissent to the proposition that recitals in the bill of lading as to the quantity of goods received by the carrier may be contradicted as between the parties by parol evidence showing a less quantity to have been delivered.[13]

(v) Recitals as to Condition of Goods. It is usual to insert in the bill of lading that the goods were received in good condition, or apparent good condition. Even without any statement on the subject it is presumed, if no memorandum is made on the bill of lading to the effect that the goods are not in good condition, that so far as observable by inspection without opening the boxes, packages, or bundles in which the goods are shipped they were in good order.[14] It is usual, however, to insert in the bill of lading an express statement that the goods are received in good condition, or in apparent good order, or the like.[15] If the statement is that they are in apparent good condition, it is of course open to the carrier to show, as against a claim that the goods were damaged during transportation, that the damaged condition existed at the time of the receipt of the goods, but was not apparent on inspection. Such a statement relates only to external conditions,[16] and does not make out even a prima facie case against the carrier

ing the bill of lading was known to be without authority. Capehart v. Granite Mills, 97 Ala. 353, 12 So. 44. Further as to authority of agent to accept see supra, II, F, 3.

In so far as the bill of lading operates as a contract it is conclusive as to the intention of the parties, and may not be varied by parol evidence, but in so far as it operates as a receipt merely it is open to explanation or rectification by parol evidence. But to make out a mistake in the recital of the bill in this respect, and show that a less quantity was delivered than stated, the proof of mistake should be clear and unquestionable in order to rebut the evidence afforded by the bill. with reference to damage not thus apparent.[17] But the recital of good condition does make out a prima facie case against the carrier that the goods were in apparent good condition so far as ordinary inspection without opening the packages would disclose.[18] The burden of proof is on the carrier to show that the goods were not in such apparent good condition when received.[19] And this he should do by clear and satisfactory evidence.[20] The rule as generally stated, however, is that the recital as to the condition of the goods is prima facie evidence only as to that fact, and the carrier may show the contrary.[21]

(VI) Quantity of Goods Guaranteed. The carrier may by stipulation guarantee the quantity of goods received so that the recital of the bill of lading will be conclusive, even as against mistake, and render the carrier liable for any shortage.[22]

c. Bill of Lading Representing the Goods; Negotiability and Transfer — (1) Whether Negotiable. The bill of lading stands for many purposes as a representative of the goods shipped, and the title to the goods while they are in the possession of the carrier as bailee may be transferred by the owner by means of a transfer of the bill of lading to a third person. In this sense it is sometimes said that the bill of lading is a negotiable instrument, but it is not negotiable in the same sense as promissory notes or bills of exchange, for those instruments stand for money, which passes by delivery, by which the person receiving it gets a good title, if acting in good faith and without notice of defect in the title of the person from whom it is received, while the delivery of goods in general passes to the person receiving them no better title than that of the one from whom they are received.[23] Therefore the transferee of a bill of lading has no higher title to the goods represented by it than the person by whom the transfer is made.[24] His rights are not greater than the rights which he would have acquired by delivery to him of the property itself, instead of the delivery of the bill of lading representing the property.[25] But just as the delivery of any other evidence of title may estop the owner from asserting his rights as against one who has dealt with the transferee on the faith of the evidence of title thus given, the owner may, by transferring the bill of lading or authorizing it to be put out, estop himself to claim the goods as against one who has innocently advanced value upon it.[26] In a general sense then the bill of lading is negotiable in that it may be transferred as representing the goods.[27] And statutes declaring bills of lading to be negotiable instruments have no other effect than to recognize the power of the holder of the bill of lading to transfer title to the property by means of a transfer of the bill of lading, and do not import into such bills of lading all the characteristics of bills of exchange or promissory notes.[28] Moreover, the transfer of the bill of lading is not a transfer of the contract itself, but only a transfer of the goods represented by it.[29]

(II) Fraudulent and Fictitious Bills of Lading. It follows from what is said in the preceding paragraph that if the bill of lading is fictitious, that is, if it does not represent any goods, then the transferee thereof acquires no rights under the transfer.[30] Where the carrier receives no goods, and the bill of lading is fraudulently issued by the agent, then the bill of lading represents nothing, and its transfer confers no rights to the transferee as to the goods which it appears to represent.[31] But if the carrier is negligent in issuing the bill of lading he may be liable to one injured by such negligence.[32] For the purpose, however, of preventing fraud it is provided in some states by statute that no bill of lading shall be issued unless the goods named therein have been actually delivered to the carrier, and that the carrier shall be liable to any one injured by the issuance of a fraudulent or fictitious bill of lading.[33]

(III) Duplicate Bills of Lading. It is not unusual for the carrier to issue duplicate or triplicate bills of lading, each being an original bill for all purposes.[34] Thus, if one of duplicate bills of lading as representing the goods is transferred to a holder, he can recover them, although the consignor retaining the other bill has ordered the carrier to return the goods.[35] But of course if the duplicate is issued without the carrier's authority he will not be bound thereby.[36] If issued with authority, the carrier will be liable to the holder of either, although the shipper who has received them fraudulently transfers both as originals.[37] In case of a variance between the duplicates, that one will be binding which is acted upon as representing the contract or the goods.[38]

(IV) Substituted Bills of Lading. So long as the bill of lading representing the goods is in the hands of the person to whom it was originally issued, there could of course be no objection to the substitution of another bill by agreement of the parties, but after it has passed from the person to whom issued into the hands of another, it would work a fraud for the carrier to issue a substituted bill of lading which may be used by the person to whom it is issued in making a pre-

Transfer after delivery to consignee.— Likewise a carrier is not liable on its bill of lading to a transferee thereof from the consignee of the goods, if such transfer is made after the goods have been delivered to the consignee, for in such case the goods are no longer in the hands of the carrier as bailee, and the bill of lading no longer represents them. Adams v. Trent, 19 La. Ann. 262.

So if goods have been delivered to carrier in pursuance of a contract by which title has passed to the consignee, the subsequent issuance of a bill of lading for the goods to the shipper will not enable him to transfer any title to a third person. Hepburn v. Lee, 14 La. 76.

The effect of the issuance of a bill of lading without the receipt of goods, as to a consignee taking the bill in good faith and for value, has already been considered. See supra, II, G, 2, b, (III), (B).

The explanation of the custom of issuing bills of lading in triplicate is said to be that one is to be sent to the consignee with the goods, another by mail or some other form of conveyance, and the third is to be retained by the shipper; or, one may be retained by the shipper, one by the master of the vessel by which the goods are shipped, and the third sent to the consignee. tended sale or pledge of the property for which it stands, and in such a case, although the carrier has honored the second bill of lading, he will be responsible to a bona fide holder of the first bill for the goods.[39]

(v) Transfer of Title by Bill of Lading. The bill of lading in itself, when taken by the consignor in his own name, has no effect as showing title in him,[40] but by taking the bill of lading in the name of the consignee the shipper vests apparent title in him.[41] So also the indorsement to another of a bill of lading taken in the shipper's name constitutes presumptively a transfer of title,[42] subject, of course, to competent evidence as to the intention of the parties, for the transfer of the bill of lading, just as the delivery of the goods themselves might be for another purpose than that of transfering the title.[43] If the bill of lading provides for the delivery of the goods to a person named, or his order or assigns, or to bearer, or if the name of the person to whom the goods are to be delivered is left blank, then the transfer of the bill of lading by delivery only, without indorsement, will pass an apparent title.[44] If the bill of lading provides for delivery to the person named, or order, a transfer by such person without indorsement will also pass title.[45] And in general it may be said that a delivery of the bill of lading by the person who, according to the terms of the bill, is entitled to the goods will transfer his title.[46]

(vi) Effect of Transfer. Many difficult questions have arisen as to the relative rights of those claiming under a transfer of the bill of lading, and those claiming some right to or lien upon the goods as the property of the shipper. These questions are not proper for consideration here in detail. They depend upon the effect of transfer of title in general, and belong to the subject of sales. The carrier is not interested in these questions, except with reference to his duty to make delivery to the right person, which will be discussed hereafter.[47] But it may not be out of place to say here that where a bill of lading is accompanied by a draft on the consignee, and there is some reservation in the bill of lading of jus disponendi, the consignee does not become entitled to the possession of the goods until he accepts or pays the draft in accordance with the terms imposed by the shipper, and that an intermediate party, such as a banker, purchasing the draft accompanied with the bill of lading, has a right to the goods as security until the consignee accepts or pays, as the case may be. Such a transaction passes to the transferee of the draft and bill of lading a special title in the goods, and he has a better right thereto than one claiming under a prior or subsequent agreement with the shipper, but without having obtained actual or constructive possession of the goods.[48] Likewise a consignee who advances money, on transfer to him of apparent title by the bill of lading, acquires a title to or a lien upon the goods regardless of the claims of those who, without having received actual or constructive possession, seek to assert their rights to such goods through the shipper.[49]

3. Special Contracts For Transportation — a. Bill Not Necessary; Parol Contract. It will be readily understood from the preceding discussion that no special contract is necessary, and that the delivery of the goods to the carrier and their acceptance by him for transportation give rise to duties which are determined by principles of law without any express agreement, and that, while limitations of liability may be agreed upon,[50] and stipulations inserted in the bill of lading or shipping receipt may be binding on the parties as a contract,[51] yet the mere receipt of the goods, marked with their destination, is sufficient to give rise to contractual obligations, without regard to the issuance of any shipping receipt or bill of lading.[52] If, however, there is a special contract between the shipper and carrier, the terms of such contract, so far as it is valid, will determine the rights and liabilities of the parties.[53] Moreover, the contract may be in parol. A bill of lading is not the only evidence of the terms of a special contract.[54] If, however, a written contract has been entered into, it is conclusive as to the matters covered thereby, and it is not open to either of the parties to say that there was a prior oral agreement inconsistent with the provisions of the writing.[55] Furthermore there may be a collateral parol agreement as to a matter not covered by the bill of lading.[56] The bill of lading or other written contract will not, however, supersede a prior oral agreement, if the written contract is not entered into until the goods have already been accepted for transportation under the parol agreement.[57]

b. Contract Personal. Special agreements by the shipper are personal to him, and third persons have no right to avail themselves of the terms thereof.[58]

c. Contrary to Public Policy. A carrier cannot enter into a contract which will disable him from performing his duties to the public.[59]

d. Custom as Affecting Contract. A custom or usage known to the shipper, as to the manner or method of transportation, will be binding as a part of the contract when not contrary to its terms.[60]

e. Excuses For Non-Performance. The common law allows to the carrier certain excuses for delay in transportation, or for failure to deliver, and the like, but these may be waived, and by special agreement the carrier may obligate himself specifically with reference to the time of delivery, the furnishing of cars, and like matters, and if he does so he waives his common-law defenses and is bound as any other contracting party. In such case impossibility of performance will not be an excuse for a failure to carry out the terms of his agreement.[61]

f. Mode of Shipment. If the contract gives the carrier an option as to the mode of transportation, or the route to be chosen, such option must be exercised with a view to the interest of the shipper, and it is a breach of the contract to exercise it to his disadvantage.[62]

g. Option to Ship. Contracts are sometimes made by which the shipper is given the option to ship at a specified rate, either without limit or up to a certain quantity, or not less than a certain quantity, and if the shipper avails himself of this option the carrier is bound by the agreement.[63]

h. To Furnish Cars. The carrier may bind himself by contract to furnish cars at specified times and places, and will be liable for damages to the shipper caused by failure or delay in carrying out such contract.[64]

i. To Transport to Point Beyond Line. The question whether a carrier who accepts goods marked to a destination beyond his line of transportation thereby becomes a carrier for the entire distance, or only to the end of his line with the duty to deliver to a connecting carrier, will be hereafter discussed.[65] But there is no question that the carrier may contract for through transportation and become bound as carrier therefor.[66] The mere fact that a through rate is agreed upon will not in itself, however, show that the contract was for through transportation.[67] The use in the bill of lading of "through to destination," or other like terms, which under the circumstances indicate an undertaking to transport through, will make the carrier liable for the entire transportation.[68]

j. Terms, Time, Etc. Special contracts as to the rates to be charged, time of transportation, the facilities for loading and unloading, and like matters, may be made between the parties which will vary the common-law obligation of the carrier. These are but illustrations of the matters to which a special contract may relate.[69]

4. What Law Governs in Construction of Contract. The general rule that the validity of a contract of transportation is to be governed by the law of the place where it is made has already been illustrated in discussing the question as to what law governs in regard to the validity of limitations of liability.[70] The same principle is applicable here, as a general proposition, to wit, that the validity and construction of any contract for transportation is to be determined by the law of the place where the contract is made, although its performance is to be completed in another state.[71] It seems not to be competent for the parties to make a contract depend for its validity and interpretation on the law of some other place than that where it is made and partly executed, for instance, the law of a jurisdiction through which the goods are to be carried,[72] or that of the jurisdiction where the corporation entering into the contract is created, which is a different jurisdiction from that in which the transportation is undertaken.[73] The contract

5. Authority of Agents to Make Contracts — a. In General. In determining whether a contract made for the carrier by an agent is binding, the principles of agency are applicable, and if the contract is within the general scope of authority of the agent, the carrier will be bound thereby, although the agent has acted beyond his instructions in the particular case.[76] A local freight agent or station agent of a railroad company is presumed to have authority to contract for shipment of goods over the lines of the company and to make any contract which the company itself could make.[77] Knowledge of limitation of the agent's general authority must be brought home to the shipper in order to defeat a contract made by him.[78] An agent having authority to contract for shipment may no doubt make any special contract with relation to carrying out the general purpose of the transportation, such as a contract to give notice of arrival of the goods at their destination,[79] or as to the unloading of live stock.[80]

b. As to Cars. The station agent, having charge of a railroad company's business at a particular station, has implied authority to contract to furnish cars at particular times for the shipment of goods, and the company will be bound by such contracts, even though in violation of the company's directions to the agent, if the limitation of his authority is not known to the shipper.[81] But a station agent is not to be presumed, in the absence of evidence, to have authority to contract for furnishing cars to shippers at other stations than his own.[82]

c. As to Connecting Lines. We will see hereafter[83] that the weight of authority in this country is that the carrier receiving goods for transportation to a destination beyond his own line impliedly contracts as carrier only for his own line, and in jurisdictions where this is the rule it is evident that an agent attempting to contract for transportation over a connecting line is exceeding his ordinary authority as agent of the receiving carrier, and his principal is not bound by such contract, in the absence of express authority.[84] But such express authority may be inferred from the custom of the agent known to the principal, to make such contracts.[85] Where two or more railroad companies with connecting lines have formed an association for the transportation of goods, the agent of one has apparent authority to contract for the shipment of goods over the connecting lines.[86]

d. As to Rates and Rebates. An agent having authority to contract for shipment has also apparent authority to contract as to the rates of charge[87] and as to rebates to be allowed the shipper, if a contract for rebates would be valid.[88]

e. As to Time of Delivery. An agent having authority to contract for the shipment of goods has apparent authority to stipulate for delivery of such goods at a specified place within a specified time.[89]

H. Custody and Control of Goods in Transit — 1. Title to Goods; Special Ownership of Carrier — a. In General. The doctrine that delivery of goods by the seller thereof to a carrier for transportation to the buyer is prima facie a transfer of title, so that the goods in the carrier's hands are presumed to belong to the consignee, belongs to the law of sales, and, so far as it is to be applied between the consignor and the consignee, and the parties claiming under them respectively need not be discussed here,[90] but that doctrine is nevertheless of significance to the carrier in so far as it may determine his duties to the respective parties and his right to the possession of the goods. The effect of a transfer of the bill of lading as passing title and affecting the rights and duties of the carrier has already been considered.[91] Where there is no bill of lading it is presumed that the title vests in the consignee absolutely on delivery of the goods to the carrier, subject only to the carrier's lien for freight, and the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu.[92] Therefore, in the absence of notice to the carrier of the existence of a different relation, he must treat the consignee as the owner of the goods, with authority to control them in transit.[93] But if

The presumption that title has passed to consignee by delivery to the carrier with direction to transport to the consignee, either without a bill of lading or under a bill of lading providing for delivery of the goods to the consignee, is such that the carrier has no right afterward to treat the consignor as the owner of the goods, and change their destination at the consignor's direction (Armentrout v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 1 Mo. App. 158; Bailey v. Hudson River R. Co., 49 N. Y.

the shipper has taken the bill of lading to himself or order he will be presumed to have retained the title,[94] and if the shipper has still the right to dispose of and control the goods, notwithstanding their delivery to the carrier for the consignee, any subsequent arrangement with the carrier will be valid.[95] The presumption of the passing of title to the consignee on delivery to the carrier will protect the carrier in delivering the goods to the consignee at the end of the transportation.[96] But if he is notified by the consignor before delivery to the consignee not to make such delivery then his duty in the premises depends upon the actual facts as to whether the relations between the consignor and consignee were such that delivery to the carrier would constitute as between them a transfer of title.[97] If the consignor ships goods to a factor, or other agent, in pursuance of a previous agreement to do so, but the factor or agent has made no advances on the strength of the delivery of the goods to the carrier for him, then his right to the goods has not yet attached, and the consignor may change their direction or remand the order for delivery.[98] But if the right of the consignee to the goods has become complete on their delivery to the carrier, the consignor cannot by notice or direction to the carrier prevent such delivery.[99] The carrier derives from the shipper no higher right with reference to possession of the goods than that which the shipper has, and in case of wrongful delivery by the carrier without authority the real owner may assert his rights as against the carrier.[1]

b. Carrier Cannot Question Consignor's Title. A carrier, like any other bailee,

97. The carrier must therefore respect the directions of the consignor made before delivery to the consignee not to make such delivery, or to return the goods to the consignor, or to deliver them to another person, if the consignor is still the real owner of the goods. Failure of the consignor to furnish the carrier any evidence that he has the right as against the consignee, after giving notice not to deliver, would justify the carrier in delivering to the consignee, but in the absence of unreasonable refusal to do so, the carrier is bound by the notice. Allen v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 79 Me. 327, 9 Atl. 895, 1 Am. St. Rep. 310.

But if under a contract between the consignor and consignee the consignee's right to the goods has vested on delivery to the carrier, even though this right be less than that of ownership, the consignee may recover against the carrier for refusal to deliver the goods, notwithstanding a counter-demand by the consignor. But if the owner has delivered the goods to the carrier, who has rendered himself liable to third persons by giving a negotiable bill of lading, he cannot afterward reclaim possession. Western Transp. Co. v. Marshall, 4 Abb. Dec. (N. Y.) 575, 4 Transcr. App. (N. Y.) 366, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 280.

Where vendor of goods violates his con-must respect the apparent ownership of the shipper from whom he receives possession, and cannot question the shipper's right to the goods, in case the transaction is not such as to import a transfer of title to the consignee, although as matter of fact the shipper is not the real owner.[2]

e. Rights of Carrier as Special Owner. A carrier, like any other bailee, has by reason of his rightful possession a special ownership of or title to the property as against third persons which will sustain an action for damage to the property, or to recover possession thereof if wrongfully taken from him.[3] The rule that the carrier may sue in his own name as representative of the owner for a trespass on or injury to the property carried is applicable in courts of admiralty as well as at common law.[4] The right of the carrier to possession does not, however, give him authority to dispose of the goods as against the rightful owner, nor to pledge them,[5] except as under emergency he may have implied authority as representative of the owner to sell.[6]

2. Stoppage in Transitu — a. Notice to Carrier. The right of the vendor of goods sold on credit, and which have been delivered to the carrier for the vendee, in case the vendee becomes insolvent before the carrier has delivered the goods to him, to prevent such delivery by notice to the carrier and retake possession, pertains to the law of sales, and as affecting the vendor and the vendee need not be considered here.[7] It is only the duty of the carrier which arises from the giving of such notice to comply with the same which is to be considered. Such notice need not be in any specific form. It is enough if the carrier or his agent is advised of the wish of the vendor that his goods be not delivered to the vendee on account of his insolvency.[8] The notice, however, must be reasonable, and tract with the vendee, or rescinds the sale before delivering the goods to the carrier, and consigns them to another, the vendee has no remedy against the carrier. Lester v. McDowell, 18 Pa. St. 91.

Effect of payment for lost goods.— Where the carrier pays to the person entitled to the property transported the value of such property, under the assumption that it has been lost, he becomes vested with a right to the property itself. Ingerstown Bank v. Adams Express Co., 45 Pa. St. 419, 84 Am. Dec. 499.

Where carrier has been wrongfully deprived of possession.— As against the owner of the goods the carrier who has been wrongfully deprived of his possession can recover damages only for his special interest, but as against a third person having no right to the goods whatever he may recover the full value of the goods. White v. Webb, 15 Conn. 302; Ingersoll v. Van Bokkelin, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 670; Lyle v. Barker, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 457. The carrier's right to possession constitutes no bar as against the owner unless set up by the carrier himself. Ames v. Palmer, 42 Me. 197, 66 Am. Dec. 271.

Effect of delivery to warehouseman.— As the carrier may, when the goods have reached their destination, deliver them to a warehouseman to hold, provided the person entitled to receive the goods is not found, the carrier by such act loses his right of possession and cannot afterward bring action against the warehouseman to recover them back. Direct proof of the insolvency of the vendee should not be required in order to support the right of the vendor to resume possession of the goods as against a purchaser of doubtful solvency. Bloomingdale v. Memphis, etc., R. Co., 6 Lea (Tenn.) 616.

It is said not to be necessary to give any such as to enable the carrier to advise his agent in charge of the goods, or who is to deliver them to the vendee, that such delivery shall not be made.[9] After the receipt of notice the carrier acts at his peril in delivering the goods, either to the consignor or consignee, and may by suitable action bring the goods into court and require the claimants to determine the right of possession.[10] If the carrier allows the consignee by direct or indirect means to get possession of the goods after the consignor has exercised the right of stoppage in transitu, liability to the consignor will result.[11]

b. Termination of the Right. The rule that the right of stoppage in transitu must be exercised before the carrier has delivered the goods to the consignee does not give rise to difficulty so far as the carrier is concerned, but it is also well settled that a sale of the goods by the consignee, by means of transfer of the bill of lading to a bona fide purchaser for value, while the goods are in transit, will terminate the right of stoppage in transitu,[12] and this may cause difficulty with the carrier who has no notice of such transfer. If he refuses, though under the seller's order, to deliver to such third person, he may be liable for subsequent loss by reason of a falling market.[13]

c. Effect on Carrier's Lien. The lien of the carrier for charges on the goods is prior to the vendor's right to repossession under stoppage in transitu, and the carrier may retain his possession until such charges are paid.[14] But the carrier, as against the right of the consignor to retake possession in the event of stoppage in transitu, cannot enforce the payment of charges for other shipments.[15]

I. Duty as to Transportation — 1. In General. The fact that the carrier has the custody and control of the goods charges him with a duty as to various matters incidental to the transportation, or assumed by express contract.[16] Aside from the liability of the carrier for injury to or loss of the goods, which has reason to the carrier for the direction that the goods be not delivered. Allen v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 79 Me. 327, 9 Atl. 895, 1 Am. St. Rep. 310.

For instance, he may be bound to pay customs charges where the goods are to be trans-already been discussed,[17] he is bound to use reasonable care to preserve the goods from damage, and that duty rests upon him, and not upon the shipper.[18] In general the carrier is entitled to choose the route for transportation, unless it is fixed by the contract.[19] But if the route selected is impracticable, or its selection subjects the goods to loss which could reasonably have been avoided by the choice of a better one, the carrier will be liable for resulting damage.[20]

2. Care of Live Stock — a. In General. The carrier is bound to take reasonable care of live stock delivered for transportation, taking into account the characteristics of the animals,[21] and will be liable for damage or loss resulting from failure to do so.[22] Care is required in other respects also, as in preventing the escape of the animals which are unloaded for some reason incident to the transportation.[23] In case of transportation by rail the trains must be so managed as not to injure the animals by unnecessary concussion.[24] And it is negligence on the part of the carrier to place a stock-car in which straw bedding is used near to the engine, so as to expose the animals to danger of loss by reason of fire being communicated by sparks to the straw.[25]

b. Feeding and Watering — (i) In General. The general duty of caring for live stock in course of transportation involves the duty to feed and water the animals, so far as is reasonably necessary for keeping them in good condition.[26] The mere fact that the owner of the stock, or his agent, by arrangement with the carrier, accompanies the animals on the same train does not relieve the carrier from the duty to feed and water and otherwise care for them.[27] But if the shipper specially agrees, as a part of the contract of transportation, that he or his agents will care for the animals and attend to feeding and watering them, the carrier is thereby relieved from liability so far as opportunity of caring for, feeding, and watering the animals is afforded him.[28] And if damage results from the failure of the shipper under such circumstances to have the animals cared for he cannot hold the carrier responsible.[29] Nevertheless, if the carrier is aware that no one is accompanying the animals to care for them, his duty to give them proper attention is the same as though no contract for care by the shipper had been made.[30] If, however, the failure of the shipper or agent to accompany the animals and care for them is not known to the carrier, of course he is not bound to furnish the care which the shipper has agreed to furnish.[31] And in general the negligence of the shipper in not giving the animals the care which he has under the contract agreed to give will relieve the carrier from liability from resulting loss or injury.[32]

Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Thompson, 71 Ill. 434. And he can, under such circumstances, hold the carrier liable

But even where it is the duty of the shipper to give care and furnish food and water, the carrier will be liable for not affording him or his agent reasonable facilities and opportunity for doing so.[33] At the request of the shipper it is the duty of the carrier to set the car containing the animals out at an intermediate stopping place, if essential to avoid injury from continuance of the transportation.[34]

(II) Statutory Provisions. By federal statute[35] a railroad company engaged in transporting cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals from one state to another is prohibited from confining the same in its cars for a longer period of time than twenty-eight consecutive hours without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented from doing so by accidental causes. And although a penalty is imposed for a violation of this regulation, nevertheless a failure to comply therewith is negligence per se, rendering the railroad company liable to the shipper for resulting injuries to the animals.[36] By the terms of this statute the duty to feed and water is not imposed on the railroad company, where it has been assumed by a shipper for failure to furnish him reasonable opportunity to water where, before reaching the next stopping place, there is unusual delay by reason of the carrier's negligence. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Turner, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 625, 20 S. W. 1008.

c. Furnishing Suitable Cars and Appliances — (i) In General. A railroad company undertaking to transport live stock is bound to provide suitable cars of sufficient strength,[39] and is liable for injuries resulting from failure to do so.[40] But if suitable cars are furnished and due care is exercised, the carrier is not liable for injuries resulting by reason of the viciousness and unruly disposition of the animals or any inherent vice.[41] A railroad company is also bound, in undertaking the transportation of live stock, to furnish suitable pens, and will be liable for injury resulting from the defective condition of such appliances.[42]

The company will be liable for loss by shrinkage resulting from failure to provide sufficient stock-pens for loading the animals within a reasonable time after they are received for shipment. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Woods, (Tex. Civ. App. 1895) 31 S. W. 237.

(II) Shipper Assuming Risk as to Cars and Appliances. The mere presence of the shipper will not lessen the carrier's responsibility as to the safety of the cars, pens, and other appliances, where the shipper has no control over the matter,[43] and the mere knowledge on his part that the cars are not provided with such appliances as are required by common law or by statute will not relieve the carrier from liability.[44] A general stipulation that the shipper has examined the car in which the stock is shipped, and accepts it as suitable and sufficient, will not estop him from recovering for injuries due to a defective car, inasmuch as the carrier cannot limit his common-law liability so as to exempt himself from the consequences of his own negligence.[45] But if the shipper, with notice of defects in the car or appliances, consents to the transportation without objection, he cannot afterward complain of their insufficiency.[46] He should notify the carrier of the apparent defects.[47] The shipper having selected such cars and appliances as he requires, the carrier is not responsible for injury resulting from such selection.[48] Moreover, if the shipper by himself or his own agents exercises control in loading and securing the cars for the safe transportation of the animals, he cannot hold the carrier liable for negligence with respect thereto.[49]

d. Loading and Unloading. Not only as to the apparatus used,[50] but also as to the acts of his servants is the carrier primarily liable with reference to the loading and unloading of stock.[51] It may, however, be provided in the contract that the shipper shall be responsible for loading and unloading, and such a stipulation will relieve the carrier from liability in that respect.[52] Where the stock as loaded by the shipper is accepted by the carrier, the latter assumes all the liabilities of a common carrier, in the absence of any misrepresentation or deceit on the part of the shipper as to the loading.[53]

If the animals are unloaded en route, and escape from the pen in which they are placed, and are damaged while at large, the carrier is liable as insurer for such damage. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Turner, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 37 S. W. 643.

3. Liability For Delay — a. Diligence Required. The carrier's common-law liability as an insurer for loss or injury to the goods does not cover damages, not involving direct loss of or injury to the goods themselves, occasioned by delay in transportation.[54] As to the diligence and care required in completing the express or implied contract for transportation, the rule is that the carrier is bound to use reasonable diligence and care, and that only negligence will render him liable, unless a stipulated time is fixed in the contract.[55] If, however, damage results from failure, without good excuse, to deliver the goods at their destination within a reasonable time, the carrier is liable for such damage.[56]

If by the contract the carrier has the option of two vessels on which the goods may be transported, and in the exercise of ordinary care he sends the goods by the second, he will not be liable for damage resulting from a fall in the market price of the goods because of their not having arrived on the first of the two vessels. Under express contract not specifying time of delivery.— This rule is applicable as well where goods are shipped under an express contract which does not specify a fixed time for delivery, as where there is no express contract whatever, and the carrier's liability is determined by the rules of the common law. A contract of carriage without specified time for performance implies performance within a reasonable time. Central R. Co. v. Hasselkus, 91 Ga. 382, 17 S. E. 838, 44 Am. b. What Is Reasonable Time. The question as to what is reasonable time for delivery, being one of fact for the jury,[57] no definite rules can be stated as to what will and what will not constitute unreasonable delay, as this must depend on the circumstances of each case.[58]

c. What Constitutes Negligence. The overloading of the engine or its defective condition may render a railroad company liable for negligence in resulting delay.[59] But a carrier whose duty it is to transship goods is not bound to avail himself of the very first opportunity for doing so.[60] Negligence in ascertaining the location of the place to which the goods are to be transported may render the carrier liable for delay.[61] In general the selection of a route, where more than one route is available to the carrier, will not render him liable if reasonable care is exercised in this respect. And especially is this true where by reason of some obstruction in the usual route, not due to the carrier's negligence, it becomes necessary to exercise judgment as to forwarding by another route.[62]

d. Delay as Proximate Cause. If the negligent delay occasions the ultimate injury which results from the goods not reaching their destination in time, the carrier is liable, although the loss does not directly result while the goods are in his possession.[63] And even if concurrent negligence of another carrier,[64] or the inherent propensity of animals being transported, contributes to the loss, the carrier will be liable for the delay,[65] and excuses which would have been good for a delay, had there been no negligence on the part of the carrier, will not be available where the injury results from negligence.[66] But if the subsequent loss of the goods is due to an independent cause, the carrier will not be liable, although he has been guilty of a negligent delay in transportation.[67] If the carrier is not notified of special damage which will result from delay he will not be liable for consequences thereof which he could not reasonably have anticipated.[68] Even if there has been delay, if it appears that the damages complained of would have been suffered had there been no delay, there is no liability on the part of the carrier.[69] Where there has been delay, even though excusable, the carrier must take reasonable precautions to avoid injury resulting therefrom.[70] The carrier should notify the consignee of the delay if thereby resulting injury might be avoided.[71]

e. Excuses For Delay; Waiver — (i) Acts of Shipper. If the delay is due to the act or fault of the shipper the carrier cannot be held accountable for resulting injury.[72] If the title to the goods and right to control of them has passed to the consignee by delivery to the carrier, then the subsequent directions of the shipper will not excuse the carrier for detaining the goods.[73]

(ii) Advising Shipper as to Probable Delay. A carrier is bound to know, when he accepts property for shipment, that he has or can obtain facilities for its transportation within a reasonable time,[74] and as to any cause of delay which he might anticipate he should then advise the shipper, and if he does not do so the delay will not be excused.[75]

(III) Climatic Conditions. Floods, snow-storms, and the like may furnish an excuse even for the loss of or damage to the goods,[76] and of course they will furnish a sufficient excuse for delay.[77]

(IV) In Case of Special Contract. Where the carrier specifically agrees to deliver by a fixed time he is bound to answer in damages for failure to do so, without regard to the cause of the delay.[78]

(V) Legal Obstacles; Military Control. Delay due to the requirements of the law will be excused.[79] Where garnishment of the carrier is not valid as to goods after they have been accepted for immediate transportation,[80] such garnishment will be no excuse for delay in completing the transportation.[81] If a railroad is under military control the company will not be liable for delay due to such interference.[82] But if the probability of delay on such account was known to the company at the time the goods were received for transportation it cannot rely upon such defense.[83] It should in such case abdicate its functions as common carrier and refuse to receive goods for transportation.[84]

(VI) Press of Business, or Lack of Facilities. If the carrier treats all alike and furnishes transportation as far as his facilities will permit him, as has heretofore been explained, he may refuse to receive goods which he cannot transport, without rendering himself liable in damages for such refusal.[85] Having received goods for transportation the same excuse is not open to him, and he may be held to answer for damages due to delay, although occasioned by an unusual press of business,[86] or the lack of proper facilities.[87] So the proposition is stated; but it is evident that unusual press of business which could not reasonably have been anticipated at the time the goods were received may, like any other cause not due to the carrier's fault, sometimes furnish an excuse; for the mere receipt of goods for transportation does not impose upon the carrier the same absolute liability which results from an express contract to transport by a fixed time; and the rule, supported by the weight of authority, is that if in consequence of an unusual press of business, and not on account of any inadequacy in equipment, an unanticipated delay occurs, the carrier will be excused.[88] But in general freight received is to be forwarded without discrimination, and a delay of one shipment on account of other shipments subsequently received is not excusable;[89] and the carrier can excuse himself for delay on account of unusual press of business only by showing that he has made the best practicable use of his means of transportation.[90]

(VII) STRIKES AND MOBS. The carrier is liable for the negligent or wrongful acts of his servants during the course of their employment, and therefore if his employees go on a strike, abandoning the performance of their duties, and causing delay in the transportation of goods in their charge or control, the carrier is liable, the delay being due to the employees' wrongful acts.[91] And after the employees have quit the carrier's employment it is his duty to promptly supply their places, if practicable.[92] But if, after leaving the carrier's employment, the employees, by violence, cause delay in the transportation so as to prevent the carrier from proceeding with his business, the delay thereby occasioned will be excusable.[93] If by mob violence the carrier is prevented from performing his obligation to transport goods in his charge or control he will be excused for resulting delay.[94]

(VIII) WAIVER OF DELAY. While mere acceptance of the goods from the carrier on their arrival will not constitute a waiver of claim for damages due to delay,[95] the shipper may by express contract waive the carrier's liability for loss resulting from delay or detention.[96] But such contract will not be valid as against delay due to the carrier's own negligence.[97]

f. Liability of Consignee or Owner For Delay in Accepting; Demurrage. The rules of maritime law on this subject[98] are not applicable in case of transportation by railroad, for the reason that railroad companies have warehouses in which the goods may be stored until ready for immediate transportation, or unloaded at the end of the transportation, and it is the duty of the company to thus keep the goods as warehouseman, for which services a reasonable charge may be made.[99] Hence, in the absence of any express contract, there is in general no right on the part of a railroad company to charge demurrage.[1] But railroad companies may by stipulation in the contract of shipment provide for the payment of charges in the nature of demurrage, and such stipulation will be binding on the consignor.[2] If there is such provision in the contract of shipment, the consignee who accepts the goods is also bound thereby.[3] A general regulation of the railroad company providing for charges on account of delay in unloading may be binding on the

g. Actions Against Carrier For Delay; Pleading and Evidence — (i) In General. The general subject of pleading and practice in actions against carriers will be hereafter discussed[7] and the distinction between an action for breach of contract and an action for tort will be pointed out. It is sufficient here to say that the action for damages resulting from a delay for which the carrier is liable may be founded on contract, even though the contract of shipment does not specify any time within which the transportation is to be completed, for a contract to transport will be deemed to imply transportation within a reasonable time.[8] But the action may be in form for tort, even though the shipment is under a contract, express or implied, the allegation being that the defendant undertook to transport the goods within a reasonable time, and through negligence, carelessness, or fault on defendant's part failed to do so.[9] As to any excuses

Form of declaration or petition.— The following substantial averments were held to show that the action was one founded on breach of contract: Plaintiff alleges that on —— he made a contract in writing with defendant, wherein defendant agreed to transport one hundred cattle for plaintiff from South Omaha to Chicago; that defendant received the cattle on that date for transportation; that the usual, ordinary, and reasonable time required for such transportation was from twenty-four to thirty-six hours; that defendant, in violation of its contract "unreasonably and negligently delayed the transportation of said cattle . . . and did not deliver said cattle at Chicago until ——, and more than forty-eight hours after the time when said cattle should have been delivered at Chicago in the usual and customary course of transportation," followed by allegations of special damage. Denman v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 52 Nebr. 140, 141, 71 N. W. 967. In St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Mudford, 44 Ark. 439, a complaint in substantially the following form was treated as alleging breach of contract: The plaintiff alleges that heretofore, on ——, said defendant was a common carrier for hire from —— to ——, and on said day received from plaintiff at —— [certain described goods] for transportation to ——. Said goods were of the value of —— dollars, and were so to be by defendant, as a carrier for a reward there agreed upon and paid to defendant by plaintiff, carried and delivered to —— within a reasonable time. Plaintiff alleges that —— is a reasonable time in which said goods should have been transported from —— to —— aforesaid, yet the defendant so negligently misbehaved in regard to the same in its calling as carrier for hire that it failed and neglected to deliver the said goods at —— until ——, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of one thousand dollars, wherefore plaintiff prays judgment, etc.

Form.— The averments of a declaration at common law in such case might be substantially as follows: That on —— the defendant was a common carrier of goods for hire from London to Birmingham, and that plaintiff caused to be delivered to defendant, and defendant accepted and received of and from plaintiff, certain goods [specifying them] of the plaintiff to be transported from London to Birmingham within a reasonable time; that a reasonable time for the defendant's carrying and conveying and delivering the said goods was ——. That defendant did not

which it may be anticipated defendant will interpose for the delay, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to negative them in his complaint.[10] But if the plaintiff declares upon breach of contract by which he has himself assumed the risk of damage resulting from delay, the burden of alleging and proving that the delay was occasioned by defendant's negligence is on the plaintiff.[11] On the other hand, if the carrier has unconditionally agreed to transport within a given time he cannot excuse non-performance by alleging and proving an excuse which would otherwise be sufficient.[12] In general the carrier has the burden of proof to show that the delay arose from some other cause than his own neglect.[13]

(II) Conditions Precedent. The prepayment of freight is not essential to an action, unless required by the carrier.[14]

(III) Questions For Jury. The question as to what is a reasonable time for the transportation, and as to the reasonableness and sufficiency of the excuse which the carrier makes for delay, is for the jury.[15]

h. Measure of Damages For Delay — (I) Not the Value of the Goods. Delay in delivery of the goods, even though it is such as to render the carrier liable, does not constitute conversion, and the person entitled to the goods cannot on that account refuse to receive them and sue for the full value.[16]

(II) Value of Use; Profits. Where the proximate result of the delay is the loss of the use of the goods, as, for instance, where the goods consist of machinery, the measure of damage is the value of the use during the time of detention. That is, in general, the rental value.[17] Profits which are reasonably certain, carry and deliver said goods within a reasonable time, but so negligently and improperly behaved and conducted himself that by and through the negligence, carelessness, and default of the defendant in the premises the said goods were not transported to Birmingham for delivery to plaintiff until ——, with allegations as to damages. and within the contemplation of the parties, may be recovered,[18] but in general speculative or uncertain profits are not allowed.[19] And advantages which might have been derived by the use of the goods which are wholly contingent cannot be recovered.[20]

(III) Notice of Special Circumstances. The carrier will not be liable for profits lost by reason of failure to perform a special contract, or on account of other special circumstances not apparent from the transaction itself, unless he has notice of the facts which caused the loss.[21] And this notice should be given when the goods are delivered for transportation.[22] Subsequent notice, however, of the effect of further delay after the goods should have been delivered may render the carrier liable for damages accruing after that time by reason of his negligence in not tracing and finding the goods.[23]

(IV) Depreciation in Value — (A) Generally. In general depreciation in value due to delay may be recovered, that is, the person entitled to recover on account of delay may have the difference between the market value at the time and place where the goods should have been delivered, and their market value at the time and place of actual delivery, if there has been a depreciation.[24] If the delivery is at a different destination than that contracted for of course depreciation of value on that account is also to be taken into account.[25]

(B) Loss of Market. The application of the rule announced in the preceding paragraph is coupled with some difficulty. It seems to be based on the assumption that the goods are shipped with the intention that they are to be sold on their arrival. And where that is the intention, and such intention is known to the carrier, or may be reasonably inferred by him from the nature of the transaction, then of course it is perfectly reasonable; and in pursuance of the same principle it has been held that if the goods are evidently intended for sale on a particular market day, or during a particular market season, then the loss of the market is a damage for which the carrier should respond.[26]

(v) Incidental Expenses and Damages. Necessary expenses incurred by the owner of the goods on account of negligent delay of the carrier in delivering them at their destination may be recovered, such as expense in searching for the property, or carrying insurance on it, or keeping it after arrival.[27] But no recovery can be had for time lost in making inquiry for the goods when they might have been expected to arrive, nor for loss of time while awaiting arrival.[28] Nor can expense be included which might have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care.[29] In some Texas cases recovery has been allowed for distress of mind caused to the consignee by delay in the transportation of a corpse.[30]

(vi) Freight; Interest. Unpaid freight is to be deducted from the amount of damage, as the owner receives the advantage of the transportation.[31] Legal interest on the value of the goods has usually been considered a proper element of damage, to be computed from the time when the goods should have arrived.[32]

market value during the delay may be of no importance whatever to the owner, and it might be entirely unreasonable to adopt that as the measure of damage, although of course any real depreciation in value due to the delay would always be recoverable. In an English case it has been held that when goods are to be conveyed by railway for the purpose of sale the rule already announced may be reasonable, but that no such presumption can be entertained in case of a contract of carriage for a long distance by sea, because goods thus shipped are frequently sold before arrival, or with the intention of holding them for a proper market after arrival, and therefore that the depreciation in market value during the transportation is a purely speculative measure of damage. J. Carrier's Custody of Goods Before and After Transportation — 1. Custody of Goods Awaiting Transportation. Where the goods are delivered to the carrier for immediate transportation, and nothing remains to be done by the shipper, the liability of the carrier as carrier attaches at once.[33] And even while detained in the carrier's warehouse in the usual course of business, or for the carrier's convenience, the liability of the carrier is not that of warehouseman, but that of carrier proper.[34] But if the goods are detained by the carrier before commencement of actual transportation, at the request of the consignor, and for his accommodation, or in order that something further may be done to prepare the goods for transportation, the carrier's liability during such detention is that of warehouseman only.[35]

2. Custody For Delivery to Connecting Carrier. Where a carrier receives goods for transportation to a destination beyond his own line, and involving a delivery to a connecting carrier, he does not become warehouseman of the goods while holding them at the end of his own line before delivery to the connecting carrier, but his liability remains that of carrier so long as the custody continues.[36]

See 9 Cent. Dig. tit. "Carriers," § 751.

It is immaterial that while the goods are being held for delivery to the connecting carrier they have been stored in a warehouse.[37] But if the connecting carrier refuses to receive them the duty of the first carrier having been fully discharged, he may then place them in a warehouse, and his liability as carrier ceases.[38] So if, by the shipper's orders, the goods are stopped in transitu, and they are held for the shipper, the carrier while so holding is liable as warehouseman only.[39]

3. Custody Awaiting Delivery to Consignee — a. Carrier Liable Until Transportation Completed. It is only on the completion of the entire duty of the carrier with reference to the transportation of the goods that any question as to the reduction of the carrier's liability to that of warehouseman can arise. So long as anything remains to be done by the carrier as carrier, before the goods are ready for acceptance by the consignee, the carrier's liability as such continues.[40]

b. Express Companies. Where by contract or custom — as is usually the case with express companies — the duty of the carrier is to make personal delivery to the consignee, he remains liable as carrier until reasonable effort to deliver has proven ineffectual. Then, if by reason of inability to find the consignee, or the consignee's refusal to receive the goods, delivery is not completed, the carrier is liable only for safe-keeping as bailee for hire.[41]

c. General Ships. In case of carriage by water, otherwise than by steamboats having a regular schedule time for arriving and departing, and which come under the same classification as railroads, the rule seems to be uniformly recognized that the liability of the carrier as such continues until the consignee has been notified that the goods are ready for delivery, and he has had a reasonable opportunity to receive them.[42] Notice may, however, be excused by stipulation in the bill of

What constitutes a termination of transportation.— But it is not a simple matter to state an exact rule with reference to what constitutes a termination of transportation. Much depends on the nature of the particular kind of carriage and the usage in connection therewith as to who is charged with the duty of unloading. As to express companies, the general custom is to make personal delivery; as to general ships, the goods may be delivered to the consignee on board, he being charged with the responsibility of removing them, or upon a wharf or pier from which he is to take them; in case of transportation by railroad or steamboat the general custom is to unload into a warehouse or freight house, from which the consignee takes the goods, although railroad companies by contract or usage often place cars loaded with goods for one consignee upon a side-track at a suitable place for unloading, from which, by contract or usage, it is the duty of the consignee to remove the goods. These different methods of delivery require separate discussion. The duty of the carrier to the consignee as to time and place of final delivery will be discussed under a subsequent heading. lading.[43] After the expiration of reasonable time after notice, the carrier is liable only as warehouseman, no matter what may be the excuse of the consignee for not receiving the goods.[44] But if the goods are not called for the carrier must safely store them.[45]

d. Railroads and Steamboats — (1) General Rule; Reasonable Time. Notwithstanding the distinction between the usual methods of delivery in case of general ships on the one hand, and railroad and steamboat lines having fixed schedules of time for arriving and departing on the other, which will hereafter be adverted to, the general rule of liability announced in the preceding paragraph has been very frequently applied to carriage by rail or steamboat, that is, that the carrier remains liable until the goods have reached their destination, and the consignee has had reasonable opportunity[46] (involving notice of arrival, where such notice is essential to charge him with the duty of taking the goods), to receive the goods from the carrier, and that, after the expiration of such reasonable time,[47] the liability of the carrier, if the goods remain in his possession, is

(II) Storing; Placing on Side-Track. Railroads usually have freight houses in which the goods are placed on reaching their destination, and in the absence of some contract or usage by which the consignee is bound to unload from the cars, their liability as carrier is not reduced to that of warehouseman until the goods are placed in the freight house, ready to be taken by the consignee.[51] And in general on failure or refusal of the consignee to take the goods, the duty of the carrier as warehouseman involves the storage of the goods.[52] If by custom or contract the duty of the carrier is performed when it places the car containing the goods on a side-track ready for unloading by the consignee, then from that time the liability of the carrier as carrier ceases.[53]

(III) NECESSITY OF NOTICE—(A) In General. The rule above stated[54] has not been uniformly recognized as applicable to railroads and steamboats, but in many jurisdictions a different rule, which may be designated as the Massachusetts rule, has been adopted, based on the assumption that by reason of the existence of fixed schedules for the arrival of trains or boats, from which the consignee may know when to expect his goods, it is his duty to be on hand to receive them,[55] and that rule is that when the goods have reached their destination and are ready for delivery to the consignee, the carrier's duty as carrier terminates, and that of warehouseman begins without regard to notice to the consignee or a reasonable time for the removal of the goods.[56] This rule is convenient by reason of its definiteness, and in that it obviates the constant difficulty of determining the sufficiency of notice and reasonableness of time. But notwithstanding this consideration, the weight of authority is with what may be called the New York rule, by which the carrier remains liable after the goods have reached their destination, and notwithstanding their being placed in a freight house or other suitable place for being received by the consignee, until the consignee has had reasonable opportunity to take them away.[57] In not all the jurisdictions which follow the New York rule as to the carrier being liable for a reasonable time after the goods reach their destination is it required that the carrier give notice. Some courts hold that the consignee is bound to take notice of the usual time for the arrival of the goods, and that he has only a reasonable time thereafter in which to remove them, without regard to notice given by the carrier.[58] But in most of the jurisdictions in which it has been held that the carrier continues responsible as carrier for a reasonable time, it is required that the carrier give such notice as is practicable to the consignee of the arrival, and that the question of reasonable time is to be determined with reference to the giving of such notice.[59] The liability of the carrier as such continues under this doctrine until,

Reason for rule.— It is urged in support of this rule that by reason of the nature of the railroad company's means of transportation it cannot make personal delivery, as can those who transport by vehicles traversing the common highways, and it is not practicable in the ordinary course of business to give notice to the consignee, as is done in the case of general ships. But the controlling distinction probably is to be found in the fact that it is customary for railroad companies to deliver goods at the destination into a freight house, and there is no good reason for applying the severe common-law rules of liability after the risks incident to transportation have been terminated by storage in such freight house. after notice, the consignee has had a reasonable time to remove the goods.[60] What constitutes a reasonable time will depend to some extent on the circumstances of the case,[61] but will not depend upon the peculiar circumstances in the situation of the owner or consignee as affecting his own necessity or convenience.[62] Where notice is required, newspaper publication is not sufficient.[63] If the consignee is unknown, the carrier must use reasonable and diligent effort to find and notify him.[64]

(B) Under Provisions of Contract or Statute. The duty of the carrier as to giving notice may be controlled by contract between the shipper and the carrier.[65] In some states there are statutes requiring the carrier to give notice to the consignee, but such a statute does not necessarily determine the time when the carrier's liability as carrier ceases and his liability as warehouseman begins. Where the rule is that the carrier's strict liability terminates with the arrival of the goods at their destination, it seems that statutory requirement as to notice does not alone extend the term of strict liability.[66] But in some states the statutory provision is such as to continue the carrier's strict liability until a reasonable time after the giving of notice.[67]

e. Effect of Custom or Usage. The duty to give notice, and the liability of the carrier as such until reasonable time after notice is given may arise from usage of such nature that the carrier is presumed to have assented thereto.[68] On the other hand, the duration of the carrier's liability as carrier after the goods have reached their destination may be restricted by usage[69] or a course of dealing between the parties.[70] It is said that notice to the consignee of the arrival of the goods may be dispensed with by usage of the port.[71] But when usage or custom is relied on it must be such as that the consignor or consignee should be presumed to have had knowledge thereof.[72] Usage may control as to whether delivery is properly made on holidays.[73] A usage as to posting the arrival of goods on a bulletin board as a substitute for any other form of notice may be binding.[74]

4. Liability as Custodian or Warehouseman[75]— a. Gratuitous Bailee; Slight Care. The goods may no doubt be so left in the hands of the carrier after reaching their destination and the consignee or owner has had opportunity to take them, as that the further duty of the carrier with reference thereto is only that of an accommodation or gratuitous bailee or custodian, with no right on the part of the carrier to collect charges for keeping, and no duty to exercise more than slight care, and in such case the carrier will be liable, it is said, only for gross negligence.[76]

b. Bailee For Hire; Ordinary Care. The presumption, however, is that even after the strict responsibility of carrier ceases, he continues to be a warehouseman of the goods until taken by the consignee or owner, and for compensation, either included in the original charge for carriage, or collectable as an additional charge against the consignee or owner.[77] Therefore the carrier as warehouseman is bound to use ordinary care in the keeping of the goods, and will be liable for negligence causing injury thereto.[78] It would be impracticable to differentiate Negligence in not making prompt delivery. — If the consignee is prevented from getting the goods by reason of negligence of the carrier's servant in assuring him that the goods have not arrived, the carrier will be liable for the destruction of the goods, although not due to any negligence in their keeping. Rep. 293; Lane v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 112 Mass. 455; Derosia v. Winona, etc., R. Co., 18 Minn. 133. And evidence is competent for the purpose of showing that defendant exercised the same degree of care that was usually exercised in the vicinity with reference to the same kind of property by other carriers. Cass v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 14 Allen (Mass.) 448.

5. ACTIONS AGAINST CARRIER AS WAREHOUSEMAN.[80] The storage of the goods does not create a new contract, and the action against the carrier for negligence in keeping the goods at their destination may be based on the contract of shipment.[81] As the action against the carrier as warehouseman is founded on negligence, it is perhaps theoretically correct to say that the burden of proving negligence is on the plaintiff.[82] But, the custody of the goods being shown to have been in the carrier, and their loss, or the failure to produce them, being established, the burden of showing that there was no negligence is usually held to rest upon the carrier.[83]

K. Effect of Legal Process[84]—1. EXCUSE FOR NON-DELIVERY. Where the goods are taken from the possession of the carrier by valid legal process against the owner the carrier is excused from further liability, if he acts in good faith and without negligence in surrendering the goods. Such surrender on the part of the carrier does not amount to conversion.[85] But if the goods are not actually taken from the carrier, legal process will furnish no excuse for failure to transport or deliver.[86] And if the goods are not subject to seizure under the process

in response to which the carrier surrenders them, the carrier is liable for failure to deliver.[87]

2. Duty to Notify Owner. Where the carrier surrenders the goods under legal process he should, to relieve himself from liability, at once notify the owner of the fact.[88]

3. Rights of Officer Levying on Goods. The officer under legal process can only take the goods from the carrier by paying the carrier's charges, and upon doing so he is subrogated to the carrier's lien.[89]

4. Garnishment of Carrier.[90] A garnishment of the carrier at the suit of a creditor of the owner of the goods is not effectual while the goods are in transit.[91] But while holding the goods at the end of the transportation for delivery to the consignee the carrier may be garnished therefor.[92]

L. Final Delivery[93] — 1. What Sufficient — a. In General. Where the transportation is by water, much depends upon the usage and custom of the trade as to what is a sufficient delivery to terminate the carrier's responsibility for the care of the goods.[94] The general rule seems to be that the carrier's liability terminates when the goods are unloaded and placed on the wharf,[95] with notice to the consignee, and after a reasonable time for their removal.[96] The same rules apply process as will render the carrier liable for conversion on refusal to deliver the goods in pursuance of such demand. Kohn v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 37 S. C. 1, 16 S. E. 376, 34 Am. St. Rep. 726, 24 L. R. A. 100.

Failing to give such notice the carrier becomes liable as in any other case of delivery to another person than the one entitled to the goods, and assumes the burden of showing that the process was valid, unless he can show that the owner had actual knowledge from other sources in due time to assert his rights to the goods. Robinson v. Memphis, etc., R. Co., 16 Fed. 57.

It is not the duty of the carrier to defend against a seizure for the protection of, nor to give notice to, the consignor where the process is valid against the consignee and the goods are seized at the point of destination. Frank v. Central R. Co., 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 129.

Carrier's knowledge of ownership.—The carrier is not liable to garnishment, unless he has knowledge that the goods belong to the debtor in the garnishment proceeding. Walker v. Detroit, etc., R. Co., 49 Mich. 446, 13 N. W. 812.

If the garnishment is in a proceeding against the shipper, the carrier is not chargeable for subsequent delivery to the consignee, as he has a right to presume, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, that they belong to the consignee, and not to the shipper. Bingham v. Lamping, 26 Pa. St. 340, 67 Am. Dec. 418.

from the cars or boat in which such goods have been transported is to be borne by the carrier.[4]

c. Opportunity to Inspect and Remove. The consignee has the right to examine the goods before accepting delivery,[5] and if unloading is essential for that purpose the duty rests on the carrier to make it.[6]

d. Storage. While it may be the duty of the consignee to be present to receive the goods when ready for delivery,[7] yet the carrier cannot abandon the goods for failure of the consignee to appear and claim them, although his liability as carrier may be terminated,[8] but he must store or warehouse them and hold them for the consignee.[9]

e. Part Delivery. There may be delivery and acceptance as to a part of the goods, leaving the carrier liable as to the balance.[10] But unless there is something to indicate a contrary agreement, the contract of carriage will be deemed indivisible, and the consignee will not be bound to accept part performance.[11]

2. PERSONAL DELIVERY — a. Express Companies. In case of land carriage it seems to have been thought by earlier judges that personal delivery was implied in the contract, in the absence of stipulation or usage authorizing some other delivery.[17] And this is still the presumption as to expressmen, express companies, and other carriers holding themselves out as having facilities for making personal delivery.[18] Until reasonable effort to deliver in person has been made the express company remains liable as carrier.[19] If, however, by custom or reason-

Reciprocal duty.— The duty of the carrier to deliver and the consignee to receive in such cases are reciprocal, however; and if the carrier is unable, by reason of the fault of the consignee, to make personal delivery, his liability as carrier terminates and his further responsibility is that of warehouseman only. Adams Express Co. v. Darnell, 31 Ind. 20, 99 Am. Dec. 582.

During business hours.— It is the duty of able regulation of the express company limits are fixed beyond which it does not make personal delivery, one who is charged with knowledge of such custom or regulation must govern himself accordingly.[20]

b. Carriers by Rail. The rule requiring personal delivery does not apply to railroad companies, as they have no facilities for taking the goods to the residence or place of business of the consignee, and the general usage of their business does not require them to do so,[21] and the same principle is applicable to special transportation companies.[22]

c. Carriers by Water. A carrier by water is not bound to deliver to the consignee in person, or at the consignee's warehouse. He may land the goods at a wharf at the port of designation.[23]

3. Place of Final Delivery — a. In General. The goods are to be delivered at the usual place for making such delivery,[24] unless a place of destination is specially named in the bill of lading.[25] In the absence of special contract, express or implied, a carrier by water is not obliged to deliver freight at the nearest pier to the address of the consignee.[26] Delivery on a side-track will not be sufficient to terminate the carrier's liability, unless such delivery is agreed the express company to deliver goods as soon as practicable after arrival at the place of the consignment, within the usual hours of transacting general business in such place. b. Specified Place. If goods are accepted for delivery at a specified warehouse, or other particular place, the carrier is bound to deliver at such place, although it is not the ordinary place for delivery at that destination.[30] By special agreement a carrier by water may be bound to deliver at a special wharf.[31] Without previous contract the shipper is not entitled to have the goods delivered at a different warehouse from that at which the goods are usually delivered and to which the carrier has access.[32]

c. Acceptance at Intermediate Point. The person to whom the carrier has the right to deliver the goods may accept them at an intermediate point, and thereupon the carrier's liability terminates.[33]

goods under a contract, either express, or implied from the marks on the goods, to deliver them to a person named, without any reservation of power of disposal by the consignor, then the delivery to such person completes the contract and relieves the carrier from further liability.[34] This rests on the assumption which the carrier is authorized to entertain that the title to the goods passes to the consignee on delivery to the carrier.[35] But if the carrier has notice that the consignee is not the owner, nor entitled to receive the goods, delivery to him will constitute conversion.[36] Where there is nothing in the bill of lading indicating a reservation of title or power of disposal to the consignor, it is unnecessary that the consignee produce the bill of lading in order to be entitled to receive the goods;[37] nor will reservation of power of disposal to the consignor in the bill of lading render delivery to the consignee unlawful if the carrier has no notice of such bill of lading.[38]

b. Holder of Bill of Lading. The indorsement of a bill of lading, which by reservation[39] therein in some manner of the right of subsequent disposition to the person in whose favor it is drawn, whether he be the owner of the goods or consignee, is made to stand as representative of the goods, transfers the right to receive the goods named therein, and a delivery to such indorsee will protect the carrier.[40] And if the bill of lading is thus made to stand for the goods the person claiming the goods should produce and surrender the bill of lading. Otherwise the carrier will make delivery to the claimant of the goods at his peril.[41] But the fact that the carrier is directed to give notice to a person named of the arrival of the goods, or to deliver in care of a person named, will not make the person so named the consignee in such sense that delivery to him will be sufficient.[42]

c. Agent. The agent of the carrier at point of destination may be designated as the consignee in such way that delivery to him will terminate the carrier's liacarrier from liability to one who has become holder of the bill in good faith and for value before such delivery. See also infra, II, L, 4, b.

d. Real Owner. Acquiescence in former deliveries to one claiming to be agent may be sufficient to justify the carrier in making further deliveries to the same person. Ontario Bank v. New Jersey Steamboat Co., 59 N. Y. 510.

A drayman who has been in the habit of receiving goods for a consignee is not necessarily an authorized agent with reference to any particular shipment. Dean v. Vaccaro, 2 Head (Tenn.) 488, 75 Am. Dec. 744; Sawyer v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 22 Wis. 403, 99 Am. Dec. 49.

Carrier's knowledge of agency.— If the person to whom delivery is made is really the agent of the shipper, authorized to receive the goods, the delivery will be sufficient, although the authority was not known to the carrier. Angle v. Mississippi, etc., R. Co., 9 Iowa 487.

Goods addressed to "Hon. J. G. Carlisle, Secretary United States Treas. Dept., Washington, D. C.," were properly delivered in the usual course of business to the treasury department. Aldrich Car-Seal Mfg. Co. v. American Express Co., 117 Mich. 32, 75 N. W. 94.

Husband of consignor cannot be presumed to be consignor's agent for the purpose of accepting delivery. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Weil, 8 Kan. App. 839, 57 Pac. 853.

One charged with the duty of paying customs dues on goods may not be such agent as is authorized to accept final delivery or change the destination of the goods. Claflin v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 7 Allen (Mass.) 341; McAndrew v. Whitlock, 52 N. Y. 40, 11 Am. Rep. 657. But the carrier may be justified in putting the goods into the custody of such person. Redmond v. Liverpool, etc., Steamship Co., 56 Barb. (N. Y.) 320.

Where packages are addressed to a bank, or the cashier thereof, delivery to any agent of the bank, engaged in the transaction of its general business, is sufficient. Sweet v. Barney, 23 N. Y. 335; Hotchkiss v. Artisans' Bank, 2 Abb. Dec. (N. Y.) 403, 2 Keyes (N. Y.) 564.

Wrongful delivery to third person.—Where the consignor directed the carrier to forward a portion of the consignment to places to be designated by a third party, and the carrier delivered the goods to such third party, it was held that the delivery was wrongful. Delivery made to one who had been the consignee's agent, but whose authority had been terminated with notice to the consignor, held not sufficient. Lester v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 92 Hun (N. Y.) 342, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 907, 72 N. Y. St. 334.

46. The carrier, like any other bailee, will be excused from further liability on delivery of the goods to the true owner thereof who is entitled to the present possession, regardless of whether he is consignor, consignee, or holder of bill of lading. Forged order.— If the delivery is secured by a forged order from the consignee, the carrier is nevertheless liable. American Merchants' Union Express Co. v. Milk, 73 Ill. 224.

Impersonation of consignee.— The carrier is liable for delivering the goods to one who impersonates the consignee. Pacific Express Co. v. Critzer, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 42 S. W. 1017; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Adams, 49 Tex. 748, 30 Am. Rep. 116. Apparently contra, Pacific Express Co. v. Hertzberg, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 100, 42 S. W. 795.

Lost notice presented by finder.—Where notice sent to the consignee of the arrival of the goods contained a direction that it should be returned when the goods were called for, and the truckman to whom it was given by the consignee lost it, and a third person, finding it, by presenting it to the carrier, secured the goods, held that the carrier was liable for the loss. Sinsheimer v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 21 Misc. (N. Y.) 45, 46 N. Y. Suppl. 887.

Subsequent delivery to person entitled to receive.— If the goods are, however, delivered by the person who wrongfully receives them from the carrier to the one entitled to receive them, the latter can only recover nominal damages. Rosenfield v. Express Co., 1 Woods (U. S.) 131, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 12,060.

tion is not one of due care, for the carrier, like any other bailee, acts at his peril in making delivery.[52] The carrier's duty to deliver to the right person is not affected by the fact that the goods are left uncalled for or are refused by the person entitled to them.[53]

(II) Fraudulent Consignee. Difficult cases involving the question discussed in the preceding paragraph have arisen where consignors have been induced by fraud to ship goods, supposing that they were to be delivered to a person of known responsibility, when the intent has been to secure delivery to another person. But it may be regarded as well settled by the weight of authority that if the person to whom the consignor intended to ship the goods (in the absence of any act on the part of the consignor to mislead the carrier) is not the person who secures them, the fraud is to be deemed one perpetrated on the carrier, and for the consequences of which the carrier will be liable, and it is immaterial that the person to whom the goods were actually intended to be delivered refuses to receive them.[54] On the other hand, if the consignor is induced by fraud perpetrated upon him to ship to another person than the one to whom he supposes the shipment is being made, then he must stand the loss, and the carrier will be exonerated on delivery to the one to whom the goods are actually shipped.[55]

(III) Negligence of Shipper. If the carrier is misled by some act of the shipper or consignee as to the person to whom delivery should be made, the carrier will be excused.[56]

Erroneous view.— There are some cases in which the question is erroneously treated as though it was one involving the exercise of due care. A number of cases may be found in which language of that import is used, but where the result was correct under the facts, the carrier being held liable. (IV) Recovery by Carrier Against Person Wrongfully Receiving. Where the carrier has through mistake or fraud been induced to deliver the goods to a wrong person, he may maintain an action against such person for damages.[57]

5. Failure or Refusal of Consignee to Accept. If the consignee fails or refuses to take or accept the goods when ready for delivery, the carrier remains liable for them as warehouseman only, but he is not under obligation to return them to the consignor.[58] The duty of the carrier is to store or keep as warehouseman,[59] and it seems that the carrier is not bound to give the consignor notice of refusal of the consignee to accept.[60]

6. Failure or Refusal of Carrier to Deliver; Conversion. The act of the carrier in failing to deliver without lawful excuse constitutes a breach of contract,[61] but it also constitutes a conversion,[62] and after the consignee has waited a

Carrier is not bound to take separate receipts for different portions of the goods as taken away by the consignee, and may demand a receipt for the entire consignment which is ready for delivery. Morris, etc., R. Co. v. Ayres, 29 N. J. L. 393, 80 Am. Dec. 215. But a regulation requiring a receipt for the entire consignment before there is an opportunity to determine whether all the goods are ready for delivery is unreasonable and void. sion until the freight is paid, he will not be guilty of conversion in making payment of freight a condition for delivery.[70] After liability of the carrier for conversion has been established, he may, with reference to third persons, treat the property as his own and himself maintain an action for conversion of such property.[71]

7. Goods Carried C. O. D.— a. Acceptance For Transportation. The peculiarity of shipment of goods C. O. D. (meaning, collect on delivery), which is usually undertaken only by express companies, is that a condition is attached that the carrier on delivery to the consignee shall collect a specified sum of money, usually the purchase-price of the goods (and other than transportation charges), and return the sum thus collected to the consignor. This additional condition of the transportation involves duties and liabilities on the part of the carrier which are not to be deemed to have been assumed by the carrier, unless specially shown to have been undertaken.[72]

b. Title to Goods in Transit. There is a square conflict in the authorities as to whether the attaching of this condition to the delivery affects the ordinary presumptions as to the title to the goods while in transit. By the decided weight of authority delivery C. O. D., like an ordinary delivery to a carrier, presumptively passes title to the consignee, the only difference being that the carrier is to retain possession of the goods as agent for the shipper until payment is made by the consignee, and on receiving money in payment is, as carrier for the consignor, to transport back such money. In other words, under this view, the title to the goods passes to the consignee on delivery to the carrier, but right to possession in the nature of a vendor's lien remains with the consignor while the goods are in the carrier's possession, and terminates only when the condition is performed and the money paid by the consignee to the carrier, whereupon the title to and possession of the money vests in the consignor.[73] There is authority,

This doctrine has frequently been applied in cases of transportation of intoxicating liquors, and it has been held that where an order for such liquors has been accepted by the seller and the liquors delivered to the carrier for transportation C. O. D. to the buyer, the sale is made, that is the title passes, where the liquors are delivered to the carrier, and not where the carrier deliv-

however, for the view that where such condition is attached to the delivery of the goods to the carrier, the title does not pass until delivery to the buyer, the payment by him of the purchase-price being deemed a condition precedent to the passing of title.[74]

c. Duties and Liabilities of Carrier. The carrier is under no obligation, unless so directed by the consignor, to allow the consignee to examine the goods before paying the charges.[75] If the carrier delivers the goods to the consignee without receiving the amount to be collected on delivery, he renders himself liable to the consignor therefor.[76] On refusal of the consignee to accept and pay charges the carrier should notify the consignor,[77] and on failure to do so remains liable for the goods as carrier.[78] But where the carrier fully discharges his duty

the other hand, where the initial carrier undertakes the entire transportation, the connecting carriers through whose hands the goods pass in the performance of the contract are agents of the initial carrier in the performance of its contract, and a suit for breach of the contract should be brought against the carrier with whom the contract is made.[83]

2. ACCEPTANCE OF GOODS MARKED TO DESTINATION BEYOND CARRIER'S LINE — a. General Rule. There has been much discussion by the courts of the question whether, if a carrier receives goods marked to a destination beyond his usual line of transportation, so that for the final delivery of the goods at their destination transportation by a connecting carrier will be necessary, the shipper, who has actual or presumptive knowledge of the facts, is entitled to rely on the acceptance by the first carrier as constituting a contract to deliver the goods at their destination, employing the intermediate carrier as agent for that purpose, or whether, on the other hand, the contract implied is that the first carrier will transport the goods to the end of his usual line, and as agent of the shipper deliver them to an intermediate carrier, who thereupon becomes carrier of the shipper to complete the transportation. On the determination of this question will depend the solution of the further question whether the first carrier, after transporting the goods to the end of his line and delivering them to a connecting carrier, is absolved from liability, or whether his liability as carrier continues until the connecting carrier completes the transportation by delivering the goods at their destination. These questions, which seem to have assumed practical form only since the introduction of transportation by railroad, were first decided by the English courts on the theory that the shipper had a right to assume an undertaking by the carrier, in the absence of any express agreement to the contrary, to deliver the goods at their ultimate destination, and according to what is called the English rule the carrier receiving the goods becomes liable as carrier for the entire transportation.[84] A few American courts have given theoretical sanction to the English rule,[85] but a contrary conclusion has been reached in this country on reasoning which seems satisfactory and more in harmony with the conditions surrounding transportation by rail.[86] Accordingly the courts of this country have, with but few exceptions, adopted the rule, which has been called the American rule, that the liability of the first carrier, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, terminates when he transports the goods to the end of his line of carriage and delivers them to a connecting carrier to be taken to their destination.[87] But whatever may be the presumption, the right of the carrier is fully recognized to limit his liability by contract, and even by usage, to his own line.[88]

first carrier may, by improperly dealing with the goods, render himself liable to the shipper, even though the actual loss resulting is not apparent until the goods are in the second carrier's hands.[97] Thus, if by delay in the delivery to the connecting carrier of perishable goods their loss is caused in the hands of the second carrier, the first carrier will be liable.[98] While holding the goods for delivery to the second carrier the first carrier is not a warehouseman merely, but is subject to the full liability of common carrier.[99] But as the duty of the first carrier is to deliver to the second carrier, and his liability is to terminate when such delivery is made, he terminates his common-law liability as carrier by making proper efforts to deliver to the connecting carrier, and having done so he may, on the refusal of the connecting carrier to receive the goods, then store them and become liable as warehouseman only.[1] Where goods are thus held after failure or refusal of the connecting carrier to receive them, it is the duty of the initial carrier to at once notify the shipper or consignee, as the case may be.[2]

b. To Carrier From Whom Goods Are Received. If through any fault on the part of the second carrier liability for loss of or injury to the goods is thrown upon the first carrier, the second carrier is responsible to the first, who has been compelled to answer for the injury.[20] Where cars of one carrier are received by another, containing goods for transportation, the second carrier is a common carrier of the cars as well as the goods, and for the cars is responsible to the first carrier.[21]

5. Liability of Last Carrier. The liability of the last successive carrier as to making delivery is not, in general, different from that of a carrier who completes the transportation on his own line.[22] If he delivers to the wrong person,[23] even by reason of negligent direction of a preceding carrier for whose acts the shipper is not responsible,[24] he must answer to the shipper for the loss of the goods.[25]

6. Limitations of Liability. The conflict in the authorities as to what are the relations between the shipper and the successive carriers makes it difficult to lay down general propositions as to whether succeeding carriers are entitled to the lawful exemptions from liability contracted for by the first carrier. If the first carrier is the agent of the shipper for the purpose of procuring transportation over connecting lines, then a contract for limitation of liability made between the first and second carriers on delivery of the goods to the latter will be binding on the shipper.[26] By express stipulation in the contract with the first carrier the

25. The last carrier with reference to transportation by connecting carriers is the one who last transports the goods in pursuance of the original delivery for shipment. 26. Levy v. Southern Express Co., 4 S. C. 234.

But a mere undertaking on part of first carrier to transport to end of his route and deliver to a connecting carrier does not in itself constitute the first carrier an agent of the shipper in such sense as to authorize him to make such a contract. benefit of limitations contained in that contract may inure to subsequent carriers.[27] The weight of authority seems to support the proposition that unless the contract for transportation by the first carrier is limited by its terms to that carrier, it is to be deemed a contract regulating the entire transportation, and connecting carriers are entitled to the benefit of limitations contained therein.[28] Especially is this true where the bill of lading provides for an entire compensation for the through transportation.[29] But if the contract with the first carrier apparently relates to his liability only,[30] as, for instance, where it is stipulated that his liability shall not extend beyond his own line,[31] the connecting carrier is not entitled to the benefit thereof. Especially is this true where there is no provision in the contract for a through rate.[32] It has indeed been held with much reason that unless the contract expressly refers to succeeding carriers it is not available to them as a defense, inasmuch as the succeeding carrier is not a party to such contract.[33] As, according to the American rule, the first carrier is prima facie liable only with reference to the transportation over his own line, a contract for through transportation by which the liability of the first carrier is limited to his own line is valid, even in states where limitation of liability is prohibited by statute;[34] and liability

On the same theory it is said that as the first carrier, by accepting the goods for through transportation without prepayment of charges, impliedly agrees that no demand for charges shall be made until the point of destination is reached, this agreement is binding on succeeding carriers, and they are likewise bound to see that no damage results to the shipper from demand for prepayment of charges by succeeding carriers. beyond the receiving carrier's line being the result of contract, the carrier may impose on the assumption of such contract relation any limitation which he sees fit.[35]

7. Action Against Connecting Carriers; Presumptions; Burden of Proof. Under the American rule that, in the absence of partnership relations or contract for through transportation, each of the carriers is alone liable for loss or damage occurring during his part of the transportation, the action may be brought directly against the carrier on whose line the loss or injury occurred.[36] To render the first carrier liable it must appear that he failed to deliver the goods to the connecting carrier, or delivered them in damaged condition.[37] The second or subsequent carrier is not to be held liable in an action against him until it appears that he received the goods in sound condition and that loss or injury happened to them while in his possession.[38] But on proof of delivery to the first carrier in good condition and receipt by the second carrier without objection, it will be presumed, in an action against the second carrier, that the goods were still in the condition in which they were received by the first carrier.[39]

Indeed, the weight of authority[40] seems to be in support of the general proposition that if the goods are delivered by the last carrier in damaged condition the presumption arises without further evidence that the damage occurred while in the possession of the last carrier, and that the burden is upon him to prove that they were in the damaged condition when received by him, the double presumption being entertained that they were accepted in good condition by the first carrier, and that such good condition continued until their receipt by the last carrier, notwithstanding transportation over intermediate lines.

N. Charges and Liens — 1. Charges For Transportation — a. In Advance. That the carrier may be chargeable as common carrier the service must be for compensation,[41] and this compensation may be required in advance, and if not so paid the carrier may refuse to receive the goods.[42] But it is not necessary that charges be tendered in advance unless demanded.[43]

tion, to be determined in an action in which the question as to amount of compensation arises and to be measured by what is ordinarily charged for like services under like conditions.[44]

c. Legislative Control. That it is within the power of a state legislature with reference to commerce within a state, and of congress with reference to interstate commerce, to prescribe the rates to be charged by public carriers for their services, so long as the charges fixed do not require that the services rendered shall be without reasonable compensation, is well settled.[45]

d. By Contract. The rate of charge is usually specified in the bill of lading or other shipping contract. If the amount fixed is by reference to a schedule of rates, and by mutual mistake a different rate is inserted in the contract, the rate intended will control.[46] There may be, by general announcement of schedule rates accepted by the shipper, by the act of shipment, a resulting contract as to the rate to be charged.[47] But where the announced schedule is subject to change on notice, a notice of the change of the schedule rate will be binding as to subsequent shipments.[48] An agent having authority to contract for shipment of goods may bind the carrier as to the rate of shipment.[49]

e. Divisibility of Contract; Full or Partial Performance — (I) When Right to Freight Attaches. In ordinary cases of land carriage there is no difficulty in saying that the right to the freight provided for by the contract attaches when the goods are delivered into the possession of the carrier for transportation, but there are some peculiarities as to carriage by sea. It is said that in such cases the performance of the contract is not to be deemed as commenced so that the right to freight has attached until the vessel has "broken ground," that is, started on its journey,[50] and accordingly that after delivery of the goods to the vessel, but before sailing, the shipper may demand them back, with liability only for damages, and not for freight.[51]

(II) Contract Not Divisible. In general the contract of transportation is not divisible, and after the carrier has entered upon performance he is entitled to the full freight agreed upon, although full performance of the contract is prevented by the act of the owner, as, for instance, in taking possession of the goods before they reach their destination.[52] But if the agreement is for an amount to be determined by the quantity or weight of the goods, the amount of charge will be determined by the quantity received and delivered, and the recitals in the bill of lading as to quantity will not be binding in determining that question.[53] It is sometimes specified that damage by reason of shortage or injury to the goods as delivered shall be deducted from the carrier's freight charges.[54]

(III) Full Performance; Pro-Rating. As a general principle freight is not due until delivery of the goods, unless such delivery is prevented by fraud of the shipper or his agents, and although delivery becomes impossible by reason of some cause for which the carrier is not responsible, even though it be act of God or the public enemy, he is not entitled to freight, no matter how great a part of the transportation has been performed.[55] If the goods are in part lost or destroyed, or suffer damage, for which the carrier is responsible, the consignee is not bound to accept part performance, and there is in general no liability for freight charges.[56] In case of damage to the goods for which the carrier is not

But if part performance is accepted, or if the contract is by its terms or by implication divisible, the carrier is entitled to freight on the portion delivered, but not on that which responsible, the consignee is bound to accept, and the carrier is entitled to full freight.[57] If the goods are voluntarily accepted by the owner, with the consent of the carrier, before the completion of the transportation, the carrier is entitled to pro rata freight for the portion of the contract performed, the voluntary delivery and acceptance constituting a new implied contract by way of substitute for the original contract.[58] The carrier is not entitled, however, to additional charges for additional services rendered without the owner's consent by reason of sending the goods to their destination by a roundabout way,[59] nor on account of the value of the goods being greater than that named in the bill of lading, even though the usual freight rate is measured to some extent by the value of the goods, as the liability of the carrier is limited to the value specified in the bill of lading.[60] The rule that the carrier is entitled to freight only on full performance of the contract precludes his recovery of charges where there is a misdelivery, even though the owner gets possession of the goods from the person to whom they have been wrongfully delivered.[61] As freight is not earned where the contract of transportation is not performed by the carrier, the consignor who has paid freight in advance may recover back what he has paid, on the failure of the

f. Connecting Carriers; Advancement of Charges — (I) Charges of Each Carrier For His Own Line. Where connecting carriers act under joint arrangement as to rates, each is entitled to proportionate compensation out of the charge for the entire transportation.[63] But in an ordinary case of receipt by one carrier for transportation to a destination beyond his own line the succeeding carrier to whom the goods are offered is in the same situation as an independent carrier, and may demand prepayment if he so elects,[64] and is entitled to freight as an independent carrier, regardless of any contract of the initial carrier of which he has no knowledge.[65] If the first carrier has contracted for the rate for the entire transportation, and the charges exacted by connecting carriers are such as to render the entire charge greater than that contracted for, the remedy of the consignor or owner is against the carrier with whom the contract was made.[66]

(II) Charges Advanced to Preceding Carrier. A connecting carrier may advance the charges of the preceding carrier, including charges which the preceding carrier may have already advanced in the same way, and demand the full amount of his own charges and the advancements at the end of the transportation.[67] However, a connecting carrier is under no obligation to make such

Tender. As the carrier has a lien for his charges,[73] his duty to deliver the possession of the goods at the end of the transportation, and the consignee's duty to pay, are concurrent.[74] And until the carrier is ready to make complete and final delivery of possession to the consignee he is not entitled to his freight.[75] The consignee has a right to examine the goods as to quantity, quality, and condition before accepting delivery and becoming liable for freight.[76] On the other hand, the consignee must tender the freight before being entitled to possession of the goods, and even though excessive freight is demanded, the amount due should be tendered.[77] But if the carrier denies possession of the goods, tender of freight is waived.[78]

b. Offsetting Damages. As against the carrier's claim for freight the consignee may offset damages for which the carrier is liable,[79] and he may thus offset damages by reason of the failure of the carrier to deliver the entire amount of goods received.[80] But the recitals of the bill of lading as to the quantity of goods received are not conclusive, the bill of lading being in that respect a receipt only.[81]

c. Recovery of Excessive Payments. If freight in excess of the amount contracted for, or a reasonable rate, in the absence of contract, is demanded, either as condition precedent to accepting the goods for transportation or to their delivery at the end of the transportation, the consignor or the consignee, as the case may be, may pay under protest and bring action to recover back the excess.[82] But charges once voluntarily paid, without any fraud or deception having been practised, cannot be recovered.[83] If payment has been made, no demand for the return of the excessive freight is necessary before bringing action.[84] The common-law right of action to recover excessive charges is not suspended by a statute allowing the recovery of a penalty for exacting an excessive rate.[85]

4. Discrimination in Charges; Rebates — a. Whether Discrimination Lawful. Monopoly.—Such discriminations have been a discrimination in rates when founded on a reasonable difference in the conditions attending the different shipments. Thus, a lower rate may be granted at competing points than at points where there is no such competition.[88] And it is said that a greater general benefit to the carrier from one kind of business than from another may justify a discrimination.[89] But a greater aggregate charge for a short than for a long haul is in general prohibited by statute.[90] Discriminations on the basis of a larger amount of freight shipped by a favored shipper as compared with another shipper seem to be disfavored, evidently on the ground that they tend to create a monopoly.[91] It is apparent from the cases cited that no very definite rule on the subject of discriminations has been established, and the whole matter is now so largely regulated by statute that a discussion of the question on common-law principles would not be of much service. There are cases in which it has been held that so long as a reasonable rate is given to any shipper applying for transportation for his goods, discrimination in favor of particular shippers is not unlawful.[92] And it is not unlawful to charge less than the sched-

held particularly reprehensible where they tended to create a monopoly in favor of one shipper to the exclusion of others. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Wilson, 132 Ind. 517, 32 N. E. 311, 18 L. R. A. 105; Messenger v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 37 N. J. L. 531, 18 Am. Rep. 754; State v. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co., 47 Ohio St. 130, 23 N. E. 928, 7 L. R. A. 319. It has also been held that a railroad company cannot give the exclusive privilege to one express company of carrying express matter over its line, excluding other express companies from doing business over its line on the same terms. McDuffee v. Portland, etc., R. Co., 52 N. H. 430, 13 Am. Rep. 72; Sandford v. Catawissa, etc., R. Co., 24 Pa. St. 378, 64 Am. Dec. 667. But on this subject see a full discussion supra, II, B, 5.

So a railroad company may be enjoined from binding itself to deliver to a particular stock-yard all live stock coming over its line to that destination and refusing to grant the same privilege to other stock-yards similarly situated. McCoy v. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co., 13 Fed. 3.

Where two rival lines of steamboats made connection with the same railroad, it was held that the railroad company could not charge higher rates for goods to be forwarded over one line than for goods to be forwarded over the other. Samuels v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 31 Fed. 57.

Short and long hauls.— So, in the absence of statutory provision, a higher proportionate rate may be charged for a short than for a long haul. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Hill, 14 Ill. App. 579. Where the rate charged is not unreasonable, the fact that the lower rate is granted to another shipper in order to get business which would otherwise go by a different route will justify a discrimination. Ragan v. Aiken, 9 Lea (Tenn.) 609, 42 Am. Rep. 684.

Extent and limits of rule.— It is said, however, that there may be a discrimination in rates based upon the quantities of goods sent by different shippers, although not as between a shipper who gives his entire business to the carrier in question as against one who refuses to do so. Menacho v. Ward, 23 Blatchf. (U. S.) 502, 27 Fed. 529. Even this basis of discrimination is, however, sustained, provided the carrier is prepared to transport goods for a reasonable sum for any shipper who does not agree to such condition. Lough v. Outerbridge, 143 N. Y. 271, 38 N. E. 292, 62 N. Y. St. 324, 42 Am. St. Rep. 712, 25 L. R. A. 674.

Injunction will not be granted against extortionate charges without an allegation that ule rate in a particular case where the purpose is not to discriminate between shippers.[93] Usually the question of whether there is an unjust discrimination is a question of fact for the jury.[94] In jurisdictions where a discrimination between rates to different shippers is deemed unlawful, the complaining shipper may recover the difference between the rate which he was required to pay, and that charged a favored shipper for similar services.[95] But loss of profits by reason of discrimination cannot be recovered.[96] Interest on the recovery is in the discretion of the jury.[97]

b. Rebates. In general a contract to repay a portion of the freight charged by way of rebate is not unlawful and may be enforced.[98] But a rebate contracted for with the view of making an unlawful discrimination cannot be recovered.[99]

5. Who Liable For Freight Charges. In general the consignor with whom the contract of shipment is made is liable under the contract for the charges provided for therein. And this liability exists regardless of whether the consignor is the owner, and irrespective of the failure of the carrier to collect freight from the consignee.[1] In general also the owner of the goods for whose benefit and under whose direction they are shipped is liable for the freight.[2] As the carrier is in general entitled to freight from the consignee as a condition of delivering the goods, the consignee who actually receives the goods is liable for freight, although it may not have been exacted before delivery.[3] In general also the assignee of a bill of lading who receives the goods thereby becomes bound to pay charges of transportation.[4]

6. Liens — a. Right to Lien — (1) For Freight. A common carrier has a lien on the goods transported for the charges of transportation.[5] This lien, however, is a specific, and not a general, lien; that is, it attaches to the goods involved in one transaction, or constituting a part of one consignment, for charges relating to that transaction, or connected with that consignment and does not reason of damage to the goods.[14] If, however, the first carrier delivered the goods to the connecting carrier without authority to do so, as where the direction of the owner as to the connecting line to which the goods should be delivered has been violated, the connecting carrier has no lien, either for his own charges or those advanced.[15]

b. Waiver; Delivery of Possession. The carrier's lien is dependent upon possession, and is lost by delivering the goods to the consignee or owner.[16] The carrier, however, may deliver a portion of the consignment and retain a lien for his entire charges on the balance.[17] The right to a lien may be waived by giving credit.[18] If the carrier asserts a right to retain possession of the goods on another ground than that of a lien for charges he cannot afterward assert a right of possession under a claim for such lien.[19] So, if he claims a lien for a debt other than transportation charges on the goods, for which he is not entitled to a lien, the consignee may replevin the goods without tendering the amount of transportation charges.[20] So, if a lien is claimed for an excessive amount the consignee may recover possession of the goods or sue for conversion without a formal tender of the amount to which the carrier is entitled, provided it appears that he was ready and willing to pay the just charges.[21]

c. Priority of Lien Over Other Claims. The carrier has no lien as against the true owner of the goods who has never expressly or by implication authorized their delivery to the carrier.[22] The carrier's lien is also inferior to the right of a mortgagee of the property under a mortgage of which the carrier has actual or constructive knowledge.[23] It is also inferior to the lien of a warehouseman for storage, the goods having been delivered by the carrier to the warehouseman without requiring advancement of freight charges.[24] But the carrier's lien is superior to that of a vendor under his right of stoppage in transitu;[25] and to the claims of attaching creditors of the consignor;[26] and to any claims of a pledgee of the goods whose rights accrue while they are in the carrier's possession.[27]

d. Enforcement. The carrier's lien, like other bailees' liens, gives a right of possession but not a right to sell.[28] The statutes in some states have authorized sale by the carrier to enforce his lien,[29] especially in case of perishable goods.[30] It seems that such sale is to be of the contents of the packages, and not of the packages unopened.[31]

O. Claims For Damages; Notice of Loss; Limitation of Time For Bringing Action — 1. CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES; WAIVER. Acceptance of the goods by the consignee without objection and with knowledge of their defective condition precludes recovery for damages thereto.[32] But the consignee is entitled to a reasonable opportunity of examination, and acceptance for that purpose will not be a waiver.[33] Nor will acceptance waive objection for damage not apparent.[34] Indeed, the receipt of the goods alone, with no stipulation that they are accepted in full performance of the contract, does not, it seems, constitute a waiver of claim for damages for which the carrier may be liable.[35] A receipt acknowledging a delivery of the goods in good condition is only prima facie evidence of the fact.[36] Acceptance of a part of the goods will not waive objection on account of the damaged condition of the balance.[37] Payment of the freight is no waiver of the right to recover damages, as the consignee may maintain action therefor without interposing it by way of offset or counter-claim as against the freight.[38]

2. NOTICE OF CLAIM FOR LOSS — a. Validity of Special Limitations. It is usual to insert in bills of lading, or other contracts for shipment, a stipulation that written notice of a claim for loss of or damage to the goods shall be given to the agents of the carrier within some specified time, such as thirty or ninety days, and that unless such notice is given there will be no liability on the part of the carrier, and such stipulations are generally upheld so far as they are found to be reasonable.[39] Cases holding such stipulations to be invalid are usually based on the ground that the terms thereof are unreasonable, rather than on the general invalidity of such conditions. But they are regarded as limitations of the carrier's liability, and therefore as ineffectual against a claim for loss or injury due to the carrier's negligence,[40] and also as invalid where limitation of common-law liability is prohibited by statute.[41] Such stipulations have been held not applicable to depreciation in the property due to delay in transportation,[42] nor to a case where the consignee refuses to receive the property on the ground that it is not tendered in proper condition,[43] nor to a case where the goods are never delivered,[44] and it is also said that the time during which the carrier is engaged in tracing the goods in order to find where they are and make delivery is not to be included in the computation.[45] Such stipulation in the bill of lading is of course not applicable where the shipment is made under parol contract, and not under the bill of lading.[46] If the stipulation is valid, then the giving of notice in accordance with its requirements is a condition precedent to recovery by the owner, and compliance, or excuse for non-compliance, should be alleged.[47]

But other courts have looked upon the stipulation as a limitation, non-compliance with which should be pleaded by the carrier. Wichita, etc., R. Co. v. Koch, 8 Kan. App. 642, 56 Pac. 538; McNichol v. Pacific Express Co., 12 Mo. App. 401; Westcott v. Fargo, 61 N. Y. 542, 19 Am. Rep. 300; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Hays, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 577, 35 S. 48. Thus, if the stipulation is so broad as to cover any loss or damage whatever it is invalid. Porter v. Southern Express Co., 4 S. C. 135, 16 Am. Rep. 762. Or if it is uncertain as to the time from which the specified limitation is to run. Gwyn Harper Mfg. Co. v. Carolina Cent. R. Co., 128 N. C. 280, 38 S. E. 894, 83 Am. St. Rep. 675. While the stipulation may be disregarded where it is unreasonable under the facts of a particular case, yet, on the other hand, in tainty as to the agent to whom notice is to be given, or an agent is named to whom it would be impracticable to give notice, or if there is no agent reasonably accessible.[49] There is some diversity in the conclusions of the courts as to what is a reasonable time within which notice may be required to be given. If the time specified is to date from the delivery of the goods to the carrier or the date of the contract of shipment, it is usually held unreasonable, at least where the time allowed might be largely consumed in the performance of the contract before it could be determined whether or not there was any breach.[50] But where the time likely to be required for the transportation was only one day, a limitation of ninety days after delivery of the goods to the company was held valid.[51] A thirty-day limitation dating from the loss or delivery has been upheld.[52] So a ten-day limitation,[53] and a five-day limitation [54] have been sustained. But the carrier cannot avail himself of the limitation where it was not practicable for the owner to discover the loss within the time.[55] It is for the carrier relying upon the stipulation as a defense to show that it is reasonable,[56] and it is said that the question of reasonableness is for the jury.[57] determining the general validity of such a stipulation the question is not what might have been done in a particular case, but what might ordinarily be expected, in the exercise of reasonable diligence. Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co., 170 Mass. 129, 49 N. E. 97.

c. Rule in Live-Stock Cases. The controlling considerations bearing upon the reasonableness of a stipulation as to the time within which notice of a claim for damages shall be given in case of shipments of live stock are somewhat different from those applicable in ordinary cases, and stipulations have been sustained which would perhaps in other cases not be regarded as valid. Thus it is held that a stipulation that a claim for damages shall be made before the animals are removed from the place of delivery and mingled with other animals is valid.[58] Other stipulations for a short time of giving notice of damage in case of live stock have been sustained.[59]

3. Time For Bringing Suit. It is undoubtedly competent for the parties to a contract of shipment to agree on a limitation of time within which action for breach of the contract shall be brought shorter than the statutory limitation, and such a limitation will be enforced if reasonable.[60] It has accordingly been held that a limitation to three months is valid.[61]

But by statute in Texas it is now provided that the time for bringing suit cannot thus be limited to less than two years. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Withers, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 506, 40 S. W. 1073; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, (Tex. Civ. App. 1895) 32 S. W. 225.

The burden of proof is upon the carrier setting up the limitation to show the reasonableness of the stipulation. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Reeves, 90 Tex. 499, 38 S. W. 564.

Such a limitation, however, has been held not applicable to an action for damages due to delay (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Hume, 87 Tex. 211, 27 S. W. 110; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Elliott, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 636); nor to an action against a carrier not strictly for the loss of or damage to the goods during transportation (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Trawick, 80 Tex. 270, 15 S. W. 568, 18 S. W. 948; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Gray, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 24 S. W. 837).

4. Waiver of Such Limitations. The requirement as to making claim for damages within the time and in the manner specified may be waived by failing to object to the form of a defective notice, or by entertaining and proceeding to consider and negotiate with reference to the claim,[62] or by misleading the owner as to the necessity of giving notice.[63] And a substantial compliance with the stipulation is all that is required.[64] But waiver cannot be predicated upon the acts of an agent, where it is specified in the contract that no agent shall have authority to waive the terms thereof.[65] A limitation of time within which action shall be brought may be waived by any conduct of the carrier calculated to induce, and which has induced, the owner to delay the bringing of suit beyond the time stipulated.[66]

P. Benefits of Insurance. In the absence of any special contract the carrier is not entitled to the benefit of insurance taken by the shipper, and the shipper may sue the carrier for damages, although he has not collected the insurance money, and, so far as he has collected it, he is entitled to recover as trustee for the insurance company, which is, on payment of the insurance, subrogated to the shipper's claim against the carrier.[67] The insurance company may stipulate with the insured (shipper) that the latter shall proceed in the first instance against the carrier, and hold the company liable only for any loss not thus satisfied.[68] And it has been said that where a policy of insurance contains such a stipulation the carrier cannot by agreement in the bill of lading become entitled to the benefit of the insurance, especially where his own liability arises from negligence.[69]

Commencement of suit under such a stipulation is the filing of a petition or complaint, with instructions to issue citation thereon. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Wilbanks, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 489, 27 S. W. 302. See also, generally, Actions, III [1 Cyc. 739].

But this view seems not to be sound. The carrier may in his own behalf take insurance against his liability arising from negligence.[70] Therefore if it is stipulated in the bill of lading that the carrier is entitled to the benefit of insurance on the goods, this stipulation will take precedence over that in the insurance policy requiring the insured (shipper) to proceed against the carrier before asking indemnity from the insurance company.[71] But it seems that even under such a stipulation the carrier can only offset insurance money actually received by the shipper.[72] A statute forbidding the carrier from restricting common-law liability is not infringed by a stipulation for the benefit of insurance on the goods.[73]

Q. Sale of Damaged Goods. The duty of the carrier as bailee to protect the owner, even where the loss is not one for which the carrier would be liable, involves and authorizes sale of the goods where the completion of the transportation becomes impossible, and their detention would result in further loss or damage, as where the goods are of a perishable nature.[74] But if practicable, the carrier should give notice to the shipper and await his orders before selling.[75] And if, without involving further damage, the carrier can by transshipment send the goods to their destination it is his duty to do so.[76]

R. Actions For Loss or Damage — 1. Parties Plaintiff — a. Owner. If the action against the carrier is in tort it should be brought by the owner of the goods, whether he be consignor or consignee or a third person.[77] But it is not necessary that the ownership should be absolute; a bailee has such special property in the goods that he may maintain action for damage thereto.[78] Any one having a beneficial interest in the goods may maintain the action.[79] In case of

If the action is in tort the consignor cannot recover without showing a general or the recovery, he holds the proceeds for the benefit of the actual party in interest.[91]

2. FORM OF ACTION; PLEADING; VARIANCE — a. In Tort or on Contract; Variance. In an ordinary action against the carrier for loss of or injury to the goods plaintiff has an election to sue in tort or on contract.[92] In tort the action is for neglect or breach of duty in the course of the general employment of carrier, that is, an action on the case.[93] But for misdelivery or wrongful appropriation of the goods by the carrier, or refusal to deliver amounting to a conversion, trover will lie,[94] but not for mere loss of or injury to the goods, even though such as to render the carrier liable, if there has been no misfeasance.[95] Replevin may be maintained upon refusal of the carrier to deliver goods in his possession to the person entitled thereto.[96] The action on contract may be either in assumpsit, for breach of the general duty of the carrier, that is, on implied contract, or on the special contract entered into, if any, at the time the goods were received by the carrier for transportation.[97] It seems to have been generally held that where the shipment is under a special contract, the action must be based on a breach of such special interest in the property. Carter v. Graves, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 446. And see supra, II, R, 1, a.

special contract, and not upon the breach of the carrier's common-law duty.[98] But the better rule is that the special contract containing conditions in favor of the carrier is properly a defensive weapon to be used by the carrier when sued, and that the shipper may disregard it and sue for breach of common-law duty.[99] On the other hand, in an action on the special contract there can be no recovery for breach of common-law duty, no special contract being proven.[1] In declaring on the special contract it must be correctly set out or the action will fail on account of variance.[2] In determining whether to bring action on the case or in assumpsit, it was important under the strict rules of common-law procedure to bear in mind some distinctions between those forms of action.[3] But the difference in form of allegation in the declarations on case and in assumpsit is very slight, there being in each instance an allegation that defendant "undertook and

For instance, if the suit were in contract against joint defendants, no recovery could be had unless joint liability of all the defendants were shown, while if the action were in tort judgment might be recovered against one or more of joint defendants, although others were found not to be liable. Smith v. Seward, 3 Pa. St. 342; Pozzi v. Shipton, 8 A. & E. 963, 8 L. J. Q. B. 1, 1 P. & D. 4, 35 E. C. L. 931; Bretherton v. Wood, 3 B. & B. 54, 6 Moore C. P. 141, 9 Price 408, 23 Rev. Rep. 556, 7 E. C. L. 602.

In the action on contract the consideration must be alleged, while there is no necessity of alleging consideration in the action in tort. Smith v. Seward, 3 Pa. St. 342; Wright v. McKee, 37 Vt. 161.

The consignor could not sue in tort without allegation of ownership, as the ownership would be presumed to be in the consignee, while on contract it would be presumed that the consignor, being a party to the contract, would be entitled to bring action thereon. Pennsylvania Co. v. Poor, 103 Ind. 553, 3 N. E. 253.

agreed," the characteristic difference being that in the action on contract, it is alleged that he did so upon consideration, while in the action in tort no such allegation is necessary.[4]

b. Declaration, Complaint, or Petition. The material allegations in an action against the carrier for loss of or injury to the goods are: (1) ownership of plaintiff, or such other connection with the transaction as to entitle him to sue;[5] (2) delivery of the goods to the carrier;[6] (3) acceptance of the goods[7] by the latter as a common carrier for hire;[8] (4) consideration for the undertaking, if the action

4. Smith v. Seward, 3 Pa. St. 342.

In an action in tort it is important that there be an allegation of negligence, which would not be necessary in the action on contract, although commonly inserted. Wright v. McKee, 37 Vt. 161.

With reference to the statute of limitations it may be important to determine whether the action is in tort or on contract. Southern R. Co. v. Rosenberg, 29 Ala. 287, 30 So. 32.

Under the code procedure, as adopted in most of the states, it is specifically required that the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action shall be stated, and the technical distinction between the form of action in tort and that on contract is no longer preserved, so that the common-law tests for determining which form of action has been adopted by the pleader are no longer available. It will usually be practicable, however, taking the whole pleading together, to determine whether the complaint is that defendant was negligent, or that, on the other hand, he violated the implied conditions of the contract arising out of his acceptance of the goods for transportation. However, the distinction between remedies available in action in tort and on contract have largely disappeared under the code procedure, and it is usually immaterial whether the action be treated as of one form or the other. Tuggle v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 62 Mo. 425. And see Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Pumphrey, 59 Md. 390.

5. In tort plaintiff should allege ownership, general or special, but the fact that he is the consignee will show presumptive ownership. Pennsylvania Co. v. Clark, 2 Ind. App. 146, 27 N. E. 586; U. S. Mail Line Co. v. Carrollton Furniture Mfg. Co., 101 Ky. 658, 42 S. W. 342. And see supra, II, R, 1, b.

If the action is on contract, according to the weight of authority the consignor may sue as the party with whom the contract was made and therefore entitled to recover for its breach. Stimpson v. Gilchrist, 1 Me. 202; and supra, II, R, 1, e. But if it appears that the consignor contracted only as agent, then the action should not be maintained in his name. Ames v. First Div. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 12 Minn. 412. It has been said, however, that the consignor suing on contract should allege his ownership. Butler v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 18 Ind. App. 656, 46 N. E. 92.

6. Delivery of the goods to defendant should be averred but a general averment to this effect is sufficient. Jordan v. Hazard, 10 Ala. 221; Sommerville v. Merrill, 1 Port. (Ala.) 107; New England Mfg. Co. v. Starin, 60 Conn. 369, 22 Atl. 953; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Grimes, 71 Ill. App. 397; Martin v. Ft. Worth, etc., R. Co., 3 Tex. Civ. App. 556, 22 S. W. 1007.

7. Acceptance by defendant for transportation in the capacity of common carrier should also be alleged. Davis v. Jacksonville Southeastern Line, 126 Mo. 69, 28 S. W. 965; Smith v. King's Mountain R. Co., 3 S. C. 53.

As warehouseman.— Where it is sought to charge defendant with breach of duty as warehouseman it is not necessary to show a special charge for such duty. White v. Humphery, 11 Q. B. 43, 12 Jur. 417, 63 E. C. L. 43. An allegation that defendant undertook to transport the goods back to the shipper on failure of the consignee to accept will not show liability as warehouseman but as common carrier. Aronson v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 70 Pa. St. 68. Where the allegations of the petition charge defendant as warehouseman it is error to instruct with reference to his liability as common carrier. Porter v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 20 Iowa 73.

8. Acceptance for hire.—As a common carrier does not assume greater liability than that of a bailee where the transportation is gratuitous (see supra, II, C) it should be alleged that defendant accepted the goods for transportation as a common carrier for hire (Bristol v. Rensselaer, etc., R. Co., 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 158). But probably in an action on the case it is not essential to allege that the transportation was for compensation, it being sufficient, perhaps, to allege the receipt of the goods and negligence resulting in loss or damage. Hall v. Cheney, 36 N. H. 26.

That defendant was a common carrier should be alleged in this connection. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Gerson, 102 Ala. 409, 14 So. 873; Jones v. Pitcher, 3 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 135, 24 Am. Dec. 716; Kain v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 29 Mo. App. 53; Mershon v. Hobensack, 22 N. J. L. 372; Bristol v. Rensselaer, etc., R. Co., 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 158. But it is sufficient to allege that defendant is a railroad company where by statute railroad companies are common carriers. Denver, etc., R. Co. v. Cahill, 8 Colo. App. 158, 45 Pac. 285; Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Roberts, 71 Ill. 540; Pennsylvania Co. v. Clark, 2 Ind. App. 146, 27 N. E. 586; Dunbar v. Port Royal, etc., R. Co., 36 S. C. 110, 15 S. E. 357, 31 Am. St. Rep. 860.

In an action of assumpsit it seems that it is not necessary to allege that defendant was a common carrier, it being open to plaintiff, under the allegation that defendant undertook to transport the goods, to show the character is on contract;[9] (5) breach of duty;[10] (6) resulting damage.[11] These elements of the right of action are not usually set out in this order, but they will usually all be found in the forms of declaration or complaint, whether at common law or under code procedure.[12] It is not necessary to allege that it was defendant's duty to carry the goods safely, such duty being implied by law from the relation of com-of defendant's business as determining the nature of the undertaking. Mershon v. Hobensack, 22 N. J. L. 372.

9. Consideration.— While in an action for breach of contract there should be an allegation that the undertaking was for a compensation, it is not essential to aver that there was a payment or tender of the freight, prepayment not being essential unless demanded. Evansville, etc., R. Co. v. Keith, 8 Ind. App. 57, 35 N. E. 296; Ferguson v. Cappeau, 6 Harr. & J. (Md.) 394; Jarrett v. Great Northern R. Co., 74 Minn. 477, 77 N. W. 304; Waterman v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 25 Vt. 707. But if the foundation of the action is refusal of the carrier to deliver at the end of the transportation, there should be an averment of payment or tender of freight charges in order to discharge the carrier's lien (Jeffersonville, etc., R. Co. v. Gent, 35 Ind. 39; and supra, II, N, 3, a); unless it appears that plaintiff's claim for damages was sufficient to offset defendant's claim for freight (Miami Powder Co. v. Port Royal, etc., R. Co., 38 S. C. 78, 16 S. E. 339, 21 L. R. A. 123; 47 S. C. 324, 25 S. E. 153, 58 Am. St. Rep. 880; Ewart v. Kerr, 2 McMull (S. C.) 141, Rice (S. C.) 203; and supra, II, N, 3, b).

10. In actions ex contractu no express allegation of negligence or fault on the part of defendant is necessary, it being sufficient to charge loss of or injury to the goods in violation of the terms of the implied contract. Nashville, etc., R. Co. v. Parker, 123 Ala. 683, 27 So. 323; Williams v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 9 W. Va. 33. Allegation of loss and value is sufficient without specifying the loss to plaintiff on account of non-delivery. Independence Mills Co. v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 72 Iowa 535, 34 N. W. 320, 2 Am. St. Rep. 258.

If the action is in tort there should be an allegation either of fault or culpable misconduct. Gray v. The Steamboat Reveille, 6 Wis. 61. A general allegation, however, of neglect or misconduct is sufficient without a statement of the particulars.

See 9 Cent. Dig. tit. "Carriers," § 569.

As contra, however, holding that a general averment of negligence, without specification of the particular fault charged, is not sufficient as against a motion for more specific statement see Rubens v. Ludgate Hill Steamship Co., 2 N. Y. Suppl. 30, 17 N. Y. St. 17, 21 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 464.

If specific acts are averred, even though a general allegation of negligence is sufficient, the evidence will be confined to those alleged. Lachner v. Adams Express Co., 72 Mo. App. 13.

Under a statutory form, it was held that negligence of the carrier was a legal implication where negligence is essential to fix liability, though the words of the form did not involve an averment of negligence. Nashville, etc., R. Co. v. Parker, 123 Ala. 683, 27 So. 323.

A complaint in substantially the following form was held in Catlin v. Adirondack Co., 11 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 377, to indicate an action in tort: That at the several times hereinafter mentioned the defendant was a corporation, duly created and existing under the laws of the state of New York, and engaged in carrying goods for hire. That on or about (date) plaintiffs delivered to and left in the possession of the defendant at (place) three trunks, to be conveyed as freight to (place). That the defendant undertook and became responsible to the plaintiffs for the due and safe transportation of said trunks to their said destination. That such trunks were unduly delayed in transportation, to the great annoyance and inconvenmon carrier to the goods.[13] Where the action is for non-delivery there should be an allegation of demand.[14] But if breach of contract is alleged demand is immaterial.[15]

c. Defenses. No special discussion of the defenses available to the carrier is necessary, the general rules as to exceptions to his common-law liability and limitation of such liability by special contract having been heretofore fully considered. If the action is in tort or on implied contract, a special contract limiting liability or imposing conditions thereon, so far as valid, must be set up by the carrier as a special defense.[16]

3. Evidence; Presumptions; Burden of Proof[17]— a. Burden in General. The plaintiff has of course the burden of proving the essential elements of his cause of action, as required to be set out in his complaint.[18] If the action is for injury to the goods the burden is on the plaintiff to show that they were in good con-

ience of the plaintiff, and were not delivered at their said destination at (place) until on or about (date). That said transportation should not have occupied more than —— days. That after said trunks had been received by the plaintiffs at their destination aforesaid, and the charges for their transportation duly paid, it was found that each and every one of said three trunks had been broken open since their delivery to the defendant, and while said defendant was responsible to the plaintiffs for their safety, and numerous articles, of the aggregate value of (amount) unlawfully taken therefrom. Wherefore, etc. In Porter v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 20 Iowa 73, a petition in substantially the following form was held to set out a cause of action against defendant as warehouseman. and not as common carrier: On (date) defendant was engaged in the business of common carrier and warehouseman, running and operating a railroad from (place) to (place), and having a warehouse at the latter place, and on said date plaintiff delivered to defendant at Chicago (certain described goods), to be transported to said (place), under and in accordance with the terms and conditions of a certain written contract, a copy of which is hereto annexed, etc., and plaintiff further avers that said goods were duly transported by defendant to their said warehouse in (place), and were therein so carelessly and negligently kept that the aforesaid goods were entirely lost and destroyed, and defendant utterly failed and refused to deliver the same to this plaintiff on demand. Wherefore plaintiff asks judgment, etc.

Illustrations.— Thus, he must show that defendant is a common carrier (Ringgold v. Haven, 1 Cal. 108; Citizens' Bank v. Nantucket Steam Boat Co., 2 Story (U. S.) 16, 5 Fed. Cas. dition when delivered to the carrier, that is, that the bad condition complained of resulted while the goods were in the carrier's possession.[19] The presumption, however, arises from the fact of the receipt of the goods by the carrier without objection or exception noted in the bill of lading or shipping receipt,[20] that so far as the condition was apparent on ordinary inspection the goods were in good condition.[21] The burden is also on plaintiff to prove non-delivery by the carrier.[22] But slight evidence of non-delivery is sufficient to throw the burden on the carrier of accounting for the goods.[23] So in an action for damage to the goods it is for plaintiff to prove that the damage occurred while the goods were in the possession of the carrier as such, and not after his liability as carrier had terminated by the completion of his contract to transport and deliver the goods.[24] The burden is on plaintiff to show the value of the goods lost.[25]

Law or by Contract—(A) In General. Proof of loss of or injury to the goods while in the carrier's possession as carrier throws upon him the burden of showing that the loss or injury occurred by reason of one of the excepted causes,[26] or that it was within some special exception made by contract.[27] Therefore, in the absence of any showing on the part of the carrier, or any exception contained in the contract (if plaintiff sues on a special contract), proof of the loss or injury is sufficient.[28] It is for the carrier to bring the case within one of the common law exceptions[29] if he relies on such exception as a defense.[30] So if the carrier seeks to escape liability on the ground that the loss of or injury to the goods is one excepted by a valid special contract, he has the burden of proving not only the making of such special contract,[31] but also that the loss or injury for which

Co. v. Jaggerman, 115 Ill. 407, 4 N. E. 641; Field v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 71 Ill. 458; Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Davis, 16 Ill. Consideration.— It seems that it is not incumbent, however, on the carrier relying on a special contract to show a special consideration therefor, the burden of proof of want of consideration being on the party seeking to defeat the contract. Brown v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 36 Ill. App. 140; Schaller v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 97 Wis. 31, 71 N. W. 1042. But if the receipt issued on delivery of the goods to the carrier was unqualified, and the carrier seeks to rely on a bill of lading subsequently issued relieving him from liability, such contract will be presumed to have been without consideration, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. (B) Carrier's Freedom From Negligence. In many jurisdictions it is said that the carrier relying upon an exception made by common law or contract must not only show that the loss or injury falls within the exception, but also that it occurred without fault, that is, negligence, on the part of the carrier;[33] and it is specially so held with reference to a loss by fire, where that is a liability excepted

Reason for this view.— This rule is supported by the argument that the facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the carrier, and it is practicable for him to show due care, at least in a general way, while it may be impracticable for the owner to show want of care, even though there has been in fact negligence in the transportation of the goods by the carrier.

in the contract.[34] But the better rule, and one which seems to be supported by the preponderance of authority, is that where the carrier shows the loss to be within an excepted cause, either at common law or under a valid contract exemption, he is not bound to go further and explain the particulars of the loss or injury for the purpose of showing that he was free from negligence in connection therewith, but that the burden of proving negligence such as will render the carrier liable notwithstanding the common-law or contract exception, is on the plaintiff.[35]

This rule would seem to be especially applicable where the contract is that the carrier shall not be liable except in case of negligence,[36] or that the shipment is at the owner's risk,[37] or that the carrier shall not be liable for damages due to delay.[38]

(II) As to Negligence of Carrier. In general there is no obligation on plaintiff in an action for loss of or injury to the goods to show negligence, for the carrier's responsibility in the absence of particular limitation is much broader and proof of loss or injury is sufficient.[39] But if an issue arises as to negligence, as where the carrier seeks to escape liability by reason of a common-law exception or one embodied in a valid contract,[40] then evidence of a loss or injury which would not have resulted in the ordinary course of events, with proper care on the carrier's part, is sufficient to make out a prima facie case of negligence and throw on the carrier the burden of proving due care and vigilance.[41] So if plaintiff seeks to charge the carrier as warehouseman, proof of unexplained loss or damage is sufficient to make out a prima facie case.[42]

In some cases it is said that if the evidence of the loss bringing the case within an exception does not indicate the carrier's negligence, then the burden of proving such negligence is on the plaintiff. Patterson v. Clyde, 67 Pa. St. 500; Farnham v. Camden, etc., R. Co., 55 Pa. St. 53; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Boston Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (U. S.) 344, 12 L. ed. 465.

It is sufficient for defendant generally to prove the loss within an exception without showing affirmatively the particular and identical cause of loss. Hill v. Sturgeon, 35 Mo. 212, 86 Am. Dec. 149.

"The shipper makes a prima facie case against the carrier, when he shows the goods were not delivered. This casts the onus on the carrier, to show that the loss occurred from a danger of the river, or from fire; and he must also prove a prima facie case of diligence on his part. This, of course, implies a river-worthy vessel, properly furnished and appointed, competent and sufficient officers and crew, and care and vigilance to prevent danger, and to avert it when impending. Any deficiency in the skill or watchfulness of the officers or crew, in the matter of their special function; in the apparatus to extinguish fire, or in its whereabouts or readiness for prompt present use, or in prompt and vigorous effort to extinguish a fire when it originates, would fall short of proving a prima facie case of diligence." (III) Live-Stock Cases. The rules relating to the burden of proof in case of transportation of live stock are in principle the same as those with reference to goods,[43] but some particular questions arise in their application. Thus, inasmuch as the carrier is not liable for death of animals during transportation due to natural causes, or their inherent vice or natural disposition, mere proof that the animals died after delivery to the carrier and before the end of the transportation is not sufficient to establish liability, but the evidence must further show that the loss was due to human agency.[44] But if the loss or bad condition appears to have been due to human agency, then the carrier must show that it did not result from his negligence in order to escape liability on the ground that it was due only to delay or from causes within the common-law exemption or within a valid particular limitation.[45] But this he may do by general evidence of care and diligence in the transportation.[46] Where there is a stipulation by which the owner undertakes that he or some one representing him shall accompany the animals and attend to loading and unloading, feeding and watering, and their general care, proof of loss or injury in connection with these elements of transportation will not be sufficient to charge the carrier.[47] But such a contract does not relieve Keener, 93 Ga. 808, 21 S. E. 287, 44 Am. St. Rep. 197. But if in such a case plaintiff assumes the burden of proving that the loss by fire was due to negligence of defendant, he must sustain it by the evidence. Denton v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 52 Iowa 161, 2 N. W. 1093, 35 Am. Rep. 263.

Where contract recites that shipper has examined the car in which the animals were to be shipped and found it safe and suitable, the

the carrier from liability for loss or injury in other respects;[48] nor does it affect the carrier's liability where to his knowledge the owner or agent does not in fact accompany the animals for the purpose of giving them proper care.[49] As to other contractual limitations the carrier is usually required to show not only that the loss or injury was within the limitation, but occurred without negligence on the carrier's part.[50]

4. Measure of Damages[51]— a. For Breach of Contract to Transport, or Negligent Delay. In an action for damages for refusal to perform a contract to furnish transportation, the measure of damages is the loss of the benefit of the transportation, that is, the difference between the market value at the destination when the goods should have arrived, if carried in accordance with the contract, and the value at the same time at the point of shipment,[52] less what it would have cost the shipper under the contract to have had the goods transported, that is, freight charges and other necessary expenses.[53] Where the action is for negligent delay in transportation, the measure of damages is the decline in market value between the date when the goods should have been delivered, if transported with reasonable diligence, and the time when they were actually delivered,[54]

together with any resulting injury to the goods on account of the delay and expense occasioned thereby.[55] If the goods are, to the knowledge of the carrier, intended for a special market, the shipper is entitled also to damages for loss of such market.[56] If the shipment is made in performance of a special contract, known to the carrier, the damages for failure to transport will be the difference between the contract price at destination and market value at point of shipment, less freight.[57] Profits, speculative in their nature, cannot be included in the damages.[58] But so far as a loss incident to failure to furnish transportation according to contract is involved, it is the duty of the shipper to secure transportation otherwise, if possible, and he can recover only the difference between the freight contracted for and that which he was required to pay to secure the transportation.[59]

for loss of the goods should include freight paid in advance, inasmuch as the carrier is not entitled to freight where the goods are not delivered under the contract.[65] The carrier is also liable for custom-house duties which have been paid on the goods,[66] and he would no doubt be liable for commissions on the sale of the goods which the shipper had paid or become liable for, but he is not entitled to rebate from the value at destination on account of factor's commissions, which would have been paid in case of sale had the goods been delivered, as he has nothing to do with such sales.[67]

(11) INTEREST. In many cases it is said that plaintiff recovering judgment for loss of or injury to the goods is entitled to interest from the date of the loss, that is, from the time when the goods should have been delivered,[68] while in other cases it is said that the allowance of interest is within the discretion of the jury,[69] and in still others that no interest is allowable except by way of penalty for misconduct or fraud.[70]

are so materially damaged as to destroy their value, the consignee may of course refuse to accept and sue for the full value.[77]

c. Evidence as to Value or Damage — (1) Value at Time and Place For Delivery. The general rule as to measure of damage for loss of the goods is their value at the time and place where they should have been delivered under the contract.[78] As to time, this is the rule when the action is brought for breach of the express or implied obligation of the carrier.[79] But if the action is for conversion, then the value is to be determined with reference to the time when the conversion took place.[80] As to the place with reference to which the value of the goods is to be measured, it is the place of destination, and not that of shipment.[81] It may, however, be stipulated that the value is to be determined at the place of shipment.[82] In case of injury to the goods the place of destination is also to be taken as the basis for determining the damage, the measure being the difference between what the goods were worth at the place of destination as injured, and what they would have been worth if delivered in good order.[83]

And the rule referring the measure of damage to the place of destination is also applicable where goods are taken for transportation to a point beyond defendant's line.[84] If the loss or damage occurs at the port of shipment it is thought that the value should be measured with reference to that place,[85] but if after leaving the place of shipment, then the recovery is to be determined by the value at destination.[86]

(II) Estimation of Value; Deduction of Freight. In determining the value at point of destination, the unpaid freight should be deducted, for while the shipper is not bound to pay freight where the carrier fails to perform his obligation to deliver in good condition, yet he should not have the advantage of the increased value of the goods due to their transportation,[87] that is, the shipper

As to freight paid see supra, II, R, 4, b, (I).

But there need be no allowance on account of unpaid freight where the defendant makes is entitled to the net value at the place of destination;[88] and the estimation is to be on the basis of the wholesale, rather than the retail, value.[89] The market value is the test,[90] and this is true even as to goods which are not shipped for sale or traffic.[91] But if there is no market value, then the intrinsic value will govern.[92] And if special damage will result by injury or delay, the carrier is liable so far as such special damage is reasonably within the contemplation of both parties.[93]

(III) Evidence as to Value or Damage—(A) In General. While the market value is usually the basis for estimating the measure of plaintiff's recovery, there are cases in which no such measure is applicable. If the parties have agreed upon a valuation, as, for instance, where the shipper in compliance with a regulation requiring the value to be stated as the basis for estimating the compensation to be paid, has placed a valuation upon the goods, such valuation will control in an action against the carrier for loss.[94] Goods which have no market value, such as second-hand furniture, clothing, and the like, will be estimated at the real value to the owner.[95] As to property having a special value, owing to particular circumstances, the carrier may be held liable for such special value so far as reasonably known to him.[96] It is evident from the foregoing illustrations that public carriers of passengers, like common carriers of goods, are engaged in a public calling which imposes upon them a duty to serve all without discrimination; and that while they are not bailees of the persons of their passengers (although they may be as to their baggage),[2] they owe to their passengers a degree of care and protection different from that which may be exacted of persons who do not thus hold themselves out as serving the public in such capacity. Therefore the question whether one who furnishes transportation to individuals is a public carrier or not may be important for the purpose of determining his duty as to serving all who may apply, and also the care and prudence which he is required to exercise. For either purpose a public carrier of passengers may be defined as "one who undertakes for hire to carry all persons, indifferently, who may apply for passage."[3] It will be seen hereafter that the question as to the duty to exercise care and prudence in performing the undertaking is not dependent on compensation being made in any particular case.[4]

b. Who Are Passenger Carriers. Railroad companies are by the nature of their business public carriers of passengers, and bound to carry to the extent of the capacity of their passenger trains all suitable persons who apply for transportation in a proper way.[5] If persons are by proper authority taken for transportation upon freight trains, the companies are liable with reference to them as passengers.[6] But it is competent for the railroad company to regulate the method of conducting its business so as not to allow passengers to ride on freight trains. And although the act of the conductor of the freight train, in violation of such regulations, in allowing a passenger to ride thereon who is not chargeable with knowledge of the lack of authority on the part of the conductor may make such person a passenger,[7] yet actual notice of want of authority, or implied notice arising from the general method of conducting the company's business, may deprive a person taking passage on a freight train, even with the conductor's consent, of any right to be considered a passenger.[8] And a railroad company may occasionally carry passengers on its freight trains without thereby making itself a common carrier of passengers on such trains.[9] The same principles are applicable to construction trains, or trains on portions of a railroad used entirely for the transportation of materials, and one who may be allowed in a particular instance to ride on trains of that character is not entitled to the protection due to a passenger, unless the company has expressly or impliedly authorized the use of such trains for the carrying of passengers.[10] So a railroad company is not a carrier of passengers with reference to a person who is allowed to ride on a hand-car.[11] Where one railroad company is operating its trains on the line of another road, the company operating the train, and not the one owning the road, is deemed the carrier as to passengers.[12] The receiver or trustee operating a railroad is a carrier of passengers.[13] Street railway companies are common carriers of passengers.[14] Those who carry passengers by means of stage-coach,[15] omnibus,[16] steamboat,[17] or ferry[18] are public carriers. Indeed, it has been said that the use of an elevator for the lifting or lowering of persons in a building constitutes the owner a public carrier of passengers.[19]

2. Duty to Carry — a. Without Discrimination. The public character of the business imposes on one who undertakes it the duty of carrying without discrimination all persons who apply, so far as practicable. A railroad company therefore has no right to discriminate by selling tickets to some persons and refusing them to others without good excuse.[20] The duty to serve the public without dis-

Bennett v. Dutton, 10 N. H. 481.

Colored passengers.— Railroads may be recrimination does not necessarily imply equal accommodations to different and competing bus and baggage lines, for the purpose of bringing passengers and their baggage, at such stations.[21] It has therefore been held by some courts that it is valid for a carrier of passengers to give an exclusive privilege for soliciting passengers on trains and keeping busses and hacks on inclosed portions of the station grounds, so long as reasonable accommodations are afforded to the public in general for reaching and leaving the station.[22] But by other courts it has been thought that to grant a monopoly of this kind is against public policy, and that such an arrangement is void.[23]

b. Refusal For Good Cause. The duty to serve the public, however, without discrimination does not prevent the making and enforcement of reasonable regulations as to the business so as to exclude from trains or other vehicles of transportation persons who, by reason of intoxication, bad character, or indecent conduct, are likely to be, or have rendered themselves, obnoxious to other passengers.[24]

B. Who Are Passengers — 1. When Relation Commences — a. Intent to Become Passenger — (I) Before Transportation Commences. The relation of carrier and passenger commences when a person with the good-faith intention of taking passage, and with the express or implied consent of the carrier, places himself in a situation to avail himself of the facilities for transportation which the carrier offers. In case of a railroad this relation arises not merely when the passenger enters the train with the ticket already purchased, giving him a contract right to ride, but when he enters upon the premises of the carrier, with intention to take a train in due course.[25] But one who is about the carrier's premises, with-quired by statute to furnish equal, but separate, accommodations for hire to colored passengers. Smith v. State, 100 Tenn. 494, 46 S. W. 566, 41 L. R. A. 432. And see infra, III, C, 1, b.

Damages for refusal.— If a passenger entitled to accommodations is refused he may recover damages (Wallen v. McHenry, 3 Humphr. (Tenn.) 244), which may include, in addition to actual damages, something for the indignity, vexation, and disgrace to which he has been subjected (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 55 Ill. 185, 8 Am. Rep. 641). But in declaring against the carrier for refusing to carry there must be an averment that plaintiff offered, or was ready and willing, to pay fare. Day v. Owen, 5 Mich. 520, 72 Am. Dec. 62.

Palace or sleeping-cars.— An unobjectionable passenger who applies for accommodations in a palace-car, for which he is willing to pay, cannot be rejected if the accommodations of the car have not already been exhausted. The same rule against discriminations applies in case of a palace or sleeping-car as in any other case of passenger carriage. Nevin v. Pullman Palace Car Co., 106 Ill. 222, 46 Am. Rep. 688.

Until there is an acceptance, that is, until within the express or implied knowledge of the carrier or his employees the person seeking to become a passenger has indicated his intention to become a passenger, which intention has been in some way acquiesced in, at least to the extent of not refusing transportation, the relation does not arise, even though the purpose of the person attempting to become a passenger is to pay fare when required.[31] But just as there may be sufficient intent to become a passenger before transportation actually commences,[32] so there may be an implied acceptance as to persons seeking transportation before they have entered into the train or other conveyance and it has started toward its destination. unusual or unauthorized place; if he is entitled to transportation he becomes a passenger from the time he gets on board the train.[35]

(11) Authority of Agents. While in general those who have authority to determine whether or not a person shall take transportation on a train or other conveyance have authority to accept a passenger, either expressly or by acquiescence, yet the question of authority of the agent or servant to do so becomes under some circumstances a matter of controlling importance. Thus, where a person goes upon a freight train, charged with knowledge, by reason of the general course of business of the carrier, or by reason of rules or regulations known to him, that passengers are not allowed to ride on freight trains, and that conductors of freight trains have no authority to allow them to do so, he does not become a passenger, although he may have the assent of the conductor to his act, and even though the conductor accepts a ticket or payment of fare.[36] But if it is customary for the carrier to allow passengers to ride on some freight trains, and if the person seeking transportation has no notice, express or implied, that passengers are not permitted to ride on the freight train in question, he may rely on the act of the conductor in authorizing him to go upon such train, even though such act be without authority, or contrary to the conductor's instructions.[37] The conductor of a train, however, has no authority to invite a person to ride without payment of fare and as a mere personal favor, and one thus riding is not a passenger.[38] Persons accepting invitations from employees not having the control of the train or any apparent right to give permission to ride thereon, such as brakemen, engineers, yard-masters or baggagemen, are of course not entitled to be considered as passengers.[39] While it would seem reasonable that newsboys or children who are permitted to ride on a car gratuitously, with knowledge that the employee giving the permission has no authority to do so, are not passengers,[40] such doctrine is not supported by the weight of authority, and there are many cases holding that a child accepting the invitation of a person in charge of a railroad or street-car to ride thereon, without any payment of fare being intended, becomes a passenger, with reference to whose safety the carrier has the same liability as with reference to a paying passenger.[41]

2. Continuance and Termination of Relation. Where the relation of carrier and passenger is once established it continues until terminated by the voluntary act of the passenger, or the act of the carrier, under circumstances justifying its termination, and extends to the arrival of the passenger at his destination, and a temporary departure from the train for some good or reasonable cause, without the intent to abandon the transportation, will not end the relation.[42] At the end of the journey the relation of carrier and passenger continues until the passenger has had a reasonable opportunity to depart from the train or car in safety.[43] After the passenger has departed from the car, and has had reasonable time and opportunity to avoid further danger from the operation of the car, or further necessity of relation with the servants of the carrier, he ceases to be a passenger and stands toward the carrier as one of the general public.[44]

3. PERSONS PURSUING SPECIAL CALLINGS ON TRAINS. One is not deprived of the protection of a passenger when carried on a passenger train by arrangement with the railroad company, by the fact that he is there for the purpose of transacting some business or carrying on some occupation with the consent of the company. Thus one who pays for the privilege of selling popcorn on passenger trains is a passenger while engaged in the prosecution of his business on the trains.[45] Likewise postal clerks, carried under an arrangement with the United States government with reference to the transportation and handling of mail, are passengers while thus being transported.[46] For the same reason messengers carried under arrangement with express companies, to have control of goods carried for such companies on passenger trains, are passengers.[47] Other persons engaged in occupations involving their transportation on passenger trains, but not employees of the railroad company, such, for instance, as porters of palace-cars,[48] or persons employed about a private car,[49] have been held to be entitled to the same protection against injury resulting from the management of the train as passengers.[50] Where a railroad company simply furnishes the motive power for a special train, having no control over the management of the train itself, as in case of a circus train, the company is not so related to persons riding on the train as to be charged with the duty of their protection as passengers.[51]

4. Carrier's Employees. It is evident that the liability of the carrier for injuries to passengers is different from that of an employer with reference to injuries to employees in his service.[52] Therefore the rules of carrier's liability as to passengers do not apply to employees in the operation of the cars or other vehicles in which passengers are being transported.[53] Nor are employees who are being carried back and forth to and from their work, whether on construction trains or passenger trains, and although they have no connection with the operation of the train and are carried outside of the hours of employment for which they are paid, to be considered as passengers.[54] But as it is customary to give

5. Persons Traveling on Passes — a. Free Passengers. While it is no doubt true, as indicated in the definition,[57] that public carriers of passengers are those who carry passengers for hire, there is not in the case of carriers of passengers a distinction as to liability between passengers carried for compensation and those carried gratuitously analogous to that recognized as to carriers of goods between cases where goods are carried for compensation and those where they are carried free.[58] One who is accepted for transportation as a passenger, without any compensation to be rendered, is nevertheless entitled to all the care and protection which the carrier is under obligation to furnish to paying passengers.[59]

Thus one who travels on a drover's pass, which is issued in connection with the transportation of live stock for hire, is not a free passenger, but a passenger for compensation.[60] And those who are carried on freight trains to look after live stock which is being transported, and as an incident to such transportation, are entitled to protection as passengers.[61]

C. Rules and Regulations and Their Enforcement by Expulsion or Otherwise — 1. In General — a. Power to Make Regulations. Without regard to any statutory authority, a carrier of passengers has, under the common law, the right to make reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of his business.[62]

The authority to make rules is of course

b. Regulations Must Be Reasonable. The passenger is not bound to comply with rules or regulations of the company which are unreasonable.[63] But such rules as tend to the comfort, order, and safety of passengers may be made and enforced, if reasonable with reference to the subject-matter and uniform in respect to the persons affected.[64] No regulation, however, can be enforced which is in contravention of law.[65]

c. Notice of Regulations. As the validity of a regulation does not depend upon contract, express or implied, but upon the general power of the carrier to control his business, therefore there is not the necessity which exists with reference to a special contract regulation of bringing it home to the passenger so that his assent thereto shall appear. The passenger is bound to take notice of reasonable regulations,[66] and if they are so posted or otherwise published that passengers may conveniently advise themselves with reference thereto it is sufficient.[67] How-primarily in the directors of the corporation, if the carrier be a corporation, but by delegation such authority may be exercised by the superintendent, or by an agent having charge of a station as applicable to that particular station. 64. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 55 Ill. 185, 8 Am. Rep. 641.

Fixing time for keeping office open.— A regulation with reference to a station agent at a village which required him to keep his office open for business only from seven A. M. to seven P. M. is reasonable. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Wright, 18 Ind. App. 125, 47 N. E. 491.

Forbidding leaving cars in motion.—A regulation of a street-car company that passengers must not leave its cars while they are in motion is reasonable. Armstrong v. Montgomery St. R. Co., 123 Ala. 233, 26 So. 349.

Forbidding passengers from riding on platform of car is reasonable. Macon, etc., R. Co. v. Johnson, 38 Ga. 409; Montgomery v. Buffalo R. Co., 24 N. Y. App. Div. 454, 48 N. Y. Suppl. 849; McMillan v. Federal St., etc., R. Co., 172 Pa. St. 523, 33 Atl. 560.

Prohibiting passengers from taking dogs with them in passenger-cars, and requiring payment for carrying dogs in baggage-cars is reasonable. Gregory v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 100 Iowa 345, 69 N. W. 532.

Prohibiting the taking of dangerous articles into the cars is reasonable. Dowd v. Albany R. Co., 47 N. Y. App. Div. 202, 62 N. Y. Suppl. 179.

Relating to collection of street-car fares.— To facilitate collection of fares in street-cars it may be required that while the conductor is taking up fares passengers shall not go past him from one part of the car to another. Faber v. Chicago, Great Western R. Co., 62 Minn. 433, 64 N. W. 918, 36 L. R. A. 789.

Requiring tickets.— A regulation that freight conductors shall not permit passengers without tickets to ride on their trains from ticket stations is upheld. McCook v. Northrup, 65 Ark. 225, 45 S. W. 547.

Setting apart particular cars for particular persons.—The carrier may by reasonable regulation set apart particular cars for particular classes of passengers for the purpose of promoting the convenience and good order of the passengers. Thus, a car may be set apart for ladies, and gentlemen who are accompanied by ladies, from which gentlemen not thus accompanied may be excluded. Peck v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 70 N. Y. 587; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Johnson, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 185; Bass v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 36 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 495. But colored persons cannot be excluded from such car merely on account of color. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 55 Ill. 185, 8 Am. Rep. 641; Brown v. Memphis, etc., R. Co., 5 Fed. 499.

Reasonableness whether question at law or fact.— Whether a general regulation relating to the safety, comfort, or conduct of passengers is reasonable is a question of law for the court. Wright v. California Cent. R. Co., 78 Cal. 360, 20 Pac. 740; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Whittemore, 43 Ill. 420, 92 Am. Dec. 138; Gregory v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 100 Iowa 345, 69 N. ever, rules relating to the method in which employees shall conduct the business of the carrier, and regulating their authority, are not supposed to be known to the public, and a passenger is not charged with notice thereof, unless they are brought home to him.[68]

2. Regulations as to Paying Fare or Producing Ticket —a. Payment of Fare — (I) In General. The right of the carrier to exact payment in advance as a condition of the right of the passenger to transportation is unquestioned; yet as to regulations with reference to time and manner of payment some difficulties have arisen.[69] On demand of the conductor or other agent or servant properly empowered for the purpose, however, the passenger is under obligation to make payment, or produce a ticket showing payment, and such payment should be in legal tender money if required.[70] A regulation by which more fare is required of one person than of another under similar conditions is unreasonable, and cannot be enforced.[71]

(II) Tender of Fare. While the tender of more than the amount, with the requirement of the making of change may perhaps, under the ordinary usages of such business, be sufficient, yet the person making the tender cannot expect the agent or servant of the carrier to be prepared to make change in any amount, no matter how large, and there must be a reasonable approximation of the amount tendered to the fare.[72] The tender may be made, of course, to any agent or employee authorized to accept payment, but a tender to a brakeman on a freight train is not sufficient.[73]

But a posted notice as to the validity and effect of an unlimited ticket is not binding on the purchaser of such ticket. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Turner, 100 Tenn. 213, 47 S. W. 223, 43 L. R. A. 140.

68. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 123 Ill. 162, 14 N. E. 197, 5 Am. St. Rep. 510.

As to how far a passenger is chargeable with notice of rules of the company as to the authority of a conductor on a freight train to receive passengers see supra, III, B, 1, b, (II). And before the servants of the carrier attempt to enforce such rules as against the passenger, reasonable notice thereof should be given to him. Ft. Clark St. R. Co. v. Ebaugh, 49 Ill. App. 582; Compton v. Van Volkenburgh, 34 N. J. L. 134; Lane v. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co., 5 Lea (Tenn.) 124.

By allowing agents or servants to continue to act in violation of such rules and regulations as are made for their guidance the carrier waives the same with reference to the public. San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Lynch, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 55 S. W. 517; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Elliott, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 31, 54 S. W. 410; Eddy v. Rowell, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 875.

But the previous existence of a contrary custom does not make it improper for the carrier to introduce and enforce a rule on the subject. Hobbs v. Texas, etc., R. Co., 49 Ark. 357, 5 S. W. 586.

69. For instance, it was attempted at one time by carriers in California to require payment of fare in gold, and no doubt such regulation was valid, but with reference to a passenger whose transportation had commenced before payment, it was held that the obligation to pay had become a debt, discharge of which could be made in any legal tender money. Tarbell v. Central Pac. R. Co., 34 Cal. 616. In the same case it is said that prepayment of fare is not essential to the creation of the relation of carrier and passenger, it being sufficient to allege that the passenger was ready and willing, and offered to pay the carrier such sum of money as the latter was legally entitled to charge. Tarbell v. Central Pac. R. Co., 34 Cal. 616. And see Pickford v. Grand Junction R. Co., 9 Dowl. P. C. 766, 5 Jur. 731, 8 M. & W. 372, 2 R. & Can. Cas. 592.

Where a maximum rate of fare is fixed by law the carrier cannot require payment of fare at that rate in gold coin instead of paper currency, which is legal tender, though of less value. Lewis v. New York Cent. R. Co., 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 330.

70. Jersey City, etc., R. Co. v. Morgan, 52 N. J. L. 60, 18 Atl. 904.

71. Phillips v. Southern R. Co., 114 Ga. 284, 40 S. E. 268; State v. Omaha, etc., R. Co., 113 Iowa 30, 84 N. W. 983, 86 Am. St. Rep. 357, 52 L. R. A. 315; Coy v. Detroit, etc., R. Co., 125 Mich. 616, 85 N. W. 6.

72. Thus it has been held that the tender of a five-dollar bill for a five-cent fare on a street-car is not a reasonable tender. Barker v. Central Park, etc., R. Co., 151 N. Y. 237, 45 N. E. 550, 56 Am. St. Rep. 626, 35 L. R. A. 489; Muldowney v. Pittsburg, etc., Traction Co., 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 335, 43 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 52. But in Barrett v. Market St. R. Co., 81 Cal. 296, 22 Pac. 859, 15 Am. St. Rep. 61, 6 L. R. A. 336, it is held that while the tender must be reasonably approximate to the amount of the fare, the carrier was under obligation to furnish change, and that a tender of a five-dollar bill for a five-cent fare was not unreasonable.

73. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Bartram, 11 Ohio St. 457.

As to payment to brakeman see also supra, III, B, 1, b, (II).

(III) Mistake of Conductor.[74] If by mistake the conductor accepts a less amount than that due, the passenger does not, through such mistake, acquire the right to ride to his destination, but the mistake must be corrected on demand of the additional amount, and if not paid the passenger may be ejected for non-payment.[75]

(IV) Mistake of Passenger.[76] If the passenger by his own mistake, and without fault of the servants of the carrier, takes the wrong train, he is not entitled to transportation to the next stopping place without payment, but may be ejected as any other person on refusing to pay fare.[77]

b. Purchase of Ticket — (I) In General. If the carrier sees fit, by proper regulation, to require the passenger to procure a ticket before entering the train for transportation, such regulation may be enforced by the proper servants of the carrier.[78]

(II) Extra Charge Upon Failure to Purchase. Instead of excluding a passenger for not having procured a ticket[79] the carrier may properly exact a sum in addition to the amount which would have been charged for a ticket to the same destination, and such extra charge will not be unlawful as a discrimination,[80]

On street-cars it is sometimes arranged that fare be paid by dropping the amount in a box on the car, without intervention of the conductor. Nye v. Marysville, etc., St. R. Discount to purchasers.— The requirement for the purchase of a ticket may be enforced by giving a discount to those who purchase tickets instead of imposing an extra charge on those who do not. Coyle v. Southern R. Co., 112 Ga. 121, 37 S. E. 163; State v. Goold, 53 Me. 279.

Payment for further transportation.— If the passenger on the train desires to pay for further transportation, he may be required to pay the extra amount for not having purchased the ticket, although he has no opportunity to secure such ticket. and the payment of the extra amount required may be enforced by expulsion from the train of one who refuses to pay.[81]

(III) Opportunity to Purchase.[82] As a condition precedent, however, to the enforcement of such regulation by expulsion of the passenger, the carrier must have afforded to the passenger a reasonable opportunity to procure a ticket. And if such reasonable opportunity has not been afforded, the passenger has the right to have the regular fare accepted for his transportation.[83] If the passenger arrives at the station too late to buy a ticket before entering upon the train, or does not attempt to do so, he is subject to the regulation.[84] But if there is no ticket office, or it is not kept open during a reasonable time before the departure of the train, so that a ticket may be bought, the regulation is not applicable.[85]

3. Exclusion or Rejection For Failure or Refusal to Comply With Regulations — a. In General. A proper method of enforcing a reasonable rule or regulation of the carrier as to the conduct of passengers is by ejecting from the train one who refuses to comply, and it is immaterial whether the violation of the rule is

The extra charge is not regarded as payment for transportation, but as a reasonable penalty for not complying with the requirement for the purchase of a ticket. Reese v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 131 Pa. St. 422, 19 Atl. 72, 17 Am. St. Rep. 818, 6 L. R. A. 529.

Rep. 801.

Time of keeping office open.— It is not an inconvenience to other passengers or to the carrier in the particular instance, if the rule is a proper one.[86] The enforcement must be reasonable and in good faith, and the passenger should not be ejected if it appears to the servant acting for the company that failure to comply has been without fault on the part of the passenger.[87]

b. Disorderly Conduct; Obnoxious Persons. As the carrier has the right to exclude from his trains persons who by their conduct or condition cause annoyance or offense to other passengers, or interfere with the carrier's legitimate business, it is proper to expel such persons, though otherwise entitled to ride as passengers. Such right of expulsion may be exercised with reference to persons who have a contagious disease,[88] or are intoxicated,[89] or are unruly,[90] or use vulgar, indecent, or profane language.[91] And if the conduct or condition of the person necessary that the ticket office be kept open until the very moment of departure of the train if the agent, in the usual course of the practicable discharge of his duties, has afforded opportunity for the purchase of tickets. Everett v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 69 Iowa 15, 28 N. W. 410, 58 Am. Rep. 207; State v. Hungerford, 39 Minn. 6, 38 N. W. 628. What is a reasonable time is to be determined by the jury with reference to the requirements, convenience, and demand of the public at the station in question. Everett v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 69 Iowa 15, 28 N. W. 410, 58 Am. Rep. 207.

Statutory provisions.— The matter is in some states regulated by statute. Where the requirement is that the office be kept open a certain time before the time fixed by schedule for departure of the train, it is not necessary that an opportunity be afforded for the purchase of a ticket after the schedule time for departure, although the train is late. But if the statute requires that the office be kept open a certain length of time before the starting of the train, the passenger cannot be required to pay the excess if such regulation is not complied with, even though the office was kept open for the required time before the schedule time for departure. Disturbance of other passengers.— But to constitute ground for expulsion the objectionable language must be used in a tone sufficiently loud to annoy and disturb other passengers. Chicago City R. Co. v. Pelletier, 134 Ill. 120, 24 N. E. 770.

One who protests with the conductor against what he considers unnecessary roughness in is such as to reasonably warrant the anticipation of inconvenience or annoyance he may be expelled before any improper act has been committed.[92] The same right of control or expulsion may be exercised with reference to the waiting-room of the carrier.[93] The carrier may also exclude from his conveyance or premises persons who without his consent are attempting to make use thereof for carrying on an independent business of their own.[94]

c. Refusal to Pay Fare, or Produce Ticket — (i) In General. For refusal to pay the required fare for transportation the reasonable and usual remedy is expulsion.[95] So, if the ticket offered is void or otherwise not such as to entitle the person offering it to transportation at the time and on the train for which it is offered, the passenger refusing to pay fare or otherwise show himself entitled to transportation may be expelled.[96] It is a usual and reasonable requirement that handling an intoxicated person does not thereby subject himself to expulsion. Weber v. Brooklyn, etc., R. Co., 47 N. Y. App. Div. 306, 62 N. Y. Suppl. 1.

the passenger shall not only have a ticket, or other evidence of his right to transportation, but also shall present it when required by the conductor, or surrender it on demand, and for refusal to do so he may be expelled.[97]

(II) Opportunity to Pay Fare or Produce Ticket.[98] The passenger is entitled to a reasonable time in which to present his ticket or check or pay his fare before being expelled, and if he is acting in good faith the conductor has no right to eject him from the train without affording him a reasonable opportunity to make payment or to find and present his ticket or check, if lost or mislaid.[99]

(III) Transportation on Freight Train. Special conditions are sometimes attached to the privilege of transportation on freight trains, such as that the passenger shall have procured a ticket, or, in addition to a ticket, a permit to ride on such train, or the like, and one who insists on transportation on a freight train in violation of such conditions may be expelled.[1]

which the passenger should be required to pay, the passenger need not tender the right amount, but may refuse to pay the amount demanded, and, if ejected, recover damages.[5] Where a child of immature years is in charge of a parent, on refusal of the parent to pay the lawful fare of the child the parent and child may both be ejected, although the fare for the parent has been paid or tendered.[6] Misconduct of the person who, after violation of the rules as to paying fare or producing ticket and threat of expulsion, has tendered full fare may be such as to amount to a forfeiture of his right to remain on the train so that the conductor may properly eject him.[7]

(II) After Steps Taken For Expulsion. After the person seeking transportation has refused to comply with the rules of the carrier as to payment of fare or production of ticket or otherwise, and the servants of the carrier have taken steps, by ringing for the stoppage of the train or the like, to eject him, he cannot then, by tendering compliance, entitle himself to transportation and make the subsequent ejection wrongful.[8] Nor, after being expelled from the municated to the conductor, will not render the subsequent ejection wrongful. Texas Pac. R. Co. v. James, 82 Tex. 306, 18 S. W. 589, 15 L. R. A. 347.

The conductor is not obliged to take back a passenger who has been put off the train for non-compliance with a rule; certainly not unless it be at a regular station, and ticket train, can he by tender of fare or ticket for further transportation entitle himself to be transported on that train.[9] At any rate, one who has been ejected for refusal to pay fare or produce a ticket may be required, as a condition for further transportation, to pay fare from the point of commencement of the transportation for which he has not paid, as well as for further transportation on the same train.[10]

e. Mistake as to Right of Transportation — (I) Conductor's Mistake[11] — (A) Generally. If the passenger has done what is necessary under the rules of the carrier to entitle him to transportation, the carrier will be liable for his expulsion from the train by reason of mistake or want of judgment on the part of the conductor, although he acts in good faith.[12] But if the conductor has by mistake taken a less amount of fare than should have been required, and subsequently demands the balance, which the passenger refuses to pay, the latter may be expelled if he attempts to ride further than the distance for which he has paid.[13]

(B) Mistake of First Conductor. The same principles which govern the case where an agent wrongfully fails to furnish the passenger the evidence of right to transportation to which he is entitled[14] are applicable also where one conductor should furnish to the passenger the evidence to be presented to a succeeding conductor of the passenger's right to continue his journey, and if by mistake or negligence of the first conductor the passenger is ejected by the second conductor, although the act of the second conductor may be properly the fault of the first conductor, the carrier will be liable for the expulsion.[15] And if the conductor

(B) Taking Wrong Train. In general it is the duty of the passenger to ascertain what train will take him to his destination, and if by mistake, without being misled by those authorized to act for the carrier in the matter, he takes the wrong train, or one which does not stop at his point of destination, he may properly be expelled.[19]

But if the passenger knows that the information which he has received from the servant of the carrier is erroneous his expulsion will be proper. Johnson v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 63 Md. 106. In some cases it has been held that when advised by the

(III) Ticket Agent's Mistake — (A) Generally. There is some authority for the proposition that if the agent selling a ticket makes a mistake as to the character of the ticket to which the passenger is entitled, and for which he pays, the mistake being one which would be apparent to the passenger on inspection, the latter cannot complain if he is ejected from a train on which the ticket furnished him does not entitle him to transportation.[20] But certainly where the passenger is not reasonably chargeable with knowledge as to the nature of the ticket furnished him by the agent he has a right to rely on the agent's representations and may recover for being ejected from a train on which he supposed he had a right to be transported, although, so far as the conductor ejecting him is concerned, the ticket was not good on that train under the rules of the carrier.[21] Moreover, if the agent assures him that something will be done which will entitle him to transportation on such train, he cannot lawfully be ejected therefrom, by reason of having relied on the agent's representations.[22] Indeed, many courts throw the responsibility for mistake of the agent as to the ticket furnished or as to representations made solely on the carrier, and require no precaution on the part of the passenger in the matter, proper explanation being made to the conductor as to the mistake.[23] On a similar principle, when the passenger has a conductor that the train on which he is riding is not the proper one for reaching his destination, it is the passenger's duty to get off and wait for the proper train, and that he cannot recover damages for expulsion, although he has taken the train in pursuance of the misdirection of the carrier's servants, his remedy being to recover for the delay incident to such misdirection. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Pierce, 47 Mich. 277, 11 N. W. 157; International, etc., R. Co. v. Hassell, 62 Tex. 256, 50 Am. Rep. 525. If the passenger is on a train which does not stop at his destination, he may properly be required either to stop short of his destination, or pay the additional fare necessary to carry him to the next stopping place beyond his destination, and for failure to pay such additional fare may be expelled. Logan v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 77 Mo. 663; Fink v. Albany, etc., R. Co., 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 147; Noble v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 4 Okla. 534, 46 Pac. 483; Texas Pac. R. Co. v. James, 82 Tex. 306, 18 S. W. 589, 15 L. R. A. 347.

20. The theory of these cases is that the ejection is proper by reason of failure of the passenger to show his right to transportation when required in accordance with the rules of the carrier, and that his only remedy is for breach of contract on account of the failure of the agent to furnish him the kind of ticket called for. Baggett v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 3 App. Cas. (D. C.) 522; Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co., 135 Mass. 407, 46 Am. Rep. 481; Nolan v. New York, etc., R. Co., 41 N. Y. Super. Oral representations.— On the same theory it is said that the passenger has no right to rely on oral representations of the agent of the carrier which are contrary to the terms of the ticket which is given him, and that he may be ejected from a train on which the ticket does not entitle him to transportation, although he had the assurance of the agent that the ticket would be good on such train. return ticket or coupon which must be stamped by the agent in order to make it good for return passage, the assurance of the agent that no stamping is necessary, or a refusal of the agent to stamp when properly requested, or inability of the passenger to find the proper agent on reasonable effort, will render the carrier liable if the conductor subsequently ejects the passenger because the ticket is not stamped as required.[24] Even as against the terms of the ticket itself it has been held that the passenger may rely on oral representations of the agent as to the sufficiency of the ticket which is furnished him,[25] for the passenger is not presumed to know that the agent is acting without authority.[26]

(B) Proper Basis of Right to Recover. The proper basis of the right of the passenger to recover for the act of the conductor in expelling him when he has secured from the proper agent the right to be transported is not, as suggested in some cases,[27] that such expulsion is a breach of contract, nor, as suggested in other cases,[28] that the conductor is in the wrong in not accepting the passenger's explanation, but that, although the conductor has acted properly under reasonable regulations in expelling the passenger for not having proper evidence of right to transportation, this expulsion is such as naturally results from the wrongful act of the agent which constitutes therefore the occasion for the expulsion and renders the carrier liable therefor.[29]

4. Method of Expulsion; Liability For Wrongful Expulsion — a. What Constitutes Expulsion. In determining the liability of the carrier, where it is claimed that the expulsion has been either without cause, or in an improper manner, the question may arise whether or not there has been an expulsion in fact. To constitute such expulsion it is not necessary that any violence shall have been used. If the servant of the carrier, authorized to determine whether or not a person claiming to be a passenger shall be transported, notifies such person that he must leave the train or other vehicle, the person so notified may, without further resistance, depart therefrom and maintain an action for damages if the expulsion is without right, or at an improper place.[30]

b. Return of Fare. Where the expulsion is on the ground that the person claiming to be transported as a passenger has no right to transportation by reason of non-compliance with a contract requirement as to payment, the carrier, who is thus seeking to avoid the pretended contract on which the passenger relies, must return to him the consideration paid, or the portion thereof unearned.[31] The expulsion. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Conrad, 4 Ind. App. 83, 30 N. E. 406. So where the transportation was delayed on the first line and the passenger was unable to make the connection on the second line called for by his ticket and he was expelled, held that the first company was liable therefor by reason of the failure of its agents to notify the conductor on the second line that the passenger was entitled to transportation. Watkins v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 21 D. C. 1.

Reason for rule.—As between the conductor and the passenger, the reasonable and proper rule is that the ticket is conclusive (Western Maryland R. Co. v. Stocksdale, 83 Md. 245, 34 Atl. 880; Frederick v. Marquette, etc., R. Co., 37 Mich. 342, 26 Am. Rep. 531; Woods v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 48 Mo. App. 125; Pouilin v. Canadian Pac. R. Co., 23 Fed. 326); and if the passenger could, by using ordinary diligence, have discovered the mistake of the agent or of the preceding conductor in not furnishing him the proper evidence of his right to transportation, then he should not recover for expulsion, inasmuch as the expulsion is not the proximate cause of the wrongful act of the agent or previous conductor, the passenger's own negligence having intervened (Wiggins v. King, 91 Hun (N. Y.) 340, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 768, 71 N. Y. St. 861; Pouilin v. Canadian Pac. R. Co., 52 Fed. 197, 6 U. S. App. 298, 3 C. C. A. 23). The act of the conductor in applying the rules of the company with reference to the showing made by the passenger is proper, for he is not bound to accept the mere statements of the passenger which are contradicted by the circumstances as they appear to him. But if departure from conveyance is dangerous at the particular instant because it is in motion, or otherwise, then the passenger will not be justified in incurring such immediate danger, unless it is apparent that the intention of the carrier's servant is that he shall incur such danger, and that his expulsion will be immediately effected by force if he does not comply with the direction. Bosworth v. Walker, 83 Fed. 58, 53 U. S. App. 562, 27 C. C. A. 402.

conductor has the right, however, to retain out of the money paid by the passenger the proper fare for transporting him to the place where he is expelled, even though he had no desire and expressed no intention to secure transportation to that place.[32] But it seems that there is no necessity, where the passenger's right to transportation under the ticket which he has surrendered has been forfeited, to return to him the ticket.[33] Where a passenger has a right to the return of the fare paid, or a portion thereof, the ejection will be wrongful, unless such return is previously made. It is not sufficient that the tender is made to him after expulsion.[34]

c. Place of Expulsion. When there is proper occasion for ejecting a person from the carrier's train or other vehicle for refusal to comply with proper rules and regulations, consisting of improper conduct, refusal to pay fare, present a ticket, or the like, there is in general no legal requirement that the expulsion be at a regular station or stopping place. The person who has no right to be conveyed, or to be further conveyed, may at any place, aside from the question of reasonable care for his safety, to be hereafter discussed,[35] be required to leave the carrier's conveyance and prevented from further enjoying the privileges thereof.[36] But in many states statutes have been passed requiring that ejectment for refusal to pay fare shall be only at a usual stopping place or station, or near a dwelling-house. These statutes are no doubt intended for the protection of persons who are ejected against the dangers and inconveniences which may arise from expulsion at points where they may suffer hardship.[37]

d. Liability For Wrongful Expulsion[38] — (i) Rule Stated. The carrier is liable for the wrongful acts of its servants in charge of the train or other conveyance in expelling persons therefrom, so far as such servants are acting within the scope of their authority.[39] Therefore the carrier is liable for the damages resulting from an unlawful expulsion by his servants, even though they act recklessly, wilfully, or maliciously, or in violation of their duty,[40] provided their acts are done in the discharge of their duty as servants of the carrier, and within the general scope of their duties.[41] With reference to passengers, that is, those entitled to be transported as distinct from trespassers or persons seeking to secure transportation without right, it is immaterial whether or not the employee of the company is acting within the scope of his authority, for it is the duty of the carrier to afford protection to the passenger.[42]

(ii) Rule Applied. In accordance with the general rule that the carrier is liable for the wrongful acts of his servants within the scope of their employment, it is held that where a railway or street-car conductor expels a passenger from his train or car, either wrongfully, that is, where there is no right to expel, or negligently, the carrier is responsible for any resulting injury, for it is within the scope of the employment of the conductor to determine who is entitled to transportation on his train, and to expel therefrom those not so entitled, and it will be immaterial that the conductor in the wrongful or negligent act violates his instructions;[43] and the same liability extends to acts of persons employed by the conductor to assist him in the expulsion.[44] So if the driver of a street-car has authority to expel from the car those not entitled to transportation, the carrier will be liable for his wrongful or negligent acts in so doing.[45] A brakeman on a railroad, however, does not necessarily have the authority, in consequence of his general employment, to determine who is entitled to transportation, or to expel persons not so entitled.[46] What is said in this paragraph is applicable to trespassers as well as passengers.[47]

question for the jury whether under the circumstances such expulsion is negligent.[49]

(II) At Improper Time or Place. The servants of the carrier should not expel a passenger (or even a trespasser) at a time or place which is dangerous,[50] and the carrier will be liable in such a case not only for injuries directly suffered in connection with such expulsion, but also for subsequent injuries proximately due thereto, such as injury from other trains which the ejected person could not reasonably avoid, the probable consequences of improper exposure, and the like.[51] And it will be no answer that the person was injured by reason of his helplessness due to intoxication or like cause, if his condition was known to the servants of the carrier, and the consequent injury resulting from his expulsion could have been reasonably anticipated.[52] But to render the carrier liable for subsequent injuries it must appear that they were the proximate result of the expulsion, and could have been reasonably anticipated. Even as to persons who are partially incapacitated the carrier is not liable for subsequent injuries, unless there was negligence as to the time or place selected for the expulsion.[53] of force depending on the resistance offered.[55] But for injuries due to the use of unnecessary force or violence, the carrier will be liable. Even in the removal of trespassers no injury should be inflicted which may reasonably be avoided consistently with effecting the removal.[56] Although the expulsion is lawful, if unnecessary violence is wilfully employed by the carrier's servants, the carrier will be liable for exemplary as well as actual damages.[57]

(IV) Resistance. There is some authority for the proposition that a passenger whom the servants of the carrier are wrongfully attempting to remove from a train may resist, and if injury is inflicted in overcoming such resistance recovery may be had therefor.[58] But on this question the weight of authority seems to be that a passenger threatened with wrongful expulsion (especially one who is being rightfully expelled) has no right to resist the authority of the carrier's servants in control of the transportation, but should comply with their directions, being entitled to damages for wrongful expulsion, although no force has been used, but not entitled to recover for injuries received by reason of resistance to their authority, even though wrongfully exercised.[59]

There is some authority for the contention that where, as between the passenger and the conductor who causes his expulsion, there is no right to transportation shown, but the expulsion is the result of the fault of the agent of the carrier or previous conductor in not furnishing to the passenger the evidence of his right to transportation to which he was entitled, the action should be against the carrier for breach of the original contract to transport, and not in tort for wrongful ejection. But by better reason and the weight of authority an action of tort may be maintained even in such a case, for the wrong involved in the ejection is the proximate consequence of the wrong of the carrier's servants with reference to the transportation of the passenger, and is chargeable to the carrier as a tort. from the station, it must show that plaintiff was there with intent as a passenger to be transported.[63] If it appears that the ejection was from a train, facts must be alleged showing the train to have been a proper one, as, for instance, that it was a train stopping at the destination to which plaintiff was entitled to transportation.[64]

c. Evidence. The burden of proof is on plaintiff seeking to recover damages for wrongful ejection as a passenger to show that he was rightfully on the vehicle where he was being transported.[65] For this purpose it may become important to show his intent, for which purpose evidence is admissible that he endeavored to procure a ticket before entering the car.[66] On the other hand, as disproving his good faith and purpose to pay fare, evidence that he had no money with him is competent.[67]

d. Measure of Damages — (I) Expense; Loss of Time; Inconvenience. A passenger wrongfully ejected may recover compensation for loss of time and additional expense due to the delay and inconvenience suffered.[68]

(II) Physical and Mental Suffering. If physical injuries are suffered from wrongful or negligent expulsion, or as a proximate result of such expulsion, or from the use of unnecessary force in connection with a rightful expulsion, recovery may be had therefor under the general rules which govern recovery for physical injuries in other cases of tort.[69] If the ejection is wrongful there may also be recovery by way of actual damages for mental pain and suffering, so called, including shame and mortification which resulted to plaintiff, and the humiliation to which he was subjected and the indignity put upon him.[70] The fear involved in the apprehension attending, or which may follow, expulsion from the train may also be taken into account.[71]

(III) Proximate and Remote Damages. Where the servant of the carrier who wrongfully ejected a passenger also causes his arrest on the charge of crime, the imprisonment and detention are proximate results which may properly be considered in assessing damages.[72] Personal injuries resulting from efforts to reach some place of security after expulsion are recoverable,[73] but not those resulting from unnecessary exposure or effort.[74] In determining what physical injuries are proximate it is competent to show the physical and mental condition of plaintiff which aggravated the injury, although such peculiar condition was not known to the carrier.[75] Plaintiff cannot, however, recover for the humiliation resulting from subsequent comments of persons not present,[76] nor injury to good name,[77] nor loss of work,[78] nor injury to business or professional reputation,[79] nor for having been compelled to borrow money to pay fare illegally exacted.[80] If the expulsion is not wrongful or in an improper manner the passenger cannot recover for wounded feelings. He cannot speculate in an action against the carrier by way of seeking recovery for an act which he must have known would follow his attempt to wrongfully secure transportation, or his negligence in not complying with the regulations of the carrier.[81]

(IV) Mitigation of Damages. Although the passenger who produces a ticket or is ready to pay fare may recover substantial damages for being ejected,[82] and the good faith of the carrier's servants in ejecting will not prevent recovery of such substantial damages, although competent to be shown for the purpose of affecting the amount of recovery,[83] yet the passenger has no right, even where the ejection is unauthorized, to unnecessarily resist and thereby bring upon himself the exercise of force resulting in personal injury, and for injuries thus suffered, unless they were unnecessarily or maliciously inflicted, there can be no recovery.[84] In some cases it has been held that it is the duty of the passenger, even where there is no ground for eviction for non-payment of fare, to pay whatever additional fare is demanded, and thereby limit himself to a recovery of the amount so unlawfully exacted.[85] But, it is said with better reason that even though the amount demanded is trifling, the passenger may stand upon his legal rights, and, submitting to an unlawful ejection, recover damages therefor.[86]

(v) Exemplary Damages. In accordance with the theory which at one time received some support that a master is not liable for the wilful and malicious acts of his servant, it has been said by some courts that a railway company as carrier of passengers is not liable in exemplary damages for the malicious acts of its servants in expelling a passenger from the train.[87] In other cases it has been said that the corporation is not liable under such circumstances unless it had authorized or ratified the acts of its servant.[88] But the doctrine that a master is not liable for the wilful and malicious acts of the servant, even though within the scope of his general employment, is generally discarded, and with it the doctrine that a corporation cannot be rendered liable for exemplary damages by reason of its servant's acts, and the generally recognized rule is that the carrier may be mulcted in exemplary damages for the wrongful acts of its servant in expelling the passenger from a train, where such act is within the scope of the servant's employment, in all cases where natural persons, acting for themselves, would be liable for such damages.[89] And in a great variety of cases in which recovery has been sought against carriers for wrongful ejection, exemplary damages have been allowed where it has been shown that the act was accompanied with malice, wantonness, or gross negligence.[90] On the other hand, even though the ejection had been wrongful, yet if accomplished without malice or unnecessary force, violence, or indignity, and with reasonable care, exemplary damages have been refused.[91] Where the ejection is due to the fault of an agent or prior conductor in not furnishing the passenger with proper evidence of his right to ride, and not to any fault of the conductor who expels him, it has been said that exemplary damages cannot be recovered.[92] But on the theory that the expulsion is the proximate result of the fault of such prior agent or conductor it may well be that exemplary damages may be recoverable, the fault of the agent or first conductor being found to be grossly negligent or wilful.[93]

D. Special Contracts; Fares; Tickets; Limitations — 1. Fare — a. Payment.[95] Looking at the relation of carrier and passenger as arising out of contract, it is evident that, while a person may be a passenger without payment, if accepted as such by the carrier,[96] nevertheless, to give rise to any contractual relation, consideration on the part of the passenger is essential.[97] If by contract the carrier is under obligation to furnish tickets, as, for instance, in exchange under the provisions of a mileage book, the passenger may recover damages for failure of the carrier through its proper agents to furnish such tickets showing the passenger to be entitled to transportation.[98]

b. Recovery of Overcharge. If the agents of the carrier exact a larger amount by way of fare than the carrier is entitled to, the passenger may recover back the excess charge, with interest.[99]

2. Tickets — a. Whether Ticket Is a Contract. There has been some diversity of opinion as to whether a railroad ticket, or other similar ticket entitling the passenger to transportation, is to be deemed a contract.[1] The ordinary ticket is not a contract but is evidence of the right to transportation furnished to the passenger in consequence of a contract to carry, and intended to enable the passenger to secure transportation, under the rules and regulations of the carrier in performance of such contract.[2] There is no question, however, on the other hand, that

As to baggage or luggage.— In connection with the discussion of the carrier's liability for the luggage of the passenger, it appears that an ordinary ticket is not deemed to constitute the contract of transportation, and therefore that conditions or limitations appearing thereon are not binding on the passenger unless assented to by him, the mere

the ticket may be in such form as to indicate that it is mutually intended and understood as a contract, the terms and conditions of which become binding on the passenger by signature and acceptance, or even by acceptance alone, without signature.[3] As to the ordinary ticket, however, it has been held that it does not preclude parol evidence to show the contract of transportation.[4] On the other hand, the ticket is prima facie evidence of the possessor's right to transportation.[5] The fact that the ticket is issued on Sunday does not affect the right of the passenger traveling thereunder to recover in an action ex delicto for injuries wrongfully inflicted upon him during such transportation.[6]

b. Authority of Agent. Any agent allowed to exercise general authority to sell tickets over the line of a carrier thereby binds the carrier,[7] and any act within the apparent scope of his authority in making such contract for transportation will be binding.[8] But representations as to the effect of a ticket, not made in connection with its sale, are without authority.[9] Nor can an agent authorized to sell bind the carrier by delegating his authority to another, as by putting tickets already stamped and prepared for delivery into the hands of a third person, without the carrier's knowledge or consent.[10]

c. Connecting Lines. In the absence of any arrangement between carriers operating connecting lines, there is no right on the part of either to bind the other by the sale of a ticket for through transportation over the two lines.[11] But joint arrangements are frequently made, by which tickets issued by one of such carriers are accepted by the other.[12] The usual arrangement is that by which each of the connecting carriers sells tickets for the through transportation, acting as principal with reference to his own line, and agent of the connecting carrier in contracting for transportation over the connecting line.[13] A ticket thus sold is not a through contract,[14] and the right of the purchaser, and the responsibility of acceptance of the ticket not being sufficient in itself to show assent. See infra, III, I, 2, a.

the different companies are the same as though separate tickets had been purchased by him from each, and each is responsible for injury suffered on its own line, and not otherwise.[15] But the contract of the carrier selling the ticket may be for through transportation, and in such case the company selling the ticket is the principal, and the connecting carrier continuing the transportation of the passenger under such ticket is the agent of the carrier selling the ticket, for the purpose of carrying out the contract of transportation, and in such case the carrier selling the ticket will be liable for any fault of the connecting carrier or its servants.[16]

3. Conditions and Limitations — a. In General. Where the ticket is not such as in form to constitute a special contract, conditions printed thereon are not binding on the purchaser unless assented to by him, expressly or by implication. Signature of purchaser.— It is common to require signature of the purchaser to such ticket, and it may be presumed, where a signature is contemplated, but the purchaser is not in fact required to sign, that the conditions are not accepted by him, and the ticket has the effect of an ordinary ticket without conditions or limitations. Walker v. Price, ticket is such as to constitute a special contract, then its terms will not be affected by any general representations of the carrier, by advertisement or otherwise, as to the effect of such tickets.[28] The conditions attached, even in case of a special contract ticket, must, however, be reasonable.[29]

b. Limitation as to Time. In the absence of any stipulation or limitation in the ticket it will be presumed to be unlimited as to the time when performance of the undertaking may be demanded.[30] But the purchaser is bound by, and must take notice of, limitations printed or stamped upon the face of the ticket as to the time within which it may be used.[31] In the construction of limitations as to time it is said that if, without fault of the passenger, he is delayed, so that he cannot complete his journey within the limitation of the ticket, then he is entitled, notwithstanding such limitation, to continue his journey to his destination.[32] In construing limitations as to time it has been held that the stipulation, "Not good for passage after" a certain number of days from date, or, "on and from date stamped on back," limits only the time of the commencement of the journey, so that, if the journey is commenced within the specified time the ticket remains 9 Kan. App. 720, 59 Pac. 1102. But in case of special tickets, such as mileage tickets, or tickets over connecting lines, the very terms of which imply an assent which it is required shall be given by signature, the failure to sign will not relieve the purchaser who accepts and uses the ticket from the limitations or conditions contained therein. Reasonableness and effect of time limit.— Such a limitation seems to be regarded as a part of the description of the right to transportation which the ordinary ticket is intended to indicate, and if the condition is reasonable it will be binding, without regard to any express assent. Hanlon v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 109 Iowa 136, 80 N. W. 223. A time limit of one day is not unreasonable (Coburn v. Morgan's Louisiana, etc., R. Co., 105 La. 398, 29 So. 882, 83 Am. St. Rep. 242), especially if there is also a provision for refunding the purchase-price or any unused part thereof, if not used within that time (Southern R. Co. v. Watson, 110 Ga. 681, 36 S. E. 209; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Marlett, 75 Miss. 956, 23 So. 583). But the time limit must, in order to be binding, allow sufficient time for a person exercising ordinary diligence to accomplish the journey. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Wright, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 179, 30 S. W. 294. Where a distinction in rate is made between unlimited and limited tickets, a ticket with a time limitation comes within the latter clause. U. S. v. Egan, 47 Fed. 112.

If the transportation is under a coupon ticket, each part representing a separate contract with the different connecting lines, delay caused by the fault of the carrier on one good until its completion, if pursued continuously.[33] But if the stipulation is that the ticket is not to be good beyond a certain date it is to be construed as meaning that the transportation is to be completed by that time.[34]

c. Provision Against Detaching Coupons. It is frequently stipulated, where a ticket consists of two or more parts, to be separated by successive conductors, that each successive portion shall be invalid if detached,[35] the intention being that the whole of the ticket, or the remaining portion of it, shall be presented to the conductor, who shall detach therefrom the portion entitling the passenger to transportation over that part of the entire route which is under the control of such conductor.[36]

d. Stamping and Identification For Return Trip. A usual condition in excursion tickets sold for a round trip at reduced rates is that before the returning portion of the ticket is used it must be presented by the purchaser to an agent at the other end of the line, and there signed by the purchaser for the purpose of identifying him by means of his signature as the person who bought and signed the ticket when issued.[37] The conditions in such tickets sometimes pro-line will not operate to extend the time limit as to transportation on subsequent lines. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Looney, 85 Tex. 158, 19 S. W. 1039, 34 Am. St. Rep. 787, 16 L. R. A. 471.

Perhaps if there is no agent to whom the application can be made within a reasonable time, or the agent should refuse to stamp or indorse a ticket when properly required to do so, the passenger would be entitled to transportation, that is, the carrier would be liable for his ejection on the ground that it was through the fault of the carrier's agent that such ejection resulted. Southern R. Co. v. Wood, 114 Ga. 140, 39 S. E. 894, 55 L. R. A. 536. See also supra, III, C, 3, e.

vide for identification, not only by signature, but by other means when required.[38]

e. Waiver of Conditions — (I) In General. It has been held that where a condition, such as that a mileage ticket shall be signed by the purchaser, has been ignored by the conductor and the passenger has been allowed to ride thereon repeatedly without signature, so that the omission to require signature is not to be deemed a mere oversight, the condition must be regarded as waived.[39] But it has been held with better reason that the mere failure, even on different occasions, to require compliance with the conditions of a ticket will not waive the conditions as to that ticket as to other trips.[40] And certainly the waiver as to one ticket will not constitute a waiver as to other tickets, although they are of the same character.[41]

(II) Authority to Waive. A general officer or an agent authorized to determine whether or not a passenger is entitled to transportation may waive the conditions in a ticket.[42] It may be stipulated, however, in the ticket itself that no employee has authority to waive the conditions.[43] In general a waiver by one conductor as to his portion of the route will not be binding on other conductors.[44]

Where the ticket is over connecting lines, and the identification and stamping is to be by the agent of the second line, the fault of such agent will not render the ejection of the returning passenger by the conductor on the first wrongful so as to subject that carrier to liability, the stipulation in the sale of the ticket being that the first carrier becomes bound only for the transportation over his own line. Sufficiency of identification. — Where the condition was that the holder of the ticket should, at the request of the conductor, sign his name thereto and otherwise identify himself as the original purchaser, it was held that on refusal of the conductor to allow the passenger to identify himself by signature he could not be required to furnish other identification. f. Limitation of Liability by Contract — (I) Rule Stated. In analogy to the rule established by the great weight of authority in the case of carriers of goods, that any contract relieving the carrier from liability for negligence is invalid,[45] it is well settled that as the carrier of passengers is not liable in any event save for negligence, any contract limiting his liability is against public policy and void,[46] and the authorities are practically unanimous in support of the proposition that no contract, condition, or limitation will relieve the carrier from liability to a passenger carried for compensation for the consequences of the negligence of the carrier or his servants, nor modify that liability so as to in any way restrict it within the limits fixed by the common law.[47]

(II) Rule Applied — (A) Generally. The rule just stated is applicable to passengers who, though not paying the regular fare, are carried, though on so-called passes, not gratuitously, but in return for some benefit or advantage to the carrier.[48] Where, however, a person, though carried as a passenger, and for some compensation or advantage to the carrier, has a special privilege to which passengers in general are not entitled, there has been some difference of opinion as to whether the carrier can limit his liability. Thus, where one is carried on a freight train in order that he may accompany stock being shipped, it is held by the weight of authority that a stipulation in the contract exempting the carrier from liability for his own or his servant's negligence, is void;[49] but there are cases to the contrary.[50]

(B) Express Messengers. A similar difficulty has arisen as to express messengers carried on railroad trains under contract with the express company. The weight of authority seems to be that a contract by which the railroad company is relieved from liability for injuries to the messengers is valid.[51]

(C) Mail Agents. As to mail agents transported on trains it is said that a stipulation relieving the railroad company from liability for injury to them is not valid.[52]

(D) Persons Riding Gratuitously. In respect to the transportation of passengers who are carried gratuitously, that is, as a matter of favor and without any compensation or advantage whatever to the carrier, the weight of authority is that a stipulation entered into by such person as a condition of being transported that he will assume the risk of the transportation, and not look to the carrier for compensation for any injury resulting to him in connection therewith, is valid.[53]

E. Performance of Contract or Duty to Transport — 1. On Proper Train or Conveyance — a. Particular Train and Route. Unless there is a special contract as to the train on which the passenger is to be transported he is not entitled to take any particular train, but he has the right to be transported in accordance with the reasonable regulations of the carrier.[58] The passenger must take the train which under the regulations of the carrier will take him to his destination. He has no right to transportation on a train which is not scheduled to stop at his destination.[59] If the same carrier runs trains over different routes between the same points, a passenger between such points may be required to take the shorter route and to pay extra fare for transportation if he goes by the longer.[60]

b. Right to Be Taken Up. The passenger has the right to be admitted to the proper train for transportation under his contract, and may recover damages if wrongfully refused admission to, or transportation on, such train.[61] As to regular passenger trains it is the duty of the carrier, in the exercise of reasonable care, to furnish the passenger opportunity to get on board the train at the usual passenger platform;[62] but as to freight trains carrying passengers, a custom to stop the car on which passengers are to be transported at some distance from the platform may be reasonable and proper, and the passenger cannot complain that, waiting on the regular passenger platform, he has no opportunity to enter the passenger-car of the freight train.[63] Opportunities for taking the proper train at the proper place must be afforded under reasonable regulations,[64] and a passenger desiring to take a train scheduled at a particular station may recover damages if he is not given the opportunity to do so by the stopping of the train.[65] As to street-cars, the duty is to stop in accordance with usual regulations on signal for the purpose of taking passengers, and failure to do so will render the company liable.[66] The carrier by rail is bound to give reasonable signals of the starting of its trains so that passengers may go on board.[67]

2. ACCOMMODATIONS — a. Duty to Furnish Transportation. As the ordinary unlimited ticket is not a contract to transport on any particular train,[68] it does not constitute a breach of contract that the passenger having a ticket cannot be accommodated by reason of the limited capacity of the train, and it seems that this is so even where the company advertises an excursion.[69] But if tickets are sold for a particular train the contract is broken if accommodation is not furnished, even though the capacity of the train is already overtaxed.[70]

b. Duty to Furnish Seats. The carrier is bound to furnish seats to passengers entitled to transportation, if practicable,[71] and the passenger may refuse to give up his ticket or pay fare if a seat is not furnished.[72]

c. Accommodations According to Contract. One who has purchased a ticket of a particular class is entitled to accommodations according to his ticket.[73] But in general the passenger who elects to remain on a particular train must accept the reasonable accommodations afforded him on such train.[74]

3. CONTINUOUS TRIP ACCORDING TO TERMS OF CONTRACT; STOP-OVER PRIVILEGES. The passenger is entitled to transportation from the point indicated by his ticket as the beginning of his journey to his destination, and not in the reverse direction.[75] And a ticket for transportation between two points is good from any intermediate point to destination.[76] But in the absence of contract arising from special provisions, or implied from usage or regulation, a ticket entitles a passenger only to continuous transportation from the initial point to the end of his journey;[77] and if, after commencing the journey, he abandons it before reaching his destination, he is not entitled to complete it under the original ticket or payment of fare.[78] Nor is the passenger entitled, having commenced his journey on one train which will take him to his destination, to abandon it and take another train, though operated by the same carrier.[79] If the ticket is for transportation over connecting lines, the passenger is entitled to take only the train on the connecting line which corresponds to that on which he has traveled over the first line.[80] But under an ordinary coupon ticket, which amounts in effect to separate contracts of transportation over distinct lines, and with no special stipulations as to the journey being continuous, the passenger may stop off at any connecting point and subsequently avail himself of the coupons entitling him to transportation for the remainder of his journey.[81] By regulation the privilege of stopping over at an intermediate point and continuing the journey later under the same ticket is often given, but in such case the conditions prescribed by the regulation must be complied with.[82] The right to stop over at

4. Transfer to Another Train or Line; Performance by Connecting Line — a. Transferring From One Car or Train to Another; Street-Car Transfers. Where it is necessary for the passenger to change cars or trains in the prosecution of the journey, reasonable notice thereof by the servants of the carrier is sufficient, and the passenger not governing himself by such notice cannot recover damages if he loses his connection.[84] If street-car lines are so operated that passengers are entitled to transfers from one line to another, a regulation requiring a transfer check is not unreasonable.[85] Where transfer checks are used the passenger must comply with the conditions thereof to be entitled to transportation on the connecting line.[86] If through fault of the agent or conductor the passenger is not furnished the proper transfer entitling him to ride on the connecting line, and is ejected therefrom, he may recover damages.[87] The right of transfer from one street-car line to another is sometimes provided for by statute.[88] carrier has made a through contract for the entire transportation, then he will be liable for any failure or neglect on the part of the connecting carrier in carrying out the contract.[91]

5. Discharging Passenger at Destination — a. Duty to Stop at Destination. Where a ticket is sold on a particular train, for a specified destination, or the passenger on the train pays the conductor for transportation to a specified destination, the carrier is under obligation to stop the train at that point to allow the passenger to alight, and a refusal to carry him on that train to such destination will be a breach of contract.[92] But if without any assurance on which he has a right to rely, or contrary to the directions of the conductor, he takes passage for a continuous journey on a train, which under the rules of the carrier does not stop at his destination, he may be required to leave the train at the first stopping point before the destination is reached, or to pay fare to the next stopping place beyond his destination, and on refusal to comply he may properly be ejected from the train.[93] If the destination is a flag station, at which the train stops only on signal, the passenger must notify the carrier a reasonable time before reaching the destination of his desire to stop, and thereupon it is the duty of the carrier to let him off at his destination.[94] In general the conductor is under no obligation to stop the train to let off a passenger at a place where the train is not scheduled to stop, in the absence of any special contract.[95] But by express or implied con-obligatory that the train be stopped for a reasonable length of time to allow passengers, in the exercise of due diligence, to get off without danger.[99] General notice to the passengers on the train, for the purpose of enabling them to alight at the proper station, is all that is required, personal notice to each passenger of the station where he is to alight not being necessary,[1] and it is the duty of the passenger to get off at the proper place.[2]

c. Duty in Connection With Alighting of Passenger. The carrier discharges his duty with reference to the alighting of the passenger when he gives him reasonable opportunity to alight. There is no obligation in the ordinary case to furnish assistance.[3] There is no duty to awaken a passenger in order to advise him that his destination is reached and enable him to get off the train, and even a promise of the conductor to do so[4] will be regarded as a personal favor for breach of which the carrier will not be liable.[5] In general all the passenger is entitled to is that the usual notice be given that the train is approaching the station, and any promise to give special notice will be deemed beyond the authority of the conductor, and not binding on the carrier.[6]

6. DELAY. With reference to the time within which the carrier shall complete the transportation after it has been commenced, the carrier's duty is to use due care and skill. The announcement of schedules for the arrival and departure of trains does not give rise to a contract that as to a particular train the schedule will be complied with, the liability for not complying being one based on negligence in the proper operation of the train in connection with the business of the carrier.[7] For unreasonable delay, occasioned by the fault or negligence of the servants in charge of the carrier's business, the carrier will be liable,[8] even though the fault of such servants is wilful.[9] For delay caused by the elements, without negligence on the part of the carrier, there is no liability.[10]

7. Actions For Damages For Breach of Contract of Transportation — a. Form of Action. An action for being refused transportation in accordance with contract,[11] or for refusal to put the passenger off at his destination,[12] is for breach of contract, and the damages recoverable are those recoverable in such an action.[13] If no actual damages are shown, the breach of the contract will authorize the recovery of nominal damages only.[14] But the breach of the contract may also involve a tort, that is, a breach of the carrier's common-law duty, and in such case other damages than those incident to breach of contract may be recovered.[15] The technical form of the action is, however, in general immaterial, recovery being allowed in accordance with the wrong indicated by the facts as alleged.[16]

b. Pleading. In an action for refusal to transport, plaintiff must allege that he was ready and willing to pay the legal or reasonable fare for such transportation.[17] If the action is for refusal to let the passenger off at his destination, and for carrying him beyond, plaintiff must allege that the place at which he desired to stop was one at which by law, or by the carrier's regulations, it was the duty of the carrier to stop the train.[18]

c. Damages — (i) Actual and Proximate Pecuniary Damages. For breach of contract in refusing the passenger transportation, or carrying him beyond his destination, the passenger is entitled to recover damages for his trouble and inconvenience suffered, and expense and loss of time involved, either as incident to the refusal to transport, or consequent thereon.[19] The damages recoverable are limited to those which are proximate, and not remote or contingent.[20] There is some conflict as to what injuries consequent to being carried past the passenger's destination will be deemed the proximate result thereof. In some cases the injury resulting from having to walk to the destination, and inconvenience, danger, and sickness incurred in doing so are allowed.[21] On the other hand it has been held that sickness and exposure resulting from being wrongfully carried beyond the destination, and put off at a place not in itself dangerous, and in a proper and careful manner, was too remote to be charged to the fault of the carrier.[22] Loss of profits in an enterprise which is interfered with by delay of the passenger in reaching his destination, the danger of such loss not having been known to the carrier, is not to be allowed.[23]

(ii) Physical and Mental Suffering. For improper refusal to stop at the passenger's destination, and carrying him beyond, the carrier is liable, not only for the actual pecuniary damage suffered, but also for any physical or mental suffering due to injury or anxiety incident to the failure to allow the passenger to depart from the train, or consequent upon his being carried to a point away from his destination.[24] But for mere negligence, not accompanied with or resulting in physical injury, it is generally said that the carrier is not liable for damages by way of compensation for mental suffering.[25]

(III) Exemplary Damages. Where the breach of duty as to transporting the passenger, or delivering him at his destination within a reasonable time, is attended with circumstances of wilfulness, gross negligence, insult, or indignity, exemplary damages may be recovered.[26] But in general, where there is breach of contract only, or negligence not accompanied with circumstances of aggravation, no exemplary damages are allowed.[27]

F. Personal Injuries to Passengers — 1. Degree of Care Required as to Safety of Passenger — a. Carrier Not Insurer; Liable Only For Negligence. A carrier of passengers is not absolutely liable for the safety of the passenger as the carrier of goods is for the safety of the goods. His liability is bottomed on negligence.[28] Therefore, in the sense in which carriers of goods are said to be insurers of the safety of the goods,[29] it may be said that carriers of passengers are not insurers of the safety of passengers.[30]

b. Definitions of Degree of Care. While the carrier's liability with reference to the safety of the passenger is founded on negligence, the courts have used a variety of forms of expression, not by any means harmonious, in attempting to define what constitutes negligence, that is, in explaining what will be sufficient care on the part of the carrier as to relieve him from liability. But it is to be noticed in the first place that classification of negligence by degrees has been discouraged by very high authority.[31] In the proper use of the term "negligence" is simply the failure to use the amount of care, skill, and diligence required by the nature of the undertaking and the circumstances of the case, and speaking in this sense of the degree of care required of the carrier of passengers, who has intrusted to him the personal safety of the passenger, it is evident that the skill, care, and diligence should be proportioned to the nature and risk of the undertaking, in view of the nature of the means of conveyance employed, especially in the case of railroad companies which engage in the hazardous occupation of conveying human beings in vehicles operated at a high rate of speed by means of immense power developed by the use of steam.[32] Therefore, while it might be proper in one sense to say that the care required is that which an ordinarily careful and prudent person would exercise in such business, in view of its extra-hazardous nature, yet, on the other hand, the nature of the business requires the use of a very high degree of care, prudence, and foresight, and it would be misleading to say that ordinary and reasonable care was sufficient to relieve the carrier from the charge of negligence. But it will not do to require of the carrier the exercise of every possible precaution against injury to the passenger, for that would prevent the practical performance of the duty to transport with expedition, in accordance with the usual requirements of the business.[33] Hence it is not the highest degree of care, prudence, and foresight for the safety of the passenger which is required, but such great degree of care, prudence, and foresight which a prudent man engaged in the business as usually conducted would employ, that is, such as is reasonably practicable.[34] The many different forms of expression used in stating the rule of the carrier's liability all recognize substantially the same test, the difference in statement being for the purpose of applying the rule to different states of fact. Thus it is said that the degree of care required is the high degree of care which would be used by a person of great prudence in view of the nature and risks of the business,[35] or, in general, the highest degree

By statute in Nebraska it is provided that railroad companies shall be liable for all damages to passengers while being transported, except where the injury arises from the criminal negligence of the person injured, or the violation of some express rule of the company actually brought to the passenger's notice. In the federal court it has been held that even this statute does not make a common carrier an insurer of the safety of the passengers, but merely establishes a presumption that damages inflicted on the passenger are entirely attributable to the negligence of the railroad company. Degrees of negligence.— If the degrees of negligence which have sometimes been recognized in defining the liability of a bailee were applied to carriers of passengers, then no doubt it would be proper to say that a carrier of passengers for hire would be liable for ordinary negligence only, and some courts have used language to that effect, referring to negligence as the failure to use ordinary and reasonable care. Reem v. St. Paul City R. Co., 77 Minn. 503, 80 N. W. 638, 778;

c. Liability as Affected by Means of Transportation — (i) Railroads and Steam Vessels. So large a proportion of the transportation of passengers is by means of railroads operated by steam that the general rules of liability as developed in the decided cases have reference to such carriage, and no particular discussion of the cases further than that given in the preceding paragraphs is necessary. Undoubtedly the same rules govern the liability of carriers operating steam vessels.[39] In the operation of freight trains, however, somewhat greater peril is involved to passengers riding thereon than is involved in the operation of passenger trains.[40] Nevertheless, the rule of liability, that is, the requirement as to the exercise of a high degree of care and foresight, is the same. The passenger by assuming to ride by this means of conveyance does not relieve the carrier from the obligation to exercise great care for his safety.[41] And a passenger properly

The obligation to exercise the highest degree of care which human prudence and foresight can suggest only exists with respect to those results which are naturally to be apprehended from unsafe road-beds, defective machinery, imperfect cars, and other conditions endangering the success of the undertaking. In every case the degree of care to be exercised is dependent upon circumstances, and the carrier is only liable for the consequences of the negligence of the servant where the latter fails to use that skill and care which would be required of an ordinarily careful and prudent man. So drovers, or persons accompanying cattle on freight trains, being passengers, are entitled to have the same degree of care exer-

allowed to ride in a place of danger is entitled to that degree of care which corresponds to the danger to which he is exposed.[42]

(II) Stage-Coaches. The principles governing the liability of passenger carriers seem first to have been laid down in stage-coach cases, and it was early settled that the owner of a stage-coach is not an insurer of the safety of his passengers, and is liable only in case of negligence.[43] But the carrier by stage-coach is bound to exercise the greatest care and diligence, and is liable for the slightest negligence of himself or his servants.[44]

(III) Street-Cars of Various Kinds. A carrier by street-car is liable only for negligence.[45] And in some cases language has been used with reference to transportation of passengers in this manner, indicating that reasonable care and diligence is all that is necessary to relieve the carrier from liability for injuries happening to the passenger in the course of transportation;[46] but in most of the cases the general rule of liability is laid down, as in other cases discussed in the preceding paragraphs, to the effect that the highest care and diligence is required to be exercised by the carrier for the safety of the passenger.[47] And these rules

(iv) Ferries. One operating a ferry for the purpose of transporting passengers is a common carrier of passengers, and must use the highest degree of vigilance and caution in protecting the passenger against danger.[51]

e. Care as to Premises, Machinery, and Appliances. While the duty to exercise the highest care and diligence in providing safe machinery is fully recognized, and any negligence of the carrier or his servants or employees in manufacturing or providing such machinery will render the carrier liable,[57] yet, as the carrier is not necessarily a manufacturer of the machinery which he uses, if he uses the proper care in the purchase and inspection of machinery employed, buying from competent and reputable manufacturers, and carefully inspecting and testing, so far as practicable, he will not be liable for injuries resulting from hidden defects which he could not have discovered and provided against in the exercise of due care and diligence.[58]

2. Negligence or Wrongs of Servants — a. Who Are Servants. There is in general no difficulty in determining who are servants or employees of the carrier in such sense as to render him liable for their negligence or wrongful acts, the question which has usually arisen being as to whether the wrong of the servant or employee was within the scope of his authority so as to render his principal liable for injuries resulting therefrom.[59] However, the question as to whether the person whose wrong caused the injury was the servant of the carrier has arisen in determining the liability of railroad companies for the negligence or wrongful acts of porters on sleeping-cars, owned and controlled by an independent company, but used by the railroad company as a part of its train, and it has been held that inasmuch as the servants of the railroad company have entire control of the trains, and are engaged in the transportation of the passenger under contract with him, although he may be availing himself of the conveniences and additional accommodations of the sleeping-car, such porters are to be deemed servants of the railroad company so far as the passenger is concerned.[60] Postal clerks engaged in the mail service on railroads are not to be deemed employees of the railroad company so as to render the company liable for their negligence causing injury to a passenger.[61] With reference to the liability of a carrier who contracts for through transportation over connecting lines, it is held that the contracting carrier is liable for the negligence or wrongful acts of the servants of the connecting carrier in carrying out the transportation contracted for.[62] So where railroad companies are in the joint use and occupation of stations or tracks, a passenger of one company may recover against that company for injuries due to the negligence or fault of the employees of another company using the same station or tracks.[63]

b. Negligence or Wrongs of Servants in General; Scope of Employment. Modification of rule.— This general rule is subject to the modification that as the carrier owes protection to his passengers he will be liable for injuries to the passenger from assaults or other wrongs committed by his servants, whose duty it is to afford such protection to the passenger, even though the wrong itself was not within the scope of the servant's employment, and was done for his own purposes and not in the discharge of any who are suffering from some infirmity or disability.[66] And certainly this is true if the servants of the carrier have no knowledge or reason to believe that the passenger is laboring under a disability.[67] But the servants are presumed to know that persons in feeble health may be passengers, and if such persons are injured by negligence in operating the train, they are entitled to recover, even though the injury would not have happened to a person in sound health.[68] If the passenger is suffering from some sickness or disability which is known to the servants of the carrier, the care required as to him may be greater than that required as to an ordinary passenger. While a railway company is not bound to accept for transportation without an attendant one who, because of physical or mental disability, is unable to take care of himself, yet, if its servants do voluntarily accept such a person, unattended, they should render to him such special care and assistance as his condition requires in order that he may be safely transported.[69] And the same principle applies to persons who are known to be partially or entirely helpless on account of intoxication[70] or physical disability.[71] Those who are lame or otherwise infirm should be allowed a longer time, if necessary, in which to get on board or depart from the car.[72] While the duty of the carrier to all passengers is the same in degree, the amount of care may vary with the age, sex, or bodily infirmity of the passenger.[73] Where a passenger becomes ill in transit, to the knowledge of the servants of the carrier, it is their duty to furnish such care and attention as is consistent with the safe conduct of the business and the comfort of other passengers.[74]

(II) Duty to Warn as to Danger. The carrier owes to the passenger the duty of protection during transportation in order that, while on the carrier's premises and in his vehicles, they may enjoy comfort, peace, and safety. This duty of care involves warning of danger so far as such warning might enable the passenger to protect himself against an injury which might be anticipated in the exercise of a high degree of care and foresight, and the carrier will be liable for an injury which might have been avoided if due warning had been given,[75] and also for injury resulting in the reasonable efforts of the passenger to avoid supposed danger, where the warning is improperly given.[76]

(III) Duty Not to Assault. The duty of the carrier to protect the passenger must be discharged by means of his servants engaged in carrying out the transportation contracted for.[77] Therefore, if any servant of the carrier while thus engaged assaults a passenger, or otherwise infringes the right of protection to which he is entitled, the carrier is liable, irrespective of whether the servant in the thing done was acting for his master or for his own purposes.[78] Of course, it may be that the passenger has ceased to be passenger by the termination of his journey and his departure from the train, or the servant has ceased to be servant for the time being by reason of having no further duty to discharge to his employer in the premises, so that the assault may be said to be outside of the scope of the servant's employment.[79] But so long as the passenger is being transported, or is on the carrier's premises legitimately in connection with such transportation,[80] and the servant is there employed about the business of the carrier in his relation to the passenger, the duty of protection exists. Therefore the carrier is liable for assault upon a passenger by the conductor in charge of the train or car in which the passenger is riding, whether the assault is in the supposed interest of and discharge of a supposed duty to the carrier, or is made as the result of personal malice or desire for revenge for an affront.[81] Likewise a brakeman upon a train, in connection with his employment, is bound to discharge the duty of protecting the passenger, and if he makes an assault upon the passenger, although not in connection with the discharge of any particular duty as brakeman, but for his own ends, the carrier will be liable.[82] The same principle extends to the conduct of other servants who have, in the discharge of their duties, any connection with the passenger, such as the porter,[83] any member of the train crew,[84] a gate-man,[85] a station agent,[86] or a guard[87] of a railroad company, the driver of a street-car,[88] or the master,[89] mate,[90] deck hands,[91] or waiters [92] of a steamboat. The duty of the carrier toward the passenger also extends to the protection of females from insulting remarks, indecent assaults, or improper liberties.[93] But mere rudeness of language or brusqueness of behavior on the part of the servant will not be such an injury to the passenger as to entitle him to recover damages.[94] Of course, if the servant of the carrier acts only in justifiable self-defense as against an assault by the passenger, the carrier will not be liable;[95] but no provocation, consisting in mere insulting language, will excuse an assault,[96] nor will the fact that the passenger is refusing to comply with a regulation of the carrier justify the servant in using violence not proper nor necessary for the enforcement of the regulation.[97]

(iv) Protection of Passengers Against Injuries From Fellow Passengers. While the relation of the passenger to the carrier is not such as to render the carrier liable directly for an assault or other injury committed by the passenger upon a fellow passenger, yet it is the duty of the servants of the carrier to exercise great care and vigilance in preserving order and guarding passengers from violence or insult threatened by fellow passengers, and this duty may involve the coöperation of the servants of the carrier and the invoking of the assistance of other passengers in removing from the train a disorderly passenger.[98] Thus, where disorder is threatened by reason of race antipathy, it is the duty of the carrier's servants to remove from the train passengers whose conduct indicates danger from them to other passengers.[99] Where a passenger is insane, and by reason of that condition, although arising during transportation, injury to fellow passengers is threatened, it is the duty of the servants of the carrier to refuse to carry him further than necessary to place him in charge of an officer and use all reasonable care to prevent injury to passengers in the meantime, and this duty arises not merely from the probability, but from the reasonable possibility known to the carrier's servants that such injury will result.[1] The liability of the carrier in such cases depends on failure to use care after the danger is reasonably apparent.[2] Thus, where a passenger inadvertently threw a lighted match on the clothing of another passenger, causing the latter to be severely burnt, it was held that there was no liability on the part of the carrier, his servants having used every reasonable effort after the danger became apparent to prevent injury.[3] And there is no liability of the carrier for injuries to a passenger resulting from the ignition or explosion of inflammable material carried by a passenger, if, in the exercise of a high degree of prudence and foresight, such as would be exercised by a very cautious, prudent, and competent person under similar circumstances, the danger could not have been avoided.[4] So injury to a passenger from the negligent handling of a fire-arm by a fellow passenger has been held not to impose a liability where the carrier's servants had no reason to anticipate the accident.[5]

(v) Protection Against Wrongs of Outsiders. The carrier owes to the passenger the duty of protecting him from injury by strangers or intruders upon his cars or premises, if the danger was, or could in the exercise of care have been, known to the servants of the carrier and prevented by them.[6] So the carrier may be liable for the robbery of a passenger by strangers, if it could have been prevented by those in charge of the conveyance,[7] and may be liable for injuries to a passenger by a mob allowed to go upon the train with the purpose of injuring passengers, the intention of the mob being reasonably apparent, and it being within the power of the conductor to prevent it by not stopping the train where the threatening mob is gathered.[8] It is not the duty of a railroad company, however, to carry on its trains a police force sufficient to quell or oppose the entrance of unexpected mobs seeking to injure persons on the train;[9] and, in general, the carrier is not liable for the acts of third persons intruding into the waiting-rooms or upon the depot grounds, or within the cars, and causing injury to passengers, where the disorderly conduct which caused the injury could not have been anticipated.[10]

3. Liability of Carrier For Injuries to Passenger by Accident — a. Inevitable Accidents. The rules developed in connection with liability of carriers of goods with reference to loss due to act of God or the public enemy[11] have no application to carriers of passengers, inasmuch as the carrier of passengers is liable only for negligence,[12] and it matters not therefore whether the injury is due to natural cause or overwhelming force, or to the wrongs or faults of third persons, unless the carrier is in some way guilty of negligence with respect thereto. And it is of course true that if the accident resulting in injuries is due to natural causes, and is inevitable, that is, could not have been avoided in the exercise of that high degree of care which the carrier is bound to exercise for the safety of the passenger, the carrier will not be liable.[13] But on the other hand if, in the exercise of the high degree of care and foresight required of carriers of passengers, the cause of the accident could have been foreseen and the result thereof avoided, the carrier will be liable.[14] The negligence of the carrier in such case, however, must be proximate and not remote as connected with the accident.[15]

b. Care Required as to Safety of Premises — (i) Reasonable Care Required. A passenger by railroad is entitled to protection against danger at the station-house or waiting-room, on the platform, and in getting upon or alighting from the train, but the peculiar hazard of railway travel, requiring high speed by the use of the dangerous agency of steam,[16] is not involved on the premises of the railroad company, or while getting on or off trains, and therefore in these respects the care required for the protection of the passenger is reasonable, rather than the highest, or extraordinary, care.[17] And the rule is stated to be that, with reference to stations, platforms, approaches, and the like, the carrier is liable for any injury to the passenger resulting from failure to maintain them in a reasonably safe condition.[18]

(II) Safe Approaches; Ingress and Egress. In general the requirement is that the carrier shall use reasonable care in furnishing safe approaches to the vehicle for passengers going on board of or leaving the same.[19] And this liability of the carrier is applicable with reference to approaches provided by others, but in general made use of by passengers, with the express or implied approval of the carrier.[20] Carriers by street-car, taking up and discharging passengers on a public street, are not responsible for defects in the street.[21] But the passenger should be warned of any special danger involved in his alighting at such place.[22] If safe approaches are provided, the carrier is not liable if the passenger approaches or leaves in any other way, which is dangerous.[23]

(III) Safety of Ingress and Egress at Unusual Place. If by custom the carrier recognizes a proper place for getting on board or alighting, which is not the usual place specially provided for that purpose, the duty to provide safe approaches exists, although it may not be necessary to provide the same means for approach that would be required at the usual place.[24] Whether

senger is injured by reason of the throwing of mail-pouches from postal cars in such a way as to involve danger to passengers, if it has permitted postal clerks carried on its trains to adopt an unsafe method of delivering such pouches.[33] Station-houses should be kept reasonably comfortable and decent, and a passenger suffering injury by reason of being unable to sit therein when he desires and it is proper for him to do so may have damages for injury suffered.[34]

(VI) To Whom Carrier Liable For Unsafe Premises. Liability for injuries resulting from unsafe station-houses, platforms, and the like, is not limited, however, to those who are entitled to be considered passengers. Any one having business with the carrier, and coming upon the premises, does so with an implied invitation, imposing upon the carrier the same duty as that of any person conducting a place of business where others are invited to come, that is, the duty of using reasonable care to make the premises safe, and the corresponding liability for injuries resulting from negligence in doing so.[35] Moreover, the usual method of conducting the business of carriage of passengers involves the presence of persons on the premises who are not, and do not intend to become, passengers, but are there for the purpose of accompanying passengers to the trains or other conveyances, or meeting them when they arrive.[36] One leaving the station in the usual way and in a reasonable manner is entitled to the protection of a passenger until he has left the premises,[37] but after voluntarily leaving a passenger train at an unusual place,[38] or reaching the street on alighting from a street-car,[39] the lia-

c. Care Required in Connection With Getting on Board Of, or Alighting From, Car or Other Conveyance — (1) Degree of Care; Assistance. The carrier is bound to exercise care in securing the safety of the passenger while boarding and alighting from its cars or other conveyances,[41] and the degree of care required in the discharge of this duty is the highest care, or the care which a very prudent person would have used under the circumstances,[42] that is, that high degree of care which is required with reference to the transportation of passengers.[43] But in general there is no duty to instruct or warn passengers, it being the duty of the passenger to comply with the usual reasonable and known regulations of the carrier with reference to safe entrance and exit.[44] Nor in general is there any duty to assist a passenger in entering or alighting from the train or other conveyance,[45] unless there is some unusual danger or difficulty arising from the place or means afforded for alighting,[46] or the passenger is, to the knowledge of the servants of the carrier, infirm or under some disability.[47] But if assistance is rendered, even where it is not necessary, the carrier will be liable for any negligence of its servants connected with the rendering of such assistance[48] or providing appliances, such as a box or stool, to facilitate the alighting of the passenger.[49]

(II) Opportunity and Time For Getting on Board. The passenger is entitled to a reasonable time in which to get on board a train after he is given an opportunity to do so,[50] and if, without allowing such reasonable time, the train is started and the passenger is injured, the railroad company is liable.[51]

(III) Reasonable Time For Alighting. With reference to the safety of the passenger in alighting at his destination, it is the duty of the railroad company to stop its train at the passenger's destination a sufficient length of time to enable him to alight with safety before the train is again moved, and failure in this respect will render the carrier liable for any injury resulting to the passenger.[52] It is not necessary that the train be held without moving until the passenger has had time to leave the platform. It is enough if he has had a reasonable opportunity to get beyond danger from the movement of the cars.[53]

(iv) Special Circumstances. The time to be allowed a passenger for getting on board a train, or for alighting therefrom, may depend on the special circumstances of the passenger as to his physical ability, his encumbrance with luggage, the existence of a crowd on the car or platform, and the like. It is the duty of the carrier to give a reasonable time under the circumstances as they exist and are known to, or should be known to, the servants in charge of the train.[54] After a time which is reasonable under the circumstances the car or train may be moved without notice or warning,[55] unless within the reasonable knowledge of the servants in charge such movement will endanger the safety of someone who is getting on or off.[56] The train may be started after a passenger has got on board the car, and before he has reached a seat,[57] unless there is some reason to apprehend danger in so doing, or the movement is in a negligent manner.[58] No signal or warning as to the starting of the train is necessary after a sufficient stop,[59] unless a passenger has been misled as to the time when the train will start, or there are other special circumstances rendering a signal or warning reasonably necessary.[60]

for the starting of the train are applicable where the train is stopped for taking on or discharging passengers at other than its regular stopping place.[61] If the train is stopped, not for the purpose of allowing passengers to get on board or alight, care must be taken to avoid injury to passengers who may be misled as to the place of stoppage being the proper one for those purposes.[62] With reference to this matter it is important to know whether there has been an express or implied invitation to the passenger to get on board or alight at such place, and if such invitation has been given, the duty is involved of using care with reference to passengers who attempt to comply with the invitation.[63] Where the passenger is attempting to get on board or alight in pursuance of an express or implied invitation, it is the duty of the carrier to bring the train to a full stop in order to enable him to do so in safety,[64] and if, by increasing the speed of the train before it has come to a full stop, the passenger is injured, he may recover for the injury caused thereby.[65] It is in general negligent on the part of the servants in charge of a train to induce passengers to get off while it is in motion.[66]

(VI) CARE REQUIRED AS TO PERSONS NOT PASSENGERS. A carrier owes a duty to persons who come upon a train accompanying passengers, with the intention of getting off before the train starts, or for the purpose of meeting passengers who are about to alight.[67] And especially is there such a duty where a passenger requires assistance which the servants of the carrier do not undertake to render.[68] But if the servants of the carrier have no notice or knowledge of the intention of one thus coming on board to get off before the starting of the train, they owe him no additional duty as to affording him an opportunity to safely alight.[69]

(VII) STREET-CAR CASES. While the general rules applicable to taking up and setting down passengers, which have already been considered mainly with reference to steam-cars, are applicable to street-cars, yet some difference in the methods of operating street-cars may necessitate variations in their application, and it will be proper to restate some of these rules in the light of street-car cases. It is the duty of the carrier by street-car to stop the car for the purpose of taking on or letting off passengers,[70] and if the car is started up again before it has fully stopped, the carrier will be liable for injury to the passenger resulting therefrom, if the passenger has reason to think that the slowing up was for the purpose of enabling him to get on board or to alight.[71] The time of stoppage must be such as to enable the passenger attempting to get on or off to reach a place of safety, either on the street or in the car, before it is started.[72] Before starting the car after a stop for the purpose of letting a passenger on or off, the servants in charge of the car should see that all passengers attempting to get on or off have reached a place of safety.[73] In general a carrier will be liable for injuries to any passenger attempting to get on or off by reason of the car being started after a stoppage for receiving or discharging passengers without allowing a reasonable time for the purpose.[74] Perhaps it may be true as a general propo-

(III) Latent Defects. The duty of the carrier as to furnishing machinery and appliances originally safe, suitable, and adequate, is discharged by a purchase thereof from a reputable manufacturer and inspection to detect defects discoverable by any tests which the highest care and prudence can suggest. The carrier does not warrant the safety and perfection of his machinery and appliances, but undertakes to exercise the highest care with reference to their safety.[81]

(IV) Well-Known and Approved Machinery and Appliances. The exercise of the highest degree of care does not, however, require that machinery and appliances which are absolutely the safest shall be used, without regard to the practical nature and exigencies of the business. The duty is to make use of well-known and approved appliances for the safety of passengers so far as is reasonably consistent with the carrying on of the business and the discharge of the duty which the carrier owes to the public.[82]

common carriers of passengers, owe the same duty to those who by invitation, express or implied, are transported in the cars of such elevators, to exercise the highest care, in view of the character of the mode of conveyance adopted, as to the safety of the car and appliances.[92]

e. Care in Management and Operation — (I) In General. The same high degree of care, diligence, and foresight which is required as to providing machinery and appliances is also required as to the operation of the machinery by which the transportation is carried out.[93] And this degree of care is usually required as to the operation of passenger elevators.[94]

(II) Providing For Safety and Comfort of Passengers on Trains. Proper appliances for the protection of the passenger, such as gates on platforms and the like, must be so used as that they shall afford the protection intended.[95] Passengers should not be encouraged or required, by reason of failure to furnish them other accommodations, to ride in dangerous places, such as on the platforms or steps of railway or street-cars.[96] And if fare is collected from a passenger riding in such position, it is the duty of the carrier to exercise the proper degree of care for him with reference to his dangerous position,[97] and as to persons of immature years, it is negligence to permit them to ride in such positions.[98] The servants in charge of the train or car should notify passengers of any danger which may be apprehended or foreseen with reference to the place of riding, or any other peril to which they are subjected.[99] But it may be negligence to

(v) Liability For Collisions. Collisions between trains or cars, or between cars and passing vehicles on a street, being one of the most common forms of danger to which passengers are subjected in transportation, the carrier must exercise the highest degree of care and foresight in avoiding them.[8] This duty is especially imperative when a train or a car is approaching a railroad or a street-car crossing.[9] The fact that those operating the train or car on the crossing track are negligent will not relieve the carrier of the passenger from liability for injury to him if his servants might, in the exercise of the highest degree of care and precaution, have avoided the collision.[10]

(vi) Dangerous Speed. The rate of speed at which a train or car is run may be dangerous in view of the circumstances or conditions under which it is operated, or because the particular place is such as to require precautions in that respect.[11]

(vii) Jerks and Jars. It may constitute negligence that the train or car is so operated as that, by jerking or jarring, passengers are imperiled who are properly conducting themselves with reference to their transportation, even though they may be standing or moving for the purpose of getting off the conveyance.

4. Actions For Personal Injuries — a. Form of Action. While the action against a carrier for wrong resulting in personal injury is usually brought in tort the action may be in assumpsit for breach of the common-law duty to carry safely.[18]

b. Pleading — (I) Allegations Showing Relation of Carrier and Passenger. It is essential in the petition or complaint in an action founded on breach of duty by defendant as carrier of passengers that it be made to appear by proper averment that the relation of carrier and passenger existed at the time the injury was received,[19] and therefore there should be such allegation as to indicate that defendant was a carrier of passengers.[20] But if defendant is a railroad company, the fact that it is a carrier of passengers will be presumed.[21] It must also be alleged in some form that plaintiff was a passenger,[22] and it is usual to charge that the undertaking to carry plaintiff was for hire.[23] It is not necessary to allege that plaintiff had paid for his transportation, as the obligation to pay is inferred.[24]

must be stated in what the negligence complained of consisted,[25] yet, on the other hand, the particular facts need not be averred, and in most states it is sufficient to say in a general way that defendant was negligent as to the machinery or appliances used, or in failing to construct or maintain the track in a safe condition, or in the operation of the train, conveyance, or the like.[26] An allegation of negligence of a servant is sufficient to charge the carrier with negligence, and it is not necessary to specifically charge that the acts of the servant were within the scope of his employment, if that fact appears in a general way from the allegation that the servant was acting for the carrier in the matter as to which negligence is alleged.[27] In actions for injuries received by a passenger by reason of assaults, or other wrongful acts on the part of an employee or fellow passenger, which the servants of the carrier should have prevented, the allegation may properly be of negligence and misconduct on the part of the carrier with respect thereto.[28] In any case it must be made to appear that the injury complained of was in some way the proximate result of the negligence or wrongful act on the part of the carrier or his servants.[29]

sary in the petition or complaint to expressly negative any fault or contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff.[30] But in most of the states it is held sufficient to so allege the facts as to indicate that the injury was the result of the fault or negligence of defendant, without expressly averring plaintiff's freedom from contribution thereto.[31]

c. Evidence — (i) In General. Plaintiff must prove the essential elements of his cause of action, such as that the relation of carrier and passenger existed, that there was a wrong on the part of the carrier or his servants in the discharge of the duties growing out of this relation, and that injury to plaintiff resulted therefrom which was proximate to the wrong done. For instance, plaintiff must prove that he was a passenger, and as such rightfully being transported at the time of the accident.[32]

(ii) Happening of Accident as Presumptive Evidence of Negligence — (a) Statement of Rule. The maxim, res ipsa loquitur, which is recognized to some extent in the proof of negligence in general, is of peculiar application in actions against carriers of passengers, and it is sometimes said that the happening of an accident to the passenger, at least where it appears to have occurred without fault on his part, gives rise to the presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier, so that the passenger makes out a prima facie right to recover for personal injuries received during transportation by proof that he was at the time of receiving the injury a passenger, that an accident occurred, and that his injury resulted therefrom.[33] But this is too broad a statement. The carrier is not an insurer against injuries to the passenger,[34] and there is no implied contract that the passenger shall be transported safely. His right of action for injuries is based on negligence, and the burden of proof of negligence is on plaintiff. Therefore the mere proof of an injury to the passenger in course of transportation, which, so far as it is shown, might have occurred by reason of other cause than the carrier's negligence, such as the act of the passenger himself, or without fault of any one, will not make out a prima facie case.[35] So also if it appears that the accident might have been the result of the wrongful acts or negligence of third persons,[36] or of causes not due to human agency,[37] a prima facie case is not made out. It is very generally said, however, that proof of the happening

proximate cause of the injury,[48] and if there were other possible causes, the question is whether the negligent construction, maintenance or operation of the premises, road-bed, machinery, or appliances was the efficient and dominant cause producing the injury.[49] If the carrier or his servants were negligent in any of these respects, and the injury resulted mediately or immediately from such negligence, then the carrier is liable, although there may have been an intervening accidental cause not chargeable to the carrier's fault, the question being one for the jury.[50] But if, on the other hand, though the carrier is negligent, there is an intervening independent cause for the injury, not the result of the carrier's negligence, the carrier is not liable.[51] Thus, where the passenger is not given reasonable opportunity to alight, but is carried past his destination or the proper place for alighting, the carrier will not be liable for injury suffered by the passenger after alighting without injury, if the subsequent injury is not such as could have been anticipated as the result of being carried beyond the place for alighting, and is not in itself due to any fault of the carrier.[52] It is not necessary, however, that the negligence of the carrier be the sole cause of the resulting injury. Even though there is an accompanying cause not chargeable to the carrier, yet if the carrier's negligence contributes to the injury he is liable therefor.[53] Therefore it is immaterial that in connection with the accident causing injury to the passenger there is negligence or wrongful act of a third person, such as the negligence of those managing a train, car, or vehicle with which the train or car in which the passenger is riding collides, or the like. It is enough that the negligence of the carrier contributes in some way or concurs with the negligence of third persons in causing the accident complained of.[54] In such cases the carrier and the third person whose negligence has concurred with that of the carrier in causing the injury may be sued jointly or separately therefor.[55] Where physical or mental suffering follows as a natural consequence on the injury received by the passenger from the carrier's negligence, recovery therefor may be had in an action against the carrier.[56]

where there is wilful misconduct or reckless indifference on the part of the servants affecting the safety of the traveling public in general, and not merely the safety of a particular passenger,[58] yet, by the great weight of authority, the carrier, even though a corporation, is liable for injury to a passenger due to gross neglect of duty on the part of its servants,[59] or for the consequences of their wanton and reckless conduct.[60] Thus, the carrier may be liable in exemplary damages for wanton misconduct or gross negligence of his servants in assaulting a passenger, or failing to protect him from assault by fellow passengers or others.[61]

G. Passenger's Contributory Negligence — 1. Will Defeat Recovery — a. General Rule; Ordinary Care. The rule already stated[62] that the carrier will be liable for injuries to which his negligence contributes, although it is not the sole cause, has an exception in the well-established rule applicable in other branches of the law of negligence, that the injured person cannot recover if his own negligence has in any way contributed to his injury, even though there has also been negligence on the part of the carrier. Therefore, in an action by a passenger against the carrier for personal injuries, contributory negligence of the passenger in respect to the injury, and proximately connected with it, will defeat recovery.[63] In a few states the doctrine of comparative negligence as between plaintiff and defendant is recognized, and it is said that negligence of the passenger which is only slight as compared with that of the carrier will not defeat recovery.[64] But these cases are exceptional, and the inquiry is usually directed not to any comparison between the negligence of the passenger and that of the carrier with respect to the injury, but solely to the question whether the passenger has exercised ordinary care. If it appears that there has been a want of such care on the passenger's part, contributing to the injury suffered, he cannot recover.[65]

b. Persons Under Disability — (1) In General. What will constitute failure to exercise ordinary care on the part of the passenger may depend, however, on the mental and physical capacity of the passenger himself, and acts which might be negligent in a normal person may not be contributory negligence in view of the passenger's disability, such as will defeat his recovery for injury where the carrier has been negligent.[66]

Intoxication is not contributory negligence

(11) Children. The same care, discretion, and foresight cannot be required of a child of immature years as of an ordinary adult, and all that can be required is such care and judgment as may reasonably be expected of a child of the same age and mental development as the one in question.[67]

c. Acts in Case of Emergency. In determining whether the passenger has exercised ordinary care to avoid the injury which he has received as a result of the carrier's negligence, it sometimes becomes a question whether he has been negligent in doing an act which would in itself have been presumptively negligent, but under circumstances which it is claimed justified it in the attempt to escape a threatened injury, such as a collision, and the rule is well established that if the passenger acts as a reasonably prudent person would have done in view of the danger as it appeared to him, he is not guilty of contributory negligence so as to bar his right of recovery against the carrier, although, if he had not acted thus in the attempt to avoid injury, he would have been safe.[68] The same rule is per se, and will defeat recovery only where it has contributed to the injury.

d. Violation of Regulations or Directions; Reliance on Persons in Charge. It will in general constitute negligence on the part of the passenger to violate the regulations made by the carrier with reference to the safety of passengers, and for an injury resulting from such violation he cannot recover.[70] But the passenger may properly rely upon the directions of the persons in charge of the conveyance as to what will be safe conduct.[71] Thus, while it is usually in violation of rule to ride on the platform of a railway train or street-car, yet if this is by the express or implied direction or consent of the persons in charge of the train or car it will not be imputed to the passenger as negligence.[72] But if the act is manifestly negligent, and in violation of rule, the consent of the persons in charge will be no excuse,[73] and it is so held as to riding on the engine.[74] On the other hand, the passenger should be guided by the directions of the persons in charge with reference to his own safety, and may be guilty of contributory negligence in failing to observe warnings or cautions thus given.[75] Another illustration of the same principle is furnished by cases with reference to injuries received by a passenger who attempts to get on board of or alight from a train while moving. Such an act is generally regarded as contrary to reasonable prudence,[76] but if it is done in response to the invitation or direction of the person in charge of the train the passenger is said to be thereby exonerated from fault.[77]

But this is not true if the act is manifestly, to the judgment of a reasonable person, imprudent, or contrary to the authority of the servant who gives the direction.[78] The mere advice or counsel of those in charge of the train as to getting on or off while the train is in motion will not be enough to excuse the passenger in doing a negligent or wrongful act.[79] Misdirection of persons in charge of a train as to the proper place for passengers to get off will render the carrier liable to one who, acting in reasonable reliance on the direction given, is injured.[80]

e. Proximate Cause. The negligence of the passenger must have some proximate connection with the injury suffered, or it will not defeat his recovery. Thus, his riding in an unsafe place, or violating some rule or direction of the carrier intended to secure his safety will not defeat his recovery if the injury suffered is not the result of his fault in so riding, that is, if it is such injury as would have been as likely to happen had he been in a proper place.[81]

f. Carrier's Duty to Protect Passenger Against His Own Negligence. The doctrine of the preceding section that contributory negligence to defeat recovery must be the proximate cause of the injury leads to a well-recognized rule that if the negligence of the passenger is known to the servants of the carrier, or in the exercise of proper care might have been known to them, and by the exercise of the degree of care required of carriers for the protection of their passengers the injury likely to result from such negligence might have been avoided, then the carrier is liable for the fault of his servants in not avoiding such injury, such fault being deemed the proximate cause thereof, while the negligence of the passenger becomes the remote cause.[82]

gence per se to attempt to get on board a train while moving;[88] while in other cases it is denied that such an attempt is under all circumstances in itself negligence.[89] Usually it is said that the question as to whether under the circumstances of the case the passenger was negligent in attempting to get on board a moving train is one of fact, and therefore to be determined by the jury, unless the facts are so unequivocal in their character as to make it proper for the court to determine the question.[90] Even though the carrier fails to stop the train in order for passengers to get on at the proper place, or does not stop it for a reasonable length of time, this will not in itself excuse the passenger in negligently attempting to get on the train while moving.[91] As to street-cars, the general doctrine that it indicates negligence to attempt to get on board while moving is not so strictly applied,[92] and it has been announced in a great majority of cases in which the subject has been passed on that it is not negligence per se to do so.[93]

More particularly it has been held not to be negligence in itself to attempt to board a street-car after it has been slowed up in response to the signal of one desiring to get on board, although it has not come to a full stop.[94] But in general the question is one of fact for the jury, to be determined under the circumstances of the case.[95] As to street-cars it has also been held that it is not negligence in itself to attempt to get on the front platform, although the rear platform is the usual place for mounting.[96] With reference both to steam and street-cars it has also been said that it is not negligence per se to attempt to get on board at a place other than a regular stopping place, the question being one of fact under the circumstances.[97]

assume care on the part of the carrier's servants in stopping.[99] In alighting from the platform the passenger should exercise reasonable care in taking hold of railings or other supports, and in stepping off in the proper direction and manner, and failure to use reasonable precautions in these respects may constitute contributory negligence.[1]

(II) Dangers on Station Platform; Safe Exit. The passenger must exercise reasonable care to avoid danger on or about the platform or other place for alighting, but he has the right to assume that a place which is safe from hidden dangers is provided, and will not be guilty of contributory negligence in acting on that assumption.[2] He is justified in the same assumption with reference to the usual exit from the train or station, but may be negligent in taking a way which is not the usual one, or one indicated by the carrier in some way as proper.[3]

(III) Improper Place. The passenger should obey the reasonable rules of the carrier as to the place for alighting, and if one place rather than another is indicated he should alight at that place. Thus, it may be negligent to get off at the wrong side of the car where there are conveniences offered for the alighting of the passenger at one side of the car and not at the other, and if this is contrary to the regulation or plain intent of the carrier, or manifestly dangerous, it will constitute contributory negligence.[4] But in general, unless there is some indication that only one side is a safe place to alight, the passenger may alight at either.[5] So also there may be regulations requiring passengers to get off at the rear platform, so as to render it negligent to get off at the front platform, defeating recovery for any injury resulting therefrom.[6] It is not, however, as a rule negligence per se to get off at the front platform, either in case of railroad cars[7] or street-cars.[8] Whether it constitutes negligence on the part of the passenger to get off the train at any other place than the usual and recognized place for passengers to alight will depend largely on whether there has been an invitation, express or implied, to alight at the unusual place, for the carrier will be expected to provide for the safety of the passenger in alighting at a place where it is intended he shall alight, and not elsewhere.[9] To alight, therefore, at a place which is in fact dangerous, and without express or implied invitation, may be contributory negligence,[10] while, although the place may be dangerous, if it is indicated by the carrier in any way as a proper place for alighting, then the question of whether the passenger used proper precautions is one of fact.[11]

that to attempt to get off while the car is in motion, without any effort to cause a stoppage or slowing up of the car, is negligence per se;[15] but whether it is negligence to attempt to alight before the car has come to a full stop will depend on the circumstances, and no general rule can be laid down.[16] If the car has failed to stop or slow up on the signal of the passenger indicating his desire to alight, he is not justified in attempting to get off while it is in rapid motion.[17] But if the speed of the car is reduced in apparent response to the passenger's signal, it is not necessarily negligent to attempt to alight before it has come to a full stop.[18] In general with reference to either steam or street-cars it may be said that the fact that the train or car is not stopped at the proper place, or not stopped long enough to enable the passenger to alight, will be no excuse for his incurring danger in attempting to get off,[19] while on the other hand, if the speed has been checked so as to indicate an intention that he shall alight, or so as to render it practicable nor usual in the course of the business to require passengers to remain in a seat without moving from the beginning to the end of the transit, it is properly a question of fact whether under the circumstances the passenger was negligent in standing in the car while in motion.[23] At any rate when the car is crowded so that passengers cannot all be accommodated with seats it is not negligent for a passenger to stand, taking proper precautions in doing so.[24] The same principle applies to moving from one part of the car to another while in motion.[25] It is suggested in some cases that it is negligent for a passenger to go from one car to another while in transit, thus subjecting himself to danger not incident to continuing in the car which he first entered.[26] But even this may be justified under some circumstances, and the question is for the jury as one of fact.[27]

(III) Projection of Body or Member Beyond Side of Car. It is generally said that it is negligence for a passenger in a steam car to protrude his arm or head through a window so as to come in contact with objects or obstacles near the track.[28] It is not negligence for the passenger to sit with his elbow on the window sill, the window being open, although by reason of some sudden jolt

or jar his arm is thrown outside and he is injured.[29] As to street-cars there is less strictness in the rule with reference to the elbow or arm projecting, or holding on to the posts of an open car, or the like.[30] But it may be negligent for a passenger in either a railway or street-car to stand on the side of the car or on the platform and swing his body out so as to come in contact with obstacles.[31]

is being transported as a passenger, such as a drover on a freight train accompanying cattle, to ride in a more hazardous place than that provided for the transportation of passengers, and the assumption of any necessary hazard of this kind will not be contributory negligence.[33] To ride in a car not intended for passengers, such as a baggage, mail, or express car, and without the consent of the carrier's servants, is usually considered negligence per se so far as to absolutely defeat recovery for injuries which would not have been sustained had the passenger been in a proper place.[34] It is usually for the jury to say whether the injury is the proximate result of riding in such car.[35]

(II) Riding on Car Platform or Steps. To ride on the platform of a railroad car while the train is in rapid motion is usually treated as negligence per se, such as to defeat recovery for injuries received by reason of riding in such position;[36] but there are cases in which such an act is said not to be negligence

By statute in some states passengers are prohibited from riding on the platform if suitable accommodations are available inside the car, and of course a violation of the statute constitutes contributory negligence.

per se, even where there is no particular excuse for it.[37] And where the car is so crowded that there is no reasonable accommodation inside, the act of riding on the platform is treated as not negligent.[38] As therefore the question of the propriety of riding on the platform depends on circumstances, it is properly for the jury.[39] As to street-cars, the rule as to riding on the platform is more liberal, and it is generally said not to be negligence per se to do so.[40] And it is said not to be negligence per se in such cases, even though the passenger fails to hold on to railings or other convenient supports.[41] But under the circumstances failure to hold on may constitute such negligence as to defeat recovery for resulting injury.[42] In many cases, however, it is said to be negligent to ride on the platform or steps of a street-car in rapid motion, unless the crowded condition of the car makes it necessary.[43] In general the question of negligence in riding on the platform of a street-car is one of fact.[44] The rule applicable to platforms and steps of ordinary street-cars is also applicable to the running-board or step at the side of an open car, and it is said in some cases to be negligence per se to ride in such position without the excuse that there is no room in the car,[45] while, if the car is crowded, it is not negligence per se to ride on the running-board.[46] This question, also, is usually left to the jury.[47]

5. Pleading and Proof. As already stated,[48] the rule in some states is that plaintiff must aver freedom from contributory negligence, while in others such negligence is to be pleaded by defendant to defeat plaintiff's recovery. There is a corresponding difference as to the burden of proof, in some states the rule being that the burden of showing freedom from fault or negligence on his part is upon plaintiff,[49] while in others the burden of showing such fact as a defense is upon defendant.[50] Where contributory negligence is treated as a defense it should be specially averred,[51] but if the burden with reference thereto is regarded as resting upon plaintiff, then defendant may introduce evidence of contributory negligence under a general denial.[52]

H. Transportation in Sleeping or Palace Cars — 1. Public Duty.[53] While the companies operating palace or sleeping-cars attached to railway trains, but under a separate management, perform only an auxiliary function in the transportation of passengers, they are nevertheless engaged in a public calling by virtue of which they are under obligation to accommodate without discrimination all persons desiring their accommodations,[54] and refusal, without good excuse, to furnish accommodations to an unobjectionable person on the usual and reasonable terms is a breach of legal duty.[55]

2. Contract Duty.[56] One who has secured a berth by purchasing a ticket, or otherwise paying therefor, is entitled to the accommodation for which he has contracted, and may recover damages if they are not furnished.[57]

3. Regulations.[58] It is proper to require extra compensation for the special accommodations furnished in a sleeping-car, even though it is owned and operated by the railroad company,[59] and also proper to require the purchase and presentation of a sleeping-car ticket, showing what accommodations the passenger is entitled to,[60] and if the ticket is lost the passenger may be refused the accommodations for which he has paid.[61] Further, it may be required by the rules of the railway company that passengers shall not be allowed to have accommodations in the sleeping-car, unless they have a first-class railway ticket.[62]

4. Safety and Comfort of Passengers[63]— a. Care for Passenger's Safety. The same high degree of care for the personal safety of the passenger is required of sleeping-car companies as of railway companies.[64] But contributory negligence of the passenger will defeat recovery for injuries received, where such contributory negligence, rather than the fault of the company, occasions the injury.[65]

b. Care For Passenger's Comfort. As the sleeping-car company undertakes to furnish accommodations for the comfort of the passenger, it is under obligation to give him reasonably safe means for getting into and out of a berth, and to respond to his reasonable calls for attention.[66] The fact that the sleeping-car company assumes to furnish accommodations for the passenger while asleep involves the duty, which is not imposed on a railroad company with reference to ordinary passengers,[67] to awaken the occupant of a berth at night in reasonable time to enable him to get off at his destination.[68]

c. Liability For Wrongs of Servants—(i) In General. For the wrongful ejection of the passenger by the conductor the sleeping-car company is liable in tort for the injury resulting therefrom.[69] It is also liable, like any other carrier ticket for a berth has been sold, but the purchaser is refused the right to occupy it because it is already in possession of someone else he may recover damages suffered, and is not limited to recovering back the money paid. Braun v. Webb, 32 Misc. (N. Y.) 243, 65 N. Y. Suppl. 668.

of passengers, for wrongful assaults upon a passenger by a servant in charge of the car, such as the porter.[70]

(II) Respective Liability of Sleeping-Car and Railroad Company For Wrongs of Servants of the Other. The railroad company is liable to a passenger for wrongful acts or negligence of the servants in charge of a sleeping-car, at least in the absence of any knowledge on the part of the passenger that the sleeping-car is under separate management.[71] On the other hand the sleeping-car company, not having undertaken the general duty of transporting the passenger, is not liable for the wrongful acts or negligence of the servants of the railroad company.[72]

d. Limitation of Liability. Contracts of a sleeping-car company, like those of any other carrier of passengers, for limitation of liability in case of negligence are invalid.[73]

5. Actions For Breach of Duty as to Passenger — a. Form of Action. Although the passenger may have a right of action on contract for breach of the express or implied undertaking of the sleeping-car company to furnish accommodations, the refusal of the company, without valid excuse, to permit a proper person to avail himself of the accommodations of the sleeping-car will support an action in tort.[74]

b. Damages.[75] For the wrong of the sleeping-car company through its servants in denying accommodations to a passenger, or failing reasonably to provide for his comfort, the company is liable to the extent of the injury resulting which could have been anticipated as the natural and probable result of such breach of duty.[76] And the company may also be liable in punitive damages if the injury is malicious or wilful.[77] But for damages which could not reasonably have been anticipated as a probable consequence of the wrong the passenger cannot recover.[78]

6. Liability as to Passenger's Luggage or Effects — a. For Negligence Only. A sleeping-car company does not accept the luggage and effects of its passengers as a bailee, nor does it undertake to maintain a place where accommodation is furnished for the safety of its patrons' property like an innkeeper, and therefore it does not assume the exceptional liability for goods which the law imposes upon common carriers of goods or innkeepers by reason of engaging in those public callings.[79] Its liability with reference to the luggage and effects of its patrons is analogous to that of a railway company carrying passengers in regard to the safety of the personal belongings and baggage which the passenger is allowed to take with him into the sleeping-car.[80] Therefore, while a sleeping-car company owes a duty to its passenger to protect his property, luggage, and effects[81] from loss or injury, it is not an insurer of the safety thereof, and is liable only for negligence.[82] Mere proof of loss of luggage which is taken by the passenger into a sleeping-car does not therefore make out either an absolute or prima facie case of liability against the company.[83] But the company does owe to the passenger the duty of protecting his luggage and effects by all reasonable means from loss or injury while in the sleeping-car.[84] This duty involves provisions for the safety of luggage by maintaining a strict and vigilant watch by a competent person, such as the porter, over the safety of the passenger's belongings while in the car,[85] and if there is a failure to discharge this duty by not providing a competent and efficient person[86] or by imposing on him duties which make it impracticable for him to furnish adequate protection, the sleeping-car company is liable for any loss which may reasonably be attributable to negligence in this respect.[87] For negligence of the servant in caring for property, the control of which is directly assumed by him for the time being, the sleeping-car company is liable.[88] Contributory negligence of the passenger will defeat his recovery.[89]

b. Limitation of Liability. As the liability of the sleeping-car company is for negligence only, such liability cannot be restricted by notice or special contract.[90]

c. Liability of the Railroad Company. As the luggage and effects of a passenger in a sleeping-car are under the control of the servants of the sleeping-car company, the railroad company is not liable for loss thereof.[91]

I. Liability For Baggage or Effects — 1. Luggage or Effects Retained in Passenger's Possession. As will appear hereafter,[93] a carrier of passengers may become the bailee of the baggage of the passenger so as to have, with reference to such baggage, the liability of a common carrier of goods, but the passenger has the right to retain in his possession and under his control, and to have carried as a part of the transaction, a reasonable quantity of personal baggage appropriate to the journey.[94] Even without delivery of the goods into the exclusive possession of the carrier there is a duty to furnish reasonable protection to the passenger against loss or injury of such property, such as the clothing which he wears, the valise and personal belongings contained therein, and the like. This right, however, to take personal belongings and other articles with him into the cars or other vehicles of conveyance is subject to reasonable regulation, not only as to what may be thus taken,[95] but also as to how far the carrier will be liable for articles retained by the passenger under his control.[96] The carrier's duty with reference to personal effects retained in the passenger's possession and control is to exercise reasonable care to protect such effects from loss or injury.[97] Within this rule carriers have been held not to be insurers but liable for loss of or injury to effects of passengers kept within their possession and control, and resulting from negligence, that is, failure on the part of the carrier or his servants to use reasonable care in the protection of the property.[98] But the rule of liability in such cases does not extend to large sums of money or other property of exceptional value retained by the passenger in his control, without the knowledge of the carrier,[99] nor does it enable the passenger to recover for personal effects lost while retained in his control, if the loss is due to his own negligence.[1] These general principles determine the liability of the carrier of passengers by boat or vessel with reference to baggage and personal effects taken by the passenger to his state-room, and thus retained within his control and not delivered into the possession of the carrier as bailee, and in such cases the carrier is only liable for failure to afford reasonable protection to the property of the passenger.[2] The same difficulty arises with reference to baggage taken by the passenger with him into his sleeping-car. The weight of authority is that the carrier of passengers in a sleeping-car is liable only for negligence in reference to such baggage.[3]

2. Carrier's Responsibility For Baggage as Bailee — a. Same as That of Carrier of Goods. As to personal baggage of the passenger, delivered to and taken possession of by the carrier, the liability of the latter is that of a common carrier of goods.[4] It is immaterial whether the baggage is carried on the same train with the passenger or not.[5] Carriers of passengers by stage-coach are com-

In New York there are cases holding that carriers of passengers by steamboat become liable as common carriers for baggage taken to the passenger's state-room as fully as though the baggage had been delivered into the possession and control of the carrier, and therefore without proof of negligence of the carrier. mon carriers, and therefore liable for loss of baggage as common carriers of goods.[6] As a part of the duty to transport the passenger it is the duty of the carrier, under reasonable limitations as to weight and value, to carry his personal baggage without additional charge, the compensation for the carriage of the passenger serving also as compensation for the transportation of his baggage.[7] But as a carrier of goods is not liable as common carrier unless the carriage is for compensation,[8] so if the passenger is carried gratuitously,[9] or if transportation of baggage is secured on the erroneous assumption that one is a passenger,[10] the carrier is liable only as any other carrier of goods without compensation, that is, for such negligence as would charge a gratuitous bailee.[11] The carrier of baggage being liable as common carrier of goods, he will be excused for loss thereof or injury thereto only by act of God or the public enemy.[12] The presumption as to the condition of the goods and as to where loss or injury occurred is the same as with reference to transportation of goods.[13] imposed on the carrier, the law of the place of performance will govern as to his liability.[26]

c. What Constitutes Baggage. In general the term "baggage" (or "luggage," which means the same thing),[27] includes such articles of necessity and convenience as are usually carried by passengers for personal use and comfort or protection during the continuance of the journey,[28] and in determining the question, the station in life, circumstances, and business of the passenger, and the nature and extent of the contemplated journey, may be taken into account.[29] Articles intended as presents, or carried for the convenience of others, do not come within the meaning of the term.[30] There is no question as to the right to carry wearing apparel for the passenger's reasonable use, no matter how valuable, if suitable to his circumstances and condition in life.[31] Weapons, such as one is in the habit of carrying or taking with him for purposes of defense or adornment, are included.[32] It seems to be thought that tools of a traveling jeweler may be classed as baggage.[33] Books carried by a student have been regarded as

It is said that mere knowledge on the part of the baggage-master that the passenger is attempting to carry merchandise as baggage will not charge the carrier with liability therefor, it being outside of the scope of his authority to accept merchandise as baggage. Blumantle v. Fitchburg R. Co., 127 Mass. 322, 34 Am. Rep. 376. Perhaps this is true if the passenger has notice of limitation on the authority of the baggage-master in this respect, but in the absence of such notice the act of the agent will be binding upon his principal. Minter v. Pacific R. Co., 41 Mo. 503, 97 Am. Dec. 288; Sherlock v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 85 Mo. App. 46. Accordingly if the passenger has knowledge that the carrier's agent is prohibited from checking sample cases as baggage, except upon execution of a release of liability, and without compliance with such conditions induces the baggage-master to violate his duty in that respect, he cannot hold the trunks offered to be checked as baggage.[47] And if merchandise is checked under the form of baggage, or mingled with articles of baggage without the carrier's knowledge, he is not liable therefor.[48] While actual knowledge is not necessary to charge the carrier with liability for merchandise checked as baggage, if the circumstances are such as to indicate the fact,[49] yet the mere appearance of the trunk or case offered to be checked as one ordinarily in use for carrying merchandise or samples will not in itself charge the carrier with knowledge that it does contain merchandise rather than personal baggage.[50] The fact of delivery of a trunk or other receptacle in which personal baggage is generally carried is an implied representation that it contains baggage only, and a failure to disclose the nature of the contents as being other than baggage will constitute such concealment as to relieve the carrier from liability so far as the contents are not baggage.[51] So far as the articles are properly baggage, there is no obligation to disclose their value, however exceptional it may be, in the absence of reasonable inquiry.[52] The carrier may make an extra charge for value beyond a reasonable limit fixed, and require information as to the value for the purpose of determining such charge.[53] The carrier may also make an extra charge for weight beyond a reasonable limit, or for accepting merchandise which is not properly baggage, and upon accepting the charge for excess becomes liable as common carrier with reference to the merchandise thus accepted to the same extent as though the goods were carried as freight.[54]

A railroad company receiving baggage from a connecting line is not chargeable with knowledge of the baggage-master of such connecting line that the trunk of the passenger contains merchandise, there being no presumption that the agent of the connecting line had authority to bind the line receiving the baggage without actual notice. The transaction as to excess value or weight, or as to merchandise which would not otherwise be properly checked as baggage, ex-

d. Acceptance; When Liability Commences. To constitute such delivery of baggage to the carrier as to charge him with reference thereto, it is necessary that there be also an express or implied acceptance.[55] The delivery must be with intention to become a passenger.[56] The facilities offered for the receipt of baggage and the general custom of the place will furnish a basis for determining how long before the passenger actually intends to enter upon his journey he may deliver his baggage to the carrier so as to render the carrier liable therefor.[57] Where baggage is left with the carrier in anticipation of a journey not about to be commenced, and to be called for and checked when the passenger is ready to begin his journey, the carrier is liable, therefore, as warehouseman only.[58] A regulation that baggage shall not be checked until a ticket has been procured is reasonable, but the carrier cannot limit his liability as carrier by refusing to take charge of baggage until the procurement of a ticket.[59] The giving of a receipt or check is a matter of convenience, and the time when the carrier's liability commences will not depend upon the issuance of such receipt or check, but upon the actual acceptance of the baggage for transportation.[60] The authority of a person acting as tra compensation being charged, may be treated as a separate contract (Talcott v. Wabash R. Co., 159 N. Y. 461, 54 N. E. 1; Millard v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 86 N. the carrier will be liable without regard to negligence on his part, as for conversion.[64]

f. Liability as Warehouseman. The conflict of authority which exists with reference to carriage of goods as to when the liability of the carrier as such terminates, and his responsibility as bailee begins,[65] seems not to apply to transportation of baggage. The duty of the passenger is to know when his baggage will arrive and to take it away. The liability of the carrier as to baggage continues therefore until the baggage has reached its destination and the passenger has had a reasonable opportunity to take it away. After that time the carrier's liability is that of warehouseman only.[66] In determining what is a reasonable time, regard must be had to the circumstances of the case.[67] But in the absence of some special circumstances excusing the passenger from doing so, it is his duty to take his baggage without delay.[68] If the delay in delivering the baggage to the passenger is due to the carrier's fault in not transporting it properly, or otherwise

The fact that the passenger, on account of illness, is given a lay-over and does not reach his destination until after the arrival of his baggage does not extend the time of the carrier's liability as common carrier. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Boyce, 73 Ill. 510, 24 Am. Rep. 268.

postponing delivery, the liability of the carrier is thereby extended until the lapse of what is a reasonable time under the circumstances for the passenger to receive his baggage.[69] But retention of the baggage by the agent of the carrier for the accommodation of the passenger will not extend the carrier's liability.[70] If the passenger does not apply for his baggage within a reasonable time,[71] the duty of the carrier is to store and keep it with reasonable care, and his liability therefor is that of warehouseman; this duty, however, not being that arising under an independent contract, but a part of his duty as carrier, covered by the original contract of transportation.[72] In some cases it has been said that even where the retention of possession by the carrier is at the request of the passenger, the liability is that of bailee for hire, involving the necessity of using ordinary care.[73] But on the other hand it has been held, with perhaps better reason, that in such cases the carrier is merely a gratuitous bailee, liable only for gross negligence.[74]

terminated.[80] But the presumption is, as in case of goods,[81] that failure to deliver at the end of the transportation, or delivery in bad condition, is through the fault of the last carrier until he has exonerated himself by showing that he did not receive the baggage or received it in the condition in which it reaches its destination.[82]

h. Charges; Lien. The carrier has a lien on the baggage of the passenger for the entire charge of transportation of the passenger and baggage, and it is immaterial whether the baggage has been checked, if it is still in the possession of the carrier when he seeks to enforce his lien.[83] While thus retaining baggage under a lien, the carrier is liable therefor as bailee.[84] A connecting carrier employed by the first carrier in carrying out the contract of through transportation cannot enforce a lien on the baggage if charges have been paid in advance, but may otherwise detain the baggage for the entire charges of the transportation.[85]

i. Actions For Delay, Loss, or Injury — (i) Form of Action. Action for loss of or injury to baggage is usually brought in tort,[86] and especially is this the proper form of action where the passenger has accepted and retained the baggage in a damaged condition.[87] But the action may be brought on special contract, and where that is substantially the form of action, allegations as to defendant's disregard of duty as a common carrier will be treated as surplusage.[88] Assumpsit is of course not maintainable if the baggage is being carried free.[89]

(II) Who May Sue. The person checking the baggage in connection with his transportation as passenger may bring action for breach of the contract with reference to such baggage, although he is not the real owner thereof.[90] On the other hand, the real owner may bring the action, although he is not the person who as passenger checked the baggage for transportation.[91] Thus, where sample cases are checked by a traveling salesman, his principal, to whom the goods belonged, may maintain an action for their loss.[92] And this is true even though the principal was undisclosed and the baggage was checked as the property of the agent.[93]

(III) Damages[94]—(A) For Delay. For delay in the delivery of baggage due to negligence of the carrier, the passenger is entitled to recover the value of the use of the property during the time of such delay, and any incidental expense involved in being deprived of the use thereof,[95] but not damages on account of loss of profits or other special injuries arising out of circumstances not known to the carrier.[96] If the articles transported as baggage have depreciated in value during the delay, the difference in value may be allowed as damages,[97] but not where there was no intention to sell the articles thus carried.[98]

of the loss may be added to the value,[8] and exemplary damages may be given where the loss or injury is the result of wilfulness or gross negligence.[9] Where a penalty is provided for by statute, the passenger is not limited to the recovery of such penalty, but may have actual damages.[10] And a statute limiting the carrier's liability for baggage does not prevent recovery of a larger amount where the liability is that of warehouseman.[11]

(IV) EVIDENCE:[12] Loss of baggage may be sufficiently established by proof of delivery to the carrier and failure to deliver it at destination, even without demand and refusal, if there is other evidence of loss.[13] But mere proof of non-delivery, without proof of demand and refusal, or other evidence of loss, is not sufficient to show a conversion.[14] Where negligence is the basis of the action, proof of delivery to the carrier and failure to account for the property without explanation is sufficient to take the case to the jury.[15]

I. DEFINITION.

An "action on the case" is a form of action founded on the common law and acts of parliament. It lies generally to recover damages for torts not committed with force, actual or implied; or having been occasioned by force, where the matter affected was not tangible, or the injury was not immediate but consequential; or where the interest in the property was only in reversion — in all of which cases trespass is not sustainable.[1]

II. HISTORY.

A. In General. Originally actions at law were commenced by the issuance of a writ out of chancery which performed a two-fold function. It authorized the law court in which the action was directed to be brought to assume jurisdiction thereof and it enforced the appearance of defendant. Plaintiff was required to set forth specifically and with particularity in the writ the grounds and nature of his cause of action. Very early in the history of the common law approved forms for writs, applicable to the usual and common causes of action, were preserved in the register of writs for use by the persons charged with the issuance thereof. If none of the approved forms found in the register were applicable to the facts of plaintiff's case he was authorized to bring a special action on his own case. This fact gave rise to the name "action on the case."[2] In the course of time, as novel subjects of litigation became more frequent, the clerks charged with the issuance of writs became reluctant to issue writs, forms for which were not found in the register, and doubted their authority so to do. To enforce the issuance of writs in such cases parliament enacted the Statute of Westminster II.[3] Thus it will be seen that the statute did not give rise to the action on the case but was designed merely to enforce plaintiff's right to have a writ issued on his special case.[4]

B. Abolition of Distinctions Between Case and Trespass. The distinctions existing at common law between trespass and case have very generally been abolished or modified by statute, and this is true even as to states which retain the common-law system of pleading.[5]

A form of action designed to afford relief in all cases where one man is injured by the wrongful act of another where no other remedy is provided. Van Pelt v. McGraw, 4 N. Y. 110.

3. 13 Edw. I, c. 24 (Statute of Westminster II) provided that when no writ applicable to plaintiff's case was found in the register, and a writ in a like case was found and plaintiff's case fell under a like principle and required the same remedy, then in such case the clerks were authorized to agree in making a writ applicable to plaintiff's case.

4. Hathorn v. Calef, 53 Me. 471; Webb's Case, 8 Coke 45*b*; 3 Bl. Comm. 123; Bouvier L. Dict. In Nevin v. Pullman Palace Car Co., 106 Ill. 222, 229, 46 Am. Rep. 688, Mulkey, J., said: "The writ in case, as its very name imports, was invented for the express purpose of giving a remedy where none of the old forms of writs were applicable," and the Statute of Westminster II was enacted with a view of promoting the remedy by that writ. In Kinlyside v. Thornton, 2 W. Bl. 1111, Sir William Blackstone said: "It by no means follows, because of cases unprovided for by the Register, the statute of Westm. 2, directs an action on the case to be framed, that the action on the case in general did not subsist at common law."

III. NATURE AND SCOPE OF REMEDY.

A. In General. The term "action on the case" is usually understood to mean an action in form ex delicto.[6] It is founded on the mere justice and conscience of plaintiff's right to recover and is in the nature of a bill in equity.[7] To support it it is not necessary that there should be any moral turpitude in the act complained of.[8]

B. Direct or Consequential Nature of Injury — 1. In General. For a tort committed with force and intentionally, the immediate consequence of which is injury, trespass is the appropriate remedy. If the injury proceeds from mere negligence, or is not the immediate consequence of the tort, case is the appropriate remedy.[9] An injury is considered as immediate when the

the case and trespass; so that an action on the case will lie for a wrong properly the subject-matter of an action of trespass (Smethurst v. Journey, 1 Houst. (Del.) 196), and trespass for an injury properly the subject of an action on the case (Coe v. English, 6 Houst. (Del.) 456).

Illinois.—Starr & C. Anno. Stat. (Ill.) c. 110, par. 22, abolishing the distinction between counts in trespass and counts in case and providing that either form of action may be used for the class of actions properly the subject of trespass or case does away with the technical distinction between the forms of action, but does not give any other remedy for acts done under the legal process of a court of competent jurisdiction than before existed, viz., an action on the ground of malice and want of probable cause; also under the statute counts in trespass and case may be joined in one declaration and the action be called trespass or case, but the count in case must contain all of the elements necessary to make a good cause of action in case, and the count in trespass in like manner must contain all the elements to make a good cause of action in trespass; neither does it in any way affect the rule that the proof must correspond with the allegations. Blalock v. Randall, 76 Ill. 224; Gay v. De Werff, 17 Ill. App. 417.

Michigan.— How. Anno. Stat. Mich. § 7759, providing that where by the wrongful act of any person, an injury is produced either to the person, personal property, or rights of another or to his servant, child, or wife for which an action of trespass may by law be brought, an action of trespass on the case may be brought to recover damages for such injury, whether it was wilful or accompanied by force or not, and whether such injury was a direct and immediate consequence from such wrongful act or whether it was consequential and indirect, does not authorize the maintenance of an action of trespass on the case for a wrongful entry on plaintiff's land and the doing of acts thereon injurious thereto, since the word "rights" must be deemed to refer to rights growing out of personal property or personal in their nature. Wood v. Michigan Air Line R. Co., 81 Mich. 358, 45 N. W. 980.

Pennsylvania.— The distinctions between trespass and case so far as they relate to procedure were abolished by the Pennsylvania act of May 25, 1887. Duffield v. Rosenzweig, 144 Pa. St. 520, 23 Atl. 4.

Virginia.— Va. Code (1873), c. 145, § 6, provides that in any case in which an action of trespass will lie, there may be maintained an action of trespass on the case. Hence in an action on the case a declaration setting out facts constituting a trespass is not demurrable. Daingerfield v. Thompson, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 136, 36 Am. Rep. 783.

West Virginia.—W. Va. Code (1860), c. 148, § 7, providing that "in any case in which an action of trespass will lie, an action of trespass on the case may also be maintained," does not authorize the maintenance of trespass for an injury properly the subject-matter of an action on the case. Hence an action of trespass vi et armis will not lie for damages alleged to have resulted from the wrongful ejectment of plaintiff from defendant's train by the latter's servants. The terms "immediate" and "consequential" should be understood, not in reference to the time which the act occupies or the space through which it passes or the place from which it has begun or the intention with which it is done or the instrument or agent employed or the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the act, but in reference to the progress and termination of the act, to its being done on the one hand and its having been done on the other. If the injury is inflicted by the act at any moment of its progress, from the commencement to the termination thereof, then the injury is direct or immediate; but if it arises after the act has been completed, though occasioned by the act, then it is consequential or collateral, or more exactly a collateral consequence. Jordan v. Wyatt, 4 Gratt. (Va.) 151, 47 Am. Dec. 720.

11. Connecticut.— Stone v. Stevens, 12 Conn. 219, 30 Am. Dec. 611.

3. Injury Direct but Caused by Negligence. Some authorities hold that where an injury is the effect of negligence, though the force be immediate or direct, plaintiff may maintain his action of trespass on the case, or trespass at his option.[12] Other authorities hold that trespass is the proper action in such case.[13] If the act which occasions the injury is intentionally or wilfully done negligence is of course negatived, and if the injury is direct trespass only will lie.[14]

C. Injury Common to All. Case cannot be sustained where the injury is alike common to all, and where no right peculiar to the party has been affected.[15]

IV. CAUSES OF ACTION.

A. In General. The action is an outgrowth of the principle that whenever the law gives a right or prohibits an injury it will also afford a remedy. Hence

Illegal tax.— Where the person of an individual has been arrested or his property seized, in order to enforce the payment of a tax, the assessment of which was wrongful, he generally has his election to treat the arrest as the immediate cause of the injury and declare in trespass, or to treat the wrongful assessment under which the warrant and arrest or seizure were founded as the cause of action and the arrest as consequential and declare in case. See 1 Cent. Dig. tit. "Action on the Case," § 19; and, generally, PROCESS.

One who maliciously and without probable cause makes charges before the commissioner of the land-office concerning one who has taken steps to preëmpt land, necessitating the attendance of the latter on an examination before the officers of the land-office on such charges, in order to procure his patent, may maintain case against the person so maliciously filing such charges. Hoyt v. Macon, 2 Colo. 113.

justified under the process and trespass is the only remedy for the injury caused thereby.[18]

C. Breach of Duty Imposed by Contract. For the breach of an ordinary contract which involves no element of tort, an action of assumpsit is the proper remedy,[19] and an action on the case will not lie; but when a duty is imposed by the contract or grows out of it by legal implication, and injury results from the violation or disregard of that duty, an action on the case will lie, although assumpsit may also be maintained.[20] Case, however, will not lie where the breach of duty complained of is defendant's refusal to turn over to plaintiff money received by the former for the latter's use. Assumpsit is the only remedy.[21]

D. Breach of Duty Imposed by Law. Wherever there is carelessness, recklessness, want of reasonable skill, or the violation or disregard of a duty which the law implies from the conditions or attendant circumstances, and individual injury results therefrom, an action on the case lies in favor of the party injured.[22]

Case or assumpsit.—Where property is lost while in the possession of a bailee thereof through the latter's negligence, the owner may recover therefor either in an action of assumpsit or in case as he may elect. Ferrier v. Wood, 9 Ark. 85. E. Enforcement of Rights Given by Statute. Where a statute prescribes a remedy other than case for the enforcement of a right or liability created by the statute case will not lie, though independent of the statute it would be the appropriate form of remedy.[23] But if the statute merely imposes a duty or liability, without providing any remedy, an action on the case will lie if appropriate to the character of the injury.[24]

F. False and Fraudulent Representations. For any deceit resulting in damage to plaintiff he may recover in an action on the case.[25] So where a person in the sale of property knowingly makes false representations concerning the quality or title of the property, and such representations are relied on by plaintiff under circumstances which warrant him in so doing, and he is injured

Breach of duty by trustee.— If a trustee of property in whom the absolute title is apparently vested transfers it to a third person who takes without notice of the equities of a cestui que trust, the latter may maintain an action on the case against the trustee for the wrongful conveyance, since it is a breach of his duty as trustee. Gillespie v. Hughes, 86 Ill. App. 202.

Sheriff's refusal to release exempt property.— Where an officer, levying an execution, wrongfully refuses to set aside property claimed by the execution debtor, and to which he was entitled under the exemption laws, the debtor's most appropriate remedy is case, since it is the duty of the officer to allow the debtor to retain the exempt property, and his failure so to do is a breach of duty resulting in injury to plaintiff. b. Water Rights or Easements. For an obstruction of a stream or a wrongful diversion of the waters thereof resulting in an injury to plaintiff's water-power, case is the appropriate remedy, since the injury is consequential and not direct.[30] For the same reason case is the appropriate remedy for the recovery of damages occasioned by the construction of a dam or other obstruction in a stream and resulting in the flooding of plaintiff's land,[31] or the pollution of the water of a stream so as to render it unfit for the use of a lower riparian owner.[32] So where a dam owner, without notice to lower riparian owners and contrary to statute, discharges an unusual amount of water from his mill-pond, resulting in injury to lower riparian owners, the remedy of the latter is in case and not trespass, since the injury is consequential and not direct.[33]

Interference with right of ingress and egress.— Case is the appropriate remedy for the obstruction of a way which interferes with plaintiff's ingress and egress to and from his property. Runyon v. Bordine, 14 N. J. L. 472; Ridgeley v. West Fairmont, 46 W. Va. 445, 33 S. E. 235.

Obstruction of right of way.— Plaintiff may maintain an action on the case for the obstruction of a right of way over the land of a third person, caused by defendant's wrongful act in placing an obstruction on plaintiff's land directly in front of the place where the right of way connected with plaintiff's land. Removal of dam.— Case is the appropriate remedy for diminution of the water-power of plaintiff's mill by diverting the water therefrom by removal of a part of plaintiff's dam. The force employed to remove the portions of the dam is not the gist of the action but the consequential loss of the power. Meyer v. Horst, 106 Pa. St. 552. But when the injury to the dam is the gist of the action trespass and not case is the appropriate remedy. Wilson v. Smith, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 324.

Where defendant obstructed a drainage ditch, causing plaintiff's crops to be inundated and injured thereby, case is the appropriate remedy, since the injury is consequential and not direct. Shaw v. Etheridge, 52 N. C. 225. So where plaintiff, with consent of an adjoining owner, placed an obstruction in a ditch which constituted the boundary line between their lands, and defendant, with the consent of the adjoining landowner, removed such obstruction, which caused another ditch belonging to plaintiff to become clogged with sand, it was held that plaintiff's remedy was by an action on the case and not trespass, since the injury was consequential. Hogwood v. Edwards, 61 N. C. 350.

32. Drake v. Lady Ensley Coal, etc., Co., 102 Ala. 501, 14 So. 749, 48 Am. St. Rep. 77, 24 L. R. A. 64.

Where defendant purposely and wilfully collected a head of water and then liberated it and it flowed down upon and injured plaintiff's dam the injury was held to be direct and immediate and trespass and not case the appropriate remedy. Kelly v. Lett, 35 N. C. 50.

34. This doctrine is based on the theory that the wrong is done to property of which plaintiff has neither the possession nor the right to possession, and since trespass, detinue, or trover will not lie, the law for the injury to plaintiff's rights will afford a remedy by an action on the case.

J. Injury to Realty. When defendant does some act on his own land which results in an injury to the land or other property of an adjoining owner case may be maintained.[35] Case also lies where a person having a right to enter on the land of another after entering on such other's land does some unnecessary injury.[36]

K. Injury to Reversionary Interest. Where an injury to property, either real or personal, is committed with force, and is the direct and immediate result of the act complained of, trespass and not case is the appropriate remedy, if at the time of the commission of the wrong the owner is in possession or if not in possession, is entitled to the immediate possession; but if plaintiff is not in possession or is not entitled to the immediate possession, case is the appropriate remedy. Hence for an injury to property which affects its reversionary value, and in which plaintiff has only a reversionary interest, case is the appropriate remedy.[37]

Overhanging eaves.— Where defendant builds a house on his own land so near to plaintiff's land that the roof thereof sheds water on plaintiff's land, the latter cannot recover therefor in an action for trespass, since case is the appropriate remedy, the injury being consequential. As to case by bailor see BAILMENTS, VI, B, 1, a, (II) [5 Cyc. 221].

Case may be maintained by the mortgagee for an injury to his reversionary interest, where he has not the right to immediate possession. Googins v. Gilmore, 47 Me. 9, 74 Am. Dec. 472. And case will lie by the holder when defendant's wrongful act results in the loss to plaintiff of the services of another, to which plaintiff is entitled, the latter may maintain an action on the case therefor, since the injury complained of is consequential and not direct. Hence for the enticing away or debauching of plaintiff's daughter, resulting in the loss of her services, case is an appropriate remedy.[38] It will also lie for criminal conversation,[39] or for an assault on plaintiff's child or wife which deprives him of their services.[40] In England there seems to have been a diversity of opinion as to what form of remedy should be pursued, the earlier practice seeming to favor the framing of the declaration in trespass.[41] Subsequently such actions were held to be in case and not trespass.[42] The later decisions are a recurrence to the view that such actions are actions of trespass and not case.[43]

M. Wrongful Acts of Servant. If injuries are done by a servant in the course of his master's business, which resulted from negligence or want of proper care or skill on the part of the servant, the master will be liable in an action on the case.[44] of a mortgage on lands against the mortgagor or a purchaser from the mortgagor of the equity of redemption for acts of waste committed with the knowledge that the value of the security will be injured thereby. Van Pelt v. McGraw, 4 N. Y. 110.

Injury to unassigned dower interest.— A widow may maintain an action of trespass on the case against one who, subsequent to the death of her husband but before the assignment of dower, enters on the premises and does acts injurious to the freehold. This on the theory that her dower interest is in its nature a reversionary interest. Rogers v. Potter, 32 N. J. L. 78.

41. Batchelor v. Bigg, 3 Wils. C. P. 319, decided in 1772, was an action of trespass for criminal conversation. Tullidge v. Wade, 3 Wils. C. P. 18, decided in 1769, was an action of trespass per quod servitium amisit by a father against one who had debauched his daughter and gotten her with child. No question was raised as to the appropriateness of the form of action in either case.

42. Cooke v. Sayer, imperfectly reported in 2 Burr. 753, was an action for criminal conversation and is said by Lord Ellenborough in Macfadzen v. Olivant, 6 East 387, to have been an action on the case. Bennett v. Allcott, 2 T. R. 166, was an action of trespass for breaking and entering plaintiff's house and debauching plaintiff's daughter. Defendant's defense of entry on plaintiff's premises under a license was excluded as not being admissible under the plea of not guilty. Buller, J., said "that if the trespass in entering the premises had not been proven (or if defendant had justified such act) defendant would have been entitled to a verdict." From which it appears that for the debauching of plaintiff's daughter case is the appropriate remedy. Macfadzen v. Olivant, 6 East 387, holds that an action for criminal conversation is case. This case refers to Parker v. Ironfield (an unreported case) as being an action for the seduction of plaintiff's daughter and in which Justice Buller indorsed on the paper book the words "this is an action on the case."

But if the injury be committed by the servant wilfully, trespass and not case is the appropriate remedy.[45]

V. DEFENSES.

When parties by an express agreement assume the performance of an obligation, which, aside from the agreement, the law implies, whatever will in law excuse a breach of the express obligation will, in an action on the case for breach of the implied obligation, be a defense thereto.[46] Coverture, however, is not a defense, as the action is in form ex delicto.[47]

VI. PERSONS LIABLE.

Case will lie against a private or public corporation for a wrong which is the appropriate subject-matter of an action on the case.[48]

VII. JURISDICTION AND VENUE.

A. Jurisdiction. In states where justices of the peace have jurisdiction of actions ex contractu but not of actions ex delicto, an action on the case to recover for injuries caused by defendant's negligence and unskilfulness in performing a contract, though an action for the breach of a duty imposed on defendant by a contract, is not an action ex contractu so as to give a justice jurisdiction thereof.[49]

B. Venue. A statute providing that where "the foundation of the suit is some crime or offense or trespass for which a civil action in damages may lie, in which case the suit may be brought in the county where . . . the trespass was committed" includes that class of wrongs for which an action on the case will lie.[50]

VIII. LIMITATIONS OF ACTION.

A statute providing that actions on the case must be brought within a certain time after the cause of action shall have accrued is not abrogated by the subsequent adoption of a code abolishing "the forms of all actions and suits."[51]

Where animals are killed by a railroad train by reason of the negligence of the employees in charge of the train, case is the appropriate remedy against the railroad company for the recovery of damages for the injury so inflicted. Selma, etc., R. Co. v. Webb, 49 Ala. 240.

Where a servant is commanded by the master to do a lawful act and he does it in an unlawful way so as to injure another, the latter may have his remedy by an action on the case, but if the act commanded is unlawful in and of itself, and not from the mode of doing it, trespass would lie. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Dalby, 19 Ill. 353.

45. Wright v. Wilcox, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 343, 32 Am. Dec. 507; Savignac v. Roome, 6 T. R. 125, which latter case holds that where defendant's servant wilfully drove defendant's carriage against plaintiff's and injured it, trespass and not case is the appropriate form of action for the redress of the injury.

46. Thus where plaintiff delivered to defendant a quantity of barley for malting under an agreement by the latter to return it to plaintiff, the law, aside from the agreement, would have implied the obligation on defendant's part to return it, and plaintiff may at his election bring an action on the case for breach of defendant's duty to return, but defendant may show in defense that the barley was destroyed while in his possession through no fault of his own. IX. PARTIES.

A. Plaintiffs. Where a wrong constitutes a direct as well as a consequential injury to land in the possession of a life-tenant, the latter may waive the trespass and join with the remainderman in an action on the case for the recovery of the consequential damages sustained by him.[52]

B. Defendants. Where several persons join in the commission of a wrong giving rise to an action on the case, plaintiff may join as parties defendant one or all persons jointly participating in the wrong complained of.[53]

X. PLEADING.[54]

A. Declaration — 1. In General. The name given to a declaration by plain-cept actions for assault and battery, criminal conversation, false imprisonment and slander, are governed by the three year statute of limitations. Emrich v. Little Rock Traction, etc., Co., (Ark. 1902) 70 S. W. 1035 [criticizing Patterson v. Thompson, 24 Ark. 55]; Cockrell v. Cooper, 86 Fed. 7, 29 C. C. A. 529.

Change of action to case.— Where an action, on a cause of action which is the appropriate subject-matter of an action on the case, is commenced, in a form other than case, prior to the expiration of the period of limitations applicable to case, it may, subsequent to the expiration of such period, be changed, by amendment, to case, where the amendment does not change the cause of action set forth in the original declaration. Smith v. Bellows, 77 Pa. St. 441.

Application of statute.— If the declaration sets forth a cause of action for which case is the appropriate remedy the period of limitations applicable to actions on the case will be applied. Thus, an action brought under a statute providing that if the owner of diseased sheep shall knowingly let them be at large and they shall mingle with sheep belonging to other persons resulting in injury to such other's sheep he shall be liable for the injuries resulting therefrom is an action on the case within the statute of limitations applicable to actions on the case. Mount v. Hunter, 58 Ill. 246. So where the owner of land by the construction of a dam on his own land overflows the land of another, an action by the latter to recover therefor is an action on the case within the statute of limitations applicable to actions on the case. Wabash, etc., Canal v. Spears, 16 Ind. 441, 79 Am. Dec. 444.

52. McIntire v. Westmoreland Coal Co., 118 Pa. St. 108, 11 Atl. 808. See also, generally, PARTIES.

Action by assignor.— A court of law has jurisdiction of an action of trespass on the case to recover damages for loss by fire, though plaintiff has assigned parts of any recovery that may be had, and may apportion the judgment to satisfy the different assignments. Tyler v. Ricamore, 87 Va. 466, 12 S. E. 799.

A licensee of land with authority to cut and take away timber therefrom may maintain an action on the case against a person who wrongfully enters thereon and cuts the timber, in consequence of which the licensee sustains damage. Beckwith v. McPhelm, 7 N. Brunsw. 501.

53. Andrews v. Boedecker, 126 Ill. 605, 18 N. E. 651, 9 Am. St. Rep. 649; Winslow v. Newlan, 45 Ill. 145; Pozzi v. Shipton, 8 A. & E. 963, 8 L. J. Q. B. 1, 1 P. & D. 4, 35 E. C. Breach of duty imposed by contract.— An action on the case for breach of a duty imposed by contract may be maintained against one or all of the obligors in the contract. Orange Bank v. Brown, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 158; Pozzi v. Shipton, 8 A. & E. 963, 8 L. J. Q. B. 1, 1 P. & D. 4, 35 E. C. L. 931; Ansell v. Waterhouse, 2 Chit. 1, 6 M. & S. 385, 18 Rev. Rep. 413, 18 E. C. L. 469; Govett v. Radnidge, 3 East 62, 6 Rev. Rep. 539.

Breach of warranty.— Where defendant has been induced to purchase property by false representations as to its quality or the condition of the title thereto, made under circumstances which constitute them a warranty, he may at his election waive his action on the warranty and maintain an action on the case against one or all of the joint contractors, though in assumpsit all of the joint contractors would be necessary parties defendant. Vail v. Strong, 10 Vt. 457.

Negligence of agent.— Where an injury is sustained by reason of the wrongful act of one who at the time of the commission of the wrong was acting as the agent of two or more persons and such wrong was committed in the course of the principals' business under such circumstances as to make the principals liable for the agent's acts, the injured party may maintain an action against one or all of the principals. Bretherton v. Wood, 3 B. & B. 54, 6 Moore C. P. 141, 9 Price 408, 23 Rev. Rep. 556; Moreton v. Hardern, 4 B. & C. 223, 6 D. & R. 275, 10 E. C. And an agent and his principal may both be joined as parties defendant in an action on the case. Wright v. Wilcox, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 343, 32 Am. Dec. 507.

tiff is not conclusive as to its form.[55] Such question is to be determined from the nature of the wrong alleged and the character of the relief sought.[56]

2. ALLEGATION AS TO DAMAGES. If the damages sustained have not necessarily resulted from the act complained of, and therefore are not implied by law, plaintiff must allege the particular or special damages sustained and meant to be relied on at the trial.[57]

3. ALLEGATION AS TO NEGLIGENCE. If the gist of the action is defendant's negligence, the declaration should allege the specific acts of negligence relied on as a ground for recovery.[58]

4. ALLEGATION AS TO TITLE. In an action by a reversioner for an injury to the freehold, plaintiff's specific interest in the property affected should be alleged.[59]

5. ALLEGATION AS TO WRONGFULNESS OF ACT. The act causing the injury must be averred to be wrongful or some equivalent averment must be used.[60]

Description of property injured.— Since the action is in the nature of a bill in equity, much latitude will be allowed in the description of the property to which the injury is done. Taber v. Packwood, 2 Day (Conn.) 52.

Right of way.— A declaration in an action on the case for the obstruction of a right of way alleging that plaintiffs were seized in their demesne as of fee of the premises sufficiently alleges that they were in the possession and occupation of the right of way. Cushing v. Adams, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 110.

Where the action is for consequential injuries to property in plaintiff's possession, resulting from defendant's wrongful act, it is not necessary for plaintiff to allege title in himself, since possession is sufficient to sustain the action. North v. Cates, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 591.

The declaration must show an invasion of the legal right of plaintiff either with a proper allegation of injury or the invasion of such a right that the law implies such resulting injury. Sprague v. Fletcher, 67 Vt. 46, 30 Atl. 693.

6. Breach of Duty Imposed by Contract. If case is brought on a breach or omission of duty growing out of a contract, the contract itself need not be formally stated in the declaration unless it constitutes a material part of plaintiff's case.[61]

7. Breach of Duty Imposed by Law. In an action on the case for the breach of an obligation imposed by law, it is, as a general rule, sufficient to allege facts out of which the duty arises, and that defendant failed to perform such duty.[62]

8. Duplicity. A declaration in case stating facts constituting more than one cause of action against defendant is not bad for duplicity, unless plaintiff relies on each of them as a distinct ground of recovery.[63]

9. Joinder of Counts. In the absence of statutory provisions authorizing it[64] counts in case cannot be joined with counts in trespass,[65] nor with counts in

If the act complained of is alleged to be unlawful, it is not sufficient to allege that it is unlawful but the facts which constitute the unlawfulness must be set out. Perry v. Buss, 15 N. H. 222.

Malice.— It is not necessary to lay the act to be done maliciously. Cotteral v. Cummins, 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 343.

Where the law implies the existence of the obligation, it is not necessary to allege its existence. Shrieve v. Stokes, 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 453, 48 Am. Dec. 401.

Where a statute imposes an obligation and provides that for a breach thereof the party aggrieved thereby may recover his damages in an action on the case, plaintiff need not recite the statute in his declaration, but it is enough if he states facts showing the breach thereof. Bayard v. Smith, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 88. It is not, however, enough for plaintiff to allege that defendant neglected a duty imposed by statute, and that he would not have been injured if the duty had been performed, but he must also show that the duty was imposed for his benefit, and was one which defendant owed to him. Smith v. Tripp, 13 R. I. 152.

63. Raymond v. Sturges, 23 Conn. 134; Higson v. Thompson, 8 U. C. Q. B. 561.

What constitutes duplicity.— In a count in case alleging that plaintiff's slave was killed while working for defendant under a contract of employment, by reason of defendant's negligence in not repairing the building in which the slave was working and which fell on him, and also alleging that defendant, knowing the condition of the building, fraudulently represented to the slave and one who was working with him that it was safe, is not bad for duplicity, since the allegation as to fraudulent representation may be treated as surplusage and the count still charge a good cause of action. Perry v. Marsh, 25 Ala. 659.

64. Alabama.— Ala. Code (1886), § 2673, provides that counts in trespass and trespass on the case may be joined when they relate to the same subject-matter.

Vermont.— Vt. Stat. (1894), § 1153, provides that counts in trespass may be joined with counts in trespass on the case in one declaration, if for the same cause of action. Howard v. Tyler, 46 Vt. 683.

Virginia.— Under Va. Code, c. 148, § 7, providing that in any case in which an action of trespass will lie, there may be maintained an action of trespass on the case, a count in trespass may be joined with a count in case, in an action purporting to be in case. assumpsit.[66] A count in trover may, however, be joined in a declaration with a count in trespass on the case.[67]

10. Amendment. Plaintiff may amend his declaration so as to change the form of the action to an action on the case, where the amendment does not change the cause of action.[68]

B. Plea. Not guilty is an appropriate plea to a declaration in case and puts in issue every essential fact alleged in the declaration,[69] except matters set out merely by way of inducement.[70] A special plea alleging facts which may be given in evidence under the plea of not guilty is bad.[71]

XI. ISSUES AND PROOF.

A. In General. The pleading and the proof must correspond.[72] And the acts or omissions of defendant which are insisted on as a tortious violation of the duty imposed by his contract must be proved as alleged.[73]

B. Matters Admissible Under General Issue. Under the general issue, defendant may give in evidence any facts or circumstances which in equity are sufficient to bar plaintiff's claim.[74]

See also Coggswell v. Baldwin, 15 Vt. 404, 40 Am. Dec. 686.

Where plaintiff has brought an action on the case for a wrong properly the subject-matter of an action of trespass, and the declaration alleges facts which show that he has also suffered an injury which is the proper subject-matter of an action on the case, he may amend so as to constitute the facts permitting him to sustain case, as the gravamen of his ground of recovery. XII. EVIDENCE.[75]

A. Burden of Proof. In an action of case for damages sustained by the carelessness of defendant the burden of showing negligence is upon plaintiff.[76]

B. Admissibility. In case for damages for unlawful and violent dispossession, brought by tenants against a landlord, evidence of the temper and disposition of defendant and his wife, who committed the acts of violence, are admissible to sustain the allegation that plaintiffs were kept out of possession by threats and violence.[77]

XIII. AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

As the action is "founded on the plaintiff's title in justice and equity to receive a compensation in damages" the damages are to be estimated by the jury in view of all the circumstances of the particular case.[78]

CASES AT LAW. Ordinary common-law actions, as distinguished from suits in equity or admiralty, and special proceedings.[1]

CAUSE OF ACTION.[5] The right which a party has to institute and carry through a proceeding;[6] a right to bring an action, which implies that there is some person in existence who can assert, and also a person who can lawfully be sued;[7] the right to bring a suit;[8] right of action;[9] a legal right of the plaintiff invaded by the defendant;[10] matter for which an action may be brought;[11] the ground on which an action may be sustained;[12] the fact or combination of facts which gives rise to a right of action;[13] every fact which is material to be proved to entitle the plaintiff to succeed; every fact which the defendant would have a right to traverse.[14] Sometimes a person having a right of action.[15] (Cause of Action: Accrual of, see LIMITATIONS OF ACTIONS. Generally, see ACTIONS.)

CAUSEWAY. A way raised above the natural level of the ground by stones, earth, timber fascines, etc.,[16] serving as a dry passage over wet or marshy ground, or as a mole to confine water to a pond or restrain it from overflowing lower ground.[17]

5. Distinguished from "action."— The action is simply the right or power to enforce an obligation. It springs from the obligation, and hence the "cause of action" is simply the obligation. Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 426, 64 Pac. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53 [citing Pomeroy Pl. & Pr. § 453].

Distinguished from "remedy" and "relief."—"Cause of action" is to be distinguished from the "remedy," which is simply the means by which the obligation or the corresponding action is effectuated, and also from the "relief" sought. Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 426, 64 Pac. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53 [citing Pomeroy Pl. & Pr. § 453]. "A cause of action may be defined in general terms to be a legal right, invaded without justification or sufficient excuse. Upon such invasion a cause of action arises, which entitles the party injured to some relief, by the application of such remedies as the laws may afford. But the cause of action, and the remedy sought, are entirely different matters. The one precedes and, it is true, gives rise to the other, but they are separate and distinct from each other, and are governed by different rules and principles. It is true, that the motive which prompts the action is a desire for relief, and to obtain this relief is the object of the action, and in this sense the relief sought is the cause of the action; but this is not the legal sense of the phrase 'cause of action.'" I. DEFINITION.

A cemetery is a place where the dead bodies of human beings are buried.[1]

II. ESTABLISHMENT AND REGULATION.

A. Power to Establish and Regulate[2] — 1. IN GENERAL. The legislature, in the exercise of its police power, has the right to provide for the establishment and discontinuance of cemeteries and to regulate their use.[3] But as burial places are indispensable and concern the public health they are not the subject of absolute prohibition by legislative action.[4]

2. Delegation of Power to Municipality. The power existing in the legislature to regulate the burial of the dead[5] may be delegated by the legislature to municipalities.[6] If the power has been so delegated[7] municipalities may, by ordinance, establish such regulations concerning the manner of digging graves, their depth, and the interment of dead bodies as are reasonable[8] in their character and necessary for the protection of the public health and welfare.[9] They may even prohibit future burials in existing cemeteries or the establishment of new ceme-

7. Delegation of power.— Under a charter giving a city power "to make any and all regulations necessary to secure, protect, preserve and restore the general health," the city has power to pass an ordinance regulating the burial of the dead. Graves v. Bloomington, 17 Ill. App. 476. So a charter provision authorizing a city "to make regulations to secure the general health of the inhabitants, and prevent and remove nuisances" (Campbell v. Kansas City, 102 Mo. 326, 13 S. W. 897, 10 L. R. A. 593), or a charter provision authorizing a city "to regulate the burial of the dead" (Austin v. Austin City Cemetery Assoc., 87 Tex. 330, 28 S. W. 528, 47 Am. St. Rep. 114), is a sufficient grant of police power to authorize the prohibition of burials and the discontinuance of graveyards in the populous districts of cities. See also People v. Pratt, 129 N. Y. 68, 29 N. E. 7, 41 N. Y. St. 244.

8. Reasonableness of regulation.—A county ordinance making it unlawful to establish, extend, or enlarge any cemetery within the limits of the county, without first obtaining permission of the supervisors, but impliedly permitting burials in cemeteries already established, without restriction, is unreasonable in making the right to pursue a lawful avocation depend upon the arbitrary will of the supervisors and unequal in its operation, in assuming to limit the unrestricted privilege of burial to one class of citizens and to deny it to another class within the same district. Los Angeles County v. Hollywood Cemetery Assoc., 124 Cal. 344, 57 Pac. 153, 71 Am. St. Rep. 75. teries within specified portions of their corporate limits.[10] The power when thus possessed is a continuing power which may be exercised by the municipality from time to time as the public health and welfare may require.[11]

B. Power to Change Control. The control of a cemetery which has been acquired by a town solely for public use and in which it has no beneficial interest may lawfully be taken from it by the legislature and vested in a city which has been organized within its limits, and which embraces the cemetery within its boundaries, if the rights and beneficial interests in the property of the inhabitants of both city and town are saved to them.[12]

III. COMPANIES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

A. Charter or Articles of Association — 1. In General. The purposes for which cemetery corporations may be organized are public rather than private.[13] Accordingly a corporation organized for the avowed purpose of establishing a public cemetery without capital stock or contributions from its members cannot be adapted to the acquisition of profits and emoluments by the directors and incorporators.[14]

2. Enlargement of Cemetery. Under a statute authorizing individuals to associate for the purpose of procuring and establishing a burying-ground individuals may associate to enlarge a burying-ground theretofore used as a public burying-ground.[15]

B. Membership. Ownership of a lot is not equivalent to membership in a society which by its charter was to consist of such persons as might be admitted members and comply with the articles and rules of the society.[16]

C. Powers and Duties of Company or Association — 1. Power to Alienate or Encumber Lands. Lands once legally devoted to and used for burial become appropriated to a public purpose in such a sense that the power of the body in which the legal title may rest to use or alienate the same while such dedication remains in force is restricted.[17] It has accordingly been held that a cemetery corporation has no power to create debts on the faith of lands dedicated for a cemetery,[18] or to mortgage the same.[19]

2. Power to Regulate Care and Management of Lots. The proprietors of a cemetery may make rules and regulations for the care and management of lots in the cemetery.[20] Such authority is sometimes conferred by statute.[21] The rules and regulations must be reasonable,[22] equal in their operation, and uniform in their application to all owners of lots in the cemetery.[23]

3. Duty to Account For Revenues. A cemetery association organized for the purpose of establishing a public cemetery, without capital stock or contributions from its members, is a trustee for the benefit of those who lawfully make use of every person being the purchaser of one or more of the burial lots, and subscribing to the articles and by-laws, shall become a member of the company, and be entitled to one vote for every lot so purchased, the trustees of the company have no right, as such, to cast a number of votes equal to the unsold lots remaining in their hands. Sale for other than burial purposes.—Without the consent of the stock-holders of a cemetery company and of those who have buried their dead in the cemetery upon the faith of its being perpetually used for the purposes for which it was dedicated, it is not within the power of the directors of the company to sell any part of its property for other purposes than that of burial of the dead. Johnstown Cemetery Assoc. v. Parker, 28 Misc. (N. Y.) 280, (N. Y.) 280, 59 N. Y. Suppl. 821.

22. Reasonableness of regulation.—A regulation by a cemetery association prohibiting lot owners from cutting grass and weeds on their lots is not a reasonable regulation within a statute providing that the directors may make reasonable rules for the care and management of lots in the cemetery. Johnstown Cemetery Assoc. v. Parker, 28 Misc. (N. Y.) 280, 59 N. Y. Suppl. 821.

23. Rosehill Cemetery Co. v. Hopkinson, 114 Ill. 209, 29 N. E. 685, holding that a cemetery corporation has no power to make or enforce a rule which would confer a right upon one lot owner in regard to the improvement of his property and deny the same right to another lot owner.

A purchaser of a cemetery lot from a private corporation is not bound by an ordinance enacted after a transfer of the cemetery to a city prohibiting any grave from being dug except by permission of the city sexton. Ritchey v. Canton, 46 Ill. App. 185. So where the charter of a cemetery company provided "that every lot, conveyed in said cemetery, shall be held by the proprietor for the purpose of sepulture alone, and for none other, as real estate" and by an instrument in writing, under seal, a lot in a cemetery was conveyed to a grantee, his heirs and assigns forever for such purpose, together with the right to cultivate trees, shrubs, and plants in the same, and he had exercised this right for more than twenty years, employing skilful and competent persons of his own selection to do the work, the cemetery company cannot by any subsequent order prevent the exercise of this right by the lot-holder personally or by any agent or servant he may employ. lots sold to them by it, and is in duty bound to account to its beneficiaries, the lot owners, for moneys received therefrom.[24]

4. Duty to Care For and Repair Lots. A provision in a charter of a cemetery association that the association shall, out of the proceeds of sales of lots, keep the grounds in repair and in good order does not charge the association with the duty of caring for and keeping in repair lots which have been sold to individuals for burial purposes.[25]

IV. LOCATION.

A. Consent of Adjacent Landowners. By statute in some states a cemetery cannot be laid out within a certain distance of a dwelling-house, store, or other place of business without the consent of the owner of the same.[26] Such prohibition has been held to apply as well to a purchase as to land acquired by an appropriation proceeding.[27]

B. Consent of Public Authorities. The consent and approval[28] of the municipal authorities within or near whose limits it is proposed to locate a cemetery is sometimes required.[29] Such consent may be granted by the municipal

The denial by the members of a cemetery association of any trust relation to the lot owners who have buried their dead in the cemetery, and a refusal to account for moneys received and appropriated by them, authorize judicial interference to compel the recognition of the trust relation and the restoration of such funds to the treasury for the proper improvement and maintenance of the burial grounds. Brown v. Maplewood Cemetery Assoc., 85 Minn. 498, 89 N. W. 872. See also Hullman v. Honcomp, 5 Ohio St. 237, holding that a special and express trust created by the appropriation of a lot of ground by a cemetery association for the exclusive purpose of the burial of the dead of a certain religious society and the appropriation of the surplus means of the association solely to pious and charitable uses are objects which will be upheld and the execution of the trust strictly enforced in a court of equity, upon the application of any member of the association, where there has been an abuse or perversion of such trust.

A statute providing that no cemetery shall be laid out within twenty rods of a dwelling-house, store, or other place of business without the consent of the owner of the same is a limitation of the authority conferred upon certain officers to exercise the public right of eminent domain and not a regulation of the private rights of landowners. authorities on motion. It is not necessary that it be given by ordinance or formal resolution[30]

C. Enjoining Location — 1. Of Proposed Cemetery. Chancery has jurisdiction to enjoin the action of municipal boards in establishing burial-places should they proceed to exercise it illegally or improperly to the injury of others.[31]

2. Of Established Cemetery. A cemetery is not a nuisance per se.[32] If, however, it can be shown that a cemetery is so situated that the burial of the dead there will injure life or health, either by corrupting the surrounding atmosphere or the water of wells or springs, the court will grant its injunctive relief, upon the ground that the act will be a nuisance of a kind likely to produce irreparable mischief and one which cannot be adequately redressed by an action at law.[33]

V. ACQUISITION OF, AND TITLE TO, LANDS.

A. Mode of Acquisition — 1. By Condemnation Proceedings. The legislature may lawfully provide for the compulsory taking of land for a public cemetery. Provision for the proper and decent burial of the dead is a public necessity and duty.[34]

A statute which forbids rural cemeteries to acquire land for cemetery purposes in certain counties, without first obtaining the consent of the supervisors of the county, applies only to the counties named therein. People v. Pratt, 129 N. Y. 68, 29 N. E. 7, 41 N. Y. St. 244.

Sufficiency of application.— Under a statute providing that no corporation shall lay out or establish any cemetery within certain limits in or near a city or village without first obtaining the consent of the municipal authorities thereof, a communication addressed to the mayor and common council of a city and signed by the pastor, secretary, and treasurer of an incorporated religious society, asking that permission be granted to such society to maintain a cemetery on certain lots, is a sufficient application. Porch v. St. Bridget's Congregation, 81 Wis. 599, 51 N. W. 1007. And under a statute providing that all persons making application to the municipal authorities for the location or enlargement of any cemetery shall accompany the application with a descriptive map of the premises they propose to occupy, the map required need not describe the property shown thereon by metes and bounds, but it sufficiently complies with the statute if, from an examination of it, the municipal authorities can readily determine the location, size, and shape of such property. 2. By Dedication — a. In General. Land may be dedicated to the public for use as a cemetery.[35] And one who has dedicated land as a public cemetery, the dedication having been accepted, is estopped from denying it.[36]

b. Requisites and Sufficiency. To constitute a dedication of land for a cemetery it is not necessary that any conveyance be made,[37] or that there be any person capable of taking a conveyance otherwise than in trust.[38] A dedication may arise out of the conduct of the owner and the acts of those who rely thereon.[39]

Illustrations.— Stating to people living in the vicinity that the ground might be used for a burial-place; suffering it to be fenced and exclusively used for such purpose for a great number of years; the appropriation of lots in it; and the making of roads constitute a sufficient dedication. Pierce v. Spafford, 53 Vt. 394. A dedication of land for a graveyard is also shown where the proprietors of the land mark it on a plat as "donated for graveyard" and the plat was used for making sale of other lands while the public accepted the use thus indicated by burying their dead on the land for about ten years. Campbell v. Kansas City, 102 Mo. 326, 13 S. W. 897, 10 L. R. A. 593.

The owner of land who permits his neighbors to use a graveyard on it does not neces-used solely for burial purposes, the conveyance vests in the grantee an absolute estate in fee simple.[40]

C. Appropriation For Other Purpose. The fact that lands have previously been devoted to cemetery purposes does not place them beyond the reach of the power of eminent domain.[41] And in the absence of special limitation or prohibition[42] streets and highways may be laid out through cemeteries.[43] It has been held, however, that a municipal corporation which holds land dedicated to public use as a burying-ground cannot appropriate the land for any other purpose.[44]

D. Abandonment — 1. What Constitutes. A cemetery is none the less a graveyard because further interment in it becomes impossible. It only loses its character as a resting-place of the dead when those already interred are exhumed and removed.[45] Land, however, will be deemed abandoned as a graveyard if the sarily dedicate it to a public use. Brown v. Gunn, 75 Ga. 441.

40. Field v. Providence, 17 R. I. 803, 24 Atl. 143.

If a grant of property to be used as a cemetery contains a condition that a good fence shall be erected and maintained around it, the grantor being then the owner of adjacent land, the stipulation will be construed to be a covenant and not a condition subsequent, and the grantor is not entitled to reënter for failure to erect the fence. Scovill v. McMahon, 62 Conn. 378, 26 Atl. 479, 36 Am. St. Rep. 350, 21 L. R. A. 58. And a grant of land, which had been used as a burial-place, to a town for a burying place forever, in consideration of the love and affection of the grantor to the town, and for other valuable considerations, is not a grant on condition subsequent, so as to forfeit it by a diversion of it to the uses of a schoolhouse site. See also Wood v. Macon, etc., R. Co., 68 Ga. 539, holding that the state, though it may have dedicated property for a cemetery by the exercise of its right of eminent domain, has the power to dedicate a portion of the same property to another public use not inconsistent with and destructive of the first use.

E. 627, holding that the word "through," in an act providing that "no road, street, alley or thoroughfare shall be laid out or opened through" the grounds of a cemetery association "or any part thereof," without the consent of the charterers, was intended to mean the same as the word "over" and the object was to prevent any part of the lands from being taken for road or street purposes.

A charter of a cemetery association prohibiting the opening of a road through its property, without its consent, does not apply in case of a dedication of a part of the land of the cemetery to the public use as a street, with the express consent of the cemetery company. Eq. 531, 9 Atl. 203, holding that where land is given in trust for a burial-place the trust is not to be considered as at an end when the last body which can be buried in it has been deposited. And see Com. v. Wellington, 7 Allen (Mass.) 299, holding that where land has become a public burying-ground by use and occupation as such, it does not lose that character by mere disuse.

The mere passage of a city ordinance prohibiting future burials in a graveyard does not constitute an abandonment thereof. Kansas City v. Scarritt, (Mo. 1902) 69 S. W. 283.

Land had been dedicated by the owner

public and those interested in its use as such have permanently appropriated it to a use entirely inconsistent with its use as a graveyard and it has become impossible to use it for that purpose.[46]

2. Reversion to Original Owners. The title to land dedicated for a graveyard reverts to the grantor or his heirs, when the public cease to bury in the land and refuse or neglect to erect or preserve monuments to indicate the identity of those already buried, or to give and continue to the place the character and name of a graveyard.[47]

VI. TITLE AND RIGHTS OF OWNERS OR LICENSEES OF LOTS.

A. Mode of Acquisition — 1. In General. No formal deed is necessary to confer the exclusive right to the use of a lot in a cemetery for burial purposes. Oral permission from the proprietors is sufficient.[48] thereof to the inhabitants of a town for a burying-ground for thirty-six years. The trustees of the town, without authority, opened a highway across it which was traveled for ten years and then discontinued. It was held not to amount to an abandonment. Hunter v. Sandy Hill, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 407.

46. Campbell v. Kansas City, 102 Mo. 326, 13 S. W. 897, 10 L. R. A. 593, holding that where no burials have for a long time been made and cannot be made in a burying-ground, and in addition thereto the public and those interested in its use have failed to keep and preserve it as a resting-place for the dead and have permitted it to be thrown out to the commons and the graves to be worn away, gravestones and monuments to be destroyed, and the graves to lose their identity, and it has been so treated or neglected by the public as to entirely lose its identity as a graveyard and is no longer known, recognized, and represented as such by the public, such facts constitute an abandonment of its use as a graveyard.

Rights of lot owner.— Where a cemetery has been abandoned for more than twenty years, all the trustees deceased or resigned, all the dead removed except plaintiff's family, and the property, or a large part of it, sold, equity will not appoint trustees for the corporation upon the petition of plaintiff alone, although he cannot be deprived of his property in the land. Whipple v. Louisville Presb. Orphan Asylum, 2 Ky. L. Rep. 391.

47. Campbell v. Kansas City, 102 Mo. 326, 13 S. W. 897, 10 L. R. A. 593; Mahoning County v. Young, 59 Fed. 96, 16 U. S. App. 253, 8 C. C. A. 27 [reversing 51 Fed. 585], the latter case holding that where land is dedicated for a burying-ground, whether by a common-law dedication under which the fee remains in the owner or pursuant to a statute under which the fee is vested in the county in trust for the purposes named only, a lawful and effectual abandonment of the land as a burying-ground restores the former owner to his right of possession. See also Newark v. Watson, 56 N. J. L. 667, 29 Atl. 487, 24 L. R. A. 843.

By abolishing a cemetery, the land for which had been conveyed by a city to a trustee to be used for cemetery purposes, the city terminated the trust relation and it thereupon became and was the duty of the trustee to reconvey the property. Schlessinger v. Mallard, 70 Cal. 326, 11 Pac. 728.

A grant of land to church societies for the use and purpose of a church and burying-place is a grant for that special purpose, and when the purpose fails the land reverts to the donor or his heirs. Gumbert's Appeal, 110 Pa. St. 496, 1 Atl. 437. But see Cincinnati Methodist Protestant Church v. Laws, 7 Ohio Cir. Ct. 211, holding that a conveyance of land to a religious corporation "for a place of burial and other purposes" vests a fee simple title in the grantees, which is not defeasible on the cessation of the use of the land for burial and like purposes.

L. 147, holding that a grant to the exclusive use of a vault in a church burying-ground cannot rest in parol.

Certificates of lots in a cemetery issued by a religious corporation convey no title to the land, where such certificates are not acknowledged in the way pointed out by the statute in force at the time, and which provided that no estate in land of above seven years' duration could pass unless the deed conveying the same was acknowledged in the way indicated in the statute or in some one of its supplements. Order of court.— A church corporation may convey a burial lot without an order of court which is necessary for an absolute conveyance of the soil. Richards v. Northwest Protestant Dutch Church, 32 Barb. (N. Y.) 42, 11 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 30, 20 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 317.

Sale ultra vires.— A contract by a cemetery association to sell burial lots cannot be avoided by the association on the ground that it was ultra vires after the buyer has executed it and paid the price. Palmer v. Cypress Hill Cemetery, 14 N. Y. St. 591 [affirmed in 122 N. Y. 429, 25 N. E. 983, 34 N. Y. St. 30].

2. Adverse Possession. The title to an easement of a burial lot may be acquired by prescription where adverse possession for that purpose is held for the statutory period.[49]

B. Title Acquired — 1. In General. The purchaser of a lot in a cemetery, though under a deed absolute in form, does not take any title to the soil. He acquires only a privilege or license to make interments in the lot purchased, exclusively of others, so long as the ground remains a cemetery.[50] Such privilege or license is subject to the police power of the state, in the exercise of which not only future interments may be prohibited but the remains of persons theretofore buried may be removed.[51] Therefore, when by lawful authority the ground ceases to be a place of burial, a lot holder's right ceases, except for the purpose of removing remains previously buried.[52]

An act directing the vacation of a cemetery and the removal of the bodies is not an infringement of a lot-holder's rights (Kincaid's Appeal, 66 Pa. St. 411, 5 Am. 2. LENGTH OF POSSESSION. Possession of a burial lot, unless voluntarily relinquished, continues as long as the graves are marked and distinguishable as such and the cemetery continues to be used.[53]

C. Descent of Title. A burial lot is regarded as property in which title may in most cases descend to heirs.[54]

D. Exemption From Execution. By statute in some states a burial lot is exempt from seizure, either by direct legal process or by equitable proceedings attempting to subject it to judicial sale for satisfaction of a debt against the owner of the legal title to such lot.[55]

E. Mortgage of Lots. A mortgage of a burial lot is not void as against public policy.[56]

F. Sale of Lots. The ownership of lots in a cemetery is a qualified property or easement,[57] and its transfer is subject to the rules which may be prescribed by the constitution and by-laws of the cemetery association relative to the recording of such transfers.[58]

As to mortgage of cemetery grounds see supra, III, C, 1.

Rights of mortgagee.— The mortgagee of a burial-ground has notice of the purposes to which it is devoted and is bound by rights of burial temporary or in perpetuity granted by his mortgagor while left in possession. Injunction against sale.— If a man buys a burial lot in a cemetery, and his wife goes

G. Rights in Alleys and Approaches to Lots. The owner of a burial lot has the right to free and unobstructed access to the cemetery and to the use of the necessary driveways and approaches to his lot;[59] but no interest in the alleys which separate a lot from other lots, except a right of way, passes to a purchaser unless particularly expressed in the deed.[60]

H. Tombstones and Monuments.[61] The right to bury carries with it the right to do so according to the usual custom in the neighborhood, and includes the right of making mounds over and erecting stones and monuments at the grave.[62]

VII. RIGHT OF BURIAL.

A. In General. A right to use a lot in a cemetery of a religious corporation is a right to use the lot subject to and in conformity with the established rules and by-laws of the corporation in so far as they are not in violation of any law.[63] But where there is no restriction of the right of sepulture on the purchase of a to expense in improving it, and interments are made there, she may have him enjoined from selling it. Schroder v. Wanzor, 36 Hun (N. Y.) 423.

Mandamus will not lie to compel a cemetery company to give its written consent to the sale of a portion of plaintiff's lot, without which consent the sale would be void, where it appears that the granting or withholding of such consent is not a ministerial act, but depends upon the company's judgment as to whether its consent can be given, in view of certain rules of the company and acts of the legislature. Dickens v. Cave Hill Cemetery Co., 93 Ky. 385, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 347, 20 S. W. 282.

59. Wright v. Hollywood Cemetery Corp., 112 Ga. 884, 38 S. E. 94, 52 L. R. A. 621. See also Burke v. Wall, 29 La. Ann. 38, 29 Am. Rep. 316, holding that where a lot in a cemetery is sold with reference to a certain plan, on which plan appears an avenue leading up to or close beside the lot, affording a convenient highway to and from it, such avenue becomes a servitude in favor of the lot and cannot be legally obstructed.

60. Seymour v. Page, 33 Conn. 61, holding further that if the language of a deed conveying a lot in a cemetery is ambiguous upon the point as to whether an interest in alleys which separate the lot from other lots passed, and the grantee claims title to these alleys, evidence is admissible of the custom in other cemeteries in the same town and elsewhere respecting the control and care exercised by their respective proprietors over alleys and avenues in order to remove the ambiguity.

Improvement of avenue.— One who buys a lot in a cemetery in front of which is an avenue cannot enjoin the execution of an improvement made in good faith, although it contemplates the closing of the avenue, the value of the lot not being impaired, nor its means of access, and the owner not having protested until considerable expense had been incurred in making the changes. A. 56, holding that where a daughter who owns a burial lot permits her father's remains to be interred therein she impliedly gives to his widow the right to erect a monument on the lot. And see Durell v. Hayward, 9 Gray (Mass.) 248, 69 Am. Dec. 284, holding that the right of a husband to dispose of the body of his deceased wife by a decent sepulture in a suitable place carries with it the right of placing over the spot of burial a proper monument or memorial in accordance with the well-known and long-established usage of the community.

A license to build a tomb in a burying-ground conveys also a right of suitable access thereto, and the removal of an obstruction by the owner of the tomb is not a trespass. Lakin v. Ames, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 198. See also Fletcher v. Evans, 140 Mass. 241, 2 N. E. 837.

Ownership.— All monuments and erections capable of being removed, placed on the burial lots in a cemetery, under a license to bury therein, are the personal property of the lot holder and he has the right to remove the same upon the lot ceasing to be used for the purposes of burial. Partridge v. Baltimore First Independent Church, 39 Md. 631.

63. Hence, where a person applies for a burial lot in a cemetery of a distinctly Roman Catholic nature, it is with the tacit understanding that he is either a Roman Catholic, and as such eligible to burial therein, or that he applies in behalf of those who are in communion with that church. People v. St. Patrick's Cathedral, 21 Hun (N. Y.) 184 [reversing 58 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 55]. See also Dwenger v. Geary, 113 Ind. 106, 14 N. E. 903, holding that where a cemetery is placed under the charge of a religious organization, one who secures the privilege of burial therein, after this has been done, and after rules have been established, takes his privilege under the rules so established. And see McGuire v. St. Patrick's Cathedral, 54 Hun (N. Y.) 207, 7 N. Y. Suppl. 345, 27 N. Y. St. 192.

As to power to regulate care and management of lots see supra, III, C, 2.

lot, the managers of the cemetery have no power afterward to abridge such right by any unreasonable limitation thereon.[64]

B. Interference With Right. An unlawful and unwarranted interference with the exercise of the right of burial in a cemetery lot is a tort which gives a cause of action against the wrong-doer.[65]

C. Remedy For Enforcement of Right. The managers of a cemetery may be compelled by mandamus to permit the burial of persons entitled to sepulture therein.[66]

VIII. TRESPASSES AND OFFENSES.

A. Civil Liability — 1. RIGHT OF ACTION. While there is no right of property in a dead body in the ordinary sense of the term,[67] it is regarded as property so far as to entitle the next of kin to legal protection from unnecessary disturbance and wanton violation or invasion of its place of burial.[68]

2. FORM OF REMEDY[69] — a. Bill in Equity. Equity has jurisdiction to enjoin an unwarrantable disturbance or interference with a burial-ground or the graves therein.[70]

b. Trespass Quare Clausum Fregit. An action of trespass quare clausum fregit may be maintained for breaking and entering a burial lot.[71]

3. Who May Sue. One who is in the rightful possession of a cemetery lot, or who holds title to the usufructuary interest therein, may maintain an action against one who wrongfully trespasses upon it.[72] And where a right of way to or a right to maintain a cemetery lot for burial purposes is held in common by several persons, any one or more of them may maintain an action to prevent an interruption or destruction of those rights, without making the others parties.[73]

4. Who May Be Sued. A cemetery corporation which voluntarily uses its funds for objects akin to the purpose of its organization is not a public charity, but is liable to the proprietor of a grave for the negligent burial of a stranger therein.[74]

5. Pleading. In trespass for removing a body from its burial-place the declara-

mon privileges, and if the right asserted would, when carried into effect, disturb the enjoyment of those immunities or privileges and the right itself be ill-founded, then as such disturbance would be more than a private trespass — would be a public nuisance going to the irreparable injury of the congregations complaining — chancery has jurisdiction to restrain its commission and to quiet the appellants in the possession and use of their cemetery. W. 563, holding that the violation of a provision in a city charter that the city shall not condemn the grounds of a cemetery for street purposes without the consent of the owner makes the city liable in trespass for the damages to plaintiff in removing, without his consent, the bodies of his children from his burial lot in a cemetery. And see Long v. Rosedale Cemetery, 84 Fed. 135.

A city given power by statute to adopt regulations as to a public cemetery, and upon proper notice to compel lot owners or occupants to comply with such regulations, is liable in damages to a lot occupant if, without having adopted any regulations and without notice to him, it invades his lot and cuts down trees which he has planted therein in the improvement thereof. tion should describe the close alleged to have been broken with reasonable accuracy.[75]

6. Damages — a. Elements of Damage. While the breaking and entering of plaintiff's close is the gist of the action, the circumstances accompanying the trespass and which give character to it may be shown and considered in mitigation or aggravation of the act.[76] The jury may also take into consideration not only the injury to the property but the injured feelings of plaintiff.[77]

b. Exemplary Damages. In a suit for damages for wrongfully disinterring a dead body, if the injury has been wanton and malicious, or is the result of gross negligence, or a reckless disregard of the rights of others, equivalent to an intentional violation of them, exemplary damages may be awarded.[78]

B. Criminal Prosecution — 1. Offenses — a. Disinterment of Dead Body. The disinterment of a dead body, without authority, is a misdemeanor and indictable at common law as an offense "highly indecent and contra bonos mores."[79] And the opening of a grave in a town cemetery by order of the town officers for the purpose of removing a body from a lot which has not been paid for to another part of the cemetery which is free, is within a statute making it a felony for any person, without due process of law, or the consent of specified relatives, to open any grave and remove any dead body therefrom.[80]

75. Bessemer Land, etc., Co. v. Jenkins, 111 Ala. 135, 18 So. 565, 56 Am. St. Rep. 26, holding that a complaint is not demurrable on the ground that the close alleged to have been broken is not described with sufficient accuracy, where it is described as a burial-lot in a graveyard, near a city named in a certain county, which graveyard is now included in land occupied by a designated company but which for many years has been used and occupied as a burying-ground, having been dedicated for that purpose by defendant.

The answer in an action of trespass against a city for removing a dead body from plaintiff's lot in a public cemetery set up that the removal was made by the authority of a third person, who was the owner of the lot and in possession of the same, in good faith, with care and decency. It was held that the answer was good on demurrer, although it did not show from whom or how such third person acquired title. Hamilton v. New Albany, 30 Ind. 482.

b. Disfiguring Cemetery. Cutting trees upon a public burial-ground for purpose of private profit, without the consent of the public authorities having charge of it, is a violation of a statute which provides a penalty for destroying trees within the limits of a place of burial, although the person who cuts them is the owner of the fee of the land and believes that his acts are lawful.[81]

2. INDICTMENT. In an indictment for defacing or destroying a tombstone it is not necessary to designate the name of the person whose tomb has been defaced, nor is it necessary to charge, in terms, that the dead body was that of a human being.[82] And an indictment for wrongfully desecrating and disfiguring a public burial-ground need not describe it by metes and bounds.[83]

Form of indictment for violating sepulture is set out in People v. Dalton, 58 Cal. 226.

83. Com. v. Wellington, 7 Allen (Mass.) 299, holding, however, that if an indictment for wrongfully desecrating and disfiguring a public burying-ground contains an accurate description of it by metes and bounds the proof must correspond with the averment, and it is not sufficient to prove that a part of the lot described was a public burying-ground, although the acts complained of were committed upon that part.

An indictment for wilfully removing gates from a certain cemetery in violation of a statute which provides that whoever wilfully removes any fence or other work in or around any "public or private" cemetery or burial-place shall be fined, etc., is sufficient, although it does not state that such cemetery was either a public or private one. "There are three principal species of 'censo' as known to the laws of Spain, viz.: the 'emphyteutic,' the 'consignativo,' and the 'reservativo.' The 'emphyteutic' is the right which one has to exact from another a certain annual pension or sum, by virtue of a transfer to him of the usufructuary right of real property, the legal title remaining in the grantor. This estate is subject to several burthens and liable to forfeiture on several contingencies which we need not now specify. The 'censo consignativo' is the right to exact from another an annuity in virtue of having advanced money, and which money is made a charge upon lands of the person who promises to pay the annuity, the full title to such lands, however, remaining in the grantor of the annuity. The 'censo reservativo' is the right to receive from another an annual pension by virtue of having transferred land to him by full and perfect title. (Sala and Escriche verbo Censo.)" I. DEFINITION.

A census[1] in modern times[2] is an official enumeration[3] of the inhabitants of a state or country, with details of sex and age, family, occupation, possessions, etc.[4]

II. AUTHORITY FOR TAKING.

The taking of the census of the United States is provided for by the constitution,[5] and statutes have been passed, from time to time, providing methods for the taking of the same.[6]

1. The word is derived from the Latin censere, to reckon. Republic v. Paris, 10 Hawaii 579, 581.

2. In old European law it was "a tax, or tribute; a toll." Black L. Dict.

In Roman law it was "a numbering or enrollment of the people, with a valuation of their fortunes." Burrill L. Dict. [quoted in Huntington v. Cast, 149 Ind. 255, 259, 48 N. E. 1025].

3. It must be an official enumeration of the people, and as such a public record. Huntington v. Cast, 149 Ind. 255, 48 N. E. 1025. See also Childers v. Duvall, 69 Ark. 336, 63 S. W. 802.

4. Century Dict. [quoted in Huntington v. Cast, 149 Ind. 255, 258, 48 N. E. 1025].

Other definitions are: "The official counting or enumeration of the people of a state or nation, with statistics." Black L. Dict. [quoted in Huntington v. Cast, 149 Ind. 255, 259, 48 N. E. 1025].

"An official reckoning or enumeration of the inhabitants and wealth of a country." Bouvier L. Dict. [quoted in Huntington v. Cast, 149 Ind. 255, 259, 48 N. E. 1025].

"An official numbering of the people of a country or district." Standard Dict. [quoted in Huntington v. Cast, 149 Ind. 255, 258, 48 N. E. 1025].

"An official registration of the number of the people, the value of their estate, and other general statistics of the country." Webster Dict. [quoted in Republic v. Paris, 10 Hawaii 579, 581; Huntington v. Cast, 149 Ind. 255, 258, 48 N. E. 1025].

5. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 2, par. 3, which provides for taking the census once in every ten years.

In England the census is also taken once in every ten years. Wharton L. Lex.

6. The manner of taking the census previous to 1890 was prescribed by U. S. Rev. Stat. (1872), § 2175 et seq. This was modified by the act of congress of March 1, 1889 (25 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 760, c. 319), providing for the taking of the eleventh and subsequent censuses, which was, in turn, modified by the act of congress of July 6, 1892 (27 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 86, c. 153). The census office in the department of the interior was abolished by act of congress of March 3, 1893 (27 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 646, c. 210), the uncompleted work of the eleventh census being finished in

III. CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

Although the constitution[7] merely directs congress to take a census of the population for the purpose of apportioning representatives and direct taxes, yet laws requiring additional information concerning property are held to be constitutional.[8]

IV. APPOINTMENT AND COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS.

A state statute providing for the taking of a census at certain intervals and making it the governor's duty to appoint a superintendent of the census at least six months before each interval is directory only as to the time of appointment.[9] A United States census agent can recover for only such expenditures as are authorized by the secretary of the interior;[10] but the compensation specified in the agent's commission cannot be reduced by a rule of the department, of which the agent has not been informed,[11] and the fact that one is to be paid by the day contemplates a daily service.[12]

V. OFFENSES.[13]

A. Making False Return. The making of a false or fictitious census return is an indictable offense.[14]

B. Refusing to Furnish Information. The statute makes it a misdemeanor to refuse to render to the census enumerator the required information.[15] the office of secretary of the interior. The act of congress of March 3, 1899 (30 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 1014, c. 419) provides for taking the twelfth and subsequent censuses.

8. U. S. v. Moriarity, 106 Fed. 886, where it was held that it could not be urged that the acquirement of such information is the taking of private property for public purposes without just compensation.

Where a state constitution required the taking of a census at certain regular periods, an act of the legislature providing for such an enumeration seven years after the prescribed period is constitutional, such enactment having been neglected by previous sessions of the legislature. People v. Rice, 135 N. Y. 473, 31 N. E. 921, 47 N. Y. St. 702, 16 L. R. A. 836.

9. Hence, such appointment is valid, even though made after the prescribed time. In re Census Superintendent, 15 R. I. 614, 15 Atl. 205 [citing People v. Allen, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 486].

Per diem allowance for subsistence.—Under the census act of 1889 (25 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 760, c. 319), a special agent was appointed at six dollars per day, and actual expenses of subsistence and transportation. After his appointment, the act of congress of April 3, 1890 (26 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 34, c. 61) was passed, adding to the statute the clause "and a per diem allowance, in lieu of subsistence, of three dollars per day." It was held that the per diem allowance for subsistence was intended for agents when actually traveling only. Test v. U. S., 27 Ct. Cl. 352. And in Ebert v. U. S., 29 Ct. Cl. 183, it was held that a special agent whose duties are to be performed at his residence is not entitled to such allowance in lieu of subsistence.

11. Ogden v. U. S., 27 Ct. Cl. 469.

12. Ebert v. U. S., 29 Ct. Cl. 183, where it was held that although the information required by one who is appointed a special agent of the census office may have been the inducement of appointing him, nevertheless he cannot furnish a substitute who keeps his office open, and recover pay when absent from the country and unable to perform the duties of his office.

Requisites of indictment.—An indictment for making a false and fictitious census return need not charge that it was made to the supervisor of the district, he being the only one authorized to receive it; nor need it allege that the return was made upon a prescribed and adopted form. Nor is the indictment defective because a portion of such return contains information not required by statute and omits information which is so required. U. S. v. Moriarity, 106 Fed. 886.

S. v. Moriarity, 106 Fed. 886; U. S. v. Sarle, 45 Fed. 191. In this latter case the statute made it a misdemeanor to refuse to render to the census enumerator a true account, "of every person belonging to such family in the

A court, established in London in 1834, having jurisdiction to try all offenses committed within the city of London, the county of Middlesex, and certain suburban parts of Essex, Kent and Surrey, and of offenses committed on the high seas, formerly within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty.[3]

I. NATURE AND SCOPE OF REMEDY.

A. Writ Defined and Distinguished From Other Remedies. Certiorari is a common-law writ,[1] issued from a superior court directed to one of inferior jurisdiction, commanding the latter to certify and return to the former the record in the particular case.[2] At common law when not ancillary to other process, certiorari is in the nature of a writ of error.[3] It has the same functions to inferior tribunals whose proceedings are not according to the course of the common law as the writ of error has to common-law courts. There is this difference, however, certiorari brings up the record for inspection only, while on error the proceedings below are superseded.[4] It differs from appeal in that it brings up the case on the

1. Bacon's definition.— "A certiorari is an original writ, issuing out of Chancery, or the King's Bench, directed in the king's name, to the judges or officers of inferior courts, commanding them to return the record of a cause depending before them, to the end the party may have the more sure and speedy justice before him, or such other justices as he shall assign to determine the cause." Bacon Abr. tit. Certiorari (A) [quoted in Dean v. State, 63 Ala. 153, 154; Matter of Saline County Subscription, 45 Mo. 52, 53, 100 Am. Dec. 337; Matter of Evingson, 2 N. D. 184, 190, 49 N. W. 733, 33 Am. St. Rep. 768].

"The substance of this definition has never been departed from except where the statute has broadened the scope of the writ." Matter of Evingson, 2 N. D. 184, 190, 49 N. W. 733, 33 Am. St. Rep. 768.

2. Smith v. Jones County, 30 Iowa 531; Hamilton v. Spiers, 2 Utah 225, 228. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 2 Cyc. 507, note 3.

Inferior court defined.— In England an inferior court is a court other than one of the four great courts of the realm, i. e., the court of chancery, and the three great common-law courts, sitting at Westminster. Swift v. Judges Wayne Cir. Ct., 64 Mich. 479, 31 N. W. 434 [citing Tomlins L. Dict.]. The inferior court of the definition comprehends special tribunals, commissioners, magistrates, and officers exercising judicial powers affecting the property or rights of the citizen, and who act in a summary way, or in a new course different from the common law. Burrill L. Dict. In Washington v. Huger, 1 Desauss. (S. C.) 360, the South Carolina court refused to obey the writ when issued by the federal court because it was not inferior to the court which issued it, and further because if applicable the petition could proceed under the act relating to the removal of causes.

record, while on appeal the case is brought up on the merits;[5] and from mandamus, for by that writ the case is proceeded with in the inferior court, in accordance with the order of the court granting it.[6] In some of the states the statutory writ of review is a substitute for certiorari, and sustains substantially the same relation to the code procedure as the writ of certiorari does to the common-law practice.[7]

B. Propriety of Writ — 1. Where No Other Remedy Exists — a. In General. It is the general rule that the writ will lie in all cases, where no adequate remedy exists by which an erroneous determination can be reviewed or excess of jurisdiction restrained.[8]

Effect of change of name of writ.— Although a statute provides that all appellate proceedings theretofore taken by error, appeal, or certiorari, shall thereafter be taken in a proceeding to be called an appeal, but does not extend the right of review, change its extent, or modify its exercise, the pre-existing mode of review by certiorari will remain applicable in the same cases, within the same limits, and with the same effect as before the statute. Rand v. King, 134 Pa. St. 641, 26 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 81, 19 Atl. 806, holding that an appeal from an order striking a satisfaction of judgment from the record is in effect a common-law certiorari.

The Georgia act providing for the review by certiorari of the action of the county courts is applicable to proceedings on a possessory warrant had in vacation. Carter v. Commander, 35 Ga. 265.

Certiorari is appropriate where there is nothing to review but a question of law as to whether a court officer was in contempt for non-performance of duty (Glover v. Lumpkin, 99 Ga. 174, 25 S. E. 179); to review a judgment quashing an inquisition of lunacy (Com. v. Beaumont, 4 Rawle (Pa.) 366), an order refusing to vacate a forfeited recognizance (Com. v. Bird, 144 Pa. St. 194, 29 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 14, 22 Atl. 877), the action of a sheriff, in amending his return and taking out and levying an alias execution after returning the original "satisfied" (Atkin v. Mooney, 61 N. C. 31), or a decree of divorce (Jeans v. Jeans, 3 Harr. (Del.) 136); and when an attachment has improperly issued on a defective affidavit and bond (Billings v. Russell, 23 Pa. St. 189, 62 Am. Dec. 330).

10. Whitehead v. Gray, 12 N. J. L. 36; Ludlow v. Ludlow, 4 N. J. L. 451.

Thus the writ has issued to review the appointment and proceedings of commissioners to value land taken for corporate purposes, and to appraise damages by special statutory authority (Smith v. Trenton Delaware Falls Co., 17 N. J. L. 5; Vanwickle v. Camden, etc., R., etc., Co., 14 N. J. L. 162; Bennett v. Camden, etc., R., etc., Co., 14 N. J. L. 145; Morris Canal, etc., Co. v. State, 12 N. J. L. 365, 14 N. J. L. 411), the laying out of a road under an act incorporating a turnpike company (State v. Newark, etc., Turnpike, 2 N. J. L. 318), and the return list of delinquents, and execution issued for the collection of fines imposed for the neglect of military duty (State v. Atkinson, 9 N. J. L. 271; State v. Kirby, 6 N. J. L. 143); to test the validity of a by-law of a municipality (State v. New Brunswick, 1 N. J. L. 450), the classification and assessment of militia under a statute (State v. Chambers, 1 N. J. L. 458), and the validity of an election (State v. Anderson, 1 N. J. L. 366, 1 Am. Dec. 207; State v. Middlesex County, 1 N. J. L. 283); and will lie to commissioners who have passed on the question of damages to an abutting owner by a change of street grade, but have failed to report in his favor (Stewart v. Hoboken, 57 N. J. L. 330, 31 Atl. 278).

In proceedings of a summary character by bodies exercising quasi-judicial functions which do not admit of any other remedy for a direct review, clear violations of law in doing those things which are within the jurisdiction of the body to do in a legal manner may be corrected by the common-law writ of certiorari. State v. Lawler, 103 Wis. 460, 79 N. W. 777. To same effect see State v. Dodge County, 56 Wis. 79, 13 N. W. 680; State v. Whitford, 54 Wis. 150, 11 N. W. 424.

(II) Probate or Orphans' Courts. This general rule has been held applicable to probate and orphans' courts and other like tribunals, upon which special jurisdiction has been conferred by statute.[11]

(III) Proceedings Concerning Insolvents and Poor or Fraudulent Debtors. Certiorari will lie to review the action of inferior tribunals, with respect to proceedings concerning insolvents, and poor or fraudulent debtors,[12] and proceedings on the arrest of an alleged fraudulent debtor, where the record discloses errors of law.[13]

(II) Exceptions to Rule — (A) Remedy Concurrent or Cumulative. The writ will not be denied, however, where such other remedy is concurrent with that of certiorari, or cumulative thereto;[19] and for this reason the party aggrieved will not be precluded, because he may have a remedy by action,[20] although where the party has an opportunity to litigate the question in an action,[21] or another adequate remedy exists, the court as a rule is reluctant to grant the writ, or at least will exercise great caution in so doing.[22]

(B) Remedy Inadequate — (1) In General. So too where such other remedy is inadequate, and more expeditious and efficient relief can be afforded by this writ, it may be granted, although another mode of redress is available.[23]

cable where the tribunal below was apparently without jurisdiction, or errors or abuses going to the jurisdiction are complained of.[24]

b. Other Proceeding Pending — (I) In General. If the party aggrieved has elected another remedy under which he can obtain full redress he cannot resort to certiorari also;[25] but the right to the writ is not precluded by the institution or pendency of an action to annul a judgment rendered without jurisdiction,[26] or of a suit in equity for the same relief,[27] especially when the bill has been dismissed for want of jurisdiction.[28] So the pendency of an action to cancel municipal aid bonds will not bar the right to review the proceedings by which their issue was authorized,[29] and a motion for a new trial made in the primary court will not preclude an applicant who thereafter voluntarily dismisses it;[30] but a cause cannot be removed after arbitrators or referees have entered into consideration of the questions involved,[31] and it seems that where one party sues out habeas corpus and the other certiorari, and both writs are returned at the same time, preference will be given to the former.[32]

(II) Appeal. The writ will not be granted when an appeal is pending from the same determination and the questions sought to be reviewed thereon are the same;[33]

An action against a sheriff for surrendering attached property under an unauthorized and void order is not such a "speedy" remedy as will preclude the party aggrieved from resorting to certiorari. State v. Rose, 4 N. D. 319, 58 N. W. 514, 26 L. R. A. 593.

3. UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT. Under the act of congress establishing the circuit court of appeals, and empowering the supreme court of the United States to award certiorari to require the former to certify cases for review and determination, the supreme court will not grant the writ except in matters of gravity and importance, and only to prevent extraordinary inconvenience and embarrassment in the conduct of the cause;[49] and it is left to the discretion of the supreme court to determine at what stage of the proceedings it will exercise the power conferred.[50]

D. Successive Writs. While it has been held that an alias certiorari is unknown to the law,[51] and that a second writ cannot be allowed for the same purpose,[52] it has also been held that after the writ has been dismissed for informality, another may be awarded on timely application,[53] although the time has elapsed within which the original certiorari could issue;[54] that a second writ may issue to bring in new parties;[55] and that as many writs may issue as are necessary to bring up the whole record.[56] However, a second or alias writ will not be issued where the petitioner has failed to exercise due diligence in procuring the first to be issued and heard,[57] or unless some extraordinary circumstance is shown, which will warrant its allowance.[58]

II. DETERMINATIONS REVIEWABLE.

See 9 Cent. Dig. tit. "Certiorari," § 1.

Refusal to dismiss appeal.— Where a defective bond was given in a case in which it was apparent that no appeal lay, because no basis for damages in an amount permitting an appeal was shown, the court issued the writ to review an order overruling a motion to dismiss the appeal taken. Territory v. Doan, (Ariz. 1900) 60 Pac. 893.

60. Robinson v. Sacramento, 16 Cal. 208; Mason, etc., Drainage Dist. v. Griffin, 134 Ill. 330, 25 N. E. 995.

Action with respect to the audit of claims has been permitted in some cases. State v. Washoe County, 14 Nev. 66; State v. Paterson, 39 N. J. L. 489; People v. Madison County, 51 N. Y. 442; People v. Barnes, 44 Hun (N. Y.) 574; People v. Highland, 8 N. Y. St. 531; Clermont County v. Robb, Wright (Ohio) 48.

Courts.— The writ will lie: to a city court empowered to grant new trials (Archie v. State, 99 Ga. 23, 25 S. E. 612); to a common pleas court to review an award of damages, made by such court under a statute permitting an assessment in favor of one whose building has been destroyed by a municipality to prevent the spread of a fire (Stone v. New York, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 157); to a county court to review its action in directing an examination of the accounts of a county collector, and entering judgment against him for uncollected penalties (Snoddy v. Pettis County, 45 Mo. 361); to a district court to review its action in refusing to appoint inspectors on a contested election (State v. Searle, 59 Minn. 489, 61 N. W. 553); to probate courts, or courts acting as such (Ex p. Roanoke, 117 Ala. 547, 23 So. 524; Malone v. Cornelius, 34 Oreg. 192, 55 Pac. 536; Garnsey v. Klamath County Ct., 33 Oreg. 201, 54 Pac. 539, 1089; Kirkwood v. Washington County, 32 Oreg. 568, 52 Pac. 568. Contra, Peters v. Peters, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 529, for the reason that it was an ecclesiastical court); but not to a military tribunal (Matter of Vidal, 179 U. S. 126, 21 S. Ct. 48, 45 L. ed. 118. See also ARMY AND NAVY, 3 Cyc. 861, note 2).

b. Ministerial, Executive, or Legislative Acts. It necessarily follows that the writ will not lie to review acts which were not done in the exercise of judicial power or authority, but were merely ministerial, executive, or legislative in their character.[61]

Military board of examination.— The decision of a military board of examination is reviewable by certiorari. People v. Hoffman, 166 N. Y. 462, 60 N. E. 187, 54 L. R. A. 597.

Municipal boards and officers.— The writ will lie to review the action of a town board in removing an assessor (Merrick v. Arbela, 41 Mich. 630, 2 N. W. 922); of a health board in refusing to register births as required by statute (Matter of Lauterjung, 48 N. Y. Super. Ct. 308); of a board of supervisors in directing an election to relocate a county seat (Herrick v. Carpenter, 54 Iowa 340, 6 N. W. 574); in creating an office and increasing the salaries fixed by statute (Robinson v. Sacramento, 16 Cal. 208); or to set aside any wrongful, illegal, or fraudulent appropriation of public moneys (Shields v. Paterson, 55 N. J. L. 495, 27 Atl. 803 [followed in Shields v. Grear, 55 N. J. L. 503, 27 Atl. 807]); of a city council in removing a city officer (Macon v. Shaw, 16 Ga. 172), granting a ferry license (Fay, Petitioner, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 243), or to test the lawfulness of a municipal ordinance providing for the payment of an official salary (Christie v. Bayonne, 64 N. J. L. 191, 44 Atl. 887); and of school trustees in uniting and dividing school districts (Miller v. School Trustees, 88 Ill. 26; State v. Whitford, 54 Wis. 150, 11 N. W. 424); but it has been refused to boards of election (Ex p. Carson, 5 S. C. 117), and of road commissioners (Nobles v. Piollet, 16 Pa. Super. Ct. 386), because they were not inferior courts.

Proceedings purely ecclesiastical are not "civil proceedings" which may be reviewed by certiorari. Peters v. Peters, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 529; Ex p. Gray, 2 L. C. Rep. 292, 3 Quebec Q. B. 191. But see Ex p. Little, 33 N. Brunsw. 210, holding that the writ will lie to remove the finding of an ecclesiastical court made without evidence.

Temporary court.— It has been held that a constitutional provision empowering a superior court to correct errors in inferior judicatories of a permanent nature by writ of certiorari has no application to the proceedings of a court called together for a temporary purpose, and existing only for the time of the trial. Heard v. Heard, 18 Ga. 739.

The writ will not lie to obtain a judgment law;[73] but if the record shows non-conformity to legal requirements the writ will lie.[74]

E. Matters Subsequent to Judgment. Matters arising subsequent to judgment, which afford no ground of objection to its correctness at the time of its rendition, furnish no ground for issue of the writ;[75] but it is otherwise where good grounds of objection were unknown until after judgment.[76] However, the writ is sometimes used in connection with the writ of supersedeas, in the place of an audita querela, to give relief to a party against whom a judgment has been rendered, for causes which have originated since the rendition thereof.[77]

F. Right to Office. Unless by statute[78] certiorari will not lie to try title to office, or where the determination of the right to office is the obvious and only object of the writ.[79] There are, however, decisions holding that collateral questions involving the legality of an election to office may be raised and determined in testing the validity of laws or resolutions adverse to the parties' rights.[80]

determine whether or not the court failed to perform its duty[88] or was guilty of misconduct.[89] The writ may also be granted on the ground that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the inferior tribunal,[90] and by statute the writ will lie to remove a judgment in some cases, where the judgment is complained of as unjust, with a view to try the cause again on the merits.[91]

2. IN ALLOWING OR REFUSING APPEAL. Certiorari may be allowed for the refusal to allow or approve an appeal,[92] for irregularity in sustaining an appeal and proceeding to a hearing and determination,[93] to review the action of the court below in fixing the amount of a supersedeas bond in a sum in excess of that fixed by statute,[94] where an appeal has been improperly dismissed,[95] a special appeal overruled,[96] or where an appeal lawfully dismissed has been improperly reinstated.[97]

Expiration of time pending motion to vacate judgment.— The writ will not be granted, although the time to appeal from a judgment expired before the decision of a motion to vacate it. Lewis v. Gilbert, 5 Wash. 534, 32 Pac. 459.

Insufficient excuse.— That petitioner was served with the warrant in a county other than that of his residence, where he was on business, that he left a sick family at home and was hurrying back to them when the warrant was served, and that it was impossible for him to return in time to appeal from the judgment does not present a sufficient excuse. Copeland v. Cox, 5 Heisk. (Tenn.) 171. So it is not a sufficient excuse that applicant failed to appeal because informed by his attorney that the case was compromised and that the judgment against him was to be released, and it was not released. Stocking v. Knight, 19 Ill. App. 501.

inexcusably failed to seasonably perfect an appeal taken,[2] as by neglecting to furnish the security required by statute,[3] or has relied on another, who abused his confidence, to do that which he should have done himself,[4] he will not be permitted to resort to certiorari as a remedy.

2. Through Act of Judge or Clerk. Where an appellant is deprived of the benefits of an appeal duly taken, because of delay on the part of the judge in settling the case on appeal[5] or because of his omission so to do,[6] because of his retirement from office before such settlement,[7] or because the case as made up by him does not correctly set forth the ground of exceptions,[8] he is entitled to proceed by certiorari as a substitute for the lost right; and, except where the clerk has acted as the agent of appellant in the premises,[9] will have the like right where he has sustained the loss of his remedy by appeal by reason of the negligence of the clerk in the performance of his official duties.[10]

Although a valid excuse is presented the writ will not issue where the court below proceeded regularly within its jurisdiction, and the aggrieved party might resort to another remedy. Haynes v. Semmes, 39 Ark. 399.

Agreements of parties and counsel.— The writ will not issue where there is evidence of a compromise and settlement, although it was agreed that the right of appeal should not be lost if no compromise was made (Williamson v. Boykin, 99 N. C. 238, 5 S. E. 378) or an alleged agreement between counsel is denied (Hutchinson v. Rumfelt, 83 N. C. 441).

2. Andrews v. Whisnant, 83 N. C. 446.

Certiorari has issued as a substitute for appeal where the papers taken from the clerk's office for the purpose of making a statement on appeal were not returned in time to make a transcript (Seay v. Yarborough, 94 N. C. 291) or where the attorney's reasons for the appeal were not filed (Garrett v. Perryman, 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 108).

Delay in bringing up transcript cannot be corrected when not applied for by appellant or his attorney. Crafts v. Stockton, 8 Yerg. (Tenn.) 163.

Delay in docketing transcript does not entitle a party to the writ. Pittman v. Kimberly, 92 N. C. 562.

Delay in settling case on appeal.—An application for a certiorari to a judge to settle a case on appeal, made seven months after the appeal was taken, will be denied in the absence of an affidavit to negative laches. Peebles v. Braswell, 107 N. C. 68, 12 S. E. 44. And a "liberal practice among the members of the bar" is not a sufficient excuse for delay in making up a statement of the case on appeal until after the time limited by statute. Wilson v. Hutchinson, 74 N. C. 432.

Failure to pay clerks' fees for making transcript is fatal. Smith v. Lynn, 84 N. C. 837; Andrews v. Whisnant, 83 N. C. 446.

Illness of one of firm of attorneys.—Where defendant's attorneys agree that one of them shall perfect the appeal, the fact that the one selected to attend to the matter was taken sick after notice of appeal was filed, the other being in perfect health, although absent from the county on business, is not sufficient excuse for defendant's failure to perfect the appeal, so as to entitle him to a review of the judgment by certiorari. Boyer v. Garner, 116 N. C. 125, 21 S. E. 180. But the illness of two of petitioner's counsel, the appointment to an important office of the third, the refusal of the court to hear the appeal, and the insolvency of the counsel is sufficient to excuse the delay. Bayer v. Raleigh, etc., Air Line R. Co., 125 N. C. 17, 34 S. E. 100.

4. State v. Williams, 9 N. C. 100.

Fault of attorney.— Ignorance of the practice or inadvertence on the part of the attorney for the complaining party in preparing, securing the execution of, or filing the bond or undertaking on, appeal, whereby the benefits of an appeal are lost, furnish no reason for granting relief by certiorari. Turner v. Powell, 93 N. C. 341; Turner v. Quinn, 92 N. C. 501; Winborn v. Byrd, 92 N. C. 7; Smith v. Abrams, 90 N. C. 21; Elliott v. Holliday, 14 N. C. 377.

If the error is that of the court and not of the prevailing party the failure to appeal may be excusable, in which case certiorari will lie. Simmons v. Dowd, 77 N. C. 155.

6. Where the judge omitted making up a case during the term, and the attorneys took the papers from the clerk's office for the purpose of preparing the case, but did not return them until too late for the clerk to prepare a transcript in time, certiorari will be allowed as a substitute for an appeal. Murray v. Shanklin, 20 N. C. 345.

3. Through Illness or Death. Illness of the appellant of such a character as to incapacitate him from taking a timely appeal,[11] or from procuring others so to do,[12] or from perfecting an appeal taken by him,[13] or his death intermediate the judgment and the expiration of the time within which an appeal might have been taken [14] will ordinarily excuse the failure to pursue that remedy and entitle the party to the writ.

4. Through Inability to Furnish Security. Inability to procure or furnish security, accidental [15] or otherwise,[16] or misapprehension, caused by the action of the adverse party,[17] has been held sufficient to excuse the omission in this respect.

5. Through Misconduct of Adverse Party. The writ will ordinarily lie if the right has been lost through the fraud, contrivance, or culpable conduct of the adverse party, or where the applicant has been misled by such party.[18]

Absence from the trial by reason of old age, feeble health, and remote residence, and the miscarriage of a letter from counsel advising of the judgment will excuse the failure to appeal in time. Wright v. Haley, 34 Tex. 48.

Failure to ask for continuance.— Sureties on a capias ad satisfaciendum bond, against whom a judgment was rendered because of the failure to produce their principal, he being ill, are not entitled to a certiorari, as they might have procured a continuance, for which they failed to ask. Inadvertence.—After a motion to dismiss an appeal for the failure to file an appeal-bond in time, the failure being caused by inadvertence and after filing the bond, a certiorari may be granted as a substitute for the ineffectual appeal. Stickney v. Cox, 61 N. C. 495.

(Tenn.) 108), or where, relying on an assurance that the case would be dismissed, he fails to exercise due diligence (Austin v. Bush, 11 Colo. 198, 17 Pac. 501). Nor will he be entitled to the writ because of the loss of a good defense, by the fault of the adverse party. Watts v. Boyle, 26 N. C. 331.

Fraud of principal against sureties.—Where the parties to a capias ad satisfaciendum bond, conditioned to appear in the county court to take the benefit of the act for the relief of insolvent debtors, were called, and failing to appear judgment was entered against them and their sureties, it was held that the sureties were not, on the allegation of having been prevented by the fraud of plaintiff's agent from making a surrender of their principals in discharge of themselves, entitled to the writ of certiorari to enable them to make it in the superior court. Betts v. Franklin, 20 N. C. 496.

ters of important public concern.[19] It will not lie for such a purpose, however, where delay will result, unless the proceeding was without jurisdiction or in gross violation of law.[20]

F. New or Difficult Questions. While in some cases the court has declined to grant the writ on the ground that new or difficult questions of law are involved,[21] in others it has issued for those reasons;[22] but even though this may be a ground for the writ, its issue is a matter of discretion[23] which can only be exercised when some specific difficulty in point of law is shown.[24]

IV. RIGHT TO WRIT.

A. Parties Entitled — 1. Test of Right. The test of the right to certiorari is whether the person seeking the writ was a party in form or substance so as to be concluded by the determination below,[25] and it will not, in general, issue in behalf of a stranger to the proceedings below or of one who was not a party thereto.[26]

A petitioner to bond a town may sue out the writ to review the proceedings of the county judge. People v. Wagner, 7 Lans. (N. Y.) 467, 1 Thomps. & C. (N. Y.) 221.

Judge of court.— When an inferior court, acting within what it claims to be its exclusive jurisdiction in the enforcement and ascertainment of rights of litigants before it, is through its judge made sole defendant in writs of certiorari or prohibition from a superior court, based on a claim of the latter that it has appellate jurisdiction over it touching the matters before it, the judge of such inferior court is authorized to apply to the supreme court for writs of certiorari against the appellate court. State v. Voorhies, 49 La. Ann. 1717, 23 So. 107.

Municipality.— If not inhibited by statute a town may bring certiorari to review proceedings to bond it. People v. Wagner, 7 Lans. (N. Y.) 467, 1 Thomps. & C. (N. Y.) 221. But a writ sued out on behalf of a municipality will be quashed, where it appears that the application was not made on authority as required by law. State v. Manitowoc County, 59 Wis. 15, 16 N. App. Div. 239, 71 N. Y. Suppl. 1044.

Persons beneficially interested.—An insolvent, against whom an order is made to account for certain property (Madison v. Piper, (Ida. 1898) 53 Pac. 395), a special administrator illegally directed to pay out moneys of the estate (State v. Second Judicial Dist. Ct., 18 Mont. 481, 46 Pac. 259), or a widow (Hefflefinger v. George, 14 Tex. 569) is "beneficially interested" within a statute authorizing the issue of the writ to persons so interested; but an agent or attorney of a party beneficially interested has not himself such an interest as will enable him to apply for the writ (State v. Napton, 24 Mont. 450, 62 Pac. 686), and one who has transferred his entire interest in gambling devices is not a party beneficially interested so as to entitle him to review an order directing their destruction (Sanderson v. Winchester, 10 N. D. 85, 85 N. W. 988). Certiorari brought by one beneficially interested in an estate to review the settlement of the administrator's account is for the benefit of all others similarly interested. Hefflefinger v. George, 14 Tex. 569.

V. PROCEEDINGS AND DETERMINATION.

A. Jurisdiction — 1. In General — a. Rule Stated. Under their supervisory powers, courts of general jurisdiction exercise, by the writ of certiorari, control over all inferior jurisdictions, however constituted, which are vested with power to decide on personal or property rights, and whatever their course of proceeding;[38] but a court vested with common-law and chancery jurisdiction has no power, where exercising the latter jurisdiction to award the writ;[39] and unless the authority is inherent, or the jurisdiction is expressly or impliedly conferred

3. CONFLICT OF JURISDICTION. If exclusive jurisdiction is vested in a particular court, it can only be exercised by that court,[63] but constitutional authority to inferior courts to remove causes from lesser jurisdictions will not exclude the authority of the superior courts to issue the writ.[64] As a rule the supreme court of the state will not take jurisdiction where the application can be made to a superior court,[65] unless the case is of more than ordinary magnitude and importance, to prevent a denial of justice,[66] in cases where the superior court cannot entertain the application because of the amount involved,[67] or where no application can be made to the superior court in time to prevent the consummation of the alleged wrong.[68] Under the English practice the writ issued out of the king's bench to draw to it jurisdiction over cases which properly belonged to it or with which it had concurrent jurisdiction.[69]

In the District of Columbia the court in Hendley v. Clark, 8 App. Cas. (D. C.) 165, explained the case of Cross v. Smith, 2 Ld. Raym. 836, 7 Mod. 138, 1 Salk. 148, supra, and repudiated the doctrine laid down in Coleman v. Freedman, 1 MacArthur (D. C.) 160, to wit, that a cause could be removed on the sole ground of concurrent jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, and the practice founded thereon and declared the doctrine to be unsound.

Writs to remove decrees of the orphans' courts on the settlement of accounts may be styled between the persons seeking redress erly plaintiff only in those cases in which the individual for whose benefit the writ is sued out cannot, upon legal principles, be himself the plaintiff, or where the state or the whole community have some rights or interest in the subject-matter, not speculative or political, but direct and positive rights and interests which are to be affected one way or the other.[71]

b. Joinder — (I) Where Parties Severally Affected. Parties severally affected by the proceedings below must sue out separate writs, although there is but one act to be reviewed[72] and but one record,[73] but in such a case the writ will not be quashed because issued on the application of more than one.[74] So two or more who are not in privity cannot unite in one writ to review separate judgments against them;[75] nor can they unite where they seek similar, but not the same, relief.[76] If the determination is against several defendants, only one of whom appeared, the others may sue out the writ, but upon its return should take a rule on the one who appeared to show cause why they may not prosecute without him.[77]

(II) Where Parties Jointly Affected. Persons jointly affected by the determination below must prosecute jointly,[78] unless there is a severance;[79] but one may prosecute on showing that his co-defendant is incapable of consenting or is absent from the state,[80] and on a release of errors by one the proceeding may continue in the name of the other.[81]

2. Defendants — a. In General. All persons interested and whose rights are directly affected, or who were proper parties to the record sought to be annulled, must be made defendants;[82] but whether or not persons who have acquired or

and the personal representatives. Burrough v. Mickle, 3 N. J. L. 472; Wood v. Tallman, 1 N. J. L. 177.

attempted to acquire rights on the basis of the action under review shall be summoned and heard is discretionary and their presence or absence is not jurisdictional.[83]

b. Inferior Tribunal. The court is the only necessary respondent in a proceeding to review its order,[84] but a judicatory whose judgment is questioned cannot be made defendant merely because it may have erred in judgment.[85]

c. Public Bodies — (I) In General. In a proceeding to review the action of a court, the public corporation whose action is complained of should be made defendant.[86] If the office of the writ is limited to an inquiry into the inferior jurisdiction, it is improper to join tribunals or officers exercising separate and distinct jurisdictions, or persons having no voice in the proceedings to be reviewed.[87]

(II) The State. It has been held that the state cannot be made defendant in any case,[88] and the writ cannot be issued against the state, when it is in no wise a party to the proceeding below.[89]

3. Objections and Remedies — a. Adding Parties. New[90] or necessary[91] parties may be added.

C. Time For Instituting — 1. In General — a. Rule Stated. Timely application for the writ must be made. Unreasonable delay or failure to apply within the time limited by statute or established by the local practice is good ground for refusing the writ, in the absence of exceptional circumstances.[97] Nor can a void

In North Carolina an application for the writ as a substitute for a lost appeal must be made before the merits of the case are entered upon (McDaniel v. Pollock, 87 N. C. 503), or before the appeal is regularly reached in its order on the docket for argument (State v. Harris, 114 N. C. 830, 19 S. E. 154; State v. Rhodes, 112 N. C. 857, 17 S. E. 164). In Tennessee application for the writ must be made to the first term of the court after the rendition of the judgment, or else some sufficient cause for the delay must be shown in the petition. Mason v. Hammons, 7 Coldw. (Tenn.) 132; Perkins v. Hadley, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 143. This rule will not be modified so as to permit a party to apply after the prescribed time, although the judgment sought to be revised was based on a certain measure of damages, and after expiration of the time to apply the measure of damage in such case was changed by a decision of the supreme court. Perkins v. Hadley, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 143.

In Canada the application was granted when made at the first term after the refusal of an appeal (Ex p. O'Regan, 8 N. Brunsw. 261; Ex p. Hebert, 8 N. (III) RUNNING OF STATUTE.[5] When the statute begins to run from the determination below, a final determination is intended;[6] from confirmation of the action complained of, legal confirmation;[7] from and after the trial, the day after the trial;[8] before the first day of the term at which the issue might be tried, the first term at which the cause might be regularly noticed for trial;[9] and from the illegal action of a public board, the time the first step is taken which will affect the complaining party injuriously.[10] A certiorari is brought when the petition is filed.[11]

c. In Absence of Limitation — (I) IN GENERAL. In the absence of statute or rule prescribing any fixed period within which application for the writ shall be made, the question as to whether or not the application is seasonable is addressed to the discretion of the court,[12] and its exercise of that discretion will not be revised, if not abused.[13]

(II) APPLICATION OF RULE IN ERROR. In some jurisdictions, in analogy to the rule of limitation on suing out writs of error and in the absence of special circumstances, that rule has been adopted.[14]

2. AGAINST MUNICIPAL BODIES. The review of the action of a municipal body

5. Suspension of statute.— The mere pendency of a petition for the writ will not suspend the running of a statute prescribing the time within which certiorari must be brought, where the petitioner has failed to give timely notice of the sanction of the writ or of the time and place of hearing. O'Keefe v. Cotton, 102 Ga. 516, 27 S. E. 663. So, the suing out of a writ of certiorari, without complying with the prerequisites to its issue, will not suspend the running of the time limited for the application. Carpenter v. Southern R. Co., 112 Ga. 152, 37 S. E. 186.

Adjournment of public board.— N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2125, which requires the writ to be procured and served within a stated time after the determination complained of, is not solely a statute of limitations, but by implication grants the relator the time specified within which to procure the writ in a case where, although the determining body has finally adjourned after making a disposition of the matter in question, it or its successor can subsequently obey any order of the court. People v. Sutphin, 166 N. Y. 163, 59 N. E. 770 [following People v. Champlain, 33 N. Y. App. Div. 277, 53 N. Y. Suppl. 739, and modifying 53 N. Y. App. Div. 613, 66 N. Y. Suppl. 49].

Assessments.— Within a statute limiting the time to review for excess of jurisdiction, the time limited for the annulment of an assessment for a local improvement begins to run from the making of the assessment and not from the time of the resolution authorizing the improvement. Polk v. McCartney, 104 Iowa 567, 73 N. W. 1067.

See also People v. Cooper, 22 Hun (N. The New Jersey statute providing that "writs of error shall not be brought but within five years after rendering the judgment complained of" does not apply to writs of certiorari. Carman v. Carman, 3 N. J. L. 215, where the court considered the advisability of adopting the like limitation with respect to certiorari. The time was subse-must be sought while it retains jurisdiction of the proceedings.[15] To test its corporate existence, the writ must be sued out before its organization and assumption of corporate functions.[16]

3. Effect of Laches — a. In General. The writ may be granted after the expiration of the time limited, if the delay is satisfactorily explained,[17] as by a showing of the judge to whom the writ was required to be presented.[18] To bar the right to the writ for laches, it must appear that since the making of the record sought to be reviewed, and upon its assumed validity, something has been done so that great public detriment or inconvenience might result from declaring it invalid.[19]

b. Where There Was Want of Jurisdiction. Notwithstanding the laches of the applicant, he will not be precluded where the determination sought to be reviewed was made without jurisdiction and has not been carried into effect.[20]

4. Objections — a. How Taken. Objection to the proceedings because not instituted within the time limited should be taken by motion to dismiss[21] or to quash[22] the writ.

b. Waiver. Laches in applying for the writ may be waived by appearance and pleading[23] or by making a return.[24]

Consideration on hearing.—Whether the provisions of an act limiting the time within which a writ of certiorari shall be allowed or granted to review an assessment made under such act will prevent the supreme court, after the period so limited, from allowing a certiorari to determine the constitutionality of the act, or the portion of it under which the assessment was made, and the relation of the limitation to such act, may be disposed of on the hearing, if the facts present the question. D. Conditions Precedent — 1. In General. All requirements which are conditions precedent to the issue of the writ must be complied with.[25]

2. Payment of Costs Below. Where it is required that before any writ of certiorari shall issue the applicant shall produce and file with the petition a certificate from the officer,[26] whose decision or judgment is the subject-matter of complaint, that all costs which may have accrued on the trial below have been paid,[27] the failure to produce and file such a certificate will preclude the right to the writ.[28]

E. Application — 1. Necessity of. Except when sued out by the sovereign power,[29] a writ of certiorari will not, as a rule,[30] issue of course, but an application by petition, affidavit, or other mode prescribed, showing prima facie a case for relief, is prerequisite to its issue.[31]

27. Sufficiency.—A statement in the certificate that all costs have been paid is sufficient (Williams v. Shuler, 94 Ga. 660, 19 S. E. 981), but a recital that the petitioner has paid the "court costs in said case" is not a compliance with the statute (Osborn v. Osborn, 70 Ga. 716). The failure to state that all costs have been paid is not fatal, where the petitioner shows that he has paid the costs and gives the items. Scott v. McDaniel, 64 Ga. 780.

Lost petitions.— An application should not be dismissed on the ground that the court had ordered the same to issue at a previous term, when, by the carelessness of the opposite counsel, the petition had been mislaid and the issuing of the writ so prevented. Hopkins v. Suddeth, 18 Ga. 518.

Not waived by appearance.— The necessity of an application is not waived by appearance. Newell v. Hampton, 1 Marv. (Del.) 1, 40 Atl. 469.

Stranger.—A statute authorizing the oath to be made by the applicant or his agent does not permit the application to be made by a stranger to the judgment sought to be reviewed, although he describes himself as agent. Okerlind v. Fyke, 90 Ill. App. 192.

An affidavit by an attorney should show why it was not made by the party; but this omission may be supplied on motion to quash. Flanagan v. Murphy, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 291. Such an affidavit, when made by the attorney who had charge of the proceedings, is sufficient, although it fail to state that affiant made it as the agent or attorney of plaintiff in certiorari. 35. Order of presenting rulings.— In Michigan an affidavit asking a review of rulings should present them as they actually occurred, as in a bill of exceptions. It should not combine in one recital a series of detached rulings on points that were not connectedly presented. Knapp v. Gamsby, 47 Mich. 375, 11 N. W. 204.

Numbered paragraphs.— Certiorari is not a suit within the Georgia pleading act of 1893, requiring the allegations of pleadings to be set forth in numbered paragraphs. Royal v. McPhail, 97 Ga. 457, 25 S. E. 512.

36. Thus in Nova Scotia, an application to review a conviction under a liquor license act must state that the applicant did not violate the act. Reg. v. Power, 28 Nova Scotia 373; Reg. v. McDonald, 26 Nova Scotia 402.

Obligation to pay or receive more or less than due.— Where it is provided that no writ of certiorari shall be allowed unless the applicant shall make affidavit that the proceedings proposed to be removed are unjust and illegal, "and if not removed, will oblige the said applicant to pay more money to, or receive less from his opponent, than is justly due," an affidavit which merely alleges that the proceedings proposed to be removed are unjust and illegal is fatally defective. Benner v. Ducoing, 1 Browne (Pa.) 217.

37. Thus in a proceeding against road commissioners for neglect to repair, the affidavit need not contain the allegation prescribed by statute, i. e., that the proceeding would compel defendants "to pay more money than is justly due," when no money is to be paid by defendants in any event. Wilt v. Philadelphia, etc., Turnpike Co., 1 Brewst. (Pa.) 411.

38. Certainty required.— Where the denial of liability in the petition is in the nature of a plea non est factum, it must have such certainty that if false an indictment for perjury will lie. b. Entitling. The affidavit in support of the application must be properly entitled,[42] but dismissal of an application because it is improperly entitled will not preclude a renewal thereof on affidavits amended in that respect.[43]

c. Particular Averments — (I) Party's Right to Prosecute — (A) In General. The applicant must show that he occupies such a relation to the controversy as to entitle him to sue out the writ,[44] or that he has interests which will be injuriously affected by the proceedings sought to be reviewed;[45] and, where the writ only issues in such case, the petition must show on its face that the petitioner has no other mode of review.[46]

A general allegation of injury is insufficient. State v. Lockhart, 18 Wash. 531, 52 Pac. 315.

Sufficient showing.— In an application for a writ of certiorari to review the action of a county board in calling an election under the local option law, averments that applicant was a retail liquor dealer at the time complained of; that he had large property which would greatly deteriorate in value should an election result in prohibiting the sale of liquors; and that the city council had refused him license on the sole ground that the election resulted in such prohibition, sufficiently show an injury peculiar to applicant to entitle him to a writ of certiorari to test the legality of the call for the election. fect an appeal in time,[48] except where appeal is a concurrent remedy.[49] Likewise some sufficient reason must be shown why the application is not made to a superior court of concurrent jurisdiction.[50]

(II) Grounds For Issue—(A) In General. General allegations of error are ordinarily insufficient, and the particular errors complained of and relied on should be distinctly set forth.[51] If, however, the petition clearly states the grounds of complaint, the fact that it sets forth other immaterial grounds is unimportant.[52]

(B) Want of Jurisdiction. If the application is based on want or excess of jurisdiction, such facts must be set out that the court may see that there is just ground of complaint.[53]

The presentation of inconsistent reasons will not excuse the omission to take an appeal. O'Hara v. O'Brien, 4 Ill. App. 154, where the petitioner alleged that he did not know that a judgment had been rendered against him until too late to take an appeal; and that the judgment creditor, by false representations, led petitioner to believe that the judgment would not be enforced.

(III) Rendition of Judgment. A petition for a certiorari as a writ of false judgment must show that a judgment was rendered.[54]

(IV) Setting Out Evidence. If it is complained that the determination was contrary to the evidence, all[55] the evidence introduced below should be substantially set out,[56] and the petition should allege that the facts recited as proved on the trial were all the facts proved.[57]

d. Merits — Good Faith. The applicant must show a prima facie case of merits,[58] and his means of establishing them on another trial, so that it may appear that the determination complained of will be probably changed.[59] He is ordinarily required, moreover, to present an affidavit of good faith or of merits,[60] and in such a case the failure to present a sufficient affidavit of this nature will warrant the refusal of the application.[61] It will be sufficient, however, if the affidavit substantially conforms to the requirements of the statute.[62]

A statement that the inferior court was without jurisdiction is a mere legal conclusion. Coos Bay Nav. Co. v. Coos County, 31 Oreg. 594, 47 Pac. 1101; Southern Oregon Co. v. Gage, 31 Oreg. 590, 47 Pac. 1101; Southern Oregon Co. v. Coos County, 30 Oreg. 250, 47 Pac. 852.

Disqualification of judge.— An original application for a writ of certiorari to bring up the proceedings of a justice of the peace on the ground that the circuit judge was disqualified by relationship to the petitioner should show how he was related. Ex p. Allston, 17 Ark. 580.

The nature and amount of the judgment and against whom it was rendered should be stated. Boyd v. Clark, 21 Tex. 426.

Stating facts expected to be proved.— The rejection of evidence can be no ground for a certiorari, on error, unless the petition sets forth the facts expected to be proved, so that the materiality of the rejected evidence can appear. Bodman v. Harris, 20 Tex. 31.

57. Givens v. Blocker, 23 Tex. 633.

Sufficiency.— Where the petition for certiorari purports to report the evidence introduced by either party at the trial, and states that there is no proof to support the account sued on, it is sufficient, although it omit to state that there was no other evidence. Rollison v. Hope, 18 Tex. 446. And an allegation "and there was no other evidence before the court on the trial of said cause" clearly imports that the petition purports to, and does, set out all the evidence adduced on the trial. Stuart v. Mau, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 784. So a petition setting out the facts proved by plaintiff and averring that defendant offered no evidence controverting such facts is sufficient, although it does not purport to state all the testimony that was introduced. f. Signature and Verification. The application must be properly signed[64] and, if required to be verified, a proper verification is essential to authorize the issue of the writ;[65] but this may be made by any person who is conversant with the facts, as an agent[66] or attorney for the party,[67] or by a minor of sufficient discretion;[68] and while it has been held that a joint application should be verified by all,[69] the weight of authority is to the effect that in such a case a verification by one, on behalf of all the persons on whose behalf the petition is presented, will be sufficient.[70]

g. Exhibits. If a transcript of the record sought to be reviewed or a copy of the opinion or other papers or documents which are material to enable the court to judge of the propriety of issuing the writ is required to accompany or be made a part of the application, non-compliance with such requirement will invalidate the application.[71]

other designated officer,[73] before the hearing,[74] or within the time prescribed therefor by law.[75]

5. Objections — a. In General. Objections to the application are too late when made after the writ has issued and return thereon,[76] and irregularities in suing out the writ or defects in the petition will not authorize a dismissal, where a trial de novo is to be had.[77] A demurrer to the petition can be predicated only upon matters appearing therein.[78] In some jurisdictions by rule of court, on overruling a demurrer to the petition, the writ will issue without leave to answer.[79]

b. Waiver. Defects or irregularities may be waived by failure to object seasonably[80] or to specifically point out the defect;[81] or by filing an answer.[82]

6. Amendments — a. In General. Amendments to a petition for a certiorari should be granted with caution,[83] but they have been permitted so as to include an allegation of facts sufficient to raise the question of inequality in an assessment[84] and the addition of a seal to the jurat by the officer who administered the oath to the petitioner;[85] and a supplemental affidavit has been permitted to be filed for the purpose of explaining why the original was made by the attorney of the party, instead of by the party himself.[86] The applicant will not be precluded because of delay in moving to amend, where the respondent delayed the filing of the return, at which time the petitioner was first apprised of the insufficiency of his petition, and the respondent was not injured by the delay.[87] On the other hand amendments have been refused to supply omissions or cure defects,[88] and an amendment will not be granted if it will not render the petition sufficient to justify the writ,[89] or to add new grounds on final judgment after all the evidence on the issues raised has been taken.[90]

b. New Application. A new application for a writ of certiorari may be entertained by the court where an affidavit defective in form has been amended;[91]

but a second application cannot be entertained where the first application has been heard and refused.[92]

F. Notice of Application or Hearing — 1. NECESSITY OF. As a rule, except in those cases where the writ may issue ex parte, the adverse party and others entitled to be heard should be given sufficient notice of the making or filing of the application or of the hearing[93] within the time prescribed,[94] especially where the effect of the writ is to stay proceedings;[95] but the right to notice may be waived[96] by appearance and going to a hearing on the merits.[97] There are holdings, however, to the effect that no notice is necessary,[98] but that in its discretion the court may grant the writ in the first instance, or require notice or a rule to show cause.[99]

2. SERVICE OF. Service of the notice may be made by any person,[1] and it seems, upon the attorney who represented the adverse party in the proceedings sought to be reviewed.[2]

G. Answer — 1. Necessity of. No answer is necessary, if no provision therefor exists,[3] and an answer filed to an original petition will suffice as an answer to an amended petition which is substantially the same.[4]

made thereon so far as may be necessary to present the question of law sought to be revised,[5] and is insufficient where it raises issues of fact only,[6] or merely sets forth such matters as are deemed available as a defense.[7] Members of a board having custody and control of the record must answer jointly and not separately.[8]

H. Hearing — 1. In General — a. Matters Considered — (I) In General. The court may hear the merits of the case on the petition and answer, may examine the record and evidence below to determine the propriety of the proceedings below,[9] or may await the return of the proceedings below, before taking any action on the merits,[10] as where the petition is ex parte and presents a prima facie case;[11] but it has been held that questions of fact on which the jurisdiction depends will not be reviewed.[12]

(II) Matters Dehors the Record. While there are decisions that affidavits may be read, or other evidence received dehors the record,[13] and that where the ground of the application is the loss of a right to appeal, the court may consider an oral and disputed agreement to waive the provisions of the statute,[14] it is also held that where the whole case is before the court evidence extrinsic to the record cannot be heard,[15] unless on the question of whether or

b. Admissions and Presumptions. All material facts which are well alleged in the petition, and not denied or put in issue by the answer, and all material facts alleged in the answer must be taken to be true.[17] It will not be presumed that the inferior court will exceed its jurisdiction.[18]

c. Reference. In its discretion the court may order a reference to ascertain disputed facts.[19]

I. Security — 1. In General — a. Necessity of. In the absence of statute, no bond or recognizance is necessary, or at least the requirement of security is discretionary,[21] and is insisted on only when the insolvency of the party or his departure from the jurisdiction is apprehended;[22] but a bond, undertaking, or other security required by law is a prerequisite to the issue of the writ,[23] and a writ issued in the absence of the bond, undertaking, or other security required by statute is void.[24]

b. Who May Take. The security cannot be taken by an officer who has no authority.[25]

c. Form and Requisites[26]—(I) In General. The bond should describe the judgment sought to be reviewed,[27] recite from what court the writ was obtained, and be conditioned to perform the judgment of the reviewing court.[28] Where executed by an attorney in fact, his authority should appear in the record.[29]

(II) Amount. A requirement of a bond in double the amount in controversy is satisfied by a bond in double the amount of the judgment sought to revised,[30] and it has been held that the writ should not be dismissed because the penalty of the bond is less than that prescribed by the order for the writ.[31]

(III) Seal. A seal is essential,[32] unless its use has been dispensed with by statute.[33]

d. Approval. Failure of the inferior tribunal to accept or approve a certiorari bond will render void the issue of the writ,[34] and the judge of the superior court has no power to approve the bond by way of amendment.[35] It will be sufficient, however, if the bond duly executed and approved is incorporated in the record,[36] or if, although not formally approved, it is returned by the judge below in response to the writ.[37]

e. Filing. Unless the bond is filed within the time prescribed by statute, the writ cannot legally issue.[38]

invalidated by mere irregularities[39] which may be supplied by intendment;[40] and unless timely objection is taken the defect will be deemed waived.[41]

(11) AMENDMENT. A bond or the like which is defective because of irregularities is amendable,[42] or the defects may be cured by the substitution of a new bond;[43] but if the defect is substantial, there can be no amendment[44] or new bond,[45] in the absence of statutory authority therefor. Under some circumstances, and where the applicant is not at fault, the omission of a bond may be supplied in the reviewing court.[46]

2. WHERE SEVERAL CAUSES REMOVED. While it has been held that it is improper to give but one bond to remove two cases tried at the same time,[47] or cases between different parties on a writ sued out by one who was a defendant in each case,[48] it has also been held that where the same defense exists to judgments obtained in a number of cases a single bond is unobjectionable.[49]

3. APPLICATION IN FORMA PAUPERIS. If the applicant is unable from poverty to furnish the required security, the writ may be sued out in forma pauperis;[50] but the application for leave to sue out the writ must contain sufficient information as to the applicant's poverty and the nature and extent of the claim to enable the court to exercise a sound discretion in the matter.[51]

b. Court or Judge. Unless by statute,[57] a common-law writ of certiorari cannot be allowed or issued by a judge at chambers, but must be applied for and granted in open court;[58] but now as a rule the writ may be allowed or granted in vacation or at chambers or by an officer with authority to act as a judge at chambers.[59]

3. Order of Allowance[60]— a. In General. The rule or order must properly designate the parties,[61] and must show facts necessary to confer jurisdiction on the officer who granted it.[62]

b. Imposing Conditions. In granting the writ the court has no authority to extend its operations,[63] direct the course of procedure after removal,[64] change or alter the determination which is to be reviewed,[65] or change the venue,[66] and an order imposing improper conditions may be rescinded.[67] The court may, however, as a condition of granting the writ in matters of public importance, require prompt preparation and argument;[68] and where it entertains no doubt as to the

4. Notice of Allowance — a. Necessity of. If notice of the sanction of the writ is required to be given by statute,[70] the writ may be dismissed for non-compliance therewith,[71] before the expiration of the time prescribed,[72] unless such notice is waived in writing.[73]

b. Sufficiency of. The notice must affirmatively show that the writ has been sanctioned;[74] but a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute will be sufficient.[75]

K. The Writ — 1. Necessity of — a. In General. It is a rule of general application that the reviewing court has no jurisdiction to review the proceedings below, unless a writ has duly issued whereby the record of the proceedings is to be removed.[76] There are decisions, however, holding that a writ may be waived by voluntary appearance and submission of the questions at issue on an agreed statement of facts[77] or by filing the statements required by law and procuring a continuance.[78] It has also been held that, where a certiorari has been granted by a court without jurisdiction, the parties may agree to transfer the proceeding to

(II) Inferior Courts — (A) In General. A writ to review the proceedings of an inferior court should be addressed to the court and not to a judge thereof,[90] but if the proceeding was had before the judge as an officer it is properly directed to him.[91] If it is sought not only to revise the proceedings of inferior tribunals, but also to assail rights acquired by their action, the writ may be directed to persons claiming such rights.[92]

(B) Court Martial. A certiorari to review the determination of a court martial should be directed to the president of the court.[93]

(III) Municipal Boards and Officers — (A) In General. Where the writ is sought to review the action of a municipal body or of municipal officers, it should be directed to the body or officers and not to a mere subordinate officer, although he may be in actual possession of the record,[94] or to the municipality.[95] The writ should be directed to an official body, in the individual names of its members, adding the name of their office;[96] or it may be directed to an official by name, adding his title, or by the name of the office alone.[97] If the direction states the corporate name of a public body with such sufficient accuracy as to leave no doubt of its identity, misnomer will not invalidate the writ.[98]

4. Defects and Objections — a. In General. A writ may be invalidated by a misdirection,[17] so that nothing can be removed by it;[18] but the objection is available to the adverse party alone[19] and may be waived[20] by making a proper return[21] or submitting to a hearing on the merits.[22]

b. Mode of Objection. Defects in the writ should be taken advantage of by motion[23] or by application to supersede, made before the filing of the return.[24]

c. Amendments. The writ may be amended[25] by supplying an omitted title;[26] by correcting errors in the title or indorsement,[27] in the designation of the parties,[28] in the name of the party to whom the writ is directed,[29] in the designation of the place where the writ is returnable;[30] by striking out that which relates to matters improperly required to be returned;[31] by correctly showing the nature of the action below;[32] by substituting a proper,[33] or supplying an omitted,[34] seal; by adding the sanction of the judge who granted it;[35] and by inserting the date of the teste.[36] An amendment may be permitted, although a term elapse between the teste and return.[37]

b. Mode of Service — (I) In General. The writ should be served by delivery to the person to whom it is directed,[39] although it has been held that service in any manner whereby the party to whom it is directed may reasonably be made aware of its requirement will be sufficient.[40] Service on Sunday is a nullity.[41] A defective service is waived by appearance and response to the writ.[42]

(II) How Objected to. The proper remedy for an improper service is to move to supersede the writ. A motion to quash in the absence of a return is irregular.[43]

c. Appending Other Papers. It is proper to append to the writ and serve therewith the papers on which it was granted, to inform the person served of the nature of the return required of him;[44] but the failure so to do will not excuse a proper return of that for which the writ plainly calls.[45]

L. Supersedeas — 1. Writ as Stay — a. In General. Except where the common-law rule has been changed, a certiorari to a subordinate court or tribunal or an officer operates as a stay of proceedings from the time of its service or of formal notice of its issue,[46] unless the judgment or order complained of has begun to be executed. If they afterward proceed it is a contempt, and the subsequent proceedings are void because coram non judice.[47] The proceedings below are not

Extension of time.— Service of a writ after its return-day cannot be cured by a rule extending it nunc pro tunc, because the writ is void if not executed before the day of its return. Where a writ cannot be served before its return-day because the court to which it is directed has no term within that time, the proper practice is to apply for an extension while it is in esse as a valid process. reversed by the stay, but are merely suspended until the further action of the reviewing court;[48] and notwithstanding the supersedeas or stay, the judgment or order may be given in evidence or any other proceedings may be taken not inconsistent with the dormant character of the determination so far as its enforcement is concerned.[49] Furthermore, it has been held that the issue of the writ will not prevent the filing of a supplemental opinion,[50] the issue of a dispossess warrant,[51] giving notice of the entry of judgment or of an order,[52] holding a new election under another law than that under which the determination to be reviewed was had,[53] or action in an independent although incidental proceeding;[54] nor will the writ affect matters outstanding and not removed by it.[55]

c. Parties Affected. The suspensory power of the writ operates on the court and parties directly connected with the proceedings,[57] and also on those concerned in the matter who have notice of the writ.[58]

d. Effect of Dismissal of Writ. Although the writ is dismissed, the inferior court is without authority to proceed, until the cause is remitted or the supersedeas discharged.[59]

2. Proceedings After Judgment. Proceedings subseqnent to the judgment may be stayed by a writ of supersedeas or by an independent order,[60] as may the enforcement of a municipal resolution, until its validity is determined.[61] The refusal to grant a stay will not change the effect of the writ as a supersedeas.[62] It seems that by the common-law practice, where a warrant or other process issued before the receipt of the writ, it should be superseded at once by the tribunal to which the writ is addressed.[63]

M. Return — 1. Necessity of. A formal legal return is generally a prerequisite to the jurisdiction of the court to review the proceedings or determination below,[64] but it has been held that, to avoid a failure of justice, the cause may be heard without a formal return.[65]

2. Waiver. There are holdings to the effect that a return to a writ of certiorari may be waived by the parties to the writ,[66] but a mere nominal party to attachment has the effect of dissolving the attachment, provided security is given for the payment of any judgment rendered in the reviewing court. Vanderhoof v. Prendergast, 94 Mich. 18, 53 N. W. 792.

the proceedings who is simply the custodian of the record cannot waive the necessity of a return.[67]

3. WHO MAY MAKE RETURN — a. In General. A legal return can be made only by the officer or persons having the custody or control of the record sought to be removed.[68]

b. Inferior Courts. On certiorari to bring up the record of an inferior court, the return should be made by the court[69] or the judge to whom the writ is directed;[70] but if the object is to correct the record brought up by a writ of error, the writ may be responded to by the clerk, although directed to the court.[71] The return should be made by at least a quorum of the court as constituted at the time the writ was applied for,[72] and when the object is to supply facts not shown by the record, the return should be made by all the magistrates who took part in the trial.[73]

c. Public Boards and Officers — (I) IN GENERAL. The board or body whose determination is sought to be reviewed and which retains or controls the record must make the return,[74] which may be authorized by a majority of its members.[75]

(II) EX-OFFICIALS. A valid return cannot be required of or made by a public official whose term of office has expired and who does not control, or who has parted with, the record,[76] unless a personal return is desired.[77] He may, however, return that which was done by him while in office,[78] and officers of a continuous body who succeed those whose action is sought to be reviewed may make a return, provided they control the record.[79]

4. WHO MAY PREPARE RETURN. If a return is sanctioned by the court or tribunal to whom the writ is directed, it is immaterial by whose hand it was actually made.[80]

Attorney of respondent.—A return is not objectionable, although drawn by the attorney for the respondent, but the rule is stricter where it is drawn by the attorney for the party suing out the writ. Smith v. Johnston, 30 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 374; Hunter v. Graves, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 537.

Clerk of court.— The judge to whom the writ is directed may authorize the clerk to prepare the transcript. State v. Sachs, 3 Wash. 496, 30 Pac. 503. On a writ to bring up the proceedings of highway commissioners, the township clerk may authenticate the papers attached to the return, but the return should show that it is made by the commissioners, and not by the clerk. Roberts v. Highway Com'rs, 24 Mich. 182. But see Flanders v. Wood, 113 Ga. 635, 38 S. E. 975, holding that the answer or return to a writ of certiorari cannot be written or dictated by either of the parties to the case, by an attorney therein, or by any other person interested in the case.

5. What May Be Returned[81]— a. In General. The return must contain everything commanded by the writ or required by the practice,[82] and must disclose something on which the reviewing court can act.[83] It should contain specific statements of fact, and not conclusions or opinions,[84] and must be sufficient to enable the reviewing court to pass on the legality of the proceedings below.[85]

b. The Record — (1) What Constitutes. Where the rules of the common law are adhered to, the writ brings up, and the return can only properly include, the record, or proceedings and orders in the nature of a record upon which the

d. Specification of Errors. The alleged error must appear affirmatively.[99]

e. Evidence. Unless by statute or under the circumstances hereinafter referred to, the evidence on which the inferior jurisdiction based its determination forms no part of the record and should not be returned.[1] Where the law requires the inferior tribunal to reduce the evidence taken before it to writing,[2] or the writ so commands,[3] or on review of proceedings had before a justice of the peace, the evidence may properly be returned.[4] A common-law writ of certiorari to review a summary conviction under a penal statute brings up not only questions affecting the jurisdiction of the magistrate, but also the question whether there was any evidence to warrant the conviction. In such cases the evidence must appear on the face of the record.[5] And if in addition to the right to ascertain whether the inferior tribunal proceeded regularly and within its jurisdiction, the court is also authorized to review errors, in addition to the record in its strict sense there may be returned such rulings and decisions of legal questions together with the facts and evidence relative thereto as may be necessary to enable the reviewing court to see that there was proof and that the proof was sufficient to support the determination and to justify the action below.[6]

f. Exceptions.[7] Bills of exceptions which have been signed, sealed, and made a part of the record should be included in the return.[8]

g. Distinct Determinations. Two or more judgments cannot be returned under one writ,[9] but a return is not objectionable because certifying two distinct final determinations made in the same proceedings.[10]

h. Statements Contained in Application. Matters stated in the petition or affidavit on which the writ was granted are not proper as a part of the return.[11]

i. Statement of Obedience to Writ. The return must show that it is made in obedience to a writ duly issued,[12] which should accompany it;[13] and where so required by the local practice should contain a statement to the effect that all the acts and proceedings below, or those referred to in the writ, are returned.[14]

purpose,[38] or the court of review may suspend its action to permit a proper amendment to be made.[39] But it may not be amended where it purports to be complete [40] and it is attempted to add to the record papers not presented below.[41] Nor can omitted portions of the record be supplied,[42] although it has been held that this might be done informally as a matter of indulgence and to save delay and vexation.[43]

b. Striking Out. Immaterial matter or matter dehors the record may be stricken out on application,[44] or on the hearing, as surplusage;[45] but if the court has no authority to strike it out,[46] or it tends to inform the court of the proceedings, irresponsive or irrelevant matter which is returned may be permitted to remain.[47]

11. Certification of New Matter. If the reviewing court desires to be informed of the facts on which the inferior jurisdiction acted, and which are not technically of record, it may require the certification of such facts in its return.[48]

Regarded as made nunc pro tunc.— If there be error in a return which is in conformity to the general practice it will be considered as amended nunc pro tunc. Mann v. Drost, 18 N. J. L. 336.

In Maine on review of the proceedings of county commissioners, the sworn answer of the commissioners, as far as containing conclusions of fact, is regarded as having the same effect as if their record were amended according to the answer. 12. Further Return. If the return is incomplete or defective, a further or supplemental return may be ordered;[49] and in a proper case the court may order a further return of its own motion against objection.[50] But a further return will not be required where the record furnished is complete,[51] where sufficient appears therein to show that the application for such a return is without merit,[52] or where no change will be made in the questions presented for review.[53]

N. Assignment of Errors — 1. Necessity of. On a common-law certiorari no assignment of errors is necessary,[54] for the return being conclusive it cannot be contradicted;[55] but if by statute or the local practice assignment of errors is reasons for the determination comes too late. Overt v. Whitehead, 9 N. J. L. 244.

In New Jersey, at an early day, either party, upon an allegation of diminution, might take a rule upon the justice to amend his return in any matter which ought to appear upon his docket or files; and at the same time upon the allegation of extrinsic facts, take a rule to establish those facts, if relevant, and after the amendment, if the record was still incomplete, take a rule for affidavits to supply matters which ought to be but were not returned. State v. Overseers of Poor, 52 N. J. L. 298, 19 Atl. 787; Sockwell v. Bateman, 4 N. J. L. 423. This rule was relaxed in Townly v. Rutan, 20 N. J. L. 604; Anonymous, 16 N. J. L. 355; Smith v. Opdycke, 12 N. J. L. 85; Goldsmith v. Bane, 8 N. J. L. 87. But subsequently the true rule was formulated in Scott v. Beatty, 23 N. J. L. 256, 259, as follows: "If no state of the case be agreed upon, the proper practice is, in the first instance, to call up the court to return what the facts were. Their return is conclusive. . . . If the court below fail to make a return of the facts, then, from the necessity of the case, and then only, can resort be had to affidavits." And see Gennarino v. De Gandenzio, 64 N. J. L. 157, 44 Atl. 950; State v. Mills, 57 N. J. L. 570, 31 Atl. 1023; State v. Bird, 56 N. J. L. 228, 28 Atl. 428; State v. Overseers of Poor, 52 N. J. If the reviewing court is powerless to compel by rule the return of specific exceptions alleged to have been taken and not shown by the bill of exceptions returned, the proper practice is to call on the inferior court to certify as to the matter alleged to have been omitted from the record. If the alleged diminution of the record is that exceptions duly taken and sealed have not been returned, a rule may issue that the court below certify whether such exceptions were taken, sealed, and filed, and if so that they be sent up. 3. SUFFICIENCY OF. The assignments must specifically point out the particular error or errors relied on,[59] especially where the alleged illegalities are not apparent on the face of the record.[60]

O. Dismissal and Quashing of Writ — 1. GROUNDS — a. b. Defendant. The defendant in the writ may move to quash, and it is immaterial at whosesoever instance the writ may have been placed on the files of the court.[82]

c. Dismissal by Court. In a proper case the court may dismiss the writ of its own motion.[83]

d. Loss or Waiver of Right. The right to quash or dismiss may be lost by failure to move with diligence[84] or by filing a return,[85] but not by permitting a motion for an amended return.[86] However, a waiver of notice of the sanction of the writ and of the time and place of hearing will not deprive a party of his right to dismiss, if that right has been reserved.[87]

motion to quash is in the nature of a demurrer to the petition and must be made before filing the return, which will be treated as a waiver.[92] make timely objection, otherwise he is precluded.[4] Allegations in the application cannot be controverted by the party in whose favor the decision was made. He can only present such questions of law as properly arise.[5]

f. Argument — (I) Conclusiveness of Petition and Writ. The allegations of the writ and the petition therefor will be taken to be true[6] and with the return will be considered as conclusively establishing the facts therein,[7] from which it follows that the truth of the statements in the petition cannot be disproved.[8]

(II) Consideration of Merits. Consideration of a motion to quash should ordinarily be confined to the record.[9] Hence, reasons proper to be considered on the hearing on the merits furnish no ground for dismissal of the writ and cannot be considered,[10] but the testimony of both parties on an application to quash a writ of attachment which was returned with the writ has been considered, and the facts deducible therefrom determined.[11]

(III) Admissions. A motion to dismiss for insufficiency of the petition admits the truth of the allegations therein contained,[12] but a general motion is in the nature of a general demurrer, and no question of imperfection in the form of the petition arises thereon.[13]

(IV) Matters Dehors the Record. Under some circumstances the court may consider matters dehors the record,[14] to advise it, in the exercise of its discretion, of the propriety of granting or denying the motion.[15]

g. Determination. If it is apparent that the inferior tribunal acted within its jurisdiction and proceeded regularly, the writ will be quashed, especially if a further hearing would necessarily result in an affirmance of the determination
